

Let's Read the AD&D 2nd Edition

Monstrous Manual

Introduction

In early 2008 I discovered the website www.rpg.net. I was living in Japan at the time, in a lucrative but boring job which allowed me rather a lot of free time. As with most Japanese jobs I had very little work to do but leaving the office early was frowned upon, so I usually put in daily 10 hour shifts. At least 4 of those hours were spent reading and writing about roleplaying games, whether on that website or on my blog.

One thing I noticed early was that I was spending altogether too much time becoming involved in arguments with other posters about the relative merits of a given version of this game or that. This was all too common at that website. So I decided to do something more constructive, and noticed that a fellow poster (with the moniker (un)reason – who became involved in this story directly, as you will notice), was reading every single edition of Dragon magazine from its very inception and putting his thoughts in a forum thread.

I immediately latched onto this idea, and decided on a particularly miserable rainy Tuesday to begin doing something similar with the AD&D 2nd Edition Monstrous Manual. The plan was to comment on a single monster from that book in a single post every day, and let readers chime in with ideas on how to use the monster in a game of D&D. Little did I realise the project would take 2 years to complete, comprise 5000+ posts, take up 780,000 words, and result in 4 thread closures for exceeding the size limit of rpg.net threads.

This PDF is the distilled end-product of all that work. It is more-or-less an undisturbed, unchanged and unabridged copy of all of those 5000+ posts. I have made minimal formatting changes to try as much as possible to have new entries begin on new pages, and deleted a grand total of two words. The rest is reproduced “as is”. I felt that to run a spellchecker would spoil the purity of the original, so it remains (endearingly, to my eye) full of spelling and grammatical errors. This is in the nature of forum posting and it would somehow deny the unique character of its medium to impose too much order. The somewhat chaotic nature of the finished product pleases me for this reason.

Re-reading the thing as I edited it was a great pleasure. Not only is it full to bursting with creative ideas that any DM of any edition of D&D would think of as a veritable diamond mine for his or her game. It is also genuinely interesting in places, genuinely funny in others, and genuinely just plain weird all the way through. It starts slowly and quickly builds a rhythm and a momentum all of its own. Regular contributors will, I’m sure, fondly remember the in-jokes (PETA girl, Greek and Latin plurals, our friends the “sages”, monster-corpse-armor, egg-thievery, and moaning about the poor artwork). New readers will discover just what a bunch of RPG geeks can come up with when they put their minds to it: sheer unadulterated ideas for your game, plain and simple.

Working on the thread was a pleasure and I’d like to thank everybody who contributed – you know who you are, because your names and posts are here for all to see.

Finally, if you would like to read more of the ramblings of noisms, you can visit my blog at <http://monstersandmanuals.blogspot.com>; or, if you would like to comment on the contents or contact me in relation to anything in it, you can email me at jean.delumeau@gmail.com.

Happy reading!

noisms, 12/08/2011

[Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [A-Gi]

If everybody else is doing it.

Actually, I love the AD&D 2nd edition Monstrous Manual because it was, believe it or not, the first role playing book I ever bought. I have a lot of fond memories of being twelve years old and, on a long car journey, sitting and reading the thing from cover to cover and having my tiny brain almost explode from imagination overload. I'm hoping to recreate some of that here, as well as generate some publicity for those oft-overlooked but pretty cool monsters that inhabit the volume's nooks and crannies - as well as make fun of some silly pictures. (Does anybody remember the Roper picture? I think I could have done better. Actually I think a blind elephant on one of those animal therapy sessions could have done better. But there you go.)

Anyway, without further ado, we're going to plunge right into the nitty-gritty and start off our journey with that stalwart of many an AD&D campaign, the mighty...

...Aarakocra!!!!!!

Okay, so it isn't that mighty. Nor is it a stalwart of many an AD&D campaign. In fact, I don't think I've ever seen it make an appearance in a game, or even draw passing mention. One of the idiosyncracies of having an A-Z monster guide is that there's a good possibility you're going to start off with an anticlimax, I suppose. Why didn't they put the Tarrasque at page 1 and start with a bang?

I'm being a bit mean to the Aarakocra, actually. I have thought about using them, perhaps as often as twice in my life. They're one of the myriad of rarely used low-level mook monsters which I like to call the orc-alternatives; the gang of charlies who come off the substitute bench when slaying orcs and goblins has gotten boring. Crabmen, Mongrelmen, Troglodytes, Tasloi, Miconids....that nefarious ilk. But the interesting thing that sets the Aarakocra apart is the ability to fly, which makes them a good challenge even up to level 6 if they're used in large numbers and grouped with their old pals the air elementals. I can envisage a group of player characters trying to climb up a snow-capped mountain, simultaneously trying to avoid being blown off into the abyss while dodging javelin-dives from angry bird-men.

Technically the Aarakocra's alignment is Neutral Good, which I suppose means the PCs are more likely to use them as allies than enemies, and they're useful for that too; it's always good to have guides who can fly, and luckily the Aarakocra, although reasonably intelligent, can "[be convinced] to serve as a guide or a scout in exchange for a shiny jewel or coin." Presumably this is because of their bird-like origins. It also makes them about the cheapest buys in the entire book - there aren't many creatures in it that can be palmed off with a single coin. ("There, bird-man, go buy yourself something nice. Don't spend it all at once.")

They're also notable for being, I think, one of the only two D&D monsters who can raise a snigger from a 12 year old for having a silly name. (AaraCOCKra... chortle.)

More to follow.

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Aaracockra were cool in my mind because they were the first entry in the complete book of humanoids, and could fly without being overpowered. This meant that when it came to building PC's in the days of massive numbers of splatbooks mid 2nd ed, they had a good deal of ooh shiny factor, without the worry of instantly being disallowed by the GM for being broken.

noisms

04-17-2008 12:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8742892)

Aaracockra were cool in my mind because they were the first entry in the complete book of humanoids, and could fly without being overpowered. This meant that when it came to building PC's in the days of massive numbers of splatbooks mid 2nd ed, they had a good deal of ooh shiny factor, without the worry of instantly being disallowed by the GM for being broken.

Ah, the Complete Book of Humanoids. Never was there a larger collection of "Things to Unbalance Your Game."

weasel fierce

04-17-2008 01:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always thought they were neat, but I cant say we ever used them.

A storyline about how they fight some winged evil race for dominance of the mountain peaks would be cool. Each tribe would have a dragon as their "god" brianm

04-17-2008 02:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8742675)

...as well as make fun of some silly pictures. (Does anybody remember the Roper picture? I think I could have done better. Actually I think a blind elephant on one of those animal therapy sessions could have done better. But there you go.)

Yeah, I like most of the art in the Monstrous Manual. DiTerlizzi completely changed the way I looked at and used hobgoblins, for instance. But just about everything by Jeff Butler is painful to look at. :(

I loved to use the aaracockra as part of my ancient triumvirate. In ancient times, before the rise of men and when elves still cavorted in the fairie realms (yes, I had the "feywild" long before 4th edition :D), the world was ruled and fought over by three races: the aaracockra, the thri-kreen, and the lizard folk. The ancient ruins of all three races can still be found if you know where to look, and each houses both magic and dangers the world hasn't seen since those far ancient days. The current, degenerate forms of all three races shun such places, and call them cursed, so adventurers looking to plunder these primordial cities shouldn't look for help from the descendants of their builders.

- Brian

Piestrio

04-17-2008 04:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Subscribed :)

Piestrio

noisms

04-17-2008 09:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8743534)

Yeah, I like most of the art in the Monstrous Manual. DiTerlizzi completely changed the way I looked at and used hobgoblins, for instance. But just about everything by Jeff Butler is painful to look at. :(

Sometimes you get a wonderful, evocative, eerie, delicate, beautiful DiTerlizzi piece on the opposite page to a Jeff Butler scrawl, and it really makes you wonder what they were thinking. In fact I've found myself getting put off using the monsters that Jeff Butler illustrated for, just because the pictures ruin completely whatever image or atmosphere is conjured up in the text.

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8743534)

I loved to use the aaracockra as part of my ancient triumvirate. In ancient times, before the rise of men and when elves still cavorted in the fairie realms (yes, I had the "feywild" long before 4th edition :D), the world was ruled and fought over by three races: the aaracockra, the thri-kreen, and the lizard folk. The ancient ruins of all three races can still be found if you know where to look, and each houses both magic and dangers the world hasn't seen since those far ancient days. The current, degenerate forms of all three races shun such places, and call them cursed, so adventurers looking to plunder these primordial cities shouldn't look for help from the descendants of their builders.

That's a great idea. I'm actually running a jungle-exploration game on a PBP site at the moment, which is all about exploring ancient overgrown ruins. No Aarakocra are planned, but I can see where they might come in.

noisms

04-17-2008 10:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

So moving swiftly on, and second monster in we've already come to our first Boss-type "I lurk at the bottom of the dungeon waiting for my chance to TPK your arses" creature....

the Aboleth

...which is also, interestingly, the first psionic creature we encounter. I've already mentioned that this book was the first to do with role playing that I ever bought, so I have quite a clear memory of reading the entry from the Aboleth and thinking, What the hell is all this Dis/Sci/Dev and EW, II PsC +1 TS IF TW nonsense? God, when you think about it, early psionics was bloody complicated.

The Aboleth, for those who don't know, is a "loathsome amphibious creature" that basically looks like a 20' sturgeon with three eyes, four tentacles, and - get this - "four pulsating blue-black orifices [which] line the bottom of its body and secrete gray slime that smells like rancid grease." So don't invite it to dinner. It'll make such a mess of the carpet.

I'd be surprised if you don't know this monster back to front already, though - the Aboleth has been a stalwart of the early mid-level game, in my experience, through all the editions; it makes at least one appearance per campaign, and always gets a familiar groan from players. Like when they encounter Mind Flayers, or Grell.

The Aboleth has a number of nasty abilities - favourite among them being the way it can touch you with its tentacles and turn your skin into a transparent membrane that has to be in permanent contact with water or else cause you a heck of a lot of damage. It can also try to force you into slavery through its telepathy, which can be negated by, apparently a remove curse or dispel magic spell.

That last ability is typical of the eccentricities and inconsistencies of AD&D 2nd edition design, actually. A psionic-based attack which is cancelled through magical spells which, when you think about it logically, shouldn't make a difference. Telepathy is neither a curse nor magic, so why on earth would remove curse or dispel magic work to negate it? Well, the obvious answer is that the designers thought up this cool ability, but realised that most parties don't have any sort of defence against psionic attack - so they had to crowbar in a magical defence instead.

I think of this sort of thing as being part of AD&D's charm, but I can understand why the 3.X edition fans hate it so much. It's everywhere in this book, though, so get used to it.

Anyway, more soon.

Smartmonkey

04-17-2008 12:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Be careful man. I dug my copy out a few weeks ago (just for the nostalgia, see...) and now I'm in the midst of putting together a Birthright game. 2e, for all it's warts, is refreshing in it's own way. My game, using purely the PHB + BRCS for chargen, is surprisingly low on crunch...

Subscribed.

Julius Sleazer

04-17-2008 12:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The Monstrous Manual is tied with ICE's Creatures of Middle-Earth for my all-time favorite FRPG bestiary.

noisms

04-17-2008 01:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Julius Sleazer (Post 8746160)

The Monstrous Manual is tied with ICE's Creatures of Middle-Earth for my all-time favorite FRPG bestiary.

I'm a big fan of FRPG bestiaries - even for games I've never played. (I've never played ICE's MERP, for example, but like that bestiary too.) I just love how they distill into book form the imaginations of an entire group of really imaginative people - and possibly slightly warped people too. It also sets my mind off in all kinds of weird directions; already I'm thinking "How can I come up with a campaign involving Aarakocra and Aboleths....?" and having my brain overload with silly but brilliant ideas.

I once read an interview with the fantasy writer China Mieville who said that even though he stopped role playing decades ago, he still buys loads of FRPG bestiaries, just for that very reason.

noisms

04-17-2008 01:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8746135)

Be careful man. I dug my copy out a few weeks ago (just for the nostalgia, see...) and now I'm in the midst of putting together a Birthright game. 2e, for all it's warts, is refreshing in it's own way. My game, using purely the PHB + BRCS for chargen, is surprisingly low on crunch...

Subscribed.

Birthright. Now you're talking!

Smartmonkey

04-17-2008 01:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8746180)

Birthright. Now you're talking!

I found the box set for 10 bucks at a used book store. It was missing Ruins of Empire, but that same shop had the Rjurik highlands on sale for 3 bucks, so I snatched that up too.

My PC's are now the rulers/high druid/court seer of Kvigland.

Julius Sleazer

04-17-2008 01:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8746176)

I'm thinking "How can I come up with a campaign involving Aarakocra and Aboleths....?" and having my brain overload with silly but brilliant ideas.

.

For me it's Mongrelmen, Bullywugs, Broken Ones, and Kuo-Toa.

:)

brianm

04-17-2008 01:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I love aboleth, though I prefer the Holloway (?) illustrations of it from 1st edition.

I never played with psionics, so I just gave it a sorta "cone of cold, but really mental pain waves" sorta attack. I did the same thing for the mindflayers.

I also love to place aboleth as big-time movers and shakers in the ancient, primordial past. Taking a page from Lovecraft, I had the aboleth as coming from beyond the stars and attempting to settle upon the campaign world. They made war against the titans for dominion, and in the process created all sorts of malevolent psionic monsters to be their minions, including the intellect devourer and thought eater. The titans countered by first creating horrors like cloaklers, beholders, and displacer beasts, but had more luck with puddings and slimes and gelatinous cubes, who were completely immune to the psychic powers of the aboleth.

In the end, of course, the aboleth were driven underground. The titans were weakened by the struggle, however, and were overthrown by their children, who set themselves up as gods. When the gods left the Prime Material, nobody thought to lock up monsters created to fight the aboleth, and they were allowed to run free and torment the fledging intelligent races who were just coming into their own. The aboleth remain hidden in the deep places, waiting for their chance to try once more take over the world.

- Brian

noisms

04-17-2008 02:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

(Just because I have the time, and the inclination, I'm putting up another one for today. You lucky lucky people.)

Ankheg

Another old friend which has been a staple since the very beginning of the game. The Ankheg is an "enormous many-legged worm" which lies underneath the ground, then bursts out and GETS you with acidic spit and big mandibles. The rules for it are highly detailed - possibly far more than they need to be. Not only is the adult Ankheg described, but so are the young, as well as the mating habits, breeding habits, method of hibernation, and what happens when they shed their skin. (It would be a really creative DM who had his characters encounter an Ankheg in the middle of growing a new skin, but I suppose it's something different - extra spice for the game.) I like the "parents with young" style encounter because it can face your players with a genuine moral quandary if they are so inclined - is it right to slaughter the harmless young of an animal? - but I'm not sure I can see the point in knowing about an Ankheg's mating habits. (After mating, the the female kills the male, and the young feed on his corpse. Just imagine that, chaps.)

Reading entries like this makes me wonder at the kind of games the designers must have been playing. Did the information that Ankhegs are good for farmland, in recycling the soil, ever become relevant to their games? Did any of them ever actually use an Ankheg shell for armour? (AC 2, if dried and cured.) Or its spit for acid? It's hard to tell. They're interesting ideas, but I just don't see them coming into one of my games without taking on greater significance in the players' minds than what they're supposed to be doing.

For example, I keep seeing myself introducing the topic of farmers who secretly encourage Ankhegs into their lands in order to surreptitiously enrich their soil and gain unfair advantage over their neighbours. But the Ankhegs then become responsible for a spike in the death of innocent farm labourers, which the farmers try to cover up and blame on a local inoffensive tribe of Mongrelmen. The problem is that I can imagine this little vignette becoming more important than the plot of the campaign itself.

Actually...scratch that, it's an awesome idea. I'm yoinking it. From myself.

UglyJimStudly

04-17-2008 02:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8746319)

Reading entries like this makes me wonder at the kind of games the designers must have been playing. Did the information that Ankhegs are good for farmland, in recycling the soil, ever become relevant to their games?

That stuff was in vogue for 2E because the "Ecology of..." articles in Dragon were wildly, ridiculously popular, and they were loaded with that kind of info. Lots of people wrote in saying that stuff should be in the MM. And so in 2E, it was made so.

Quote:

For example, I keep seeing myself introducing the topic of farmers who secretly encourage Ankhegs into their lands in order to surreptitiously enrich their soil and gain unfair advantage over their neighbours. But the Ankhegs then become responsible for a spike in the death of innocent farm labourers, which the farmers try to cover up and blame on a local inoffensive tribe of Mongrelmen. The problem is that I can imagine this little vignette becoming more important than the plot of the campaign itself.

Actually...scratch that, it's an awesome idea. I'm yoinking it. From myself.

And this is why it was wildly, ridiculously popular. The main "problems" with including all that in the monster writeups is you basically get far more adventure hooks than you'll ever be able to use, and as you note it can distract from the main storyline. I don't actually see either as a bad thing, but enough people did to make WOTC decide the pagespace could better be used on more monsters with less fluff.

I never actually picked up the 2e Monstrous Manual - I was a big fan of the Monstrous Compendium format, where the monsters were sold as packs of pages that could be added to a ring binder. Sadly, that never caught on, I wanted to see all the rulebooks printed that way.

noisms

04-17-2008 03:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudly (Post 8746366)

And this is why it was wildly, ridiculously popular. The main "problems" with including all that in the monster writeups is you basically get far more adventure hooks than you'll ever be able to use, and as you note it can distract from the main storyline. I don't actually see either as a bad thing, but enough people did to make WOTC decide the pagespace could better be used on more monsters with less fluff.

Actually the more I think about it the less of a bad thing I see it as. I suppose it depends on the kind of campaign you're running - if it has an epic plot arc such little distractions can be a refreshing change from the main story.

brianm

04-17-2008 04:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ah, the ankheg...

Actually, I got nothin'. :D

I hardly ever used them in my games. Move along, nothing to see here.

- Brian

Captain Thark

04-17-2008 04:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I love the Monstrous Manual to death. It was one of the first RPG books I ever had. Picked it up used and I'd spend hours just reading that wonderful book. I love how it's almost a campaign setting, with all it's cool world info. Every monster seemed to be either A) cannon fodder, B) A Boss or C) An adventure waiting to be written.

It still seems odd to me that while the Player's Handbook and Dungeon Master's Guide in 2e are some of the driest D&D core books ever written, the Monstrous Manual is by far the best written bestiary of any edition.

noisms

04-17-2008 04:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8746574)

Ah, the ankheg...

Actually, I got nothin'. :D

I hardly ever used them in my games. Move along, nothing to see here.

- Brian

Maybe now you will. Some day you'll be sitting down to plan out an encounter for a campaign and you'll think "Why not the Ankheg?" all because of this thread. And my work will have been done. ;)

Wakboth

04-17-2008 04:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8745556)

Sometimes you get a wonderful, evocative, eerie, delicate, beautiful DiTerlizzi piece on the opposite page to a Jeff Butler scrawl, and it really makes you wonder what they were thinking. In fact I've found myself getting put off using the monsters that Jeff Butler illustrated for, just because the pictures ruin completely whatever image or atmosphere is conjured up in the text.

Oh, yes. The book would have been much better served by using DiTerlizzi illustrations throughout.

I loved the MM when I got it, and I love it still, even though I'm only slightly more likely to run a 2e game than to sprout wings and take flight. It's the sort of a book you can pick from your shelf, open randomly, and start reading, and always find something interesting, neat or engrossing.

It's not flawless, though; there are some weird filler monsters, umpty-teen pages of giants split by ecological niches ("Mountain giants are different from hill giants who are different from stone giants..."), and some entries, which have been condensed from larger lists are incomplete (the slaadi one is particularly lacking, IIRC.)

noisms

04-17-2008 05:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8746659)

*Oh, yes. The book would have been much better served by using DiTerlizzi illustrations throughout.*

I loved the MM when I got it, and I love it still, even though I'm only slightly more likely to run a 2e game than to sprout wings and take flight. It's the sort of a book you can pick from your shelf, open randomly, and start reading, and always find something interesting, neat or engrossing.

It's not flawless, though; there are some weird filler monsters, umpty-teen pages of giants split by ecological niches ("Mountain giants are different from hill giants who are different from stone giants..."), and some entries, which have been condensed from larger lists are incomplete (the slaadi one is particularly lacking, IIRC.)

Yeah, and the Baatezu and Tanar'ri entries are a bit rubbish. But let's not get ahead of ourselves. ;)

I disagree with you on the giants, by the way. I love some of the obscure ones.

DMH

04-17-2008 10:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Aboleths- love 'em, but more for the concept of skum. They are masters of breeding and monster making. Their alien appearance and aquatic nature makes them that much more interesting.

Ankhegs- once I saw a player charm one and use it as a tunneling machine. The castle siege was very short after the walls came down.

an_idol_mind

04-17-2008 10:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8746319)

Another old friend which has been a staple since the very beginning of the game. The Ankheg is an "enormous many legged worm" which lies underneath the ground, then bursts out and GETS you with acidic spit and big mandibles. The rules for it are highly detailed - possibly far more than they need to be. Not only is the adult Ankheg described, but so are the young, as well as the mating habits, breeding habits, method of hibernation, and what happens when they shed their skin. (It would be a really creative DM who had his characters encounter an Ankheg in the middle of growing a new skin, but I suppose it's something different - extra spice for the game.) I like the "parents with young" style encounter because it can face your players with a genuine moral quandary if they are so inclined - is it right to slaughter the harmless young of an animal? - but I'm not sure I can see the point in knowing about an Ankheg's mating habits. (After mating, the female kills the male, and the young feed on his corpse. Just imagine that, chaps.)

I actually liked this aspect of the Monstrous Manual a lot. It fleshed out the monsters a bit, but also wasn't so fully integrated into the game mechanics that it couldn't be changed if needed. I sorely wish that 3rd edition had used the Monstrous Manual's formatting of one monster per page plus some societal notes earlier on.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8746319)

Did the information that Ankhegs are good for farmland, in recycling the soil, ever become relevant to their games? Did any of them ever actually use an Ankheg shell for armour? (AC 2, if dried and cured.)

The Baldur's Gate computer game had a side quest where the party could go on an ankheg hunt but were required to kill no more than 10 ankhegs lest they cause damage to the surrounding farmland. It also had ankheg shell armor.

Regarding the farmland thing, I really don't think it makes any sense. No matter what those guys might do for the soil (and realistically, they wouldn't make it better to farm at all), I can't imagine any farmer who isn't a retired adventurer deciding to set up shop near a hive of giant acid-spitting bugs with shells harder than plate mail and a tendency to eat livestock.

noisms

04-17-2008 10:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by an_idol_mind (Post 8747300)

I actually liked this aspect of the Monstrous Manual a lot. It fleshed out the monsters a bit, but also wasn't so fully integrated into the game mechanics that it couldn't be changed if needed. I sorely wish that 3rd edition had used the Monstrous Manual's formatting of one monster per page plus some societal notes earlier on.

Yeah, looking back at what I wrote I think I came across as a bit harsher than I meant to be. Reading the societal notes is interesting and sets off all kinds of good ideas. I just meant that it was hard to imagine when that information would ever be useful in game. (Then I went ahead and pretty much contradicted myself anyway!)

noisms

04-17-2008 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I won't be able to keep up the pace for long, but work is slow and I've got nothing better to do, so...

Arcane

First off, it has to be said this is our first genuinely awful illustration. A blue chump with a big head, basically, which discourages me from using the very monster itself through its sheer... I-could-have-done-better-edness. (In the Planescape Monstrous Compendium I or II - I forget which - there's a much better picture of an Arcane by, guess who, Tony DiTerlizzi.) This is a shame, because Arcanes are a good addition to any campaign - a race of aloof, inscrutable interplanar magical item traders who behave like primadonnas but can end up selling you something really cool if you play your cards right. I would like to one day create a set of random-and-unusual magic item generation tables for Arcanes, so that when players come across one they can end up with the chance to buy all kinds of weird, wonderful and random nonsense.

There are two rather eccentric – I'm tempted to use the word 'arcane' but will restrain myself - rules in the racial description. First, apparently all Arcanes are telepathically linked across the multiverse, so that if one is killed all the others immediately know about it and will never trade with the perpetrator ever again. A bit like one of those subatomic particles that eerily knows where all the other ones are. I forget the name. A higgs-boson? Anyway, this rule just screams out as a crowbarred-in way to police PCs and prevent them from killing every Arcane they come across and, well, stealing their stuff; it's typical of 2nd edition, with its slight finger-wagging attitude and tendency to moralise. (I suppose it stems from the reaction against devil-worship allegations.)

Second, there is the frankly quite odd rule that "if the PCs actively look for one" there is a 10% chance per day of finding an Arcane. No context at all; just if the PCs spend enough time searching, they'll find one - although there is a hint that the chance does increase or decrease depending on location. Was there ever a more pointless rule? Why not base it on good role playing, with characters asking around and persuading merchants to divulge secrets or rumours? Or why not just use the information gathering proficiency? It's yet another example of early D&D's odd impulse to create one-off rules, completely unconnected to everything else, for one-off situations. Exception-based design, I think it's called: we'll see a lot of it over the coming weeks as I delve deeper into the tome.

Anyway, the obvious adventure hook for an Arcane is to have them hire the adventurers as bodyguards, which I suppose would work well in a low-grade, does-what-it-says-on-the-tin sort of way. I'd rather just use them as a very occasional special NPC guest, though; a mysterious merchant passing through and selling his wares, nothing to see here, kind of like Neko in the old SNES Squaresoft game Secrets of Mana, if anybody is old and geeky enough to remember that.

UglyJimStudly

04-18-2008 12:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8746511)

Actually the more I think about it the less of a bad thing I see it as. I suppose it depends on the kind of campaign you're running - if it has an epic plot arc such little distractions can be a refreshing change from the main story.

Mostly I think it's just the age-old clash of styles - sandbox campaigns vs. storyline campaigns. They're great for a sandbox, because there's plenty of hooks for players to latch onto, not so great for storylines because those hooks may not fit into the story the DM wants to present. Hard to please all the people all the time.

Lugh

04-18-2008 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudly (Post 8746366)

I never actually picked up the 2e Monstrous Manual - I was a big fan of the Monstrous Compendium format, where the monsters were sold as packs of pages that could be added to a ring binder. Sadly, that never caught on, I wanted to see all the rulebooks printed that way.

I liked the Monstrous Compendium format, too. My only problem became that, as I bought more and more expansions, I couldn't actually put them in alphabetical order. With one monster on each side of the page, and some monsters spanning multiple pages, it became impossible to interleave the pages logically.

I always had it mind to buy a used photocopier, and put each monster on its own sheet. One side would have a big version of the art, along with the societal notes. The other side would have the stats and combat abilities. Thus, when the encounter happens, you could say, "You see...THIS!" and hold up the page with none of the stats. Of course, I never got around to it. I bet I could do a much better job these days, with a scanner.

UglyJimStudly

04-18-2008 02:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8748057)
I liked the Monstrous Compendium format, too.

I was a huge fan of the Thieves' Guild stuff way back when, which was initially released in a similar format. My favourite thing about that format is that I could customize my rulebooks for each adventure or campaign; if I was running one of TSR's modules, I could grab just the monsters I needed for that session to bring to wherever we were playing. If they'd done the PHB, DMG, and Complete Whatever books in the same format, I wouldn't have gone through so many backpacks during the 90s.

Quote:

I always had it mind to buy a used photocopier, and put each monster on its own sheet. One side would have a big version of the art, along with the societal notes. The other side would have the stats and combat abilities. Thus, when the encounter happens, you could say, "You see...THIS!" and hold up the page with none of the stats. Of course, I never got around to it. I bet I could do a much better job these days, with a scanner.

Yeah, nowadays scanners, PDF, decent free software for formatting and layout, and relatively cheap laser printers make rulebook customization much simpler.

demiurge1138

04-18-2008 06:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8747450)
I won't be able to keep up the pace for long, but work is slow and I've got nothing better to do, so...

Arcane

snip

Ah, arcanes. Never thought I'd say this the first time I picked up a Monstrous Compendium (my first gaming book too!) but I love these guys. I've used them on numerous occasions, in their 3e incarnation as "mercanes" (much better name, in that it isn't an ordinary English word that's used commonly in D&D). Even played one in an abortive epic-level game--a cleric of Boccob who viewed his faith as a long term exchange of services. Boccob gave him phenomenal cosmic power, the mercane brought him new converts to the faith.

I like arcanes/mercanes because they make D&D's implied magic item economy make more sense. Sure, that merchant who just bought that +2 longsword off of you might not find another adventurer to buy it, but those friendly blue men will swing around soon enough and trade it for magic items that will get sold, or maybe just enough food and sundries to keep that merchant happy and comfortable for a year.

noisms

04-18-2008 10:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8749516)

I like arcanes/mercanes because they make D&D's implied magic item economy make more sense. Sure, that merchant who just bought that +2 longsword off of you might not find another adventurer to buy it, but those friendly blue men will swing around soon enough and trade it for magic items that will get sold, or maybe just enough food and sundries to keep that merchant happy and comfortable for a year.

That's true. I also like the air of mystery surrounding them. They just turn up, trade, and move on; nobody knows where to, and nobody knows where they came from.

noisms

04-18-2008 11:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Argos

I find it hard to think of this monster without having two things come into mind: first, one of those cheesy "blob from outer space" B-movies from the 1950s, and second a British mail-order firm of the same name. So I have a tough time taking it seriously. I have images of people in blank & white running shrieking in terror from a glossy mail order catalogue.

Great, over the top description in the text, though: "An argos resembles a giant amoeba. It has one large, central eye with a tripartite pupil, and a hundred lashless, inhuman eyes and many sharp-toothed mouths. An argos can extrude several pseudopods, each tipped with a fanged maw that functions as a hand to manipulate various tools."

A hundred lashless, inhuman eyes. Okay, so poor man's Lovecraft. But I like it.

The Argos has various ways to mess with your head - either by attacking you with regular objects, enfolding you in a pseudopod, enveloping you and swallowing you whole, or blasting you with rays from its many eyes. You know - the lashless inhuman ones. (There's a brilliant, unintentionally funny line here: "The eyes of an argos, like those of a beholder, have a variety of special powers. An argos can bring 1d10 of its smaller eyes to bear on any target. The large, central eye can focus only on targets that are in front of the creature (within 90 degrees of the "straight-ahead point" of the central eye). Though the creature has nearly 100 eyes, only 20 special powers have been noted; therefore a number of eyes must possess the same power." Come on guys, admit it. You just couldn't think of 100 different powers for all the eyes to have.)

Anyway, the eye attacks are randomly determined and of various degrees of nastiness - which is to say boring ones like Darkness 15' Radius, weird ones like Tongues, bog-standard ones like Burning Hands, and a couple of interesting things like Heat Metal and Suggestion. Most of them seem more geared to the "annoying monster" archetype than the "straight up mighty monster" one; the Argos is one of those creatures that DMs love and players love to hate - a tricky ambusher illusionist/ESP type beastie.

More largely pointless 'Ecology' type information: the Argos gradually loses HD over time if it doesn't eat, but on reaching 5 HD it can enter hibernation for a year. This is the first 'ecology' type snippet in the book so far that I've read and thought - "Nah, that does nothing for me." No adventure hook to see here. Move along.

demiurge1138

04-18-2008 11:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The argos is one of those monsters in the book that suffers from a recolored Tom Baxa illustration - the original B&W illustrations were moody and sharp-edged, when Baxa does his own colors, it's in effectively sickly pastels... but the argos in the Monstrous Compendium is just tacky (as is the blue slaad later in the book).

I do like the idea of argos as translator, though. Some beholder or neogi merchant prince has one enslaved to shoot himself and his guests (slaves, clients, whatever) with language beams so they can better understand each other.

Halvormerlinakyad

04-18-2008 05:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

You realize it was originally called the Monstrous Compendium, right? I've got both my binders and numerous supplements to prove it.

noisms

04-18-2008 05:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Halvormerlinakyad (Post 8751724)

You realize it was originally called the Monstrous Compendium, right? I've got both my binders and numerous supplements to prove it.

Yeah, I know. I'm reading the white, hardback combined supplement "AD&D Monstrous Manual", which brought together all the monsters from Monstrous Compendium I and II.

Halvormerlinakyad

04-18-2008 06:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8751731)

Yeah, I know. I'm reading the white, hardback combined supplement "AD&D Monstrous Manual", which brought together all the monsters from Monstrous Compendium I and II.

He's a witch! Burn him!:D

noisms

04-18-2008 06:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Halvormerlinakyad (Post 8751803)
He's a witch! Burn him!:D

What can I say? I was 12 years old when I bought it, I knew no better! ;)

noisms

04-19-2008 10:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Aurumvorax

Ah, this is more like it. After the poncy Arcane, the gloopy Argos, the slimy Aboleth and the weakling Aarakocra, we finally have a straight-up, no holds-barred furry little tough guy, the Aurumvorax.

Billed as a 3' long ball of fury, the Aurumvorax (or 'golden gorgor') is basically a very bad-tempered, eight-legged badger which likes to eat gold and beat up adventurers. The picture makes it look like one of those vaguely ridiculous background aliens from the new Star Wars films, when all the possibilities of CGI had gone to George Lucas' head and he just started filling up every single shot with as many odd creatures as he could. "Eight legged golden badger alien? Okay, put that one in the background when Padme's ship flies into dock on Naboo. What's next? Irritating Jamaican racial-stereotype alien? Hmm, I like the sound of that..."

Anyway, for a 3' long and I imagine rather cute little beastie, the Aurumvorax is pretty nasty. Its AC and HD are better than respectable, and it can also do put you in a world of hurt – biting you and clinging on while doing 8 hp of damage per round until it or you are dead. As it has 12 HD, that could make for some close calls. So it's a typical random encounter enemy for a group of high mid-level characters, who would have to expend a fair bit of healing magic after coming across one. Once it's dead the Aurumvorax's hide can be turned into a garment of "incredible beauty" worth 15-20,000 gold pieces, which also functions as armour. Only a handful of monsters into the book and already we've come across two whose corpses can be made into armour. The designers really loved that particular shtick.

More somewhat pointless ecology information. Aurumvorax mate every eight years and have 1d6 plus 2 babies; only 1 or 2 of the babies tend to survive to adulthood. Right. So then.

Also dwarves "tend to dislike them" but sometimes train them to sniff out gold. And hey presto, an adventure hook appears. The adventurers are hired by dwarves to capture a live Aurumvorax kitten and bring it back for training, and all manner of crazy high jinks ensue....

demiurge1138

04-19-2008 11:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I sort of imagine the dwarves as good samaritans here; after all, most of the aurumvorax kitties will die, so the dwarves hire adventurers to scoop up a few and give them a chance at life.

Hm... aurumvorax versus rust monster cage match...

Wakboth

04-19-2008 04:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I never used an aurumvorax in any game, but I've always thought it's a pretty nifty critter. It has a certain mythological vibe to it (perhaps because of the name), as if it was described by some medieval bestiarist with an unusual grasp of ecology and metallurgy. :)

noisms

04-19-2008 06:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8756107)

I never used an aurumvorax in any game, but I've always thought it's a pretty nifty critter. It has a certain mythological vibe to it (perhaps because of the name), as if it was described by some medieval bestiarist with an unusual grasp of ecology and metallurgy. :)

I agree. But I always thought the introduction into D&D of Latin and Greek sounding words was a bit weird. I mean, those cultures never existed in the standard D&D settings.

noisms

04-19-2008 06:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8755579)

I sort of imagine the dwarves as good samaritans here; after all, most of the aurumvorax kitties will die, so the dwarves hire adventurers to scoop up a few and give them a chance at life.

Aww, doesn't it just make you feel all warm and cuddly inside?

Pete Whalley

04-19-2008 09:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8756341)

I agree. But I always thought the introduction into D&D of Latin and Greek sounding words was a bit weird. I mean, those cultures never existed in the standard D&D settings.

Good point. Whenever my players bring it up I just tell them it's Elven.

Works for me.

weasel fierce

04-19-2008 11:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The Auromvorax is a critter I wish I had used in a game.

demiurge1138

04-20-2008 03:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pete Whalley (Post 8756657)

Good point. Whenever my players bring it up I just tell them it's Elven.

Works for me.

Draconic was my go-to excuse for a while.

noisms

04-20-2008 10:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Baatezu

When you look at the 2nd edition Monstrous Manual one of the things that surprises you is that the Baatezu and Tanar'ri ever took off as mighty 'bad guy' races. (I suspect it was due to a combination of their being based on the old and fondly remembered devils and demons, and on their complete re-imagining in the Planescape campaign setting, where they were made decidedly better in every respect.) Their entries in this volume are sparse, dry, and accompanied by some of the least impressive art in the book: the Pit Fiend looks like a sumo wrestler on his way to a Halloween party; the Abishai looks like a gargoyle in the middle of having a bowel movement. (The other types are mentioned, but not detailed either in picture or statistical form.)

The Baatezu also have the weakest and least interesting blurb so far, and for quite a while afterwards: a cursory explanation that they hate the Tanar'ri a whole lot, and that they really are jolly nasty. Then the text dives straight into their special abilities - and there really isn't much to say about that either. It seems Pit Fiends can cast a Wish spell once a year - I'd forgotten about that. I suppose a really evil DM could use that to huge advantage. "The Pit Fiend Ashjsajghsfgsfdf decides to cast his yearly wish spell this round...." Oddly, the Pit Fiend's strength is only 18/00 - a reminder of how D&D used to be, before 36 Point Buys and the like made a strength of 18 a regular occurrence for even a bog standard fighter character. I don't have the 3rd edition MM to hand, but surely the Pit Fiend's strength can't still be at the 18 or 19 mark. Is it?

One thing I did like about this entry when I was reading it as a kid was that it hinted about this whole other body of interesting-sounding background information that I wasn't privy to. The Nine Hells? The Prime Material Plane? What on earth were they? Other than that aspect (which obviously applies only to newcomers to the game) the Baatezu entry is really just a bit dull.

There are some good entries coming up though. (And no, I'm not talking about the ones for Beetles or Birds.)

an_idol_mind

04-20-2008 10:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8758874)

Baatezu

I don't have the 3rd edition MM to hand, but surely the Pit Fiend's strength can't still be at the 18 or 19 mark. Is it?

37 according to the SRD. Also, they still have the yearly wish capability.

noisms

04-20-2008 10:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by an_idol_mind (Post 8758895)

37 according to the SRD. Also, they still have the yearly wish capability.

Wow. What a reminder how things have changed. 37 as opposed to 1800. "Edition power creep" at work, I suppose.

UglyJimStudly

04-20-2008 12:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8756341)

I agree. But I always thought the introduction into D&D of Latin and Greek sounding words was a bit weird. I mean, those cultures never existed in the standard D&D settings.

Didn't the Aurumvorax debut in Expedition to the Barrier Peaks? I always figured the name was supposed to be part of its scientific name, the only part of the nameplate left legible after it burst out of its cage.

noisms

04-20-2008 12:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudly (Post 8759115)

Didn't the Aurumvorax debut in Expedition to the Barrier Peaks? I always figured the name was supposed to be part of its scientific name, the only part of the nameplate left legible after it burst out of its cage.

I've never played that adventure, believe it or not. (In fact, in around 15 years of playing D&D, I've never played in a published adventure.)

brianm

04-20-2008 12:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Before 3rd edition, increasing a stat by even one point is something an adventurer got to do maybe once in a lifetime. So it's more power-leap than creep by my estimation. ;)

The baatezu were one of the reasons I continued to use my 1st edition monster books all the way through college, rather than convert over to the 2nd edition monster books, even though we played with the 2nd edition PHB. And I never really warmed to the whole Blood War thing, either.

- Brian

noisms

04-20-2008 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8759139)

Before 3rd edition, increasing a stat by even one point is something an adventurer got to do maybe once in a lifetime. So it's more power-leap than creep by my estimation. ;)

The baatezu were one of the reasons I continued to use my 1st edition monster books all the way through college, rather than convert over to the 2nd edition monster books, even though we played with the 2nd edition PHB. And I never really warmed to the whole Blood War thing, either.

- Brian

Oh yeah, wish spell after wish spell to raise even one point. Now they get raised automatically.

Smartmonkey

04-21-2008 01:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

So I never really used the Batezu or Tanar'i in my 2e games, mostly because the critters statted in the monster manual weren't very cool. This "blood war" sounded neat, but I never quite grokked their stats.

And is it just me, or is 21k xp a LOT of xp for a critter with 4hd?

Anyways. Can anyone tell me what changed from 1e to 2e in regards to demons?

Juriel

04-21-2008 02:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Is this the manual where there is a race of catgirls who 'always roll their Rs'?

Say that one aloud. I'm sure that was no accident!

Wakboth

04-21-2008 02:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8760776)

And is it just me, or is 21k xp a LOT of xp for a critter with 4hd?

It's not just you, the XP values for baatezu and tanar'ri in 2e MM are horribly broken. I recalculated them at some point, using the guidelines in the 2e DMG, and found they were inflated by half or something similarly ridiculous.

Smartmonkey

04-21-2008 02:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8760842)

It's not just you, the XP values for baatezu and tanar'ri in 2e MM are horribly broken. I recalculated them at some point, using the guidelines in the 2e DMG, and found they were inflated by half or something similarly ridiculous.

I flipped my copy open to check, and, indeed, Black Abisashi have a measly 4 hit-dice, with an average of 16 hit points. Their AC isn't great, their attacks are fairly weak in terms of hp - they do have a fairly nasty poison, but two hits from a high strength warrior will drop one in a single round.

Netting him 21,500 xp.

Even when I was reading that at 12, I was going wtf.

Even with things like that, though, I still love the Monster Manual. I have it sitting next to me at the moment - 13 years of use shows, but it's still one of my favorite books on my shelf.

Neurotrash

04-21-2008 03:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

It's a long way off, but I can't wait to see what everyone's reaction is to the "Wolf" entry. I remember discovering it years after buying the MM because, really, who reads the fluff text on the "Wolf" entry? But one day I was flipping through and I happened to actually read it...wow.

To this day I wonder what twelve-year-old girl wrote that entry.

JasonK

04-21-2008 05:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8760776)

So I never really used the Batezu or Tanar'i in my 2e games, mostly because the critters statted in the monster manual weren't very cool. This "blood war" sounded neat, but I never quite grokked their stats.

And is it just me, or is 21k xp a LOT of xp for a critter with 4hd?

Anyways. Can anyone tell me what changed from 1e to 2e in regards to demons?

You mean statistically or conceptually? In the former case, I have no idea. In the later case, they were re-named and re-conceived as "evil extra-planar beings." In other words, they had previously been literal demons or devils - creatures of the pits of hell; in 2E they became, effectively, alien things, not actual religious in any way.

Personally, I never cared about the switch. I mean, I figured Tanari'i and Ba'atezu were the creatures' own way of referring to their species; humans and the like just used the D words. Planescape, of course, made using Devil or Demon just silly.

And I never meant to say any of that - I just meant to subscribe to this thread to catch all the commentary on the various undead out there. :)

~ jason

UglyJimStudly

04-21-2008 11:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8759139)

Before 3rd edition, increasing a stat by even one point is something an adventurer got to do maybe once in a lifetime

Unless you took your example from some of the high-level modules, in which both stat gains and Wish were pretty standard rewards. Different styles in different groups and all that.

noisms

04-21-2008 12:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8760842)

It's not just you, the XP values for baatezu and tanar'ri in 2e MM are horribly broken. I recalculated them at some point, using the guidelines in the 2e DMG, and found they were inflated by half or something similarly ridiculous.

They were fixed in Planescape. I think Abishai in the first Planescape Monstrous Compendium give somewhere in the 3,000 range, off the top of my head. Pit Fiends are something like 25,000. Unfortunately those books are in another country in a box in my parents' loft.

chiguayante

04-21-2008 12:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8742675)

...Aarakocra!!!!!!

Ahh, so that's where WoW got their Arrakoa bird men from. I was wondering if there was precedent for that, apart from looking like Dark Crystal cast members. Anyone got links to the AD&D art for them? I'm a young guy who starting roleplaying in '99 and I never knew the likes of AD&D.

noisms

04-21-2008 12:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Banshee

The first undead monster in the book, and it's a good one - a wailing female spirit who can detect unwary bands of adventurers with unerring accuracy once they come within five miles of her den. She then pops up at night and wails at them, causing them to die instantly, "faces contorted with horror" (!) unless they pass a saving throw against death magic. She can only do this once a night though - so that's okay then. The sight of her is also enough to cause fear, which makes you flee for 10 rounds with a 50% chance of dropping what you're carrying. A pisser if you happened to have that handy Vorpal Sword +5 you got from the red dragon's hoard drawn.

The 'ecology' section has it that the Banshee's only pleasure is "the misfortune and misery of others". But it seems to me that the poor woman wants nothing else other than for you to leave her alone - she'll keep returning to wail at you every night until you've gone away. Which you would, wouldn't you? Unless, I suppose, you were an intrepid band of adventurers.

As well as driving away adventurers, the Banshee's wailing and keening will also eventually kill of all the animals and vegetation surrounding her den, leaving a desolate five mile wasteland of dead trees and plants. Did somebody mention the words 'adventure hook'?

Following on from the discussion regarding the Baatezu, killing a Banshee will net you precisely 7,000 XP. That's right - a 7 HD monster that needs a +1 to hit and which can kill you instantly is only worth a third as much as the pathetic Black Abishai on the previous page. Did nobody notice this when they were compiling the MM? I mean, the entries are right next to each other.

Oh well. Inconsistencies are all part of 2nd edition's charm. And I like the Banshee. Any monster which represents the undead spirit of an evil female elf is worth having in a game, in my book, and her insta-death ability is enough to strike genuine fear into even quite high level adventurers. And we know how rare that is in any incarnation of D&D.

brianm

04-21-2008 02:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by chiguayante (Post 8762686)

Ahh, so that's where WoW got their Arrakoa bird men from. I was wondering if there was precedent for that, apart from looking like Dark Crystal cast members. Anyone got links to the AD&D art for them? I'm a young guy who starting roleplaying in '99 and I never knew the likes of AD&D.

I don't have a link to the 2nd edition art, but here are the two black-and-white pics drawn by Jeff Dee for the 1st edition versions.

Full body

Closeup

- Brian

brianm

04-21-2008 02:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8760776)

Can anyone tell me what changed from 1e to 2e in regards to demons?

Mostly, the Blood War. All demons and devils were recast in terms of what they contributed to the Blood War. It became the cornerstone of their "ecologies".

Outside that, they all got tougher. The 1st edition Type II (Hezrou) has an AC of -2 and 9 hit dice. In 2nd edition, they dropped the "Type II", just called them Hezrou, and gave them -6 AC but still the same 9 hit dice. However, their magic resistance went from 55% to 70%, required +2 or better weapons to hit (where normal weapons would hit them in 1st edition), gained a troglodyte-like overpowering stench, and more magical powers.

- Brian

JasonK

04-21-2008 02:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8762739)

Banshee

No real ecology or origin, here? Just "an evil female elf gone undead"?

Makes me wonder, do all female elves who go evil become banshees? Is it a given? Or is it a choice, like lichdom? Does it happen automatically when they die, or maybe when they take that final action that pushes them inevitably to the evil end of the alignment spectrum? Or only should their graves be disturbed or someone die near their corpse?

~ jason

A Letter From Prague

04-21-2008 02:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8762978)
Makes me wonder, do all female elves who go evil become banshees?

Actually, it's all elves who aren't neutral good.

JasonK

04-21-2008 02:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by A Letter From Prague (Post 8763005)
Actually, it's all elves who aren't neutral good.

Eh?

~ jason

noisms

04-21-2008 02:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8762978)
No real ecology or origin, here? Just "an evil female elf gone undead"?

Makes me wonder, do all female elves who go evil become banshees? Is it a given? Or is it a choice, like lichdom? Does it happen automatically when they die, or maybe when they take that final action that pushes them inevitably to the evil end of the alignment spectrum? Or only should their graves be disturbed or someone die near their corpse?

~ jason

The Banshee doesn't have a very specific origin story, to be honest. It literally is just "the undead spirit of an evil female elf", who often hangs around in her old home amongst the possessions she had in life. It says somewhere near the end that they sometimes go out in pursuit of people who wronged them while they were alive. Another point where cool idea for adventure sirens sound off in my head.

noisms

04-21-2008 03:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Neurotrash (Post 8761085)

It's a long way off, but I can't wait to see what everyone's reaction is to the "Wolf" entry. I remember discovering it years after buying the MM because, really, who reads the fluff text on the "Wolf" entry? But one day I was flipping through and I happened to actually read it...wow.

To this day I wonder what twelve-year-old girl wrote that entry.

Oh yeah, the wolf entry is hilarious. It's like they picked up a leaflet from the local PETA office and lifted it word for word. But it's a long way off, so let's not spoil it. ;)

noisms

04-22-2008 10:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Basilisk

A set of three short entries for this monster, which is essentially a big lizard whose gaze can turn others to stone. It's a favourite of mine, and it often ends up making an appearance in my campaigns; it's good to have a monster which isn't generally defeated by combat or spells but something else, and I do love me a good mythological beast in a game. I'm also a fan of medusas for those very reasons.

The first entry is for the ordinary, bog-standard Basilisk. No ecologies here; no space for that. The Basilisk is a big lizard which turns you to stone. Job's a good 'un. Its gaze also works in the Astral and Ethereal planes, although I can't see myself ever using that. (In the Astral its gaze just kills you; in the Ethereal it turns you to 'Ethereal stone'. Ahh, Ethereal stone. Gotcha.)

The Greater Basilisk is, self-obviously, a big Basilisk. Not only can it petrify you, however, it can also kill you instantly with its halitosis breath or poison you with its claws. (Type K poison, for those who remember what that means. I'm sure Piestro's thread will explore it at some point.) I'd forgotten how many truly deadly monsters there were in earlier versions of D&D. In the space of a few pages we've had the Banshee, which can shriek you to death; the Basilisk, which can turn you to stone; and the Greater Basilisk, which can both petrify you and kill you instantly with poison. The versions of these monsters from 3rd edition onwards are noticeably less mean.

A bit ridiculously, the Greater Basilisk can only self-petrify through a reflective surface within 10' because it is short-sighted, but its petrification gaze is ordinarily effective to 50'. How on earth does that even begin to make sense?

Finally, there is the Dracolisk, which is the offspring of a Black Dragon and a Greater Basilisk. It spits acid, as you would expect, and can also fly for short periods. Its eyes have 'nictating membranes' which largely protect it from its own gaze; I don't know why they didn't just use that explanation for the Greater Basilisk too, rather than bring in this short-sighted nonsense. The Dracolisk is especially cool, I think, because it combines two of my favourite monster shticks: namely it's a mythological beast and it also implies the arcane experimentations of an evil archmage, which is a great fantasy trope.

noisms

04-23-2008 11:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bat

The first real life monster. Unless you believe in Banshees.

I like the descriptions of real-life animals in the MM. Did they really imagine there was anybody who'd be reading the book who wouldn't know what a bat was? Anyway, in case you didn't know, "The small body of the ordinary bat resembles a mouse, while the wings are formed from extra skin stretched across its fore limbs." Thanks, guys. Apparently bats are also "annoying but harmless."

The designers also add, sagely, that "The larger bats are scaled up but otherwise similar in appearance." Aha, I see.

Anyway, there are a few entries for different varieties of bat, all of them notably odd in some respect.

Ordinary Bat. This speaks for itself, but did you remember that a flock (a flock? Is that right?) of bats can put out torches (1% chance per round per bat), reduce THACO by 2, and force you to perform a Wisdom check to be able to cast a spell? I've never had that effect in one of my games, but I will in the next one!

Large Bats give you rabies (1% chance per bite), which basically means you'll be dead within 10 plus 1d4+6 days. In the meantime, there's a chance you'll become frenzied and attack the nearest person whenever you become frightened or startled. Ouch. It would be an evil DM who inflicted such a monster on a party without access to a cure disease spell. Mwahahahahahaaaa.....

Huge Bats also have the vaguely silly moniker "Mobat". With a wingspan of 16', they're big beasties, and they have a "dim and evil intelligence" which means they "prefer warm blooded prey who they bite to death with their fangs". They can also disable opponents with blasts of sonar.

Azmyths are Chaotic Neutral, intelligent bats who form friendships with humanoids through telepathy. I generally find that sort of sidekick animal an unnecessary annoyance in a game, but hey, if that's what you like.

Night Hunters are named Dragazhar after an adventurer who domesticated one "long ago". I find that setting-specific stuff in the MM a bit odd; "long ago" where? Anyway, the Night Hunter is basically a more powerful Large bat, with velvet fur and red eyes.

Sinisters aren't really bats; they are more like levitating manta rays which fly around casting Hold Monster spells and annoying people. Although they are completely silent, they love music, and are attracted to bards, who they will follow from campsite to campsite to listen to his singing or playing. I'm trying to think of an adventure hook associated with that, but can't....

This is a bit of a low point in the MM. We have bats, bears and then beetles in a sort of real-life animal triple whammy. Luckily after that there are behirs and beholders to look forward to, so bear with me. ("Bear" with me? Geddit?)

demiurge1138

04-23-2008 12:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I like the sinisters, but never could figure out how to use one. The bard finds out that he's being followed and... then what?

Also, I don't believe in banshees, but there is an aurumvorax living down the street from me...

noisms

04-23-2008 01:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8773516)

I like the sinisters, but never could figure out how to use one. The bard finds out that he's being followed and... then what?

My thoughts exactly. It's almost an idea you could use, but not quite.

Nokura

04-23-2008 02:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8767385)

Basilisk

Finally, there is the Dracolisk... Its eyes have 'nictating membranes' which largely protect it from its own gaze; I don't know why they didn't just use that explanation for the Greater Basilisk too, rather than bring in this short-sighted nonsense.

I love it when game designers use these kind of terms because they sound cool or something similar. Here is the info on Wikipedia about nictitating membranes in nature.

Not seeing it help the dracolisk, unless he gets sand in his eye. :)

Cool thread though, makes me remember why I never bought AD&D 2 (played it quite a bit but it never felt that coherent really...now I know some of the reasons why). And all those save or suck effects = ouch.

Smartmonkey

04-23-2008 02:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8773516)

I like the sinisters, but never could figure out how to use one. The bard finds out that he's being followed and... then what?

Also, I don't believe in banshees, but there is an aurumvorax living down the street from me...

The party needs to intercept a messenger of the big evil overlord. Fortunately, he's a bard, so he shouldn't be hard to overcome up close. Unfortunately, he has a small flock of Sinisters following him around, all of whom will probably object rather strenuously to the PC's interrupting his performance.

I can also see them being used for creep/fantastic factor - the Bard is hanging around camp fiddling with his lute, when he notices a bunch of floating manta rays just... watching him. His reactions can lead all sorts of strange places...

A Letter From Prague

04-23-2008 02:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8773454)

Huge Bats also have the vaguely silly moniker "Mobat".

It's the evolved form of Nubat!

Nomad4life

04-23-2008 02:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I love this thread. Can't wait until we get to some of my favorites...

noisms

04-23-2008 03:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8773892)

The party needs to intercept a messenger of the big evil overlord. Fortunately, he's a bard, so he shouldn't be hard to overcome up close. Unfortunately, he has a small flock of Sinisters following him around, all of whom will probably object rather strenuously to the PC's interrupting his performance.

That isn't bad, actually. Yoinked!

JasonK

04-23-2008 04:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8773454)

Ordinary Bat. This speaks for itself, but did you remember that a flock (a flock? Is that right?) of bats can put out torches (1% chance per round per bat), reduce THACO by 2, and force you to perform a Wisdom check to be able to cast a spell? I've never had that effect in one of my games, but I will in the next one!

This is very cool, any useful to remember when we get further down the line to the Vampire entry. :)

Also, the interweb tells me that a grouping of bats is called either a Colony or a Camp. Make of that what you will.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8773892)

The party needs to intercept a messenger of the big evil overlord. Fortunately, he's a bard, so he shouldn't be hard to overcome up close. Unfortunately, he has a small flock of Sinisters following him around, all of whom will probably object rather strenuously to the PC's interrupting his performance.

Awesome!

~ jason

Biohazard

04-23-2008 07:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I was wondering if your version features the (IMHO) ugly coloured pictures, or is it still the moody b&w ones from the binders?

Because I still love the b&w ones. The Orcs, Hobgoblins also the Kobolds were quite nicely done. Ahhh, the memories ...

sim_james

04-23-2008 08:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8773454)

Sinisters aren't really bats; they are more like levitating manta rays which fly around casting Hold Monster spells and annoying people. Although they are completely silent, they love music, and are attracted to bards, who they will follow from campsite to campsite to listen to his singing or playing. I'm trying to think of an adventure hook associated with that, but can't....

I guess I would use a few sinisters if I wanted to depict a stretch of countryside as being a bit weird and... well, sinister.

"Hey, it's a map of Darkvania. Remember that place?"

"You mean the country with all the gypsy oracles, Spanish moss, and weird manta bats that kept showing up whenever Loran pulled out his harp? Yeah, I fucking remember it. I was never so glad to find myself in a wholesome halfling village than after we crossed the border out of there."

Wood

04-23-2008 08:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8773454)

Huge Bats also have the vaguely silly moniker "Mobat".

Mo Bat, Mo Problems.

noisms

04-23-2008 08:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Biohazard (Post 8774749)

I was wondering if your version features the (IMHO) ugly coloured pictures, or is it still the moody b&w ones from the binders?

Because I still love the b&w ones. The Orcs, Hobgoblins also the Kobolds were quite nicely done. Ahhh, the memories ...

The art ranges from the godawful (probably the 'ugly coloured pictures' you mention) to the carefully mediocre to the really quite good (DiTerlizzi's pictures). There are no B&W ones; I don't think they kept any art from the binders (although I could be wrong).

The Last Conformist

04-23-2008 09:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8760880)
Black Abisashi have a measly 4 hit-dice, with an average of 16 hit points. .

How does that work? D7s?

noisms

04-23-2008 09:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 8774787)
I guess I would use a few sinisters if I wanted to depict a stretch of countryside as being a bit weird and... well, sinister.

"Hey, it's a map of Darkvania. Remember that place?"

"You mean the country with all the gypsy oracles, Spanish moss, and weird manta bats that kept showing up whenever Loran pulled out his harp? Yeah, I fucking remember it. I was never so glad to find myself in a wholesome halfling village than after we crossed the border out of there."

Well, if a place is called Darkvania...don't expect picnics and daisies. ;)

Biohazard

04-23-2008 09:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8774825)
The art ranges from the godawful (probably the 'ugly coloured pictures' you mention) to the carefully mediocre to the really quite good (DiTerlizzi's pictures). There are no B&W ones; I don't think they kept any art from the binders (although I could be wrong).

Okay, I think I know which version it was. I was a bit unsure, because the German translation also featured the binder version as a hardcover.

Lugh

04-23-2008 11:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always wanted an aurumvorax as a familiar for my high-level wizard, but could never quite convince the DM to let me have it.

noisms

04-24-2008 01:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bear

Part two of our triple bill of ordinary animals, we have the Bears, which I have to confess I've only ever used once - a group of bandits the PCs in one of my campaigns had to fight kept a pet one who they fed prisoners to. There seems something slightly unrealistic (What? AD&D? Unrealistic? Never!) about solitary bears attacking a party of six armed and armoured adventurers on horseback. (To be fair to the designers, it actually says as much in the text description.)

Anyway, let's get on with it.

First up is the Black Bear, which like the other bears can grab you on a natural 18 or above to hit roll, and hug for additional damage. Why on earth didn't they keep such a simple and intuitive idea for 3.X? Doing the same trick in D&D 3.5 would take dice roll after dice roll of grappling and opposed checks and the use of Super Duper Improved I'm Gonna Get You feats... You know, the more I think about it, although AD&D was a crude mish-mash of rules and systems, it seemed to be a heck of a lot easier to run most of the time than 3.X. Although maybe that's just because I grew up with it.

Next are Brown Bears and Cave Bears, which are basically bigger and meaner varieties of the Black Bear, with the corollary that in a fight they can go berserk and keep on attacking until they reach -9hp. Cave Bears are also different from the norm in that they'll perfectly happily attack a party of adventurers. Well, you wouldn't want to get too realistic, right?

And finally there is the Polar Bear. Now, I'm sure most of the people reading this are more knowledgeable than me. (Or more inclined to look stuff up on wikipedia.) Are Polar Bears really 14' high when they stand up? Because that's what it says in the MM.

If they are...bloody hell. If not... I suppose the MM Polar Bear is a sort of fantasy version of the real life creature; a Dire Polar Bear, if you will.

Tomorrow I'll inflict the Beetles of the AD&D world onto my readership. Be afraid. Be very afraid.

an_idol_mind

04-24-2008 01:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8775949)

And finally there is the Polar Bear. Now, I'm sure most of the people reading this are more knowledgeable than me. (Or more inclined to look stuff up on wikipedia.) Are Polar Bears really 14' high when they stand up? Because that's what it says in the MM.

That actually sounds about right to me. My hometown museum has a stuffed polar bear on display. Standing on its hindquarters, the thing's head nearly reaches the second-floor balcony.

noisms

04-24-2008 01:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by an_idol_mind (Post 8775963)

That actually sounds about right to me. My hometown museum has a stuffed polar bear on display. Standing on its hindquarters, the thing's head nearly reaches the second-floor balcony.

Christ Almighty, that's big. They must get through a heck of a lot of seals.

DMH

04-24-2008 01:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The polar bear and cave bear stats were switched. This was official errata for the MC and then didn't fix it for the MM.

As for art, who did the goblin? It ia the worst piece other than the invisible stalker (check the credit page for who did that).

g026r

04-24-2008 01:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8776083)

It ia the worst piece other than the invisible stalker (check the credit page for who did that).

Hey, don't be dissing the invisible stalker illustration. :p

noisms

04-24-2008 01:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8776083)

The polar bear and cave bear stats were switched. This was official errata for the MC and then didn't fix it for the MM.

As for art, who did the goblin? It ia the worst piece other than the invisible stalker (check the credit page for who did that).

Aha, that explains a lot.

The goblin was probably Jeff Butler. It is truly awful. Although I stand by my belief that the absolute worst illustration is the Roper.

As for the Invisible Stalker....well, let's not ruin the (ahem) joke.

weasel fierce

04-24-2008 02:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ive used cave bears quite a bit. Always seems to scare my players.. along with tigers.

A big monster is one thing, but these are big animals that we know can inflict horrible damage on a human body. There's a certain kind of respect inflicted by that

demiurge1138

04-24-2008 02:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8776127)

The goblin was probably Jeff Butler. It is truly awful. Although I stand by my belief that the absolute worst illustration is the Roper.

If memory serves me right, that goblin is actually by Tony DiTerlizzi! It's a recycled (yet still terrible) illustration of a kobold from the super-module Dragon Mountain. There used to be a Gallery of Terrible Art on his website, and many Pirates of Penzance jokes were made.

You'll notice that the kobold in the Monstrous Manual is basically wearing the same outfit, but has a vastly superior picture.

blizack

04-24-2008 02:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8776291)

If memory serves me right, that goblin is actually by Tony DiTerlizzi! It's a recycled (yet still terrible) illustration of a kobold from the super-module Dragon Mountain. There used to be a Gallery of Terrible Art on his website, and many Pirates of Penzance jokes were made.

I never owned the Monstrous Manual, but the DiTerlizzi art in Dragon Mountain is, by and large, not very good (it was his first published work, I think). And his "Dragon Mountain Kobolds" are extremely goblin-looking.

Biohazard

04-24-2008 02:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 8776091)

Hey, don't be dissing the invisible stalker illustration. :p

That really had me cracking up, when I saw it the first time!

brotherscrim

04-24-2008 02:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 8774918)

How does that work? D7s?

hit dice were d8s, right?

the average roll on a d8 is 4.5

this we all know, now. The question is, did the designers know at the time of creation of the books that the average for a given die is $(dx+1)/2$, or did they, like i did for a long time, assume that the average for a given die is half its maximum?

anyone care to do a random sampling of the MM stats and see what they can see?

Wakboth

04-24-2008 03:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8776291)

If memory serves me right, that goblin is actually by Tony DiTerlizzi! It's a recycled (yet still terrible) illustration of a kobold from the super-module Dragon Mountain. There used to be a Gallery of Terrible Art on his website, and many Pirates of Penzance jokes were made.

I seem to recall that it was a sketchy design pic that somehow ended up being used as the final illustration.

Quote:

You'll notice that the kobold in the Monstrous Manual is basically wearing the same outfit, but has a vastly superior picture.

And the goblin in 3e MM is also based on the same critter... except vastly superior. :)

demiurge1138

04-24-2008 04:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

For those of you playing along at home without a Monstrous Compendium, this is the goblin we're talking about:

<http://mmadnd.chat.ru/goblin.gif>

It's a bad illustration, but I admit that it has a certain rough charm to it.

blizack

04-24-2008 04:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8776998)

For those of you playing along at home without a Monstrous Compendium, this is the goblin we're talking about:

<http://mmadnd.chat.ru/goblin.gif>

It's a bad illustration, but I admit that it has a certain rough charm to it.

Yep, that's the "Kobold, Dragon Mountain" illustration from the Dragon Mountain boxed set's Monstrous Compendium pamphlet.

DMH

04-24-2008 05:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

There is color outside the lines above its left shoulder and its arms are not the same length.

noisms

04-24-2008 09:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

So not only am I getting a thousand-and-one plot hooks from this thread, I'm also learning about the art design history of Dungeons and Dragons.

Actually when you look at the goblin pic, you can see a sort of DiTerlizzi-ish roughness about it - that slightly scrawled look that he would develop into something really great when he did the Planescape art. I suppose that goblin (or kobold, more accurately) was drawn in the putative stages...

And to think I was blaming Jeff Butler.

noisms

04-24-2008 10:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Beetle, Giant

Giant Beetles are pretty much what you would expect. Big Beetles. They are "basically unintelligent and always hungry"; they roam around aimlessly and when they come across something organic, they eat it. This includes brave adventurers, who can't be revived by anything other than a wish spell if they get eaten - the beetle's mandibles will crush them into a pulp.

There are six kinds identified:

Bombardier Beetle. As far as I know, this is a real insect, which can squirt nasty chemicals out of its rear end (so can I after a heavy night down at the pub...) to scare off predators. In game, this ability variously stuns, deafens, and causes 3d4 damage to its enemies in 8-15' radius. Pretty terrifying for a small party of 1st level adventurers, who could end up being TPK'd by such a threat if the dice go wrong. Talk about ignominy - TPK'd by a beetle's fart. If a Bombardier Beetle is killed, the chemicals can be removed and an incendiary device fashioned - which makes the animals popular with alchemists. Adventure hook with your beetle, sir?

Boring Beetle. And you are to read nothing untoward into this creature's name. Not at all. Anyway, it, er...has a nasty bite. Jolly nasty. It also raises fungi and....zzzzzzz..... (Okay, I'm being mean to the poor Boring Beetle. Actually there are some nice ideas alluded to in the text. A group of the insects can develop a sort of hive mind intelligence, and they collect magical items and grow fungi guards for their nests. That could be an interesting twist on a dungeon crawl.)

Fire Beetle. Now this really is a boring beetle. It has nothing to do with fire - it is so named because of red patches on its body which glow in the dark. Mages and alchemists are apparently keen to discover the secret of this luminescence. I wonder if any of them know any adventurers who could help out? I suppose they could advertise in, I dunno, a tavern or something...

Rhinoceros Beetle. This is a big bugger with a massive horn. Its shell is used to decorate Egyptian temples. Nothing to see here. Move along.

Stag Beetle. "Great nuisances" which raid farms to eat all the grain. I wonder if they could be brought into a combined Ankheg/Stag Beetle agricultural adventure fest.

Water Beetle. My uncle has a little "water ecology system" in his basement in which he is trying to perfectly emulate a typical British pond. Along with water boatmen, water scorpions, water spiders and sticklebacks, he also has a couple of these water beetles in there. They're surprisingly fast, and quite big. That's all I have to say about water beetles.

Thank God that's over. Behirs tomorrow. And after that a certain race of floating circular beasties with big eyes. I wonder what they could be...

demiurge1138

04-24-2008 01:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8778963)

Beetle, Giant

Stag Beetle. "Great nuisances" which raid farms to eat all the grain. I wonder if they could be brought into a combined Ankheg/Stag Beetle agricultural adventure fest.

The way I see it, the party is hired by a powerful merchant consortium. A huge swarm of giant stag beetles, their eggs transported to the food belts owned by these merchants either by malice or bad luck, are eating all the grain in sight. Without that grain, not only is there no bread for the peasants and princes alike, but the barley that would go to making beer for the dwarves, an important trade commodity with those surly folk. With no beer, the trade in fine dwarf-craft weapons would trickle out, and the dwarves might spitefully look the other way if raiding parties of hobgoblins or kobolds were to move through the outskirts of their territory to raid the merchants' lands...

So where do the adventurers come into this? After a few jobs just clearing out areas where the beetles are thick, the merchants realize that a more subtle approach needs to be taken to get all of the chittering menaces. Biological control. The party is then hired to delve into ankheg nests and steal enough eggs to introduce throughout the region; ankhegs are notorious predators of giant stag beetles, after all. But ankhegs in the region are nowhere to be seen. What sort of monster could be keeping the ankheg populations so small and eat their eggs...?

mirober

04-24-2008 01:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8747450)

Arcane

First off, it has to be said this is our first genuinely awful illustration. A blue chump with a big head, basically, which discourages me from using the very monster itself through its sheer.. I-could-have-done-better-edness.

Pulls out book

Huh. To me, that illustration says "Hi there, I'm from the 80's. Would you care to do a lot of coke and vote for Ronald Reagan ... IN SPACE?" Still, that kinda fits, since the text itself puts them in the Spelljammer setting.

(I'm with you, though, I prefer the Planescape Arcane).

brianm

04-24-2008 02:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I used bears a lot, mostly as companions for druids and very high level rangers. Since I ran points-of-light campaigns before PoL was cool, dryads who lived in dangerous woods would also charm them to scare away anyone with an axe or an open flame who came too close to their trees.

- Brian

noisms

04-24-2008 03:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8779530)

The way I see it, the party is hired by a powerful merchant consortium. A huge swarm of giant stag beetles, their eggs transported to the food belts owned by these merchants either by malice or bad luck, are eating all the grain in sight. Without that grain, not only is there no bread for the peasants and princes alike, but the barley that would go to making beer for the dwarves, an important trade commodity with those surly folk. With no beer, the trade in fine dwarf-craft weapons would trickle out, and the dwarves might spitefully look the other way if raiding parties of hobgoblins or kobolds were to move through the outskirts of their territory to raid the merchants' lands...

So where do the adventurers come into this? After a few jobs just clearing out areas where the beetles are thick, the merchants realize that a more subtle approach needs to be taken to get all of the chittering menaces. Biological control. The party is then hired to delve into ankheg nests and steal enough eggs to introduce throughout the region, ankhegs are notorious predators of giant stag beetles, after all. But ankhegs in the region are nowhere to be seen. What sort of monster could be keeping the ankheg populations so small and eat their eggs...?

You should write adventure modules.

noisms

04-24-2008 03:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8779781)

I used bears a lot, mostly as companions for druids and very high level rangers. Since I ran points-of-light campaigns before PoL was cool, dryads who lived in dangerous woods would also charm them to scare away anyone with an axe or an open flame who came too close to their trees.

- Brian

That makes sense, although I tend to use non-powerful animals as companions for those classes - birds are a favourite, or things like skunks and snakes. I don't like bears and wolves and the like, which really seem to take away the role of the party's melee-oriented PCs. It seems a bit much to have a druid who can not only cast support spells and do well in melee, but who also can call on a ravening bear.

JasonK

04-24-2008 06:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Druids are a bit much in general, aren't they, though? A skunk as an animal companion would just be hilarious... :)

~ jason

noisms

04-24-2008 06:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8780261)

Druids are a bit much in general, aren't they, though? A skunk as an animal companion would just be hilarious... :)

~ jason

A player in my current game has a skunk. It isn't an animal companion - he's a cleric with animal handling and animal training proficiencies - but it does exist. We houseruled the spray so it sort of acts like a less powerful Stinking Cloud. It's actually got the players out of a number of scrapes, especially when they were at lower levels.

JasonK

04-24-2008 06:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Don't skunks get stats later on in the book? Or is it one of the other manuals/editions where that's the case?

~ jason

noisms

04-24-2008 10:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8780369)

Don't skunks get stats later on in the book? Or is it one of the other manuals/editions where that's the case?

~ jason

You're right, under 'Mammal'.

noisms

04-24-2008 11:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Behir

The poor man's dragon, a Behir is a sort of cross between a crocodile and a snake (if you can imagine a 40' long crocodile-snake with a dozen legs, blue skin and the ability to breathe lightning, that is). It can run about on 'all dozens', or it can fold its legs to its sides and slither on its belly like a snake. That reminds me of my friend, who has a pet iguana he sometimes lets swim around the swimming pool. It swims by folding in its legs like a snake and moving its body from side to side. Technically Behir don't do it while they're swimming, but that's how I imagine the movement.

Yeah, whatever, forget I mentioned that. Moving on...

Behir can mess you up good and proper. On a natural 20 they can swallow you whole, giving you six rounds to be rescued from death and only twelve rounds to be rescued from digestion and hence complete oblivion. Not even a wish spell will save you if that happens. (I doubt there's precedent for an animal being able to digest somebody in...what, a few minutes? But that lightning breath has to come from somewhere, I suppose.) Aside from that, they're just plain tough - lots of hit dice and attacks. A good, solid, high level straight-up-fight sort of monster, which has a nice old-school slaying-of-mighty-mythic-beasts, St. George-and-the-Dragon kind of feel to it. In fact, I'm going to go straight out and say the Behir is my favourite monster in the book so far. Although we're only about 3% of the way in.

I also like the picture. The featured Behir seems oddly pleased with himself, for some reason, with a faint smile that can only be described as smug. Perhaps he's just swallowed an adventurer.

Plot hooks aplenty towards the end of the blurb. In fact, I count 4:

1. Behir are useful to mages, because their body parts can be variously used for lightning bolt, protection from poison and neutralise poison spells.
2. Behir sometimes swallow prey whole, so in their bellies you can often find magical items of an indigestible nature. (I love how, in a standard AD&D campaign world, there are enough adventurers in existence to be eaten by Behir and then have their remains discovered by another adventurer. It's as if they're a not particularly common, but hardly rare profession - perhaps occurring with the frequency of, say, a Yoga instructor in the real world.)
3. Behir skin can be made into armour (yeah, that old chestnut...I think around 25% of the monsters encountered so far can have their skins or shells fashioned into armour of some kind; my next high level character is so going to have an Ankheg shield, Behir scale-mail and Boring-Beetle shell helmet). The suit will be worth at least 500gp, although unfortunately it isn't statted. Now there's the Supplement That Never Was: the Complete Guide to Monster-Corpse Armour....

4. Behir and dragons hate each other and will go out of their way to drive each other out of their territory; I'm already imagining a "rampaging Behir who's been driven into settled lands by a Red Dragon moving into his territory and supplanting him" campaign....

committed hero

04-25-2008 12:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Great thread.

One thing that has always bothered me about nictating membranes: apparently, membranes are the only things that nictate in the observable universe.

Mark Krawec

04-25-2008 12:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8781274)

...I think around 25% of the monsters encountered so far can have their skins or shells fashioned into armour of some kind; my next high level character is so going to have an Ankheg shield, Behir scale-mail and Boring-Beetle shell helmet). The suit will be worth at least 500gp, although unfortunately it isn't statted. Now there's the Supplement That Never Was: the Complete Guide to Monster-Corpse Armour...

Makes you wonder if there isn't a subgroup of armorers who specialize in working chitin. Instead of forges, they use acids, glues & shellacs. Their apprentices don't stoke the bellows, they pump huge fans to keep the shop ventilated so the armorers aren't overcome by fumes.

noisms

04-25-2008 12:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mark Krawec (Post 8781487)

Makes you wonder if there isn't a subgroup of armorers who specialize in working chitin. Instead of forges, they use acids, glues & shellacs. Their apprentices don't stoke the bellows, they pump huge fans to keep the shop ventilated so the armorers aren't overcome by fumes.

It seems like every other post in this thread is an idea that I desperately want to incorporate into a campaign. That's such a good concept it would be wrong not to use it.

noisms

04-25-2008 12:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by committed hero (Post 8781398)
Great thread.

One thing that has always bothered me about nictating membranes: apparently, membranes are the only things that nictate in the observable universe.

Glad you like it.

I agree with you: it has always bothered me too. Sometimes I can't sleep at night. ;)

6inTruder

04-25-2008 09:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mark Krawec (Post 8781487)
Makes you wonder if there isn't a subgroup of armorers who specialize in working chitin. Instead of forges, they use acids, glues & shellacs. Their apprentices don't stoke the bellows, they pump huge fans to keep the shop ventilated so the armorers aren't overcome by fumes.

Dude. That's awesome! I gotta remember it for when I finally get around to the Spelljammer game I want to run.

noisms

04-25-2008 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Beholders and Beholder Kin

The first truly iconic AD&D monster to appear; and I do really mean AD&D - Beholders don't seem to feature as much in later editions. Or is that just me?

The Beholder is billed as "the stuff of nightmares"; a big floating head, with one central eye like a cyclops, other smaller eyes on stalks, and a big mouth (or "maw" as it has it in the MM - don't you just love the word "maw"? It only seems to appear in RPG bestiaries, unfortunately). The eye stalks have different powers, such as Sleep, Flesh to stone and Disintegrate, and the main eye can blast Anti-magic rays in 90 degree arcs in front of it. These powers are available at will.

Behaviour-wise, Beholders are a bit like Nazis. Floating Nazis with eye stalks and maws. They despise all other races and believe themselves to be the ideal species, with all others fit only to be destroyed. (This is also reminiscent of the Daleks, if any fellow Brits are reading this. I'm not sure if the AD&D designers were fans of Dr. Who.) However, there is a 50% chance that a Beholder will, on coming across a party of adventurers, choose to negotiate rather than "rain death" on them. (More strange exception-based design here - I guess for some reason Reaction Adjustment doesn't apply to a Beholder.)

Subspecies include:

The Death Kiss which, cheesy name notwithstanding, is an interesting variant that has bloodsucking tentacles rather than eyestalks - it uses ingested blood to heal itself and shoot bolts of electricity, and its tentacles can survive and continue to suck blood even if severed;

The Eye of the Deep which, as you might be able to guess, lives underwater, and blinds enemies with blasts of light from its main eye;

The Gauth, which is essentially a Beholder with something called the "dweomer drain" ability, through which it sucks power from magical items and renders them inoperable;

The Spectator, which guards treasure (for a 101 year period) and can travel between planes - unlike the other Beholders it is perfectly friendly so long as nobody tries to take the treasure it's guarding;

The Undead Beholder or "death tyrant" (there's a great over-the-top Lovecraftian description in the text, which I won't reproduce here because it's too long), a mindless zombie type, which evil mages, "Illithid villains" and other Beholders can control through...well, evil magic. Charm spells are no good - it has to be something special. (Something tells me that rule was introduced to prevent PC mages have a horde of pet Death Tyrants following them around.)

If you think that's all the MM has on Beholders, think again. More tomorrow.

Smartmonkey

04-25-2008 01:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

God, the section on Beholders is huuuuuge. I never used the things (well, I implied they were around in my very short lived spelljammer game, but that doesn't count), because they have that sort of gonzo flavor my campaigns never grasped, but I think I might slip a death tyrant in some day...

noisms

04-25-2008 01:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8784991)

God, the section on Beholders is huuuuuge. I never used the things (well, I implied they were around in my very short lived spelljammer game, but that doesn't count), because they have that sort of gonzo flavor my campaigns never grasped, but I think I might slip a death tyrant in some day...

I never used them all that much either, but one of the guys in my group used to use them ALL THE TIME when he was DMing. Grell were another favourite of his; I actually still get mixed up to this day between what Beholders can do and what Grell can, simply because of the number of encounters we had with them once we hit the middle levels.

Antithesis

04-25-2008 02:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8781274)

3. Behir skin can be made into armour (yeah, that old chestnut...I think around 25% of the monsters encountered so far can have their skins or shells fashioned into armour of some kind; my next high level character is so going to have an Ankheg shield, Behir scale-mail and Boring-Beetle shell helmet). The suit will be worth at least 500gp, although unfortunately it isn't statted. Now there's the Supplement That Never Was: the Complete Guide to Monster-Corpse Armour....

i would use the shit out of that supplement

Lugh

04-25-2008 09:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Heh. In one of my campaigns, I had a beholder city, with a dozen beholder variants as racial castes. It was wiped out because it happened to be the site for the return of an ancient evil god. The PCs had to wade through a "minefield" of zombie beholders arranged around the city.

I also remember having a discussion about beholders with a previous DM. He wanted to remove telekinesis from the beholder's bag of tricks, as it was too powerful (because there is no save). I pointed out that TK was actually the one eye you had to keep. Because, otherwise, how does the beholder pick up its food?

noisms

04-25-2008 09:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8786174)

I pointed out that TK was actually the one eye you had to keep. Because, otherwise, how does the beholder pick up its food?

We had the exact same conversation in my gaming group; it followed on from the 'How does a Beholder do after-toilet clean-up?' debate.

Mark Krawec

04-25-2008 11:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8784255)

Dude. That's awesome! I gotta remember it for when I finally get around to the Spelljammer game I want to run.

That would make for one freaky elf space marine platoon - they fly up in their moth ship, then hop out wearing suits of insect-shell armor.

noisms

04-25-2008 11:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mark Krawec (Post 8786542)

That would make for one freaky elf space marine platoon - they fly up in their moth ship, then hop out wearing suits of insect-shell armor.

That reminds me of the second novel in the Viriconium series, in a strange way. It's all about giant insects coming down to the world from the moon, after having been summoned from an alternate reality by the insane, confused visions of resurrected ancient aristocrats.

Or something. It's a while since I've read it.

FMP

04-26-2008 03:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Makes you wonder if there isn't a subgroup of armorers who specialize in working chitin. Instead of forges, they use acids, glues & shellacs.

That's actually how it works in Tekumel, the setting for Empire of the Petal Throne. One of the setting elements is that the world is metal-poor, so the best widely available material for weapons and armor is the hide of an animal called the Chlen which is also used as a draft animal.

MMDuran

04-26-2008 04:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

This write-up takes me back to junior high and high school in all the right ways.

Subscribed. Keep up the awesome nostalgia. :)

Oskar Breytenbach

04-26-2008 09:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8784991)
God, the section on Beholders is huuuuuuuge.

It certainly is. You just get through reading about six kinds of beholder, turn the page and discover another six!
Madness!

They tend to look somewhere between 'startled' and 'terrified' in the pictures. It must be the big, wide eye.

noisms

04-26-2008 10:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by MMDuran (Post 8787815)
This write-up takes me back to junior high and high school in all the right ways.

Subscribed. Keep up the awesome nostalgia. :)

Thanks. That's the reason I'm doing it. Takes me back to all those lunch hours in Secondary School (British junior high school) we used to AD&D it up.

noisms

04-26-2008 11:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

So as other have alluded to, the MM doesn't have just three or four pages devoted to six kinds of Beholders and Beholder-Kin....it has AT LEAST TWICE THAT! So, if you like Beholders, read on. If you don't, skip this bit and wait for the next installment.

Beholders and Beholder-Kin Part II

Hive Mother: as you might expect, this is a big Beholder who has dozens of Beholder and Beholder-Kin minions, and can in fact create more. It "may be the ancestral stock of the better known beholder, the next step of its evolution, a magical mutation, or a separate species," according to the MM, but "the reality remains unknown." Dun dun dunnnnn....

Director: this one involves a beholder who clings onto the back of an insect, so it ends up like a kind of symbiotic centipede. The less said about this one the better, I think.

Examiner: a kind of refugee from an early Star Trek episode, this one is an eyeless floating sphere with spidery-leg bits sticking out of it, which acts like a scribe or artificer.

Lensman: this is a five-limbed, vaguely humanoid cyclopsian freak; it has two arms, two legs, and a prehensile tentacle thing with which to... do tentacular things? This is the only Beholder-kin which can use weapons; it favours the polearm, so if you use it you get to equip it with a fauchard or guisarme or bec de corbin, if that is your wont.

Overseer: this is a kind of cross between a Beholder and a tree, covered in fungus which changes colour as the Overseer desires. Do you think, just possibly, they were running out of ideas for Beholder-Kin at this stage?

Watcher: a Beholder with three small eyes arranged around the main central one, and with just one long tentacle.

Have you had enough of Beholders yet? I have. Unfortunately, the ordeal is not yet over...

Other Beholders and Beholder-Kin

Beholder Mage: this beholder has purposefully blinded its main eye (!) in order to be able to cast spells like a mage. A vaguely interesting idea, but why the Beholder should feel this is worth the sacrifice isn't explained.

Elder Orb: an ancient Beholder of "godlike intelligence and power" which creates Death Tyrants.

Orbus: a white Beholder.

Doomsphere: a ghost-like Beholder created by "magical explosions". (If you read that and think, "What?", you're not alone.)

Kasharin: another undead beholder that passes on a rotting disease.

Astereater: "a great boulder-like Beholder without eyes".

Gorbel: a beholder with claws, which has the "nasty habit" of exploding when attacked. (!)

I have now lost the will to live. Birds next!

DMH

04-26-2008 08:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Abominations are the only versions of beholders I like. It was a bit later that I got into Spelljammer and found their origins there.

And the orbus is a bit more than a white beholder. They forgot to mention that orbuses are the power source for tyrant created spelljammers. One idea I had was to make them mutants created from normal beholders by wizards.

noisms

04-26-2008 08:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8790674)

Abominations are the only versions of beholders I like. It was a bit later that I got into Spelljammer and found their origins there.

And the orbus is a bit more than a white beholder. They forgot to mention that orbuses are the power source for tyrant created spelljammers. One idea I had was to make them mutants created from normal beholders by wizards.

I never really got into Spelljammer as much as I did some of the other settings, so I'm mostly ignorant about it. I like the hippopotamus guys, though.

DMH

04-26-2008 08:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

All the beholders on the third page are abominations- hive mothers and their spawn. I, Tyrant mentioned how mothers can make more castes but without any hard examples (IIRC it mentioned a web producing beholder meant to fight harpies).

Wakboth

04-26-2008 09:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Beholders are one of the few truly iconic D&D critters, and impressively bizarre ones at that. I've never used them much, but the idea of these superintelligent, xenophobic balls of hate is quite appealing.

IIRC, Eberron eventually explained them as living, magical artillery created by the daelkyr.

morgue

04-26-2008 09:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8784814)

Beholders and Beholder Kin

The first truly iconic AD&D monster to appear; and I do really mean AD&D - Beholders don't seem to feature as much in later editions. Or is that just me?

And there it is - after long discussion in this thread:

<http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=389888>

finally, the iconic 2E monster is revealed. It is, of course, the beholder. How come none of us picked it? Now that you mention it here, it seems obvious to me.

The beholder has been there since the start, but it was only in 2E that it reigned supreme as king of the badass monsters. And sure, it's iconic for 4E too, but I doubt it will be as central to 4E as the beholder was in 2E.

Wicked.

Pete Whalley

04-26-2008 10:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by morgue (Post 8790754)

The beholder has been there since the start, but it was only in 2E that it reigned supreme as king of the badass monsters. And sure, it's iconic for 4E too, but I doubt it will be as central to 4E as the beholder was in 2E.

I'm looking forward to scaring the shit out of my players in 4e with one, although I agree that it's heyday was in AD&D 2e.

Nothing quite so terrifying there as a volley of save or dies...I miss the good ol' days...sniff...I'll be over at Amazon trying to find replacements for my foolishly given away 2e books...sob

sim_james

04-26-2008 11:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Man, I loved beholders. There is a city in the Planescape setting that uses six beholders as its police force. Upon discovering this, my players became quite agitated and left immediately; after the game there was a bit of debate about the beasties.

Some of my players were quite adamant that beholders were "unkillable" - that literally nothing in the books could kill a beholder if it was being run intelligently. Despite the ludicrousness of this claim (what, a titan couldn't give it a go? The tarrasque?) they could not be swayed.

So I wrote a convention module for beholder PCs (and one mind flayer) and killed scads of them with liches, githyanki, and most memorably, a red dragon. There was about a 50% mortality rate.

AD&D 2nd edition Mind Flayers were quite brutal against beholders, especially if you gave them psionics. The illithid PC's saves and magic resistance ensured that almost every eyestalk fizzled; the beholders very quickly turned to using telekinesis to just hit the damn flayer with rocks. "Bugger this, I'm off to the Astral Plane," he said, and left.

Redfeild

04-27-2008 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cool thread.
A few comments.

Creatures like the Ankheg I don't think of as monsters. More like fantastical animals.

I remember the Monstrous Compendium. I can see why it did not catch on. The more pages I got for it, the harder it was to deal with.

Arcane were a big deal in Spelljammer. They were responsible for the building of most of the engines in Spelljammer.

Yes, Polar bears do get to be that tall.

The Hippo People are called the Giff. I did not like them at fist. Kind of goffy looking. But they grow on you.

6inTruder

04-27-2008 09:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8789599)
Orbus: a white Beholder.

Kasharin: another undead beholder that passes on a rotting disease.

Both are Spelljammer Beholders. The Orbus (as was already mentioned) is what normal Beholders use to power their ships.

The Kasharin are like wierd Beholder mummies. All I've read of them was in the Legend of Spelljammer box.

Quote:

Gorbel: a beholder with claws, which has the "nasty habit" of exploding when attacked. (!)

These were in the 1ed MM. I used to draw pictures of them all the damn time! Just SO astoundingly dumb.

noisms

04-27-2008 11:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Birds

Another marathon section here, and another real-life animal too. I think B is my least favourite letter of the alphabet when it comes to the MM. Although I do love me a good Behir of a morning.

Anyway, the description of the Bird sounds like it was written by the same person who did the Wolf - that is, a thirteen-year-old girl who may have been a PETA member. "Avians' unique physiology," it says, "sets them apart from all other life, and their grace and beauty have earned them a place of respect and adoration in the tales of many races." Gimme a break. Tell me how to kill them and take their stuff!*

*I'm kidding, obviously. Well, not really.

At least they didn't actually try to describe what a Bird is, like they did with the Bat. But without further ado, let's get into the nitty-gritty.

Blood Hawk: I've never used these, and don't even have memory of them being in the MM, which is odd because actually they sound like a good addition to a low level campaign as a semi-random encounter. The males attack humanoids in flocks, in order to steal jewelery with which to impress females. Blood Hawk females obviously aren't up on Destiny's Child. They don't buy their own diamonds, nor their own rings.

Boobrie: Yeah, he said boob. chortle The Boobrie is a 12' tall stork-like bird that eats catfish and snakes, and probably foolhardy adventurers too.

Condor: You know what this is already, I'd wager. What kind of bastard of an adventurer would kill a Condor though, eh? But already we've thrown ethics out of the window - Condor chicks fetch 30-60gp on the open market, you know.

Eagle and Giant Eagle: Eagles "never attack humanoids, but small creatures like brownies have to be wary of a hunting eagle." Now there's a way to balance out a game ruined by a brownie PC from the Complete Book of Humanoids and all its kewl powers. Giant Eagle eggs fetch a whopping 500-800gp. I don't think the 13-year-old PETA girl wrote this part of the entry....

Eblis: This is another stork-like thing with a level of intelligence that allows it to live in communities and have spellcasters. Most of the spells they can cast are of the elusive, annoying variety -spook, wall of fog, you know the type - and they use them to attack adventurers. They "delight [in] hunting and killing."

Falcon: These sell for 1,000 gps. Yep, it's fair to say that PETA girl definitely didn't get to see this part of the book.

Flightless Bird: A slightly amorphous entry, encompassing ostriches, emus and rheas.

Hawk: Hawks are mainly noted for their ability to make you blind; this is more likely than you might think. (25% chance on any successful hit, with 10% chance of losing the eye.) Prices for eggs and fledglings are also noted. (500-1,200 gp.) I'm starting to envisage a massive egg-thief campaign here, progressing from birds of prey, to griffins and hypogriffs, to dragons, but don't think I'd ever be able to justify it. (The entire party would probably have to be Neutral Evil.)

Owl and Giant Owl: The eggs of the Giant Owl sell for 1,000 sp and hatchlings for 2,600 sp, apparently. So... 100gp and 260 gp then? Must be a misprint.

Talking Owl: This intelligent (and, needless to say, wise) owl will accompany Good adventurers on quests, provided such adventurers treat it kindly - it will feign a broken wing to see how the adventurers react. And yet it can also detect good, which makes you wonder what the point of the song-and-dance routine is.

Raven, Giant Raven and Huge Raven: I quite like Giant Ravens, and use them as mounts for races of evil diminutive humanoids. Weirdly, the Huge Raven is actually smaller than the Giant Raven. Seems like it should be the other way round.

Swan: There is a 10% chance that any Swan encounter will include a Swanmay, which seems ludicrously high. Then again...how often does an adventurer encounter Swans in a game? I'd guess it's generally only when the DM wants there to be a Swanmay, so I suppose the chance is in actuality close to 100%.

Vultures and Giant Vultures: The carrion feeders we know and love. These will eat anybody unconscious or magically slept, which is something I haven't used before but most certainly will in future. Giant Vulture eggs are worth 30-60 gps.

The 'B' section improves rather a lot from here onwards.

The Butcher

04-27-2008 01:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8781274)

Behir skin can be made into armour (yeah, that old chestnut...I think around 25% of the monsters encountered so far can have their skins or shells fashioned into armour of some kind; my next high level character is so going to have an Ankheg shield, Behir scale-mail and Boring-Beetle shell helmet). The suit will be worth at least 500gp, although unfortunately it isn't statted. Now there's the Supplement That Never Was: the Complete Guide to Monster-Corpse Armour...

I, or rather the doughty human fighter whose byname inspired my forum login, was once the proud owner of a fine suit of behir hide armor.

This thread is TEH AWESOME!

J Harper

04-27-2008 05:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always liked the Eblis, when I first read about them in The Land Beyond the Magic Mirror module, and the 1E MM II illustration gave them a suitibly sinister look. Never got the chance to use them, though - didn't really run all that much D&D back in that day.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

demiurge1138

04-27-2008 06:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by J Harper (Post 8793657)

I always liked the Eblis, when I first read about them in The Land Beyond the Magic Mirror module, and the 1E MM I illustration gave them a suitibly sinister look. Never got the chance to use them, though - didn't really run all that much D&D back in that day.

They're from Dungeonland? OK, that makes sense now. Makes them a bit more palatable.

Also, the intelligent owls do the song-and-dance with the broken wing because good does not necessarily equal nice. If the good-aligned adventurers don't pay it any heed, they're clearly not the sort to get its cryptic, mostly useless advice.

At least it's not a clockwork owl...

noisms

04-27-2008 07:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8793777)

They're from Dungeonland? OK, that makes sense now. Makes them a bit more palatable.

Also, the intelligent owls do the song-and-dance with the broken wing because good does not necessarily equal nice. If the good-aligned adventurers don't pay it any heed, they're clearly not the sort to get its cryptic, mostly useless advice.

At least it's not a clockwork owl...

When people mention clockwork owls I always think of Viriconium, although that had ospreys, not owls.

blizack

04-27-2008 10:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8792481)

These were in the 1ed MM. I used to draw pictures of them all the damn time! Just SO astoundingly dumb.

They were in the Fiend Folio, but yeah: totally ridiculous.

The Last Conformist

04-28-2008 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Is it just me, or is a Beholder without eyes a seriously weird idea? I mean, what's it beholding with?

Smartmonkey

04-28-2008 04:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 8794705)

Is it just me, or is a Beholder without eyes a seriously weird idea? I mean, what's it beholding with?

His awesometastic magickal mind-powerz, obviously.

I actually used a Booberie in a game once - the players wandered into a marsh, got lost looking for the dungeon, and decided they needed to kill something and eat it to survive. Rather than, y'know, going fishing, they went and got slapped around by a Booberie, manage to kill it (barely), and then realize, on their own, that no-one had brought flint nor tinder.

A Catoblepas TPK'd them later, and that was the end of my first open-endedish DnD game.

The Last Conformist

04-28-2008 06:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Blink

What sort of fishing doesn't involve killing something?

Julius Sleazer

04-28-2008 07:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 8795404)

Blink

What sort of fishing doesn't involve killing something?

Heard of catch-and-release?

A Letter From Prague

04-28-2008 08:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Julius Sleazer (Post 8795574)

Heard of catch-and-release?

Catch-nibble-and-release?

noisms

04-28-2008 01:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Brain Mole

Another psionic monster which I was puzzled by when I first started reading the MM. Even then, though, I thought it was a pretty cool idea (despite the rubbish picture). The Brain Mole is a psionic thief: it tunnels around underground waiting for a psionically able creature to come along - which it can detect with unerring accuracy within 200 yards - whereupon it attempts to suck their psionic energy and wipe their brain.

Nobles and royalty apparently like to keep pet Brain Moles to sense psionic intruders and protect from psionic attack. Lots of adventure hooks there. The ones that immediately leap to mind:

-The King's pet Brain Mole has been behaving as if it is sensing somebody with psionic ability in the royal palace, but nobody can figure out a) where or who it is and b) why whoever it is seems immune to the Brain Mole's psionic draining ability...

-The Duke of Dunderland is plagued by psionically gifted thieves, and wants a Brain Mole for protection...

-The people of Blahblahland hate and fear psionics and believe they are witches. Using Brain Moles, they try to ferret out people with psionic abilities and burn them at the stake...

The "capturing animals and selling them" shtick appears to have spilled over from the Bird entry; adult brain moles fetch 50gp on the open market, and young ones 5gp. That's as cheap as chips for a pet psionics-detector.

Smartmonkey

04-28-2008 06:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Oh god, the Brain Mole. The Monster Manual turned me off of ever getting into 2e psionics, as all of it was just too freaking weird.

And yeah, fishing involves killing, but not things that try to kill you back, generally. Well, unless the GM has been flipping through the K, W, or Z sections of the MM, anyways...

Ratoslov

04-28-2008 06:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8796808)

Brain Mole

Another psionic monster which I was puzzled by when I first started reading the MM. Even then, though, I thought it was a pretty cool idea (despite the rubbish picture). The Brain Mole is a psionic thief: it tunnels around underground waiting for a psionically able creature to come along - which it can detect with unerring accuracy within 200 yards - whereupon it attempts to suck their psionic energy and wipe their brain.

I always thought Brain Moles were bullshit; they're a naturally-occurring race of psionic landmines who will proceed to brain-attack psychics out of nowhere and who, even if you somehow alert the rest of your party to the problem, what are they going to do? There's a mole somewhere in a 200 yard radius ten feet underground. Good luck finding it.

EDIT: Now, Doll Golems are worse, creepy little assholes.

noisms

04-28-2008 09:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 8797449)

I always thought Brain Moles were bullshit; they're a naturally-occurring race of psionic landmines who will proceed to brain-attack psychics out of nowhere and who, even if you somehow alert the rest of your party to the problem, what are they going to do? There's a mole somewhere in a 200 yard radius ten feet underground. Good luck finding it.

EDIT: Now, Doll Golems are worse, creepy little assholes.

They're also way more powerful than the measly 35XP they're worth.

The Last Conformist

04-28-2008 09:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Julius Sleazer (Post 8795574)

Heard of catch-and-release?

Allow me to be more specific: what sort of fishing that actually provides food doesn't involve killing something?

6inTruder

04-29-2008 05:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8792637)

[size="5"]Blood Hawk: I've never used these, and don't even have memory of them being in the MM, which is odd because actually they sound like a good addition to a low level campaign as a semi-random encounter. The males attack humanoids in flocks, in order to steal jewelery with which to impress females. Blood Hawk females obviously aren't up on Destiny's Child. They don't buy their own diamonds, nor their own rings..

I think Blood Hawks came from the 1edFF? Or at least that's where I remember them from. Never had any real inclination to use them.

Smartmonkey

04-29-2008 09:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 8797815)

Allow me to be more specific: what sort of fishing that actually provides food doesn't involve killing something?

We all know that, in DnD, if you kill something, you get XP. No XP is awarded by fishing. Ergo, there is no killing in fishing.

;)

noisms

04-29-2008 12:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Broken One

The Broken One is a great fantasy concept - I wonder if it's where China Mieville got his idea for the 'remade' from? - and they've made great contributions to my campaigns in the past. While they're ostensibly "evil", they have a very good excuse for it, and so they bring in a whole new dimension of ethics and morality - they're not just another orc-alternative.

Broken Ones are the results of magical experiments gone wrong. The failed experiment has left them twisted and, er, broken, and usually infused with the essence of whatever animal the magic was supposed to have merged them with. So one merged with a vulture might have a beak, clawed feet and useless wings instead of arms. Shunned by human society, they gather together in loose tribal bands in the wilderness, where they scrape a living by ambushing travelers and merchants and plot their revenge on those who have wronged them.

One day I want to run a campaign where Broken Ones are the main 'foe'. The BBEG would be an evil mage who was careless one day with a polymorph spell and found himself permanently twisted into something half-human, half-something else. Now a Greater Broken One, he is marshalling together all the Broken Ones in the wilderness - and rumour has it he is creating more, by capturing innocent peasants and fusing them with animals through ancient magicks...

JasonK

04-29-2008 12:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8800649)

We all know that, in DnD, if you kill something, you get XP. No XP is awarded by fishing. Ergo, there is no killing in fishing.

;)

Is there also no crying in baseball?

~ jason

Smartmonkey

04-29-2008 03:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8801331)

Broken One

snip

I once wrote up notes for a Broken ones enclave living on the back of a Zaratan (which, for the ininitiated, you have a long wait ahead for some awesome), stolen almost wholesale from the Island of Doctor Moreau. Only the island was a giant zombie turtle, and Doctor Moreau was an Illithid.

I never got to use that one...

Matthew L. Martin

04-30-2008 05:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8801331)

Broken One

One day I want to run a campaign where Broken Ones are the main 'foe'. The BBEG would be an evil mage who was careless one day with a polymorph spell and found himself permanently twisted into something half-human, half-something else. Now a Greater Broken One, he is marshalling together all the Broken Ones in the wilderness - and rumour has it he is creating more, by capturing innocent peasants and fusing them with animals through ancient magicks...

If you don't have it, pick up the RAVENLOFT adventure Neither Man Nor Beast, which features a lot of broken ones and may provide you some material. It's an Island of Dr. Moreau homage, but a well-done one by Jeff Grubb. (Broken Ones came from the RAVENLOFT Monstrous Compendium Appendix I.)

(un)reason

04-30-2008 06:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Hmm. This makes me think of broken ones and mongrelmen, and how they would react to each other. Thematically, they occupy very similar ecological niches. Would they work together, or fight one another over those little differences, despite the rest of the world just thinking of them as a bunch of freaks.

noisms

04-30-2008 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8805150)

Hmm. This makes me think of broken ones and mongrelmen, and how they would react to each other. Thematically, they occupy very similar ecological niches. Would they work together, or fight one another over those little differences, despite the rest of the world just thinking of them as a bunch of freaks.

I've given that one some thought in the past, too. I think Mongrelmen and Broken Ones have basically opposite attitudes - with the Mongrelmen being isolationist, and the Broken Ones wanting revenge. I think there would exist mutual respect/acknowledgement, but they wouldn't cooperate because of their different goals.

noisms

04-30-2008 12:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Brownie

Ah, the Brownie. The most annoying D&D monster ever? He must be up there. (You always know when a monster is going to be annoying when the descriptive text has lines like "Brownies use spells to harass and drive away enemies".) He will also be forever associated in my mind with the Brownies, which is the name of the girls' equivalent of the cub scouts association in Britain - I always imagine him with a yellow neckerchief and a woggle and a brown skirt. Not a nice image.

Anyway, a Brownie is the fairy equivalent of home help - a friendly night-time visitor who comes along and does some tidying up, milks the cows, keeps foxes out of the hen house... all in exchange for a bit of fruit and veg, and for not boasting to friends. It's all very bucolic - one of those strange moments where old fairy tales and myths break through all the pseudo-Tolkienism and force their way into D&D through the back door.

That said, I find it hard to imagine a Brownie ever appearing in one of my campaigns - partly because they're annoying, but mostly because...well, when are my players ever ordinary farmhouse owners? The only instance I could think of would be appearing as a guide (there's a flat 50% chance a Brownie will agree to this if asked - yet another point where the question has to be raised: why not either role play it out or base it on charisma?).

demiurge1138

04-30-2008 01:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Brownies = early girl scouts in America, too.

A brownie could make its way into a game in a couple of ways, as I see it. The party could be hired by an old friend or relation who is a farmer to find out what happened to his brownie who's gone missing. This poor brownie might have been kidnapped by a local villain who's too lazy to do his own housework and has the power to keep the brownie in line.

Alternatively, the farmer could get his adventuring buddies to figure out why all his chores get done when he's not looking (as he thinks it's a peculiar haunting). Lighter fare than the usual D&D game; probably better as an aside than as the focus of an adventure.

Wakboth

04-30-2008 02:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

One of the things I liked best in the 3e MM when I first read it was the blessed lack of these smug, pseudo-Irish fairies whose only purpose was to harass PCs. Nixies, pixies and grigs I can take, but keep the leprechauns and brownies and killmoulises away! :)

noisms

05-01-2008 12:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bugbear

The first genuine must-have monster in the book is the Bugbear, the classic "graduation" level creature that comes along after the goblins and orcs have become old hat. I have to confess that I've always loved the goblin-hobgoblin-bugbear axis (a veritable "Axis of Evil", if you will - to coin a phrase ;)) and actually prefer it to the orcs, ogres and ogrillons one. I hear that 4th edition is going to try to make those races completely unrelated and very different, which if true I think is a shame. It's good to have little brother, big brother, big daddy monster families, I think. The poor bugbears would be lonely otherwise, no?

Bugbears are a typical humanoid enemy, in that they roam around in bands doing evil things in an evil way, just waiting for a group of adventurers to stumble across and usually be killed by. As usual, stats are included for making leaders and champions of the clan (remember when this just consisted of giving such monsters more hit points and better THACO, rather than the laborious process of 'levelling them up'?). Bugbears are also into ambushes in a big way, which means they get surprise bonuses and have infravision.

Bugbears eat anything they can get their hands on, including goblins, which makes for great flavour (geddit?) for a campaign - the characters come over a rise in the forest and see a gang of bugbears in a clearing, with a cauldron bubbling away full of bits and pieces of goblins.... The last line of the description is, "Goblins are always on their toes when bugbears are present, for the weak or stupid quickly end up in the stewpot." Don't you just love that?

The other thing to be noted about the bugbear entry is the picture, which is a masterpiece, I think: a really evocative sketch of a big, bear-like goblinoid leaning on a mace - looking somehow proud and bestial at the same time. Great stuff.

JasonK

05-01-2008 06:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8811181)

The other thing to be noted about the bugbear entry is the picture, which is a masterpiece, I think: a really evocative sketch of a big, bear-like goblinoid leaning on a mace - looking somehow proud and bestial at the same time. Great stuff.

Given earlier discussion, it's worth noting that that picture is another Diterlizzi piece.

~ jason

noisms

05-01-2008 06:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8812098)

Given earlier discussion, it's worth noting that that picture is another Diterlizzi piece.

~ jason

Yeah, he has all the best pictures. Except, as has been established, the goblin masquerading as a kobold. (Or vice versa.)

DMH

05-01-2008 09:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8805150)

Hmm. This makes me think of broken ones and mongrelmen, and how they would react to each other. Thematically, they occupy very similar ecological niches. Would they work together, or fight one another over those little differences, despite the rest of the world just thinking of them as a bunch of freaks.

I think mongelmen, being a people that have existed for awhile (as long as there has been interbreeding) would take in any broken ones they find. They would get even more nifty and weird genes and can show the broken ones how to survive. OTOH, broken ones might want nothing to do with mongelmen, esp if they were humans converted to broken ones rather than initially animals.

noisms

05-02-2008 12:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bulette

Another iconic old favourite, the Bulette, or land-shark, has been with D&D since the very beginning. (According to the MM the name is pronounced 'Boo-lay', but clearly it should be pronounced 'Boo-lett' - the designers obviously weren't so up on their pseudo-French). A "cross between an armadillo and a snapping turtle" sums it up fairly well - except it also has a huge dorsal fin-like back which pokes out of the ground when it attacks, a la Jaws on a bee-line for some unsuspecting skinny-dippers.

Its temperament, "like the wolverine", is "stupid, mean and fearless", which sounds pretty slanderous to wolverines if you ask me. There's a wolverine who lives just down the street from me who's very urbane and sophisticated, and wouldn't dream of eating an adventurer. Anyway, stupid mean and fearless it is - a kind of underground mixture of shark and tank which roams around a 30 square mile area uprooting trees, starting landslides, and eating anything that moves. Once the whole area has been devastated, it moves on somewhere else. The only things it won't eat are elves, and it "doesn't like" dwarves. Very few people do. The beard sticks in the craw.

The Bulette is yet another monster-which-you-can-make-armour-out-of: plates of its skin can be made into shields of +1 to +3 value by dwarven smiths. This is the most obvious adventure hook, but I also like the vague rumour alluded to that soil which a Bulette has passed through becomes imbued with "magical stone dissolving properties". Now there's something a creative DM could pick up and run with, I feel.

Matthew L. Martin

05-02-2008 01:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8811181)

[size="5"]I hear that 4th edition is going to try to make those races completely unrelated and very different, which if true I think is a shame. It's good to have little brother, big brother, big daddy monster families, I think. The poor bugbears would be lonely otherwise, no?

I don't think you have to worry--there's a "goblin family lineup" sketch on p. 91 of Worlds and Monsters, and it's pretty clearly the classic trio. (The hobgoblin's a little iffy, but the goblin and bugbear are definitely the same creatures.)

They'll probably play a bit differently, but I think the world-based connections will remain.

Wakboth

05-02-2008 06:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bulettes and bugbears are both pretty iconic monsters that saw relatively little use in our games. Don't know why the bulettes never caught on, but with bugbears it was definitely because of the name, which is even wonkier in the Finnish translation (mörköpeikko). It was hard to take them seriously. :)

Also, and this is a bit tangential, but have you tried worlds without orcs at all, using just goblins, hobgoblins and bugbears? Goblins and hobgoblins especially would be pretty good fits for Tolkien's orcs; snaga and Uruk-hai.

noisms

05-02-2008 06:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8816987)

Bulettes and bugbears are both pretty iconic monsters that saw relatively little use in our games. Don't know why th bulettes never caught on, but with bugbears it was definitely because of the name, which is even wonkier in the Finnish translation (mörköpeikko). It was hard to take them seriously. :)

Also, and this is a bit tangential, but have you tried worlds without orcs at all, using just goblins, hobgoblins and bugbears? Goblins and hobgoblins especially would be pretty good fits for Tolkien's orcs; snaga and Uruk-hai.

Actually a game I'm running at the moment is like that - hobgoblins rule the roost, with goblins beneath them as a worker caste and bugbears as a slave/warrior caste, and at the bottom of them all are the halflings and gnomes who are the untouchable caste. Orcs do exist, but they're just wild barbarians scraping a living in the mountains somewhere. The characters are all halflings and gnomes who have set up a kind of resistance movement against "The Man" (or "The Hobgoblin", I suppose).

Does mörköpeikko literally translate as "bug bear"? If so, that is a bit ridiculous. I imagine a bear with big multi-faceted eyes, six legs and wings.

brianm

05-02-2008 07:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I didn't use orcs for years, from about high school all the way through college. I always found them less interesting than the goblin family, though I included kobolds in that lineup.

- Brian

noisms

05-02-2008 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8817034)

I didn't use orcs for years, from about high school all the way through college. I always found them less interesting than the goblin family, though I included kobolds in that lineup.

- Brian

Yeah, orcs are overdone. For the same reason I often don't use elves, or else try to use one of the weirder elf races - like aquatic or jungle ones.

I sometimes toy with the idea of basing orcs on a certain culture from the real world, but that opens up a huge can of worms ("What? So you're saying that all Greeks/Hungarians/Chinese/Indonesians are like orcs?!?") which is best avoided.

sim_james

05-02-2008 08:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8816987)

Also, and this is a bit tangential, but have you tried worlds without orcs at all, using just goblins, hobgoblins and bugbears?

That would be the Dragonlance setting, too. No orcs at all there.

Although somehow a half-orc managed to sneak into the Unsung Heroes supplement and another into one of the more horrid novels.

(un)reason

05-02-2008 08:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8816132)

Bulette

The only things it won't eat are elves, and it "doesn't like" dwarves. Very few people do. The beard sticks in the craw.

The Bulette is yet another monster-which-you-can-make-armour-out-of: plates of its skin can be made into shields of +1 to +3 value by dwarven smiths. This is the most obvious adventure hook, but I also like the vague rumour alluded to that soil which a Bulette has passed through becomes imbued with "magical stone dissolving properties". Now there's something a creative DM could pick up and run with, I feel.

Hmm. That makes me think of another plot idea. It doesn't eat elves, and given that they live in trees, its far less danger to their settlements and architecture. Plus it's good for the soil. What if the bullete was created by an elven wizard who wanted to get rid of those pesky humans and dwarves in the nearby region, so they can expand their territory without the devastation being traced back to them.

noisms

05-02-2008 08:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 8817153)

That would be the Dragonlance setting, too. No orcs at all there.

Although somehow a half-orc managed to sneak into the Unsung Heroes supplement and another into one of the more horrid novels.

Some of those non-Weiss & Hickman Dragonlance novels were awful, weren't they?

It does make you wonder why there have never really been half-hobgoblins or even half-bugbears, though.

noisms

05-02-2008 08:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8817179)

Hmm. That makes me think of another plot idea. It doesn't eat elves, and given that they live in trees, its far less danger to their settlements and architecture. Plus it's good for the soil. What if the bullete was created an elven wizard who wanted to get rid of those pesky humans and dwarves in the nearby region so they can expand their territory without the devastation being traced back to them.

That's quite a cool idea. It's also an interesting way to introduce "Elves as baddies" without resorting to Drow. I like it.

trippingsatyr

05-02-2008 09:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

As for worlds without orcs...

Give me calibans over orcs any day ^^

brianm

05-02-2008 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8817179)

Hmm. That makes me think of another plot idea. It doesn't eat elves, and given that they live in trees, its far less danger to their settlements and architecture. Plus it's good for the soil. What if the bullete was created an elven wizard who wanted to get rid of those pesky humans and dwarves in the nearby region so they can expand their territory without the devastation being traced back to them.

Oooo!

New tactic for Rhoubé Manslayer. :D

- Brian

Mark Krawec

05-03-2008 12:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8817005)

Does mörköpeikko literally translate as "bug bear"? If so, that is a bit ridiculous. I imagine a bear with big multi-faceted eyes, six legs and wings.

And that, in a nutshell, is where homemade monsters come from. And possibly some of those entries that showed up in White Dwarf back in the '80s.

Wakboth

05-03-2008 12:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8817005)

Does mörköpeikko literally translate as "bug bear"? If so, that is a bit ridiculous. I imagine a bear with big multi-faceted eyes, six legs and wings.

Thankfully no. But "mörkö", although it has the same literal meaning as "bugbear" has a definite childish tone. Maybe bugbears as "bugaboos"?

noisms

05-03-2008 11:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bullywug

Now here's a monster you don't see as often as you used to. In fact, do Bullywugs even still exist in 3.X D&D? A "bipedal race of frog-like amphibians", they lurk in swamps, river deltas and marshland, ambushing the unwary as well as making a living by fishing and hunting - a sort of bufonidaean orc, if you will. (Yes, I have a ridiculously big dictionary and I'm not afraid to use it.) Living in small "socially fascist" (whatever that means) clan-groups, they inhabit an area long enough to exhaust all its resources, then move on somewhere else.

I suppose there isn't really much point to Bullywugs, in the grand scheme of things. They're weaker and less interesting than most of the humanoid species in the MM. Equivalent in strength to a goblin, their only real special ability is the hop attack (+1 to attack rolls) which they can deploy from ambush, and they can't use magic. Really their only value is as a kind of surprise: "Wow, our DM used Bullywugs on us at the game yesterday. Never had that happen before."

Part of my lack of enthusiasm I suspect stems from the genuine cringeworthy awfulness of the picture, which I wish I could replicate here. Something more moody and genuinely amphibian-looking (rather than just an orc with a frog's head) would have worked much better. Other than that, I suppose it's just hard to see a niche for the Bullywug when there are so many more "swamp-inhabitant" archetypes to use in the MM, from Lizardmen to Tasloi to Yuan-ti to Grippli to Troglodytes. I suppose if I was going to use them I'd play up the swamp-hunter angle, giving them poison darts, net-traps...maybe giant toad allies.

I bet somebody is going to come along now and tell me that they always used Bullywugs and once had a campaign where the players explored a jungle which was once the site of an ancient empire of Advanced Bullywugs, sort of like the Maya in the Yucatan...

morgue

05-03-2008 11:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Bullywugs were heavily featured in the Isle-of-Dread related Adventure Path in the final run of Dungeon magazine. One of the adventures was even called "The Bullywug Gambit".

:-)

blizack

05-03-2008 11:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8820606)

Bullywug

Now here's a monster you don't see as often as you used to. In fact, do Bullywugs even still exist in 3.X D&D? A "bipedal race of frog-like amphibians", they lurk in swamps, river deltas and marshland, ambushing the unwary as well as making a living by fishing and hunting - a sort of bufonidaean orc, if you will.

Bullywugs were in the Monsters of Faerun supplement for 3rd edition. Oh, and surely bullywugs are more batrachidaean than bufonidaean, right? :D

I always had a soft spot for bullywugs, as they played a prominent part in the D&D cartoon. I even had some bullywug action figures as a kid.

Rachel Cartacos

05-03-2008 12:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8811181)

It's good to have little brother, big brother, big daddy monster families, I think.

I always take this even further and make them just different stages in the same species life cycle.

Goblins are the children, they grow into Hobgoblins, after a few decades they lose their fertility and grow into bugbears.

mirober

05-03-2008 01:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8820606)
In fact, do Bullywugs even still exist in 3.X D&D?

Pathfinder created an equivalent: The Boggard http://paizo.com/download/pathfinder...1_Bestiary.zip

E.T.Smith

05-03-2008 02:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8820606)
Part of my lack of enthusiasm [for Bullywugs] I suspect stems from the genuine cringeworthy awfulness of the picture, which I wish I could replicate here.

Is this what you're talking about?

<http://neo3555.tripod.com/sitebuilde...s/bullywug.jpg>

It could be much worse:

<http://www.toyarchive.com/STAForsale...wugSpear1a.jpg>

That's the figure from the early 1980's D&D kids toylines, based on the Saturday morning cartoon in which Bullywugs were a recurring menace. As often as not, an episode would begin with the lost kids running and shouting "oh no, Venger's bullywugs have found us again!" then they'd execute some clever ruse to give 'em the slip. Because bullywugs featured so prominently in the show (but none of the other humanoids did), kids like myself who only found out about D&D the game after watching D&D the cartoon had an inflated expectation of their importance.

E.T.Smith

05-03-2008 02:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

While I'm posting pictures, I'll refer back to the Bulette. Because I love gleefully pointing out that some of its weirdness is because it was one of the monsters Gygax made up based upon some cheap plastic toys he used as improvised minis back in the primordial days:

Source: It came from Blogspace

http://www.stupidranger.com/pics/mon...s/DSC_0674.jpg

demiurge1138

05-03-2008 02:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

In my prehistoric, reptiles-only campaign setting, bullywugs featured pretty strongly.

As a backwards race of jokes.

The Salt was a great shallow sea in between the two major continents, studded with thousands of marshy, mangrove-filled islands. It was inhabited by the bullywugs and the sivs, a race of monastic batrachians. The bullywugs thought that the two races were at war, and endlessly plotted to destroy their more civilized kin. The sivs knew that they had won the war ages ago, and mostly ignored the bullywugs, occasionally manipulating them into destroying their "allies" or hunting them for sport.

noisms

05-04-2008 10:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8821088)

While I'm posting pictures, I'll refer back to the Bulette. Because I love gleefully pointing out that some of its weirdness is because it was one of the monsters Gygax made up based upon some cheap plastic toys he used as improvised minis back in the primordial days:

Source: It came from Blogspace

http://www.stupidranger.com/pics/mon...s/DSC_0674.jpg

That's the coolest bit of trivia ever.

I wonder what the origin of that plastic toy was.

blizack

05-04-2008 10:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8823864)

That's the coolest bit of trivia ever.

I wonder what the origin of that plastic toy was.

Not sure, but I had a bag of cheap plastic dinosaur toys as a kid that included a bullette and a rust monster.

noisms

05-04-2008 10:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by blizack (Post 8823896)

Not sure, but I had a bag of cheap plastic dinosaur toys as a kid that included a bullette and a rust monster.

I have a feeling I had the rust monster, or at least I vaguely remember it, but it's the first time I've seen the Bulette. I'd love to know what company made them. Probably somewhere in Taiwan - they made all the cheap toys back then.

brianm

05-04-2008 11:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by blizack (Post 8820632)

I always had a soft spot for bullywugs, as they played a prominent part in the D&D cartoon. I even had some bullywug action figures as a kid.

Yeah, the cartoon went very far in selling the bullywugs to me, but it wasn't until recently that I think I ever got around to using any in an adventure, and even then they were sort of morally ambiguous allies for the PCs.

But man I loved those cool D&D action figures. :D

- Brian

brianm

05-04-2008 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Yeah, I had at least two rust monsters, one that came with a bag of otherwise very authentic dinosaurs and saber-toothed tigers. I was shocked to see it appear in D&D.

And the bullywugs were not the only humanoids to show up frequently in the D&D cartoon, though they did appear alot. Some episodes also featured the pig-snouted orcs.

- Brian

Julius Sleazer

05-04-2008 11:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by A Letter From Prague (Post 8795677)
Catch-nibble-and-release?

Um, yeah. Good point.:o

noisms

05-04-2008 11:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Yes, here it is folks, the one you've all been waiting for, the Monster That Comes Before All Other Monsters (if not alphabetically), the Most Iconic of Icons, the most Dungeonest of D&D creatures (if not the Dragonest)....

the Carrion Crawler!!!!

Those wonderful words just trip of the tongue, don't they? Carrion crawler. Say it with me. Carrion crawler. It's like a little melody. And it brings back such warm memories because for me (and I suspect for many people reading this) it was the first monster I ever encountered as a D&D player.

For me, it happened when I was about 11 and my friend's brother ran a short adventure during the lunch hour at school using, I think, the red box set. My character was a nameless halfling, who I remember little about except that he had a dexterity of 16, which I thought was the coolest of cool things; the memory of rolling those three d6s and having it come up with two 6s and a 4....I think I was hooked on D&D from that moment. I also recall that he was wielding a handaxe, although my memory gets hazy after that. I picked a halfling because I'd just finished reading The Two Towers; I do remember that, at least.

It was a classic (in many ways The Classic) D&D adventure: without backstory or any explanation other than "You're adventurers and that's what you do," we entered a dungeon (I think the other players were a dwarf and a human magic-user) and in the first cavern came across this beastie....whereupon we commenced to kill it, and would have taken its stuff too if it had had any. (One of the other characters died in the encounter, I think, and came back as yet another dwarf with only a slight variance in stats.) My halfling struck the killing blow, as I recall, although maybe that's just a glory-stealing mis-memory.

[The next encounter was a red dragon. My friend's big brother was mean.]

Anyway, I'd be amazed if anyone reading this didn't know what a Carrion Crawler was, but for the uninitiated, it's a kind of giant maggoty worm thing that crawls around trying to paralyze people. It's an easy kill for its 420 XP, with a fair few hit dice but nothing to frighten you with other than 2d6 turns of paralysis; I have, however, always longed to see a TPK where a group of Carrion Crawlers get lucky, paralyzes the entire party, and proceeds to slowly devour them.

Or, even better, they paralyze the party and the DM says "You feel the Carrion Crawlers moving over you, but are temporarily blinded by their paralyzing poison," and what the creatures are actually doing is laying eggs inside the PCs' bodies, ready to hatch and explode from their stomachs, a la Alien. That would be fantastic.

The Ecology section at the end lets us know, though, that the Carrion Crawler ain't really bad - he's just misunderstood. He's good for the ecosystem, see, and fulfills the vital function of killing off the weak and foolish, thus strengthening the gene pool of his prey races. Eugenics in D&D, eh? Who would have thunk it?

sim_james

05-04-2008 04:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I remember the carrion crawler fondly from those 1st edition Monster Manual cards. Remember them? Full colour illo of a monster on one side and MM stats on the other...

I think I still have sets I and III around here somewhere.

Smartmonkey

05-04-2008 04:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Vs level 3ish party.

Begin with 6-10 orcs, with war leader and maybe a wolf or two for spice.

Add tamed Carrion crawlers among the orcish defenders.

Bake pie.

Utilize paralysis until hilarity ensues.

The carrion crawler does very poorly as a single critter. Team it up with a rust monster for extra hilarity/annoyance.

demiurge1138

05-04-2008 06:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I love love love the Monstrous Manual carrion crawler art. Look at it:

http://www.vanhiel.com/daniel/MC_ima...on_crawler.jpg

It's like a little jaunt into my subconscious. Maggot + octopus = love.

Despite that, I don't think I've ever used the monster itself. Which is a pity. I should really rectify that soon. Very soon...

tobygrandjean

05-04-2008 06:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

raises hand

Yup, I've been in TPKs with a carrion crawler. Just a run a hugely bad luck unduplicated until the TPK with a 3rd level party to a single ghoul in a pool.

There seems to be this rule; you better take at least one elf in the party or you'll be hosed by paralysis.

Wakboth

05-04-2008 09:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Carrion crawler's a menace at low levels; a bit of bad luck with the saves, and your party is suddenly down and worm chow.

noisms

05-05-2008 12:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8825516)

Carrion crawler's a menace at low levels; a bit of bad luck with the saves, and your party is suddenly down and worm chow.

2nd edition was really interesting that way. In earlier editions death had been swift and you just shrugged your shoulders and rolled up a new character. In 3.X, character creation took bloody ages so character death was a minor catastrophe. 2nd edition was caught between the two; on the one hand death was still sudden and often based entirely on luck, while on the other character creation was a much more involved affair than it had been in the past, and you were encouraged to invest in the process somewhat. It made for an odd mixture of being somewhat emotionally attached to characters while at the same time seeing them die a whole lot.

JRM

05-05-2008 06:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Thanks for this thread, the 2nd edition is my favourite version of The Monster Manual. I've always liked the additional ecology info.

As for the carrion crawler, I think of them as a relatively harmless monster - in early enough editions of AD&D they didn't have a bite attack, so there was no way they could inflict HP of damage. Just as well, since those paralyzing tentacles were a pain - with eight attacks a round at least one PC always ended up failing a save, and with a 15" move few characters would be able to outrun them.

A grell makes a far more threatening paralyzing monster, those things are nasty.

Smartmonkey

05-05-2008 10:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

It might be an interesting low-level adventure to have PC's hired by a local physician who has found that carrion crawlers make great anesthesiologists - i.e, capture a live carrion crawler so the doctor can use it to paralyze patients prior to surgery/amputations.

Creepy, but neat.

Numanoid

05-05-2008 11:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

There seem to be a bunch of monsters worth 420 XP.

I'm sure you could set up a very elaborate 2nd ed. "drinking game" where you take a bong hit every time you kill a monster.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cat, Great

Thankfully, PETA girl didn't get her hands on this entry, so it isn't an overblown weirdo love-in like a lot of the other "real" animal entries. The intro consists of one sentence and one sentence alone: "The great cats are among the most efficient of all predators." Yep, I guess so. Although you do have to wonder if this would be true in an average D&D homeworld where blue dragons and rocs and harpies are also on the prowl.

Anyway, detailed are:

Cheetahs, which can spring forward 20 feet, according to the MM. Is that right? 20 feet? There must be a zoologist reading this.

Jaguars, "one of the most feared predators of the jungle."

Leopards, which can spring forward 25 feet, and so always presumably beat cheetahs in long jump competitions at the big cat olympics. (Unless the cheetahs cheat, that is! God, I'm such a wit.)

Lions, which can actually leap 30 feet. They would beat the leopards at the big cat olympics, but they're usually too busy lazing around.

Mountain Lions, who are good competition for the cheetahs, with a 20 foot leap.

Spotted Lions, who don't leap at all.

Giant Lynx, who can only manage a pathetic 15 feet.

Tigers, who can manage a 30-50 foot leap, and so always get the gold medal.

Smilodons, who aren't really cats, but are included anyway because, well, hey.

Not much else to say about the big cats. Each entry makes a point of saying, at the end, that human beings are the cats' worst enemies and all of them become threatened by the destruction of their habitats and hunting by man; maybe I spoke too soon about PETA-girl.

I've never used a big cat as a monster in a game. It just doesn't seem to make sense; why on earth would a tiger want to take on four to six humanoids armed with swords and axes when it could just eat a deer instead?

Allandaros

05-05-2008 03:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8816987)

Also, and this is a bit tangential, but have you tried worlds without orcs at all, using just goblins, hobgoblins and bugbears? Goblins and hobgoblins especially would be pretty good fits for Tolkien's orcs; snaga and Uruk-hai.

I was already planning on doing this in my upcoming PbP. :D

JasonK

05-05-2008 03:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well, rangers and druids still got animal companions in 2E, right? Maybe that's why cats were included...?

~ jason

demiurge1138

05-05-2008 05:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Animal companions are where I've usually used big cats. In the game I'm currently running, the party wizard stood in the back and got dragged off by a cougar animal companion. The rest of the party saved him at -9 hp.

That group still refers to getting ambushed as "being cougared".

Sleeper

05-05-2008 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8828260)

Smilodons, who aren't really cats, but are included anyway because, well, hey.

Minor correction. The Smilodon genus is part of the family Felidae, so by definition they are cats, and thus "saber-toothed cat" is fine. Sabre-toothed tiger on the other hand is taxonomically inaccurate because they aren't closely related to tigers (they belong to a different subfamily, Machairodontinae).

noisms

05-05-2008 09:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 8828533)

Minor correction. The Smilodon genus is part of the family Felidae, so by definition they are cats, and thus "saber-toothed cat" is fine. Sabre-toothed tiger on the other hand is taxonomically inaccurate because they aren't closely related to tigers (they belong to a different subfamily, Machairodontinae).

Blame the authors of the MM! I was just repeating the information I read there, parrot-like.

brianm

05-06-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Also, if you had 5k gp burning a hole through your Belt Pouch, Large, you could buy a hunting cat according to the equipment list of the 2e PHB.

I love the 2e PHB equipment list. It had damn near anything on it.

I also loved large, predatory cats because you couldn't have a sexy, voluptuous Frazetta-style babe lounging in the jungle without a half-dozen panthers or smilodons hanging about. :D

- Brian

noisms

05-06-2008 11:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8830070)

I also loved large, predatory cats because you couldn't have a sexy, voluptuous Frazetta-style babe lounging in the jungle without a half-dozen panthers or smilodons hanging about. :D

Very true! That reminds me of the Animal Lords in the Planescape Montrous Compendium II; the Cat Lord (Mistress?) picture was bloody gorgeous.

Smartmonkey

05-06-2008 11:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

That evil druid, y'know, the one whose idea of balance is closer to nature red in tooth and claw than anything else? Yeah. Gather up some smilodons, and start cacking those mean old farmers and townsfolk.

Seriously. I don't think theres much more terrifying than being hunted by a great cat - even lynx can be pretty damn scary. If you're a pissed of druid, great cats would make great terror assets.

noisms

05-06-2008 11:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cat, Small

Commoners be afraid, be very afraid. Oh, wrong edition, sorry.

Lots of interesting information in the Small Cat entry - get this: some cats are pets, while others are wild. Not only that, they are commonly used to control rodent populations and are common in settled regions! I know, I can hardly stand the excitement myself.

There are three types detailed in this entry; the Domestic Cat, the Wild Cat and the elven cat. The Domestic and Wild varieties are pretty much what you would expect; a few details on how cats are stealthy and rarely surprised, and the obligatory Ecology section on gestation periods and litter sizes.

The Elven Cat gets a slightly lengthier section; they are to the Domestic Cat what elves are to humans - in other words a more graceful, wise, annoying version with pointier ears. They have their own language (which must be the least-chosen language ever on character sheets: "My character can speak Common, Dwarven, Draconic and Elven Cat!"), rudimentary ESP, and a few spells like Trip and Enlarge. They also have a 99.9% chance to move silently, which is a rule I guarantee I will never use; I mean come on guys, when it gets to 1d1000s, let's just call it quits and say they always move silently.

Rachel Cartacos

05-06-2008 12:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8832733)

The Elven Cat gets a slightly lengthier section; they are to the Domestic Cat what elves are to humans - in other words a more graceful, wise, annoying version with pointier ears. They have their own language (which must be the least-chosen language ever on character sheets: "My character can speak Common, Dwarven, Draconic and Elven Cat!"), rudimentary ESP, and a few spells like Trip and Enlarge. They also have a 99.9% chance to move silently, which is a rule I guarantee I will never use; I mean come on guys, when it gets to 1d1000s, let's just call it quits and say they always move silently.

Haha! This is the first I've ever heard of these!

These are joining the Flumphs and the Wolf-in-sheep's-clothing as some of the coolest monsters ever!

sim_james

05-06-2008 02:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8832733)

They also have a 99.9% chance to move silently, which is a rule I guarantee I will never use; I mean come on guys, when it gets to 1d1000s, let's just call it quits and say they always move silently.

But that's unrealistic!

kelvingreen

05-06-2008 05:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8832733)

(which must be the least-chosen language ever on character sheets: "My character can speak Common, Dwarven, Draconic and Elven Cat!")

Brilliant! The campaign possibilities abound!

Although that said, I could see the potential in some kind of Lovecraftian "the cats are in charge" adventure.

blizack

05-06-2008 10:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rachel Cartacos (Post 8832878)

Haha! This is the first I've ever heard of these!

These are joining the Flumphs and the Wolf-in-sheep's-clothing as some of the coolest monsters ever!

Well, the 1st edition Monster Manual II had the Cooshee (elven dog), so I guess it was only a matter of time.

Numanoid

05-07-2008 12:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Aww... kitties!

This whole thread is such a nostalgia trip for me.

Steve H

05-07-2008 08:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Always loved the Monstrous Manual, precisely for all of the ecology stuff. When I cleared out all my 2nd Ed stuff a few years back it was one of the few books I kept. Reading this thread is making me regret getting rid of the 2nd Ed stuff - really shows up how in many ways it was a very different game to 3e.

demiurge1138

05-07-2008 08:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

On ENWorld, one of the guys who used to write Ecology articles for Dragon Magazine posted his "Ecology of the Elven Cat" which didn't get picked up. You can read it here. Makes them make a certain amount of sense.

Plus, it's a good read.

noisms

05-07-2008 12:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Steve H (Post 8837073)

Always loved the Monstrous Manual, precisely for all of the ecology stuff. When I cleared out all my 2nd Ed stuff a few years back it was one of the few books I kept. Reading this thread is making me regret getting rid of the 2nd Ed stuff - really shows up how in many ways it was a very different game to 3e.

A very different game, which all things considered I really prefer.

noisms

05-07-2008 12:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Catoblepas

I love the description of the Catoblepas: "The body of the catoblepas is like that of a large, bloated buffalo, and its legs are stumpy, like those of a pygmy elephant or a hippopotamus. Its long, snakey tail is swift and strong, and can move with blinding speed. The head of the catoblepas is perched upon a long, weak neck, and would be much like that of a warthog except that the catoblepas is uglier." Talk about kicking somebody when they're down. Surely the Catoblepas already knows he's ugly without comparing him unfavourably to a warthog. I mean, he has a body like a large bloated buffalo, for God's sake!

Anyway, not only is he uglier than a warthog, the Catoblepas also has easily one of the worst pictures in the MM; one that has to challenge for the top 5. If you've never seen it, I really do urge you to check it out. It literally looks like it was drawn by the 9-year-old daughter of whoever wrote the descriptive text. (I imagine all the other designers crowding around him in the office and saying "Please, Bob, just please don't put that picture in! Tony Diterlizzi's just waiting in the next room for the go ahead!" But no, his little princess drew the picture and that's the one he wants to go for. If the rest of the world can't see what a talented artist she is, screw them!)

The Catoblepas is hands down the cheapest monster in the book. It's an insta-kill monster, of which there are quite a few in the MM; the difference is that a Catoblepas' gaze doesn't even allow a saving throw. If your eyes meet its gaze, you're fucked. What is more, if the creature has the advantage of surprise, there is a straight 1 in 6 chance of somebody in the party meeting its gaze. So a flat 1 in 6 chance of somebody being dead, basically, whenever the creature is encountered. Even if a concerted effort is made to close or avert your eyes, all you get is a saving throw against death magic. Not incidentally, the beast can also stun you with its tail with 75% effectiveness for 1-10 rounds. And all this for only 975 XP!

That said, it's mythological, so I quite like it. It reminds me of those old animated films by Ray Harryhausen (sp?), although I'm not sure a Catoblepas ever appeared in one of them.

Pointless Ecology information: Catoblepas' mate for life, live for 150-200 years, and attach no importance to treasure.

demiurge1138

05-07-2008 01:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Sadly, a catoblepas never made it into a Harryhausen movie. It would have felt at home there. And say what you will about 3e, but at least their catoblepas has a save attached to its death ray eyes.

Jack of None

05-07-2008 01:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I remember reading about the Catoblepas in some book as a child, but the only thing I remember about this early encounter with the Catoblepas is that it had a deadly gaze, but its hair was so heavy that it couldn't lift its head. I also remember it being described as very sad and lonely, although I might be confusing it with something else.

I would probably use the Catoblepas as an extremely unusual social encounter -- like an oracular monster or something -- rather than a combat scene.

Steve H

05-07-2008 05:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8837679)
A very different game, which all things considered I really prefer.

I'm torn. I think I'd have to play it again to really have an opinion on the matter, since it's been so many years now that I did.

What drew me to see 3e as an "upgrade" at the time was the more sensible and coherent internal structure of the rules, as opposed to 2nd Ed's somewhat random assortment of different rules subsystems (although playing 3e again now is highlighting that there's still a few random subsystems hiding in there, such as grappling). In hindsight though I'm starting to feel that 3e is a more rules-heavy game, to a degree which is starting to not pay off for me. My gut feel (but I say again, I've not played 2nd Ed in nearly 10 years) is that combat is far slower in 3e, which is something which bugs me.

kelvingreen

05-07-2008 05:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8837757)
Pointless Ecology information: Catoblepas' mate for life, live for 150-200 years, and attach no importance to treasure.

There's a supplement for, I think, 2e Forgotten Realms, which is an illustrated catalogue of strange items that can be bought from this travelling bazaar thing. One of the items is cheese made from the milk of the Catoblepas; for obvious reasons, procuring the milk is a dangerous job, so the cheese is something of a delicacy.

It's called "Death Cheese", and with a brilliant name like that, it endeared itself to our gaming group immediately.

Wakboth

05-07-2008 05:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8838489)

There's a supplement for, I think, 2e Forgotten Realms, which is an illustrated catalogue of strange items that can be bought from this travelling bazaar thing. One of the items is cheese made from the milk of the Catoblepas; for obvious reasons, procuring the milk is a dangerous job, so the cheese is something of a delicacy.

It's called "Death Cheese", and with a brilliant name like that, it endeared itself to our gaming group immediately.

FR also has gorgonzola, a blue cheese made (by drow?) from gorgon milk. :D

Deadmanwalking

05-07-2008 05:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Just posting to note that this was one of the first three RPG books I owned (the others were the PHB and DMG, obviously. All back in...4th Grade, I think), and I still remember reading through it the Christmas Break I got it. Lots of fun. :)

I have and will be watching this thread with interest, though I do occasionally disagree (the catoblepas picture wasn't that bad).

sim_james

05-07-2008 08:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

That Ecology information isn't entirely useless. Knowing that Catoblepas mate for life, if your party only manages to slay one of a mated pair then they can still consider it a qualified success - the survivor won't be reproducing.

At least, that would be my spin to the Old Geezer In The Tavern.

DMH

05-07-2008 09:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8837843)

And say what you will about 3e, but at least their catoblepas has a save attached to its death ray eyes.

And they only use it when hunting (once a month) or for defense. The rest of the time they are big capybaras munching on sedges and other marsh plants.

noisms

05-07-2008 10:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 8838824)

That Ecology information isn't entirely useless. Knowing that Catoblepas mate for life, if your party only manages to slay one of a mated pair then they can still consider it a qualified success - the survivor won't be reproducing.

At least, that would be my spin to the Old Geezer In The Tavern.

And to whoever hired you to kill them. "Hey, I'm entitled to half the gold, surely!"

noisms

05-08-2008 04:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cave Fisher

A bit of an oddity, this one, in that every time I flick through the MM and come across its entry I find myself thinking, "Oh yeah, the Cave Fisher - I'd forgotten about that."

A kind of cross between a spider, a lobster, and a trilobite, the Cave Fisher knocks around in subterranean areas, setting up webs to ensnare its victims. These are difficult to detect and can only be cut by a +1 magical weapon - but disappointingly the Fisher's blood can also dissolve them. It would be more fun if they ensnared you for ever if you didn't have a magic blade. That would make you think twice about dissing a Cave Fisher again.

Better, the creature can shoot its filaments like a snare and then drag targets towards it, a bit like a harpoon, or that guy on Mortal Kombat whose name escapes me. They have a strength of 18/00 in the case of a tug of war - which I think makes them as strong as a pit fiend, if anybody has been keeping up with this thread since the Baatezu entry.

Adventure hook: Thieves guilds prize the Cave Fisher's filaments, which they have obvious uses for - the strands make super strong ropes and the sticky stuff that coats them can be used on gloves and boots to...well...turn you into spiderman, I suppose.

Numanoid

05-08-2008 04:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

i think it's funny that, between the Carrion crawler and the Cave Fisher, that D&D felt the need to make up imaginary giant bugs because apparently giant version of real bugs Just. Aren't. Weird. Enough.

Seriously, I'm surprised that one day they didn't decide to just make a giant grasshopper with an rhino's head and call it a day.

"Rhinopper! 8 HD. Leap-and-gore attack inflicts 2d10 dmg. AC 3"

"Ecology? Uhh... a wizard did it. Yeah. It lives for 1,000 years and usually dwells in dungeons, mostly in 10' x 10' rooms."

"Brilliant! Print a layout and have Diterrizi illustrate!"

But in all seriousness, I can wait for the entry of my all-time fav D&D monster... the Doppelganger.

Kaiten

05-08-2008 04:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cave Fishers were always one of those monsters that made me go, "That's kinda cool. I should use that sometime," and then never actually got around to using them.

kelvingreen

05-08-2008 05:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8843435)

Better, the creature can shoot its filaments like a snare and then drag targets towards it, a bit like a harpoon, or that guy on Mortal Kombat whose name escapes me.

Scorpion.

The Cave Fisher is a weird one. Really, it doesn't do anything that a giant spider of some sort can't do, so one wonders why it was created. I suspect it sneaked in from one of the designers' home campaigns.

brianm

05-08-2008 06:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8843558)

The Cave Fisher is a weird one. Really, it doesn't do anything that a giant spider of some sort can't do, so one wonders why it was created. I suspect it sneaked in from one of the designers' home campaigns.

The cave fisher made its debut in module A4: In the Dungeons of the Slave Lords. This is a justly famous adventure in which the party begins as captives who are dumped all-but-naked in an underground maze and must use their wits in place of their lost equipment. It also debuted the myconids.

The thing with the cave fisher that makes it different from a spider is how it uses its "web". Instead of weaving a net across a likely traffic point, it dangles a string to snag its victim and then reels it in. Thus, it's more like a giant frog with its sticky tongue than a spider. The traditional cave fisher tactic is to have it hiding in the crevices above a narrow path. As the party marches by, the cave fisher ambushes the group by shooting its sticky web at somebody in the middle of the party. For best effect, it ought to be the mage. The party then has to find a way to get up to the beast to kill it before it reels in its catch and chows down on it. Since there's no listed maximum length on this string and most infravision only goes to 60', this can be a real challenge for some parties.

- Brian

kelvingreen

05-09-2008 06:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

True, true. I suppose it's all in the way you play it.

noisms

05-09-2008 07:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Centaur

I must confess Centaurs are one of the few MM creatures that really leave me cold. I'm not sure why exactly, but I can take a few guesses:

- The anarcho-socialist, "we're all comrades who live in idyllic oneness with nature" shtick bores me to tears - I want my Centaurs to be bloodthirsty marauding Scythians, dammit! I want characters to tremble at the sound of their hooves in the distance - not tremble in fear at the sound of their self-righteous "we love nature and everybody's friends together" bleating.
- They get on far too well with elves; if any race gets on well with elves it automatically becomes suspicious in my book (I've played too many dwarf characters down the years and I sometimes think it has unduly affected my psyche).
- There was an Episode of Which We Do Not Speak involving an over-amorous Centaur player character and a female human NPC in a session with my old gaming group - and that's just badwrongfun right there.
- That bit in the Dragonlance Chronicles where the characters meet a group of Centaurs is one of the most cringeworthy boring love-ins in the history of fantasy literature

Anyway, I'll get off my anti-Centaur high-horse (geddit?) now. Centaurs in theory should be cool, and if I ever do use them in a game it will be as marauding Scythians threatening the civilized world as we know it, butchering priests, burning temples, drinking blood out of skulls and generally being bad horsies. Forget the utopian socialist nonsense!

That has no place in fantasy outside of China Mieville novels!

Malignant Marionette

05-09-2008 08:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8849359)

[]There was an Episode of Which We Do Not Speak involving an over-amorous Centaur player character and a female human NPC in a session with my old gaming group - and that's just badwrongfun right there.*

Well, I suppose you're popular with the ladies when you're hung like a horse. :p

Anyhow, this thread is great stuff. Really brings back memories and some new stuff, too. (Yeah, didn't remember the cave fisher either.) Almost tempted to start a similar-ish one with a different book.

Hellzon

05-09-2008 09:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Centaur are fucking terrifying in NetHack.

Just saying...

Subscribed

weasel fierce

05-09-2008 11:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Warhammer's centaurs arent terribly nice either.

A Letter From Prague

05-09-2008 11:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8849359)

[]The anarcho-socialist, "we're all comrades who live in idyllic oneness with nature" shtick bores me to tears - I want my Centaurs to be bloodthirsty marauding Scythians, dammit! I want characters to tremble at the sound of their hooves in the distance - not tremble in fear at the sound of their self-righteous "we love nature and everybody's friends together" bleating.*

Since when does loving nature preclude cannibalism?

Elemental

05-10-2008 12:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8832733)

The Elven Cat gets a slightly lengthier section; they are to the Domestic Cat what elves are to humans - in other words a more graceful, wise, annoying version with pointier ears.

Those things were real? I heard about them, but I thought they were some sort of house-ruled thing or in-joke that went too far.

noisms

05-10-2008 01:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by weasel fierce (Post 8850008)

Warhammer's centaurs aren't terribly nice either.

What a Warhammer centaurs like? I haven't played Warhammer in about 10 years.

Heart in Narnia

05-10-2008 02:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

This thread is great. I got into DnD too late to actually use ADnD, but I find it fascinating to see the previous incarnations.

Also, whenever I am playing a bard that is starting to run out of languages, I am going to pick Elven cat. This, I believe, is an excellent plan.

kelvingreen

05-10-2008 05:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

One of the problems, I think, is that centaurs are all well and good in a baseline, low-fantasy, setting, but they just seem a bit naff when you've got Slaad and Githyanki running about. Ditto the satyr.

There's probably some potential in playing centaurs like the Spartans in 300, but the good-but-dull version is, well, dull.

Hybba

05-10-2008 05:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8851727)

One of the problems, I think, is that centaurs are all well and good in a baseline, low-fantasy, setting, but they just seem a bit naff when you've got Slaad and Githyanki running about. Ditto the satyr.

There's probably some potential in playing centaurs like the Spartans in 300, but the good-but-dull version is, well, dull.

Yeah, the greek version of the warlike hedonist centaurs is much better :)

Hyb'

brianm

05-10-2008 07:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hybba (Post 8851853)

Yeah, the greek version of the warlike hedonist centaurs is much better :)

Yeah, but then you're right back in with the badwrongfun. :D

- Brian

kelvingreen

05-10-2008 07:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well, perhaps we can keep the fighting and wine-quaffing, but draw the line at gratuitous wenching? ;)

noisms

05-10-2008 10:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Centipede

Whoever wrote the text for this one really didn't like centipedes. In the first paragraph they are variously described as "loathsome", "repulsive", and "arousing [of] universal disgust". I dunno; I'm not a big centipede fan either, but I prefer them to, say, slugs. Or centaurs.

I also often use them in games. They're a good low-level challenge for a group of 1st level dungeoneer characters, and it makes a change from killing kobolds all the time. Statted are:

Giant Centipedes, which are about a foot long and poisonous. (I'm not sure if all real centipedes are poisonous, but the ones in Japan are. I know a girl who got bitten by one in the neck while she was asleep, and she almost died because of the paralytic effect on her throat.)

Huge Centipedes, which are only 6 inches long, but essentially the same as the Giant variety. As an aside, I was always slightly confused by AD&D's size rankings. "Huge" sounds bigger than "Giant" to me, intuitively, although it's one rank below on the official scale. Am I alone in thinking this?

Megalo-Centipedes (which means Great Centipede: Fact) - a bigger, instakill save-vs-death variety, with rudimentary intelligence. I'd forgotten just how many instakill monsters there were in AD&D. Reading through the MM like this it feels as if at least 25% of all the entries have at least one creature which can end you with a single bite, touch or glance.

Tunnel Worms, which lurks in tunnels (hence the name, I suppose) waiting for prey to pass by, whereupon they lunge out and basically eat its way through whatever it is - armour and all (leather armour is destroyed in one round; plate mail in three). I like this monster. It is getting used at the next available opportunity in the campaign I'm running at the moment. (I'm a big fan of monsters which destroy armour. Nothing like the look of horror on the party's paladin's face when he realizes his plate mail is now useless and he's at AC 9 until he can get some armour from somewhere.)

Wakboth

05-10-2008 03:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hybban (Post 8851853)

Yeah, the greek version of the warlike hedonist centaurs is much better :)

I had centaurs in one game as rowdy, violent hippies: all free love (between centaurs, thankfully!), friendship and wine, but if you pissed them off, or they drunk a bit too much, the clubs come out swinging.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8853146)

Centipede

Whoever wrote the text for this one really didn't like centipedes. In the first paragraph they are variously described a "loathsome", "repulsive", and "arousing [of] universal disgust". I dunno; I'm not a big centipede fan either, but I prefer them to, say, slugs. Or centaurs.

True fact: our current DM has a centipede phobia, to the point that she cringes and twitches when she has to pick up a centipede miniature. Which, honestly, makes me wonder why she uses them in adventures. :)

Ragnarok_Engine

05-10-2008 04:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8850397)

What a Warhammer centaurs like? I haven't played Warhammer in about 10 years.

I dunno, but I bet they'll sink your fucking barge. :D

Naxuul

05-10-2008 04:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8850397)

What a Warhammer centaurs like? I haven't played Warhammer in about 10 years.

<http://uk.games-workshop.com/beastso...re-gallery/14/>

Not mentioned there is that they're all complete drunkards.

And cannibals too, but that goes without saying for a Beast of Chaos.

-Naxuul

kelvingreen

05-10-2008 05:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8853146)

As an aside, I was always slightly confused by AD&D's size rankings. "Huge" sounds bigger than "Giant" to me, intuitively, although it's one rank below on the official scale. Am I alone in thinking this?

Nope. Doesn't make much sense to me either!

DMH

05-10-2008 08:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8853146)

"Huge" sounds bigger than "Giant" to me, intuitively, although it's one rank below on the official scale. Am I alone in thinking this?

No, but I don't agree with you. Huge and giant are names, what are the listed sizes in the stat blocks? I am guessing small and tiny (which was the smallest in 2nd ed.).

Malignant Marionette

05-10-2008 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8854113)

<http://uk.games-workshop.com/beastso...re-gallery/14/>

Those are the centigors, not centaurs. Although to be fair, centaurs haven't been around in Warhammer since 3rd edition. Back then they were the proper human torso on horse body critters. Can't remember their personality traits and my 3rd edition books aren't here unfortunately, so I can't check. :(I do remember at least some of them were chaos critters, if not all of them.

Smartmonkey

05-11-2008 03:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 8854712)

Those are the centigors, not centaurs. Although to be fair, centaurs haven't been around in Warhammer since 3rd edition. Back then they were the proper human torso on horse body critters. Can't remember their personality traits and my 3rd edition books aren't here unfortunately, so I can't check. :(I do remember at least some of them were chaos critters, if not all of them.

I think we can rest assured that WFRP centaurs, whether Centigors count or not, are probably horrendously ugly and subsist on the flesh of the innocent. Which is pretty much Warhammers schtick.

I remember going WTF when I was a kid reading the centaur entry - it was the first entry that struck me as being pointless to have, because who was going to go a-killing those nice nature loving centaurs? It felt like something that belonged in a Disney movie.

Hell, the Centaurs from Harry Potter are -way- more intimidating.

Malignant Marionette

05-11-2008 06:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Not that pointless non-fighty monsters are really pointless, since it can evoke the idea of a magical, fantastic forest more for your group to encounter faeries, centaurs, leprechauns or whatever than if they encountered a bunch of regular woodsmen. You know, more like a flavour-thing than a combat encounter. I guess it's a bit like whether you enjoy Aurora's Whole Realms Catalogue of utterly pointless crap or not. ;) (For the record, I've got nothing against Aurora's, it's kind of neat.)

kelvingreen

05-11-2008 06:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 8855917)
I guess it's a bit like whether you enjoy Aurora's Whole Realms Catalogue of utterly pointless crap or not. ;) (For the record, I've got nothing against Aurora's, it's kind of neat.)

That's it! That's the book with the Catoblepas Death Cheese. Thanks for the reminder! ;)

Malignant Marionette

05-11-2008 08:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8855924)
That's it! That's the book with the Catoblepas Death Cheese. Thanks for the reminder! ;)

Yup! And who gets the shitty job of milking them so the cheese can be produced? That's right, adventurers of course. :D Nothing like D&D ecology to brighten up a day.

Numanoid

05-11-2008 05:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I'm not suprised that centaurs are written as hippies. I mean, when you trying to make a killing machine out of a human animal hybrid, "horse" isn't the first animal that comes to mind.

"Hey, you know what would be badass! Crossing a man with an animal that doesn't eat meat and has fragile legs!"

Yeah, I know the Greek centaurs were a bunch of psycho frat-boys, but c'mon.

Gaffa

05-11-2008 05:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Numanoid (Post 8857468)

I'm not suprised that centaurs are written as hippies. I mean, when you trying to make a killing machine out of a human animal hybrid, "horse" isn't the first animal that comes to mind.

"Hey, you know what would be badass! Crossing a man with an animal that doesn't eat meat and has fragile legs!"

Yeah, I know the Greek centaurs were a bunch of psycho frat-boys, but c'mon.

If you would wish to aggravate my friend's horses to the point that they'd aggravate on you, I'll be happy to email pics of the ten square acres of your remains to your relatives of choice.

Numanoid

05-11-2008 06:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Gaffa (Post 8857503)

If you would wish to aggravate my friend's horses to the point that they'd aggravate on you, I'll be happy to email pics of the ten square acres of your remains to your relatives of choice.

I'm not saying horses can't be dangerous - I certainly wouldn't want to find out what its like to get kicked by one.

It's just that no one looks at a horse's appearance and behavior and thinks "apex predator". No one's ever been lost in the woods scared to death that they'll be trampled to death by pack of wild horses. Ya feel me, dawg?

Numanoid

05-11-2008 06:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8855320)

I think we can rest assured that WFRP centaurs, whether Centigors count or not, are probably horrendously ugly ana subsist on the flesh of the innocent. Which is pretty much Warhammers schtick.

Warhammer's schtick being "D&D monsters, as designed by the members of Dethklok."

noisms

05-11-2008 06:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Numanoid (Post 8857527)

I'm not saying horses can't be dangerous - I certainly wouldn't want to find out what its like to get kicked by one.

It's just that no one looks at a horse's appearance and behavior and thinks "apex predator". No one's ever been lost in the woods scared to death that they'll be trampled to death by pack of wild horses. Ya feel me, dawg?

Which is why Felinaurs make so much more sense. (Do they exist in D&D? I forget.)

Still, Scythians are definitely the way to go. (Why would Centaurs live in the forest anyway? Surely horses are more at home on the high plains.)

noisms

05-11-2008 07:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Chimera

Hilarious first line for this one: "How chimerae were created is a dark mystery better left unexplored." Translation: We couldn't think of an even vaguely plausible origin story. I can imagine two guys sitting around in TSR's head office at 4:55pm on a Friday in front of a computer; they've spent an hour and a half trying to think of something, anything, and finally one says to the other, "Fuck it, just put something about dark mysteries and let's get off down the boozier." I bet it went exactly like that. (Sort of like the Monster Designers equivalent of the Dm Hand Wave.)

The Chimera is a proper mythological beast, so it gets a thumbs-up from me. That said, it's a bugger to keep track of - the goat, dragon and lion heads all have different attacks, powers and and armour classes, which makes it really three monsters rather than one. You have to keep constantly in mind who is attacking which head and what each head is doing, which is a bit of a pain.

Thankfully the ecology section provides a perfect, and blatant, excuse for having a Chimera-battle somewhere in an adventure: Chimera "can't resist" attacking adventurers - which is a great way of bypassing any wails of protest from the players about random, uncalled-for and unprovoked attacks. The DM can just open his MM, point at the ecology section, and say "Chimerae can't resist attacking adventurers. So there."

Also detailed is the Gorgimera, which is just a Chimera with a Gorgon's head rather than a goat's. I can see what the impulse behind that was. Why Chimerae have a goat's head has always puzzled me.

"My God, look at that monster! It has the head of a lion!"

"Aargh!"

"No...wait...even worse....it has the head of a dragon too!"

"AAAAAAArgh!"

"Hang on....it...erm...has the head of a goat too!"

"Er..."

Gorgon has a bit more oomph to it.

Gaffa

05-11-2008 07:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8857541)
Which is why Felinaurs make so much more sense. (Do they exist in D&D? I forget.)

Yes. There's a number of versions; the wemic is probably the most commonly known.

Malignant Marionette

05-12-2008 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

And the lamia too. Both conveniently in the book you're reading. ;)

Sleeper

05-12-2008 05:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8857607)
Why Chimerae have a goat's head has always puzzled me.

Goats eat cans, and fighters are just yummy bits of flesh packaged in tin cans. It's how the other heads get to the good bits.

I'm sure it has mythological precedent, too. Weren't the ancient Greeks of the Heroic Age the ones who developed that elaborate, gothic armor we see in museums? :)

YojimboC

05-12-2008 07:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Numanoid (Post 8857527)

It's just that no one looks at a horse's appearance and behavior and thinks "apex predator". No one's ever been lost in the woods scared to death that they'll be trampled to death by pack of wild horses. Ya feel me, dawg?

And yet "man + horse" conquered and ruled the largest contiguous land empire in history.

It always bugged me that when the Forgotten Realms did their Mongol Horde story, the "Mongols" weren't centaurs. That would have been so much cooler.

Wakboth

05-12-2008 04:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 8859301)

And yet "man + horse" conquered and ruled the largest contiguous land empire in history.

It always bugged me that when the Forgotten Realms did their Mongol Horde story, the "Mongols" weren't centaurs. That would have been so much cooler.

That'd be the nadir of FR during the 2e days, when the people at TSR were trying their damndest to turn the setting into a semi-Earth by grafting "exotic" cultures to it left, right and center. (See also: Russian Rashemen, Maztica, Zakhara and so on.) It was lazy and didn't fit the tone of the setting at all, IMO.

noisms

05-12-2008 09:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cloaker

Okay, I take it back about the Catoblepas. Its picture was a veritable El Greco compared to the Cloaker's. If you have the book handy, pick it up and take a look, then try to imagine that creature jumping out at you down in the dungeons somewhere: "Rarr." If you don't have the book, you're really missing out on some so-bad-it's-funny goodness.

Another classical favourite along the lines of the Carrion Crawler, the Cloaker is a real old-school monster; something that seems to have no independent existence outside of trying to kill dungeoneers. It does this by jumping at them, enveloping them, and then rather quickly devouring them, while their comrades try in vain to stop it. Quite cool then; I like scenes in which the players are desperately trying to save one of their comrades from certain death within a constrained time limit.

The Cloaker's other talent is having a good moan. (It's a bit emo that way. Probably stays in its bedroom a lot too, writing poetry.) It has four varieties of whinge, which variously hold, nauseate and otherwise debilitate enemies; it uses them to keep away attackers while it finishes its meals.

Pointless Cloaker Ecology Fact: They might be asexual, but nobody knows for sure.

Kaiten

05-12-2008 09:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Fun Fact: I have only used Cloakers three times, resulting in a horrible PC death each time!

sim_james

05-12-2008 11:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8861310)

Pointless Cloaker Ecology Fact: They might be asexual, but nobody knows for sure.

Because the only people capable of that kind of research Just Don't Give A Rat's Arse.

g026r

05-12-2008 11:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

"Hans, I know you're being horribly digested, and rest assured that we're doing everything in our power to get you out while there's still something to get out, but... uh... while you're in there could you maybe take a moment and check to see if the thing has any identifiable reproductive organs? That's a good lad."

:p

DMH

05-12-2008 11:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ah, tenebra complexor (aka cloaker). They should have stuck with the original name from A2.

There has been mention of cloaker cities (in the Dungeoner Survival Guide and subsequent supplements) and I really wish there had been an ecology article in Dragon to explain what the hell they are.

demiurge1138

05-13-2008 02:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I quite like cloakers, and have used them as Plot Specific Antagonists a couple of times. In an all-kobold game I ran, they fought cloakers in an abandoned salt mine, who were summoning armies of little demons to harry the kobold borders. That fight was great fun because the party was attacked as they were climbing up and down various shafts in the dungeon (why would cloakers make their lair convenient for the adventuring kind?), so lots of Climb checks were involved. Once the battle was over, there was a brief idea to tie one of the party members to a dead cloaker and have everyone else fly him around like a kite... I ruled that that wouldn't work so well.

JasonK

05-13-2008 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cloakers! Whee! Noisms, you left out the defining characteristic, which is that they look like cloaks. That provided them with the one use they ever saw in a game I ran: The BBEG used a charmed cloaker as a... cape! He "threw" it at the party when they had him cornered, thus buying him time to escape. :)

~ jason

6inTruder

05-13-2008 06:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Numanoid (Post 8857527)

It's just that no one looks at a horse's appearance and behavior and thinks "apex predator". No one's ever been lost in the woods scared to death that they'll be trampled to death by pack of wild horses. Ya feel me, dawg?

I'm sure the Sci-fi channel will. Eventually.

noisms

05-13-2008 03:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8862674)

Cloakers! Whee! Noisms, you left out the defining characteristic, which is that they look like cloaks. That provided them with the one use they ever saw in a game I ran: The BBEG used a charmed cloaker as a... cape! He "threw" it at the party when they had him cornered, thus buying him time to escape. :)

~ jason

I like that idea. A lot.

JasonK

05-13-2008 03:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8865474)
I like that idea. A lot.

Feel free to steal it. :)

~ jason

noisms

05-13-2008 10:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Cockatrice

Chalk another instakill monster up on the list. I think I'll start keeping a tally.

The Cockatrice is a very ill-tempered and too-big-for-its boots chicken crossed with a bat and a lizard, which pecks you and turns you to stone. To be honest, I'm not sure whether it is actually a Greek mythological monster or not (the word 'Cockatrix' keeps popping into my mind for some reason, typing this), although if it is I doubt very much it ever made it into a Ray Harryhausen film. Would have been great if it had, mind you.

According to the Ecology section, Cockatrices are a bit like reverse Mormons - the females take on a group of males as a harem, who they mate with and have ickle baby Cockatrices with and it's like a little Cockatrice happy family. Except as soon as the chicks are six months old they get unceremoniously kicked out of the nest - and here is our first adventure hook; these young homeless Cockatrices band together in the wilderness and travel from place to place, turning everything in their path into stone. I think that's a great idea for a side-branch of an adventure: the PCs coming across an entire village of statues, with the only evidence being a few chicken feathers floating on the wind... The second adventure hook is the idea that wizards like Cockatrice feathers and use them as quills for writing spells and scrolls. Not as interesting, but still a nice little springboard for a short quest.

Also included in the Cockatrice entry is the Pyrolisk, which as the name suggests is a Cockatrice that sets people on fire rather than turning them to stone; another instakill beast, it can do this just by looking at you. I had a character killed by a Pyrolisk once: a 12th level bard who I'd been playing for what felt like forever, and I remember it as being a kind of relief - I'd never quite gotten into the role and now that the poor fellow was dead I could have fun being somebody else instead. And it was a fun way to go - bursting into flame and flinging himself screaming over the edge of a cliff.

Sleeper

05-13-2008 11:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8866421)

To be honest, I'm not sure whether it is actually a Greek mythological monster or not (the word 'Cockatrix' keeps popping into my mind for some reason, typing this), although if it is I doubt very much it ever made it into a Ray Harryhausen film. Would have been great if it had, mind you.

Etymology: Middle English cocatrice, from Middle French cocatrix ichneumon, cockatrice, from Medieval Latin cocatric-, cocatrix ichneumon.

It's like strix/stirge. Did not know that.

Phersu

05-14-2008 12:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8861754)

Ah, tenebra complexor (aka cloaker). They should have stuck with the original name from A2.

I wonder if the Cloaker was not inspired by an Empire of Petal Throne monster called the Mantle (or the "Biridlù", see EPT p. 64).

Quote:

Originally Posted by EPT

These ancient treasure guardians are cape-like, black flying creatures which cling to ceilings and drop down upon the unwary.

They then suffocate their victim, gibbering and shrieking in their powerfully muscled folds.

John_C

05-14-2008 12:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Phersu (Post 8866889)

*I wonder if the Cloaker was not inspired by an Empire of Petal Throne monster called the Mantle (or the "Biridlù", see EPT p. 64).*

The Cloaker can be blamed upon Fritz Leiber, I think. Can't remember the name of the story, but it was a good one.

Kinda goes without saying, I suppose.

Rook

05-14-2008 12:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8861310)

Another classical favourite along the lines of the Carrion Crawler, the Cloaker is a real old-school monster; something that seems to have no independent existence outside of trying to kill dungeoneers.

For some unknown reason, the writers for the Forgotten Realms developed cloakers far more than you might expect. Which for me, admittedly, is any development at all. In several Underdark Realms campaign supplements and adventures, they've gone at some length as to cloaker societies, how weird and alien their minds are and what parts of the Underdark are cloaker dominated. There are apparently places in the Realms where cloakers meet to float around in columns for unknown reasons. Funny that I can recall quite a bit about weird cloaker ecology from these, but I can't remember them ever addressing why they look just like cloaks (right down to faux-clasps for fastening).

noisms

05-14-2008 12:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rook (Post 8867035)

For some unknown reason, the writers for the Forgotten Realms developed cloakers far more than you might expect. Which for me, admittedly, is any development at all. In several Underdark Realms campaign supplements and adventures, they've gone at some length as to cloaker societies, how weird and alien their minds are and what parts of the Underdark are cloaker dominated. There are apparently places in the Realms where cloakers meet to float around in columns for unknown reasons. Funny that I can recall quite a bit about weird cloaker ecology from these, but I can't remember them ever addressing why they look just like cloaks (right down to faux-clasps for fastening).

Some monsters really are just left well alone as "things that live in dungeons and want to kill you", aren't they?

You reminded me why I never really got into Forgotten Realms. There's so much of it I like, but the years and years of people putting on more and more layers of development led to some really absurd levels of detail - so absurd that they became ridiculous. (Like Cloaker societies.)

Steve H

05-14-2008 04:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8861310)

Cloaker

Okay, I take it back about the Catoblepas. Its picture was a veritable El Greco compared to the Cloaker's. If you have the book handy, pick it up and take a look, then try to imagine that creature jumping out at you down in the dungeons somewhere: "Rarr." If you don't have the book, you're really missing out on some so-bad-it's-funny goodness.

Flicking ahead a few pages, we're in for something of a run of bad art through the next few monsters. I vaguely recall thinking at the time when I got the Monstrous Manual to replace my Compendiums (Compendia?) that the quality of art was in general worse this time around, even if it was in colour.

kelvingreen

05-14-2008 06:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rook (Post 8867035)

Funny that I can recall quite a bit about weird cloaker ecology from these, but I can't remember them ever addressing why they look just like cloaks (right down to faux-clasps for fastening).

Intelligent design, obviously. ;)

demiurge1138

05-14-2008 07:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8868553)

Intelligent design, obviously. ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lore Sjoberg

The odd evolution of D&D monsters leads me to conclude that one of the following must be true: dungeons have existed for at least fifty million years or there's some sort of hyperspeed Lamarckian evolution going on or evil wizards routinely make new monsters to relax and impress waitresses or hey, are those nachos? Can I have some?

From The Book of Ratings

shirosan

05-14-2008 08:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8828260)

I've never used a big cat as a monster in a game. It just doesn't seem to make sense; why on earth would a tiger want to take on four to six humanoids armed with swords and axes when it could just eat a deer instead?

I'm still making my way through this awesome thread, but I just have to share my one use of a big cat: a PC (an Illusionist) was making his way through a jungle and I managed to keep rolling rolling encounters with a tiger. Time and again the hapless illusionist managed to leg it after taking a few claw swipes, but that damn random tiger kept showing up. Clearly our man was being stalked. He eventually stumbled out of the jungle, down in the single-digit hit points.

Sometimes the "real world" encounters can be the most memorable. :D

shirosan

05-14-2008 08:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8838489)

There's a supplement for, I think, 2e Forgotten Realms, which is an illustrated catalogue of strange items that can be bought from this travelling bazaar thing. One of the items is cheese made from the milk of the Catoblepas; for obvious reasons, procuring the milk is a dangerous job, so the cheese is something of a delicacy.

It's called "Death Cheese", and with a brilliant name like that, it endeared itself to our gaming group immediately.

Aurora's Whole Realms Catalogue, one of my all-time favorite 2e supplements. The section of thief toys alone (including ear blades to cut hangman's nooses before the gallows trapdoor is thrown and "bam smacks"--small tubes of bamboo filled with black powder...oh god, how my players made use of those!) makes it worth tracking down.

IIRC, Death Cheese was made exclusively by an order of blind monks, who were immune to the Catoblepas's gaze. So I guess that's one way around the insta-kill ability--scratch your eyes out!

sim_james

05-14-2008 08:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I could kinda dig a D&D setting where dungeons had indeed existed for over fifty million years. :)

noisms

05-14-2008 09:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by shirosan (Post 8869322)

IIRC, Death Cheese was made exclusively by an order of blind monks, who were immune to the Catoblepas's gaze. So I guess that's one way around the insta-kill ability--scratch your eyes out!

Now that's one hell of a specialized way to make a living.

Mortality

05-14-2008 09:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8871538)
Now that's one hell of a specialized way to make a living.

You kind of have to wonder how it started. Was it just a monastery of blind monks (because that way they can cut down on extras, they don't need braille and normal books for example)?

The one day, Brother Jacob was out and came across this really weird cow. The milk was kinda weird, so they decided to make cheese instead, and some years later had a cheese the likes of which the world had never seen. The first merchant proved very enthusiastic, but when they took him to see where the milk came from he inexplicably had a heart attack. After a few more merchants died under mysterious circumstances, they decided to hit the braille library.

"Well, it's either a Catoblepas, or a cow so holy that only the most devout can stand it's presence."

"Does either stop us selling the cheese?"

"...I don't think so."

"Sorted."

Malignant Marionette

05-14-2008 10:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by shirosan (Post 8869322)
IIRC, Death Cheese was made exclusively by an order of blind monks, who were immune to the Catoblepas's gaze. So I guess that's one way around the insta-kill ability--scratch your eyes out!

Got the book right here, says the monks make it, jobless adventurers do the herding and milk-collecting. Not that it would be hard to remake if one wanted to, of course, it being mostly a mention. Of course, then you can't humiliate characters who are in dire need of cash by offering them a job like that. :p

Lugh

05-14-2008 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rook (Post 8867035)

Funny that I can recall quite a bit about weird cloaker ecology from these, but I can't remember them ever addressing why they look just like cloaks (right down to faux-clasps for fastening).

Of course, my evolution of cloakers is a bit different.

First, you start with the premise of living dungeons. Dungeons have many life stages. The earliest life stage is as an ooze of some sort. The ooze will eventually take on a more sophisticated and stable shape, generally as a piece of faux treasure or a part of the dungeon. Hence, cloakers, creeping coins, trappers, piercers, etc. All of those weird monsters that seem to have evolved specifically to hunt adventurers. They then develop into mimics, then doppelgangers, finally ending up as dragons (note the shapeshifting theme throughout).

noisms

05-15-2008 02:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

As Steve H rightly pointed out, the middle part of the 'C' section is a real celebration of genuinely bad art. Today's monster is no exception, which is all the more laughable because its descriptive text would have it that it is "one of the most beautiful creatures in existence". Really its picture would only work if you substituted the word "beautiful" in that sentence for... moronic, I think would be most suitable. Anyway, it is the Couatl.

The Couatl is the first (and possibly only) Aztec-inspired D&D monster; a feathered serpent that hangs around in the jungle being Lawful Good. (The Tabaxi might be loosely based on the Zapotec jaguar-man, but then it could just be a D&D mish-mash pastiche.) It is actually a kind of jungle policeman, roaming around fighting evil and telling people off; the text even uses the phrase "catching evil-doers red handed" - you don't get much more village-bobby than that.

To help it with this task, the Couatl has a couple of powerful abilities of the most annoying kind - polymorphing, becoming ethereal at will, turning invisible, plane shifting; exactly the kind of "Neh neh! Can't catch me!" type trickery that players love to hate. They also (natch) have an instakill poison bite, though.

I find it quite hard to get excited by the Couatl. Like Centaurs, they're a bit too goody two-shoes for my taste. If I was going to use one in a campaign it would be more like a vengeful spirit of the jungle, capricious, unpredictable and morally ambiguous - possibly worshipped by tribes of ape-people constantly on the look out for humans and demihumans to sacrifice to it. It could be a sort of Kurtz-like, Heart of Darkness, fat Marlon Brando Couatl, muttering The Horror! The Horror! and forgetting its lines.

Deadmanwalking

05-15-2008 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8872768)

I find it quite hard to get excited by the Couatl. Like Centaurs, they're a bit too goody two-shoes for my taste. If I was going to use one in a campaign it would be more like a vengeful spirit of the jungle, capricious, unpredictable and morally ambiguous - possibly worshipped by tribes of ape-people constantly on the look out for humans and demihumans to sacrifice to it. It could be a sort of Kurtz-like, Heart of Darkness, fat Marlon Brando Couatl, muttering The Horror! The Horror! and forgetting its lines.

Oh come now, there need to be some Good Aligned creatures. Both for realism (unless you're in Ravenloft, everything being evil stretches the bounds of disbelief quite a lot), and so Evil characters can have something to fight and kill they can't just ally with at the drop of a hat. If there are Paladins, why not Couatl?

And, while I can see complaining about Centaurs being Good (since that really messes with the mythology) Quetzacouatl was pretty nice, as gods go.

Rachel Cartacos

05-15-2008 02:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8872921)
Oh come now, there need to be some Good Aligned creatures.

Agreed!

Quote:

Both for realism (unless you're in Ravenloft, everything being evil stretches the bounds of disbelief quite a lot), and so Evil characters can have something to fight and kill they can't just ally with at the drop of a hat. If there are Paladins, why not Couatl?

And also, for allies for good characters!

My higher level characters loved summoning Angels for help with stuff. (Important stuff anyway, she never summoned angels for help doing the dishes or anything. :D)

Deadmanwalking

05-15-2008 02:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rachel Cartacos (Post 8872956)
And also, for allies for good characters!

My higher level characters loved summoning Angels for help with stuff. (Important stuff anyway, she never summoned angels for help doing the dishes or anything. :D)

Oh, absolutely! I've rarely pulled that particular trick myself, but allies are always fun and useful. :)

Rachel Cartacos

05-15-2008 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8873030)

Oh, absolutely! I've rarely pulled that particular trick myself, but allies are always fun and useful. :)

I absolutely adore summoning, after healing it's my favorite thing to do. :)

Naxuul

05-15-2008 08:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rachel Cartacos (Post 8873074)

I absolutely adore summoning, after healing it's my favorite thing to do. :)

I figured that summoning is the reason that 90% of good creatures in the monstrous compendiums are planar to some extent like Couatls, Devas, Eladrin etc. It doesn't entirely make sense for a cleric of a good diety to be summoning demons.;

-Naxuul

demiurge1138

05-15-2008 09:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8872768)

Couatl.

The Couatl is the first (and possibly only) Aztec-inspired D&D monster...

Not so, but they get more obscure after that. The 3e Fiend Folio had the ahuizotl, an otter-like creature with a hand on its tail. It kills people in rivers and eats their eyeballs, teeth and fingernails. Good times!

6inTruder

05-15-2008 09:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8874705)

I figured that summoning is the reason that 90% of good creatures in the monstrous compendiums are planar to some extent like Couatls, Devas, Eladrin etc. It doesn't entirely make sense for a cleric of a good diety to be summoning demons.;

What about the Flumph?

UglyJimStudly

05-15-2008 10:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8874997)

Not so, but they get more obscure after that. The 3e Fiend Folio had the ahuzotl, an otter-like creature with a hand on its tail. It kills people in rivers and eats their eyeballs, teeth and fingernails. Good times!

I don't have the books handy to check, but I'm going to guess that werejaguars have to make a relatively early appearance. Anybody know if there were there any Mesoamerican critters in Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan? Seems a likely module to introduce some new nasties.

noisms

05-15-2008 10:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8872921)

Oh come now, there need to be some Good Aligned creatures. Both for realism (unless you're in Ravenloft, everything being evil stretches the bounds of disbelief quite a lot), and so Evil characters can have something to fight and kill they can't just ally with at the drop of a hat. If there are Paladins, why not Couatl?

Yeah, I know. I'm not against all good creatures in games! ;) But I've never believed good = goody-two-shoes. For example, I've always liked Birthright elves, who might be 'good' but are so xenophobic they'll shoot you full of arrows as soon as look at you. Or the Guardinals in the plane of Elysium from Planescape, who rip apart anything they see as evil.

Sometimes monsters in the MM just come across as hopelessly idealistic (Centuars) or patsies for the DM (Couatl). The Couatl in particular seems designed to be a kind of monstrous Mary Sue - a polymorphing, ethereal, plane shifting instakill school-mistress to come along and beat you up if you do something bad. They don't have to be played like that, I know; it's just the rules and descriptive text seem oddly geared towards it.

Anyway, it's just the style of game I enjoy - a Kurtz-Coatl would be great, I think.

noisms

05-15-2008 10:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudly (Post 8875124)

I don't have the books handy to check, but I'm going to guess that werejaguars have to make a relatively early appearance. Anybody know if there were there any Mesoamerican critters in Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan? Seems a likely module to introduce some new nasties.

I suppose Tabaxi are a kind of were-jaguar. I've never read that module though.

Wakboth

05-15-2008 03:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I think the ixicachitl (sp?) are also drawn from the Mesoamerican myths, at least going by the sound of the name...

Victim

05-15-2008 03:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8875133)

Yeah, I know. I'm not against all good creatures in games! ;) But I've never believed good = goody-two-shoes. For example, I've always liked Birthright elves, who might be 'good' but are so xenophobic they'll shoot you full of arrow as soon as look at you.

That's a pretty evil seeming good you've got there. Of course, DnD has always had stuff like that. "Hi, I'm a chaotic good fey. I charm and enslave people. But I'm really hot, so they must not mind."

noisms

05-15-2008 03:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Victim (Post 8875923)

That's a pretty evil seeming good you've got there. Of course, DnD has always had stuff like that. "Hi, I'm a chaotic good fey. I charm and enslave people. But I'm really hot, so they must not mind."

Heh. And they probably don't much mind, either.

I think there's a difference between being suspicious and xenophobic and being evil, though. Anyway, this isn't the place for alignment discussions! I can sense the derailment ending in flames just from here, so let's not go down that path... ;)

noisms

05-15-2008 04:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Crabman

A bit of an unusual one, this, in that it occupies quite a few niches without ever really properly filling them:

- It could be seen as being an Orc-alternative, in that it's a barbaric and alien species that sometimes goes out marauding, but the problem with this is that its alignment is Neutral and generally speaking it lives a peaceful existence (only becoming Orc-like when population pressure forces it to do so).
- It could be seen as a Mongrelman alternative, in that it's ugly and monstrous but really only wants to be left alone, the problem being that it has the tendency to become Orc-like noted above.
- It could be a Dwarf alternative in that it likes to keep itself to itself, but it takes xenophobia to the max and doesn't even learn languages other than its own, so it can't really be a regular player-character ally like a clan of Dwarfs can be.

This isn't necessarily a problem, because it means Crabmen can have quite a nuanced role in a campaign, being neutrals, allies or enemies depending on what you want them to be as a DM. It also means you can get some good mileage out of PC dilemmas regarding fighting them if you're that way inclined: their Neutral alignment, low intelligence and capricious nature makes slaying them different to killing Orcs or Hobgoblins.

Anyway, a Crabman is, self obviously, a big walking humanoid crab. The picture looks more like a shrimp to me than a crab, in all honesty, but it's a great idea. Once again returning to a familiar theme, it reminds me of a Ray Harryhausen or Ray Harryhausen-inspired film in which the main characters were attacked by giant crabs and killed them by tipping them into boiling hot springs - I'm so using that in a game one day.

Adventure hooks also abound in the entry. First, super-rich and eccentric art collectors often want Crabman artifacts, which they will pay a huge price for: I'm picturing an adventure where the PCs are hired to bring back some art or other and have to decide whether to do so by force, stealth, trade or trickery. Second, Sahuagin love Crabmen and consider them a delicacy (and who wouldn't?), which gives me an idea for a little twist in the tale of a longer campaign, in which the PCs have to get on the good side of a tribe of Crabmen (for whatever reason) by protecting them from the excesses of a gang of Sahuagin raiders who've just moved into the area. But the only snag is, in order to do so they have to steal some sort of water-breathing magical artifact from the lair of a Topaz Dragon which lives in a cave a little way up the coast...

Oddly, Crabman shells can't be made into armour - this is surprising given the alacrity with which the designers appeared to have been using Ankheg, Bulette and Beetle corpses in their games. However, it is compensated for by the fact that their claws can be used as weapons; surely the coolest exotic weapon proficiency ever. Imagine a bounty hunter or gladiator whose signature move is to finish off his opponents with a snip of Crabman claw. His name could be Spartaclawus. Or Boba Claw.

Gaffa

05-15-2008 05:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudly (Post 8875124)

I don't have the books handy to check, but I'm going to guess that werejaguars have to make a relatively early appearance. Anybody know if there were there any Mesoamerican critters in Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan? Seems a likely module to introduce some new nasties.

There were a number of thematically appropriate Mesoamerican unique critters in Shrine, including -- of course -- a couatl. But mainly there was a lot of undead, and some wonderful set-dressing surrounding some very nice traps.

DMH

05-15-2008 07:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8876009)

Crabman

A bit of an unusual one, this, in that it occupies quite a few niches without ever really properly filling them:

So they are more human than the humanoids?

noisms

05-15-2008 08:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8876484)

So they are more human than the humanoids?

Ha! Exactly. Maybe that's why they never took off - they are too much like humans.

That's it. My next campaign is going to have Crabmen as the dominant species. I've just decided.

Oskar Breytenbach

05-15-2008 09:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I think the crabmen are quite interesting as described, but the artwork really puts me off them. I absolutely hate it.

DMH

05-16-2008 05:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8876508)

That's it. My next campaign is going to have Crabmen as the dominant species. I've just decided.

Looking at the art in all 3 editions, I have to say the 2nd edition is the best by far (though the mouth is still wrong from the description). The first is a joke and the third (FF as Yurian) doesn't look like a crab at all.

I spent too much time today trying to figure out how to do the dominate species thing so I here are some suggestions:

Their civilization is much older than even dragons. I was thinking of 250-325 million years. Distant Horizon's The Practical Enchanter has a short, nifty article on how low level magic can replicate higher level with enough time and money. With millions of years, the smartest of the crabmen should have had a major impact upon the world.

There are 4 major races:

Marine/coastal are the ones in the MM.

Terrestrial/coastal are like land crabs and spend their adult life on land. They only require saltwater to breed.

Freshwater/coastal create ponds or use lakes to reproduce.

Burrowers live anywhere they can dig to the water table ala some species of crayfish.

All of them are hiver like in that they produce a lot of larvae. So much so that the adults don't mind other races eating the larvae with moderation. Crabman towns are filled with larvae and their predators.

Since they can't build things with their claws, fine work either is done with their mandibles or not done at all.

Mammals were never seen as much of a threat, so humans did evolve. They just don't have the overwhelming reproductive potential as crabmen and thus are still not much of a threat. Dragons are marginal because they were wiped out as threats when they started breathing fire on crabmen. Now they are either in the arctic or in the largest deserts.

UglyJimStudly

05-16-2008 07:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8878982)

Looking at the art in all 3 editions, I have to say the 2nd edition is the best by far (though the mouth is still wrong from the description). The first is a joke and the third (FF as Yurian) doesn't look like a crab at all.

The Crabman was also statted up in Necromancer's Tome of Horrors. Art's not bad, but the humanoid arms look out of place.

Sleeper

05-16-2008 09:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudy (Post 8875124)

I don't have the books handy to check, but I'm going to guess that werejaguars have to make a relatively early appearance.

IIRC, transparently Aztec adventure "Mechica" (not Maztica) in Dragon #70 had a werejaguar, though that wasn't until 1983.

6inTruder

05-16-2008 10:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8878982)

Looking at the art in all 3 editions, I have to say the 2nd edition is the best by far (though the mouth is still wrong from the description). The first is a joke and the third (FF as Yurian) doesn't look like a crab at all.

No way! I love the 1ed picture!

... I just can't find a copy of it... :(

But I was also thinking of a REALLY odd party of PCs: Take a Crabman, add a Tako but then I don't know what to do for Patrick and Spongebob?!

noisms

05-16-2008 09:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8878982)

Looking at the art in all 3 editions, I have to say the 2nd edition is the best by far (though the mouth is still wrong from the description). The first is a joke and the third (FF as Yurian) doesn't look like a crab at all.

I spent too much time today trying to figure out how to do the dominate species thing so I here are some suggestions:

Their civilization is much older than even dragons. I was thinking of 250-325 million years. Distant Horizon's The Practical Enchanter has a short, nifty article on how low level magic can replicate higher level with enough time and money. With millions of years, the smartest of the crabmen should have had a major impact upon the world.

There are 4 major races:

Marine/coastal are the ones in the MM.

Terrestrial/coastal are like land crabs and spend their adult life on land. They only require saltwater to breed.

Freshwater/coastal create ponds or use lakes to reproduce.

Burrowers live anywhere they can dig to the water table ala some species of crayfish.

All of them are hiver like in that they produce a lot of larvae. So much so that the adults don't mind other races eating the larvae with moderation. Crabman towns are filled with larvae and their predators.

Since they can't build things with their claws, fine work either is done with their mandibles or not done at all.

Mammals were never seen as much of a threat, so humans did evolve. They just don't have the overwhelming reproductive potential as crabmen and thus are still not much of a threat. Dragons are marginal because they were wiped out as threats when they started breathing fire on crabmen. Now they are either in the arctic or in the largest deserts.

There are so many good ideas in this thread, with so little chance of being implemented. You now are obliged to go and put this into practice in a real campaign! ;)

noisms

05-16-2008 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Crawling Claw

Nothing says Hammer Horror better than this monster. (Or possibly The Addams Family if that's more your thing.) But I have to confess it always reminds me of the roguelike Angband variant called Zangband, which I spent far too many of my formative years playing. In it there was a kind of monster called The Disembodied Hand That Strangled People, which killed off more of my early-level characters than I care to remember. The sight of a green letter 'u' moving about the screen was enough to strike terror into my white '@' mark's soul on many an occasion.

Anyway, the Crawling Claw has to be the best example of the "Does exactly what it says on the tin" school of monster-naming. It's a crawling claw. It's a claw that crawls. Like the Invisible Stalker, the Crabman and the Living Wall, there's no chance a player is going to hear its name and say "What's that monster like, then?" I think more monsters should be like that. The Green Skinned Ugly Brutal Humanoid. The Orange Skinned Ugly Brutal Humanoid. The Red Flying Crocodile-thing Which Breathes Fire. The Annoying Guy With Pointy Ears.

I have to confess I've never used a Crawling Claw in a game - it just seems too hammy. But I'm warming to the idea, mainly because the descriptive text moots the idea of the monster gouging out people's eyes or strangling them (hence The Disembodied Hand That Strangled People), although disappointingly doesn't give rules for this.

Another possibility is to allow players to animate their own Crawling Claws. None of my players have ever tried it or even entertained the idea - possibly because, it must be said, by the time you're powerful enough to create the things they're pathetically weak in comparison - 1d6 hit point damage just doesn't cut it when you're a mighty necromancer. But one should never underestimate the importance of animating undead body parts purely for effect: "Look at what I did. I went around gathering the hands, claws and paws from the corpses of various animals and then animated them. I am one sick bastard." As my players generally are sick bastards, I'm surprised it's never come up.

(un)reason

05-16-2008 11:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8882261)

There are so many good ideas in this thread, with so little chance of being implemented. You now are obliged to go and put this into practice in a real campaign! ;)

Yeah, its amazing what these threads are doing for sparking plot ideas aplenty. So much for constantly needing to buy new shiny stuff to keep the game interesting. The big problem is figuring out how to fit them all into a game. Which reminds me, JDCorley never did finish his attempt to get a plot hook from every page of the FR corebook. Lightweight. :p ;)

kelvingreen

05-17-2008 12:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8882300)

"Look at what I did. I went around gathering the hands, claws and paws from the corpses of various animals and then animated them. I am one sick bastard." As my players generally are sick bastards, I'm surprised it's never come up.

"I thought all these severed hands, paws and claws were pretty weak individually, so I stitched them all together, and then animated them."

It's a Crawling Claw Colony Creature!

Mahoshonen

05-17-2008 01:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Another idea is to rip off Evil Dead 2 and turn a PC's hand into a Crawling Claw. :D

Hellzon

05-17-2008 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Argh, Crawling Claws. Those things are bloody terrifying in Incursion* too (I never warmed to the *bands).

I guess animating some could be handy...

*) Roguelike based on D&D 3.x.

noisms

05-17-2008 01:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

There's a 3.X-based roguelike? And where might this be downloaded? I'm always on the look out for new roguelike games. (Although I have to say I'm more a *band fan than I am a NetHack one.)

Hellzon

05-17-2008 06:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8883086)

*There's a 3.X-based roguelike? And where might this be downloaded? I'm always on the look out for new roguelike games. (Although I have to say I'm more a band fan than I am a NetHack one.)

Incursion homepage and wiki.

It borrows the inventory system from Omega, if you played that. Dunno what you'd compare the rest of the game to, but it's not very NetHackish.

demiurge1138

05-17-2008 11:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

In 3.5, crawling claws are much cooler.

Because they're a swarm.

Little bastards.

noisms

05-17-2008 01:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 8884356)
IncurSION homepage and wiki.

It borrows the inventory system from Omega, if you played that. Dunno what you'd compare the rest of the game to, but it's not very NetHackish.

Thanks! I like the look of it. I'll see how it compares to TOME, which is my main go-to roguelike these days.

noisms

05-17-2008 05:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Crocodile

It's times like this I really wish I hadn't promised myself I'd write an entry on every monster in the MM. Because really, how much is there to say about a Crocodile? You already know what one is (a big water-dwelling reptile that likes to eat people), what it can do (eat people), and how to defeat it (run away or stick it full of arrows).

There is one glimmer of a plot hook in there - the idea that "In recent years there have been dreadful rumors that some of these reptiles have made their homes in the sewers of cities in tropical regions, living on waste and carrion." Leaving aside the enigmatic setting-specific bits that you often get in the MM (In recent years where? In tropical regions where?), this is a reasonable idea for, say, an urban Al Qadim-type adventure. Maybe, for some foul purpose, a clique of sinister mages are secretly bringing Crocodiles from the great swamp and depositing them into the city sewers. Perhaps it is to further do-down the just but weak-willed ruler of the city - if Crocodiles can come and go as they please in the sewers, it could incite the populace to rise up in rebellion against the Sultan, who cannot even protect his citizens from attacks by amphibious reptiles right on his doorstep.

Or, there's this Crocodile living in the great river who once swallowed an alarm clock and... no, wait, that's much too stupid to ever work as an idea for a D&D campaign, book or film.

DMH

05-17-2008 10:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8882261)
There are so many good ideas in this thread, with so little chance of being implemented. You now are obliged to go and put this into practice in a real campaign! ;)

Sure, after my other 75 semi developed campaign ideas are played first. ;)

As for the crawling claw, don't forget the dread, a boney arm varient in the first Annual MC.

Aren't all crawling claws left hands or paws?

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

Yeah, its amazing what these threads are doing for sparking plot ideas aplenty. So much for constantly needing to buy new shiny stuff to keep the game interesting.

New shiney stuff, for me, isn't about keeping it interesting, it is about new ideas I can steal, twist, bend and mutilate for fun.

(un)reason

05-18-2008 12:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8886237)

Crocodile

There is one glimmer of a plot hook in there - the idea that "In recent years there have been dreadful rumors that some of these reptiles have made their homes in the sewers of cities in tropical regions, living on waste and carrion." Leaving aside the enigmatic setting-specific bits that you often get in the MM (In recent years where? In tropical regions where?)

Yeah, it makes sense when the monsters were originally campaign specific, and you know where they come from (crawling claws are originally a forgotten realms monster, and it shows in the way their ecology stuff is handled) But when they just copypastad it into here without removing the setting specific stuff or at least making it clear what setting they're from it gets annoying. And when they graft implied setting stuff onto real world animals, it becomes somewhat incongrous. The croc thing is really more suited to a modern game, as most medieval cities didn't have proper sewage systems for them to grow to that size in. Someone'd been reading their urban legends book and didn't think the ramifications of grafting into D&D through properly.

Sleeper

05-18-2008 12:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8886812)

The croc thing is really more suited to a modern game, as most medieval cities didn't have proper sewage systems for them to grow to that size in.

Then explain the otyugh :)

D&D doesn't have more than a superficial resemblance to anything medieval. No streets awash in human filth, very modern interpretations of biology, a scientific approach to magic instead of symbolism and synchronicity, even liberal sensibilities about what is proper and good instead of unthinking casual racism, second-class women, omnipresent and life-defining religion and superstition, and awed reverence and pure peasant love for royalty. D&D is familiar, with a few fantastic elements; for most, a medieval mindset and world would be far more alien than even the Far Realm.

JRM

05-18-2008 04:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudly (Post 8875124)

I don't have the books handy to check, but I'm going to guess that werejaguars have to make a relatively early appearance. Anybody know if there were there any Mesoamerican critters in Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan? Seems a likely module to introduce some new nasties.

If memory serves me right The Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan introduced only one new monster to the world of AD&D and that was...

...The Gibbering Moulder!

Now, I'm no authority on Mesoamerican mythology, but I'm pretty sure that particular beastie doesn't appear in any folklore from that region.

The Last Conformist

05-18-2008 04:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 8854712)

Those are the centigors, not centaurs. Although to be fair, centaurs haven't been around in Warhammer since 3rd edition. Back then they were the proper human torso on horse body critters. Can't remember their personality traits and my 3rd edition books aren't here unfortunately, so I can't check. :(I do remember at least some of them were chaos critters, if not all of them.

I don't have it at hand, but I'm 99% sure they were still in the 4th edition Bestiary, as savage Chaos creatures.

6inTruder

05-18-2008 10:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8886237)

Crocodile

It's times like this I really wish I hadn't promised myself I'd write an entry on every monster in the MM. Because really, how much is there to say about a Crocodile?

I came up with a Spelljammer npc last night based off my thinking about yon Crocodile:

A rouge-ish palladin who travels the spaceways in his spelljamming yacht. His animal companion is a crocodile. Though for obvious reasons I'd not name it Elvis.

noisms

05-18-2008 11:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8888264)

I came up with a Spelljammer npc last night based off my thinking about yon Crocodile:

A rouge-ish palladin who travels the spaceways in his spelljamming yacht. His animal companion is a crocodile. Though for obvious reasons I'd not name it Elvis.

Heh. I now can't get the image of a 1985-era Don Johnson Paladin in ray-bans out of my mind.

noisms

05-18-2008 11:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Crustacean, Giant

Like the Crocodile, this is another tough monster (or, rather, pair of monsters) to write an entry about: Giant Crabs and Crayfish pretty much are...well, jolly big Crabs and Crayfish.

One surprising thing about the entry is that the one idea that you knew the designers would definitely include, the one they absolutely wouldn't be able to resist - using crab and crayfish shells for armour and shields - is alluded to, but there are no stats. Disappointing. Oh well, I suppose it's another one for my never-to-be-written Complete Guide To Monster Armour which I first had the idea for when reading the Behir entry.

There really isn't a whole lot else to comment on. The one thing that I would have loved - rules for Giant Crab claws lopping off limbs with a single snip - are not included. But anyway, here's a grab bag of vaguely ('vaguely' being the operative word) interesting and amusing bits and pieces:

- Crab males "attempt to mate with as many females as they can" - as soon as I read this my first thought was, "Your point being?" I mean, name me an animal species in which the males don't try to mate with as many females as they can. Indirectly or directly it's certainly what I devoted 90% of my time to before I got married.

- Crayfish meat is prized as a delicacy by Nixies, of all things. Somebody can surely come up with a plot hook based around that, if I know the regular readers of this thread.
- Giant Crayfish continue growing as they get older - which gives me an idea for a Crayfish which has lived in the same lake for millenia and is now the size of a blue whale. The people living around could have all sorts of legends about the beast, giving it the name Old Johnny or Big Bertha or something suiting.
- Giant Crayfish "do not normally pose a threat to adventurers" because they spend all their time on river bottoms and so would only encounter PCs swimming deep down in freshwater bodies. It really makes you wonder why anybody felt it necessary to create the thing or write a full entry...

Still, nice picture, though.

We're getting closer to the Dragons at this point. I can't wait.

demiurge1138

05-18-2008 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well, nixies are harder than giant crayfish, aren't they? So what's keeping a few enterprising (shortsighted and hungry) nixies from wiping out entire populations in their efforts for the perfect etoufee?

And with all those giant crayfish disappearing, what will the giant raccoons eat?

The answer, clearly, is halflings.

Putting the party, once again, in the shoes of ecological defender when the food chain gets a few links too short, and the giant raccoons decide to start using their nimble paws to reach through the doors and windows of little huts.

noisms

05-18-2008 03:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I knew it! ;)

DMH

05-18-2008 09:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I would have the nixies hold captives so that their family members (inc PCs) are forced to hunt crawdads in other waters.

This is an actual threat in 2nd ed since raise dead isn't automatically successful and the PCs should desire to keep their family alive.

UglyJimStudly

05-18-2008 10:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8882496)

Yeah, its amazing what these threads are doing for sparking plot ideas aplenty. So much for constantly needing to buy new shiny stuff to keep the game interesting.

Some of the best threads ever on ENWorld are the "plot idea for every monster" threads, where everybody works through a monster book in order, posting an adventure idea for each critter. Unfortunately I lost my links to those threads in one of their major board crashes, I remember the one for the Tome of Horrors was particularly cool.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 8887363)

If memory serves me right The Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan introduced only one new monster to the world of AD&D and that was...

...The Gibbering Moulder!

In an odd little coincidence, when I dropped by a local used book store yesterday I found that somebody must have recently parted with their 1e collection. Among other things, they had nearly new copies of various modules, including Tamoachan. Since I lost a lot of old modules during a move a few years back, I picked it up - turns out there's two new monsters in it. Your memory is correct on the Gibbering Moulder, the other highly mesoamerican new critter introduced is... the Nereid. ;)

darktalon

05-18-2008 11:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rachel Cartacos (Post 8872956)

My higher level characters loved summoning Angels for help with stuff. (Important stuff anyway, she never summoned angels for help doing the dishes or anything. :D)

Did she have a friend who did BMX tricks? ;)

JRM

05-19-2008 12:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by UglyJimStudy (Post 8889623)

In an odd little coincidence, when I dropped by a local used book store yesterday I found that somebody must have recently parted with their 1e collection. Among other things, they had nearly new copies of various modules, including Tamoachan. Since I lost a lot of old modules during a move a few years back, I picked it up - turns out there's two new monsters in it. Your memory is correct on the Gibbering Moulder, the other highly mesoamerican new critter introduced is... the Nereid. ;)

What? My memory deceived me about there being only one new monster in that module? Bad Memory! Bad Memory!! No supper for you tonight.

That may appear harsh, but denying your mental processes virtual meals is the only way to keep them in line.;

Anyhow, I have no recall of the Nereid debuting in Tamoachan. I thought they were mentioned in the MM as a variant of the Nymph. Oh well, you live and learn.

At least Neries are more Mesoamerican than the Gibbering Moulder, since I believe the aboriginals myths have supernatural watery women not too similar to those of other continents.

kelvingreen

05-19-2008 12:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8888513)

Giant Crayfish continue growing as they get older - which gives me an idea for a Crayfish which has lived in the same lake for millenia and is now the size of a blue whale. The people living around could have all sorts of legends about the beast, giving it the name Old Johnny or Big Bertha or something suiting.

The backward villagers living on the shore of the lake worship the giant lobster as a god, sacrificing travellers to it every so often.

Milk

05-19-2008 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8889915)

The backward villagers living on the shore of the lake worship the giant lobster as a god, sacrificing travellers to it every so often.

They've worshipped it for so long that it's become a god, albeit a small one. This demigod knows only its own cold hunger, and inspires that hunger in its followers. The villagers intentionally spread rumours to the outside world of a legendary giant crayfish that dwells in the lake, ripe for the catching, and watch as would-be fishermen go out onto the lake never to return.

kelvingreen

05-19-2008 01:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Milk (Post 8889971)

They've worshipped it for so long that it's become a god, albeit a small one. This demigod knows only its own cold hunger, and inspires that hunger in its followers. The villagers intentionally spread rumours to the outside world of a legendary giant crayfish that dwells in the lake, ripe for the catching, and watch as would-be fishermen go out onto the lake never to return.

Even better. ;)

noisms

05-19-2008 09:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Milk (Post 8889971)

They've worshipped it for so long that it's become a god, albeit a small one. This demigod knows only its own cold hunger, and inspires that hunger in its followers. The villagers intentionally spread rumours to the outside world of a legendary giant crayfish that dwells in the lake, ripe for the catching, and watch as would-be fishermen go out onto the lake never to return.

I love it.

noisms

05-19-2008 12:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Crypt Thing

The name of this monster is a classic. It just screams out 1950s B-movie horror: "The Thing From The Crypt!" It also sounds like it should be part of the title of a Fighting Fantasy book - "The Wrath of the Crypt Thing!" - which can be nothing but a good thing in my eyes.

The Crypt Thing is an interesting monster in that it throws into stark relief the nature of the average D&D adventurer - a being which exists only to defend its crypt against "grave robbers or vandals"; i.e. the player characters. Of course this is only implied. But the inference was clearly obvious to the designers. Actually, the 2nd edition MM is a great focal point for examining the contradiction at the heart of D&D (are the PCs really heroes or are they actually villains?), because it was that edition in which it was most glaring. One the one hand the core books made such a point of trying to drag the game into the realm of high, heroic fantasy, where the PCs were caught up in the mighty struggle between good and evil and clearly meant to be explicitly in support of the former. But on the other hand, play itself still revolved around killing things and taking their stuff - and grave robbing too, as the existence of the Crypt Thing suggests. It was never really clear whether the PCs were supposed to be Aragorn or the Grey Mouser. (I should point out that I don't think that central ambiguity/contradiction is a weakness, or that it should affect play in any way. In fact, it's one of the things that, as a 2nd edition connoisseur, I really get a kick out of.)

Anyway, almost derailed myself there! Back onto the Crypt Thing.

The Crypt Thing is basically a skeleton which can teleport you. On failing a saving throw you are transported a random distance in a random direction - or, if you are fighting a particularly cunning one, above a canyon or two hundred feet above a heap of boulders. A good power, although it is implied that it can only be used once (it would be a "per encounter" ability in 4e, I would guess).

The art in the MM can, I think, be divided into four categories: the Godawful (Roper, Catoblepas, Cloaker), the Merely Bad (Aaracokra, Dracolich), the Carefully Mediocre (Crocodile, Kenku, Swanmay), and the Good (generally just DiTerlizzi's pictures, with the possible exception of the Goblin. That has a "should have done better" sub-category all of its own). The Crypt Thing is a classic example to illustrate what I mean by the Carefully Mediocre category. It is a perfectly serviceable picture of a skeleton in a robe. It doesn't evoke anything, but at least this means it doesn't evoke derision or vomit. I think I'll try to use these categories in future entries, and see if you agree.

Three plot hooks for your amusement:

- Crypt Things' bones can be made into potions of undead control.
- Crypt Things' bones can also be made into pipes of haunting.
- There is a sparkly New Spell, Create Crypt Thing, for which all you really need is a nice fresh corpse.

These three items shout Evil Necromancer, Player Characters in search of employment, and Sinister Purpose to me. I don't know about you. ;)

Wakboth

05-19-2008 04:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8891759)

The art in the MM can, I think, be divided into four categories: the Godawful (Roper, Catoblepas, Cloaker), the Merely Bad (Aaracokra, Dracolich), the Carefully Mediocre (Crocodile, Kenku, Swanmay), and the Good (generally just DiTerlizzi's pictures, with the possible exception of the Goblin. That has a "should have done better" sub-category all of its own). The Crypt Thing is a classic example to illustrate what I mean by the Carefully Mediocre category. It is a perfectly serviceable picture of a skeleton in a robe. It doesn't evoke anything, but at least this means it doesn't evoke derision or vomit. I think I'll try to use these categories in future entries, and see if you agree.

That's a good division, I think. "Carefully mediocre" is a very good description of a lot of the art in the book.

Quote:

- Crypt Things' bones can be made into potions of undead control.
- Crypt Things' bones can also be made into pipes of haunting.
- There is a sparkly New Spell, Create Crypt Thing, for which all you really need is a nice fresh corpse.

I'm almost surprised you can't make armor out of a Crypt Thing... :D

kelvingreen

05-19-2008 05:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8892338)

I'm almost surprised you can't make armor out of a Crypt Thing... :D

Indeed! I know my group would have loved a set of Crypt Thing Shinpads, with an inherent random teleport ability, of course.

And Wrath of the Crypt Thing is brilliant Fighting Fantasy goodness. Those books really did have great, albeit bludgeoningly simplistic, titles. Got right to the point.

DMH

05-19-2008 08:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I wonder why they didn't include the hatori under crocodile? It would have made the entry 2 pages, but seperating them made it 2 anyways.

noisms

05-19-2008 08:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8892754)

I wonder why they didn't include the hatori under crocodile? It would have made the entry 2 pages, but seperating them made it 2 anyways.

It is unusual. Although I have to wonder why they didn't just include Crocodile in one of the bigger "Animal" entries. I mean, the Crocodile entry really must be one of the most boring in the whole book, and could have been pared right down to a few lines. (At least a quarter of the entry is devoted to describing what a Crocodile is and how it behaves, which has to be about the most redundant piece of information I've ever read in a D&D sourebook.)

Mark Krawec

05-20-2008 12:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8888594)

Well, nixies are harder than giant crayfish, aren't they? So what's keeping a few enterprising (shortsighted and hungry) nixies from wiping out entire populations in their efforts for the perfect etouffee?

Or the nixies eat the crayfish as fast as they can because the blighters lay millions of eggs at a go & when a crawdad grows up - say to the size of a pony or so - its favorite food becomes, you guessed it, nixies. And an 800-pound armored, constantly ravenous killing machine with claws the size of scythe blades is not something halfling-sized lakedwellers want for a neighbor.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Death Knight

More slightly irritating setting-specific stuff here; the Death Knight is, basically, Lord Soth from the Dragonlance books, and the flavour text even goes so far as to say that "kender have been known to become frightened" on meeting one. The assumption that readers would be familiar enough with Dragonlance to understand what that means is something I find more than a little grating, especially as kender are not included in the MM itself.

Anyway, you just know the writers got the idea for the Death Knight from Darth Vader. Weiss and Hickman, you naughty rip-offs, you. "He's an, er, fallen "Paladin", right? And he wears this black suit of armour, and nobody can see his face..." I know D&D has never really claimed to be original - where did they get the idea for orcs from, after all? - but still...at the time the Dragonlance books were written the original Star Wars trilogy was only a few years old. The flesh of the corpse wasn't even cold and already they were body-snatching.

The Death Knight is less interesting than Darth Vader, though, because where Vader has become so corrupted that he is now the antithesis of a goody-goody Jedi, the Death Knight wants to have his cake and eat it too: he wants the kudos of being Evil and Nasty, but at the same time wants to be respected for the "honourable" way in which he fights - by never attacking from behind and waiting for his enemies to draw their weapons before striking.

This is given the lie, however, by the fact that Death Knights aren't honourable at all. In the Catoblepas entry I accused that monster of being the cheapest in the MM, but I really think the Death Knight has stolen that crown. What exactly is honourable about a monster that can cast Power Word, Blind, Power Word, Stun and Power Word, Kill, fire 20-dice Fireballs, continually generate Fear in a 5' radius, and has a powerful magic sword? Just because it never attacks from behind? Gee, yeah, if I was Power Word, Killed to death it would really matter whether the guy did it to my face or not.

I don't tend to use Death Knights, mainly because they are just too cheesy for words, but I quite like the idea of an evil Necromancer who has convinced a Death Knight to be his bodyguard. Said Necromancer could have weird grey skin and heavy black robes; speak in a strange, lispng voice; and have a fetish for lightning bolt spells and a strong liking for maniacal chuckling. Yes, that could work...

SuperG

05-20-2008 01:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

That sounds almost EXACTLY like Darth 'I'll use the Force to hurl bits of machinery at you, since you're immune to Force Choke' Vader.

Just sayin'.

J Harper

05-20-2008 02:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Hickman and Weiss did not create the Death Knight - it was the creation of Charles Stross, and first appeared in the 1st Ed Fiend Folio. If memory serves me right, the first Death Knights were 12 paladins corrupted by Demogorgon, damned to serve him for all eternity. I have no idea if Stross was influenced by Darth Vader when he came up with the concept.

I've always liked Death Knights, though I've yet to use them in any version of D&D.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

Keefe the Thief

05-20-2008 02:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8892814)

It is unusual. Although I have to wonder why they didn't just include Crocodile in one of the bigger "Animal" entries. . . mean, the Crocodile entry really must be one of the most boring in the whole book, and could have been pared right down to a few lines. (At least a quarter of the entry is devoted to describing what a Crocodile is and how it behaves, which has to be about the most redundant piece of information I've ever read in a D&D sourcebook.)

You know, a lot of Earthdawn books (and especially the creature book) assume that the books actually exist in the game world. I think it would have helped if the writers of the MM would have thought along similar lines. They'd just have to imagine the Grey Mouser reading the Monster Manual: "Crocodile? Behavior? I know how it behaves! I bits you with it's jaws! Where's the treasure?"

;)

J Harper

05-20-2008 02:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Also, I remember being quite annoyed, back in the day, when it seemed like TSR was trying to make Death Knights a Krynn only type of monster, as the entry in the Monstrous Manual seems to indicate. Yeah, I know that TSR wouldn't have sent the gaming police if I dast used a Death Knight in the Realms or a homebrew, but it still peeved me a bit.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

J Harper

05-20-2008 02:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

One final point - the 'honorable Death Knight' is definitely a 2E/Krynn-ism. If memory serves, the Death Knight was Chaotic Evil in 1st E. I also remember, from one of the excellent Undead Halloween articles in Dragon way, way back, an adventure seed concerning Death Knights - on their way to attack a stronghold of evil, the party is confronted by an evil knight, who challenges the party's cavalier or paladin to a joust. The knight is a Death Knight, lord of the stronghold, he and his nightmare steed disguised by an illusion. Just before the Death Knight makes contact with his opponent, he casts Power Word: Kill on him, then takes to the air, dropping a fireball in the midst of the rest of the party, then retreating back to his stronghold as some of his servitors rush forth to finish off (hopefully) the weakened party.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

noisms

05-20-2008 02:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Keefe the Thief (Post 8896731)

You know, a lot of Earthdawn books (and especially the creature book) assume that the books actually exist in the game world. I think it would have helped if the writers of the MM would have thought along similar lines.

They'd just have to imagine the Grey Mouser reading the Monster Manual: "Crocodile? Behavior? I know how it behaves! I bits you with it's jaws! Where's the treasure?"

;))

That would have been great. I would have loved a Monster Manual written by "adventurers" - made up of hastily-scribbled sketches of the monsters, anecdotes, rumours and eyewitness accounts. There would be no stats; the DM would have to cobble together his own idea of what stats for the monsters would be, according to what was provided by the entry.

That would never happen, but I can still dream.

noisms

05-20-2008 02:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by J Harper (Post 8896750)

One final point - the 'honorable Death Knight' is definitely a 2E/Krynn-ism. If memory serves, the Death Knight was Chaotic Evil in 1st E. I also remember, from one of the excellent Undead Halloween articles in Dragon way, way back, an adventure seed concerning Death Knights - on their way to attack a stronghold of evil, the party is confronted by an evil knight, who challenges the party's cavalier or paladin to a joust. The knight is a Death Knight, lord of the stronghold, he and his nightmare steed disguised by an illusion. Just before the Death Knight makes contact with his opponent, he casts Power Word: Kill on him, then takes to the air, dropping a fireball in the midst of the rest of the party, then retreating back to his stronghold as some of his servitors rush forth to finish off (hopefully) the weakened party.

That's very interesting, and much more in keeping with how I think a Death Knight should act. An anti-Paladin should stand against everything a Paladin stands for, including acting honourably.

Skiorht

05-20-2008 02:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by J Harper (Post 8896728)

Hickman and Weiss did not create the Death Knight - it was the creation of Charles Stross, and first appeared in the 1st Ed Fiend Folio. If memory serves me right, the first Death Knights were 12 paladins corrupted by Demogorgon, damned to serve him for all eternity. I have no idea if Stross was influenced by Darth Vader when he came up with the concept.

It seems to me that the original Death Knight was more influenced by Moorcock than Star Wars. I got a very strong Prince Gaynor the Damned -vibe from the Fiend Folio entry.

E.T.Smith

05-20-2008 02:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I forget where (it was probably a TSR-era Dragon article) but I once read that Death Knights were specifically conceived to be a martial-themed counterpart to the Lich. Given their array of spell-like abilities, I don't much see the point, but they're well designed for being a campaign's big-bad, more hinted at in the background than seen until faced in a final apocalyptic battle that only half the party survives.

Its interesting that, even only up into the D's, its apparent how thematically random and tone deaf the foe selection was in the MM. Individual entries natter on about pseudo-ecology and in-setting behaviors but never break kayfabe to directly address the DM how the creatures should function as tools for creating challenge or fun. I wonder how many neophyte DM's randomly opened up the MM, threw a Death Knight at the party and prematurely ended their first campaign.

kelvingreen

05-20-2008 05:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8896627)

The assumption that readers would be familiar enough with Dragonlance to understand what that means is something I find more than a little grating, especially as kender are not included in the MM itself.

You don't need the stats, just take a standard halfling and apply a -18 Charisma modifier.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8896786)

That would have been great. I would have loved a Monster Manual written by "adventurers" - made up of hastilyscribbled sketches of the monsters, anecdotes, rumours and eyewitness accounts. There would be no stats; the DM would have to cobble together his own idea of what stats for the monsters would be, according to what was provided by the entry.

That would never happen, but I can still dream.

Although it does include the stats, the Bestiary produced for the short-lived SAGA system uses flavour text (rather than game text) almost exclusively, so you get a good feel of how people in the setting view the monsters, accurately or not. It's generally regarded as one of the best monster books produced for an rpg system, and is fiendishly difficult to find as a result. I think the images are all drawn "in character" too.

noisms

05-20-2008 05:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8897103)

You don't need the stats, just take a standard halfling and apply a -18 Charisma modifier.

And give it 1d1 Hit Dice too, preferably.

Quote:

Although it does include the stats, the Bestiary produced for the short-lived SAGA system uses flavour text (rather than game text) almost exclusively, so you get a good feel of how people in the setting view the monsters, accurately or not. It's generally regarded as one of the best monster books produced for an rpg system, and is fiendishly difficult to find as a result. I think the images are all drawn "in character" too.

I'll see if I can find that someday.

Wakboth

05-20-2008 08:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by J Harper (Post 8896728)

Hickman and Weiss did not create the Death Knight - it was the creation of Charles Stross, and first appeared in the 1st Ed Fiend Folio. If memory serves me right, the first Death Knights were 12 paladins corrupted by Demogorgon, damned to serve him for all eternity. I have no idea if Stross was influenced by Darth Vader when he came up with the concept.

Stross also invented the Githyanki (although the name comes from GRRMartin) and Githzerai, as well as the

Slaadi. And he's an excellent SF writer, too! :D

The whole "Chaotic Evil, but still acts with honor" thing was silly, though. Just make the monster LE, if you want that!

sim_james

05-20-2008 08:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8897103)

Although it does include the stats, the Bestiary produced for the short-lived SAGA system uses flavour text (rather than game text) almost exclusively, so you get a good feel of how people in the setting view the monsters, accurately or not. It's generally regarded as one of the best monster books produced for an rpg system, and is fiendishly difficult to find as a result. I think the images are all drawn "in character" too.

That's exactly what I was going to mention. The Bestiary is a beautiful book. It makes those "Cat, Large" entries worth reading. :D

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8897412)

The whole "Chaotic Evil, but still acts with honor" thing was silly, though. Just make the monster LE, if you want that

I believe that in Dragonlance at least, the whole "evil but honourable" thing was a lie. Death Knights might maintain the facade of honour, but they are creatures of vile treachery.

DMH

05-20-2008 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8897412)

The whole "Chaotic Evil, but still acts with honor" thing was silly, though. Just make the monster LE, if you want that

You have to remember that back then CE was more evil than LE or NE. Which is silly since NE is the evillest, obviously! ;)

DMH

05-22-2008 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I forgot one basic that is vital- umber hulks. They are the fastest way to expand a dungeon lair.

And for the really evil DM, use shadow dragons in place of the deep or sapphire.

6inTruder

05-22-2008 10:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8901914)

the Deepspawn is the creature that lives in the garbage disposal machine aboard the Death Star.

I thought that was the Otyugh(sp?)?

noisms

05-22-2008 01:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dinosaur

I love dinosaurs, and have done since I was a kid. Just last week I tried to put some National Geographic dinosaur posters up on the walls of my bedroom, but my wife made me take them down. I tried to tell her it would be educational, but she just wouldn't listen.

The descriptive text for the Dinosaurs is remarkably scientific. Whereas all the other entries contain vague pseudo-scientific nonsense supposedly uncovered by "sages", suddenly in the Dinosaur entry we find mention of "endothermic and exothermic" animals, "pelvic structures", and "thecodonts". Sages do make an appearance at the end, though - puzzling over the extinction of Dinosaurs in worlds in which they no longer exist, and theorising that they are the ancestors of Lizardmen (!).

Ah, Dinosaurs, how I do love thee, let me count the ways:

Ankylosaurus: A big armour-plated beast with a club-like tail that does 3d6 damage.

Deinonychus: A raptor-like creature which jumps at you and rakes you with its nasty foot-claws. Trivia Fun: the Velosoraptor (sp?) from the Jurassic Park films was, in real life, only about 3' high. Michael Crichton based his concept for the creature on the Deinonychus.

Diplodocus: A big Sauropod which tramples for 3d10 damage and tail-slaps for 2d8. The bigger Brachiosaurus tramples for 8d10 damage.

Elasmosaurus: This "looks like a snake with fins and a thick body", if you can imagine what on earth that means. It's an underwater predator.

Lambeosaurus: This is a "peaceful herbivore" - I'm not sure why they bothered statting it; do you know any DMs who make use of peaceful herbivores in D&D games?

Pteranodon: A fun flying beastie which can carry off anything up to four times its weight (50lbs). Unfortunately, it doesn't sound as if that means it can be ridden. Maybe by a gnome.

Stegosaurus: The famous plated, spike-tailed, walnut-brained Dinosaur which I'm sure you remember.

Triceratops: A 10-ton tank of a thing, which charges around like a rhino.

Tyrannosaurus: We all know this one. The MM describes, with peculiar relish, the fact that "[the creature is] so relentlessly and stupidly fierce that it will attack a small triceratops, kill it, and swallow its head in one gulp -- thus killing itself in a matter of hours as the horns of the victim pierce the stomach of the victor." How weird is that?

There really needs to be a Lost World, Dinosaur-ride-type campaign setting, a la Dinotopia, for D&D. (I heard that halflings in Eberron ride Dinosaurs, but that doesn't count.)

brianm

05-22-2008 01:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Yeah, but doesn't the pic of those two dinos make it look like they're in the middle of a tickle-fight or something? :D

- Brian

noisms

05-22-2008 01:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8906163)

Yeah, but doesn't the pic of those two dinos make it look like they're in the middle of a tickle-fight or something? :D

- Brian

Ha! It really does. Maybe they took it from Dinosaur Playboy: This is what Jenny the Tyrannosaur and Cheyenne the Triceratops get up to when they're chilling out at the Playboy mansion.

The Dinosaur picture really doesn't look like any of the other art in the book. I wonder who drew it.

Oskar Breytenbach

05-22-2008 08:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

The descriptive text for the Dinosaurs is remarkably scientific

I think they lose points for including the Pteranodon and Elasmosaurus, which are not dinosaurs. But, they gain a few back by pointing out that the Pteranodon has no teeth (take note, Jurassic Park 3).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8906123)

The MM describes, with peculiar relish, the fact that "[the creatures is] so relentlessly and stupidly fierce that it will attack a small triceratops, kill it, and swallow its head in one gulp -- thus killing itself in a matter of hours as the horns of the victim pierce the stomach of the victor." How weird is that?

It's so weird that it almost makes me wonder if they based that idea on some peculiar fossil evidence. Surely no one just made that up out of nowhere? :confused:

DMH

05-22-2008 10:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The 2nd Annual MC has an additional 20 dinosaurs (and related critters). I think they simply updated all the old ones from the 1st edition MMs.

blizack

05-22-2008 10:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Oskar Breytenbach (Post 8906996)

It's so weird that it almost makes me wonder if they based that idea on some peculiar fossil evidence. Surely no one just made that up out of nowhere? :confused:

Nope, they made it up out of nowhere.

blizack

05-22-2008 10:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8906123)

Deinonychus: A raptor-like creature which jumps at you and rakes you with its nasty foot-claws. Trivia Fun: the Velosoraptor (sp?) from the Jurassic Park films was, in real life, only about 3' high. Michael Crichton based his concept for the creature on the Deinonychus.

Some paleontologists think Deinonychus and Velociraptor are actually two different species of the same genus, and since the name "Velociraptor" is the older one, it would take precedence. I think Crichton was getting a lot of his information from a (very good) book called Predatory Dinosaurs of the World by Gregory S. Paul, who is one of the Deinonychus=Velociraptor guys.

A dinosaur geek is me!

Sleeper

05-23-2008 01:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by blizack (Post 8907405)
A dinosaur geek is me!

Another geekish note is that while the specimens normally associated with the Velociraptor genus are tiny, even the much larger specimens associated with the Deinonychus genus are still considerably smaller than than the raptors in Jurassic Park. There weren't any raptors of that size known before the film began production, yet while the film was being produced, a dromaeosaurid that dwarfed even the super-sized movie version was discovered (the Utahraptor).

blizack

05-23-2008 01:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 8907771)
Another geekish note is that while the specimens normally associated with the Velociraptor genus are tiny, even the much larger specimens associated with the Deinonychus genus are still considerably smaller than than the raptors in Jurassic Park. There weren't any raptors of that size known before the film began production, yet while the film was being produced, a dromaeosaurid that dwarfed even the super-sized movie version was discovered (the Utahraptor).

Correct! Actually, I think Utahraptor showed up in one of the 3rd edition books.

DMH

05-23-2008 04:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I know it was in a Dungeon for 2nd ed. The cover was a revenant monk bursting out of its grave.

What I like about the adventure was the dinosaurs eating a type IV demon. The demon thought it could take them and found itself in the Abyss a minute or two later. Otherwise it was very bland and any similar sized carnivore could have replaced them.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Displacer Beast

After quite an extended period of Merely Bad and Carefully Mediocre art, we finally get another Good one. And this one really is good; definitely Top 20 material. It can't be said often enough how genuinely brilliant DiTerlizzi was as a D&D artist - it's good for him but a shame for us that he's found the mainstream success he has!

I like Displacer Beasts. What isn't there to like about a six-legged giant puma with tentacles growing out of its shoulders and which has no other motivation than hatred for all other forms of life? Nothing, is the answer. It's a solid gold D&D monster. Even its power - displacement - is great: the ability to appear to be 3' away from where it really is.

There is a lot of customary and unnecessary Ecology information included in the text (young reach maturity after 4 months, followed by a 2 month perio... zzzzzzzz.....). Ignore it. All you need to know is that Displacer Beasts roam around in packs, killing for pleasure, and generally shouting "We exist for adventurers to come and try to hunt us down!"

Other plot hooks are the obvious body-pilfering-related ones: Sages and alchemists like Displacer Beast hides for preparing certain spells and potions, and thieves look on their eyes as good luck charms. The latter makes me think: Thieves guild, megalomaniac guild-master, player characters, mission to get a Displacer Beast eye, difficulty in obtaining payment for completion of said mission, all manner of hi-jinks...

Obligatory "Bit that makes you go, 'Eh?'" : Displacer beasts harbor an undying hatred of blink dogs. Many theories attempt to account for this enmity. Some sages believe it springs from antipathy in temperaments -- the lawful good blink dog would naturally be the enemy of a creature as savage and destructive as the displacer beast. Others argue that it is the displacement and blink abilities which cause this antipathy -- the two abilities, when in close proximity, somehow stimulate the nervous system and produce hostile reactions. Encounters between the two breeds are rare however, since they do not share the same territory.

Numanoid

05-23-2008 11:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8910252)

[u][size="5"]

Obligatory "Bit that makes you go, 'Eh?'" : Displacer beasts harbor an undying hatred of blink dogs. Many theories attempt to account for this enmity. Some sages believe it springs from antipathy in temperaments -- the lawful good blink dog would naturally be the enemy of a creature as savage and destructive as the displacer beast. Others argue that it is the displacement and blink abilities which cause this antipathy -- the two abilities, when in close proximity, somehow stimulate the nervous system and produce hostile reactions. Encounters between the two breeds are rare however, since they do not share the same territory.

Seems like a classic "Cats vs. Dogs" scenario to me.

I bet Displacer Beast kittens are still the cutest, though.

6inTruder

05-23-2008 11:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8910252)

Displacer Beast

There is a lot of customary and unnecessary Ecology information included in the text (young reach maturity after 4 months, followed by a 2 month perio... zzzzzzzz.....). Ignore it. All you need to know is that Displacer Beasts roam around in packs, killing for pleasure, and generally shouting "We exist for adventurers to come and try to hunt us down!"

Not always.

Wields-Rulebook-Heavily

05-23-2008 12:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Man, all these one-shot-kill monsters remind me of how I dealt with them.

Usually the party needed a native guide for the local lingo and to get anywhere, because I was a stickler for enforcing language restrictions and skill use for survival and navigation and no one ever wanted to play a ranger or druid. It also meant I had a convenient redshirt to kill to show everyone how serious the situation was, so if there were henchmen/native guides around, they'd inevitably catch the worst of any horrible instant death the monster of the week could dish out.

And I didn't set out to do that, it just sort of happened and got stuck. It underscored the seriousness of the situation without using a PC for target practice, and occasionally made for good RP fodder as they furiously sought out a sage to teach them about that really freaky thing that ate Bruno the baggage handler.

I need to start doing more of that again. :D

A Letter From Prague

05-23-2008 02:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wields-Rulebook-Heavily (Post 8910421)

Man, all these one-shot-kill monsters remind me of how I dealt with them.

Usually the party needed a native guide for the local lingo and to get anywhere, because I was a stickler for enforcing language restrictions and skill use for survival and navigation and no one ever wanted to play a ranger or druid. It also meant I had a convenient redshirt to kill to show everyone how serious the situation was, so if there were henchmen/native guides around, they'd inevitably catch the worst of any horrible instant death the monster of the week could dish out.

I was just talking about how Indy 4 needed more of those.

noisms

05-24-2008 11:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dog

"A four legged, furry canine, with..." No, I'm kidding; the MM doesn't bother explaining what a dog is. No messing around here: let's get straight into the doggy goodness.

Wild Dog: A dog that's wild, but which can be tamed. PETA girl had a hand in this entry; it was felt necessary to stress that wild dogs (like wolves) don't attack humans unless provoked or extremely hungry. Cry me a river, liberal!

War Dog: Like wild dogs, these are apparently "not usually vicious, and rarely attack without cause." Come off it, PETA girl. The thing's name is WAR Dog. War Dog. War.

Blink Dog: I'd like to know who came up with the idea for Blink Dogs. Not that it's a bad idea; it's just a distinctly odd one. Why a Blink Dog and not, say, a Blink Monkey, Lion, Elephant or Snake? (Maybe there are Blink [Animals] in obscure parts of the Dragon archives - I'm sure (un)reason can confirm or deny this. If there aren't, you can be damn sure Blink Monkeys, Blink Lions, Blink Snakes and More is going to be my next D&D sourcebook, after The Complete Guide to Monster Corpse Armour.)

Blink Dog puppies are worth 1-2,000 gold pieces, by the way. A new angle on my Egg Thief campaign!

Death Dog: We haven't had an instakill monster for a bit, so it was about time - although technically the Death Dog isn't instakill but rather 'certakill': it gives you a disease which will kill you within 4-26 days. The Death Dog has two heads, and, er, there is an 85% chance it will attack humans on sight. Ah, it's our old friend Weird-monster-specific-rules-unrelated-to-anything-else, and his cousin Plucked-from-the-air-at-random. Good to see them back in action.

Dragons are only a few entries away. Do people think I should cover each Dragon with a separate entry or just do an entry for each of the different categories (Chromatic, Metallic, Gem and Weirdo)?

tobygrandjean

05-24-2008 12:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Separate entries per dragon please. ;)

Naxuul

05-24-2008 12:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8914910)

Dragons are only a few entries away. Do people think I should cover each Dragon with a separate entry or just do an entry for each of the different categories (Chromatic, Metallic, Gem and Weirdo)?

I'd say by category, if only because there really isn't that much to say about most of the Metallic, Gem and Weirdo dragons.

-Naxuul

JasonK

05-24-2008 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8914975)

I'd say by category, if only because there really isn't that much to say about most of the Metallic, Gem and Weirdo dragons.

-Naxuul

I'm with Nax. Also, this thread is gonna be long enough as-is. ;)

~ jason

Novatian

05-24-2008 01:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8914975)

I'd say by category, if only because there really isn't that much to say about most of the Metallic, Gem and Weirdo dragons.

-Naxuul

I'm going to have to respectfully disagree here. I would have said there wasn't much to say about a number of these creatures, but there's been wit and insight the whole way. Besides, it is Dungeons & Dragons, so let's give the title critters their full due. I'm sure there's plenty to say about each dragon species in the Monstrous Manual.

Gaffa

05-24-2008 02:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8914910)

Blink Dog: I'd like to know who came up with the idea for Blink Dogs. Not that it's a bad idea; it's just a distinctly odd one. Why a Blink Dog and not, say, a Blink Monkey, Lion, Elephant or Snake? (Maybe there are Blink [Animals] in obscure parts of the Dragon archives - I'm sure (un)reason can confirm or deny this. If there aren't, you can be damn sure Blink Monkeys, Blink Lions, Blink Snakes and More is going to be my next D&D sourcebook, after The Complete Guide to Monster Corpse Armour.

Blink dogs inspired me enough that, in my Warhammer Fantasy Roleplay Campaign, I invented a race of blink giants. No end of fun for my PCs, I assure you.

noisms

05-24-2008 03:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Gaffa (Post 8915278)

Blink dogs inspired me enough that, in my Warhammer Fantasy Roleplay Campaign, I invented a race of blink giants. No end of fun for my PCs, I assure you.

I like it!

I've been toying with the idea of Blink Snakes since making that post. They could be really nasty - poisonous buggers who blink next to you, sink in their fangs, then blink away, leaving you twitching and frothing at the mouth and unable to make the evening's dinner engagement.

kelvingreen

05-24-2008 07:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8914910)

Dragons are only a few entries away. Do people think I should cover each Dragon with a separate entry or just do an entry for each of the different categories (Chromatic, Metallic, Gem and Weirdo)?

I'd go for the categories, personally, although I had a look at the MM yesterday, and ran into the Mercury Dragon. I'd love to know where that one specifically came from, as it definitely seems to have been added to the Metallics as an afterthought.

Oskar Breytenbach

05-24-2008 08:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Yes, please cover the twenty or so dragons individually!

DMH

05-24-2008 09:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8914910)
(Maybe there are Blink [Animals] in obscure parts of the Dragon archives

One of the April issues (in the 150's or 160's) has the blink wooly mammoth. Other than that, I don't remember any.

Quote:

Dragons are only a few entries away. Do people think I should cover each Dragon with a separate entry or just do an entry for each of the different categories (Chromatic, Metallic, Gem and Weirdo)?

Seperate- there is enough people commenting that we should get some cool stories for each.

Unseenlibrarian

05-24-2008 09:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8915680)
I'd go for the categories, personally, although I had a look at the MM yesterday, and ran into the Mercury Dragon. I'd love to know where that one specifically came from, as it definitely seems to have been added to the Metallics as an afterthought.

The 2E Draconomicon, I think, which added also added yellow dragons and steel dragons.

Mr Jack

05-24-2008 10:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8914910)

Dragons are only a few entries away. Do people think I should cover each Dragon with a separate entry or just do an entry for each of the different categories (Chromatic, Metallic, Gem and Weirdo)?

One for each!

By the way, noism, great thread. Thank you.

Sleeper

05-24-2008 11:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8915301)

I've been toying with the idea of Blink Snakes since making that post. They could be really nasty - poisonous buggers who blink next to you, sink in their fangs, then blink away, leaving you twitching and frothing at the mouth and unable to make the evening's dinner engagement.

I think that was the idea behind blink.... I mean phase... spiders.

MadWriter

05-25-2008 05:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 8916008)

I think that was the idea behind blink.... I mean phase... spiders.

I hope that your group members don't have arachnophobia for your sake.

glass

05-25-2008 05:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8915301)

I like it!

I've been toying with the idea of Blink Snakes since making that post. They could be really nasty - poisonous buggers who blink next to you, sink in their fangs, then blink away, leaving you twitching and frothing at the mouth and unable to make the evening's dinner engagement.

Not quite the same thing, but there are displacer serpents in one of the 3e book (Minis Handbook, I think).

glass.

noisms

05-25-2008 12:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dolphin

Yeah, the Dolphin gets an entry. I know. I can hardly stand the excitement myself.

First things first, let's get the picture out of the way, because it really is just awfully, terribly, grotesquely, criminally bad. Not only is it an insult to the MM, to AD&D 2nd edition players everywhere, and to Dolphins, but also to the very concept of RPG art itself and the good name of the Dungeons and Dragons game. It sucks ass. It is a bad, bad picture.

Now that unpleasantness is behind us, let's get on to the unpleasantness of the article itself.

I have a number of objections to this entry:

1. Dolphins do not deserve an entry of their own in the Monster Manual. They really don't. I'm sorry if you disagree, but you're wrong. If Dolphins should get their own entry then so should gorillas, giraffes, gazelles and goats, to name examples from only one letter of the alphabet. Dolphins should be in the Mammal entry, if they are included at all.
2. Dolphins are not "inherently peaceful" and do not take a "benign interest" in human affairs. That's Flipper. Not AD&D.
3. Dolphins are not Lawful Good, and nor do they have an Intelligence of 11-12. They really don't, PETA girl. They are animals with slightly above-average intelligence who like to make clicky noises.
4. It is not the case that "More than one ship owes its safe arrival in port to the timely intercession and warning of Dolphins." Nor in fact is it the case that one ship does.
5. This entry would have been nothing like the ridiculous rosy-coloured love-in that it is if the writers of the MM had been tuna.

You are hereby advised to never discuss the Dolphin entry ever again in your lives except to unrelentingly mock it.

Hellzon

05-25-2008 01:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

You mean gorillas don't get an entry? :eek:

Numanoid

05-25-2008 01:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I think a lot of the art in this book would better (or at least passable) if it weren't always placed on a stark-white background. A little background art, even a supporting character (Like a helpless victim or a lackey) would go a long way into making the rendered monsters look much nicer.

Instead, even the good pieces (like DiTerrizi's work) tend to look flat and washed out, because the monsters look like they're sitting in one of those white-room training sessions from The Matrix.

Whitemagebishieboy

05-25-2008 03:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)

1. Dolphins are not "inherently peaceful" and do not take a "benign interest" in human affairs. That's Flipper. Not AD&D.
2. Dolphins are not Lawful Good, and nor do they have an Intelligence of 11-12. They really don't, PETA girl. They are animals with slightly above-average intelligence who like to make clicky noises.

Inherently peaceful? Were talking about the same dolphins who kill porpoises just to practice there baby murdering skills, and engage in regular gang rapes, right? Dolphins seem peaceful and playful to US because we aren't part of there habitat not because they are peaceful and playful.
But what did i expect from PETA girl.

The most amusing part? an int of 11-12 means that would make them slightly smarter than the average human.

David J Prokopetz

05-25-2008 03:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)

It is not the case that "More than one ship owes its safe arrival in port to the timely intercession and warning of Dolphins." Nor in fact is it the case that one ship does.

I'm going to nit-pick this one: there are at least a couple of reliably recorded cases of wild dolphins assisting humans in dangerous waters. You can argue about the motivation behind it - maybe the human in question was moving like a wounded calf (yes, a young dolphin is a "calf") or something - but it does happen. This is probably the only accurate sentence in the whole writeup. :p

noisms

05-25-2008 03:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8918382)

I'm going to nit-pick this one: there are at least a couple of reliably recorded cases of wild dolphins assisting humans in dangerous waters. You can argue about the motivation behind it - maybe the human in question was moving like a wounded calf (yes, a young dolphin is a "calf") or something - but it does happen. This is probably the only accurate sentence in the whole writeup. :p

I'll give you humans - I've heard those stories too - but surely not ships!

David J Prokopetz

05-25-2008 03:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8918412)

I'll give you humans - I've heard those stories too - but surely not ships!

Well, if you take the humans out of the equation... great, now I have a mental image of a ship crewed by dolphins. Thanks a lot!

sim_james

05-25-2008 07:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dolphin stats are vaguely useful, because there is a type of sea elf that can polymorph into them three times per day.

In Dragonlance. And not one of the elves mentioned in this book. But anyway.

With an average Int of 11-12 I suspect that every dolphin is, in fact, a polymorphed sea elf, or possibly that the dolphins and sea elves have interbred in such numbers that dolphins in AD&D are much smarter than on our planet.

Weltenbummler

05-25-2008 07:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)

Dolphin

I have a number of objections to this entry:

1. Dolphins do not deserve an entry of their own in the Monster Manual. They really don't. I'm sorry if you disagree, but you're wrong. If Dolphins should get their own entry then so should gorillas, giraffes, gazelles and goats, to name examples from only one letter of the alphabet. Dolphins should be in the Mammal entry, if they are included at all.
2. Dolphins are not "inherently peaceful" and do not take a "benign interest" in human affairs. That's Flipper. Not AD&D.
3. Dolphins are not Lawful Good, and nor do they have an Intelligence of 11-12. They really don't, PETA girl. They are animals with slightly above-average intelligence who like to make clicky noises.
4. It is not the case that "More than one ship owes its safe arrival in port to the timely intercession and warning of Dolphins." Nor in fact is it the case that one ship does.
5. This entry would have been nothing like the ridiculous rosy-coloured love-in that it is if the writers of the MM had been tuna.

That's seems a bit off-key. The AD&D MM entry certainly didn't strive to make a zoologically correct entry for dolphins, rather they made an entry for dolphins in a Sword & Sorcery Fantasy Game written for teenagers at a time when flipper was all the rage!

Intelligent, helpful dolphins might not exist for real, but they fit perfect in a good-and-evil AD&D fairy-tale world; no less was described in the MManual.

noisms

05-25-2008 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8918776)

That's seems a bit off-key. The AD&D MM entry certainly didn't strive to make a zoologically correct entry for dolphins, rather they made an entry for dolphins in a Sword & Sorcery Fantasy Game written for teenagers at a time when flipper was all the rage!

Intelligent, helpful dolphins might not exist for real, but they fit perfect in a good-and-evil AD&D fairy-tale world; no less was described in the MManual.

Well, let's not get into an argument about it, but every other real world animal in the book is described in a broadly zoologically accurate way.

I wouldn't have minded an Intelligent Dolphin or Magical Dolphin entry.

glass

05-25-2008 08:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)

Dolphin

Am I being blind, or have you skipped "Dog, Moon"?

glass.

Chaot

05-25-2008 11:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 8918973)

Am I being blind, or have you skipped "Dog, Moon"?

<http://i78.photobucket.com/albums/j1...an/Moondog.jpg>

JRM

05-26-2008 03:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 8918022)

You mean gorillas don't get an entry? :eek:

Well they had their own entry in the original Monster Manual, with 'Ape, gorilla', not to mention the separate entry for 'Ape, giant carnivorous' so that the DM had a version to attack their PCs.

Come to think of it, the original MM had a dolphin entry with the same touchy-feelie quality, so at least they're consistent. Although at least there wasn't a picture that resembled the work of a talented nine year old, like the Monstrous Compendium had.

6inTruder

05-26-2008 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 8919939)

Well they had their own entry in the original Monster Manual, with 'Ape, gorilla', not to mention the separate entry for 'Ape, giant carnivorous' so that the DM had a version to attack their PCs.

Sure. THIS MM on the other hand rolls both apes up under Mammals, and I for one would have much preferred a full entry for Ape, Carnivorous over the Dolphin.

edit: yeah! Where's the Moon Dog?

demiurge1138

05-26-2008 05:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

If memory serves me right, moon dogs are under "moon dog" in the Ms, rather than being like "dog, blink". Presumably because they have more special powers.

Rasmus Wagner

05-26-2008 05:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8896786)

That would have been great. I would have loved a Monster Manual written by "adventurers" - made up of hastily-scribbled sketches of the monsters, anecdotes, rumours and eyewitness accounts. There would be no stats; the DM would have to cobble together his own idea of what stats for the monsters would be, according to what was provided by the entry.

That would never happen, but I can still dream.

I would pay money for that. Set it up so I can print and separate the notes on each creature, crumple/teastain/bake/singe/whatever each individual piece, and stuff it all in a binder, and I'm a hspppy GM.

Rasmus Wagner

05-26-2008 05:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8899519)

The original Fiend Folio had another cursed undead fighter sort called a "Skeleton Warrior" which reads like an alternate toned-down take on the Death Knight. Mechanically they're just a 12th level fighter who happens to be undead. Besides the basic advantages of being fleshless their only uber abilities are a fear aura, immunity to normal weapons and a pumped Magic Resistance. Their entry mainly focuses on how a Skeleton Warrior's soul is trapped in golden circler that can be used to control them. That's such a great story hook it practically grabs you by the throat and demands to be used, and in fact one of my favorite Dungeon adventures (A Rose for Talakara in #25) was all about that hook.

A rose for Talakara is absolutely awesome. And yes, he comes off as much more honourable and memorable than the death knight entry.

glass

05-26-2008 07:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8920188)

If memory serves me right, moon dogs are under "moon dog" in the Ms, rather than being like "dog, blink". Presumably because they have more special powers.

Not in my MM. "Dog, Moon" is right there after "Dog" (and before "Dolphin").

glass.

kelvingreen

05-26-2008 09:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Didn't Dark Sun get some weird psychic dolphins?

noisms

05-26-2008 09:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Apologies: I think I was concentrating so much on the idea of Blink Dogs that I completely forgot Moon Dogs had a separate entry.

Dog, Moon

I'd like to know who came up with the idea for the Moon Dog; a big, intelligent spellcasting canine with human hands instead of paws. The picture makes it look almost like some kind of freakish monkey - something out of a nightmare, actually. Dogs with human hands is just... wrong.

The first point of interest is that Moon Dogs speak their own language. Now that must surely tie for number 1 with Elven Cat in the least-chosen-by-adventurers-language-ever competition. (Suggestions for other candidates...?)

The second point of interest is that Moon Dogs are bloody hard. Not only can their howls cause damage, they have a plethora of powerful spells, are never surprised, can be hit only by +2 or better weapons, and effectively dispel evil at will. Woe betide a party of adventurers, especially evil ones, who come across them. (A pack of Moon Dogs would make a great DM stooge for policing evil PCs, if that's your thang.)

I have to admit to a certain fondness for Neutral Good creatures, especially the "smiting evil wherever it is found" types, like Moon Dogs and Guardinals. They're much more interesting than the goody-two-shoes Lawful Good celestials, and seem to have more purpose than Chaotic Good ones; I think one day I'd like to include a mixed force of Guardinal knights and Moon Dog warhounds in a game, scouring the multiverse for wrongdoers and operating on a "Chop first, ask questions later" basis. They could mistakenly believe that the PCs are involved in some sort of evil mission, and end up trying to kill them. (Or, even better, it could turn out that the PCs are on some sort of evil mission, but they just haven't realised it. Until the Guardinals and Moon Dogs strike...)

YojimboC

05-26-2008 11:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 8919939)

Well they had their own entry in the original Monster Manual, with 'Ape, gorilla', not to mention the separate entry for 'Ape, giant carnivorous' so that the DM had a version to attack their PCs.

I miss giant carnivorous apes.

noisms

05-26-2008 11:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 8922570)

I miss giant carnivorous apes.

We all do, my friend. We all do.

g026r

05-26-2008 11:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8922573)

We all do, my friend. We all do.

I would have loved to have seen PETA girl try to write an entry on them. :D

Wakboth

05-27-2008 12:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

IIRC, the moon dogs come from the 1e Fiend Folio, along with tons of other weird stuff.

In those pre-Planescape days, I think the Upper Planes had just the devas, planetars and solars, plus moon dogs, phoenixes and similar animal-themed, good-aligned critters; archons, guardinals and eladrin are 2e Planescape inventions.

Skiorht

05-27-2008 01:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8922815)

IIRC, the moon dogs come from the 1e Fiend Folio, along with tons of other weird stuff.

Nope, Monster Manual II. I remember the illustration being one of the better pieces of that (mainly) disappointing book.

One of the most gruesome memories of our 1st ed. days features a moon dog. The PCs had allied with a moon dog. We were playing the Slavers mega-module, and the adventurers were captured after a hard fight where the moon dog almost saved their asses. After several days of starving in a dungeon, the jailers finally brought some steaming stew. The players didn't bother to ask me about the food, and the PCs unknowingly gorged themselves on moon dog meat. Later on they escaped and thought to enquire about their canine friend. The erstwhile captors gleefully told the truth.

darktalon

05-27-2008 02:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8922224)

Didn't Dark Sun get some weird psychic dolphins?

Blue Rose has them, but it's somewhat thematically justified there.

glass

05-27-2008 02:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8922224)
Didn't Dark Sun get some weird psychic dolphins?

Dark Sun had weird psychic lots-of-things, but dolphins seem a little unlikely given the general lack of water.

glass.

A Letter From Prague

05-27-2008 02:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 8923276)
Dark Sun had weird psychic lots-of-things, but dolphins seem a little unlikely given the general lack of water.

They could've been flying ones.

With hands.

Chaot

05-27-2008 03:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 8923276)
Dark Sun had weird psychic lots-of-things, but dolphins seem a little unlikely given the general lack of water.

What was it, 'Mind Lords of the Last Sea?' I think that's what it was called. Yup, Athasian water dolphins.

YojimboC

05-27-2008 03:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 8922627)
I would have loved to have seen PETA girl try to write an entry on them. :D

There was an "Ecology of..." article on carnivorous apes in an issue of Dragon years and years ago. Great Jeff Easley art, too.

demiurge1138

05-27-2008 04:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8922573)
We all do, my friend. We all do.

Giant carnivorous apes aren't gone... they're the default in 3e. If I may quote the ape entry:

"These powerful omnivores resemble gorillas but are far more aggressive; they kill and eat anything they can catch. An adult male ape is 5½ to 6 feet tall and weighs 300 to 400 pounds."

JRM

05-27-2008 07:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8923627)
Giant carnivorous apes aren't gone... they're the default in 3e. If I may quote the ape entry:

"These powerful omnivores resemble gorillas but are far more aggressive; they kill and eat anything they can catch. An adult male ape is 5½ to 6 feet tall and weighs 300 to 400 pounds."

Now that's more like it, now we just need more Oongas...

noisms

05-27-2008 10:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8923627)
Giant carnivorous apes aren't gone... they're the default in 3e. If I may quote the ape entry:

"These powerful omnivores resemble gorillas but are far more aggressive; they kill and eat anything they can catch. An adult male ape is 5½ to 6 feet tall and weighs 300 to 400 pounds."

Oh yeah, I forgot about them. My knowledge of the 3e Monster Manuals isn't great. Still, I like my Giant Carnivorous Apes even bigger. 12 feet tall and 800 lbs would be great.

noisms

05-27-2008 11:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Doppelganger

All D&D players love a good Doppelganger, I think. I can actually remember the day I first encountered the Doppelganger - it was in a Fighting Fantasy gamebook - and for years I thought it was a cool invention of Steve Jackson and Ian Livingstone.

That said, I'm not sure I'm a big fan of the monster's D&D incarnation. Now, don't get me wrong, sinister shape shifters who were created by an evil archmage long ago and who now find employment as assassins and spies are a great thing in a game. There is a kind of subspecies of fantasy monsters who have a broadly similar pattern - I'm thinking D&D Doppelgangers, those things from 2nd edition Planescape called Seekers (?), the three-eyed automatons from the first Viriconium book, a few others - namely, they were created in the long forgotten past for some purpose which no longer has any meaning, but which they continue to fulfill anyway because there is no other reason for them to exist. I like that idea a great deal.

But the thing is, I like the proper, mythological Doppelganger even more. The idea of a PC coming across his or her Doppelganger and having to fight it to the death is just too good to have been ignored, but inexplicably it was. In the end that shtick was left to a creature from the 2nd edition Planescape Campaign Setting boxed set bestiary; I forget the name, but it began with 'A'. Even so, it wasn't quite the same: Doppelgangers hate and envy their alter-ego and want to destroy it and take over its life, whereas the Planescape things whose names begin with 'A' do it by command of the Gods.

The solution, I think, would be to rename the 2nd edition Doppelgangers something else ("Sinister Shape Shifty Swines"?) and make rules for real Doppelgangers in a supplement. (This is next on my list, after the Complete Guide to Monster Corpse Armour and the Complete Guide to Blink Animals.)

Still, nice art on this one.

Ragnarok_Engine

05-27-2008 11:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8918418)

*Well, if you take the humans out of the equation... great, now I have a mental image of a ship crewed by dolphins.
Thanks a lot!*

<http://homepage.mac.com/rhurt/galler...eaker-down.jpg>

:p

(And let me tell you, I had to think long and hard before doing a Google Image Search including the word "Streaker.") :D

demiurge1138

05-27-2008 12:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8924974)

Doppelganger

There is a kind of subspecies of fantasy monsters who have a broadly similar pattern - I'm thinking D&D Doppelgangers, those things from 2nd edition Planescape called Seekers (?)

Keepers. Love those guys. The Men in Black of the planes.

E.T.Smith

05-27-2008 01:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

As far as I can tell, and I think I've heard this confirmed, the D&D doppelgangers don't have much mythological resonance because they were never intended to. Rather, their introduction into the dungeon-delving environment was part of the tactic and counter-tactic oneupmanship between PC's and DM's. Specifically, they were for thwarting parties who flaunted big gangs of hirelings, parties who dragged along a score of bowman to take out the dragon in one volley and just as many bearers to carry out every last coin, running roughshod over all the carefully crafted challenges. The DM would make some secret rolls, replace one of the anonymous extras with a doppelganger and have the monster strike from within the ranks at the most devastating moment. Parties who survived soon learned to never travel with more hirelings than they could keep an eye on at once.

Really, doppelgangers can only sensibly work by targetting NPC's, since I don't see any player responding too well to a DM note that reads, "you're dead, play along."

Sleeper

05-27-2008 01:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8924913)

Oh yeah, I forgot about them. My knowledge of the 3e Monster Manuals isn't great. Still, I like my Giant Carnivorous Apes even bigger. 12 feet tall and 800 lbs would be great.

So really, really, really, really skinny? :)

(Your giant ape scaled down to gorilla-height would weigh about 90 lb. Ignoring inconvenient biomechanical limitations and following the same logic behind the more-or-less human-proportioned giants, an isometrically up-scaled 12 ft. gorilla should weigh in the vicinity of 3,000 lb.)

Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily

05-27-2008 01:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8925359)

As far as I can tell, and I think I've heard this confirmed, the D&D doppelgangers don't have much mythological resonance because they were never intended to. Rather, their introduction into the dungeon-delving environment was part of the tactic and counter-tactic oneupmanship between PC's and DM's. Specifically, they were for thwarting parties who flaunted big gangs of hirelings, parties who dragged along a score of bowman to take out the dragon in one volley and just as many bearers to carry out every last coin, running roughshod over all the carefully crafted challenges. The DM would make some secret rolls, replace one of the anonymous extras with a doppelganger and have the monster strike from within the ranks at the most devastating moment. Parties who survived soon learned to never travel with more hirelings than they could keep an eye on at once.

Really, doppelgangers can only sensibly work by targetting NPC's, since I don't see any player responding too well to a DM note that reads, "you're dead, play along."

Say, that gives me an idea to go with my old redshirt standby. Rather than having the native guide be eaten by le monster du jour, I'll have him be the monster. After doing the first cliché a few times to make sure they don't suspect it.

Dammit, now I really need to start doing this. Even if I have to start another game to do it.

JasonK

05-27-2008 02:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8924974)

But the thing is, I like the proper, mythological Doppelganger even more.

Damnation. Somehow it never occurred to me to use the "real", cool doppelganger's in a d&d game. And now I'm trying to see if I can fit these into my ever-evolving E6 campaign setting...

~ jason

Numanoid

05-27-2008 02:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

While a more "true-to-myth" doppleganger would be cool, i think their use would be sort of limited - if they only look like one specific individual, aren't they a one-shot monster?

I actually thought of a cool doppleganger-based campaign based around Marvel's "Secret Invasion", replacing the Skrulls with 'gangers. Game would start out as a fairly stock D&D game - adventures meet, kill monsters, foil evil - until they kill an important PC and find out that he's a doppelganger and may possibly have been one the whole time.

(This works particularly well for settings with lots of big-name NPCs - "Dritz was a doppelganger? NO WAY!!!")

Theyn all hell breaks loose when thousands of doppelgangers who have infiltrated power structures throughtout the land - king's courts, churches, merchant guilds - make themselves know and bring the population to its knees. It's now up to the party to singlehandedly bring down the doppelganger invasion, all the while knowing that anyone they meet, friend or foe, can shift at any time.

(Combat note - in addition to rank-and-file 'gangers, PC's will also fight allied monsters, quislings of various races, and the elder doppelgangers who possess class levels and enhanced shapeshifting powers, like the power to mimic spell-like abilities)

Wakboth

05-27-2008 04:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8924974)

In the end that shtick was left to a creature from the 2nd edition Planescape Campaign Setting boxed set bestiary; I forget the name, but it began with 'A'. Even so, it wasn't quite the same: Doppelgangers hate and envy their alter-ego and want to destroy it and take over its life, whereas the Planescape things whose names begin with 'A' do it by command of the Gods.

'Aleax', if I recall correctly. Weren't they also in the 1e?

noisms

05-27-2008 04:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8925644)

'Aleax', if I recall correctly. Weren't they also in the 1e?

Yes! Aleax, that's the one.

kelvingreen

05-27-2008 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8925359)

Really, doppelgangers can only sensibly work by targetting NPC's, since I don't see any player responding too well to a DM note that reads, "you're dead, play along."

"You've been kidnapped and replaced, now play along" on the other hand... ;)

The mythical doppelganger would probably fit in well in Ravenloft; I'd be surprised if there's no such beastie in one of the Monstrous Appendices for that setting.

JRM

05-27-2008 06:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8924913)

Oh yeah, I forgot about them. My knowledge of the 3e Monster Manuals isn't great. Still, I like my Giant Carnivorous Apes even bigger. 12 feet tall and 800 lbs would be great.

Yes, that's why we need more Oongas (as in Oonga the monarch of the Isle of the Ape \(WG6\), the AD&D module by Gary Gygax, whose kind are listed as Ape, gargantuan carnivorous.)

Gargantuan carnivorous apes are mentioned in 3rd edition D&D, doesn't one gargantuan carnivorous ape have a cameo in the Isle of the Ape sidequest of Expedition to the Ruins of Greyhawk? Anyhows, enworld's Creature Catalogue has a conversion of both regular gargantuan carnivorous apes and Oonga which they call "Apes of the Isle". I'm guessing this is because they make them Huge monsters, so describing them as Huge gargantuan carnivorous apes would just be confusing!

The stats are a pretty good reflection of the original, except they lack the originals 'smashing into the ground' ability and add a Gallop special quality - I suspect they picked up the latter after watching a movie by Peter Jackson.

P.S. Sleeper is right, a 12' giant carnivorous ape should weigh around 3000 pounds if you a regular one in 5½-6' & 300-400 pounds and you scale it up equally in all three dimensions.

noisms

05-27-2008 09:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I stand corrected. I never was the best at estimating the weight of giant primates...

3000lbs is a lot.

How tall was King Kong again?

David J Prokopetz

05-28-2008 12:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8926258)

I stand corrected. I never was the best at estimating the weight of giant primates...

A good rule of thumb is for every doubling of height, increase body mass by a factor of ten. Strictly speaking, it should really be by a factor of eight, but I find that throwing in an extra 25% helps to account for the fact that a bigger creature should be more solidly built in order to support its own weight (and it makes the math easier, too - just add a zero).

(Similarly, if you want to make a creature 50% taller - e.g., from six feet to nine feet - multiply its weight by four, not 1.5, to get a rough estimate.)

JRM

05-28-2008 02:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8926258)

I stand corrected. I never was the best at estimating the weight of giant primates...

3000lbs is a lot.

How tall was King Kong again?

It depends on which King Kong you're talking about. The original King Kong in the 1933 film was mostly eighteen tall, although he appeared larger in some scenes - up to a maximum of about forty feet tall. The King Kong who fought Godzilla was about fifty metres tall (160 feet), while the King Kong in Dino deLaurentiis's 1976 remake was fifty feet tall. Finally, the most recent King Kong of Peter Jackson movie was twenty five feet tall.

Gary Gygax's Oonga was thirty feet tall.

Sleeper

05-28-2008 02:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8926258)

How tall was King Kong again?

Well, it's worth remembering that most film portrayals are only slightly more consistent than say Gargantua and Pantagruel in Rabelais' satires, where they can fit into ordinary rooms yet still be large enough that entire nations of people live among their teeth.

The original Kong Kong was advertised as being 50 ft. tall, but on Skull Island he was consistently portrayed as about 18 ft. tall. In New York he grew again to 24 ft (and even taller on the Empire State Building, I believe). The proposed King Kong vs. Frankenstein version was purportedly 38 tons and 19 ft. 8 in. in height, and Peter Jackson's version might have been about 30 ft. tall (that's a very rough guess). The version in King Kong vs. Godzilla was vastly bigger, supposedly 20 to 45 m tall and weighing 25,000 tons.

Scaling up a big gorilla (6 ft. tall, 500 lb silverbacks have been recorded), the 50 ft. version would be about 145 tons, the 18 ft. version would be about 6.75 tons, the 24 ft. version would be about 16 tons, and the more modern version 30 ft. version might be just over 30 tons. A more reasonable weight for the 19 ft. 8 in. version is about 9 tons (or increase the height to 32 ft.). So far all of them are larger than any living land animal except the elephant, though they're not as big as the larger whales or sauropod dinosaurs. The Godzilla version is also completely out of whack, like a lot of Toho monsters; the height range given suggests a weight between 300 and 4,000 tons, or a height of roughly 280 ft. (85 m).

Of course that's ignoring the square-cube law. Assuming the 500 lb silverback can lift 2,000 lb (which is probably conservative), a somewhat simplistic extrapolation of strength and weight would indicate a 25 ft gorilla would be unable to lift its own body mass. At some point it would have problems breathing, and that's ignoring all the other body mechanical issues with simply scaling up a monster, like heat regulation. But in a world where giants can lift their own body weight as easily as a human-sized figure, it's a reasonable if fictional assumption.

kami2awa

05-28-2008 03:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8747450)

I won't be able to keep up the pace for long, but work is slow and I've got nothing better to do, so...

Arcane

There are two rather eccentric – I'm tempted to use the word 'arcane' but will restrain myself - rules in the racial description. First, apparently all Arcanes are telepathically linked across the multiverse, so that if one is killed all the others immediately know about it and will never trade with the perpetrator ever again. A bit like one of those subatomic particles that eerily knows where all the other ones are. I forget the name. A higgs-boson? Anyway, this rule just screams out as a crowbarred-in way to police PCs and prevent them from killing every Arcane they come across and, well, stealing their stuff; it's typical of 2nd edition, with its slight finger-wagging attitude and tendency to moralise. (I suppose it stems from the reaction against devil-worship allegations.)

Actually, it's an idea as old as SF; Arthur C. Clarke has a race like this (I think they were called Pandorians) in one of his early short stories. The Quantum Mechanics interpretation is a good spin (pun intended) on it...

kami2awa

05-28-2008 03:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8784814)

The Beholder is billed as "the stuff of nightmares"; a big floating head, with one central eye like a cyclops, other smaller eyes on stalks, and a big mouth (or "maw" as it has it in the MM - don't you just love the word "maw"? It only seems to appear in RPG bestiaries, unfortunately). The eye stalks have different powers, such as Sleep, Flesh to stone and Disintegrate, and the main eye can blast Anti-magic rays in 90 degree arcs in front of it. These powers are available at will.

In the new Dr Who series, the Daleks are very Beholder-like since they fly a lot of the time. This makes them actually dangerous-seeming since they are a lot more dangerous...

kami2awa

05-28-2008 03:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Smartmonkey (Post 8832704)

That evil druid, y'know, the one whose idea of balance is closer to nature red in tooth and claw than anything else?

That's a COOL character concept!

YojimboC

05-28-2008 08:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8925423)

Damnation. Somehow it never occurred to me to use the "real", cool doppelganger's in a d&d game. And now I'm trying to see if I can fit these into my ever-evolving E6 campaign setting...

They had them. I think it was in the Dragonlance supplement, or more probably one of the Ravenloft ones. They were called Fetches, but they did the work of the mythological doppelganger.

Of course, these days doppelgangers just make me think of Overdrawn at the Memory Bank. "Dopple." Heh.

YojimboC

05-28-2008 08:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8926258)

I stand corrected. I never was the best at estimating the weight of giant primates...

3000lbs is a lot.

Ten feet and 1200 lbs is well within the bounds of reality. Gigantopithecus was the biggest ape ever known, and it's been missing for 100,000 years, but it was a real animal.

6inTruder

05-28-2008 10:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 8928595)

Of course, these days doppelgangers just make me think of Overdrawn at the Memory Bank. "Dopple." Heh.

Well, some of us have only dabbled in dopples.

And the Fetch was in the Dragonlance Compendium.

noisms

05-28-2008 01:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dracolich

Another pretty dreadful picture here. The Dracolich looks rather less menacing than a small dog pawing its owner for some food. Ho hum. It doesn't get much better over the forthcoming Dragon entries either, which are pretty hit and miss.

The Dracolich has the most ridiculously overcomplicated origin story ever, full of arcane rules on the finding of hosts and the performing of rituals. It goes on for ages in a dry, rambling way, and is so convoluted I don't think I ever bothered reading it. Even now I can't summon up the effort. Because really, what's the point? It's a dragon which is also a lich, brought about by sinister ritual magic. Job's a good'un.

Anyway, the upshot is that Dracoliches are the same as their original form, but harder. They have better armour class, do more damage, and paralyze opponents, and can only be destroyed completely by destroying the 'host' (it would take another 3,000 word essay at least to explain what that is - you'll just have to read the entry).

I'm looking forward to the Dragons (I'm thinking of doing 2 per entry) so apologies if this entry is a little skimpy.

demiurge1138

05-28-2008 02:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The whole dracolich host/pseudodracolich thing is pretty dumb. I'm glad it got simplified a bit in 3e to be more on par with ordinary liches. Crappy picture or not, the skeleton dragon did inspire my young mind after I picked up a Monstrous Manual back in the day, and my first foray into roleplaying game country (not D&D by any means, but a more free-form experience) featured a dracolich as its antagonist.

kami2awa

05-28-2008 06:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)
[u]

1. Dolphins do not deserve an entry of their own in the Monster Manual. They really don't. I'm sorry if you disagree, but you're wrong. If Dolphins should get their own entry then so should gorillas, giraffes, gazelles and goats, to name examples from only one letter of the alphabet. Dolphins should be in the Mammal entry, if they are included at all.
2. Dolphins are not "inherently peaceful" and do not take a "benign interest" in human affairs. That's Flipper. Not AD&D.
3. Dolphins are not Lawful Good, and nor do they have an Intelligence of 11-12. They really don't, PETA girl. They are animals with slightly above-average intelligence who like to make clicky noises.
4. It is not the case that "More than one ship owes its safe arrival in port to the timely intercession and warning of Dolphins." Nor in fact is it the case that one ship does.
5. This entry would have been nothing like the ridiculous rosy-coloured love-in that it is if the writers of the MM had been tuna.

I think the entry is talking about the mythological perception of dolphins. Even in Greek myth they were thought to help drowning sailors, and generally be benevolent to mankind. In a fantasy world, they might well be like that.

Weltenbummler

05-28-2008 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 8930169)
I think the entry is talking about the mythological perception of dolphins. Even in Greek myth they were thought to help drowning sailors, and generally be benevolent to mankind. In a fantasy world, they might well be like that.

Think we've been over that before.

noisms is very, very harsh on the mundane animals, but to a large extent they illustrate the aim of AD&D to go beyond miniature fighting into immersive world building. (Yes, I know that AD&D has it's root in mini-combat gaming, but everything that made it special and stand out from gazillion like games is that it aimed for more).

Stats for Cats, Dogs and else have innumerable uses (i.e. to be initiated in the thieves guild young rogue, you need to catch seven stray cats before the dawn), as do things like elven animals or lawful good centaurs that aimed to flesh out societies and create a more complete, immersive world beyond the cannon fodder for the players...

Juriel

05-28-2008 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

And housecats to kill apprentice wizards with.

noisms

05-28-2008 11:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8930880)
Think we've been over that before.

noisms is very, very harsh on the mundane animals, but to a large extent they illustrate the aim of AD&D to go beyond miniature fighting into immersive world building. (Yes, I know that AD&D has its root in mini-combat gaming, but everything that made it special and stand out from gazillion like games is that it aimed for more).

Stats for Cats, Dogs and else have innumerable uses (i.e. to be initiated in the thieves guild young rogue, you need to catch seven stray cats before the dawn), as do things like elven animals or lawful good centaurs that aimed to flesh out societies and create a more complete, immersive world beyond the cannon fodder for the players...

You're right, of course. And I do appreciate that motivation on the part of the designers - it's actually one of the really fantastic things about 2nd edition AD&D.

My main complaints are the inconsistencies: Why fantasy dolphins but not, say, fantasy polar bears? Why are wolves painted as misunderstood gooder-than-gold superheroes, but bats are castigated as "annoying"? Why does having a fleshed-out centaur society mean turning them into hippies, but having a fleshed out minotaur society means keeping them as evil, brutal monsters? And so on.

Anyway, this isn't really the place to go into the argument in detail! Maybe when I've finished the entire thread (in a decade's time or however far away that will be) we can do a kind of roundup/debate.

Whitemagebishieboy

05-28-2008 11:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8930880)
but to a large extent they illustrate the aim of AD&D to go beyond miniature fighting into immersive world building.

AD&D 2E anyways.

AD&D 1E remained pure, unsullied and all about killing monsters and yonking their stuff. Well that and random gygaxian stuff.

David J Prokopetz

05-28-2008 11:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 8931031)

AD&D 2E anyways.

AD&D 1E remained pure, unsullied and all about killing monsters and yoinking there stuff. Well that and random gygaxian stuff.

I kind of miss the Random Adjective Tables.

YojimboC

05-29-2008 11:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8929040)

Well, some of us have only dabbled in dopples.

I would hate to bobble the dopple.

Quote:

And the Fetch was in the Dragonlance Compendium.

Hah! My nerd-fu is strong.

6inTruder

05-29-2008 11:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Acctually, I think the Fetch would've made a far stronger entry than things like the Deepspawn.

6inTruder

05-29-2008 11:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 8933502)
I would hate to bobble the doppel.

Are there anteaters listed under the Mammal entry?

noisms

05-29-2008 12:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

So here we have it folks, what you've all been waiting for: the creature that is the namesake of the game. I'm going to skip the general Dragon information and just get straight into the entries - two per day for, I guess, twelve days or so. Okay, deep breath.

Dragon, Chromatic, Black

The Black Dragon is the goth/emo-kid of the Chromatics: They like "dismal surroundings", prefer darkness to daylight, and "resent intrusions of any kind".

They inhabit "steamy environment[s] where canopies of trees filter out most of the sunlight, swarms of insects fill the air, and stagnant moss-covered ponds lie in abundance." Swamps and jungles, basically, where they lurk under water just waiting for their chance to leap out and shout "Rarr! I'm a black dragon!"

As you all know, Black Dragons breathe acid. I seem to remember one of the characters in a Dragonlance book having his face melted by a Black Dragon's breath. One of the pretend-American Indian ones. I forget the name.

Weird detail: Black Dragons like to eat eels.

Quite cool, grisly detail: Black Dragons like to pickle the corpses of their victims in stagnant ponds before eating them.

Dragon, Chromatic, Blue

One of the things that always puzzled me about Blue Dragons was why they like to live in deserts. You couldn't get a less desert-y colour than blue, could you? Although, in fairness, the MM acknowledges this, and makes the point that you get lots of blue skies in the desert, so the Blue Dragons can camouflage themselves against that. (Quite a nifty idea, actually - a great big dragon appearing literally as a bolt from the blue and blasting the party with lightning.)

Blue Dragons are tricky tricksters, who like to employ illusions such as hallucinatory terrain and the like. They also like to eat camels, which they cook with lightning (!).

I like how the designers made an effort to show how the monsters had an independent existence outside of their interactions with adventurers in the MM. An example is the rivalry between Blue and Brass Dragons. The two races hate each other, and as they occupy the same territory they usually end up fighting. Blue Dragons are more powerful and have lightning breath, though, whereas Brass Dragons are kind of pathetic, so usually the Blues win.

The Blue Dragon picture is one of the better ones in the Dragon section, which as I said yesterday is pretty hit and miss. The Black Dragon picture, for example, is deathly dull - it kind of looks like it's sticking its tongue out at somebody in a desultory "yah boo" kind of way. The Blue Dragon, on the other hand, is saying, "I'm gonna grab you with my claws, so there."

Ragnarok_Engine

05-29-2008 12:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8933582)
Are there anteaters listed under the Mammal entry?

<http://i24.photobucket.com/albums/c3.../ant-eater.jpg>

demiurge1138

05-29-2008 02:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8933699)
Weird detail: Black Dragons like to eat eels.

Who doesn't? Mmm... unagi...

noisms

05-29-2008 02:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8934079)
Who doesn't? Mmm... unagi...

See, that's why it's a weird detail. It should be taken as read that everything in the MM likes to eat eels.

Whitemagebishieboy

05-29-2008 04:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8934085)
See, that's why it's a weird detail. It should be taken as read that everything in the MM likes to eat eels.

I prefer squid and octopus. Also lobster.
Wait a tick, are you including the HERBIVORES?

noisms

05-29-2008 05:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 8934463)
*I prefer squid and octopus. Also lobster.
Wait a tick, are you including the HERBIVORES?*

Even herbivores must secretly love a bit of eel.

Mark Krawec

05-29-2008 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8933699)
Quite cool, grisly detail: Black Dragons like to pickle the corpses of their victims in stagnant ponds before eating them.

Now that's a handy bit of info. The party is trekking through some godsforsaken swamp when they come across a particularly nasty slough that's full of bloating corpses kept submerged with unusually large rocks.

Players: "Damn! Who put these here?"

DM: "Ehm, ranger? Make a animal lore check."

Possibly a moment later:

Dragon: "Get outta the kitchen! They'll be ready when they're ready!"

Mr Jack

05-30-2008 12:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8933699)

Although, in fairness, the MM acknowledges this, and makes the point that you get lots of blue skies in the desert, so the Blue Dragons can camouflage themselves against that. (Quite a nifty idea, actually - a great big dragon appearing literally as a bolt from the blue and blasting the party with lightning.)

I hate to get all reality on a thread about the 2e monstrous manual, but this doesn't work. What happens is that if you put an solid object, like a dragon, in front of a bright object, like the desert sky, it looks black.

Which is why Abbott. H. Thayer was wrong about why Flamingos are pink.

noisms

05-30-2008 12:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr Jack (Post 8935684)

I hate to get all reality on a thread about the 2e monstrous manual, but this doesn't work. What happens is that if you put an solid object, like a dragon, in front of a bright object, like the desert sky, it looks black.

Which is why Abbott. H. Thayer was wrong about why Flamingos are pink.

Oh yeah, you're right. Oh well. Maybe if the player characters were flying in on the back of another dragon it would work.

I remember reading about the Thayer/Flamingo thing in one of Stephen Jay Gould's essays. I think it was Theodore Roosevelt who debunked the myth, bizarrely enough.

Mr Jack

05-30-2008 01:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8935702)

I remember reading about the Thayer/Flamingo thing in one of Stephen Jay Gould's essays. I think it was Theodore Roosevelt who debunked the myth, bizarrely enough.

Red Wings in the Sunset? Yup, that's where I got it from too.

A Letter From Prague

05-30-2008 03:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr Jack (Post 8935684)

Which is why Abbott. H. Thayer was wrong about why Flamingos are pink.

To hide in candy stores?

DMH

05-30-2008 10:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

One of my favorite pieces of art involving dragons is the ranger on the head of the black, not knowing there is a dragon there at all. It is in the ranger book, among other books.

noisms

05-30-2008 11:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragon, Chromatic, Green

"Green dragons are bad tempered, mean, cruel and rude." But I like them. Whisper it, but does anybody else agree with me that Green Dragons should be the iconic ones, rather than Reds? I know the association of red with fire, but as a child (in my pre-D&D days) I'm pretty sure I always imagined Dragons to be green, as in the St. George story. In order for that to be the case, though, they'd have to ditch the naff poison breath shtick and switch to fire, and that would mess up the whole sequence.

Green Dragons see Hill Giants as their main enemy, which is another example of what I talked about in the previous entry; the separate life of monsters outside of their encounters with adventurers. Hill Giants like to eat baby Green Dragons. The dragons' main solution to this problem is to enslave the Giants. I'm picturing a party of high level PCs becoming involved in continual running skirmishes with gangs of Hill Giants, becoming slowly weakened...whereupon Mr. Green Dragon strikes! With fire breath! Mwahahahahaaaaaa!!!!

Dragon, Chromatic, Red

Ah, the Big Daddy of the dragons. Even though Gold ones are technically harder, we all know that Red ones are better. They're greedier, more obnoxious, vainer and more arrogant, which is what every dragon should be.

Terrible picture, though. The example looks like a rather naughty child, licking his lips, about to steal a cake.

Red Dragons like to charm villagers into sending them young maidens as sacrifices. This is a plot hook I haven't thought to use before, but will in the future. What could be more D&D than rescuing a damsel in distress from a mighty dragon?

My first character, a first level Halfling in Basic D&D, was killed by a Red Dragon. I think I mentioned it in one of the first posts in this thread. It was just after we'd killed a Carrion Crawler. Especially galling was the fact that I think I made my saving through, but I only had 4 hit points so it didn't make much difference.

Numanoid

05-30-2008 04:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8938234)

Dragon, Chromatic, Green

"Green dragons are bad tempered, mean, cruel and rude." But I like them. Whisper it, but does anybody else agree with me that Green Dragons should be the iconic ones, rather than Reds? I know the association of red with fire, but as a child (in my pre-D&D days) I'm pretty sure I always imagined Dragons to be green, as in the St. George story. In order for that to be the case, though, they'd have to ditch the naff poison breath shtick and switch to fire, and that would mess up the whole sequence.

Actually, I'm pretty sure that the dragon of St. George's legend had poisonous breath rather than flames.

Weltenbummler

05-30-2008 04:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Numanoid (Post 8939200)

Actually, I'm pretty sure that the dragon of St. George's legend had poisonous breath rather than flames.

Don't think he had a breath-weapon in the sense of D&D at all. But he's described as 'plague-bearing' and 'envenoming the countryside'.

And though Saint George's dragon is usually green (likely inspired by reptiles), he is also a symbol of evil and the devil (Saint George after all, needs to become christian to defeat him.. heavily relying on the cross for protection) which harks back to John's Book of Revelation which describes Satan as "a great dragon, flaming red, with seven heads and ten horns".

Kaiten

05-30-2008 05:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Although I'd have to say that Greens and Reds were always my favorite dragons, I hardly ever use them in games. I always end up tossing Blacks and Whites at my players, mostly because I like sending my adventurers off to the godawful swamps and tundras where those dragons live. I like my adventurers to be slogging through hip deep mud, swatting off mosquitoes as big as housecats (sometimes literally!), and generally being miserable enough to wonder whether any treasure can possibly be worth it.....and that's when the dragon attacks.

Ironically, this typically ensures that the adventurers become dead certain that the treasure must indeed be worth all the trouble. After all, they had to fight a dragon, so the treasure must be awesome, right?

Belchion

05-30-2008 07:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaiten (Post 8939403)
Although I'd have to say that Greens and Reds were always my favorite dragons,

I always liked blacked dragons most, with greens a close second.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaiten (Post 8939403)
After all, they had to fight a dragon, so the treasure must be awesome, right?

A dragon is treasure enough, just sell its blood to the local mage guild!

Sleeper

05-30-2008 10:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always liked blue. Ilusions, sandstorms, lonely oases, lightning from above, claws scrabbling up from below.

Hmm. Since gnomes are monsters now (RAWWR!), maybe they're in cahoots. The deceivers of the dunes. Small faces, worn by the sand. Terrible danger, both great and small. Striking suddenly, then fading back into the intricate mirages and phantasms.

Cahoots. I like that word :).

sim_james

05-30-2008 10:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dark Secret: There aren't any blue dragons, not really. They are all gnomes.

Tricksy, illusion-casting gnomes.

That's why you can't see blue dragons until they "appear" out of a cloudless blue sky.

Wakboth

05-31-2008 01:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Having read The Hobbit at a young age, red is indelibly imprinted as the iconic dragon color in my imagination. :)

As for the black dragons' unpleasant cooking habits, don't crocodiles do something similar?

Can't argue about the artwork; although it's a great improvement over the 1e MM (whose bright idea was it to let the non-Dave-Trampier guy illustrate the freaking dragons?), it's very 'meh' overall. IIRC, brass dragon is simply pathetic...

Sleeper

05-31-2008 01:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 8940063)

Dark Secret: There aren't any blue dragons, not really. They are all gnomes.

Tricksy, illusion-casting gnomes.

That's why you can't see blue dragons until they "appear" out of a cloudless blue sky.

I like that.

The deep desert... it's terrifying. Caravans go loaded for bear... or dragon. Huge, whole companies of soliders, mighty sorcerers from the Stygian kingdoms, and still. So many, so very many, never make it out. The wastes are as wide open and morally ambiguous as the scenes in Lawrence of Arabia. There's something out there, something huge and ominous and winged. And the poor little brass dragons bury their heads under their trembling wings.

Because they're afraid, so very afraid. Of something barely 3 foot tall, hidden under an omnious, serpentine, cobalt specter composed of nothing more than ghosts and shadows.

noisms

05-31-2008 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragon, Chromatic, White

I like the picture of the White Dragon, with his unusual head crest and ugly face. He has the more savage look to go with the more animalistic nature of the White.

One thing that always puzzled me when I was a snotty pedantic teenager was that a cone of frost is the least effective breath weapon an animal living in icy conditions could use, because all its main rivals - Frost Giants and the like - would probably be immune or resistant to cold. Actually it makes perfect sense to see such relationships as an evolutionary arms race, with the White Dragon developing more powerful breath over time just as its rivals develop stronger immunities.

What I need to do is run an Ice Age campaign in which White Dragon-riding Frost Giants have subdued the entire world. That would be just too fantastic for words.

Dragon, Gem, Amethyst

Christ, it's been so long since I even considered using a Gem dragon that I completely forgot about their psionic abilities. That adds something, I suppose, although I always found psionic monsters a little annoying. Not because I hate psionics, but because people who didn't have the psionics handbook (e.g. most of my group) couldn't use such monsters in games without heavy rule alterations and complicated ways of replacing psionics with magic.

Amethysts are wise, regal jobbies who hang out in underground lakes eating fish and spitting explosive ~~throat~~ ~~sweets~~ lozenges at people. Broadly I am in favour of both the Dragon and the picture (although he seems to be making a suggestion - "How about this?" - rather than threatening anybody) but I do sometimes wonder why Amethysts got chosen to be the most powerful Gem Dragons. You would have thought Diamond, wouldn't you?

YojimboC

05-31-2008 01:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8943290)

What I need to do is run an Ice Age campaign in which White Dragon-riding Frost Giants have subdued the entire world. That would be just too fantastic for words.

Amen.

JasonK

05-31-2008 01:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8943290)

One thing that always puzzled me when I was a snotty pedantic teenager was that a cone of frost is the least effective breath weapon an animal living in icy conditions could use, because all its main rivals - Frost Giants and the like - would probably be immune or resistant to cold.

Amazing. Somehow, this NEVER occurred to me.

Rock on, noisms.

~ jason

David J Prokopetz

05-31-2008 01:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr Jack (Post 8935684)

I hate to get all reality on a thread about the 2e monstrous manual, but this doesn't work. What happens is that if you put an solid object, like a dragon, in front of a bright object, like the desert sky, it looks black.

Unless blue dragons glow.

Naxuul

05-31-2008 01:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8943378)
Unless blue dragons glow.

Which given that they're like blazing reptilian batteries, isn't out of the question.;

-Naxuul

Wields-Rulebook-Heavily

05-31-2008 01:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8943378)
Unless blue dragons glow.

They may reflect light (scales!), but I'm thinking that's not enough.

David J Prokopetz

05-31-2008 01:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8943386)
Which given that they're like blazing reptilian batteries, isn't out of the question.;

Hmmm... I wonder how many lumens would a blue dragon would have to generate to blend in with a clear desert sky?

JasonK

05-31-2008 01:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Hey, also, question:

I know that this is a long, long book to do a Let's Read on, but I wonder if you couldn't shake up the entries a little for the sake of interest? So much of them focuses on the art and one little detail in the entry that I honestly get a little lost. Maybe it's been too long since I read the MM myself, maybe these details should be obvious, but I sort of want to hear more about what type of adventurers these creatures should fight, what their use in a campaign might be...

I dunno, maybe I'm not making any sense?

~ jason

David J Prokopetz

05-31-2008 01:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Apologies for the double-post: some quick research indicates that the effective intensity of the mid-day sky at equator is equal to about five hundred foot-candles. Since attenuation is negligible for our purposes, we can consider this to be equivalent to five hundred lumens, or about the same as a 40-watt incandescent bulb (assuming that the dragon is equally luminous over its entire body surface, of course).

So really, our hypothetical glowing blue dragon wouldn't have to glow all that brightly to camouflage itself against the sky.

noisms

05-31-2008 01:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8943412)

Hey, also, question:

I know that this is a long, long book to do a Let's Read on, but I wonder if you couldn't shake up the entries a little for the sake of interest? So much of them focuses on the art and one little detail in the entry that I honestly get a little lost. Maybe it's been too long since I read the MM myself, maybe these details should be obvious, but I sort of want to hear more about what type of adventurers these creatures should fight, what their use in a campaign might be...

I dunno, maybe I'm not making any sense?

~ jason

That does make sense. I'll try to incorporate your suggestions. Definitely usage in a campaign was an aspect I wanted to focus on from the beginning but which has started to get lost in, as you say, the art and little details.

Now there's an idea: A campaign which uses every single monster from the MM...

noisms

05-31-2008 01:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8943430)

Apologies for the double-post: some quick research indicates that the effective intensity of the mid-day sky at equator is equal to about five hundred foot-candles. Since attenuation is negligible for our purposes, we can consider this to be equivalent to five hundred lumens, or about the same as a 40-watt incandescent bulb (assuming that the dragon is equally luminous over its entire body surface, of course).

So really, our hypothetical glowing blue dragon wouldn't have to glow all that brightly to camouflage itself against the sky.

And there you have it. D&D is scientifically unimpeachable after all!

Now, onto fireballs... ;)

David J Prokopetz

05-31-2008 01:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8943442)

And there you have it. D&D is scientifically unimpeachable after all!

Now, onto fireballs... ;)

I'd have to bust out the alternative physics for that one. Would you prefer cold fusion or zero-point energy? :D

Naxuul

05-31-2008 01:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8943430)

Apologies for the double-post: some quick research indicates that the effective intensity of the mid-day sky at equator is equal to about five hundred foot-candles. Since attenuation is negligible for our purposes, we can consider this to be equivalent to five hundred lumens, or about the same as a 40-watt incandescent bulb (assuming that the dragon is equally luminous over its entire body surface, of course).

So really, our hypothetical glowing blue dragon wouldn't have to glow all that brightly to camouflage itself against the sky.

So is answered the immortal question 'How many blue dragons does it take to screw in a light bulb?':D

-Naxuul

David J Prokopetz

05-31-2008 02:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8943447)

So is answered the immortal question 'How many blue dragons does it take to screw in a light bulb?':D

Heh. Seriously, tho', I just like to play with setting details. The stuff you come up with by extrapolating the logical consequences of the weird little details is often far more interesting than anything you could have come up with on your own.

Like electrically-powered super-predators that radiate in the visible spectrum in order to camouflage themselves against the mid-day sky.

Naxuul

05-31-2008 02:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8943453)

Heh. Seriously, tho', I just like to play with setting details. The stuff you come up with by extrapolating the logical consequences of the weird little details is often far more interesting than anything you could have come up with on your own.

Like electrically-powered super-predators that radiate in the visible spectrum in order to camouflage themselves against the mid-day sky.

I wonder then how you would best explain the Green Dragon, a gigantic flying predator who lives in forests too small for itself to actually travel through without destroying the habitat and breathes (and in later editions radiates) enough chlorine gas to kill all plant life it meets. It's a conundrum.;

-Naxuul

Intermittently Noble

05-31-2008 02:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8933699)

Dragon, Chromatic, Black

The Black Dragon is the goth/emo-kid of the Chromatics: They inhabit "steamy environment[s] where canopies of trees filter out most of the sunlight, swarms of insects fill the air, and stagnant moss-covered ponds lie in abundance." Swamps and jungles, basically, where they lurk under water just waiting for their chance to leap out and shout "Rarr! I'm a black dragon!"

I can just see them composing poetry about the 'dark miasma of my soul, just like the fetid swamp of my flesh' and that sort of thing.

Now we know why they dislike intrusions so much.

Personally, though, I've never liked linking color to abilities. I like to say that the dragons are color-coded for the GM's convenience, not for that of the players. So, my white dragons are really just as likely to melt everyone with fire as they are to freeze fingers off.

Use red dragon's stats, white dragon's body. Have fun.

Blue dragons and light bulb: None. They don't know what the dark is, anyway. Or maybe... one. He commissions an adventurer to do it, then eats the adventurer. In true evil fashion.

David J Prokopetz

05-31-2008 02:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8943463)

I wonder then how you would best explain the Green Dragon, a gigantic flying predator who lives in forests too small for itself to actually travel through without destroying the habitat and breathes (and in later editions radiates) enough chlorine gas to kill all plant life it meets. It's a conundrum.

I'll let someone else field that one - I've had my fun for today.

(Seed of an idea: the sages are wrong. Green dragon "acid" isn't actually chlorine. You see, green dragons aren't animals at all - they're carnivorous plants.)

demiurge1138

05-31-2008 03:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I'm not entirely sure why, but I loved goddamn amythest dragons when I first got this book as a kid. Dreamed about 'em and everything.

On the moon. Maybe that means something.

Milk

06-01-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8943290)

What I need to do is run an Ice Age campaign in which White Dragon-riding Frost Giants have subdued the entire world. That would be just too fantastic for words.

Sounds like the source of a fantasy Ice Age.

Rasmus Wagner

06-01-2008 03:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 8943463)

I wonder then how you would best explain the Green Dragon, a gigantic flying predator who lives in forests too small for itself to actually travel through without destroying the habitat and breathes (and in later editions radiates) enough chlorine gas to kill all plant life it meets. It's a conundrum.;

-Naxuul

Because they really, really hate trees?

Ashikaider

06-01-2008 04:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8943515)

I'll let someone else field that one - I've had my fun for today.

(Seed of an idea: the sages are wrong. Green dragon "acid" isn't actually chlorine. You see, green dragons aren't animals at all - they're carnivorous plants.)

that sounds like the Forest Dragon boss from Final Fantasy 12:D

Pete Whalley

06-01-2008 06:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rasmus Wagner (Post 8944920)
Because they really, really hate trees?

And therein lies the hook, perhaps?

The settlements along the edge of a vast forest come under attack by crazed animals forced out of their habitat due to it's slow poisonous death. Local druids are shitting themselves, and the fey (Dryads, Treants and such) are dying along with the forest.

The kingdoms economy suffers as the loggers, furriers and hunters are too scared to enter the forest. What's needed is a band of homicidally courageous hero-types to delve into the wooded depths and kill the green bastard responsible.

Eel

06-01-2008 06:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8934522)
Even herbivores must secretly love a bit of eel.

This is more true than you'd expect.

I might just sig this.

...

What?

(un)reason

06-01-2008 07:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rasmus Wagner (Post 8944920)
Because they really, really hate trees?

Note that their scales remain flexible, unlike other dragons. Maybe they're like mice and octopi, with flexible bodies able to squeeze through ridiculously small gaps without breaking the trees.

noisms

06-01-2008 10:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

This thread is made up of a million ridiculous but brilliant ideas. It should be distilled through recondite processes until it resembles pure ether, which all apprentice DMs will be forced to inhale - thus immeasurably bettering the hobby; nay, the WORLD.

Dragon, Gem, Crystal

The Crystal Dragon is one of two (I think) Chaotic Neutral Dragons and therefore probably in the top 10 most powerful Chaotic Neutral creatures ever. (The others being Topaz Dragons, Slaad, and Big Bad Githzerai.) It is the Stephen Fry of Dragonhood, being heavily into intellectual conversation and disdainful of getting its claws dirty.

My immediate thought on reading the entry was to use a Crystal Dragon as a kind of font of collected knowledge in a campaign. Having lived for centuries and conversed with just about every race of thing under the sun, it will have become a trivia expert of Oracular proportions - a kind of Dragon Rainman without the associated emotional dysfunction - able to answer any question put to it with lightning speed. "Where can we find the key to the Golden Temple?" "Where the Blood River meets its source." "When will Orcus return from the dead?" "When the clocks strike 13." Etc. Obviously finding the Crystal Dragon Oracle would be difficult enough in itself - he would live on the top of an Everest-scale mountain, conveniently overrun by hideous monsters. And as he would be Chaotic Neutral, you would only be able to trust his pronouncements half of the time.

Then I got to the bottom paragraph and found out that Crystal Dragons often adopt young White Dragons and teach them "to be friendly." Even better: the Crystal Dragon Oracle has a gang of White Dragon minions/bodyguards who bring interesting humanoids from all over the known world for him to chat with. Often they do this by force, polymorphing into humanoid beings so they can get close to highly knowledgeable folk, then abducting them and bringing them to the mountain top. Of course, they return them afterwards - usually in one piece. And hey presto! The campaign begins with the players meeting a half-mad Sage claiming he was abducted by dragons. As if! But he has proof...

Dragon, Gem, Emerald

Emerald Dragons are the most miserly and parsimonious of Dragonkind. They just do not like people getting their grubby mitts on even the tiniest copper coin from their hoard. Living in volcanoes, they shut themselves away from the world behind elaborate alarm systems. As they get older they gain the ability to cast geas once a day, which isn't bad. I like the word 'geas'. Geas.

In comparison to the Crystal Dragon, the Emerald Dragon's entry is plot hook-lite. They don't like Fire Giants, and they're paranoid about their treasure. That's mostly it, although the entry makes passing mention that Emeralds are scared of Reds coming and stealing their treasure. I suppose that could be worked into a campaign somehow.

Another idea that strikes me is having adventurers completely accidentally end up pocketing just one or two coins from an Emerald Dragon's hoard while exploring an ancient volcano, thereby incurring its wrath.

demiurge1138

06-01-2008 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8945997)

Emerald Dragons are the most miserly and parsimonious of Dragonkind. They just do not like people getting their grubby mitts on even the tiniest copper coin from their hoard. Living in volcanoes, they shut themselves away from the world behind elaborate alarm systems. As they get older they gain the ability to cast geas once a day, which isn't bad. I like the word 'geas'. Geas.

In comparison to the Crystal Dragon, the Emerald Dragon's entry is plot hook-lite. They don't like Fire Giants, and they're paranoid about their treasure. That's mostly it, although the entry makes passing mention that Emeralds are scared of Reds coming and stealing their treasure. I suppose that could be worked into a campaign somehow.

I dunno. Geas as a spell is laden with plot hooks, because it's the "make adventurers run your errands, or waste away and die" spell. Like, the emerald dragon geases a bunch of lower-level PCs to do his dirty work, and so they have to plot how to work around the geas to break the spell and get their grim revenge. The "dirty work" in question would probably have to do with tracking down each individual copper from a nest egg the emerald dragon had stolen from it.

noisms

06-01-2008 05:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 8946874)

I dunno. Geas as a spell is laden with plot hooks, because it's the "make adventurers run your errands, or waste away and die" spell. Like, the emerald dragon geases a bunch of lower-level PCs to do his dirty work, and so they have to plot how to work around the geas to break the spell and get their grim revenge. The "dirty work" in question would probably have to do with tracking down each individual copper from a nest egg the emerald dragon had stolen from it.

Yep, that works. That definitely works.

There would have to be some shenanigans, because I think you can only geas one person at a time, and the dragon can only use the spell once a day, so... Maybe he would hold them captive and geas one every morning until the whole lot are sorted.

demiurge1138

06-01-2008 06:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8946909)

Yep, that works. That definitely works.

There would have to be some shenanigans, because I think you can only geas one person at a time, and the dragon can only use the spell once a day, so... Maybe he would hold them captive and geas one every morning until the whole lot are sorted.

For a good aligned group, having one of their own wasting away would probably be enough motivation to be the dragon's minions for a while.

Either that, or the dragon geases one of the party's allies/friends/family members into doing something impossible, dangerous or humiliating unless the PCs cooperate.

noisms

06-02-2008 08:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragon, Gem, Sapphire

I always felt there was something highly unusual about the Sapphire Dragon picture. What exactly is he doing? Standing on his tail? I'd welcome suggestions.

Sapphires are militant, snobbish, high-falutin' lawful neutral types, who don't like drow or dwarves. Well, who does? is the inevitable response. They also love a bit of giant spider - and, really, who doesn't? is the also inevitable response. They breathe an inaudible cone of sound (!) which kicks you arse and also makes you afraid - even if you are immune to fear. That's how scary inaudible sounds are.

One thing I always forget is that Gem and Metallic Dragons have access to Priest spells as well as Wizard ones. I think the TSR creators missed a trick in not having any Dragon Proxies in the Planescape campaign setting. Imagine a Sapphire Dragon Proxy of Wee Jas wandering the multiverse, smiting stuff. That would be "made of awesome and win", as I believe the kids say these days. Yeah, respect'. Bo selecta.

Dragon, Gem, Topaz

I'll let you in on a strange secret that I've never told anyone before. Topaz Dragons are my favourite kind.

Partly it's to do with the weirdness. Why Topaz? I don't think I even know what Topaz is. (I just looked it up on Wikipedia; it's brownie yellow.) Partly it's because they live in coastal areas, and I'm a big fan of coastal areas - I love the idea of adventures in inaccessible cliffs and rocky outcroppings. Mostly it's because they're unfriendly and selfish, and I'm unfriendly and selfish.

A campaign I'd like to run is one where a cult of ignorant backwards Crabmen have begun to worshipping a local Topaz Dragon who has taken to sunning himself on a cliff near where they live. They bring him their babies as sacrifices (they don't mind; they give birth to thousands every year) and in return he goes and beats up the local Sahuagin every so often with his psionics and cones of dehydration. Then some innocent fishermen happen to kill and eat some Crabmen...but it make the Topaz Dragon very, very angry. (Not because he likes the Crabmen, but if humans go around eating them it means less baby crabs for him to eat.)

Mr Jack

06-02-2008 08:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

They breathe an inaudible cone of sound (!) which kicks you arse and also makes you afraid - even if you are immune to fear. That's how scary inaudible sounds are.

Don't mock it. Low frequency sounds are one of the things the US military tried out when it was developing non lethal weaponry.

Malignant Marionette

06-02-2008 11:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8950346)

I always felt there was something highly unusual about the Sapphire Dragon picture. What exactly is he doing? Standing on his tail? I'd welcome suggestions.

He's practicing his crane stance, obviously. Don't disrespect it, you don't want to end up in a kung fu fight against a dragon.

DMH

06-03-2008 02:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Look at the sapphire's breath weapon- it about the only realistic sonic effect (in terms of shape) in the game.

How does one create a cone of sound?

Lugh

06-03-2008 02:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8951724)

Look at the sapphire's breath weapon- it about the only realistic sonic effect (in terms of shape) in the game.

How does one create a cone of sound?

Er, don't most speakers create a cone of sound? That's certainly always the way they look on the diagrams. And, that's more or less in line with my (decidedly less than expert) experience. You get a lot less effect from behind a speaker than from in front of it.

Belchion

06-03-2008 03:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 8950786)

He's practicing his crane stance, obviously. Don't disrespect it, you don't want to end up in a kung fu fight against a dragon.

My grasshopper style is way better than his dragon style!

Now, that is an idea - the characters are member of kung fu schools and their masters are defeated by some mysterious stranger. They have to defeat him - just to find out it is a transformed dragon. Who will prevail - kung fu or sonic blasts?

Intermittently Noble

06-03-2008 04:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8951757)

Er, don't most speakers create a cone of sound? That's certainly always the way they look on the diagrams.

High frequencies generate a cone of sound. Low frequencies generate a ball of sound. So if the effect is so low as to be inaudible, then it should be a simple area effect like fireball. If it's so high as to be inaudible, it should be a cone of sound. If it's some sort of extremely high-pitched SASER, then it should be a line of sound.

Make sense?

Weltenbummler

06-03-2008 05:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Intermittently Noble (Post 8952308)

High frequencies generate a cone of sound. Low frequencies generate a ball of sound. So if the effect is so low as to be inaudible, then it should be a simple area effect like fireball. If it's so high as to be inaudible, it should be a cone of sound. If it's some sort of extremely high-pitched SASER, then it should be a line of sound.

Make sense?

What's better than cybernetic ninja bears with LASERS?

It's militant kung-fu dragons with SASERS!!!!!!

noisms

06-03-2008 01:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8952490)
What's better than cybernetic ninja bears with LASERS?

It's militant kung-fu dragons with SASERS!!!!!!

Those World of Synnibarr people really missed a trick, didn't they?

Kaiten

06-03-2008 02:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8950346)
[u]

Dragon, Gem, Topaz

A campaign I'd like to run is one where a cult of ignorant backwards Crabmen have begun to worshipping a local Topaz Dragon who has taken to sunning himself on a cliff near where they live. They bring him their babies as sacrifices (they don't mind; they give birth to thousands every year) and in return he goes and beats up the local Sahuagin every so often with his psionics and cones of dehydration. Then some innocent fishermen happen to kill an eat some Crabmen...but it make the Topaz Dragon very, very angry. (Not because he likes the Crabmen, but if humans go around eating them it means less baby crabs for him to eat.)

Uh, I think Topaz are my favorite now too. That's an awesome idea.

(un)reason

06-03-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8950346)

Dragon, Gem, Topaz

I'll let you in on a strange secret that I've never told anyone before. Topaz Dragons are my favourite kind.

Partly it's to do with the weirdness. Why Topaz? I don't think I even know what Topaz is. (I just looked it up on Wikipedia; it's brownie yellow.) Partly it's because they live in coastal areas, and I'm a big fan of coastal areas - I love the idea of adventures in inaccessible cliffs and rocky outcroppings. Mostly it's because they're unfriendly and selfish, and I'm unfriendly and selfish.

A campaign I'd like to run is one where a cult of ignorant backwards Crabmen have begun to worshipping a local Topaz Dragon who has taken to sunning himself on a cliff near where they live. They bring him their babies as sacrifices (they don't mind; they give birth to thousands every year) and in return he goes and beats up the local Sahuagin every so often with his psionics and cones of dehydration. Then some innocent fishermen happen to kill and eat some Crabmen...but it make the Topaz Dragon very, very angry. (Not because he likes the Crabmen, but if humans go around eating them it means less baby crabs for him to eat.)

Topaz dragons are great. Most neutral dragons feel like the good dragons, only less likely to kill you if you do something evil. They seem more likely to dispense cryptic wisdom than actually do anything dangerous from the way they're described. Topaz dragons are cranky pains in the ass to deal with, while not actually being bad guys. And their breath weapon is brutal. That strength draining'll knock most fighter types down in effectiveness hugely even if they save. It lets them punch above their weight in the killing stakes, because ability damage was so much harder to deal with back then.

DMH

06-03-2008 08:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Crap, I meant the emerald having the sphere of sound, not the sapphire.

I like the topaz for large lakes as well. If some annoying fishing fleet shows up, the dragon can simply ground the boat at port or over shallows with its breath weapon (which is then damaged by the water rushing into the void).

Deadmanwalking

06-03-2008 08:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I'm aware both of these are a bit late, but I'm indulging my pedantic tendencies today, as well as catching up on the thread:

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)

Dolphin

Dolphins are not Lawful Good, and nor do they have an Intelligence of 11-12. They really don't, PETA girl. They are animals with slightly above-average intelligence who like to make clicky noises.

Um, I'm about as far from PETA as possible, but this is untrue. While certainly not Lawful Good (they have rape gangs, for God's sake*) there is a great deal of evidence that dolphins are at at least Great Ape level intelligence, if not at human level intellect. They have language, and have displayed an understanding of syntax, recognize their own reflections, and are otherwise demonstrably really damn smart. "Very" might be stretching it, but not by that much.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8917932)

[It is not the case that "More than one ship owes its safe arrival in port to the timely intercession and warning of Dolphins." Nor in fact is it the case that one ship does.

In real life? Of course not. But it's not ridiculously unbelievable as compared to Crocodiles in the sewers...

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8925359)

Really, doppelgangers can only sensibly work by targetting NPC's, since I don't see any player responding too well to a DM note that reads, "you're dead, play along."

I'm actually doing almost exactly this in a Delta Green game right now. Well, I'm more possessed than dead in that one, but still. I'd play along in a heartbeat (especially in Resurrection-happy D&D), and I doubt I'm alone in that.

*Yes, really. They behave disturbingly humanly in a lot of ways. Which actually adds to the case for their intelligence.

noisms

06-03-2008 08:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8955103)

Um, I'm about as far from PETA as possible, but this is untrue. While certainly not Lawful Good (they have rape gangs, for God's sake) there is a great deal of evidence that dolphins are at least Great Ape level intelligence, if not at human level intellect. They have language, and have displayed an understanding of syntax, recognize their own reflections, and are otherwise demonstrably really damn smart. "Very" might be stretching it, but not by that much.*

But "very" intelligent (11-12) on the AD&D scale means more intelligent than an average human! That's just crazy. Most animals have an intelligence of 1 according to the MM; I think giving dolphins a 2-4 would be reasonable, or at most a 5-7 for particular geniuses amongst them. (Don't forget rats can recognise faces, cuttlefish have language and crows can use tools, and I'm not sure anybody would give them an intelligence of 11 or 12!)

Weltenbummler

06-03-2008 09:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8955103)

Um, I'm about as far from PETA as possible, but this is untrue. While certainly not Lawful Good (they have rape gangs, for God's sake)*

Yes, really. They behave disturbingly humanly in alot of ways. Which actually adds to the case for their intelligence.*

shrug.. It's a common thing among horses and cattle aswell to box in a mare/cow from two sides to give a third stallion/bull a chance to... ya know.

Not sure if thats a sign of intelligence (or any indication to unicorn or gorgon mating)

Deadmanwalking

06-03-2008 09:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8955127)

But "very" intelligent (11-12) on the AD&D scale means more intelligent than an average human! That's just crazy. Most animals have an intelligence of 1 according to the MM; I think giving dolphins a 2-4 would be reasonable, or at most a 5-7 for particular geniuses amongst them. (Don't forget rats can recognise faces, cuttlefish have language and crows can use tools, and I'm not sure anybody would give them an intelligence of 11 or 12!)

Professional Intelligence researchers are still debating, but evidence seems to be piling up that they really are of near-human, or even full human intellect. Average Intelligence wouldn't be a stretch. I'm not really arguing that the description doesn't pretty them up alot more than it should, but it's not as bad as you were making it out to be.

Also, I'm a Psych student who just finished a class on Comparative (re: animal) Psychology and an obsessive-compulsive pedant.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8955261)

shrug*.. It's a common thing among horses and cattle aswell to box in a mare/cow from two sides to give a third stallion/bull a chance to... ya know.*

Not sure if thats a sign of intelligence (or any indication to unicorn or gorgon mating)

I was referring to their human-like behavior in general, not that specific instance, but I can see where the statement would've been confusing...

Lugh

06-03-2008 10:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8955294)

Professional Intelligence researchers are still debating, but evidence seems to be piling up that they really are of near-human, or even full human intellect. Average Intelligence wouldn't be a stretch. I'm not really arguing that the description doesn't pretty them up alot more than it should, but it's not as bad as you were making it out to be.

So, with the proper training, and some way to breach the language barrier, a dolphin could work at Burger King? Because, honestly, that's my definition of Int 10. You are capable of working the register at Burger King (or other fast food restaurant). Int 8 is the Goodwill shadow jobs, sweeping the floors. While I do agree that dolphins are human-level under certain definitions, I don't, for instance, consider them capable of being mages (which an 11 Int would certainly allow).

kelvingreen

06-03-2008 10:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8955485)

While I do agree that dolphins are human-level under certain definitions, I don't, for instance, consider them capable of being mages.

But dolphin mages would be brilliant. That's enough fo a reason to allow it, right there.

noisms

06-03-2008 10:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8955499)

But dolphin mages would be brilliant. That's enough fo a reason to allow it, right there.

Dolphin mages would be kind of cool.

Clearly what D&D needs is INTELLIGENT ANIMAL variants, a la Chronicles of Narnia.

Just think of the possibilities! Bald Eagle Druids. Chimpanzee Bards. Sperm Whale Mages. Elephant Paladins. Tiger Priests. This needs to be done.

Deadmanwalking

06-03-2008 10:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8955485)

So, with the proper training, and some way to breach the language barrier, a dolphin could work at Burger King? Because, honestly, that's my definition of Int 10. You are capable of working the register at Burger King (or other fast food restaurant). Int 8 is the Goodwill shadow jobs, sweeping the floors. While I do agree that dolphins are human-level under certain definitions, I don't, for instance, consider them capable of being mages (which an 11 Int would certainly allow).

Well, animal intelligences vary every bit as much as human ones*, so an "Average" score would indicate about the same range of intellects as humans. Which is what I'd be inclined to consider them to have. A +0 racial Int mod, so to speak. And in a fantasy setting, I see no reason they wouldn't have Mages (though what they'd do for spell books I have no idea). They don't have hands, hence the lack of tool use and technology, but the evidence seems to support a fair bit of intellect.

*Obviously, in D&D that's not quite true in terms of actual score, but I'd put that down to the differences between a smart chipmunk and a stupid one not mattering at all to those with human level Int.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8955511)

Dolphin mages would be kind of cool.

Clearly what D&D needs is INTELLIGENT ANIMAL variants, a la Chronicles of Narnia.

Just think of the possibilities! Bald Eagle Druids. Chimpanzee Bards. Sperm Whale Mages. Elephant Paladins. Tiger Priests. This needs to be done.

Yes. Yes it does. Mechanics would be a bit tricky, but by no means unworkable...

Kapten

06-03-2008 10:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 8955541)

Well, animal intelligences vary every bit as much as human ones, so an "Average" score would indicate about the same range of intellects as humans. Which is what I'd be inclined to consider them to have. A +0 racial Int mod, so to speak. And in a fantasy setting, I see no reason they wouldn't have Mages (though what they'd do for spell books I have no idea). They don't have hands, hence the lack of tool use and technology, but the evidence seems to support* fair bit of intellect.

Obviously, in D&D that's not quite true in terms of actual score, but I'd put that down to the differences between a smart chipmunk and a stupid one not mattering at all to those with human level Int.*

Yes. Yes it does. Mechanics would be a bit tricky, but by no means unworkable...

Sorry for the threadjack, but what instrument is used to measure animal intelligence? Especially vs human intelligence?

Kapten

06-03-2008 10:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8955511)
Dolphin mages would be kind of cool.

Clearly what D&D needs is INTELLIGENT ANIMAL variants, a la Chronicles of Narnia.

Just think of the possibilities! Bald Eagle Druids. Chimpanzee Bards. Sperm Whale Mages. Elephant Paladins. Tiger Priests. This needs to be done.

I will introduce a sperm whale archmage to my campaign! It fits perfectly with the old and powerful creature. It's the perfect GMPC, powerful enough to be the wise old wizard but logistically constrained from interfering in the PCs' business.

Whitemagebishieboy

06-03-2008 11:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8955511)
Chimpanzee Bards.

This is different from human bards how?
More fur?

Deadmanwalking

06-03-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 8955569)

Sorry for the threadjack, but what instrument is used to measure animal intelligence? Especially vs human intelligence?

Various analytical, problem solving, and language recognition tests, that can be performed by both the creature in question and a human being. It's obviously not perfect, but until we figure out a way to speak to them directly...

Mark Krawec

06-03-2008 11:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 8955595)

*This is different from human bards how?
More fur?*

No vocalists (unless you count yodelling). Plus they can't dance worth a damn with those stumpy little bow legs. On the other hand, they're bad mutha drummers. Plus their arms are so long they can reach from one end of a spinnet keyboard to the other.

kelvingreen

06-04-2008 02:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8955511)

Dolphin mages would be kind of cool.

Clearly what D&D needs is INTELLIGENT ANIMAL variants

With all the templates flying around in 3.X, I'm surprised these didn't make the cut. I'd play an elephant paladin.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 8955595)

*This is different from human bards how?
More fur?*

More fur and better rhythm.

R-90-2

06-04-2008 02:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8956695)

With all the templates flying around in 3.X, I'm surprised these didn't make the cut. I'd play an elephant paladin.

Awaken

Transmutation

Level: Drd 5

Components: V, S, DF, XP

Casting Time: 24 hours

Range: Touch

Target: Animal or tree touched

Duration: Instantaneous

Saving Throw: Will negates

Spell Resistance: Yes

You awaken a tree or animal to humanlike sentience. To succeed, you must make a Will save (DC 10 + the animal's current HD, or the HD the tree will have once awakened).

The awakened animal or tree is friendly toward you. You have no special empathy or connection with a creature you awaken, although it serves you in specific tasks or endeavors if you communicate your desires to it.

An awakened tree has characteristics as if it were an animated object, except that it gains the plant type and its Intelligence, Wisdom, and Charisma scores are each 3d6. An awakened plant gains the ability to move its limbs, roots, vines, creepers, and so forth, and it has senses similar to a human's.

An awakened animal gets 3d6 Intelligence, +1d3 Charisma, and +2 HD. Its type becomes magical beast (augmented animal). An awakened animal can't serve as an animal companion, familiar, or special mount.

An awakened tree or animal can speak one language that you know, plus one additional language that you know per point of Intelligence bonus (if any).

XP Cost

250 XP.

From the D20 SRD.

Sleeper

06-04-2008 05:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Totally off topic for no good reason whatsoever... :)

Hollyphaut CR 12

Elite awakened Indian elephant paladin 4

LG Huge magical beast (augmented animal)

Init -1; Senses detect evil, low-light vision, scent; Listen +16, Spot +14

Languages Common

AC 21, touch 7, flat-footed 23 (-2 size, +7 natural, +7 armor)

hp 186 (17 HD)

Immune disease, fear

Fort +20, Ref +10, Will +12

Speed 30 ft.

Melee slam +22 (2d6+11) and 2 stumps +17 (2d6+5)

Melee gore +22 (2d8+16)

Space 15 ft.; Reach 10 ft.

Base Atk +13; Grp +32

Atk Options smite evil (1/day, +2 atk/+4 dmg)

Special Actions trample 2d8+16 (Reflex half DC 26), turn undead (5/day, +2/+3 dmg)

Spells (CL 2)

1st--divine favor

Spell-Like Abilities (CL 4)

At will--detect evil

Abilities Str 32, Dex 8, Con 22, Int 10, Wis 17, Cha 14

SQ aura of courage (+4 morale bonus/10 ft. radius), aura of good (moderate), divine grace, lay on hands (8 hp/day)

Feats Alertness, Endurance, Iron Will, Skill Focus (Listen), Skill Focus (Sense Motive)

Skills Listen +16, Sense Motive +14, Spot +14

Possessions masterwork huge nonhumanoid half-plate, 450 gp

noisms

06-04-2008 12:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

And so we come to the good-guys...

Dragon, Metallic, Brass

Brass dragons are the weakest of the good dragons, pretty much. Their breath weapon is nothing like as powerful or damaging as some of the others'. They're also the most annoying - sort of like the guy in the office who won't stop rambling on once he's got you in a corner; the dragon will even go so far as to cast spells on you to make you talk to it. You could find yourself slept and waking up buried to the neck in sand until you've had a proper conversation with the beast. I think that's quite an interesting touch, actually. It's rare to see it acknowledged that being Good doesn't mean being Nice, Fun or Friendly.

Brass dragons are also perpetually bullied by Blues. They're eternal rivals, but a Brass' power doesn't really equal a Blue's. Probably their camouflage is better, though. As we already know, Blue dragons have luminescent scales which allow them to remain unseen against the desert sky, but Brass' are yellowy brown and so they win the Dragon Camouflage Award, Desert Section, most years.

I like the Brass dragon picture - it reminds me of a Dimetredon - but it patently wouldn't be able to fly unless those wings are capable of beating literally thousands of times per second.

Dragon, Metallic, Bronze

Another coastal creature for my nascent Topaz Dragon/Crabmen/Sahuagin campaign idea that will never get run, Bronze dragons are hard bastards, what with two breath weapons (lightning and repulsion) and a lot of magic. It seems rather unfair that most of the good dragons get two breath weapons when the evil and neutral ones only get one (and more spells too). That tendency existed quite a lot in 2nd edition - there were lots of powerful evil creatures, but at the end of the day there was always an ever more powerful good being just around the corner. Part of the cloying morality that was an unfortunate reaction against the whole Devil Worship thing.

Bronze Dragons like plundering shipwrecks, which doesn't sound like a very Lawful Good thing to do, but it gives me an idea for an adventure in which a famous heirloom of the king has been lost at sea and taken by a Bronze Dragon, and the PCs have to see if they can persuade the creature to give it back. Needless to say, the dragon would want something in return...

Bronzes also like to polymorph into humanoid shape and live amongst humanoids unobtrusively. There are approximately a hundred billion ways of working that into a campaign, and I'm sure you've already thought of about five just in the course of reading this paragraph.

David J Prokopetz

06-04-2008 02:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8959219)

It seems rather unfair that most of the good dragons get two breath weapons when the evil and neutral ones only get one (and more spells too). That tendency existed quite a lot in 2nd edition - there were lots of powerful evil creatures, but at the end of the day there was always an ever more powerful good being just around the corner. Part of the cloying morality that was an unfortunate reaction against the whole Devil Worship thing.

Of course, it's come full circle these days. What with all the dark-n-gritty settings out there, I find it sort of refreshing to page through a game where good is objectively more powerful than evil.

noisms

06-04-2008 02:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 8959488)

Of course, it's come full circle these days. What with all the dark-n-gritty settings out there, I find it sort of refreshing to page through a game where good is objectively more powerful than evil.

Good point. "Edgy" has got to the stage of being trite, nowadays.

David J Prokopetz

06-04-2008 02:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8959498)
Good point. "Edgy" has got to the stage of being trite, nowadays.

I was finding it trite and overplayed when I was twelve years old - my adolescent power fantasies have always tended more toward "shining paragon of virtue" than "Angsty McTrenchcoat". :p

kelvingreen

06-04-2008 05:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 8957737)
Totally off topic for no good reason whatsoever... :)

Hollyphaunt CR 12

Surely that should be "Holyphaunt"? ;)

That's great. Did you stat this up yourself, or did it come out of a book? Now I want to play an elephant paladin of Ganesh!

noisms

06-04-2008 05:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8959904)
Surely that should be "Holyphaunt"? ;)

That's great. Did you stat this up yourself, or did it come out of a book? Now I want to play an elephant paladin of Ganesh!

Or a Monkey Paladin of that monkey god. Hanuman? My Hindu mythology ain't what it was....

Deadmanwalking

06-04-2008 05:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8959933)
Or a Monkey Paladin of that monkey god. Hanuman? My Hindu mythology ain't what it was....

Hanuman is correct, though he's almost more of a demigod as I understand it...

JRM

06-04-2008 10:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Noism
It seems rather unfair that most of the good dragons get two breath weapons when the evil and neutral ones only get one (and more spells too). That tendency existed quite a lot in 2nd edition - there were lots of powerful evil creatures, but at the end of the day there was always an ever more powerful good being just around the corner. Part of the cloying morality that was an unfortunate reaction against the whole Devil Worship thing.

Although in fairness the most powerful good creatures, Solars and Planetars, date back to 1st edition, as does the metallic dragons' two breath-weapons.

JRM

06-04-2008 10:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
*Hollyphaunt CR 12
Elite awakened Indian elephant paladin 4*

That reminds me, I once wrote up a scenario featuring an awakened dire elephant rogue - when one of those sneak-attacks you, you feel it!

noisms

06-04-2008 10:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 8960793)

Although in fairness the most powerful good creatures, Solars and Planetars, date back to 1st edition, as does the metallic dragons' two breath-weapons.

That's true. Chalk that up to speaking extemporaneously.

David J Prokopetz

06-04-2008 11:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 8960805)

That reminds me, I once wrote up a scenario featuring an awakened dire elephant rogue - when one of those sneak-attacks you, you feel it!

Didn't somebody once crunch the numbers and determine that, due to various quirks of the 3E skill system, elephants make excellent ninjas?

Lugh

06-05-2008 01:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8959219)

Bronze Dragons like plundering shipwrecks, which doesn't sound like a very Lawful Good thing to do, but it gives me an idea for an adventure in which a famous heirloom of the king has been lost at sea and taken by a Bronze Dragon, and the PCs have to see if they can persuade the creature to give it back. Needless to say, the dragon would want something in return...

I don't know. I see it as the dragon equivalent of a super-vegan. "I won't harm any living being in order to get my sustenance, I will only take what fruit naturally falls from the tree." Or, in dragon terms, I won't kill anyone to get their stuff, I'll only take stuff from people that are killed by other people/natural forces/etc.

noisms

06-05-2008 01:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8961490)

I don't know. I see it as the dragon equivalent of a super-vegan. "I won't harm any living being in order to get my sustenance, I will only take what fruit naturally falls from the tree." Or, in dragon terms, I won't kill anyone to get their stuff, I'll only take stuff from people that are killed by other people/natural forces/etc.

"Finders keepers."

Sleeper

06-05-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8959904)

Surely that should be "Holyphaunt"? ;)

That's great. Did you stat this up yourself, or did it come out of a book? Now I want to play an elephant paladin of Ganesh!

Back in the days of 1E, there was a MM2 creature called the hollypha[u?]nt, back when all creatures from the Upper Planes were furry and cute. Quite a few differences, but stole the name (which was obviously inspired by "oliphaunt"). :p

I just took the (Indian) elephant and slapped awakened (+2 HD), the elite stat array, 4 levels of paladin (because 5 would give a pokemount... and I wanted to avoid the image of a huge elephant trying to clamber on a large horse), and checked to see if full plate fell within the budget of a level 4 NPC (not when it's huge... but half-plate worked). Simpler than it sounds because the elephant stat block starts pretty sparse.

kelvingreen

06-05-2008 02:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well, it's nicely done, and looks playable. I'll see if any of the DMs around my way will let me use it! ;)

sim_james

06-05-2008 12:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 8961676)

Back in the days of 1E, there was a MM2 creature called the hollypha[u?]nt, back when all creatures from the Upper Planes were furry and cute.

Hollyphants made it into 2nd edition too, with the Planescape Monstrous Compendium II. I was actually showing my girlfriend some of the "furry and cute" Planescape beasts last night. Man I love sun flies. Happy gnome-faced bugs that fly around singing little songs to themselves.

Hollyphants, baku, malephants... there's a lot of Upper Planar elephant action in Planescape.

noisms

06-05-2008 12:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragon, Metallic, Copper

Copper dragons sound rather like the annoying cousins Brass ones: "incorrigible pranksters, joke tellers and riddlers". They're selfish and greedy too, although I tend to think all dragons should be selfish and greedy at base - even the good ones. It's part of what being a dragon is, no?

Some articles in the MM brush over combat tactics, but others go into considerable detail. The Copper dragon must be up there with the most detailed:

Quote:

"Copper dragons like to taunt and annoy their opponents, hoping they will give up or become angry and act foolishly. Early in an encounter, a copper dragon will jump from one side of an opponent to another, landing on inaccessible or vertical stone surfaces. If there are no such places around a dragon's lair, the dragon will create them ahead of time using stone shape, move earth, and wall of stone. An angry copper dragon will mire its opponents using rock to mud, and will force victims who escape the mud, into it with kicks. Once opponents are trapped in the mud, the dragon will crush them with a wall of stone or snatch them and carry them aloft. When fighting airborne opponents, a dragon will draw its enemies into narrow, stony gorges where it can use its spider climb ability in an attempt to maneuver the enemy into colliding with the walls."

Good stuff. It gives the lie to the idea that earlier editions of AD&D didn't have different tactics for monsters or had oversimplified combat.

I have to admit I never really thought much of the Copper dragon, but re-reading the entry now I can definitely see a niche for a dragon which can cast shape stone, spider climb, wall of stone, move earth, and breathe slowness and acid. Its set of powers really compliment each other and make for a very tough fight. Well done, MM writers. Have a gold star.

Dragon, Metallic, Gold

No matter how many times I read Dragonlance books and entries in D&D bestiaries, Gold Dragon still says 'Smaug' to me - mainly because of John Howe's wonderful pictures. Golds shouldn't be "wise, judicious and benevolent". They should be the embodiment of greed, jealousy and malice.

Ho hum. The designers seem to have taken a very vaguely Chinese route with the Gold Dragon. Its powers are all to do with luck, blessings, and summonings, and it commonly takes a wingless, snake-like form (as in the picture for the entry). Actually I rather like that direction. If anything it just makes a change from all the other dragons, which outside of the Weirdo section are all pretty similar in size and shape. But it also harks back to a now extremely rarely seen era of more mythological, fairy-tale-based, "enchanted" (in the magical sense) fantasy that still had an influence on the game during the 2nd edition era. You only glimpse it rarely in creatures like Brownies, Sylphs, Dryads, Treants and Gold Dragons, but it is definitely there: it is one of the saddest losses from the game in the years that have passed since 2nd edition.

Web Warlock

06-06-2008 02:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

This is a really cool thread.

I just read it all now and enjoyed every bit of it!

Looking forward to more.

Tim

noisms

06-06-2008 10:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Web Warlock (Post 8966560)
This is a really cool thread.

I just read it all now and enjoyed every bit of it!

Looking forward to more.

Tim

I'm glad you enjoyed it. It's highly impressive that you ploughed through the whole lot.

noisms

06-06-2008 06:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Okay guys, I've well and truly dragonned myself out. I don't know why I ever committed to two per entry. So let's get this sucker finished and move on!

Dragon, Metallic, Silver, And Dragon, Weirdo, Lots

Silver Dragon - the Silver is like a more-Westernized, poor-man's version of the Gold Dragon, or perhaps a good version of the Red. They like to polymorph into humans and form great friendships with them; if you were into that sort of game you could probably get some mileage out of a tragic love affair between a dragon and a PC.

Brown Dragon - the first Weirdo dragon, and it is a weird one, looking quite like a wingless crocodilian. Browns form a new prong in the blue-brass rivalry, being hated enemies of the blue dragons themselves. Apparently they "migrated from the desert. Raurin and now frequent much of the wastes in Eastern Mulhorand". And you know what my feelings are on THAT. Grr.

Cloud Dragon - another wingless dragon with a vaguely "Eastern feel"; its breath weapon is a blast of air which works kind of like that bit in The Empire Strikes Back when Darth Vader and Luke have their climactic battle and Vader summons up a force wind. FACT.

Deep Dragon - this is the Drow of dragons, being an evil thing that lives underground. It breathes "flesh corroding" gas. Eww. Deeps like to eat Kuo-Toa. As sashimi, probably.

Mercury Dragon - these live up to their "quicksilver" moniker, being...well, quick and silver. They breathe a beam of light, use telekinesis, talk rather a lot, and are "whimsical" (one of those words that all D&D players should fear).

Mist Dragon - another wingless Eastern one which likes to philosophize and ruminate, and probably stroke its moustaches in a thoughtful way. It breathes "scalding vapour". I think the designers were running out of breath-weapon ideas at this point...

Shadow Dragon - ah, the old favourite. Where would D&D be without stupidly powerful dragons which can drain levels with their breath? I tell you, it wouldn't be a D&D I'd be interested in playing.

Steel Dragon - a sage-like, knowledgeable scientist type, the Steel Dragon always offended my sense of pedantry as a kid by being Lawful Neutral (Good). What was that (Good) doing there? Then I got Planescape and realised how that could kinda sorta make sense. A bit. Now, what do you do if you're a monster designer and you've run out of dragon breath weapon ideas? Do you a) make it toxic gas? b) make it corrosive gas? or c) make it hot vapour gas? Answers on a post card.

Yellow Dragon - "Although the existence of yellow dragons has long been predicted by sages (based on theories of primary colors), the first specimen was spotted only five or so years ago." There is so much wrong with that introduction, I've lost the will to live. Breath weapon: Scorching air mixed with sand.

And, thank Christ, the dragons are over with. Tomorrow....er.... Dragonnes!

*Kills self.

(un)reason

06-06-2008 06:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8969560)

Okay guys, I've well and truly dragonned myself out. I don't know why I ever committed to two per entry. So let's get this sucker finished and move on!

Dragon, Metallic, Silver, And Dragon, Weirdo, Lots

Silver Dragon - the Silver is like a more-Westernized, poor-man's version of the Gold Dragon, or perhaps a good version of the Red. They like to polymorph into humans and form great friendships with them, if you were into that sort of game you could probably get some mileage out of a tragic love affair between a dragon and a PC.

Yeah, silver dragon mating habits are one of D&D's more interesting quirks. (particularly the fact that they probably produce more half dragons than all the other types put together, especially pre 3rd edition where only naturally polymorphing dragons could interbreed with everything under the sun.) Its another example of how broad the metaphorical umbrella of each alignment can be.

Quote:

And, thank Christ, the dragons are over with. Tomorrow....er.... Dragonnes!

*Kills self.

And dragon turtles and pseudodragons and faerie dragons. :D Thats what you get when they're in the game title.

Oskar Breytenbach

06-06-2008 06:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8969560)

Although the existence of yellow dragons has long been predicted by sages (based on theories of primary colors)

I find that line hilarious. Theory of primary colours indeed! What they probably meant to write was "Players keep asking why there are no yellow dragons, so here you go. Don't blame us if it's rubbish."

noisms

06-06-2008 07:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Oskar Breytenbach (Post 8969666)

I find that line hilarious. Theory of primary colours indeed! What they probably meant to write was "Players keep asking why there are no yellow dragons, so here you go. Don't blame us if it's rubbish."

Precisely. I don't think I saw that line as acceptable even at the age of 11.

DMH

06-06-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I used a shadow dragon in 1st ed and never, ever again will I use anything like it. I came up with a variant that uses a stinger that does damage ala the fang dragon's drain. Players hated it because it could strike from any near by shadow (almost like a boggle). Fun times with that second one.

brianm

06-07-2008 12:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8970316)

I used a shadow dragon in 1st ed and never, ever again will I use anything like it. I came up with a variant that uses a stinger that does damage ala the fang dragon's drain. Players hated it because it could strike from any near by shadow (almost like a boggle). Fun times with that second one.

Yeah, I enjoy using shadow dragons in the game, but as NPCs. Frankly, my players have traditionally gone to great lengths to avoid having to fight dragons. Even in 1e, they could be terribly dangerous opponents, and 2e only made them worse with their tail-slaps and wind-whipping wing attacks.

Quote:

And, thank Christ, the dragons are over with. Tomorrow....er.... Dragonnes!

*Kills self.

ROFLMAO! :D

- Brian

noisms

06-07-2008 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Man, I just read through that last entry and I must have made at least two dozen elementary grammar errors. Blame the onset of brain-stem death caused by dragon overload.

EDIT: I just edited it.

Multi-Pass

06-07-2008 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dare I ask what the brown dragon's breath weapon is?

t@nya

06-07-2008 02:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Multi-Pass (Post 8971128)
Dare I ask what the brown dragon's breath weapon is?

It's a powerful acid.

R-90-2

06-07-2008 05:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by t@nya (Post 8971144)
It's a powerful acid.

No bonnacons for us, I guess.

noisms

06-07-2008 12:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragon Turtle

There's a rare touch of poetry in the opening paragraph to this entry: "When a dragon turtle surfaces, it is sometimes mistaken for the reflection of the sun or moon on the water. The turtle's rough, deep green shell is much the same color as the deep water the monster favors, and the silver highlights that line the shell are patterned like light dancing on open water." Don't you just love that image? I wonder who wrote the thing.

A Dragon Turtle is pretty much what you'd expect: a mixture between a Dragon and a Turtle which inhabits a large lake or sea, causing all kinds of mischief. It can destroy ships by swimming underneath and rising up to capsize them - but it can also unleash a breath weapon: scalding steam that does 20-120 points of damage.

Adventure Hook, or rather Adventure Hooks: "Mariners of any experience recognize the territorial claims of dragon turtles and will often make extravagant tributes to the turtle controlling areas necessary for safe and speedy trade." I'm thinking either a) the PCs must pass through a Dragon Turtle's territory for some reason, and have to think up a suitable tribute, or b) the PCs are captured by pirates and offered up as sacrifices themselves...

We see a welcome return of Monster Corpse Armour in this entry. As you would expect, Dragon Turtle shells make excellent shields which also protect against fire and steam attacks. Given that the shells themselves are 40' in diameter, you could probably equip a miniature army.

Now there's an idea: the Dragon Turtle Band; a mercenary group all armed with Dragon Turtle shell shields which are passed down from generation to generation...

Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily

06-07-2008 12:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

That reminds me of the time I wanted to play a fighter equipped with nothing but "pre-owned" materials. DM at the time said no, unfortunately, so I had to do it myself. Wasn't the same, though. :p

I'd forgotten that my inspiration for it was precisely the fact that the book is littered with this stuff. Awesome. :D

demiurge1138

06-07-2008 01:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The last time I was in a game that featured a dragon turtle, the PCs (myself included) killed and ate it, hollowed out its carcass and used its shell as a boat, then threw its baby through the window of a little old lady's house, after she helped us make the boat.

The advantages of a universally chaotic neutral party, I guess. Good times, good times...

Ragnarok_Engine

06-07-2008 02:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8969560)

Yellow Dragon - "Although the existence of yellow dragons has long been predicted by sages (based on theories of primary colors), the first specimen was spotted only five or so years ago." There is so much wrong with that introduction, I've lost the will to live. Breath weapon: Scorching air mixed with sand.

At least that's better than the original iteration of the Yellow Dragon, published in some stupid Dragon magazine article. The main thrust of the article was on how different chromatic dragons interbred using the color wheel as a model, so they introduced the Yellow, Orange, and Purple dragons. This version of the Yellow Dragon breathed, I shit you not, salt.

Oh, and since the Green Dragon (produced by crossbreeding with Blues) breathes chlorine, obviously the Orange Dragon (produced by crossbreeding with Reds) had to breath sodium. Sodium.

EDIT: Looking at the D&D Wiki, looks like the offender was Dragon #65. Although some assclown though it was a good idea to bring these dracobortions back in the Draconomicon.

noisms

06-07-2008 02:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ragnarok_Engine (Post 8973764)

At least that's better than the original iteration of the Yellow Dragon, published in some stupid Dragon magazine article. The main thrust of the article was on how different chromatic dragons interbred using the color wheel as a model, so they introduced the Yellow, Orange, and Purple dragons. This version of the Yellow Dragon breathed, I shit you not, salt.

*Oh, and since the Green Dragon (produced by crossbreeding with Blues) breathes chlorine, obviously the Orange Dragon (produced by crossbreeding with Reds) had to breath sodium. Sodium.

EDIT: Looking at the D&D Wiki, looks like the offender was Dragon #65. Although some assclown though it was a good idea to bring these dracobortions back in the Draconomicon.

Orange Dragon? That's just too funny. How do you breath Sodium, anyway? That's like breathing iron.

I would have had it breath concentrated citric acid...

g026r

06-07-2008 02:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ragnarok_Engine (Post 8973764)

EDIT: Looking at the D&D Wiki, looks like the offender was Dragon #65. Although some assclown though it was a good idea to bring these dracobortions back in the Draconomicon.

I'm now curious as to how the ones in 65 were different from the ones the ones in #38. I guess that's something to ask (un)reason.

Ragnarok_Engine

06-07-2008 02:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8973794)

Orange Dragon? That's just too funny. How do you breath Sodium, anyway? That's like breathing iron.

I would have had it breath concentrated citric acid...

I don't have access to that Dragon, but here's how somebody on ENWorld converted it for 3E before the Draconomicon came out:

Breath Weapon (Su): An orange dragon has one type of breath weapon, a stream of pure liquid sodium. 1/2 damage first round, 1/2 damage second round as per acid. If an attempt is made to wash the sodium off with water, full damage is taken as fire.

If a creature is wet or standing in water, full damage is taken; half as fire, half as acid. In all cases damage is halved if the creature makes it's reflex save.

E.T.Smith

06-07-2008 02:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ragnarok_Engine (Post 8973764)
This version of the Yellow Dragon breathed, I shit you not, salt.

Somewhere in D&D land, an arch-wizard keeps a miniaturized salt-breathing yellow dragon chained to his dinner table solely for mealtime convenience.

noisms

06-07-2008 03:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8973868)
Somewhere in D&D land, an arch-wizard keeps a miniaturized salt-breathing yellow dragon chained to his dinner table solely for mealtime convenience.

Along with a miniaturized version of a rarely seen sub-breed of black dragon.

E.T.Smith

06-07-2008 03:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8973965)
Along with a miniaturized version of a rarely seen sub-breed of black dragon.

I think it should actually called a Sneeze Dragon... crap, now I want to stat one up.

Naxuul

06-07-2008 03:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 8973868)

Somewhere in D&D land, an arch-wizard keeps a miniaturized salt-breathing yellow dragon chained to his dinner table solely for mealttime convenience.

He also has his modified Aurumvorax affectionately known as the Spice Weasal.

BAM!

-Naxuul

DMH

06-07-2008 07:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Nothing about the art for the dragon turtle? I think it is the best piece, even if it is just a snapping turtle.

noisms

06-07-2008 07:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8974416)

Nothing about the art for the dragon turtle? I think it is the best piece, even if it is just a snapping turtle.

Oh yeah, it's a good one. But it's DiTerlizzi, so that's expected. I have to say, my favourite is probably the Gnoll. I'm not sure why; it just seems like the perfect Gnoll to me. The Platonic Gnoll, in fact.

Neil Bishop

06-07-2008 08:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8964082)

(snip) Dragon, Metallic, Gold (snip) The designers seem to have taken a very vaguely Chinese route with the Gold Dragon. Its powers are all to do with luck, blessings, and summonings, and it commonly takes a wingless, snake-like form (as in the picture for the entry). (snip)

Actually this is a legacy from Gary Gygax's 1E days. The original monster manual had the gold dragon illustrated as a wingless vaguely oriental dragon and the pseudo-Latin name was draco orientalis sino dux.

Great thread, BTW.

Hellzon

06-07-2008 11:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Nethack has yellow* and orange dragons.

Ah, we're through the Dragon entry. Is the next mega-entry "Elf"? ;)

*) Acid breath

) Sleeping gas breath

Wakboth

06-08-2008 12:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8969641)

Yeah, silver dragon mating habits are one of D&D's more interesting quirks. (particularly the fact that they probably produce more half dragons than all the other types put together, especially pre 3rd edition where only naturally polymorphing dragons could interbreed with everything under the sun.) Its another example of how broad the metaphorical umbrella of each alignment can be.

"Of all the metallic dragons, silvers spend most of their time polymorphed into different beings, especially humanoids, and are by far the most congenial and friendly towards such creatures. Indeed, some observers (especially copper dragons, who love good gossip) claim they prefer non-draconic shapes entirely, and only settle for draconic mates after a series of doomed relationships with lesser beings. Needless to say, silver dragons are not amused by such scurrilous claims."

-- Bethmoora the Sphinx, "Her Myriad Ways; Or, a Treatise on Love & Procreation Among Various Kinds of Beings. With 48 Woodcut Illustrations!" :D

Wakboth

06-08-2008 12:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8974418)

Oh yeah, it's a good one. But it's DiTerlizzi, so that's expected. I have to say, my favourite is probably the Gnoll. I'm not sure why; it just seems like the perfect Gnoll to me. The Platonic Gnoll, in fact.

The excellent DiTerlizzi gnoll illustration was, I believe, one of the primary influences behind my interest in anthropomorphs. (Also, the werebeasts in the same book. The weretigress... rowr! :p)

noisms

06-08-2008 12:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8974856)

The excellent DiTerlizzi gnoll illustration was, I believe, one of the primary influences behind my interest in anthropomorphs. (Also, the werebeasts in the same book. The weretigress... rowr!:p)

Even more rowr is the Cat Goddess thing in the Planescape Monstrous Compendium II.

R-90-2

06-08-2008 12:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8974914)

Even more rowr is the Cat Goddess thing in the Planescape Monstrous Compendium II.

Animal Lord(Cat). And, yes, yes, yes.

YojimboC

06-08-2008 07:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8969560)

Steel Dragon - a sage-like, knowledgeable scientist type, the Steel Dragon always offended my sense of pedantry as a kid by being Lawful Neutral (Good). What was that (Good) doing there? Then I got Planescape and realised how that could kinda sorta make sense. A bit. Now, what do you do if you're a monster designer and you've run out of dragon breath weapon ideas? Do you a) make it toxic gas? b) make it corrosive gas? or c) make it hot vapour gas? Answers on a post card.

Sorry I'm late, but --

Weren't these guys just the Greyhawk dragons under another name?

6inTruder

06-08-2008 07:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 8975979)
Weren't these guys just the Greyhawk dragons under another name?

Cloud and Mist I believe?

DMH

06-08-2008 08:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

No, he is right. Steel dragon is the name for the Greyhawk dragon in other settings.

(un)reason

06-08-2008 09:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 8977655)
No, he is right. Steel dragon is the name for the Greyhawk dragon in other settings.

Almost, The two types have different set of spell-like abilities. They are almost identical otherwise, and specifically noted as having very recent common ancestors. Dragons do do quite a bit of planet hopping, it seems. But then, dragons are so big, rare, have so many subvariants and even one has such a large ecological impact that logically, the ability to do that is necessary to keep them from either going extinct forever when a rash of dragonslayers comes around or messing up the world when there are too many dragons in one place.

noisms

06-08-2008 09:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 8977728)
Almost, The two types have different set of spell-like abilities. They are almost identical otherwise, and specifically noted as having very recent common ancestors. Dragons do do quite a bit of planet hopping, it seems. But then, dragons are so big, rare, have so many subvariants and even one has such a large ecological impact that logically, the ability to do that is necessary to keep them from either going extinct forever when a rash of dragonslayers come around or messing up the world when there are too many dragons in one place.

The "messing up there world when there are too many dragons in one place" idea might be fun for a campaign.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragonet

If I never see another Dragon again I'll be a happy man, so there's no way Dragonets are getting individual entries.

Faerie Dragonet - The picture of the Faerie Dragonet is so camp it's impossible to take the thing seriously - he's even flopping his wrist forward as if about to break into a rendition of "I'm a little tea-pot, short and stout..." For those who aren't familiar, A Faerie Dragonet is a tiny dragon with butterfly wings which likes the dreaded "pranks, mischief and practical jokes" which always (ahem) lighten up a game. Ventriloquism, Animate Rock, Distort Distance and Forget are particular favourites. Even its breath weapon, a ball of Euphoria Gas, is guaranteed to cause "humourous" and "amusing" effects. Their giggles sound like silver bells tinkling and they especially enjoy fruit pastries. Yes, you did read that sentence right, and no, I'm not making it up.

Firedrake - The Firedrake is a miniature, dog-sized red dragon, complete with tiny fire breath and burning blood. It is notable chiefly for the latter quality; its blood can be stored and used to make firebombs, or flaming weapons (although the mechanical effects of having a fiery sword are not detailed - I can't remember if they are set out in another book).

Pseudodragon - Another small, benign and playful dragon. They aren't very benign in Zangband or TOME, though. I remember losing a lot of low-level characters to Pseudodragons. It was about time we had an instakill monster and Pseudodragons are an added bonus in being a pseudoinstakill one - their stings put you into a coma with a flat 25% chance of death. Their eggs are worth 10,000 gps and their babies 20,000 - so they can definitely be an addition to my Egg Thief campaign (see the Bird entry). Not much else to say about them - they find employment chiefly as familiars, and will deliberately seek out human masters. I got a good belly chuckle from the line "If the human seems overjoyed and promises to take very good care of it, the pseudodragon will accept. If not, it will fly away." Well, that would rule me out, then.

We're almost at the finishing line now. Just Dragonnes to go and then we can get onto interesting things like Driders, Drow, Dryads and Dwarfs. 'D' must surely be the most important letter in the MM alphabet.

kelvingreen

06-08-2008 10:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8977775)

The "messaging up there world when there are too many dragons in one place" idea might be fun for a campaign.

That's sort of what the Fifth Age setting in Dragonlance described. There were fewer dragons, because some bigger ones came from elsewhere and started cannibalising the others, but these bigger ones then take over the world and start "messaging it up".

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8977915)

...A Faerie Dragonet is a tiny dragon with butterfly wings... its breath weapon, a ball of Euphoria Gas... they especially enjoy fruit pastries.

So it's basically the Stoner Dragon, complete with hallucinations and munchies.

JRM

06-08-2008 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8977915)

Dragonet

Pseudodragon - Another small, benign and playful dragon. They aren't very benign in Zangband or TOME, though. I remember losing a lot of low-level characters to Pseudodragons. It was about time we had an instakill monster and Pseudodragons are an added bonus in being a pseudoinstakill one - their stings put you into a coma with a flat 25% chance of death. Their eggs are worth 10,000 gps and their babies 20,000 - so they can definitely be an addition to my Egg Thief campaign (see the Bird entry). Not much else to say about them - they find employment chiefly as familiars, and will deliberately seek out human masters. I got a good belly chuckle from the line "If the human seems overjoyed and promises to take very good care of it, the pseudodragon will accept. If not, it will fly away." Well, that would rule me out, then.

I had a low level elf magic-user/thief with a Pseudodragon familiar once. It was a lot more dangerous than I was - better AC, more hit points, magic resistance, super-stealth ability and a poison sting with a -2 save. My character didn't even have a Sleep spell when he started out. Oh, I miss those games...

noisms

06-09-2008 11:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 8978064)

I had a low level elf magic-user/thief with a Pseudodragon familiar once. It was a lot more dangerous than I was - better AC, more hit points, magic resistance, super-stealth ability and a poison sting with a -2 save. My character didn't even have a Sleep spell when he started out. Oh, I miss those games...

That reminds me of a character in my current game, a halfling cleric. He's powerful now, but when he started off he had a pet skunk which was more dangerous than he was.

Chevelle

06-09-2008 09:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

This is a fantastic thread Noisms. I quit lurking here after the signal to noise ratio went downhill in the wake of things like the motivational posters thread. Now I'm kicking myself. This thread is full of all the best things about this board, creativity, game ideas, information, and nostalgia. Nice work!

I just read the entire thing and I made some notes along the way...

Centaur - I know that Piers Anthony is essentially persona non grata here but his centaurs are the best I've read in fantasy. They're generally interesting, well-developed characters and run from wild crazy injuns to scholars. The other smart thing is that they're the archers. Having a four-legged base would be perfect for handling a bow.

Numanoid's idea for the doppelganger Secret Invasion - brilliant! Sign me up for that game!

Yellow Dragon - The yellow lizard that comes to mind is the beautiful (and sadly critically endangered) Chinese Alligator. I'd make them into the yellow dragon. A lower breed, littoral, it's breath weapon something "realistic" like a jet of water that can stun a water buffalo, and kill a deer or a human. It swims up rivers eats livestock and fishermen, setting traps with a cruel cunning. Being an "Eastern" type of story I'd have the dragon's arrival in the river be seen by the locals as some sort of Karmic consequence, like the original novel Jaws. The PCs arrive to help deal with it, and unravel the fishing village's corruption.

zanshin

06-09-2008 11:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Just wanted to say that I shyed away from this thread initially, as my D&D experience was 1e and 3e, so I didnt think it would have the nostalgia value for me of the Dragon/1e DMG threads.

What it is is brilliantly, imaginatively , wittily written. Thank you noisms , a lot.

noisms

06-09-2008 11:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Chevelle (Post 8981717)

Yellow Dragon - The yellow lizard that comes to mind is the beautiful (and sadly critically endangered) Chinese Alligator. I'd make them into the yellow dragon. A lower breed, littoral, it's breath weapon something "realistic" like a jet of water that can stun a water buffalo, and kill a deer or a human. It swims up rivers eats livestock and fishermen setting traps with a cruel cunning. Being an "Eastern" type of story I'd have the dragon's arrival in the river be seen by the locals as some sort of Karmic consequence, like the original novel Jaws. The PCs arrive to help deal with it, and unravel the fishing village's corruption.

First post in the thread, and it's already a good one. Keep it up, and thanks for the kind words. ;)

noisms

06-09-2008 11:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by zanshin (Post 8981936)

Just wanted to say that I shyed away from this thread initially, as my D&D experience was 1e and 3e, so I didnt think it would have the nostalgia value for me of the Dragon/1e DMG threads.

What it is is brilliantly, imaginatively , wittily written. Thank you noisms , a lot.

You're welcome, and thanks! Glad you like it. I enjoy writing it (for the most part... ;)

noisms

06-09-2008 11:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dragonne

The Dragonne is quite an odd idea, in my opinion. Is there any reason for the Lion/Dragon combination? It seems a little...uninspired. I'd love to see something like a Rhinoceros-Dragon, or a Bear-Dragon, or a Turtle-Dra....No, wait...

The Dragonne is Yet Another Riff on the venerable line of hybrid monsters, although I much prefer proper mythical ones like Chimeras and Manticores. It's reasonably tough, with reasonably powerful special attacks (a roar which causes weakness, deafness and fear) and it gives a reasonable amount of experience as a reward. But this is AD&D, dammit! Who wants reasonable when you can have Grossly Unfair!?

The entry also sounds as if it was written by two different people. Probably Zeb Cook wrote the first bit: "Possessing some of the most dangerous qualities of a lion and a brass dragon, the dragonne is a vicious and deadly hunter, and a threat to many who travel in warmer climates." It's a monster, rarr, etc. But then PETA girl finishes off the entry: "Dragonnes are not necessarily aggressive toward strangers, and the creature's reputation as a mindless devourer of helpless travelers is more the product of ignorance than well-researched fact." It's just misunderstood, boo hoo, etc.

Dragonnes give birth to eggs, although unfortunately prices aren't given. Still, egg-thief campaign, baby. Egg-thief campaign.

Wakboth

06-10-2008 12:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always thought dragonnes were somehow based on the Chinese lion dogs. (I don't think I've ever used, or faced, one in any game, either.)

As for the egg-thief campaign, wouldn't the ultimate prize be building a suit of armor from the shards of a roc's eggs? :D

Thranguy

06-10-2008 02:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 8974707)

Nethack has yellow and orange dragons.*

Ah, we're through the Dragon entry. Is the next mega-entry "Elf"? ;)

No, there's "Dwarf" coming up, followed by "Elemental" before you get to "Elf".

(Then, IIRC, a mega entry for Faeries, then Giants and Golems. The mega-entries are all pretty front-loaded, at least; no many in the later alphabet.)

(Thinking how interminable 'D' is now, remember that in most versions it would have 'Demon', 'Devil', and 'Daemon' in it on top of what it has now.)

6inTruder

06-10-2008 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8982219)

I always thought dragonnes were somehow based on the Chinese lion dogs. (I don't think I've ever used, or faced, on in any game, either.)

Fu/Foo Dogs/Lions. They're in OA(1ed anyway) and the Kara-Tur compendium.

Chevelle

06-10-2008 07:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 8982802)

(Thinking how interminable 'D' is now, remember that in most versions it would have 'Demon', 'Devil', and 'Daemon' in it on top of what it has now.)

Totally. I was just about to post that.

Also, the Dragon Turtle and Dragonne are two of Tramp's best illustrations from the 1st ed MM. Iconic! They'd make great tatoos.

noisms

06-10-2008 09:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8983343)
Fu/Foo Dogs/Lions. They're in OA(1ed anyway) and the Kara-Tur compendium.

They're also in one of the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums (Compendia?), I think. I'm not 100% sure.

Brutus

06-10-2008 10:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8984583)
They're also in one of the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums (Compendia?), I think. I'm not 100% sure.

Definitely, can't remember whether it's in compendium 1 or 2 though. We'd never have this much fun with the planescape creature books though. They're not nearly silly enough.

noisms

06-10-2008 09:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dryad

I like Dryads. For starters, I like their ambiguity; on the one hand they're sexy elf-maidens who want to seduce you, but on the other they're dangerous temptresses who might ensnare you with their magic for ever. On the one hand they're a useful source of information because they know their surroundings intimately and will share it if you're nice, but on the other hand if you're too nice you could end up being their "amorous slave" (as the book puts it) for the rest of your years. Secondly, I really like the MM monsters who you aren't supposed to kill and take their stuff. It adds much more depth to both adventures and to the game generally to have creatures who are to be dealt with in more subtle ways.

Basically all a Dryad can do to harm you is to cast her special Charm spell, which is more powerful than a regular charm person. If your Charisma is 16 or more, watch out - you could end up as one of the aforementioned "amorous slaves", with only a 50% chance of ever being seen again, and even that after 1d4 years have passed. (This is another argument for using Charisma as a dump stat.)

And that's the main plot hook, I suppose, other than the "providing information" shtick. It might be rather fun to have a PC who starts the campaign having literally just escaped from a four year stint as an "amorous slave" of a Dryad. Of course, another angle is to have the PCs trying to rescue somebody from the clutches of Dryads, be it a member of their own party or somebody else. Needless to say, the Dryads might agree to release said somebody, provided that the PCs do something for them in return... like going and killing a local coven of Hags.

JRM

06-11-2008 01:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8980131)

That reminds me of a character in my current game, a halfling cleric. He's powerful now, but when he started off he had a pet skunk which was more dangerous than he was.

Bah, that familiar stinks in comparison to my character's!:)

JasonK

06-11-2008 02:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8986318)

It might be rather fun to have a PC who starts the campaign having literally just escaped from a four year stint as an "amorous slave" of a Dryad.

Brilliant!

Quote:

Of course, another angle is to have the PCs trying to rescue somebody from the clutches of Dryads, be it a a member of their own party or somebody else. Needless to say, the Dryads might agree to release said somebody, provided that the PCs do something for them in return... like going and killing a local coven of Hags.

Also cool, yeah, as long as you make it obvious to the players that killing the dryad or chopping down her tree is a sure way of trapping the rescued. Otherwise...

~ jason

Wakboth

06-11-2008 03:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8986318)

It might be rather fun to have a PC who starts the campaign having literally just escaped from a four year stint as an "amorous slave" of a Dryad.

"Going into the dungeons, where there are no trees or plants, with a bunch of hairy dwarves, smelly half-orcs and weedy wizards, with not a woman in sight? Sign me iup, quick!" :D

Whitemagebishieboy

06-11-2008 07:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8986318)
[u]"amorous slave"

Dryads are CG aren't they? What are CG critters doing with love slaves?

Sleeper

06-11-2008 08:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 8988782)
Dryads are CG aren't they? What are CG critters doing with love slaves?

Assauging their guilt with lots of sex.

The alignment system isn't so absolute that good girls can't do bad things. And it's easy to rationalize. After all, she's taking really good care of him. And he really, really, doesn't seem to mind. Or maybe the average dryad just assumes it's her own natural allure, and doesn't realize it's magically-enhanced. Which might cause her to undergo a major moral crisis when the truth is exposed.

see

06-11-2008 10:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 8988782)
Dryads are CG aren't they? What are CG critters doing with love slaves?

They're CG in 3e, but they were Neutral in the 2e Monstrous Manual.

noisms

06-11-2008 12:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

It's funny how alignments migrate across the editions like that. The clearest example for me is Orcs. They were Lawful Evil in 2nd edition, but suddenly became Chaotic Evil in 3rd.

demiurge1138

06-11-2008 12:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 8989466)
They're CG in 3e, but they were Neutral in the 2e Monstrous Manual.

And there was a movement towards the end of 3e to bring them back into neutrality. The Monster Manual V featured the "verdant reaver", a plant-y gorilla thing. When a dryad keeps a charmed love slave for too long, the mortal turns into a nature guardian spirit. The entry said that good dryads rotated their lovers out to prevent such a fate, evil ones purposefully created these reavers, and neutral ones either created them as a punishment for mortals who deserved it or just because they forget.

Now that's got some good plot hooks in it.

noisms

06-11-2008 04:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dwarf

Is there much to say about Dwarves than you already know? Probably not. I like them, though. "Dwarf Fighter" is pretty much my favourite race/class combination in D&D, although these days I try to do something a little different with them (like basing their culture on the quasi-Babylonian shtick that Warhammer Chaos Dwarfs had, or making them the dominant race in the world, or such like). I'm not a big fan of the monoculturalism though. I'd like to see a campaign setting with properly developed, and interesting/different Dwarven (and Elven) societies.

Hmm....reading through the entry, what stands out and makes me go, "Oh, well I never"?

- Dwarves use bears and wolves as guards, sometimes. I'd forgotten about that.
- "A dwarven clan not already attached to a city or mine travels until it finds an outpost where it can begin to ply a trade." That's usable, in a rather low-grade sort of way. Traveling dwarven clan moves into the area, causes trouble, PCs have to sort it out, blah blah.
- Dwarven-made things fetch 20% extra when they are sold.
- Mountain dwarves like spears a whole bunch.
- Er, that's it.

I'll do Derro and Duergar in another entry.

kelvingreen

06-11-2008 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8990604)

although these days I try to do something a little different with them (like basing their culture on the quasi-Babylonian shtick that Warhammer Chaos Dwarfs had, or making them the dominant race in the world, or such like)

Tangent! Are the Chaos Dwarves still about in Warhammer canon? Or did they get retconned out between editions? They've always been one of my favourite races from that setting, as they seemed so original and different from all the other stock fantasy goings on. Angry coal-mining dwarves that lived in pyramid-ziggurats, had extensive knowledge of firearms and genetic engineering (didn't they invent Black Orcs as a slave race?), worshipped lammasu and wore really funky hats. I'd love to use them in WFRP.

One generic fantasy setting I homebrewed (for AD&D2, I think) many years ago had a dominant dwarven nation which used minotaurs as a slave race and generally weren't too nice. I think I may have been influenced by the Chaos Dwarves with that one!

JasonK

06-11-2008 06:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

"Finds an outpost," given the traditional dwarven association with mines, reads to me a little like "clears out a dungeon." Which I guess is a plot-hook or two right there. The PCs are all dwarves who want to clear a dungeon of its monster denizens so that they can take over and set up shop (though, for variety, I suppose they should recruit a human wizard and a halfling thief, first...).

Alternately, the dwarves are npcs and are honestly just skilled craftsmen and they need to hire the PCs to do their dirty work for them. (Which is sort of funny, in a way; the PCs are effectively kicking the monsters out of their natural habitat to make room for a rival species.)

That said, I've never been sold on dwarves as mine-dwelling clannish folk. I'm sure they have mines, of course, since they need to get their raw goods from somewhere, and I believe the family impulse would be as strong for them as any other medieval-type society. But, ultimately, I prefer to think of my dwarves as feudal Mountain Kings. I see them living in castles (with towers, crenelations, ramparts, all that stuff) that rise up into the air from the tops of the mountains, almost cut out of the rock. Each castle has a single king or thane, greedy, tricky and steeped in ancient lore. (In my mind, dwarven kings are wiry where their subjects are thick, and break the curve on the dwarven height averages. Plus they can turn into badgers or ravens. I like pushing a little mythology back into my d&d.)

Dwarves will travel, for certain, but only because they're on the road to answer a commission. I see a small team of dwarves, hired to forge a special sword for a human king, one tied to his land and so, of necessity, made there. There's a cart, in the back of which is a runed anvil and all the tools of the dwarves' trade. They move down the long road in winter at a gnomish pace, cloaks pulled tight, only their thick, frost-rimed beards showing. And with them, a guard of honor, yes, the great mountain bears.

(Because of their association with goblins and orcs, I just don't see wolves being good pets to dwarves.)

~ jason

noisms

06-11-2008 06:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Great ideas, guys. Regarding Chaos Dwarves, I don't think they're around any more in the Warhammer canon, but I haven't played the game for something like 10 years so I can't be sure. I loved them, but they were always too expensive for me as a kid - they had no plastic models, only lead ones, as far as I can remember. I loved the Bull Centaurs. They were fantastic.

I remember reading somewhere on the net a person's idea for Dwarves based on Japanese culture. I quite liked that thought, although Japanese culture is way overdone in RPGs. I think Zulus would be a good fit for Dwarves - fierce, proud warriors who place law and order so high that they will literally walk off a cliff if their king commands it.

Lugh

06-11-2008 11:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8990783)
incredible dwarven awesomeness snipped

Hory clap! I think you just revitalized dwarves for my campaign world. Sure, there's nothing revolutionary there. But, just enough touches to give them back some cool points.

Chevelle

06-12-2008 12:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8990783)
"Finds an outpost," given the traditional dwarven association with mines, reads to me a little like "clears out a dungeon." Which I guess is a plot-hook or two right there. The PCs are all dwarves who want to clear a dungeon of it monster denizens so that they can take over and set up shop (though, for variety, I suppose they should recruit a human wizard and a halfling thief, first...).

Alternately, the dwarves are npcs and are honestly just skilled craftsmen and they need to hire the PCs to do their dirty work for them. (Which is sort of funny, in a way; the PCs are effectively kicking the monsters out of their natural habitat to make room for a rival species.)

~ jason

Maybe the best rationale for a dungeon crawl I've ever heard. Throw in some kind of holy relic or magical artifact at the bottom of the mine, and you've got good reason for other-than-dwarves to go a-dungeoneering with the dwarven expedition.

Wakboth

06-12-2008 12:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8990878)

Great ideas, guys. Regarding Chaos Dwarves, I don't think they're around any more in the Warhammer canon, but I haven't played the game for something like 10 years so I can't be sure. I loved them, but they were always too expensive for me as a kid - they had no plastic models, only lead ones, as far as I can remember. I loved the Bull Centaurs. They were fantastic.

I think the Chaos Dwarves haven't been explicitly written out of Warhammer, the way, say, Squats were in 40k. So as far as I know, they're still out there on the Plain of Zharr, with their hordes of hobgoblin slaves. They haven't been given any detail in a while, though.

Dwarves, in general, tend to be a bit under-used race, especially compared to elves. Maybe it's because of the whole "stolid, hard-working, taciturn, suspicious of outsiders" thing...

Kapten

06-12-2008 12:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8991691)

I think the Chaos Dwarves haven't been explicitly written out of Warhammer, the way, say, Squats were in 40k. So as far as I know, they're still out there on the Plain of Zharr, with their hordes of hobgoblin slaves. They haven't been given any detail in a while, though.

Dwarves, in general, tend to be a bit under-used race, especially compared to elves. Maybe it's because of the whole "stolid, hard-working, taciturn, suspicious of outsiders" thing...

You have to factor in that elves look good while dwarves as a rule are pretty ugly ;)

Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily

06-12-2008 12:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Hee. Strike the Earth! :D

noisms

06-12-2008 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8991691)

I think the Chaos Dwarves haven't been explicitly written out of Warhammer, the way, say, Squats were in 40k. So as far as I know, they're still out there on the Plain of Zharr, with their hordes of hobgoblin slaves. They haven't been given any detail in a while, though.

Dwarves, in general, tend to be a bit under-used race, especially compared to elves. Maybe it's because of the whole "stolid, hard-working, taciturn, suspicious of outsiders" thing...

Don't get me started on Dwarves vs. Elves. What I will say is that Dwarves are my favourite non-human race both in D&D and Warhammer, and it's a crying shame that they're so underappreciated. They only ever seem to get the comic relief job, e.g. Gimli in the LOTR films.

Oskar Breytenbach

06-12-2008 01:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I am very fond of dwarfs. Elves make me want to vomit: especially the ones in Lord of the Rings.

Dwarfs are practical, technologically advanced, enjoy beer, and have awesome beards. Elves prance through the trees and pretend they are better than everyone else. It's no contest which is better.

JasonK

06-12-2008 02:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8990878)

I remember reading somewhere on the net a person's idea for Dwarves based on Japanese culture. I quite liked that thought, although Japanese culture is way overdone in RPGs. I think Zulus would be a good fit for Dwarves - fierce, proud warriors who place law and order so high that they will literally walk off a cliff if their king commands it.

The Burning Wheel game I'm kinda sorta playing in right now has dwarves that are very Japanese. I thought that Japanese folklore had it's own particular form of dwarf, which might be interesting myths to use as a basis instead of western ones, but I can't now remember what they're called or find word of them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 8991530)

Hory clap! I think you just revitalized dwarves for my campaign world. Sure, there's nothing revolutionary there. But, just enough touches to give them back some cool points.

Thanks. :o It's pretty much the take I went with last time I designed a game world, and for the exact same reason - I wanted to keep dwarves recognizeable, but put some of the cool back into them.

~ jason

Littleredfox

06-12-2008 04:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8986318)

Dryad

And that's the main plot hook, I suppose, other than the "providing information" shtick. It might be rather fun to have a PC who starts the campaign having literally just escaped from a four year stint as an "amorous slave" of a Dryad.

It's a simple step from Dryads charming people to keep thier trees from being cut down to organised crime. :) Then the senior members of the Bardic Colleges have the Dryad Mafia remove up and coming new talent thats not singing to the approved songsheet. Some get released years later, but most get passed on to the Rusalka when the Dryads get bored of them...

noisms

06-12-2008 10:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 8992547)

The Burning Wheel game I'm kinda sorta playing in right now has dwarves that are very Japanese. I thought that Japanese folklore had it's own particular form of dwarf, which might be interesting myths to use as a basis instead of western ones, but I can't now remember what they're called or find word of them.

Kobito, probably. I think they're a bit like gnomes. For someone who lives in Japan I'm not much of a one for the mythology.

SuperG

06-12-2008 11:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8991691)

I think the Chaos Dwarves haven't been explicitly written out of Warhammer, the way, say, Squats were in 40k. So as far as I know, they're still out there on the Plain of Zharr, with their hordes of hobgoblin slaves. They haven't been given any detail in a while, though.

Dwarves, in general, tend to be a bit under-used race, especially compared to elves. Maybe it's because of the whole "stolid, hard-working, taciturn, suspicious of outsiders" thing...

They're still there in the background, trading weapons to the Ogres in exchange for slaves, and binding Daemons inside giant warmachines for the usage of Chaos Warlords (the Hellcannon is a War Machine crewed by Chaos Dwarfs).

That said, their 'most recent' Army List (a mere two pages published ~6 years ago iirc) was banned from the latest UKGT, so the /army itself/ suffers from lack of support.

g026r

06-12-2008 12:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by WhammeWhamme (Post 8994836)

That said, their 'most recent' Army List (a mere two pages published ~6 years ago iirc) was banned from the latest UKGT, so the /army itself/ suffers from lack of support.

Wikipedia has a recent edit claiming that GW is supposed to be releasing an updated army list for them within the next year. However, like so much stuff on Wikipedia, it's [\[citation needed\]](#).

noisms

06-12-2008 01:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

What we need is for somebody to stat up AD&D Bull Centaurs and Great Taurus.

noisms

06-12-2008 04:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Dwarf, Evil

The second Dwarf installment is the Evil Dwarves - Derro and Duergar. I like them both; as with 'regular' Dwarves I think they're highly under-rated. One of my campaigns featured a long-running feud with a Duergar nation who collectively functioned as the Big Bad, and I've got lots of mileage out of Derro too, in the past.

Derro were apparently "discovered by Mind Flayers 500 years ago, and by Drow shortly after that." Where are the roll-eyes smileys when you need them? They are basically Dwarfs, but with blonde hair and "skin the colour of an iced over lake" - which is to say, "white with bluish undertones", as the MM helpfully explains. They like magic and slaves rather a lot, which puts them in the same sort of area as Warhammer Chaos Dwarves; has there ever been a fantasy setting where good Dwarves use magic?

The Derro are Social Darwinians; they fight a continual war against other Underdark races in an effort to weed out their weakest members. Damn Eugenicists.

My favourite aspect of the Derro is their God, Diinkarazan. He has a whole layer of the Abyss as his lair - The Prison of the Mad God - and I always wanted to run a Planescape campaign in which the PCs think they are on a mission for good but, unbeknownst to them, are being tricked into releasing him.

Duergar are a "malevolent breed" of grey-looking Dwarves who live in the deepest, darkest places. They are a bit like Dwarves taken to the *n*th degree; where greed and xenophobia are somewhat charming in a Dwarf, in the Duergar those characteristics are pretty much the only personality they have.

Duergar are rather underdeveloped. In the campaign I ran they were the citizens of a commonwealth of city states deep in a mountain range, who had uncovered something Dark and Terrible with their endless mining. The Dark and Terrible thing drove their rulers mad and convinced them that their destiny was endless conquest. Cheesy, but it worked rather well in the end.

kelvingreen

06-12-2008 05:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8994653)

Kobito, probably. I think they're a bit like gnomes. For someone who lives in Japan I'm not much of a one for the mythology.

In the Shadowrun Companion, there are regional variants on the standard SR races, including, inexplicably, Drow. I'm pretty sure there was a Japanese dwarf in that, and I think they gave it a traditional/mythological name. But since I don't remember the name, this has all been useless information.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995047)

What we need is for somebody to stat up AD&D Bull Centaurs and Great Taurus.

YES.

Weltenbummler

06-12-2008 06:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8995705)

In the Shadowrun Companion, there are regional variants on the standard SR races, including, inexplicably, Drow. I'm pretty sure there was a Japanese dwarf in that, and I think they gave it a traditional/mythological name. But since I don't remember the name, this has all been useless information.

Shadowrun Drow are awesome. If I remember it right, they're dark black-blue not because of their skin, but because they've got fine, dark black-blue fur covering their body.

So they're not only Drow, but also Furies.

And given that it's Shadowrun, you load them up on Katanas, Uzi's, Trenchcoats and Cypernetics.

Katana-wielding cyber-samurai-furry-dark-elves! It doesn't get better than this. Seriously.

kelvingreen

06-12-2008 06:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8995795)

Katana-wielding cyber-samurai-furry-dark-elves! It doesn't get better than this. Seriously.

When you put it like that, the awesomeness is obvious. ;)

Elemental

06-12-2008 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8990690)

Tangent! Are the Chaos Dwarves still about in Warhammer canon? Or did they get retconned out between editions? They've always been one of my favourite races from that setting, as they seemed so original and different from all the other stock fantasy goings on. Angry coal-mining dwarves that lived in pyramid-ziggurats, had extensive knowledge of firearms and genetic engineering (didn't they invent Black Orcs as a slave race?), worshipped lammasu and wore really funky hats. I'd love to use them in WFRP.

Another cool thing I remember was that using magic was so unnatural to them that their sorcerers would slowly turn into stone. Their High Priest was almost completely petrified, and had to use artificial steam-powered limbs to move around.

Wood

06-12-2008 06:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 8990690)

Tangent! Are the Chaos Dwarves still about in Warhammer canon? Or did they get retconned out between editions? They've always been one of my favourite races from that setting, as they seemed so original and different from all the other stock fantasy goings on. Angry coal-mining dwarves that lived in pyramid-ziggurats, had extensive knowledge of firearms and genetic engineering (didn't they invent Black Orcs as a slave race?), worshipped lammasu and wore really funky hats. I'd love to use them in WFRP.

One generic fantasy setting I homebrewed (for AD&D2, I think) many years ago had a dominant dwarven nation which used minotaurs as a slave race and generally weren't too nice. I think I may have been influenced by the Chaos Dwarves with that one!

The evil dwarves in Confrontation are pretty amazing, too - underground demons catch the ordinary dwarves, skin them and inhabit their stitched-together bodies. And they keep their souls in little voodoo dolls. They're big on miracles rather than magic (Confrontation and its spin-offs has different systems for divine miracles and magic).

noisms

06-12-2008 06:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Elemental (Post 8995851)

Another cool thing I remember was that using magic was so unnatural to them that their sorcerers would slowly turn into stone. Their High Priest was almost completely petrified, and had to use artificial steam-powered limbs to move around.

You're right. What was the guy's name? I've completely forgotten. Didn't Chaos Dwarfs also have their own spells? I really liked the old Warhammer magic system, with all the different schools of Battle Mage - like Grey Wizards, Amber Wizards, Amethyst Wizards...

noisms

06-12-2008 06:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wood (Post 8995854)

The evil dwarves in Confrontation are pretty amazing, too - underground demons catch the ordinary dwarves, skin them and inhabit their stitched-together bodies. And they keep their souls in little voodoo dolls. They're big on miracles rather than magic (Confrontation and its spin-offs has different systems for divine miracles and magic).

Enlighten me - what's Confrontation?

Neil Bishop

06-12-2008 07:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8989860)

It's funny how alignments migrate across the editions like that. The clearest example for me is Orcs. They were Lawful Evil in 2nd edition, but suddenly became Chaotic Evil in 3rd.

Actually, orcs were chaotic evil in the blue book released just before AD&D1E so the 3E migration was consistent, if you like, with earlier canon.

kelvingreen

06-12-2008 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995870)

You're right. What was the guy's name? I've completely forgotten. Didn't Chaos Dwarfs also have their own spells? I really liked the old Warhammer magic system, with all the different schools of Battle Mage - like Grey Wizards, Amber Wizards, Amethyst Wizards...

Astragoth High Priest of Hashut, according to this list. What a fun army list that was. That mid-edition (4th was it?) version of the Warhammer Magic rules was great fun too, especially the good old Heart of Woe magic item.

Malignant Marionette

06-12-2008 10:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995871)

Enlighten me - what's Confrontation?

It's a french fantasy miniature game. Used to be a small game played with twelve or so highly detailed metal miniatures. As the edition changed, the game is now played with 40k-sized forces and all new miniatures are made in prepainted plastic. Here's a linky to their webstore if you want to take a look at the minis, the leftmost of the three links takes you to the plastic stuff, the rightmost to the metal stuff and the middle one to their sci-fi game. http://www.rackham-store.com/index_us.htm

And for those too impatient to browse the store, here's some of the aforementioned dwarves. They won't be available in plastic, being one of the races that got removed from the game and only have the old (still available) miniatures plus a pdf army list. You know, kind of like chaos dwarves. ;)

Troopers: <http://www.rackham-store.com/boutiqu...MRAG1copie.jpg>

Mage: <http://www.rackham-store.com/boutiqu...MGM02copie.jpg>

Monster (coolest mini ever): http://www.rackham-store.com/boutiqu...UKNMBO03_1.jpg

Lugh

06-12-2008 10:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995620)
has there ever been a fantasy setting where good Dwarves use magic?

Warlords of the Accordlands does. The basic story of the dwarves is that they are the constant last bastion keeping the forces of Hell contained deep within the Earth. And, those demons aren't your peaceful, white-collar prisoners either. Every single day is Attica, only with hellfire and big claws and mind-shattering impossibilities.

Unfortunately, the dwarves do such a good job that no one on the surface is really aware there's even a battle going on. So, they tend to dismiss the efforts of the dwarves, and don't understand why they're so grumpy and fatalistic.

The dwarves do get some magic, which, in D&D terms, is largely clerical.

E.T.Smith

06-13-2008 01:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995620)
Dwarf, Evil
Derro were apparently "discovered by Mind Flayers 500 years ago, and by Drow shortly after that." Where are the roll-eyes smileys when you need them? They are basically Dwarfs, but with blonde hair and "skin the colour of an iced over lake" - which is to say, "white with bluish undertones", as the MM helpfully explains. They like magic and slaves rather a lot...

An example of one of the more dubious (and anachronistic) influences on D&D, the Derro are copied pretty much verbatim from the infamous Shaver Mysteries, a conspiracy theory so nuts even other conspiracy theorists won't go near it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wikipedia
These Dero still lived in the cave cities, according to Shaver, kidnapping surface-dwelling people by the thousands for meat or torture, and using the fantastic "ray" machines that the great ancient races left behind to project tormenting thoughts and voices into our minds (reminiscent of schizophrenia's "influencing machines" such as the Air loom). Dero could be blamed for nearly all misfortunes, from minor "accidental" injuries or illnesses to airplane crashes and catastrophic natural disasters. Women especially were singled out for brutal treatment, including rape, and Dash notes that "Sado-masochism was one of the prominent themes of Shaver's writings." [3] Though generally confined to their caves, Shaver claimed that the Deros sometimes traveled by spaceships or rockets, and had dealings with equally evil extraterrestrial beings. Shaver claimed first-hand knowledge of the Dero and their caves, insisting he had been their prisoner for several years.

noisms

06-13-2008 01:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I had no idea about that. That wikipedia article is one of the strangest things I've ever read, although a few years ago a paranoid schizophrenic enacted a massive letterbox campaign in the neighbourhood I was living in then; we all received garbled essays about creatures living "under the river" who were out to get the author. It sounds very similar to Shaver. Very sad what mental illness can do to people - it also turns me all around on the subject of the Derro, and makes me think their inclusion in D&D is in rather bad taste.

Oh well.

To change the subject, is there a length limit for threads on this site? This thing is getting damn long.

R-90-2

06-13-2008 01:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8997308)

I had no idea about that. That wikipedia article is one of the strangest things I've ever read, although a few years ago a paranoid schizophrenic enacted a massive letterbox campaign in the neighbourhood I was living in then; we all received garbled essays about creatures living "under the river" who were out to get the author. It sounds very similar to Shaver. Very sad what mental illness can do to people - it also turns me all around on the subject of the Derro, and makes me think their inclusion in D&D is in rather bad taste.

Oh well.

To change the subject, is there a length limit for threads on this site? This thing is getting damn long.

Threads tend to cap at a thousand posts, I think.

noisms

06-13-2008 01:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Okay, I guess that gives us just over 300 to play with, then I'll have to make a Part II.... Christ, 680+ posts and we're only onto 'D'!

The Last Conformist

06-13-2008 02:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995870)

You're right. What was the guy's name? I've completely forgotten. Didn't Chaos Dwarfs also have their own spells? I really liked the old Warhammer magic system, with all the different schools of Battle Mage - like Grey Wizards, Amber Wizards, Amethyst Wizards...

Yes, the Chaos Dwarfs had their own spell deck. Almost all direct attack spells - their mages were very much mystical artillery.

The different schools of battle magic are back since 6th edition - just about everyone thought the single generic battle magic deck was boring.

YojimboC

06-13-2008 09:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Weltenbummler (Post 8995795)

Shadowrun Drow are awesome. If I remember it right, they're dark black-blue not because of their skin, but because they've got fine, dark black-blue fur covering their body.

Somebody at FASA was a Nightcrawler fan, I'm guessing.

6inTruder

06-13-2008 10:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8997332)

Okay, I guess that gives us just over 300 to play with, then I'll have to make a Part II.... Christ, 680+ posts and we're only onto 'D'!

I checked the book, just for shits and giggles, the other day. M/N (the midway in the alphabet) was about... four fifths of the way through. Ergo, the book is seriously front loaded.

Actually, as I have time tonight I think I might to a % of pages breakdown by letter. Just to see.

noisms

06-13-2008 05:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 8999705)

I checked the book, just for shits and giggles, the other day. M/N (the midway in the alphabet) was about... four fifths of the way through. Ergo, the book is seriously front loaded.

Acctually, as I have time tonight I think I might to a % of pages breakdown by letter. Just to see.

That would be very interesting to see. My guess is that 'D' is the longest section.

kelvingreen

06-13-2008 05:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 8999417)

Somebody at FASA was a Nightcrawler fan, I'm guessing.

And then there was the titanium bone lacing you could use, perhaps on a dwarf who already had cyberspurs...

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elementals

Wow, they just won't let up with the mega-entries, will they? Anyway, Elementals are the dog's bollocks, in my opinion. I can never get enough of their fiery, watery, airy, earthy goodness. I always thought that they were more interesting than both Baatezu and Tanar'ri (Devils and Daemons, whatever), so when the Planescape Monstrous Compendium III was released it was like a godsend to me. I still think they're a little underdeveloped. (That's on my big list, by the way. The one that begins with The Complete Guide to Monster Corpse Armour, the Book of Blink Elephants, Blink Snakes, Blink Apes and Other Blinky Stuff, isiZulu Dwarves, and goes on from there.)

General Information

This is a short intro on how to summon an Elemental and what their common features are. A creature with 4HD or lower cannot harm an Elemental: the book even says that unless an orc has a +2 sword it is powerless against them. However, they are vulnerable to Protection from Evil, like all summoned and conjured creatures (!?).

The summoning rules are a bit complicated, and there's no need to go into great depth. What's interesting is that Elementals have a 5% chance per round of going apeshit once summoned. Unfortunately they usually go back to whatever Inner Plane they come from forthwith, but I'd like to bend the rules and have an adventure in which the PCs have to track down a pack of rampant Fire Elementals that are doing their nuts all across the kingdom.

Elemental, Air/Earth and Fire/Water

Elementals are pretty much what you would expect. Air ones are "amorphous shifting clouds" which can blast you with whirlwinds and, well, air; Earth ones are very large humanoids which hit you very hard (they can smash walls and break buildings within a few rounds); Fire Elementals are tall sheets of flame which take great joy in burning people to death (they get mighty pissed off at being summoned); Water Elementals look like waves, and generally like to smash ships and sweep you away with tidal waves.

The Elemental entry is a classic example of the simplicity of AD&D's rules: Earth Elementals can break down a wall or smash a cottage in a few rounds - that's all you need to know; Water Elementals can overturn a small ship if they want - that's all you need to know. The designers didn't bother with fiddly hit point systems for inanimate objects and suchlike, and I appreciate the flexibility of what they came up with.

brianm

06-13-2008 05:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elementals are great, whether you need to work on a construction project or just smash through some minions. And they just add flavor to any evil overlord's lair.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9001098)

The Elemental entry is a classic example of the simplicity of AD&D's rules: Earth Elementals can break down a wall or smash a cottage in a few rounds - that's all you need to know; Water Elementals can overturn a small ship if they want - that's all you need to know. The designers didn't bother with fiddly hit point systems for inanimate objects and suchlike, and I appreciate the flexibility of what they came up with.

Huh... So there's no system in the 2e DMG for handling sieges or stuff like that? 1e had a sort of hit-points for buildings and how much damage certain spells and siege engines did to them.

- Brian

noisms

06-13-2008 05:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 9001143)

Huh... So there's no system in the 2e DMG for handling sieges or stuff like that? 1e had a sort of hit-points for buildings and how much damage certain spells and siege engines did to them.

Not as far as I can remember, but I haven't picked up the DMG in a while. It's quite possible there is, but the MM implies that if there are such rules they don't apply to Elementals. An Earth Elemental can smash a cottage in "a few rounds" and break down a wall pretty much whenever it wants - and that's all it says on the matter. I interpret that to mean: Don't bother making rolls. That cottage is going DOWN.

Kaiten

06-13-2008 06:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

It's worth mentioning that the art in the Elementals section is fantastic. Again, DiTerlizzi delivers.

JRM

06-13-2008 08:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 8995620)

Dwarf, Evil Derro were apparently "discovered by Mind Flayers 500 years ago, and by Drow shortly after that." Where are the roll-eyes smileys when you need them? They are basically Dwarfs, but with blonde hair and "skin the colour of an iced over lake" - which is to say, "white with bluish undertones", as the MM helpfully explains. They like magic and slaves rather a lot, which puts them in the same sort of area as Warhammer Chaos Dwarves; ha there ever been a fantasy setting where good Dwarves use magic?

There's some Greyhawk material by the late lamented Gary Gygax which suggests Derro are mutant humans, not dwarves, and that's the way I view them in my campaign.

There's an old Gygax campaign seed that just before the Rain of Colourless Fire some Suloise tried to escape the annihilation of their country by digging a vast tunnel westwards, but got trapped underground, their descendants became stunted albino creatures whose existence the PCs discover. If I recall correctly it doesn't name them Derro, but the description of midget white-blond haired albinos is so close I doubt it's a coincidence. Not 100% sure where it is - I think it's in the original World of Greyhawk boxed set, but it may be in an old Dragon article.

As far as I know, the first published AD&D stats for Derro appear in 1st edition's The Lost Caverns of Tsojcanth.

6inTruder

06-13-2008 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9000973)

That would be very interesting to see. My guess is that 'D' is the longest section.

Close. I did two percentages: total page length and just the monster entries.

A 1.6/1.6%
B 6.25/6.5%
C 4.4/4.6%
D 12/12.4%
E 4.7/4.9%
F 1.6/1.6%
G 15.4/16%
H 5.2/5.4%
I 2.3/2.4%
J 0.3/0.3%
K 1.6/1.6%
L 6.25/6.5%
M 6.5/6.8%
N 1.3/1.4%
O 3.6/3.8%
P 3.4/3.5%
Q 0.3/0.3%
R 1.8/1.9%
S 7.6/7.8%
T 4.4/4.6%
U 0.8/0.8%
V 0.5/0.5%
W 2.6/2.7%
X 0.3/0.3%
Y 1/1%
Z 0.8/0.8%

First half (a-m) 68/70.5%

Second half (n-z) 28.4/29.5%

G, being the mega entry. By thirteen pages and about three and a half percent.

noisms

06-13-2008 10:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

'G', eh? At first glance that's surprising, but then you remember the Giants...

6inTruder

06-13-2008 10:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I rather like Elementals in relation to the Elemental-kin and Genies. Like some kind of hierarchy or ecology. I also prefer my Elementals to have more of an intelligence range.

g026r

06-13-2008 10:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9001848)

'G', eh? At first glance that's surprising, but then you remember the Giants...

I can't recall: do golems get a number of sub-entries as well?

noisms

06-13-2008 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 9001935)

I can't recall: do golems get a number of sub-entries as well?

Yes. Probably 10 or more. I don't have the book with me right now.

Lautrec

06-13-2008 10:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

checks 2E MM

Yeah, the G section is full of long entries. Giants, Golems, Gnomes, Githyanki/Githzerai, etc.

Also, GIFF! Yay. :D

Wakboth

06-13-2008 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaiten (Post 9001270)

It's worth mentioning that the art in the Elementals section is fantastic. Again, DiTerlizzi delivers.

Indeed! I wonder how successful this book would have been without his excellent illustrations?

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9001622)

There's some Greyhawk material by the late lamented Gary Gygax which suggests Derro are mutant humans, not dwarves, and that's the way I view them in my campaign.

I'm not sure if I've invented this, or seen it elsewhere, but I thought Derro are a warped hybrid of humans and dwarves, inheriting some of the worst traits of either..

Too bad I can't get enthusiastic about elementals. They've always been little more than summon-fodder and sacks of HP, in my experience.

g026r

06-13-2008 11:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lautrec (Post 9001984)

Githyanki/Githzerai, etc.

How'd those ones slip my mind? As I recall, the various Gith-subtypes are going to drive noisms crazy with the amount of setting-specific fluff present. :D

noisms

06-13-2008 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 9002179)

How'd those ones slip my mind? As I recall, the various Gith-subtypes are going to drive noisms crazy with the amount of setting-specific fluff present. :D

Ah, you know my monster preferences so well already. ;)

Oddly, Spelljammer specific monsters offend me less than the Forgotten Realms stuff. Possibly because there's just too damn much of the latter. I'd still prefer there was none, though.

noisms

06-14-2008 12:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9002131)

Indeed! I wonder how successful this book would have been without his excellent illustrations?

I've definitely noticed that I have a predisposition to liking the monsters illustrated by DiTerlizzi. A book full of Jeff Butler pictures would probably never have grabbed my attention in the same way.

Brutus

06-14-2008 01:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9002259)

I've definitely noticed that I have a predisposition to liking the monsters illustrated by DiTerlizzi. A book full of Jeff Butler pictures would probably never have grabbed my attention in the same way.

I would never have bought any D&D books if it wasn't for Diterlizzi Illustrations. My first two were the monstrous compendium and the planescape monstrous compendium. 100% TD. I didn't even buy the core books, just collected the planescape stuff that he illustrated (which is a lot!). I still treat D&D as an opportunity to collect monster art, since he's moved on to greener pastures. :)

I can't imagine having gotten into rpgs at all or caring about D&D books had they no been covered in DiTerlizzi art. :D

noisms

06-14-2008 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elemental, Air Kin

Sylph

The Sylph is one of the classic examples of monster designers plucking weird numbers from the air: Sylphs have a 20% likelihood of being friendly to adventurers (as is often the case, apparently Reaction Adjustment for Charisma is thrown out of the window); their nests have a 1% chance of having an egg inside; Sylphs meet up once ever 28 years for a big shindig...

They're basically a male fantasy made real - a beautiful young woman with wings who just wants a one-night stand of no-strings attached, egg-making sex. Who could refuse? The entry speculates that Sylphs are possibly a crossbreed between Aerial Servants and Nymphs; it's difficult, if not impossible, to imagine how that could work, but I suppose while we're pulling stuff out of our arses, we might as well go the whole hog.

A hint of a down-note creeps into the final paragraph when we find out that the main danger to Sylphs is "evil humanoid males who attempt to capture them for dark purposes." I'm assuming that's alluding to rape, which is an unusual foray into the subject on the part of the 2nd edition designers. I'm not particularly keen on having that sort of topic dealt with in a game, but I suppose an adventure to rescue a Sylph from her evil captors could work.

Aerial Servant

An Aerial Servant is an invisible blobby thing with a Strength of 23; its main modus operandi is to strangle people to death. They reproduce by being blown apart by storms (5% chance).

Unintentional hilarity:

Quote:

A cleric who summons an aerial servant will be attacked unless behind a protection from evil, because the servants resent being summoned. Otherwise, the servant will complete any duty for the cleric, except fighting, as fast as possible. If the servant is prevented from completing its mission, it goes insane and returns to kill the summoning cleric.

demiurge1138

06-14-2008 03:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9005004)

Sylph

A hint of a down-note creeps into the final paragraph when we find out that the main danger to Sylphs is "evil humanoid males who attempt to capture them for dark purposes." I'm assuming that's alluding to rape, which is an unusual foray into the subject on the part of the 2nd edition designers. I'm not particularly keen on having that sort of topic dealt with in a game, but I suppose an adventure to rescue a Sylph from her evil captors could work.

See, I never read that as rape, even with the prior references to falling in love with human males for the egg makings. In my mind, wicked sorcerers were looking to capture sylphs to pluck off their wings to make into pixie dust to make them fly.

But looking back on it, yeah, rape is more plausible. Thanks for killing my innocence, noisms!

noisms

06-14-2008 03:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9005608)

See, I never read that as rape, even with the prior references to falling in love with human males for the egg makings. In my mind, wicked sorcerers were looking to capture sylphs to pluck off their wings to make into pixie dust to make them fly.

But looking back on it, yeah, rape is more plausible. Thanks for killing my innocence, noisms!

I never read it as rape originally either, but coming back to the entry after many years of not even thinking about Sylphs, it suddenly struck me that that was what was meant.

Or maybe I'm just jaded. Pixie dust! Yeah!

JRM

06-14-2008 09:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9005004)

...The entry speculates that Sylphs are possibly a crossbreed between Aerial Servants and Nymphs; it's difficult, if not impossible, to imagine how that could work, but I suppose while we're pulling stuff out of our arses, we might as well go the whole hog.

A hint of a down-note creeps into the final paragraph when we find out that the main danger to Sylphs is "evil humanoid males who attempt to capture them for dark purposes." I'm assuming that's alluding to rape, which is an unusual foray into the subject on the part of the 2nd edition designers. I'm not particularly keen on having that sort of topic dealt with in a game, but I suppose an adventure to rescue a Sylph from her evil captors could work.

Odd, I don't find it very difficult imagining how a Aerial Servant - Nymph crossbreeding could work, they're both supernatural elemental creatures. There are many other magical crossbreeds in AD&D far less plausible, such as Owlbears, Thessalhydra or Dracolisks. I shudder to think how their progenitors got together to create them, especially the latter two which are described as resulting from crossbreeding in the wild rather than magical experimentation. I suspect some philters of love may have been involved.

The bit about evil humanoid males trying to capture them is crass, though.

kami2awa

06-15-2008 09:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 8991691)

I think the Chaos Dwarves haven't been explicitly written out of Warhammer, the way, say, Squats were in 40k. So as far as I know, they're still out there on the Plain of Zharr, with their hordes of hobgoblin slaves. They haven't been given any detail in a while, though.

Dwarves, in general, tend to be a bit under-used race, especially compared to elves. Maybe it's because of the whole "stolid, hard-working, taciturn, suspicious of outsiders" thing...

Chaos Dwarves are currently relegated to being the creators and operators of the awesome Hellcannon weapon, a daemon-possessed living cannon that tends to rampage and eat people if not kept in check. Otherwise, I don't think they appear at all in current WH.

noisms

06-15-2008 09:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9007766)

Chaos Dwarves are currently relegated to being the creators and operators of the awesome Hellcannon weapon, a daemon-possessed living cannon that tends to rampage and eat people if not kept in check. Otherwise, I don't think they appear at all in current WH.

That's so.... Warhammer. I miss that game.

noisms

06-16-2008 12:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elemental, Earth Kin

Pech

Pech are dwarves to the max - shorter, less friendly, keener on pickaxes, inhabiting deeper places. They come from the Elemental Plane of Earth to the Prime Material Plane, in search of a better life.

I rather like that, and I've been trying to think of a way to make a campaign out of it. A nomadic clan of Pech, bravely venturing to some random Prime Material world to carve - literally - a new life for themselves. But how do they deal with the Deep Dragons, the Illithids, the Duergar, and the other races of the Underdark who they have never encountered in their home plane?

Or, to put a darker spin on it: hordes of Pech have entered the Underdark from the Plane of Earth. The other races can't compete with these master diggers, and they are gradually being forced closer and closer to the surface. How will the surface dwellers cope with their increased contact with the Duergar, Drow and the like?

Interesting side note: Pech have a Strength of 18/50, which makes them almost as strong as a Pit Fiend.

Sandling

A Sandling is an asexual, amorphous pile of predatory sand which lives on minerals. It hangs about in dungeon areas, just waiting to be stepped on so it can leap into life and shout "Aha! I keel you!" The concept really reminds me of something - either from a low-budget sci-fi TVM or a naff TV series; I just can't quite remember what.

Unintentional Hilarity: "They are said to be excellent ingredients for mortar, but they and many druids object to this treatment." I love it.

I bet nobody reading this has ever had a quest to hunt down Sandlings for mortar before.

lkrast

06-16-2008 01:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9005004)

A hint of a down-note creeps into the final paragraph when we find out that the main danger to Sylphs is "evil humanoid males who attempt to capture them for dark purposes." I'm assuming that's alluding to rape, which is an unusual foray into the subject on the part of the 2nd edition designers.

For me, this is part of the beauty of 1 and 2e. You have the relentless insistence on good and evil, but enough good taste and foresight not to spell out the implications of what that means in YOUR game. Do you want to interpret the evil males as rapists? Well, that works. Do you want to keep a more innocent game, and have the men capturing them for wing harvesting? That works too. The games dumped a ton of ideas and hooks into your lap, and you fished out what you wanted and ran with it. It didn't tell you how your world had to be. Which is probably why, decades later, I can still mine those books for ideas.

There's no doubt in my mind, though, that that sentence had a second purpose: reminding adolescent players that forcing the pretty air elemental is an evil act. The game needed hot naked females because it was targeting a certain demographic, and anyway, fantasy and mythology have always been swimming with them. But I'm certain the designers didn't want games to turn into crass little glorifications of adolescent wish-fulfillment, any more than it had to. So little reminders about "this is evil, children" were, I think, important.

DMH

06-16-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9011409)

The concept really reminds me of something - either from a low-budget sci-fi TVM or a naff TV series; I just can't quite remember what.

The only thing I can think of is V the series. One episode had a predator that lived in sand and sucked down humans to eat.

JasonK

06-17-2008 04:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9011409)

Elemental, Earth Kin

Pech

Pech are dwarves to the max - shorter, less friendly, keener on pickaxes, inhabiting deeper places. They come from the Elemental Plane of Earth to the Prime Material Plane, in search of a better life.

I rather like that, and I've been trying to think of a way to make a campaign out of it.

For me, this is the Irish come to America. I'd play it with one of those bog-standard, big-world, many-planes D&D games (the sort you get if you use everything in every book), where families of pech have come through a gate and tried to set up shop in the local mining cities, but they're facing prejudice from the previous workers - dwarves, say - who are worried that these new miners, who are both better-skilled and willing to work for less, are going to drive them out of a job.

It's largely background, at first, unless a PC is a member of one of the two races, but will eventually get all Gangs of New York with rival mobs and such and the PCs forced to take sides or try to mediate the peace.

~ jason

Sleeper

06-17-2008 04:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9011409)

A Sandling is an asexual, amorphous pile of predatory sand which lives on minerals. It hangs about in dungeon areas just waiting to be stepped on so it can leap into life and shout "Aha! I keel you!" The concept really reminds me of something - either from a low-budget sci-fi TVM or a naff TV series; I just can't quite remember what.

Unintentional Hilarity: "They are said to be excellent ingredients for mortar, but they and many druids object to this treatment." I love it.

I bet nobody reading this has ever had a quest to hunt down Sandlings for mortar before.

They do? I just checked A4 (their first appearance, I believe), and their intelligence is listed as "none".

Though now I have an image an ancient city lost in the desert. When the winds blow and the streets are covered with drifting sand, the tens of thousands sandlings in the mortar wake and start to struggle, to move. Buried under the sand, the city slowly shifts and moves as they struggle and fight to be free. And a frustrated archaeologist who is absolutely certain he knows where the lost city of the sun should be buried... except it isn't there.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9014414)

For me, this is the Irish come to America. I'd play it with one of those bog-standard, big-world, many-planes D&D games (the sort you get if you use everything in every book), where families of pech have come through a gate and tried to set up shop in the local mining cities, but they're facing prejudice from the previous workers - dwarves, say - who are worried that these new miners, who are both better-skilled and willing to work for less, are going to drive them out of a job.

It's largely background, at first, unless a PC is a member of one of the two races, but will eventually get all Gangs of New York with rival mobs and such and the PCs forced to take sides or try to mediate the peace.

A low-born and brutal dwarf butcher with a handlebar mustache who becomes the underboss at the Five Tunnels mining center by leading his cronies in a tunnel-fight against the pech, and then 15 years later inadvertently takes a clean-shaven pretty boy under his wing who is actually the son of the dead pech immigrant leader?

I like it.

noisms

06-17-2008 10:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9014580)

Though now I have an image an ancient city lost in the desert. When the winds blow and the streets are covered with drifting sand, the tens of thousands sandlings in the mortar wake and start to struggle, to move. Buried under the sand, the city slowly shifts and moves as they struggle and fight to be free. And a frustrated archaeologist who is absolutely certain he knows where the lost city of the sun should be buried... except it isn't there.

That sounds like it should have been a story by Lord Dunsany. Great stuff!

Kakita Kojiro

06-17-2008 10:59 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9014580)

Though now I have an image an ancient city lost in the desert. When the winds blow and the streets are covered with drifting sand, the tens of thousands sandlings in the mortar wake and start to struggle, to move. Buried under the sand, the city slowly shifts and moves as they struggle and fight to be free. And a frustrated archaeologist who is absolutely certain he knows where the lost city of the sun should be buried... except it isn't there.

What player in his right mind would agree to adventure in the land of mortar, where the sandlings lie?

Milk

06-17-2008 11:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9011409)
Sandling

A Sandling is an asexual, amorphous pile of predatory sand which lives on minerals.

I'm suddenly curious about how many D&D creatures are "-ling"s.

Sleeper

06-17-2008 11:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

What if the sandlings are old, old beyond imagining?

What if, so long ago that mountains have fallen into themselves and become scant hills, there was a vast empire that built their cities of mile-high towers of colored glass? To shape it and sustain it, they used living glass. Spirits and substance hauled from the fundamental source of all matter, where it twists and seethes in a form of primal self-awareness.

For whatever reason, that utterly unknown civilization must have fallen. Whether it fell fast or slow makes no difference. From our distant vantage point, it is but an instant compared to the immense span of time that has since passed. What matters is that eventually the great towers lay spread across the plains, like stalks and sheafs of grain laying amidst the stubble during the harvest.

Except there was nobody to collect them, bundle them up, use them. There was only Time, who in her slow way played with them like a clumsy child. Breaking them down, casting them away, shattering them, grinding them up.

Until naught remained but dust, or sand. This desert is not a mountain, worn by Time's erosion into tiny grains. No, the desert, all of it, is a slumbering expanse of reclaimed glass. And every once in a while, a tiny piece remembers what it once was, and lashes out with the unding ache of lost and almost forgotten glories.

noisms

06-17-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9016082)
What if the sandlings are old, old beyond imagining?

What if, so long ago that mountains have fallen into themselves and become scant hills, there was a vast empire that built their cities of mile-high towers of colored glass? To shape it and sustain it, they used living glass. Spirits and substance hauled from the fundamental source of all matter, where it twists and seethes in a form of primal self-awareness.

For whatever reason, that utterly unknown civilization must have fallen. Whether it fell fast or slow makes no difference. From our distant vantage point, it is but an instant compared to the immense span of time that has since passed. What matters is that eventually the great towers lay spread across the plains, like stalks and sheafs of grain laying amidst the stubble during the harvest.

Except there was nobody to collect them, bundle them up, use them. There was only Time, who in her slow way played with them like a clumsy child. Breaking them down, casting them away, shattering them, grinding them up.

Until naught remained but dust, or sand. This desert is not a mountain, worn by Time's erosion into tiny grains. No, the desert, all of it, is a slumbering expanse of reclaimed glass. And every once in a while, a tiny piece remembers what it once was, and lashes out with the unding ache of lost and almost forgotten glories.

Reminds me of Ozymandias.

I love this thread. The only problem is that my "list of things I want to run" has ballooned from half a dozen to somewhere over a hundred ever since beginning it...

Whitemagebishieboy

06-17-2008 07:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9017380)
Reminds me of Ozymandias.

I love this thread. The only problem is that my "list of things I want to run" has ballooned from half a dozen to somewhere over a hundred ever since beginning it...

So the book is doing it's job too well?

Whenever I'm faced with too many choices, i rely on the gamers best friend. Dice.

noisms

06-17-2008 07:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elemental, Fire Kin

Salamander

Every so often in the MM you come across little throwaway lines which were obviously deliberately thrown in as ways to spark off the fires of campaign ideas. I'm always grateful for these; they demonstrate (I think) the fact that the game designers were not just thinking about what would be cool, but also about how the monsters could be used to really add something to people's games. Most of the monsters in the MM could have ended up just being grist for random encounter tables, but they are saved from that fate by this tendency on the part of the designers.

One of these examples is in the Salamander entry: "Salamanders are natives of the elemental plane of Fire, and thus they thrive in hot places. These cruel, evil creatures come to the Prime Material plane for reasons known only to them." The implication being, of course, that the reasons are known only to them AND TO THE DM, whose brain is immediately generating fifty-thousand ideas for plots involving Salamanders.

So let's have a COMPETITION. Post your ideas! Why do Salamanders come to the Prime Material Plane, and how would you build an adventure around it? The best entry wins eternal kudos, gratitude and good karma, plus a billion trillion kazillion dollars.

(If you need more information on what a Salamander is: It's like a centaur, but with a giant snake body where the horse body should be. It's Chaotic Evil, can be hit only by +1 or better magical weapons, causes heat damage merely by touch, and likes to grab people and throw them in furnaces or lava streams just for the hell of it.)

Fire Snake

This must be one of the shortest monster entries in the book. A Fire Snake is basically that - a snake that lives in fires. Some people think they're larval Salamanders. Somewhat mysteriously, they "often accumulate gems", but the book doesn't say why. (You get bonus points for the COMPETITION if you can come up with an explanation.) Er...that's it.

Steve H

06-17-2008 08:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

That quote about Salamanders reminds me of one about Umber Hulks (which I think was from a Dragon Ecology of... rather than the MM, but still), which said that they hire themselves out as bodyguard and tunnel diggers, accepting payment in gold coins - but that no-one knows what they want the gold for.

As for Salamanders, I'll go for the low-hanging fruit for my idea - barbecued humanoid flesh is a delicacy for Salamanders. The rest writes itself...

DMH

06-17-2008 08:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Fire snakes are actually baby thoqqua and the salamanders want to use them to turn the Underdark and then the surface world into magma. Why- to have a resort free from all the annoying pests like firebats from the plane of fire.

TavishArtair

06-17-2008 08:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9017409)

So let's have a COMPETITION. Post your ideas! Why do Salamanders come to the Prime Material Plane, and how would you build an adventure around it? The best entry wins eternal kudos, gratitude and good karma, plus a billion trillion kazillion dollars.

A kazillion, eh.

Well, see, the thing is, the Elemental Plane of Fire, in spite of being aflame, could just as easily be likened to its opposite element, water. Specifically, an ocean. Many things live deep in the ocean... great, massive fire elementals, who burn so hot that even the efreeti flinch... but salamanders are not one of those. Rather, they live closer to the surface of that ocean of fire. While there's no literal surface on a plane, they nonetheless are found on its edges.

Now, because they're adapted to living close to the "surface," they tend to rely on it in certain ways. Unlike pure elementals, they are partially other elements as well, in balance. While adult salamanders are adapted to the depths of the Elemental Plane of Fire, their young aren't, and need a plane with many elements to thrive, as otherwise they'll simply disintegrate into scattered embers without anything to hold them together. So, they retreat to the "shallows," lurking in fiery locations on the Prime Material Plane, in order to mate and give birth, a process which is left to the reader's imagination. The result is commonly held to be fire snakes.

The gems that fire snakes accumulate are placed there by salamanders. The precise answer as to why is not certain, although it is believed they are acting out the curiously birdlike behaviour of lining their "nest." Others state that they act as a focus for the elemental energies involved and assist in the transmutation of a fire snake to a mature salamander. Regardless, their tendency to pillage and loot seems to be strongly connected to their mating cycle. Worst yet, a burning town this year may mean more salamanders the next, who go on to greater conquests. This is what truly makes them evil. Their destruction only feeds the fire, resulting in more destruction.

JRM

06-17-2008 10:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9015913)

What player in his right mind would agree to adventure in the land of mortar, where the sandlings lie?

Oh, that pun's so awful I must applaud you. Now I'm curious what the rest of the poem is - what's the Sandling equivalent of Tolkien's One Ring?

One Brick To Rule Them All?

One Brick to build on them, and in the darkness bind them?

Hmm, that sort of makes sense and ties in with a lost city build from sandlings. Now who were the Nine, the Seven and the Three Bricks given to, and what were they used for?

Aha! It's obvious, they are the the heartstones of dungeons - the Evil One disguised himself as The Architect and gifted various subterranean races with advanced building & mining skills, which they used to gain wealth and build fabulous homes for themselves, not knowing that the Brick they build them round would enslave them and twist their home into an unnatural deathtrap maze.

Kakita Kojiro

06-18-2008 01:35 AM

(To atone for my awful pun...)

Salamanders come to the Prime as part of their eugenics program. See, their eggs need intense heat to hatch -- those aren't gems with their larva, the fire snakes, those are their eggs. The quality and nature of the intense heat applied to their eggs influences what kind of fire snake and then fire salamander that is produced.

Hatch a gem-egg on the plane of Fire, and you get your standard salamander. Hatch one on the Prime, and you can get... other things. Things that make GMs cackle with glee.

Oh, and good luck with those gems you snatched from clubbing those fire snakes to death, Mr. Adventurer. Mummy salamander is sure to come looking for her wee babies, and Og help you if someone tosses a fireball while you're wearing that helm of brilliance you made from 'em, and the things hatch on you.

demiurge1138

06-18-2008 01:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Salamanders come to the Prime Material Plane not for food, nor for reproduction. They come for religion.

The salamanders, like most elementals, were once a godless lot, paying homage to powerful elemental rulers and ancestors, but never worshipping them. But once salamanders started being summoned by mortals, they found in mortals faith, which mortals could use to heal wounds, call down the fury of the heavens... or summon salamanders.

The salamanders aspire to be the rulers of Elemental Fire, but face stiff competition from the cunning, magically adept efreet. So, in order to even the scales, salamanders come to the Material for research purposes, to worship and pray to all manner of deities, to compare which ones will give them the power to overcome their adversaries.

The Monstrous Manual was right--salamanders have antlers not for combat, but for magic. Those are antennae, intended to recieve and amplify divine magic.

Littleredfox

06-18-2008 02:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9017409)

Elemental, Fire Kin

These cruel, evil creatures come to the Prime Material plane for reasons known only to them.

It's an extreme Sport.

Translated into Human perceptions it is analogous to playing cricket in the deep arctic with thermite grenades for balls.

Only the hardest core Salamander sportsbeings come to the PMP to play thier interminably long game and mostly metaphysical game. That and thier ontourage of groupies, guru's and advertising teams.

kelvingreen

06-18-2008 03:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9017409)

The implication being, of course, that the reasons are known only to them AND TO THE DM, whose brain is immediately generating fifty-thousand ideas for plots involving Salamanders.

It's a good thing D&D is not Shadowrun, or the implication would be that the reasons are known only to the salamanders and to a sourcebook that will only be released long after the information has ceased to be useful and will likely contradict whatever the GM came up with in the meantime.

Or something.

noisms

06-18-2008 12:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9018725)

The Monstrous Manual was right--salamanders have antlers not for combat, but for magic. Those are antennae, intended to receive and amplify divine magic.

Oh yes, I forgot to mention the antlers!

noisms

06-18-2008 09:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Okay, you all did very well in the competition, so I can't possibly decide on a winner. You'll have divide the kazillion dollar prize between you. Luckily that means you still end up with a bajillion dollars each.

Elemental, Water Kin

Nereid

Also known as "honeyed ones", Nereids take the form of "voluptuous" (female fairies are always voluptuous, and I love them for it) maidens who tempt sailors to their doom. 95% undetectable when in the water they are incapable of being harmed by males - who just can't bring themselves to attack. They can also do a fair amount of ass kicking if they want, by spitting venom, summoning watery pets, and - hooray! - instakilling by kissing people, causing them to drown. (If you pass the saving throw, though, you "find ecstasy" instead).

There are quite a few little hooks scattered through the text. First, Nereids are inextricably attached to their shawls, which contains the creature's essence. This means that if a Nereid loses its shawl, it will do anything to get it back - including, presumably, trying to persuade adventurers. Second, if you can get a Nereid's shawl, you can control her, possibly forcing her to be a guide through the Plane of Water. And finally, the only reason a Nereid will be found in the Prime Material Plane is if she has been exiled from her home plane. But why has she been exiled, and who has she been exiled by.....?

Water Weird

Wow, two instakill monsters in the space of one page! The Water Weird is a watery serpent which grabs you and pulls you underwater; each round you have to make a saving throw lest you drown. That's pretty much all there is to it; there's a sentence on Water Weirids being also assume control of water elementals, but their description is only marginally longer than that of the Fire Snake.

JRM

06-19-2008 08:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Never much cared for the Water Weird. It's one of those unreasonably deadly low HD monsters that needs a particular trick to easily dispose off, like Green Slime. It was just so random in how it'd kill PCs that I wouldn't feel fair sticking one in an adventure.

I had nothing against using insakill monsters now and again, but I liked ones that were easy to foreshadow for observant players (e.g. ghostly webs for phase spiders, states for medusae).

And that controlling Water Elementals power could be pretty icky, I imagined the weird parasitising the poor elemental and slowly devouring it will playing its body like a puppet. Not that I minded that! It reminded me of Rhalto the Marvellous when the chug puppets the sandestin. Maybe that's why there are all those fonts with Water Weirids in dungeons - evil wizards keep them to control their water elemental slaves.

Foxworthy

06-19-2008 10:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Awesome thread, brings back a lot of nostalgia and a good old fashion vibe mixed with cool ideas. All shaken not stirred. Kudos to you all.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9022696)
Water Weird

Wow, two instakill monsters in the space of one page! The Water Weird is a watery serpent which grabs you and pulls you underwater; each round you have to make a saving throw lest you drown. That's pretty much all there is to it; there's a sentence on Water Weirids being also assume control of water elementals, but their description is only marginally longer than that of the Fire Snake.

Ah the Water Weird. Our group lost a cleric to a water weird, but not because of the creature we killed that. But because he fell to the bottom of the pool and couldn't swim, let alone swim in his armor. There he was at the bottom of the pool with only a wooden hatch in the bottom. Unfortunately he didn't get I was joking when I said he should break it and escape. Since wooden hatches in the bottom of a pool wouldn't be a good place to try and escape the water above you. So he smashed the panel and got killed by poison darts.

I still wonder why poison darts were installed at the bottom of a pool with a water weird.

Almost as bad as the player that walked into a room with a skeleton covered by yellow moss.

Good times.

noisms

06-19-2008 10:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Foxworthy (Post 9025492)

I still wonder why poison darts were installed at the bottom of a pool with a water weird.

Why, to kill unsuspecting clerics, of course. ;)

My first DM was my friend's older brother, and he was big into that kind of thing. I remember once coming across a pool in a dungeon which seemed like it contained a secret passageway. So my character jumped in - only to instantly turn to solid gold and sink to the bottom, dead. Apparently, the DM had just re-read The Voyage of the Dawn Treader, which had the exact same scenario - except he'd forgotten that CS Lewis at least gave his characters some clues.

brianm

06-19-2008 12:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Among the circles I gamed in, water wierds were popular almost entirely due to this painting by Elmore.

Pretty much anytime you saw an ornate pool of water with something useful at the bottom, we always assumed a wierd. We also made sure what we were seeing was actually in the pool, and not hanging above it where its image would be seen "inside" the water as a reflection.

- Brian

noisms

06-19-2008 01:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elemental, Composite

Tempest

Tempests are living storms. A cool concept, but spoiled by some rather ridiculous ideas. For instance: "They can communicate with air and water elementals and their kin, and genies, through subtle wind buffets and spatterings of precipitation." I mean, come on now. Another for instance: "Whatever their origin, they do breed and reproduce as storms. Though "male" and "female" do not truly describe the different types of tempests, there are two genders. When living storms of different genders meet, they have a brief, tempestuous affair, causing a great conflagration that may last more than a week." Yet another: "Some sages speculate that their physical form, or possibly some event in their history, causes them to hate animal life. It is quite possible that the electrical impulses produced by animal brains cause pain to the tempest."

Ridiculous.

Still, the basic idea is great, and has at least three nice hooks:

1. When a tempest is killed, a silver residue remains which can be fashioned into a wand of lightning. Sounds like a job for a likely group of adventurers to me...

2. Tempests can be accidentally summoned when a spellcaster is trying to call up another elemental or casting a weather summoning spell. I'm picturing the PCs having to chase a rampaging Tempest across the kingdom in an effort to restrain it.

3. Tempests live off moisture, so they are attracted to battlefields, where they suck up all the water from the corpses. Now that would be a cool random encounter. Storm clouds gathering on the horizon. A group of adventurers having to ride towards it. Coming up over a rise and looking down on a panorama of corpses littering a field, with a tempest feeding off them.

Skriaxit

An intelligent and evil sandstorm, which does pretty much what you would expect, and feeds on fear.

Arctic Tempest

A tempest which has powers of cold, rather than lightning.

Black Cloud of Vengeance

A living storm which can rain fire on opponents.

Milk

06-20-2008 12:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9026033)

3. Tempests live off moisture, so they are attracted to battlefields, where they suck up all the water from the corpses. Now that would be a cool random encounter. Storm clouds gathering on the horizon. A group of adventurers having to ride towards it. Coming up over a rise and looking down on a panorama of corpses littering a field, with a tempest feeding off them.

How intelligent are Tempests? Because I'm seeing adventurers being called in to discover who's been stirring up tensions between two unfriendly nations, only to find that behind the whole conspiracy is a Tempest, or Tempests, who desire to feed off the resultant war.

Mark Krawec

06-20-2008 12:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9026033)

3. Tempests live off moisture, so they are attracted to battlefields, where they suck up all the water from the corpses

Battlefields nothing - what about marshes? Or even farmlands?

Maybe our heroes are called in to investigate reports of mysterious storm clouds into which rain falls up from the fields, leaving behind acres of dessicated chaff (today's fire danger : high!) & an ever-expanding dustbowl.

noisms

06-20-2008 01:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Milk (Post 9027715)

How intelligent are Tempests? Because I'm seeing adventurers being called in to discover who's been stirring up tensions between two unfriendly nations, only to find that behind the whole conspiracy is a Tempest, or Tempests, who desire to feed off the resultant war.

They could do this by causing localized flooding, thus increasing tensions over land between the two nations.

JasonK

06-20-2008 03:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I can't really see much subtlety in a Tempest, sorry. They're giant dark stormclouds with malaevolent faces. How the hell could they operate in secrecy?

Anyway, I have to say that the Elemental Kin were always far more interesting to me as creatures than straight Elementals. Elementals are blobs of matter, things you summon, but the Kin have a personality, structure and form to interact with, and that made them interesting to me.

Incidentally, since Nereids are basically the Succubi of the water elemental plane, I tend to think of them in a similar way - they're the spies and assassins, turning enemy agents rogue, infiltrating and recruiting. They claim to be exiles on the prime, sure, but that's really just cover. They're really high-ranked operatives in the war between the elements, distributing swords out of lakes, trapping druids in trees and recruiting agents for their lords.

~ jason

see

06-20-2008 06:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I think it's cute that killing a tempest leaves you with the cloud's silver lining.

Crowetron

06-20-2008 07:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9029358)
I think it's cute that killing a tempest leaves you with the cloud's silver lining.

LOL! I never made that connection before! Well, that does it, I have to use a Tempest in my next campaign, because that's the cutest damn thing AD&D ever threw at me.

trippingsatyr

06-20-2008 10:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Oh, I got a good one! Maybe do a Silver Surfer/Galactus like thing. Something comes destroying kingdoms and battlefields to feed..a large living storm. Others say that before it comes, its herald arrives. This herald helps to stir things up, ccausing wars and strife so his master can feed.

Man, I so need to run a C&C game..

noisms

06-20-2008 01:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9029474)
LOL! I never made that connection before! Well, that does it, I have to use a Tempest in my next campaign, because that's the cutest damn thing AD&D ever threw at me.

I can't believe I didn't make the connection either. I must be slipping.

noisms

06-20-2008 01:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by trippingsatyr (Post 9030151)
Oh, I got a good one! Maybe do a Silver Surfer/Galactus like thing. Something comes destroying kingdoms and battlefields to feed..a large living storm. Others say that before it comes, its herald arrives. This herald helps to stir things up, ccausing wars and strife so his master can feed.

Man, I so need to run a C&C game..

I like it. So whenever wars and strife occur, rumours spread like wildfire that the Herald of the Storm has arrived to sew the seeds of chaos in advance of the coming tempest. He's almost like a bogey man.

Except this bogey man is REAL. Dun dun DUNNNN!

Milk

06-20-2008 09:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by trippingsatyr (Post 9030151)

Oh, I got a good one! Maybe do a Silver Surfer/Galactus like thing. Something comes destroying kingdoms and battlefields to feed..a large living storm. Others say that before it comes, its herald arrives. This herald helps to stir things up, ccausing wars and strife so his master can feed.

Oh, nice. As JasonK mentioned, making the link between a giant living storm and political manipulation is the toughie, but that works.

noisms

06-20-2008 10:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elf

Ah, Elves. Don't you just love the little skinny point-eared blighters? No? I don't either, actually, truth be told. I'm not sure what it is; possibly it's just because they're popular, and I'm one of nature's true contrarians. But I also don't like what Elves have become over the years. Tolkien's vision was of a talented, beautiful, intelligent race who were fatally flawed - whether through arrogance, pride, or vengefulness - and I like that vision, because fatal flaws are one of the cornerstones of all great Western literature. D&D Elves, though...they just seem too perfect. Or rather, that's often how they're portrayed - a race of noble, generous, intelligent, joyful, smarmy goody-goodies, who live an idyllic existence in a utopian-socialist woodland paradise and never ever make mistakes. For the same reasons that I don't like standard D&D Centaurs, I don't much like standard D&D Elves.

That said, I'm not against the race if they're done well or done differently. I love Birthright and Dark Sun Elves, for instance. I'm just sick to death of the standard tropes. They need freshening up. Cannibalistic Elves, brutal totalitarian Elves, capricious and sadistic Elves, weak and stupid Elves... these are the concepts I'd like to see in a game. Maybe someday I'll make one.

Anyway, enough ranting. On with the entry.

High Elves

High Elves are the 'standard' Elves that we all know so well; the ones who live in forests and like bows and arrows a lot. You probably know them back to front already. Still, there were a few surprises to me reading through the text. Firstly, "Elven women are the equal of their male counterparts in all aspects of warfare. In fact, some bands of elves will contain units of female fighters, who will be mounted on unicorns. This occurs rarely (5% chance), and only 10-30 elf maidens will be encountered in such a unit. However, the legends of the destruction wrought by these elven women are rampant among the enemies of the elves." I'm not sure what to make of that - for some reason elven women riding unicorns and "wreaking destruction" don't really go together in my brain. Secondly, "in their world within the forest, elves hold in check the dark forces of evil, and the creatures that would plunder the forest and then move on to plunder another. For this reason alone, elves are irreplaceable." Make of that what you will.

Grey Elves (Faerie)

Yep, I thought that random (Faerie) a bit odd, too. Grey Elves are modeled after their Middle Earth namesake, I think, in that they are rather more into studying, contemplation, and the like.

Wood Elves

These are the 'wild' branch of the Elves, and remind me of Warhammer Wood Elves, in that they are more neutral than good (i.e. they don't mind killing people). I wonder if anybody's ever started up Wood Elf Wardancers?

Half Elves

Some people dislike Half Elves, I hear, but I've always thought of them as the most interesting flavour of Elf, because they have the whole caught-between-two-worlds thing going on. That has some potential. Also, I've always rather liked the idea of a Half-Elf civilisation - one begun by the offspring of a group of humans and a group of Elves, who were stranded together on an island somewhere many centuries ago, and whose bloodlines are now thoroughly intertwined.

Cultist of Sooty

06-20-2008 10:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032013)

Secondly, "in their world within the forest, elves hold in check the dark forces of evil, and the creatures that would plunder the forest and then move on to plunder another. For this reason alone, elves are irreplaceable." Make of that what you will.

You know how they say that money doesn't grow on trees? Well, that's because our world doesn't have any elves and people plundered all the money trees long, long ago. In proper elf woods, there's cold hard cash right there, dangling from the branches for anyone who knows where to look and can survive a few elven arrows in the back.

DMH

06-20-2008 10:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I posted a campaign seed on Enworld 2-3 years ago. It had dwarves dominate society (ie humanity, halflings and gnomes) via advanced materials and protecting a gate from demonic elves. People moaned about how I had changed dwarven culture, yet nothing negative about the change to elves.

And then there was the thread here about lichen and insect eating elves: <http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=337842>

Lugh

06-20-2008 11:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I've always been partial to the fascist, racist, homicidal elven subtype, personally. Elves are superior to humans in virtually every way. And they will torture you until you agree. Also, I've always seen the Melniboneans (sp?) as elves.

The only reason elves don't rule the world is that they spend more time attempting to cull their unworthy relatives than fighting non-elves.

kelvingreen

06-21-2008 12:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032013)

That said, I'm not against the race if they're done well or done differently. I love Birthright and Dark Sun Elves, for instance. I'm just sick to death of the standard tropes. They need freshening up. Cannibalistic Elves, brutal totalitarian Elves, capricious and sadistic Elves, weak and stupid Elves... these are the concepts I'd like to see in a game. Maybe someday I'll make one.

Living in forests as they did, my elves didn't really develop a fire-and-metalworking culture and were closer to our jungle tribes than the fantasy stereotype, only with magic, obviously. They were also hugely protective of their habitats and hunted invaders remorselessly. Not hugely original, but more palatable to me than the usual annoyingly perfect and noble version.

Also, for some reason, I'd always thought of elves as being taller than humans, so it was quite a shock for me to come to D&D and see them portrayed as smaller.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9032247)

Also, I've always seen the Melniboneans (sp?) as elves.

Me too. I think one of the issues of Arcane (remember that?) also drew the same parallel, I think in an article on making the stock fantasy races more interesting.

noisms

06-21-2008 01:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9032612)

Living in forests as they did, my elves didn't really develop a fire-and-metalworking culture and were closer to our jungle tribes than the fantasy stereotype, only with magic, obviously. They were also hugely protective of their habitats and hunted invaders remorselessly. Not hugely original, but more palatable to me than the usual annoyingly perfect and noble version.

Also, for some reason, I'd always thought of elves as being taller than humans, so it was quite a shock for me to com to D&D and see them portrayed as smaller.

I always forget that too. I also always forget whether Tolkien elves are supposed to be taller or shorter than humans.

Quote:

Me too. I think one of the issues of Arcane (remember that?) also drew the same parallel, I think in an article on making the stock fantasy races more interesting.

I wish that magazine was still around. It's a sad indictment of the hobby that it can't support one single decent non-house-organ magazine.

bluejay

06-21-2008 01:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Tolkien Elves are generally slightly taller than Humans.

The more woodland Elves are tall and slender but the deep Elves (Noldor) are even taller and more solidly built (and dark haired and dark eyed).

It always struck me as strange that Tolkien's most interesting Elves were pretty much disregarded by the subsequent RPG knock-offs. Of course if he'd ended up calling them Gnomes, where would we be?

Anyhoo, Star Trek Vulcans seem to be derived from Tolkien Elves to a certain degree and seem to have fed back into the RPG collective consciousness as Elf prototypes.

brianm

06-21-2008 01:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9028579)

\Incidentally, since Nereids are basically the Succubi of the water elemental plane, I tend to think of them in a similar way - they're the spies and assassins, turning enemy agents rogue, infiltrating and recruiting. They claim to be exiles on the prime, sure, but that's really just cover. They're really high-ranked operatives in the war between the elements, distributing swords out of lakes, trapping druids in trees and recruiting agents for their lords.

~ jason

I love this! Agents of the marid in their long war against the dao and efreet. :D

- Brian

kelvingreen

06-21-2008 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032786)

I always forget that too. I also always forget whether Tolkien elves are supposed to be taller or shorter than humans.

I think the Fighting Fantasy elves might be taller than humans, and as that was my entry into the hobby, that might be where I got the idea. I think they're taller in Shadowrun too, so I'd imagine it's the same in Earthdawn.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032786)

I wish that magazine was still around. It's a sad indictment of the hobby that it can't support one single decent non-house-organ magazine.

TSR killed it, as I recall. The vast majority of Arcane's funding came through TSR advertising, so when the company folded, the magazine could no longer survive. :(

brianm

06-21-2008 01:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032013)

However, the legends of the destruction wrought by these elven women are rampant among the enemies of the elves." I'm not sure what to make of that - for some reason elven women riding unicorns and "wreaking destruction" don't really go together in my brain.

The horrors perpetrated by the Maiden far exceed those committed by the Mother, if only because her lack of life experience allows the Maiden to savage her foes without pity or remorse.

Shall a feud not begin for me?

Shall kith not kill their kin for me?

Oh, where are the trivial joys

Harmless, convivial joys

Where are the simple joys of maidenhood? :D

- Brian

KromeLizard

06-21-2008 01:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by bluejay (Post 9032817)

It always struck me as strange that Tolkien's most interesting Elves were pretty much disregarded by the subsequent RPG knock-offs.

That's because a whole lot of people can't read anything more difficult than the Hobbit.

noisms

06-21-2008 01:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by bluejay (Post 9032817)

Of course if he'd ended up calling them Gnomes, where would we be?

Now there's a thought. What would modern fantasy look like if Tolkien's elves had really been gnomes?

noisms

06-21-2008 01:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9032839)

I think the Fighting Fantasy elves might be taller than humans, and as that was my entry into the hobby, that might be where I got the idea. I think they're taller in Shadowrun too, so I'd imagine it's the same in Earthdawn.

Did you play any Advanced Fighting Fantasy? A friend and I used to play it a bit around the same time we were figuring out what D&D was; I still have all the books somewhere, as well as Out of the Pit and Titan.

kelvingreen

06-21-2008 04:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032949)

Did you play any Advanced Fighting Fantasy? A friend and I used to play it a bit around the same time we were figuring out what D&D was; I still have all the books somewhere, as well as Out of the Pit and Titan.

Yes, one of the first long-term games I ever ran was a year-and-a-bit Dungeoneer campaign. I do like the simplicity of the system, but it's horribly broken and unbalanced, so we just played it as an over the top just-for-fun kind of thing. I never read Blacksand or Allansia though.

I'm resurrecting some of the old Out of the Pit monsters in a small campaign I'm putting together; I'm thinking of having a Gonchong takeover at the heart of the plot. ;)

JasonK

06-21-2008 05:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Milk (Post 9031944)

Oh, nice. As JasonK mentioned, making the link between a giant living storm and political manipulation is the toughie, but that works.

It really does, yes. I could get behind the herald thing.

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9032612)

Living in forests as they did, my elves didn't really develop a fire-and-metalworking culture and were closer to our jungle tribes than the fantasy stereotype, only with magic, obviously. They were also hugely protective of their habitats and hunted invaders remorselessly. Not hugely original, but more palatable to me than the usual annoyingly perfect and noble version.

I think in a "pure fantasy" sort of situation this works out pretty well. Elven forest raiders growing wooden swords and shields from the trees that give them life, stuff like that. But for me, honestly, this isn't... mythic enough.

In the same way that I shifted my dwarves away from clannish mine-dwellers and into trisky, greedy, crafty Mountain Kings, I want to take elves back to their proper roots. The problem, of course, is that properly-rooted "mythic" elves are "humans, only more attractive, a bit longer-lived and living where humans don't usually live."

I'm not sure where I'm going with this - let me think on it some more.

Quote:

Also, for some reason, I'd always thought of elves as being taller than humans, so it was quite a shock for me to come to D&D and see them portrayed as smaller.

I noticed that 4E has "fixed" this little oversight - elves and eladrin are now human height.

~ jason

kelvingreen

06-21-2008 05:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9034009)

I think in a "pure fantasy" sort of situation this works out pretty well. Elven forest raiders growing wooden swords and shields from the trees that give them life, stuff like that. But for me, honestly, this isn't... mythic enough.

Well, that's from when I was seventeen. :)

I've been thinking about bringing "elves" into one of my current games. They would live in a slightly different plane of reality, separated from the main gameworld by the very thinnest of planar boundaries; if you see something moving at the edge of your sight, it's probably something in that otherworld moving along. Landscape features and ancient things appear in both worlds, but that empty hill over there may host an elven building in their world. Sensitive individuals may feel it if they move through something that's impassable in the other world.

The elves are immortal, but they can't breed. Instead they steal infants from our world, and eventually these children are changed by the magic of the otherworld into full grown elves. Those who leave before this process is complete are half-elves.

It's just notes and half-formed ideas at this point, but I also became dissatisfied with classic elves and wanted to go for something closer to the mythological faerie.

glass

06-21-2008 06:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9032839)

I think the Fighting Fantasy elves might be taller than humans, and as that was my entry into the hobby, that might be where I got the idea. I think they're taller in Shadowrun too, so I'd imagine it's the same in Earthdawn.

WFRP too.

glass.

JasonK

06-21-2008 07:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9034171)

It's just notes and half-formed ideas at this point, but I also became dissatisfied with classic elves and wanted to go for something closer to the mythological faerie.

I did something like this for my homebrew world, actually. The only "elves" that exist for PCs are changeling-children - half-human, half-fae, raised either on earth or in the Fair Realm, but with one foot in each, regardless. I'd probably use Eladrin stats for them in 4E terms, while in 3.X I created something whole-cloth.

It's a pretty satisfying solution for my world, but doesn't really answer the central elf issue so much as avoids it altogether.

~ jason

kelvingreen

06-21-2008 07:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9034577)

It's a pretty satisfying solution for my world, but doesn't really answer the central elf issue so much as avoids it altogether.

Indeed, I wonder if there is a fix, or if we're forever stuck with the Rubbish Fantasy Elf?

noisms

06-21-2008 11:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9034679)

Indeed, I wonder if there is a fix, or if we're forever stuck with the Rubbish Fantasy Elf?

RFE for short.

I'm going to plot out a few ideas for (hopefully) non-rubbish fantasy elves over the next week or so on my blog.

weasel fierce

06-21-2008 12:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9034679)

Indeed, I wonder if there is a fix, or if we're forever stuck with the Rubbish Fantasy Elf?

depending how Tangency-ish you are..

Elvish holocaust ?

JasonK

06-21-2008 05:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9035388)

RFE for short.

I'm going to plot out a few ideas for (hopefully) non-rubbish fantasy elves over the next week or so on my blog.

I guess I'll be reading your blog for a while, then, as I toss around some ideas of my own that I'll likely post here (well, in a different thread, but still...) as they come to me.

~ jason

6inTruder

06-21-2008 06:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Was it just me what missed the Gus Van Sant movie?

noisms

06-21-2008 07:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9036196)

Was it just me what missed the Gus Van Sant movie?

Crap, I completely forgot about Elephants. Okay, I'll do them in the next entry.

Littleredfox

06-22-2008 01:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9032013)

Elf

who live an idyllic existence in a utopian-socialist woodland paradise and never ever make mistakes.

Which leads to the question of the cost of that paradise. Beyond the cost of black leather armour for the National Arboreal Singers and Druids Party stormtroopers, the little old grannies running thier networks of small woodland animal informers and the over the top denunciations of the gnomish problem from the Great Leader in all the scrying pools.

Consider how reliant they mst be on Augury and other divination if the society can claim to never make mistakes. Alternatively just how much glamour and illusion magic are they expending to keep people believing in thier infallibility. It explains why they need to keep death camping orcs and gnomes as blood sacrifices.

Lukas Sjöström

06-22-2008 01:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kromelizard (Post 9032885)

That's because a whole lot of people can't read anything more difficult than the Hobbit.

I wouldn't have anything against elves as portrayed in the Hobbit. Those are certainly flawed in their own way, the drunken bastards.

Wakboth

06-22-2008 03:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Not to disparage anyone in this thread, but I'm starting to find elf-hate just as annoying as elf-love, and the only thing more cliched (by now) than the oh-so-superior Goody elves are the racist rat-bastard Nasty elves. (It's the same thing as the assholish paladins, typified by Miko Miyazaki... ;))

Why can't people just let elves be people, with both good and bad sides?

Wields-Rulebook-Heavily

06-22-2008 04:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9037334)

Not to disparage anyone in this thread, but I'm starting to find elf-hate just as annoying as elf-love, and the only thing more cliched (by now) than the oh-so-superior Goody elves are the racist rat-bastard Nasty elves. (It's the same thing as the assholeish paladins, typified by Miko Miyazaki... ;)

Why can't people just let elves be people, with both good and bad sides?

Because that would make too much sense.

I kind of like one such interpretation of elves, though; They're magically mutagenic. They evolve incredibly slowly thanks to their generation gap being longer than a human lifetime, but they do have the ability to take advantage of natural magic around them within one or two generations, which is why there are so many types of elves for different ecosystems, and why elves construct big magical places to congregate around (whether those are just magical trees or Forgotten Realms style Mythals or even magical royalty); it's a form of genetic/magical manipulation meant to bring forward certain characteristics in the population.

Of course, there are often all kinds of unintended side effects. The Underdark is inhabited by so many aberrations that the Drow mindset becomes aberrant to normal survival strategies and often quite inhuman. The serene woodland types, on the other hand, start to think like trees, hence why they perceive the seasons so differently- long life has nothing to do with it.

It may be overthinking it, but it does lead to interesting possibilities. What would an urban elf be like? :p

Littleredfox

06-22-2008 05:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9037334)

Why can't people just let elves be people, with both good and bad sides?

Perhaps because traditionally elves are closer to vampires than any other mythical creature in powers and behaviour. Both are mindhacking semi immortal superhuman monsters with an odd set of allergies and a dislike for christian symbols.

Elves just have better PR. Call them the fair folk so they don't come round and stuff your spleen up your nose for a laugh and all that.

Putting them in the role of looking too good to be true seems normal after that sort of stuff. That they tend to be tall and blond makes a Nazi pastiche an obvious way of doing it.

Of course this could always be gnomish propaganda. The Protocols of the Elder Gnomes may in fact be an authentic copy of the gnomish master plan to scapegoat the elves as a stepping stone to conquering the world.

Elvish totalitarianism may be justified, or not. And makes for a more interesting place for the PC's to visit than an arboreal paradise. Players are more likely to find things to do running from The All-Elven Extraordinary Commission for Combating Arson, Thieves and Woodcutters or the Un-Elven Activities Committee than they are interacting with Lady Galdriel's Harp Quartet.

Mostly because players tend to like things they can try and blow up. And rescuing the elven proletariat from their evil overlords offers plenty of opportunity for mayhem.

Sleeper

06-22-2008 05:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9037334)

Why can't people just let elves be people, with both good and bad sides?

Because it's so much more fun to assume the last elvish nation was overrun by a horde of orcs and their vile necromantic lieges. The squads scoured the forest and rounded up the last straggling remnants of the elvish population, and hauled them back to the labs of their evil overlords. The wicked wizards and clerics then tortured the entire race, using their malign magics to keep their victims alive while they removed their spines and visera.

That didn't last long, in elvish terms. Within a 100 years, a nearby human empire rose to prominence. Their legions firebombed the forest, depleting their stockpile of hundreds or thousands of wands of fire. The victorious human magi took pity on the pathetic remnants of the once-slightly-less-pathetic race, and used a great spell to preserve them, albeit in their horribly mutilated state.

The remaining elves live among the scorched stumps of their former homeland, the ragged flaps of skin on their back sewn together over the gaping hollow where all their vital organs once where. Timid, fearful, frail, and unable to reproduce after a century of torment, they are treated like zoo animals or circus freaks. Dwarf, gnome, human, halfling and tourists of other races come to visit, to gawk, so they can tell their children they really did see the last of the elves. They nudge each other and mutter, "I thought they were supposed to be pretty?"

JasonK

06-22-2008 05:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well, since we're having this discussion here... ;)

Here's the thing with elves. They live Beyond the Fields of Men, but the King of Elfland lives in a castle and has a beautiful daughter. In myth, elves always have always held the Dangerous Beauty of Perfection. In myth, they seduce you and they lie to you, but never with cruelty - only because they're the Other; their time is not our time, and their rules are not our rules.

Now turn that into a PC race. Turn that into a PC race when man has long-since mastered the Deep Woods of your reality and they're no longer scary; in a time when nothing is really Other to you. It's hard to keep the alien-ness, the sense of different priorities and lies of ignorance. How do you make that come across in a race write-up? How do you get folks to play that?

Well, maybe you can't. So you leave it all out, and just stick with the surface. So you get these impossibly beautiful, impossibly perfect creatures, and the stagnation and illusion beneath never gets exposed. At least, not until players have a bad reaction to what they see and take it entirely too far in the other direction and you get Fascist Elves.

The question, I figure, is how to find a happy middle-ground.

~ jason

noisms

06-22-2008 10:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9037334)

Why can't people just let elves be people, with both good and bad sides?

I agree, which is why I like Tolkien's Noldor: Despite their obvious good points, they ended up destroying paradise in the name of idiotic pride.

I like what JasonK had to say in the post above this one. D&D Elves went too far one way (ultra-good), so there is sometimes an equally strong counter reaction (making them ultra-bad).

I think that's why you rarely see evil, fascist Dwarves depicted in D&D settings. Dwarves are already quite well balanced; they're good, but at the same time their flaws - greed, xenophobia, bloody-mindedness - are readily apparent. This makes them more believable and more sympathetic, to my eyes, and means there doesn't end up being such a strong backlash as there is with Elves.

noisms

06-22-2008 01:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elephant

As with the Dolphin, I'm not entirely sure why Elephants get their own entry rather than coming under the Mammal one. Are Elephants really that popular or interesting? Still, it's a welcome return to MM writers trying to describe real-world animals that everybody knows about anyway: "Elephants have thick, baggy hides, covered with sparse and very coarse tufts of gray hair. The elephant's most renowned feature is its trunk, which it uses as a grasping limb." Hmm... A 'trunk', you say?

The entry tries to pass Elephants off as peaceful herbivores. I suspect PETA girl's influence again, because really, who wants to include Elephants in a D&D game unless they're going to be a) trampling people to death or b) being used as war-steeds (and trampling people to death)? Also, I've seen documentaries, and I know Elephants ain't no peaceful herbivores. They're violent, aggressive beasts who kill hundreds of people every year.

On the other hand, the entry is neutral about the ivory trade, as bird entries are with egg-thieving. I agree with that, of course (I hate it when modern day sensibilities intrude into a fantasy about medieval cultures) but I wonder what PETA girl had to say about allowing PCs to sell Elephant tusks for 600gps a pop.

Also included are:

Mammoths - basically a bigger, hairier, meaner variety, whose tusks are 50% more expensive than an Elephant's.

Mastadons - almost exactly the same as a Mammoth.

Oliphants - ripped off from Tolkien's Oliphant, these have shorter tusks which are only worth 100-400 gps.

Naxuul

06-22-2008 02:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Did you skip over Aquatic Elves and Drow, Noism?

-Naxuul

noisms

06-22-2008 04:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 9038982)
Did you skip over Aquatic Elves and Drow, Noism?

-Naxuul

No: I forgot about Elephants - technically they should come before Elves - so I changed the order around just for that entry. I'll be doing Aquatic Elves and Drow next.

Sleeper

06-22-2008 04:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9038783)
Oliphants - ripped off from Tolkien's Oliphant, these have shorter tusks which are only worth 100-400 gps.

Samwise described them as "big as a hill", but at least the 1st edition version from the MM2 was smaller than a normal elephant (fewer HD). It's more charitable to say both Tolkien and D&D drew from the same sources, since oliphant is a very common archaic version of the word "elephant". The medieval musical instrument made from a tusk is even called an "olifant", most famously in the Song of Roland.

Sounds like 2E continued to carry on the myth that mastodons and mammoths were larger than modern elephants. In reality, mastodons and most mammoths were comparable in size to the Asiatic elephant, and only the very largest species of mammoth exceeded the modern African bush or savanna elephant in size. The specimen mounted in the Smithsonian is one of the largest land mammals that ever lived.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9039129)

Samwise described them as "big as a hill", but at least the 1st edition version from the MM2 was smaller than a normal elephant (fewer HD). It's more charitable to say both Tolkien and D&D drew from the same sources, since oliphant is a very common archaic version of the word "elephant". The medieval musical instrument made from a tusk is even called an "olifant", most famously in the Song of Roland.

Sounds like 2E continued to carry on the myth that mastodons and mammoths were larger than modern elephants. In reality, mastodons and most mammoths were comparable in size to the Asiatic elephant, and only the very largest species of mammoth exceeded the modern African bush or savanna elephant in size. The specimen mounted in the Smithsonian is one of the largest land mammals that ever lived.

I'm learning a lot from this thread.

Until yesterday I didn't even know there was a difference between mastodons and mammoths. Now you tell me that they weren't even very big!

Wakboth

06-22-2008 09:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9038438)

I agree, which is why I like Tolkien's Noldor: Despite their obvious good points, they ended up destroying paradise in the name of idiotic pride.

Thinking about it, the Noldor seem like a very good model for Exalted: larger than life, yet still very much human, and with deep, massive, character-defining flaws to offset their tremendous potential.

Quote:

I think that's why you rarely see evil, fascist Dwarves depicted in D&D settings. Dwarves are already quite well balanced; they're good, but at the same time their flaws - greed, xenophobia, bloody-mindedness - are readily apparent. This makes them more believable and more sympathetic, to my eyes, and means there doesn't end up being such a strong backlash as there is with Elves.

Very good point. And the polarization between good and evil dwarves is nowhere near as strong as it is with elves and drow; the duergar are just dwarves with their bad sides emphasized, whereas the drow are presented as anti-elves.

I expect we'll see more discussion about this, once you hit the drow. :)

Sleeper

06-22-2008 09:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9039517)
I'm learning a lot from this thread.

Until yesterday I didn't even know there was a difference between mastodons and mammoths. Now you tell me that they weren't even very big!

They were very big. Excluding the dwarf species, they weighed several times as much as the 2nd and 3rd largest land mammals alive today (the hippo and the white rhino are in a dead heat). And while the largest land mammal of all time is basically a giant hornless rhino with too many names, the next couple slots are all proboscideans.

But the modern Asiatic and African forest elephants are pretty good sized as elephants go, and the African bush elephant is definitely on the large side.

DMH

06-23-2008 04:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

They didn't give the elephants a swim speed. Watching them cross a river that is deeper than they are tall is a bit strange- usually only their trunks are visible.

Pastor Dick

06-23-2008 10:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Notice that the 2e elephant is the pachyderm equivalent of a ninja.

kelvingreen

06-23-2008 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pastor Dick (Post 9041340)
Notice that the 2e elephant is the pachyderm equivalent of a ninja.

I thought that was the 3.Xe version?

(See discussion of elephant paladin of Ganesh about four pages back)

The Last Conformist

06-23-2008 10:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9039517)
I'm learning a lot from this thread.

Until yesterday I didn't even know there was a difference between mastodons and mammoths. Now you tell me that they weren't even very big!

Something that perhaps needs to be stated more clearly: there were many different species of mammoths and mastodonts. The smallest mammoth species were smaller than any of the living elephants; the largest larger. I'm less familiar with mastodonts, but I don't think any of them exceeded the African bush elephant in size.

Lugh

06-23-2008 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9037334)
Why can't people just let elves be people, with both good and bad sides?

Because then they're just humans with pointy ears. Elves have no significant physical distinction from humans, other than unearthly beauty and extended life span. Hence, to make them actually different, they have to have a significantly different culture. Given that most of us are not master storytellers, capable of sketching the subtle differences into nuances of speech and attitude that highlight the alien while keeping the familiar, we paint in broad strokes. And, alignment is the simplest palette D&D has to work with.

bluejay

06-24-2008 12:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

To follow up on Lugh's point, often these kind of Elvish archetypes (Tolkien's Elves, Star Trek Vulcans, etc) are used to help define what we value about our humanity by showing a society which lacks certain aspects (or exaggerates others).

noisms

06-24-2008 01:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elf, Aquatic

Aquatic Elves are basically High Elves, but under water; their abilities are essentially the same, but given an 'aquatic' twist - so that Aquatics are good with tridents instead of bows, good at hiding inside seaweed instead of woodland, etc. Their favourite method of attack is to entangle opponents in nets, and they often employ the dreaded Very Intelligent Dolphins as pets - although the MM is quick to point out that the Dolphins are actually "companions" rather than just animals. Tch.

There are a large number of those mysterious plot hook hints that we all know and love in this entry:

- Magic - "On some worlds" Sea Elves are unable to cast spells. I'm assuming that's because in some published campaign settings Sea Elves can't be spellcasters, whereas in some they can? But interestingly, there is a legend among such Sea Elves that their magic was stolen from them by the Drow in eons past; that sounds like an overarching plot for a series of adventures if ever there was one. Intrepid adventurers setting off to restore the Sea Elves' lost magic - this is the stuff pulp fantasy is made of.
- Sahuagin - Sea Elves "generate a passion for conflict with the sahuagin that surprises even themselves" (?), and will take any opportunity to kill them (and to kill sharks). This rather jibes with all the high-minded stuff at the beginning of the entry about how peaceful and live-and-let live Sea Elves are. But it would be quite fun for a group of PCs to stumble across a full-on war between Aquatic Elves and Sahuagin.
- Malenti - these are rare Sahuagin children who, for some reason, are born to look exactly like an Aquatic Elf. This only happens if Sea Elves are present within a mile of the Sahuagin parents. The Malenti is an evil Sahuagin in mind, but an Elf in body, and if it gives birth to offspring (by shagging a Sahuagin) then said offspring will be Malenti too. In this way entire communities of Sahuagin can end up becoming Malenti. That would be a fun encounter for an underwater adventure - a band of Malenti who roam the seas, enslaving foolish humanoids who let their guard down when they see a pack of apparent Sea Elves floating about.
- "An aquatic elf who makes a promise will carry out his obligation unto death. Should he be killed before he can succeed, his entire band will work to see that the promise is fulfilled. On the other hand, aquatic elves do not accept promises from non-elven characters. The sea elves know that they are the only race with the honor to carry out the duties of its dead members. And, besides, only elves live long enough to guarantee that they will have the time to fulfill a vow."
- Lastly, Sea Elf legends tell of another race of Aquatic Elves who can shapechange into sea otters or dolphins - but such races "have never been found".

Whitemagebishieboy

06-24-2008 02:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9042768)

Because then they're just humans with pointy ears. Elves have no significant physical distinction from humans. other than unearthly beauty and extended life span. Hence, to make them actually different, they have to have a significantly different culture. Given that most of us are not master storytellers, capable of sketching the subtle differences into nuances of speech and attitude that highlight the alien while keeping the familiar, we paint in broad strokes. And, alignment is the simplest palette D&D has to work with.

This, there not human. Ergo there psychology should be fundamentally different, is it so hard to comprehend a non-human intelligence with biological programming that leans toward one alignment over another? I argue that humans are biologically lawful in D&D terms.

Sleeper

06-24-2008 02:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 9044703)
I argue that humans are biologically lawful in D&D terms.

On a tangential note, I tend to wince everytime someone says that the races in D&D aren't races, but species. Magic makes no sense in a scientific paradigm, so using a modern understanding of biology and even psychology to justify elements of a fantasy setting is no more rational than just using a metaphorical explanation -- and basing it on magical thinking and dream logic is actually truer to the original source material. Though that's an entirely separate discussion.

But elves as greys (or mi-go, to mix in a little Delta Green) could be interesting cross-genre mix.

Whitemagebishieboy

06-24-2008 03:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9044739)
On a tangential note, I tend to wince everytime someone says that the races in D&D aren't races, but species. Magic makes no sense in a scientific paradigm, so using a modern understanding of biology and even psychology to justify elements of a fantasy setting is no more rational than just using a metaphorical explanation -- and basing it on magical thinking and dream logic is actually truer to the original source material. Though that's an entirely separate discussion.

Naturally? Psychologically? Inherently? I can use different terms if you'd like, but humans in D&D are supposed to be human thus i'd assume they think the same way we do, while an elf, dwarf or other race/monster/critter/abomination would have an alien mind set. They are after all not human, and human is more about how we think than merely what we look like.

David J Prokopetz

06-24-2008 03:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 9044804)
Naturally? Psychologically? Inherently? I can use different terms if you'd like, but humans in D&D are supposed to be human thus i'd assume they think the same way we do, while an elf, dwarf or other race/monster/critter/abomination would have an alien mind set. They are after all not human, and human is more about how we think than merely what we look like.

There's no reason to presume that this is the case, tho', unless you're playing with definitions and claiming that anything with a mindset that sufficiently resembles that of a real-world human qualifies as human, regardless of gross physiology.

Sleeper

06-24-2008 03:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 9044804)

Naturally? Psychologically? Inherently? I can use different terms if you'd like, but humans in D&D are supposed to be human thus i'd assume they think the same way we do, while an elf, dwarf or other race/monster/critter/abomination would have an alien mind set. They are after all not human, and human is more about how we think than merely what we look like.

Like I said it was a tangent, so it wasn't really aimed at your post at all. But it's not the terminology that's an issue. There's a difference between an exotic human culture using a modern understanding of the social sciences like anthropology (Tekumel has some good examples), an attempt to project a possible alien culture developed by a non-human physiology and environment (good sf), and a creature that is a metaphorical representation of an aspect of humanity that creates an emotional resonance in those hearing about it (like in most of the original legends and myths). There's a tendency to prefer the first two and dismiss the last one as illogical, but that's a modern bias. Magic inherently clashes with a scientific approach, and while a pseudo-scientific explanation may create a degree of verisimilitude for some people, it's no less illogical than adopting the non-scientific approach wholesale.

JasonK

06-24-2008 04:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9044668)

- Sahuagin - Sea Elves "generate a passion for conflict with the sahuagin that surprises even themselves" (?), and will take any opportunity to kill them (and to kill sharks). This rather jibes with all the high-minded stuff at the beginning of the entry about how peaceful and live-and-let live Sea Elves are. But it would be quite fun for a group of PCs to stumble across a full-on war between Aquatic Elves and Sahuagin.
- Malenti - these are rare Sahuagin children who, for some reason, are born to look exactly like an Aquatic Elf. This only happens if Sea Elves are present within a mile of the Sahuagin parents. The Malenti is an evil Sahuagin in mind, but an Elf in body, and if it gives birth to offspring (by shagging a Sahuagin) then said offspring will be Malenti too. In this way entire communities of Sahuagin can end up becoming Malenti. That would be a fun encounter for an underwater adventure - a band of Malenti who roam the seas, enslaving foolish humanoids who let their guard down when they see a pack of apparent Sea Elves floating about.

Generally, I have an unreasoning hatred of the "just like our land-based cousins, only in the water" races, but these two little snippets make my mind reel. This is one of those bits of D&D mythology that I've carried at the forefront of my mind for ages now. I have yet to make use of it (underwater adventures? Not really for me.), but it's too good not to keep in mind.

Quote:

Lastly, Sea Elf legends tell of another race of Aquatic Elves who can shapechange into sea otters or dolphins - but such races "have never been found".

Lies! They both totally showed up in the 2E Dragonlance boxed set. :)

~ jason

kelvingreen

06-24-2008 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9044668)

[]Malenti - these are rare Sahuagin children who, for some reason, are born to look exactly like an Aquatic Elf. This only happens if Sea Elves are present within a mile of the Sahuagin parents.*

The Malenti are one of the best D&D ideas, and one that's never, to my knowledge, been explained away. It's just sitting there in the MM, tempting the adventurous GM. What's perhaps most interesting is that the Sahuagin don't realise what they have in the Malenti, and kill them at birth, when they could raise them as spies or assassins.

Deadmanwalking

06-24-2008 05:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9045057)

The Malenti are one of the best D&D ideas, and one that's never, to my knowledge, been explained away. It's just sitting there in the MM, tempting the adventurous GM. What's perhaps most interesting is that the Sahuagin don't realise what they have in the Malenti, and kill them at birth, when they could raise them as spies or assassins.

Only sometimes, there's mention of doing that too, if I recall correctly.

And yeah, really fun idea.

andreww

06-24-2008 05:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9045057)

The Malenti are one of the best D&D ideas, and one that's never, to my knowledge, been explained away. It's just sitting there in the MM, tempting the adventurous GM. What's perhaps most interesting is that the Sahuagin don't realise what they have in the Malenti, and kill them at birth, when they could raise them as spies or assassins.

There is a similar sort of idea in the old Shadow Elves Gazetteer for BECMI.

The shadow elves (decidedly not drow) occasionally give birth to deformed children (they have a nuclear power plant, seriously!). They leave such children in tunnels away from their homes where they are sometimes found and raised by local tribes of humanoids. Because they are generally smarter they often end up leading those tribes.

kelvingreen

06-24-2008 06:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 9045066)

Only sometimes, there's mention of doing that too, if I recall correctly.

Not in the MM, as far as I remember, but I often remember poorly. ;)

Deadmanwalking

06-24-2008 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9045185)

Not in the MM, as far as I remember, but I often remember poorly. ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by 2E MM, p. 111

"Most of the time these offspring, known as malenti, are eaten by their parents. Once in a great while, a malenti is allowed to live to adulthood because its physical resemblance to an aquatic elf, in combination with its sahuagin upbringing and attitude, make it an ideal spy in elven communities."

So yeah, it actually is mentioned.

Oh, and this is another passage that makes great story fodder:

Quote:

Originally Posted by 2E MM, p. 111

"Few aquatic elves believe in the existence of malenti, as they suggest some disturbing possibilities about sahuagin origins."

That explains the "generate a passion for conflict with the sahuagin that surprises even themselves" line somewhat, and sets the sahuagin up as aquatic drow/driders which is, in fact, really cool. Particularly if the PCs discover it in-game and the aquatic elves need to be convinced of it so as not to be utterly infiltrated with malenti saboteurs...

DMH

06-24-2008 08:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The concept of malenti could be applied to many other races. Elves and orcs might hate each other because they cause similar mutations. Kobolds are reptiles unless within so many miles of (uh, is there any dog people?) and then hatch as mammals or the reverse.

Hmm, how about making elves and dwarves mutant humans- those born within forests or on mountains. If they have children elsewhere, they are born human.

kelvingreen

06-24-2008 08:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 9045312)

So yeah, it actually is mentioned.

Okay, okay, I said I often remember poorly; your pedant-fu is strong. ;)

sim_james

06-24-2008 09:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9044668)

Lastly, Sea Elf legends tell of another race of Aquatic Elves who can shapechange into sea otters or dolphins - but such races "have never been found".

Dimernesti and Dargonesti respectively - the Dargonesti in particular got a lot of fleshing out in Dragonlance supplements.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Whitemagebishieboy (Post 9044703)

I argue that humans are biologically lawful in D&D terms.

Agreed.

Most elves in Dragonlance were pretty lawful too, the stiff-necked bastards!

noisms

06-24-2008 10:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9045432)

Hmm, how about making elves and dwarves mutant humans- those born within forests or on mountains. If they hav children elsewhere, they are born human.

You really could be onto something there. That's a really interesting twist on demihuman races. Of course you'd have to explain halflings too.

Littleredfox

06-24-2008 11:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9044668)

Elf, Aquatic

although the MM is quick to point out that the Dolphins are actually "companions" rather than just animals. Tch.

Which leads to the possibilities of either an Aquatic Tardis or Geisha Dolphins.

Or that the Docotrs Companions all reincarnate as dolphins. Which might explain a few of the Very Intelligent Dolphin traits.

"Squee Klick Klick Squee Klick" [Trans: Benson, Big Chap with Four Arms, Five Rounds Rapid.]

DMH

06-25-2008 08:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9045698)

You really could be onto something there. That's a really interesting twist on demihuman races. Of course you'd have to explain halflings too.

Halflingland? ;)

I wouldn't use plains as standard humans already fill those. A quantity or quality of food would be good for their size but not their culture. For all the near humans, maybe there are just regions where magic causes certain kinds of humanoids to be born.

Or relics of the body of the first whatever must be within 100 miles. So if you want to expand, you have to chip the bone or cut the hair even smaller (to a point and then 1 location is screwed since their relic was destroyed).

noisms

06-25-2008 10:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Elf, Drow

Yep, we've reached that entry. It doesn't seem worth holding forth on my feelings for the Drow, as you probably have your own feelings on the race already set in stone; suffice to say, "Do. Not. Want."

Thankfully, there are a few points of interest in the entry:

- Drow have a system of sign language, with which, by combining with changes of facial expression, they can communicate very effectively. An interesting idea, and it raises the question of sign language in a D&D game. In all my D&D games over the course of 14 years or so, I don't think I've ever had two characters in a party who could use sign language to communicate. That's unusual, because when you think about it it's a very useful skill. It also gives me an idea: spell casting has a vocal component, right? But what if somebody were to come up with a system of magic in which the 'magic words' were invoked through sign language? Could a dumb mage exist? Or a mage who could cast spells even if magically silenced?
- Drow really are stupidly overpowered; how is it that an entire race are able to make all of their armour and shields out of the vanishingly rare metal adamantite?
- "Drow live in magnificently dark, gloomy cities in the underworld that few humans or demihumans ever see. They construct their buildings entirely out of stone and minerals, carved into weird, fantastic shapes. Those few surface creatures that have seen a dark elf city (and returned to tell the tale) report that it is the stuff of which nightmares are made." Well, okay, leaving aside the cheesy cliché, how is it that a race of murderous devils who "all scramble for power" and for whom "violent conflict is a part of everyday life" were able to cooperate long enough to build these cities? That's not a facetious question; I'd like to hear ideas. My own way of explaining it is that Drow cities were not really built by the Drow - they are ancient ruins of cities built eons ago by a long-forgotten race, and which the Drow are merely occupying. And what if, someday, that race were to return...?

- "The Drow believe that the strongest should rule; their rigid class system, with a long and complicated list of titles and prerogatives, is based on the idea." This doesn't make sense. If the Drow believe that the strongest should rule, then surely that is incompatible with a rigid class system, because believing that the strongest should rule is really just a form of meritocracy.
- Drow artifacts dissolve in sunlight. I think this was put into the game as a way to prevent players getting their hands on such artifacts in the long term, which strikes me as annoying. I've always hated it when DMs prevent their PCs from using NPCs' and monsters' special weapons ("No! You can't use the wizard saxinraxin's wand because....as soon as you touch it it turns to dust!") and this seems like that tendency writ large across an entire race of being.

Drider

A Drider is a Drow that has failed a "special test" set for him or her by Lolth, and so has been turned into a spider-centaur (arachnataur?). They are treated as outcasts by the Drow and mostly hang out with giant spiders. I was once involved in a game in which we (the PCs) teamed up with a Drider to help him get revenge on a group of Drow brigands. Good times.

kelvingreen

06-25-2008 11:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9049659)

My own way of explaining it is that Drow cities were not really built by the Drow - they are ancient ruins of cities built eons ago by a long-forgotten race, and which the Drow are merely occupying. And what if, someday, that race were to return...?

Drizzt sandwiches.

Apart from being even more infuriatingly poncey than normal elves, I was always slightly put off by the fact that the predominant (if not only) matriarchal society in D&D is also irredeemably evil.

The Last Conformist

06-25-2008 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Drow really are stupidly overpowered; how is it that an entire race are able to make all of their armour and shields out of the vanishingly rare metal adamantite?

Clearly, adamantite is vanishingly rare because the Drow are hogging just about all of it. :p

Kapten

06-25-2008 11:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Every description of the drow make them feel Lawful to me. I can't fathom why they have Chaotic Evil as alignment. Maybe because it's the most 'Evil' of the Evil alignments but it's still weak.

Pitch black elves that live underground is from Scandinavian folktales and myths* so I'm with the drow that far. What I don't like is the huge underground cities, the religion of the drow and the way they generally are so detailed that they go from a mythological feel to something from a bad study in anthropology.

*The word "svartalv/svartalf" means literally "black elf". Not much is known about them except that they are pitch black, greedy, evil and live underground. There is some theories that dwarves and svartalvs are the same creature in the sagas (dwarves in the sagas are generally on the dark grey scale of morality). Also, when on the subject: It's not svartalfar!! I see this a lot of times. Plural form in the Scandinavian languages is -er, not -ar.

Sleeper

06-25-2008 11:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9049659)

"Drow live in magnificently dark, gloomy cities in the underworld that few humans or demihumans ever see. They construct their buildings entirely out of stone and minerals, carved into weird, fantastic shapes. Those few surface creatures that have seen a dark elf city (and returned to tell the tale) report that it is the stuff of which nightmares are made." Well, okay, leaving aside the cheesy cliché, how is it that a race of murderous devils who "all scramble for power" and for whom "violent conflict is a part of everyday life" were able to cooperate long enough to build these cities? That's not a facetious question; I'd like to hear ideas. My own way of explaining it is that Drow cities were not really built by the Drow - they are ancient ruins of cities built eons ago by a long-forgotten race, and which the Drow are merely occupying. And what if, someday, that race were to return...?"

Think Project Runway or Top Chef except with architecture. A race of emo-goth interior decorators who enslave entire races to fulfill their artistic whims. Where being pretty and popular is everything. Fierce.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9049659)

"The Drow believe that the strongest should rule; their rigid class system, with a long and complicated list of titles and prerogatives, is based on the idea." This doesn't make sense. If the Drow believe that the strongest should rule, then surely that is incompatible with a rigid class system, because believing that the strongest should rule is really just a form of meritocracy.

I imagine it is a meritocracy, overall. But there's no sense of fair play. If you start with a rich and powerful mom, you're going to use that influence to give you a leg up on things.

That has interesting consequences. Drow only respect force of arms, and force of personality. A house would last only as long as there is a strong and charismatic leader to hold them together. Every generation, there's a major shakeup. Houses are founded, and then cast down when the leader is slain or past her prime, and in the following chaos new houses are founded and come into prominence. Due to their longevity, this could last hundreds of years. But it's almost never more than a single generation. There are no real dynasties or legacies; the children lap at their powerful parent's feet and use and abuse that influence, but most of them live in terror not just of their mother but of her death, because they know if their house appears to weaken even a little bit, the other houses will swarm like spiders and devour them. And then all those privileged children will be put to the sword or spell. A few of the more talented might juggle a web of loyalties, and pledge their allegiance to another rising house and survive that way. But not many. And once every couple generations, a strong daughter might be able to hold her mother's house together for another generation, but this would be vanishingly rare.

So you end up with a caste of spoiled rich kids, who know they're all going to be slaughtered when mom starts getting old and weak. Some abuse their positions horribly, living for the moment. Some scramble to make alliances, in the probably-futile attempt to survive the forthcoming interregnum. The other drow look at them with hungry and jealous eyes, waiting for the chance to kill them all.

noisms

06-25-2008 11:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9049756)
Drizt sandwiches.

Apart from being even more infuriatingly poncey than normal elves, I was always slightly put off by the fact that the predominant (if not only) matriarchal society in D&D is also irredeemably evil.

I noticed that too, actually.

I sometimes devote some thought to a little pet theory I have about male RPG designers. I call it the Male Game Designer And Their Attitudes To Women Threefold Model (MGDATATWTM, or MugDataTwutum, for short).

1.) The first strand of designers are normal in the broad sense; i.e. they just like making fun games. These are the Normals.

2.) The secondary strand worry unduly that there aren't many female role players, because it means they have no chance to meet women. So they misguidedly create races like the Drow in the hope that it'll attract girls to the game. Preferably hot, bisexual girls. These are the Frustrated.

3.) The third strand are called the Masochists. Like the anime artists who draw waif-like chicks with huge broadswords and the creators of Electra, these are designers who for whatever reason get a kick out of seeing women overpower men. It isn't enough for them to create a sensible matriarchal society; the only such society they can envisage is a terrifying, murderous, predatory, dysfunctional one. And yet one gets the sense that they would rather like to live in it.

The Normals wouldn't have created the Drow, but while they are the most numerous strand, they are disunited and find it difficult to counteract the combined efforts of the Frustrated and the Masochists. This is why races like the Drow exist.

Of course, the alternative is Blue Rose. Surely somebody somewhere must have come up with a believable, realistic matriarchal society in a role playing game?

glass

06-26-2008 12:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9044739)

On a tangential note, I tend to wince everytime someone says that the races in D&D aren't races, but species.

Especially since, even if we are going by biology, humans and elves (at least) are the same species because they are inter-fertile.

glass.

The Last Conformist

06-26-2008 12:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9049811)

Also, when on the subject: It's not svartalfar!! I see this a lot of times. Plural form in the Scandinavian languages is -er, not -ar.

Actually, "elves" in Icelandic (and Old Norse, which is essentially medieval Icelandic) is álfar with -ar (sg álfur, Old Norse sg álfr). Modern Swedish has alver or alfer, Danish alfer, Norwegian alver (Bokmål) or alvar (Nynorsk).

(Source: the articles about Elves in the Icelandic, Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian versions of Wikipedia.)

Lukas Sjöström

06-26-2008 12:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9049811)

Every description of the drow make them feel Lawful to me. I can't fathom why they have Chaotic Evil as alignment. Maybe because it's the most 'Evil' of the Evil alignments but it's still weak.

Pitch black elves that live underground is from Scandinavian folktales and myths so I'm with the drow that far. Who I don't like is the huge underground cities, the religion of the drow and the way they generally are so detailed that they go from a mythological feel to something from a bad study in anthropology.*

The word "svartalv/svartalf" means literally "black elf". Not much is known about them except that they are pitch* black, greedy, evil and live underground. There is some theories that dwarves and svartalvs are the same creature in the sagas (dwarves in the sagas are generally on the dark grey scale of morality). Also, when on the subject: It's not svartalfar!! I see this a lot of times. Plural form in the Scandinavian languages is -er, not -ar.

Actually, the "svartr" that is used to describe dark elves of Nordic folklore refers to hair, not skin (in the same way that "blond" only refers to hair). They're also described as "fölr", that is, corpse-pale. This isn't very surprising, since elves were, in their role as earth-spirits, associated with death. Even less surprising if you consider the fact that they were created from the maggots of Ymir's flesh.

(un)reason

06-26-2008 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 9050027)

Especially since, even if we are going by biology, humans and elves (at least) are the same species because they are inter-fertile.

glass.

Yes, but by that logic, dragons and virtually everything are the same species. Which, yeah, doesn't really work. Magic makes sensible genetics go out the window.

On drow. They're a pretty good example of the fact that chaotic races can still build societies, simply because the lessers are sensible enough to know when to lick boot rather than be killed. That and while they may hate each other, there are plenty of other species around that they hate even more. It's amazing how dysfunctional family dynamics can get without breaking down entirely, and thats just in the real world.

Malignant Marionette

06-26-2008 01:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9049819)

The Normals wouldn't have created the Drow

Oh come on. They're a subterranean spider-worshipping race where the priesthood holds all the power and only women are allowed in. No magical strapon of penetration +5 or anal circumference scores. Saying stuff like them would've been created by either sexually frustrated nerds or dumbasses giggling to themselves because of the ruckus their new race will create just isn't cool.

I for one see the drow as a welcome (although nowadays somewhat overused) change from the nondescript elf subrace which gives me a stat bonus in whatever I need to make the most munchkin character or yet another wizard-created monster of random bits. More different and quirky fleshed-out races with a fantastic feel like drow, illithid and sahuagin for me please.

As for Drizzt, the books can be left unread and fanboys who won't shut up about him or who want to play a good drow can be smacked.

noisms

06-26-2008 01:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9050219)

Oh come on. They're a subterranean spider-worshipping race where the priesthood holds all the power and only women are allowed in. No magical strapon of penetration +5 or anal circumference scores. Saying stuff like them would've been created by either sexually frustrated nerds or dumbasses giggling to themselves because of the ruckus: their new race will create just isn't cool.

I didn't say anything about dumbasses giggling about ruckuses. And hey, the only reason there were no magical strapons of penetration +5 is because D&D is a parental guidance deal. ;)

In all seriousness I didn't really mean that the Normals wouldn't have created the Drow. That was a poorly worded sentence. What I meant was that the Normals wouldn't have created the Drow as the malicious matriarchy of spider-worshippers which they are. I mean, the associations between femme fatales and poisonous spiders is pretty well established.

Kapten

06-26-2008 02:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kahyrn (Post 9050163)

Actually, the "svartr" that is used to describe dark elves of Nordic folklore refers to hair, not skin (in the same way that "blond" only refers to hair). They're also described as "fölr", that is, corpse-pale. This isn't very surprising, since elves were, in their role as earth-spirits, associated with death. Even less surprising if you consider the fact that they were created from the maggots of Ymir's flesh.

What is your source? Not that I don't trust you, I'm interested in learning more about them! The book I read just stated that very little is known about them and that they are black skinned. Sort of like Surt.

Malignant Marionette

06-26-2008 02:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9050272)

I didn't say anything about dumbasses giggling about ruckuses.

That referred to the masochists. ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9050272)

In all seriousness I didn't really mean that the Normals wouldn't have created the Drow.

What I meant was that the Normals wouldn't have created the Drow as the malicious matriarchy of spider-worshippers which they are.

But would drow really be drow without the whole evil matriarchy who considers them superior to men? And more importantly, why wouldn't the normals (Actually referring to some people as 'the normals' feels actually kinda creepy. :o) design them as such? Is it just because of the sexual undertones? If so, would designing a fantasy culture based on some real-life culture where, say, women are considered property or less human or something similar be something a normal wouldn't do?

I'm not saying the drow or something like them couldn't have been created by people like the ones you mentioned. I'm just concerned about why they couldn't have been created by perfectly normal, well-adjusted people.

ogier300

06-26-2008 03:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

* Drow really are stupidly overpowered; how is it that an entire race are able to make all of their armour and shields out of the vanishingly rare metal adamantite?

Electroplating, I bet. That authentic adamantine chain mail is really just regular chain mail with a thin layer of adamantite on it to prevent the Underdark fungus from growing on it.

Quote:

Well, okay, leaving aside the cheesy cliché, how is it that a race of murderous devils who "all scramble for power" and for whom "violent conflict is a part of everyday life" were able to cooperate long enough to build these cities? That's not a facetious question; I'd like to hear ideas.

I imagine competitive work teams of Drow, fighting to be the first to complete the project. The reason the architecture is so unusual, weird and the stuff on nightmares is because the buildings are constructed in short bursts by different parties of Drow and their slaves who end up being driven off by other Drow work parties in a constant struggle to be the one to complete the building. Each work party has its own vision of what the building should look like and works hard to make the building conform ... but no one group ever has enough time to complete an entire building on its own.

The party travelling through the Underdark stumbles onto a Drow village in the middle of being constructed and finds a dozen different groups engaged in a death struggle to put the shingles on the roof and drywall the interior.

Quote:

This doesn't make sense. If the Drow believe that the strongest should rule, then surely that is incompatible with a rigid class system, because believing that the strongest should rule is really just a form of meritocracy.

Perhaps it's the strongest in each class that rules that class, but is not permitted to rule or change into another class. A might-makes-right meritocracy inside each rigid class division...

Quote:

Drow artifacts dissolve in sunlight.

A terrible side effect of the electroplating process. They would have fixed the problem, but the competitive teams working on the project killed each other while battling to assemble to the magical lab they planned to work in.

kelvingreen

06-26-2008 03:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9050528)

I'm not saying the drow or something like them couldn't have been created by people like the ones you mentioned. I'm just concerned about why they couldn't have been created by perfectly normal, well-adjusted people.

The one major female-led society in the game is evil and depraved. Whether deliberate or not, that's not particularly normal and well-adjusted.

The only other D&D matriarchal society I can think of off the top of my head is the Githyanki, and that's ruled by a paranoid witch who consumes the souls of her own people. It's not the best way to dispel the perception that this is a male hobby for guys who don't understand women.

Inyssiis

06-26-2008 03:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9050616)

The one major female-led society in the game is evil and depraved. Whether deliberate or not, that's not particularly normal and well-adjusted.

The only other D&D matriarchal society I can think of off the top of my head is the Githyanki, and that's ruled by a paranoid witch who consumes the souls of her own people. It's not the best way to dispel the perception that this is a male hobby for guys who don't understand women.

The other D&D matriarchal society I think of off the top of my head? Gnolls. Lazy, cruel, vicious psychopaths with claws and fangs, coated in grime and filth, stinking of blood and excrement; savage, depraved, cannibalistic demon-worshipper hyena-barbarians with no redeeming features unless you count "good at fighting".

That help?

Wakboth

06-26-2008 04:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 9050647)

The other D&D matriarchal society I think of off the top of my head? Gnolls. Lazy, cruel, vicious psychopaths with claws and fangs, coated in grime and filth, stinking of blood and excrement; savage, depraved, cannibalistic demon-worshipper hyena-barbarians with no redeeming features unless you count "good at fighting".

That help?

Well, that at least is well founded in the reality of hyena biology and sex roles. :) (Incidentally, I thought elves would work perfectly well as the "nice" matriarchal society, and it would make the drow society a more natural fit for a race of demon-perverted elves.)

On the subject of drow alignment, 3e made them NE as a race, which IMO fits their description better. I tend to assume their general attitude is "Everybody hang together, or get hanged alone", tempered by demon-worship, wonky social dynamics and a horrible xenophobia. And not just in the sense of hating strangers, but genuine fear of everyone not like them; Underdark is the dumping ground for races and creatures nobody wants on the surface, but who are too tough to die out. So all their neighbours either outnumber (goblinoids) or outpower (illithids, beholders) them.

On the subject of drow being "spoiler monsters", well sure! The disintegrating equipment is only one thing. They have the darkness ability, to mess with PCs ranged attacks, Faerie Fire to ruin invisibility or concealment, levitation to commit unexpected ambushes and/or to run away to harass the characters on another day. Everything in their game mechanics screams "They were designed to be a pain for an average player group to deal with!". :D

Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily

06-26-2008 04:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9049811)

The word "svartalv/svartalf" means literally "black elf". Not much is known about them except that they are pitch black, greedy, evil and live underground. There is some theories that dwarves and svartalvs are the same creature in the sagas (dwarves in the sagas are generally on the dark grey scale of morality)

Citation?

Quote:

Also, when on the subject: It's not svartalfar!! I see this a lot of times. Plural form in the Scandinavian languages is -er, not -ar.

Wrong, actually. Svartálfar is correct.

Elemental

06-26-2008 08:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by ogier300 (Post 9050604)

The party travelling through the Underdark stumbles onto a Drow village in the middle of being constructed and find a dozen different groups engaged in a death struggle to put the shingles on the roof and drywall the interior.

I now want to do a campaign that starts with the PC's inheriting a drow construction company. :)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 9050647)

The other D&D matriarchal society I think of off the top of my head? Gnolls. Lazy, cruel, vicious psychopaths with claws and fangs, coated in grime and filth, stinking of blood and excrement; savage, depraved, cannibalistic demon-worshipper hyena-barbarians with no redeeming features unless you count "good at fighting".

That help?

As of 3E (maybe earlier), there's also the Eladrins.

Crinos

06-26-2008 08:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Trolls are also matriarchal.

sanguine

06-26-2008 08:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by ogier300 (Post 9050604)

I imagine competitive work teams of Drow, fighting to be the first to complete the project. The reason the architecture is so unusual, weird and the stuff on nightmares is because the buildings are constructed in short bursts by different parties of Drow and their slaves who end up being driven off by other Drow work parties in a constant struggle to be the one to complete the building. Each work party has its own vision of what the building should look like and works hard to make the building conform ... but no one group ever has enough time to complete an entire building on its own.

Now I want the campaign centered on the Drow GAO, and resolving bid disputes between major Drow conglomerates.

"Kellog, Drow, and Root protests the awarding of Lolth's General Services Contract for the underground city of Menzoberanzan to Illithid Telephone and Telegraph, on the grounds that ITT's past performance was not "Superior" as indicated by the Menzoberanzan Procurement Office, and did, in fact, lead to extensive brain-eating on the part of Illithid tech services staff.

The GAO supports this protest."

randomgamer8466

06-26-2008 09:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9034171)

Well, that's from when I was seventeen. :)

The elves are immortal, but they can't breed. Instead they steal infants from our world, and eventually these children are changed by the magic of the otherworld into full grown elves. Those who leave before this process is complete are half-elves.

RULE! D&D never did anything cool with the changeling myth. This is better than Nazi elves and Melnibonean elves put together.

Kakita Kojiro

06-26-2008 10:46 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Elemental (Post 9051230)

I now want to do a campaign that starts with the PC's inheriting a drow construction company. :)

Go all out: Flip This Dungeon! You've got Adventurers coming through, and you're on a tight deadline here... no time to do anything involved; you'll have to make it look good. Too long to grow some Yellow Mold; just get some yellow-brownish carpet. Not enough budget for Beholders; maybe you can pick up some Gas Spores at the Bone Depot. Didn't budget for secret doors? Hang some curtains then.

Don't forget to stick some halflings in the oven before the Adventurers show up -- the smell of baking puts people in a good mood, after all.

Or bacon, that is. The smell of bacon. Anyway.

SuperG

06-26-2008 10:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9049819)

I noticed that too, actually.

I sometimes devote some thought to a little pet theory I have about male RPG designers. I call it the Male Game Designer And Their Attitudes To Women Threefold Model (MGDATATWTM, or MugDataTwutum, for short).

1.) The first strand of designers are normal in the broad sense; i.e. they just like making fun games. These are the Normals.

2.) The secondary strand worry unduly that there aren't many female role players, because it means they have no chance to meet women. So they misguidedly create races like the Drow in the hope that it'll attract girls to the game Preferably hot, bisexual girls. These are the Frustrated.

3.) The third strand are called the Masochists. Like the anime artists who draw waif-like chicks with huge broadswords and the creators of Electra, these are designers who for whatever reason get a kick out of seeing women overpower men. It isn't enough for them to create a sensible matriarchal society; the only such society they can envisage is a terrifying, murderous, predatory, dysfunctional one. And yet one gets the sense that they would rather like to live in it.

The Normals wouldn't have created the Drow, but while they are the most numerous strand, they are disunited and find it difficult to counteract the combined efforts of the Frustrated and the Masochists. This is why races like the Drow exist.

Of course, the alternative is Blue Rose. Surely somebody somewhere must have come up with a believable, realistic matriarchal society in a role playing game?

Well, reality is a bit short on actual matriachal societies - which probably is just a sad commentary on humans and their historical tendency to hand power over to the military.

YojimboC

06-26-2008 11:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9049659)

[]"Drow live in magnificently dark, gloomy cities in the underworld that few humans or demihumans ever see. They construct their buildings entirely out of stone and minerals, carved into weird, fantastic shapes. Those few surface creatures that have seen a dark elf city (and returned to tell the tale) report that it is the stuff of which nightmares are made." Well, okay, leaving aside the cheesy cliché, how is it that a race of murderous devils who "all scramble for power" and for whom "violent conflict is a part of everyday life" were able to cooperate long enough to build these cities? That's not a facetious question; I'd like to hear ideas. My own way of explaining it is that Drow cities were not really built by the Drow - they are ancient ruins of cities built eons ago by a long-forgotten race, and which the Drow are merely occupying. And what if, someday, that race were to return...?"*

I think it comes from having such varied slave stock. Duergar, derro, orcs, mind flayers, skum, aboleth, kuo-toa, svirfneblin, some hook horrors, etc. Just weird geometries and design aesthetics come out of a mix like that.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9045698)

You really could be onto something there. That's a really interesting twist on demihuman races. Of course you'd have to explain halflings too.

Homo florensis. Humans born on islands.

spookshow

06-26-2008 01:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I can understand being sick and tired of drow (and elves in general). They've victims of their own success, overexposed and overused, to the point where I personally feel "enough already, lets see something else." I actually feel the same way about orcs and dwarves.

But I think HATING popular fantasy races like these is ridiculous. It's one of those things about some gamers that bother me -- a weird, deep-seeded and overblown resentment towards anything that becomes too popular. If you always thought drow were stupid, that's fine. But I'm willing to bet when they first read about them, the vast majority of the people now brimming with drow-hate actually thought the race was pretty cool.

Lukas Sjöström

06-26-2008 04:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 9050448)

What is your source? Not that I don't trust you, I'm interested in learning more about them! The book I read just stated that very little is known about them and that they are black skinned. Sort of like Surt.

Nothing but the Wikipedia article on Norse dwarves, I'm afraid. It mentions that the word used for dark skin tone should be "blár", which makes sense, with Africa being "Bláland" and all that.

Kaptan

06-26-2008 04:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily (Post 9050825)
Citation?

"Nordiska sagor och hjältar", it's from 1912. Don't remember who wrote it.
Quote:

Originally Posted by Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily (Post 9050825)
Wrong, actually. Svartálfar is correct.

I am a native speaker of Swedish. In Swedish it's Svartalv, svartalver plural. Norwegian and Danish don't have the -ar suffix for plural.

Also, if you are a native speaker, you don't need to use á. We know how to pronounce it from the beginning.

The Last Conformist

06-26-2008 05:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 9052637)
I am a native speaker of Swedish. In Swedish it's Svartalv, svartalver plural. Norwegian and Danish don't have the -ar suffix for plural.

Also, if you are a native speaker, you don't need to use á. We know how to pronounce it from the beginning.

I too am a native speaker of Swedish, but "Svartálfar" is not a Swedish word - it's Icelandic. (And native Icelanders do use the accent. It indicates vowel quality, not stress.)

Also, Nynorsk (one of the two official written standards for Norwegian) certainly does have the -ar plural, most relevantly in alvar "elves".

(un)reason

06-26-2008 06:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9051242)
Trolls are also matriarchal.

Must resist internet Analogy. Must Stop ... Talking .. Like . Kirk. :D

medivh

06-26-2008 06:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Incidentally, I've heard Svartelver in use in Denmark.

Lukas Sjöström

06-26-2008 08:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9052712)
I too am a native speaker of Swedish, but "Svartálfar" is not a Swedish word - it's Icelandic. (And native Icelanders do use the accent. It indicates vowel quality, not stress.)

*Also, Nynorsk (one of the two official written standards for Norwegian) certainly does have the -ar plural, most relevantly in alvar "elves".*

As does Old Norse, which is the most relevant language here.

noisms

06-26-2008 10:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ettercap

Okay, just to show I'm not such a grumpy old so-and-so after all, I do love a good Ettercap encounter. In many ways I actually think they're the perfect AD&D MM monster, although they aren't my absolute favourite. They have a great, evocative picture; the entry is short and sweet; they are just right for the level 3-6 sweet spot; they have just the right mix of abilities; they're really annoying for PCs to deal with; and they're full of instakill. Fantastic stuff all round.

If you're one of the unfortunates who doesn't know what an Ettercap is, it's an ugly bipedal pot-bellied thing with long arms and poisonous teeth which likes to hang around with giant spiders. Ettercaps are experts on setting traps made of "nets, tripwires and garottes" which they set up with silk glands like spiders; if you get caught in one, you may as well just lie back and wait for death, because within moments the Ettercaps will be on top of you with their save vs. poison or die bites.

That said, there isn't a huge amount of interest about the Ettercap entry, beyond it being really good. I like the line that "Ettercaps do not have a formal language. They express themselves through a combination of high-pitched chittering noises, shrieks, and violent actions," mainly because I don't think it's possible to have too many chittering noises, shrieks and violent actions in a game. I also like how an ounce of Ettercap poison is worth 1000gp; we haven't had usable monster corpses for a while, and it's a welcome return for the mini-genre.

medivh

06-26-2008 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Also

Ettercap = edderkop = danish word for spider.

Foxworthy

06-26-2008 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9053300)

Ettercap also like how an ounce of Ettercap poison is worth 1000gp; we haven't had usable monster corpses for a while, and it's a welcome return for the mini-genre.

That's a nice chunk of change, but I surely won't be the PC taking the job to go milk the ettercaps poison.

David J Prokopetz

06-27-2008 12:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by medivh (Post 9053468)

Also

Ettercap = edderkop = danish word for spider.

More directly, the term "attercop" turns up in Tolkien with reference to the spiders of Mirkwood.

Kakita Kojiro

06-27-2008 12:42 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9053668)
More directly, the term "attercop" turns up in Tolkien with reference to the spiders of Mirkwood.

I suspect its use in the Hobbit is why it turns up in dictionaries and etymologies -- as here -- as though it were a word in current use. Which is sort of odd and cool.

kelvingreen

06-27-2008 03:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9053300)
we haven't had usable monster corpses for a while, and it's a welcome return for the mini-genre.

Drowskin hats?

Wiolds-Rulebook-Heavily

06-27-2008 04:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9052637)
"Nordiska sagor och hjältar", it's from 1912. Don't remember who wrote it.

Hm. I've never heard the theory since, and I can't find the book to test it as a primary source, so hey.

(Snorri's Edda does have a couple of references to the gods descending into "Svartálfaheimur" to meet with dwarves, now that I've checked it, but Snorri isn't a particularly reliable source for how they Norse really envisioned it. Not only is the Edda a poetry manual which doesn't explain any of the mythology, but Snorri himself is infamous for altering or making up stuff to fill in gaps in his knowledge or for outright political purposes in other works.)

Quote:

I am a native speaker of Swedish. In Swedish it's Svartalv, svartalver plural. Norwegian and Danish don't have the -ar suffix for plural.

Also, if you are a native speaker, you don't need to use á. We know how to pronounce it from the beginning.

Native Icelandic speaker here. the "á" is just how we spell the accent. The word shares the Old Norse conjugation, which most certainly is "-ar".

...but we've wandered off topic. :p

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

That said, there isn't a huge amount of interest about the Ettercap entry, beyond it being really good. I like the line that "Ettercaps do not have a formal language. They express themselves through a combination of high-pitched chattering noises, shrieks, and violent actions," mainly because I don't think it's possible to have too many chattering noises, shrieks and violent actions in a game. I also like how an ounce of Ettercap poison is worth 1000gp; we haven't had usable monster corpses for a while, and it's a welcome return for the mini-genre.

Reminds me of the rather terrifying time I made my players go through once. It was a serial murder mystery with ettercap poison and ingeniously made garrotes and tripwires, and the PCs were off on a wild goose chase trying to discover which of the nobles (the only ones able to afford the poison) had decided to target several thief's guilds members. Turned out it actually was just an ettercap gone urban (hey, if raccoons can do it...) and the thieves were trying to make some easy gold by killing it and selling the poison. :D

DMH

06-27-2008 06:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

They do make good boogieman. Depending on how far the fangs go in, victims of ettercaps could be mistaken for vampire attacks.

But it isn't the ettercaps that should be the dangerous component of an encounter with them. They live with spiders and some very small spiders are very toxic.

noisms

06-27-2008 02:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9054596)

They do make good boogieman. Depending on how far the fangs go in, victims of ettercaps could be mistaken for vampire attacks.

But it isn't the ettercaps that should be the dangerous component of an encounter with them. They live with spiders and some very small spiders are very toxic.

Are there rules for very small toxic spiders somewhere in the MM? I can't find them on a brief flick-through.

Kaiten

06-27-2008 03:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ettercaps are yet another one of the monsters that make me go "Man, those are cool. I should totally use them for an encounter" and then I never do.

noisms

06-27-2008 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Eyewing

This is one of those monsters where the art is so bad that it's difficult to take the thing seriously. Which is a shame because, well - giant eyes with wings!!!!

The description is great: "An Eyewing's body is a fat, egg-shaped ball covered with matted black fur. The 5-foot-wide body is supported by a pair of five-foot-long leathery bat wings. Each wing is tipped with a set of three razor-sharp talons. An 8-foot-long rat's tail dangles from the back of the body. The tail ends in a small, sharp spur. It has no feet and has never been known to land.

The body is dominated by the single, bulging, 4-foot-wide eyeball. The eyeball is black with a blood-red pupil. A vile blue fluid continuously leaks from the eye, soiling its fur. Great leathery eyelids squeeze this fluid out and away from the creature. The stench is unbelievable. It gives off an acidic smell that scorches the sensitive tissues in other creatures' noses and mouths." I love it when the writers get carried away like that and start using words like vile, bulging, blood-red and stench.

Eyewings have an unusual attack; they are probably the only MM monster which kills you by crying. (This reminds me of the Cloaker, which kills you by having a good whinge.) It does this by flying past and dropping its poisonous tears onto you - although sadly the resultant save vs. poison isn't to see whether you die or not, but just how much damage you take. It can also do the regular scratch/tail lash type thing.

There are some fun bits and pieces in this entry too:

-"When left without orders they become sluggish and listless. This should not be taken to mean that they are any less dangerous. This listlessness is their expression of boredom, but nothing relieves eyewing boredom quite like tearing apart innocent creatures."

-"Eyewings have been encountered on the moon, where there is no air to breathe and no water to drink."

-"The more powerful creatures of the Abyss have no qualms about an eyewing snack should one be nearby."

I'm so going to use Eyewings as the pets of an evil archmage who is living on the moon. "Fly, my pretties!!!"

Wakboth

06-27-2008 09:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I think eyewings are another DL critter; note that they come from Abyss, but are LE. This doesn't really make sense except in DL, where "Abyss" is the generic name for the domains of the evil deities.

noisms

06-27-2008 09:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9056719)

I think eyewings are another DL critter; note that they come from Abyss, but are LE. This doesn't really make sense except in DL, where "Abyss" is the generic name for the domains of the evil deities.

You could be right, although weren't there three moons in Dragonlance? I can't remember.

Steve H

06-27-2008 09:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

They're definitely DL monsters - first appeared in the first 2nd Ed series of DL modules.

sim_james

06-27-2008 09:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Eyewings are indeed from Dragonlance, sort of; they appeared in one of the most pointless DL modules ever printed.

The strengths of DL include its memorable regions and landmarks, the interesting tripartate pantheon, and dramatic events (the Cataclysm, the War of the Lance). So naturally this trilogy of modules takes place almost entirely on the ethereal planes, against a demigoddess villain who was never seen before or since, and has minimal relation to anything else in DL.

Other kooky creatures introduced in this module series include friendly critters who look like Mr Slinky with eyeballs, and giant flowers through which you can peer through time.

DMH

06-27-2008 10:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9055821)

Are there rules for very small toxic spiders somewhere in the MM? I can't find them on a brief flick-through.

Yes and no. Hairy spiders on 326 are small enough and it would be easy to bump up the damage of their toxin (say to 35/death).

kelvingreen

06-27-2008 10:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9056514)

This is one of those monsters where the art is so bad that it's difficult to take the thing seriously. Which is a shame because, well - giant eyes with wings!!!!

I've always quite liked them, myself. Something similar appeared in the first Phantasy Star video game, although they were called "Owl Bears" for some unknown reason:

<http://www.rpgclassics.com/shrines/s...es/owlbear.gif>

Stronger versions called "Goldlens" and "Wing Eye" (almost!) turned up later.

DMH

06-27-2008 10:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9056514)

Eyewing

This is one of those monsters where the art is so bad that it's difficult to take the thing seriously. Which is a shame because, well - giant eyes with wings!!!!

Atlas did a interesting version in their Fantasy Bestiary. Eyaks, which are created by spellcasters, come in several colors, each with its own spell like ability. IOWs, they are cheap, disposable minions that can be used in huge flocks.

Lugh

06-28-2008 03:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9056949)

Atlas did a interesting version in their Fantasy Bestiary. Eyaks, which are created by spellcasters, come in several colors, each with its own spell like ability. IOWs, they are cheap, disposable minions that can be used in huge flocks.

Hmm. An intriguing possibility just occurred to me. What if, instead of the toxic blue gunk, and instead of a spell-like ability, each variety of eyewing "cries" a different potion/salve/etc.? They are deliberately created by alchemist-type mages to endlessly produce vital magical fluids. They'd still need something nifty as an attack form, to keep pesky adventurers from just stealing them and "milking" them. Oh, and each one would have an ioun stone at the center, which helps keep them aloft.

Lukas Sjöström

06-28-2008 04:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9056886)

I've always quite liked them, myself. Something similar appeared in the first Phantasy Star video game, although the were called "Owl Bears" for some unknown reason:

<http://www.rpgclassics.com/shrines/s...es/owlbear.gif>

Stronger versions called "Goldlens" and "Wing Eye" (almost!) turned up later.

They had a bunch of them in Final Fantasy X as well. Those had similarly irrational names, such as "Veteran", though I've long since stopped to expect monster names to make sense in those games. Or monster anything, really.

kelvingreen

06-28-2008 05:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9056949)

Atlas did a interesting version in their Fantasy Bestiary. Eyaks, which are created by spellcasters, come in several colors, each with its own spell like ability. IOWs, they are cheap, disposable minions that can be used in huge flocks.

I seem to recall that the bog standard servant spirits in Shadowrun 2e were also winged eyeballs. It makes me wonder if all these games are getting these creatures from a common source, but I've never encountered anything similar in any mythology I'm familiar with (which is not a great deal, admittedly).

noisms

06-28-2008 01:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9057670)

Hmm. An intriguing possibility just occurred to me. What if, instead of the toxic blue gunk, and instead of a spell-like ability, each variety of eyewing "cries" a different potion/salve/etc.? They are deliberately created by alchemist-type mages to endlessly produce vital magical fluids. They'd still need something nifty as an attack form, to keep pesky adventurers from just stealing them and "milking" them. Oh, and each one would have an ioun stone at the center, which helps keep them aloft.

That's a nifty idea. In fact it fits into my archmage-who-lives-on-the-moon-and- breeds-eyewings concept. He could have a whole flock of the things.

Defense could be provided by a handy golem or two.

Crowetron

06-28-2008 10:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well, I know where my next campaign is taking place.

"The king wants you to retrieve an ancient scroll..."

"That that doesn't sound so--"

"From the moon."

"...shit."

A Letter From Prague

06-28-2008 10:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9056827)

So naturally this trilogy of modules takes place almost entirely on the ethereal planes,

Cool?

Quote:

Other kooky creatures introduced in this module series include friendly critters who look like Mr Slinky with eyeballs and giant flowers through which you can peer through time.

Awesome! What's this module called?

Littleredfox

06-29-2008 02:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9057855)

I seem to recall that the bog standard servant spirits in Shadowrun 2e were also winged eyeballs. It makes me wonder if all these games are getting these creatures from a common source, but I've never encountered anything similar in any mythology I'm familiar with (which is not a great deal, admittedly).

ISTR The udjat or Horus's left eye after it was torn out by Set growing wings and flying around. [Thoht helped him grow a replacement]

I can't recall where I saw that version of the myth though.

shirosan

06-29-2008 05:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9057855)

It makes me wonder if all these games are getting these creatures from a common source, but I've never encountered anything similar in any mythology I'm familiar with (which is not a great deal, admittedly).

I always imagined the source was the 60s, like so:

<http://img.photobucket.com/albums/v7...kins/BG105.gif>

That's a...sort of mythology..

E.T.Smith

06-29-2008 03:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9053668)

More directly, the term "attercop" turns up in Tolkien with reference to the spiders of Mirkwood.

It was my understanding (though I only ever read it in a Dungeon adventure, so it may not be official) that ettercaps reproduce by abducting halflings, cocooning them up and painfully transforming them over a period of days into ettercaps. Which I thought was a nice perversion of the monster's Tolkienesque origins.

demiurge1138

06-29-2008 06:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9059881)
Well, I know where my next campaign is taking place.

"The king wants you to retrieve an ancient scroll..."
"That that doesn't sound so--"
"From the moon."
"...shit."

I love it when the moon comes into D&D. One of my players had a character who had a maul of the titans and was all about breaking stuff. His ultimate goal was to shatter the moon, so as to free all of the dragons he was convinced were trapped inside.

Speaking of ettercaps (backtracking a bit...), I love those guys. Way scary in 2nd Edition (they're the reason I never beat Baldur's Gate, bastards). In 3e, with the new poison rules, not nearly as scary. Until I had a party blundering around a swamp end up all trapped in an ettercap web, with the bloated monsters descending to feed.

noisms

06-29-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9062271)
Speaking of ettercaps (backtracking a bit...), I love those guys. Way scary in 2nd Edition (they're the reason I never beat Baldur's Gate, bastards). In 3e, with the new poison rules, not nearly as scary. Until I had a party blundering around a swamp end up all trapped in an ettercap web, with the bloated monsters descending to feed.

That's the same reason I gave up on Baldur's Gate too! I thought I was a complete gaming no-hoper for not getting past those damn ettercaps. Admittedly I didn't try for very long, though.

Saz

06-29-2008 08:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

They are not hard once you where they are going to strike; so usually all it takes is a reload or two then you can place your spellcasters strategically and spam them with spells!

noisms

06-29-2008 08:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Saz (Post 9062397)
They are not hard once you where they are going to strike; so usually all it takes is a reload or two then you can plac your spellcasters strategically and spam them with spells!

I'm never patient enough with computer games for that. One or two defeats and I start throwing tantrums, and then my wife tells me off. It just ain't worth it. ;)

noisms

06-29-2008 09:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Feyr

Somebody should really have told the designers that it's just silly to give a monster a name which means something but it just spelled differently. I hate that faux medieval, "ye olde elfyn prynses and pyxys" thing. Just spell it Fear, okay?

Anyway, bad name, nice concept - nightmares made real, which feed off fear and do so by launching terrorist attacks at night in major cities. They only come into existence when there are a lot of highly strung people anyway - like in the height of summer, or at a time of famine - which makes them doubly interesting. I just love the idea of a group of PCs stuck in a city during the middle of a drought: Food supplies are running low, disease is spreading, and at night, strange beings haunt the streets... Cool opening for a campaign, actually.

Lots of little Feyrs make one Greater Feyr, which is tougher and also longer-lived. (Ordinary Feyrs are destroyed by daylight, so only usually live for one night.) Where ordinary Feyrs merely cause fear, Greater Feyrs can also infect people with sadness, hopelessness, hate, or other negative emotions. And another adventure idea develops - a city overcome by despair and depression, but nobody can figure out why. And yet another one, partly inspired by (I think) the third in the series of Michael Moorcock's Corum books - a city overcome by infighting, which infects even the PCs; can they cooperate together long enough to uncover the reason why?

Ever since reading the Feyr entry I've been unable to get the Fighting Fantasy gamebook title, An Appointment with F.E.A.R., out of my head.

kelvingreen

06-29-2008 10:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9062482)

Ever since reading the Feyr entry I've been unable to get the Fighting Fantasy gamebook title, An Appointment with F.E.A.R., out of my head.

Then An Appointment with Feyr would clearly be the name for your campaign!

sim_james

06-30-2008 12:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by A Letter From Prague (Post 9059902)

Cool?

If it was a generic module, maybe. As a Dragonlance module it was irritatingly disconnected from the DL setting.

Quote:

Originally Posted by A Letter From Prague (Post 9059902)
Awesome! What's this module called?

(Goes to bookshelf)

My mistake - eyewings were introduced in the DLE series (In Search of Dragons, Dragon Magic, and Dragon Keep), whereas the Slinky People come from the DLA series (Dragon Dawn, Dragon Knight, and Dragon's Rest). Both module series start on Krynn but culminate in kooky extraplanar stuff (the Astral Plane, Ethereal Plane, and yes, a trip to the moon).

Both series are by Rick Swan, and have a certain samey-ness to them (which is probably why they've merged in my memory). I get the impression that he wasn't particularly "into" Dragonlance.

The slinky people are called Gk'lok-lok:

Quote:

A gk'lok-lok stands about four feet tall. Its body is a series of thin tubes that glisten and sparkle like polished steel. Its torso is a single tube resembling the stalk of a plant, with two long tubes for legs ending in hooked "feet" and two tubes for arms that curl in seemingly random patterns.

Two thin stalks, which glisten like steel, extend from the "neck" of the torso. Each stalk ends in a bulging eyeball about one-fourth the size of the body. A violet iris surrounds the huge black pupil, and an aura of soft red flames surrounds the entire eyeball.

Although the text says "tubes" a lot, the illustration definitely makes them look like some kind of spring-creature.

The entire race bar one gk'lok-lok spend their entire lives sleeping. If threatened, they usually turn invisible and run away.

One wonders how this 1+1 HD lawful neutral creature was passed over when compiling the Monstrous Manual. ;)

DMH

06-30-2008 01:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The ecology of the feyr, which came out just after the advent of 3.0, added some spiffy stuff like brainwashed slaves.

And be happy with the spelling of feyr, it is much better than the 3.X version (I can't remember it exactly, but it much more gobblygook than feyr).

kelvingreen

06-30-2008 02:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9062866)

And be happy with the spelling of feyr, it is much better than the 3.X version (I can't remember it exactly, but it much more gobblygook than feyr).

"Fihyr", according to Wikipedia, and yes, it's far more silly than the original.

demiurge1138

06-30-2008 04:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

OK, that's it. You've inspired me to sneak some feyrs into my next campaign. It's already going to be set in a city beset by riots, plague and tyranny... they'll fit in just fine.

JasonK

06-30-2008 05:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9061963)

It was my understanding (though I only ever read it in a Dungeon adventure, so it may not be official) that ettercaps reproduce by abducting halflings, cocooning them up and painfully transforming them over a period of days into ettercaps. Which I thought was a nice perversion of the monster's Tolkienesque origins.

Awesome! That, right there, is enough to make me want to figure out how to add halflings back into my game world...

Or maybe let ettercaps reproduce by doing this to anyone...

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9062271)

I love it when the moon comes into D&D. One of my players had a character who had a maul of the titans and was a about breaking stuff. His ultimate goal was to shatter the moon, so as to free all of the dragons he was convinced were trapped inside.

Also brilliant!

~ jason

demiurge1138

06-30-2008 06:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9063319)
Also brilliant!

~ jason

That player actually did the math, extrapolating the hit points of an object with the dimensions of the moon. He calculated that he could sunder the moon in 111 days.

noisms

06-30-2008 08:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9064957)
That player actually did the math, extrapolating the hit points of an object with the dimensions of the moon. He calculated that he could sunder the moon in 111 days.

I love it when players do stuff like that.

A player in one of my games had this plan to travel to Gehenna and hire an army of Yugoloths with which to take over the world. (He was Lawful Neutral, and wanted to institute a 'benevolent dictatorship'.) He went to great effort to calculate how much gold and rewards would be needed, how to word the contracts, etc. All on graph paper which he kept in a special clear file in all his character notes.

Wakboth

06-30-2008 09:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Did you skip ettin, by the way? Or are those listed under the gigantic "Giant" section... (Don't have my MM around, so I can't check.)

noisms

06-30-2008 10:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9065405)

Did you skip ettin, by the way? Or are those listed under the gigantic "Giant" section... (Don't have my MM around, so I can't check.)

They in the gigantic Giant section. Which we'll be coming to pretty soon. We have a mammoth Fish entry before that, though.

Foxworthy

06-30-2008 10:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9065437)

We have a mammoth Fish...

That just gave me an idea for a huge hairy fish with tusk floating under a frozen lake just waiting to attack a party foolish enough to cross. Of course I'd probably be the only one not to groan at that.

noisms

07-01-2008 12:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Fish

The entry just says 'Fish', but it's really about Giant Fish, because the first paragraph is all about how the different varieties listed can swallow adventurers, like the whale with Jonah. If you do get swallowed you take 1hp damage per round until you can cut yourself free. Doesn't seem like enough damage to me - it's a giant fish's stomach acid, for goodness' sake.

Barracuda: "The first clue that a Barracuda is in the area might be a sudden pain in the foot, as the marauder swims by and bites off a few tender tones." Love it. I wonder if there are rules somewhere in the AD&D universe for what happens when you lose toes?

Carp, Giant: Not a carping giant, but a Giant Carp. Apparently it has "sharp, curved teeth" - which seems a bit fanciful; I don't remember my uncle's Koi having teeth. Don't they just go 'gulp, gulp' a lot?

Catfish, Giant: The Giant Catfish attacks by whipping its whiskers back and forth to poison you; this also seems a bit fanciful.

Dragonfish: Hooray! Instakill. This is rather like the real-world stonefish in that it lurks in shallow water waiting to be stepped on - the spines stab into your foot and inject you with slow-acting, deadly toxins.

Eel, Electric: This does what it says on the tin, zapping adventurers with bolts of electricity.

Eel, Giant: Again, a toothed fish that I don't think has teeth. (Somebody reading this who knows more about fish will now tell me that I'm an idiot and that they all have them.)

Eel, Marine: This is another electric variety which does more damage than the regular electric kind.

Eel, Weed: Hooray! Another instakill fish. If this one bites you, watch out - you have d4 rounds left to live if you fail the save. Oddly, out of all the kinds of fish, the Weed Eel gets the longest entry - a big, some would say needless, essay on the design of the thing's lair.

Gar, Giant: Another toothed fish, which likes to swallow people.

Lamprey: This is a leech-like fish which attaches itself to you and sucks your blood.

Land Lamprey: As above, but it also encumbers its victims, reducing their dexterity.

Manta Ray: This creature is armed with a stinger, but its favourite modus operandi is, you've guessed it, swallowing people.

Pike, Giant: This one gets just two short sentences. Surprise bonus. Lives in deep freshwater lakes. The end.

Piranha: There is a 75% chance that piranhas will attack if encountered (more weird exception-based design); I have to say it would be an admirable DM who resisted the urge to ignore dice rolling and just have the creatures attack for certain. Once blood has been drawn the piranhas go berserk and can attack twice per round.

Piranha, Giant: These fish like to leap out of the water to catch water fowl; is this based in reality??

Pungi Ray: Hooray! Yet another instakill fish. Again, this one kills you if you step on it.

Quipper: The wittiest fish alive. Not really; they're piranhas that live in colder waters.

Seahorse, Giant: These can constrict opponents with their tails, and can also be trained as steeds. I'm picturing a big underwater seahorse rodeo, complete with lassos.

Shark: The only one we're really interested in, and they only get a tiny entry to the effect that they're attracted to blood. Tell us something we don't know.

Shark, Giant: These megalodons can swallow people on an attack roll 4 greater than that required to hit.

Sting Ray: Sting ray....sting ray! One of Gerry Anderson's less well known efforts. These cause paralysis for 5-20 turns. I'm interpreting that to mean you end up drowning unless you can be brought to the surface within that time, because too few adventurers drown in games as a general rule. (Think about it - when was the last time it happened in one of your campaigns?)

Phew.

Zartes

07-01-2008 01:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9062905)
"Fihyr", according to Wikipedia, and yes, it's far more silly than the original.

coming in a bit late here, but I just wanted to say that finally the name of those things makes sense. Before, my mind always added a T to the name, which combined with my tendency to over-accentuate Ys meant I kept thinking of them as "fith-years"

kelvingreen

07-01-2008 01:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9065891)
coming in a bit late here, but I just wanted to say that finally the name of those things makes sense. Before, my mind always added a T to the name, which combined with my tendency to over-accentuate Ys meant I kept thinking of them as "fith-years"

The dreaded Fifth Years! We'll have to wait for "S" for "Schoolchild, Obnoxious".

demiurge1138

07-01-2008 02:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9065859)
These cause paralysis for 5-20 turns. I'm interpreting that to mean you end up drowning unless you can be brought to the surface within that time, because too few adventurers drown in games as a general rule. (Think about it - when was the last time it happened in one of your campaigns?)

A halfling rogue about four years ago. Was held under water by a kuo-toa were-octopus monk.

Which is why I love this game.

Crowetron

07-01-2008 02:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

That is a ridiculous amount of fish. Did they think the MM was short on aquatic monsters that they needed to toss in 21 different kinds of murderous fish?

Sleeper

07-01-2008 03:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9065859)
Eel, Giant: Again, a toothed fish that I don't think has teeth. (Somebody reading this who knows more about fish will now tell me that I'm an idiot and that they all have them.)

I know absolutely nothing about fish, but a little searching turned up this interesting article about the second pharyngeal set of jaws in moray eels that can jump out to drag prey back down the esophagus. Apparently, a living inspiration for Alien.

From Mark Westneat, curator of zoology at the Field Museum in Chicago: "Having a jaw in your throat that has long, recurved, canine teeth — and can actually shoot out of your throat into your mouth, grab a fish or something, and pull it down the throat — is highly unusual."

A book of monsters inspired solely by the weird corners of the natural world would be neat.

JRM

07-01-2008 03:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9065859)

Fish

Eel, Giant: Again, a toothed fish that I don't think has teeth. (Somebody reading this who knows more about fish will now tell me that I'm an idiot and that they all have them.)

Lots of species of eels have teeth, including some large predatory animals like moray eels and conger eels, but not all of them. Moray eels not only have teeth, they have four rows of teeth due to having an extra pair of jaws (the Pharyngeal jaws) that help them swallow prey - you can see a handy diagram on Wikipedia here.

EDIT: Oh, I see Sleeper beat me to it while I was composing this post. Oh well, it's the thought that counts. There are other animals with extra rows of teeth to help swallowing prey, like pythons and the extinct Mosasaurs, but I believe Morays are pretty unique in being able to project their interior jaws.

Quote:

*Manta Ray: This creature is armed with a stinger, but its favourite modus operandi is, you've guessed it, swallowing people.*

Alas, this is complete bunkum. Manta Rays are filter feeders whose throats are too narrow for them to swallow people even if they wanted to. If I remember correctly they don't have tail-stings either.

EDIT: I just checked and yup, mantas don't have stings, although plenty of other kinds of ray do. Manta rays are still very large and powerful fish, so they should be able to give a party of adventurers a mighty buffeting if they were so inclined.

Quote:

Sting Ray: Sting ray....sting ray! One of Gerry Anderson's less well known efforts. These cause paralysis for 5-20 turns. I'm interpreting that to mean you end up drowning unless you can be brought to the surface within that time because too few adventurers drown in games as a general rule. (Think about it - when was the last time it happened in one of your campaigns?)

Hmm... that would be last year in a Star Wars campaign I was running. Wouldn't have happened if the player-characters didn't leave one of their number chained unconscious to a chair bolted to the bridge-deck of the sinking ship they'd escaped from. I told the players they were forgetting something.

DMH

07-01-2008 05:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

As an angler that targets just carp, their listed attack is just silly when the real one is so much better. With shelled prey- inhale, mash with internal teeth, spit out shell and swallow meat. They are very good at this and eat clams and mussels. With small prey in mud- gulp mud, spit it out in suspension, pick prey out of mud cloud. A good 2 part attack to make the eatee think the fish gave up.

JRM

07-01-2008 07:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9066905)

As an angler that targets just carp, their listed attack is just silly when the real one is so much better. With shelled prey- inhale, mash with internal teeth, spit out shell and swallow meat. They are very good at this and eat clams and mussels. With small prey in mud- gulp mud, spit it out in suspension, pick prey out of mud cloud. A good 2 part attack to make the eatee think the fish gave up.

The first of those sounds just right for dealing with those pesky plate-armoured fighters.

Steve H

07-01-2008 07:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9065859)

Fish

Sting Ray: Sting ray....sting ray! One of Gerry Anderson's less well known efforts. These cause paralysis for 5-20 turns I'm interpreting that to mean you end up drowning unless you can be brought to the surface within that time, because too few adventurers drown in games as a general rule. (Think about it - when was the last time it happened in one of your campaigns?)

Oddly enough, the last time someone drowned in a game I ran was while running the previously mentioned DL modules which introduced Eyewings. The party's Paladin got caught in a cone-effect Paralysis from the Wizard and fell off their boat, with hilarious consequences (this is about 20 years ago now, but from memory we had several fumbled swim skill rolls from people trying to save him, as well as multiple failed healing rolls on attempt to give the kiss off life once he was out of the water)

The Last Conformist

07-01-2008 09:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9065859)

If you do get swallowed you take 1hp damage per round until you can cut yourself free. Doesn't seem like enough damage to me - it's a giant fish's stomach acid, for goodness' sake.

That's an interesting question I suppose - would the acid kill you before you drown? I'm fairly certain that piscine stomach juice is not human-breathable.

noisms

07-01-2008 10:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9066130)

That is a ridiculous amount of fish. Did they think the MM was short on aquatic monsters that they needed to toss in 21 different kinda of murderous fish?

And most of them are just variations on a theme - do we really need so many kinds of eels, carp and piranhas?

Then again, the tendency towards unnecessary creativeness is one of the things I really love about the 2nd edition MM. I know for a fact that I'll never use all of the Fish. But I can't help but enjoy the fact that they are there.

....Now all I can think about is a campaign in which the PCs encounter every kind of Fish.

g026r

07-01-2008 11:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9067765)

....Now all I can think about is a campaign in which the PCs encounter every kind of Fish.

The Giant's Banquet: The local ruler of a kingdom is planning on holding a banquet in honour of the ruler of a nearby giant kingdom with whom he hopes to finalize a peace treaty. In order to satisfy this visiting ruler's prodigious appetites, he hires the PCs to search out and bring back numerous creatures that can be used for food (scrambled roc eggs, anyone?) -- including, of course, several of the giant fish.

So it's not every kind, but it's the best you get on such short notice. :p

Sleeper

07-01-2008 04:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9067476)
I'm fairly certain that piscine stomach juice is not human-breathable.

Warning: If you have an aversion to NC-17 themes, skip the spoiler text.

Not until Beautiful Flower Who Fucks with Nature found an unexploited niche in the cross-species sexual tourism industry. All those handsome mermen and their fair maids, all those big strong dragon turtles, all those unmolested dolphins. Hiding away their sons and daughters in their grottos, underneath the sea.

But how to exploit this? Autoasphyxiation may be erotic, but drowning generally isn't. Beautiful Fucking Flower had a brainstorm, took an afanc, and turned it into a shuttle bus. The first trick was to cause the biliary glands to extrude a base to counteract the acid in the bile. No longer did a client's endurance have to be measured in hit points. The next trick was to hyper-oxygenate the fluid. All of a sudden, airy water. Not just harmless but breathable (if a bit strange) by terrestrial types. Equally important, it was also harmless and breathable (if a bit thin) by all those submarine races.

The bubbles even tickled, which was a definite plus. Even better however, the frothing quasi-liquid could suspend both inhaled and ingested compounds. Mild soporics and euphorics, male enhancement drugs, and even the occasional hallucinogen were part of the standard mix.

Of course, the poor thing could no longer digest food, so Beautiful Flower who Fucks with Nature welded a ring of sustenance onto one of the digit analogs in its right front fin.

All the draconic circles were soon a-twitter with the idea of an entire untouched realm of potential new sexual conquests, so they lined up to be engulfed by the maw of the giant fish.

Except for the black dragons, of course. Water breathing and dank and drippy lairs already went hand in hand. They just sniffed and tried to look all dark and cool as they said things like "once you had one locathah, you've had 'em all", and "slime's not all it's cracked up to be". Didn't quite work. They're still the stinky inbred country cousins of the hexapedal pseudo-lizard world. The rest of the dragons were just glad they had an excuse not to invite their hick relatives on their pleasure cruises.

So, children, the mighty wizard Beautiful Flower Who Fucks with Nature isn't the reason why half-dragons took over the Third Age (edition?) of the world. But that flotilla of modified afancs hosting an endless parade of carnal romps by dragons in every imaginable shapechanged form is definitely the reason why they took over every last damn soggy little niche.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9067765)

And most of them are just variations on a theme - do we really need so many kinds of eels, carp and piranhas?

Then again, the tendency towards unnecessary creativeness is one of the things I really love about the 2nd edition MM. I know for a fact that I'll never use all of the Fish. But I can't help but enjoy the fact that they are there.

Most of those showed up in the 1E MM, with a couple from the Fiend Folio and the MM2. And a few are missing, like the afanc, verme, and swordfish. River travel is nasty when the fish are bigger than your boat.

noisms

07-01-2008 05:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9068681)

snip*

You strange, sick person, you.

;)

noisms

07-01-2008 09:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Frog

Giant Frogs

Interesting, in a very low-grade way, that we get two entries in a row containing monsters which swallow people. Interesting also that the Frog entry seems to treat it in a more 'realistic' way - if you get swallowed by one you will die of asphyxiation within 3 rounds, no matter what. Unfortunately that only works with creatures under 3' tall - so watch out Gnomes and Halflings. With Human-sized beings the Frog just hooks them in with its tongue and repeatedly bites them until they are dead.

There isn't really much else to say about Giant Frogs. I like the idea of adventurers being caught, insect-like, by the amphibians' tongue, and reeled in towards certain death. And the rules deal with the situation in an elegant and simple way.

As with the Crayfish, I have an idea to write an encounter with a set of villagers who worship the Giant Frogs of the local marshland, and try to capture travelers to offer up as sacrifices to the Great Croakers.

Killer Frogs

Killer Frogs! You can't get more pulpy than that. These have teeth and claws with which to attack, and they love the taste of human flesh.

Poisonous Frogs

The Poisonous Frog secretes a contact poison through its skin. Disappointingly, the poison is very weak, and there is "no market for it". Seems like the designers missed a trick there - what could be better than giant poison arrow frogs, with toxins which adventurers could spread on their blades?

Lugh

07-01-2008 10:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9069304)
Poisonous Frogs

The Poisonous Frog secretes a contact poison through its skin. Disappointingly, the poison is very weak, and there is "no market for it". Seems like the designers missed a trick there - what could be better than giant poison arrow frogs, with toxins which adventurers could spread on their blades?

Tsk, tsk indeed. I mean, at the very least, they could have inserted the rumour that there is a species of poisonous frog that produces euphoric hallucinations in those who lick it.

Then you would have doughty adventurers capturing frogs, prepping neutralize poison in case it was the wrong species, and licking the frogs. Comedy gold!

demiurge1138

07-02-2008 01:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

My favorite encounter from a rather abortive module I ran a while back involved a moat full of giant frogs. That the halfling monk promptly fell in.

He was always armed, so he was pretty good at punching his way out of a bloated frog belly. But as soon as he escaped one, another two or three tongues would hit him, and the frogs would tug-of-war, the winner snapping him up and swallowing.

That character made it to shore at -9 hit points. At least four frogs exploded from the inside floated in his wake.

demiurge1138

07-02-2008 01:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Nothing to see here. Move along...

durecellrabbit

07-02-2008 05:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I can't believe I missed this awesome thread until now. This was the book which got me into RPGs.

JRM

07-02-2008 05:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

There are a bunch of older D&D monsters that live in water and can swallow PCs up to the size of a halfling. It can suck to be small in D&D, you can't swim across a river without worrying about being gulped down by a giant gar.

As for the frog-worshipping swamp village, it reminds me of the Greyhawk cult of Wastri the Hopping Prophet.

If you get bored of the Monstrous Manual's frogs you could try the Giant Vampire Frog from Dragon #50. That's a cat sized gliding frog with blood-sucking fangs that ambushes adventurers from trees.

noisms

07-02-2008 01:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9070853)

If you get bored of the Monstrous Manual's frogs you could try the Giant Vampire Frog from Dragon #50. That's a cat sized gliding frog with blood-sucking fangs that ambushes adventurers from trees.

That sounds a bit like the Yaramayahoo from Australian Aboriginal mythology. A giant tree frog which drops out of trees and swallows children.

noisms

07-02-2008 01:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by durecellrabbit (Post 9070838)

I can't believe I missed this awesome thread until now. This was the book which got me into RPGs.

I blame the Fighting Fantasy books for my introduction to RPGs, but the 2nd edition Monstrous Manual is probably the main reason I stuck with them.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Fungus

Hmm. Fish, Frogs and Fungus all in a row; this is a tough slog, even though each entry is interesting and usable in its own way. I think as a youth I kept skipping this section and moving on to the more interesting Giants, Gnolls and Goblins just around the corner. (G is the longest section of the MM and probably the best.)

Straight away we get an error: "Fungi are simple plants..." I get to show off my very limited biological knowledge by saying that no, Fungi most certainly aren't plants. They're their own Kingdom, though whether they have a King or not I'm unsure.

What's unusual about this entry is that there is quite a detailed section explaining what ordinary Fungi are and what they can be used for - this despite the obvious fact that this is a Monstrous Manual and ordinary Fungi are not monsters. (And indeed don't do anything except, well, grow.) There is some mention of the fact that alchemists and the like can use them, but disappointingly no information on the deadly varieties.

Other types include:

Violet Fungus - These have tentacle-like structures which lash out at living things, causing necrosis on a failed save.

Shriekers - These have a good relationship with Violet Fungus: the Shriekers make a big racket if anybody approaches, which attracts wandering monsters - and presumably the Violet Fungus then gorge themselves on the resultant bodies.

Phycomid - These spit spores which will quickly take over and kill a person if they fail a saving through. The resultant corpse then becomes another Phycomid. I'd love to include a whole city of Phycomids in a D&D campaign - like the fantasy equivalent of Dawn of the Dead.

Ascomoid - Another instakiller, this rolls over you, spitting spores, which kill you within 1d4 rounds through "infection of [your] internal organs".

Gas Spore - This is "90% likely to be mistaken for a Beholder" (did someone mention exception-based design?), and floats around waiting to be struck - whereupon it will explode, doing hideous amounts of damage and, yes, infecting whoever it strikes. The victims then have 24 hours to live, whereupon they produce a new batch of Gas Spores themselves.

Fungus are a deadly bunch. Plenty of interesting ways for a crafty DM to destroy adventuring parties in the entry. (I mean, of course, plenty of interesting ways to "challenge" his players.)

JRM

07-02-2008 11:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9072220)

That sounds a bit like the Yaramayahoo from Australian Aboriginal mythology. A giant tree frog which drops out of trees and swallows children.

Haven't heard of Yaramayahoo before. They sound more like regular giant frogs that lives in trees (a Giant Tree Frog?) than the Giant Vampire Frog, since the latter doesn't swoop down to swallow victims entire, but drinks their blood.

Anyhows, there are a bunch of Australian Aboriginal monsters statted up in the Call of Cthulhu book Terror Australis. I've got a copy of the original book lying around here somewhere, but it's been so long since I read it I can't remember much of the details. The monsters were mostly supernatural beings, and included things like reed-thin humanoids that used deadly magical weapons and if you had carnal relations with one you'd transform into one of their kind, and chameleons so huge they could swallow men like insects.

JRM

07-02-2008 11:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9073594)

Fungus

Straight away we get an error: "Fungi are simple plants..." I get to show off my very limited biological knowledge by saying that no, Fungi most certainly aren't plants. They're their own Kingdom, though whether they have a King or not I'm unsure.

Of course they have monarchs, or are you forgetting the Myconid King? I have had PCs run into one of them ruling an underdark Myconid community a couple of times, since I think they are pretty fun guys.

Malignant Marionette

07-03-2008 12:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9073705)

I think they are pretty fun guys.

Urgh. The puns are worse than the instakill monsters. :p

JRM

07-03-2008 01:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9073958)

Urgh. The puns are worse than the instakill monsters. :p

It's an tired old pun compared to 'In the lands of mortar, where the sandlings lie', but I just couldn't resist.

Speaking of instakill monsters, 60% of the fungi have 'save or die' spores, although not all are instakill, and that doesn't include yellow mold, which is presumably taxanomically a fungus, albeit not of the 'giant murder-mushroom' variety.

There are real life species of fungi which snares tiny animals in loops of mycella and then digests them. I'm sure there are giant adventurer-eating variety lying around in various D&D homebrew campaigns - there were in mine. There's also a Fighting Fantasy solo-adventure in a Warlock magazine that features such a giant noose fungus.

noisms

07-03-2008 01:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

There is something genuinely frightening about being trapped and slowly digested by a giant fungus. No matter how much you struggle you can never escape...

Mark Krawec

07-03-2008 01:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

If you saw the Planet Earth miniseries a while back, you may remember the cordyceps fungus that infects ants' brains, drives them insane, then erupts out of their heads to spread spores around the colony. Surely there has to be an adventurer-borne variety lurking in a dungeon somewhere!

DMH

07-03-2008 01:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The one fungus they should have included is the zygom. It is like the Cordyceps in that it controls its host. It also provides great jokes when the old host and new host are glued together for a day or two.

JRM

07-03-2008 04:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mark Krawec (Post 9074105)

If you saw the Planet Earth miniseries a while back, you may remember the cordyceps fungus that infects ants' brains, drives them insane, then erupts out of their heads to spread spores around the colony. Surely there has to be an adventurer-borne variety lurking in a dungeon somewhere!

There are a number of functionally/conceptually similar monsters in D&D - Sons of Kyuss are an undead equivalent, Yellow Musk Creepers are plants whose pollen turns humanoids into half-alive slaves, who eventually go mad and wander away to die, spouting another Yellow Musk Creeper where they fell. Elder Myconids can produce spores that can turn a recently deceased corpse into a 'fungal zombie' used to guard myconid settlements.

In the real world there are lots of parasites that alter their hosts behaviour - for example, there's one (Toxoplasmosis) that cause mice to become attracted to the smell of cats, so the cat becomes infected.

Kakita Kojiro

07-03-2008 10:01 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9073594)

Gas Spore - This is "90% likely to be mistaken for a Beholder" (did someone mention exception-based design?), and floats around waiting to be struck - whereupon it will explode, doing hideous amounts of damage and, yes, infecting whoever it strikes. The victims then have 24 hours to live, whereupon they produce a new batch of Gas Spores themselves.

I know it is (usually) a bad idea to mix faux evolution with fantasy settings, but I've always wanted someone to make use of the idea that Beholders have apparently been around long enough for gas spores to have "evolved" to look just like them as camouflage. I mean, that probably took a really, really long time, right? So beholders are that old. Kind of creepy, eh?

Mind you, it's a very weird reproductive mechanism those gas spores apparently have. All kinds of opportunities for a backstory by someone clever, I'd think.

noisms

07-03-2008 01:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9075990)

I know it is (usually) a bad idea to mix faux evolution with fantasy settings, but I've always wanted someone to make use of the idea that Beholders have apparently been around long enough for gas spores to have "evolved" to look just like them as camouflage. I mean, that probably took a really, really long time, right? So beholders are that old. Kind of creepy, eh?

What if, for some sinister purpose, Beholders were creating Gas Spores?

g026r

07-03-2008 01:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9076558)

What if, for some sinister purpose, Beholders were creating Gas Spores?

It's all a mechanism so that a beholder can get a good night's rest without adventurers taking cheap shots in its sleep.

I mean, you'd certainly think twice about sneaking up and whacking that sleeping beholder from behind if you weren't certain it wasn't really a gas spore, wouldn't you? :p

Sleeper

07-03-2008 02:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9076558)

What if, for some sinister purpose, Beholders were creating Gas Spores?

Well, sinister is the heraldic term for left. The title of LeGuin's Left Hand of Darkness comes from Torner's Lay, which makes a Taoist pairing of light and dark. If beholders are creatures of the dark, and often specifically the Underdark, then gas spores must be creatures of the Overlight... the Sun? The prayer says "lying / together like lovers in a kemmer"

I got it. A beholder is a completely aerial species liverwort. Male and female gas spores collide, flesh out, and become beholders. Beholders also constantly release tiny spores, which catch the warm air currents and rise until they reach the sunlight, where they rapidly grow into gas spores using the magic of photosynthesis.

see

07-03-2008 09:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9076558)

What if, for some sinister purpose, Beholders were creating Gas Spores?

Me, I'm imagining a beholder in a cavern of gas spores, using telekinesis to move the gas spores around, then using cause serious wounds to make them explode if the PCs don't mistake them for the beholder and strike first.

noisms

07-03-2008 09:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9077401)

Me, I'm imagining a beholder in a cavern of gas spores, using telekinesis to move the gas spores around, then using cause serious wounds to make them explode if the PCs don't mistake them for the beholder and strike first.

Now there's an evil DM's mind at work. Genius.

Kakita Kojiro

07-04-2008 10:38 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9076656)

I got it. A beholder is a completely aerial species liverwort. Male and female gas spores collide, flesh out, and become beholders. Beholders also constantly release tiny spores, which catch the warm air currents and rise until they reach the sunlight, where they rapidly grow into gas spores using the magic of photosynthesis.

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9077401)

Me, I'm imagining a beholder in a cavern of gas spores, using telekinesis to move the gas spores around, then using cause serious wounds to make them explode if the PCs don't mistake them for the beholder and strike first.

GM: "Oh, this beholder isn't attacking you all. He's trying to mate with you all."

PCs: :eek:

The Ent

07-04-2008 10:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9074051)

There is something genuinely frightening about being trapped and slowly digested by a giant fungus. No matter how much you struggle you can never escape...

Yeah.

It made for one of the better late-series X-Files eps for one thing. Well imo.

noisms

07-04-2008 12:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Galeb Duhr

Let's say straight away that I love Galeb Duhr. Mysterious mountain spirits who look like boulders, act as shepherds to rocks, and collect gems: what's not to like? Well, except for the picture, which makes them look rather more like egg-men than mighty denizens of the Elemental Plane of Earth.

Galeb Duhr are what you would expect a boulder-spirit to be: big, tough, and slow. They seem to treat rocks as their pets or charges - they can animate boulders to attack, and show great concern for their safety. Woe betide anybody who messes about with a Galeb Duhr's pet rocks.

The most obvious point of interest with Galeb Duhr is that they collect gems, and have an intimate knowledge of where seams of minerals are in their territory. An invitation to adventurers if ever there was one: how to persuade the surly rock spirits of the great mountain to show the way to the motherlode of platinum of legend?

My favourite aspect of the monster is their music, though: "Sitting together in groups, the galeb duhr harmonize their gravelly voices into eldritch tunes; some sages speculate that these melodies can cause or prevent earthquakes. Others argue that the low rumbling produced by these creatures is a form of warning to others in the group, but there is no conclusive evidence either way."

It's one of those little elements of mystery that a creative DM can pick up and run with. What's the music for: is it to cause or prevent earthquakes, a warning, or something else entirely?

wingedcoyote

07-04-2008 12:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always loved the singing Galeb Duhr. As far as I was concerned, the purpose of the music was "to get the players good and creeped out just before the rocks start attacking them".

Ragnarok_Engine

07-04-2008 02:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by wingedcoyote (Post 9080536)

I always loved the singing Galeb Duhr. As far as I was concerned, the purpose of the music was "to get the players good and creeped out just before the rocks start attacking them".

With a side order of, "Labyrinth was awesome, wasn't it?"

sim_james

07-04-2008 03:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9080485)

My favourite aspect of the monster is their music, though: "Sitting together in groups, the galeb duhr harmonize their gravelly voices into eldritch tunes

A rock concert, as it were.

noisms

07-04-2008 03:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9080878)

A rock concert, as it were.

And I bet that's how the whole thing started.

I wonder which of the MM designers was the 'office joker'?

(un)reason

07-04-2008 07:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9080918)

And I bet that's how the whole thing started.

I wonder which of the MM designers was the 'office joker'?

I'm betting on the one who did the art for the invisible stalker. I mean, look at what that thing's doing. No-one really stalks like that. ;) Totally unrealistic.

JRM

07-04-2008 08:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9081286)

I'm betting on the one who did the art for the invisible stalker. I mean, look at what that thing's doing. No-one really stalks like that. ;) Totally unrealistic.

Hmm, is that the picture that makes one think [Elmer Fudd voice on] "Be vewy vewy quite, I'm hunting adwentuwers"[Elmer Fudd voice off].

Deadmanwalking

07-04-2008 09:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9081547)

Hmm, is that the picture that makes one think [Elmer Fudd voice on] "Be vewy vewy quite, I'm hunting adwentuwers"[Elmer Fudd voice off].

No. No, it's not. It's white space, because it's invisible and all. :)

noisms

07-04-2008 10:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 9081604)

No. No, it's not. It's white space, because it's invisible and all. :)

And much hilarity was had by all.

JRM

07-05-2008 04:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Deadmanwalking (Post 9081604)

No. No, it's not. It's white space, because it's invisible and all. :)

Oh, you obviously forgot to cast See Invisible before looking at the illustration. ;)

noisms

07-05-2008 11:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

You know, you should be saving up all these cracks for the actual Invisible Stalker entry.

JRM

07-05-2008 09:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9083603)

You know, you should be saving up all these cracks for the actual Invisible Stalker entry.

Nah, we might have forgotten them by then. Strike while the iron's hot, that's what I say.

Alternatively, our readers may have forgotten these cracks by the time the actual Invisible Stalker entry comes round, then we can reuse them all!

noisms

07-05-2008 09:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The interesting entries really come thick and fast in 'G'. In fact I don't think there's a single low-grade one in there. Today's entry, for me, is the closest to it:

Gargantua

Well, 'low-grade' is kind of harsh. My main problem, oddly, is with the art - which is extremely rare for a DiTerlizzi piece. It just really doesn't summon up what I think a Gargantuan beast should be - which is to say, a hulking, brutish monstrosity laying waste to entire kingdoms. Instead, we get something that looks a bit like a lanky Stegosaurus standing next to a gazebo, with an unconcerned looking bloke waiting idly by. It just doesn't say "mighty beast from beyond the dawn of time" to me. If anything it looks like somebody's grossly oversized pet.

Anyway, off with the entry.

Reptilian Gargantuan

This is the biggest (100-200' tall) and most dangerous, offering a whopping 43,000 XP to its killers. It emits deafening roars "that sound like the trumpeting of a bull elephant amplified a thousandfold" (Godzilla, anyone?) and generally acts like a great big mindless vandal - rumbling around breaking stuff a la the old computer game Rampage. The only real motivation other than wanton destruction is revenge - if you piss it off, you'll know about it, because it will pursue you even across the oceans to get its vengeance. Cool concept - my next set of mid-high level characters are so going to unwittingly annoy a Reptilian Gargantuan and find themselves chased to the end of the earth...

A few other bits of interest:

- The entry goes on quite a bit about Kara-Tur... Grr... Mutter... Grumble...

- Flowers that grow in a Reptilian Gargantuan's footprint can be used to make a potion of growth - now there's an adventure 'seed' (see, I can make cracks too) if ever there was one.
- When a Reptilian Gargantuan is born a lightning storm will develop, and dead things struck by the lightning will be immediately resurrected. Now that's an elaborate way to save on resurrection fees at the local temple. "First, we have to try to get that Reptilian Gargantuan to shag that other one, and then we have to wait through its pregnancy..."

Humanoid Gargantua

This is what it sounds like - an 80-100' tall humanoid which...likes breaking stuff. Only if you annoy it though; unlike the Reptilian Gargantua it doesn't go on mindless rampages. Which is a bit boring.

Insectoid Gargantua

This is an immense moth, which...likes breaking stuff. (Hang on...Reptilian Gargantua = Godzilla. Insectoid Gargantua =Mothra?) It has sticky silk with which to immobilize victims, and can conjure up a hurricane by beating its wings. Watch out Mulberry trees - you're its favourite food.

Insectoid Gargantuas' silk can be made into magical robes. And if you don't know how to make that into a good adventure, there's no helping you.

kelvingreen

07-05-2008 10:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9084407)

Well, 'low-grade' is kind of harsh. My main problem, oddly, is with the art - which is extremely rare for a DiTerlizzi piece. It just really doesn't summon up what I think a Gargantuan beast should be

With good reason. The entry skirts close enough to a lawsuit as is, without the picture making it extremely obvious. I'd imagine the brief was "make it look like Godzilla without making it look like Godzilla", so DiTerlizzi did okay, I'd say.

The only disappointment for me is that the "humanoid" Gargantua isn't a giant ape. I know that they were going for the whole kaiju thing (although I can't think of many humanoid kaiju who aren't scifi types), but if King Kong fits anywhere in the MM, it's here.

noisms

07-06-2008 12:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9084443)

With good reason. The entry skirts close enough to a lawsuit as is, without the picture making it extremely obvious. I'd imagine the brief was "make it look like Godzilla without making it look like Godzilla", so DiTerlizzi did okay, I'd say.

The only disappointment for me is that the "humanoid" Gargantua isn't a giant ape. I know that they were going for the whole kaiju thing (although I can't think of many humanoid kaiju who aren't scifi types), but if King Kong fits anywhere in the MM, it's here.

Well, let's stat one up! Best King Kong variant wins a banana.

Simian Gargantua

Climate/Terrain: Tropical and subtropical islands

Frequency: Very rare

Organization: Solitary or Mated Pair

Activity Cycle: Diurnal

Diet: Omnivore

Intelligence: Low (5-7)

Treasure: Nil

Alignment: Chaotic Evil

No. Appearing: 1, or 1-2

Armour Class: 2

Movement: 21

Hit Dice: 30

THACO: 5

No. Attacks: 3

Damage/Attack: 4-40/4-40/2-20

Special Attacks: Throw, Chomp (See below)

Special Defenses: Regeneration

Magic Resistance: Nil

Size: G (60-80' tall)

Morale: Elite (14)

Simian Gargantua inhabit humid, mosquito infested islands in the deepest tropics. Brutish, aggressive, and violent, they fly into a berserk rage at the slightest provocation. Their only real weakness is for human beings of the opposite sex, who sometimes become the focus for their primal desires.

When it makes a successful attack with either of its fists, a Simian Gargantuan can elect to try to grab its opponent so long as said opponent is ogre-sized or smaller; it immediately makes another 'to-hit' roll. If this second roll is successful, the target has been grabbed. Neither the initial or secondary attack do damage, but the Simian Gargantuan can on its next turn make either a Throw or Chomp attack. The Chomp attack causes 6-60 hit points of damage and hits automatically. The Throw attack allows the Gargantuan to hurl its opponent 3d6x10 yards in a random direction, causing damage equal to half the distance thrown.

Most Simian Gargantua resemble giant gorillas, but subspecies which look like orang-utans, chimpanzees and gibbons are rumoured to exist.

kelvingreen

07-06-2008 01:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9084651)

Their only real weakness is for human beings of the opposite sex, who sometimes become the focus for their primal desires.

There's not enough exception-based design in there:

A Simian Gargantua will attack on sight, although there is an 80% chance that it will cease its attack if presented with a female humanoid with a Charisma of 18 or better.

Fixed. ;)

Belchion

07-06-2008 02:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9084911)

A Simian Gargantua will attack on sight, although there is an 80% chance that it will cease its attack if presented with a female humanoid with a Charisma of 18 or better.

Still not perfect. It should be 40 % chance with Charisma 10 and additional 5 % per additional Charisma point, up to 80 % at Charisma 18.

JRM

07-06-2008 03:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9084651)

Well, let's stat one up! Best King Kong variant wins a banana.

D&D has had an official simulacrum of King K*cough*g since Gygax's 1st edition module Isle of the Ape came out which starred Oonga, the largest living example of the Gargantuan Carnivorous Ape. (Incidentally Isle of the Ape came out in 1985, the same year the original Oriental Adventures first introduced Gargantuas to D&D.)

Anyhow, I like the concept of Gargantuas but would make them much tougher. To my mind, they should be nigh-indestructible engines of destruction that only the most potent of parties would be able to bring down. The main problem is spellcasters could keep throwing Save or Die or Polymorph Other spell at a Gargantua until it fails a saving throw and keels over or turn into a goldfish. They need to have epic-level magic resistance and/or immunity to most of the 'easy kill' spells to make them something that really puts the fear of God(zilla) into players.

Plus, they need a ranged attack or very high movement so the party can't wittle them down from a safe distance with arrows, Fireballs and the like.

If I recall correctly, Mr Gygax gave Oonga Magic Resistance, Immunity to Mind-Affecting and Polymorph/Death spells and a storm giant grade boulder throwing ability. That's the sort of thing I'm talking about, a Gargantua should be almost as fearsome an opponent as The Tarrasque.

wingedcoyote

07-06-2008 03:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9085170)

Anyhow, I like the concept of Gargantuas but would make them much tougher. To my mind, they should be nigh-indestructable engines of destruction that only the most potent of parties would be able to bring down. The main problem is spellcasters could keep throwing Save or Die or Polymorph Other spell at a Gargantua until it fails a saving throw and keels over or turn into a goldfish. They need to have epic-level magic resistance and/or immunity to most of the 'easy kill' spells to make them something that really puts the fear of God(zilla) into players.

Plus, they need a ranged attack or very high movement so the party can't wittle them down from a safe distance with arrows, Fireballs and the like.

If I recall correctly, Mr Gygax gave Oonga Magic Resistance, Immunity to Mind-Affecting and Polymorph/Death spell and a storm giant grade boulder throwing ability. That's the sort of thing I'm talking about, a Gargantua should be almost as fearsome an opponent as The Tarrasque.

I think what you're describing is the Tarrasque. :)

Malignant Marionette

07-06-2008 04:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I'm disappointed in this thread.

No bad gazebo jokes and obvious comic references yet?

see

07-06-2008 04:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9085255)

I'm disappointed in this thread.

No bad gazebo jokes and obvious comic references yet?

Well, we haven't reached Gazebo yet; that would come alphabetically after Gargoyle, and we just got to Gargantua.

Comic references? Well, I guess Garfield would come between Galeb Duhr and Gargantua . . .

demiurge1138

07-06-2008 04:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The "humanoid gargantua" was actually called Gargantua. At least, in the title. In the Sixties, Toho made two movies featuring a giant irradiated humanoid that formed from the heart of Frankenstein's Monster, caught in Hiroshima. The movies were Frankenstein Conquers the World and War of the Gargantuas.

It should be pointed out that the Monster of the first movie only rampages when threatened, like the D&D Humanoid Gargantua, but War of the Gargantuas features another, man-eating Gargantua as well.

Neurotrash

07-06-2008 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I think the humanoid Gargantua are supposed to be these things

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gargantuas>

I saw this on a Saturday afternoon when I was like, six, under the title of "War of the Gargantuas". I think it was the first time I ever came into contact with the word "gargantua" and I've always assumed it was the inspiration for the D&D monster.

kelvingreen

07-06-2008 05:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9084943)

Still not perfect. It should be 40 % chance with Charisma 10 and additional 5 % per additional Charisma point, up to 80 % at Charisma 18.

Much better. :)

JRM

07-06-2008 06:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by wingedcoyote (Post 9085179)

I think what you're describing is the Tarrasque. :)

Not quite, I haven't added the Horns of Sharpness or the "will only stay dead with a Wish" yet.:)

JRM

07-06-2008 06:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Neurotrash (Post 9085483)
I think the humanoid Gargantua are supposed to be these things

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gargantuas>

I saw this on a Saturday afternoon when I was like, six, under the title of "War of the Gargantuas". I think it was the first time I ever came into contact with the word "gargantua" and I've always assumed it was the inspiration for the D&D monster.

Yup, I noticed the ah, purely coincidental resemblance too.

Incidentally Classic Media are going to be releasing a double DVD of Rodan and War of the Gargantuas this September. I'm looking forward to it! They do a good job of their DVDs, with both the US and the Japanese versions on the disc.

noisms

07-06-2008 10:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9085255)
I'm disappointed in this thread.

No bad gazebo jokes and obvious comic references yet?

The floor is yours... ;)

J Harper

07-06-2008 04:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9085296)
The "humanoid gargantua" was actually called Gargantua. At least, in the title. In the Sixties, Toho made two movies featuring a giant irradiated humanoid that formed from the heart of Frankenstein's Monster, caught in Hiroshima. The movies were Frankenstein Conquers the World and War of the Gargantuas.

It should be pointed out that the Monster of the first movie only rampages when threatened, like the D&D Humanoid Gargantua, but War of the Gargantuas features another, man-eating Gargantua as well.

I remember when Milk and Cheese remade War of the Gargantuas in their own inimitable style - which involved them running around, screaming at the top of their lungs, committing several acts of assault, battery, mayhem and vandalism, then, at the end, shouted at the tops of their lungs "WAR OF THE GARGANTUAS!!!"

Good times, good times...

Jeremy Harper

noisms

07-06-2008 11:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Gargoyle

Another in a long string of hits from the 'G' section, the Gargoyle is a particular favourite of mine - especially the Kapoacinth, with its hints of ruined cathedrals submerged beneath the ocean.

Gargoyle

The Gargoyle itself is a statued demon which lives in old ruins and dungeon environments. It likes torture and killing better than anything else, and will immediately attack anything which comes into its territory (on a 90% chance...why did this game have reaction adjustments for Charisma, again?). Gargoyles do not need to eat or drink, so they can wait motionless forever, just waiting for prey to come along. (How cool is that? A pack of Gargoyles who have been patiently sitting in the same place for a hundred years, just waiting for the opportunity to kill.) But sometimes they also serve evil mages.

My only regret is that Gargoyles are always Chaotic Evil. I'd quite like to include an empire of Lawful Evil Gargoyles in a campaign world; in a low magic setting even a fairly small number of Gargoyles, with their innate immunity to non-magical weapons, could easily take over a geographical area and enslave the population to their will.

Gargoyles are notable for having usable corpses (hooray!) - for potions of invulnerability and flying - and for having their own language, which must be up there with Elven Cat in the rarity stakes. I swear my next character is going to be fluent in both Elven Cat and Gargoyle.

Kapoacinth

As already mentioned, I'm a big fan of the Kapoacinth. The players, exploring the underwater world on some mission from the surface world, encounter what looks like a long-forgotten, submerged temple. Taking a closer look, they pass by two odd, ugly statues near the entrance... What could be better?

Margoyle

A "more horrid" form of Gargoyle, the Margoyle is essentially just a tougher version.

Wakboth

07-07-2008 12:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9084407)
(Hang on...Reptilian Gargantua = Godzilla. Insectoid Gargantua =Mothra?)

Add Rodan as a roc, and you're set for a city-stomping adventure; can your players lure the Gargantuas away from the city before it's completely flattened?

As for the gargoyles, I've always thought that in a world where there are nasty-looking living statues that kill and eat people, nobody sane would go near any statue they weren't completely sure about...

Overall, 'G' is definitely one of the best letters of the alphabet for monsters. :)

Tommy Brownell

07-07-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by brianm (Post 8743534)
I loved to use the aaracockra as part of my ancient triumvirate. In ancient times, before the rise of men and when elves still cavorted in the fairie realms (yes, I had the "feywild" long before 4th edition :D), the world was ruled and fought over by three races: the aaracockra, the thri-kreen, and the lizard folk. The ancient ruins of all three races can still be found if you know where to look, and each houses both magic and dangers the world hasn't seen since those far ancient days. The current, degenerate forms of all three races shun such places, and call them cursed, so adventurers looking to plunder these primordial cities shouldn't look for help from the descendants of their builders.

- Brian

That's kind of an awesome idea, actually.

Might file that one away for story theft, or something like it, should I ever run a fantasy game again.

(un)reason

07-07-2008 08:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9087234)

Gargoyle

My only regret is that Gargoyles are always Chaotic Evil. I'd quite like to include an empire of Lawful Evil Gargoyles in a campaign world; in a low magic setting even a fairly small number of Gargoyles, with their innate immunity to non-magical weapons, could easily take over a geographical area and enslave the population to their will.

Curiously enough, 1st ed AD&D gargoyles are LE. Gargoyles are one of those monsters that have gone through several fluff divergences over the course of editions. In BD&D they're constructs, built by wizards and clerics to protect their stuff, while in AD&D they've been both things from the elemental plane of earth, prime material creatures that breed, and things that are vaguely demonic in origin. None have really stuck. I guess gargoyles have never acquired iconic fluff like the gith races or D&D orcs, despite being fairly popular as monsters.

lkrast

07-07-2008 10:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

This thread continues to be constructed of solid awesome.

noisms

07-07-2008 12:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9088532)

Curiously enough, 1st ed AD&D gargoyles are LE. Gargoyles are one of those monsters that have gone through several fluff divergences over the course of editions. In BD&D they're constructs, built by wizards and clerics to protect their stuff, while in AD&D they've been both things from the elemental plane of earth, prime material creatures that breed, and things that are vaguely demonic in origin. None have really stuck. I guess gargoyles have never acquired iconic fluff like the gith races or D&D orcs, despite being fairly popular as monsters.

They suffer from being reasonably popular, but not quite popular enough to become an icon, which means they can be dicked around with in each edition. I don't have the 4e core books - are Gargoyles in the 4e Monster Manual?

wingedcoyote

07-07-2008 12:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9089093)

They suffer from being reasonably popular, but not quite popular enough to become an icon, which means they can be dicked around with in each edition. I don't have the 4e core books - are Gargoyles in the 4e Monster Manual?

Yep! This time around they "came to the world long ago from the Elemental Chaos in search of prey."

They also have a mechanically-defined Stone Form ability that gives them very high damage resistance and some regeneration, as well as Tremorsense, in exchange for being an immobile statue. They can shift in and out at will, against a lot of parties I think they'd be very hard to hurt in that form, so that has the potential to be very annoying. :)

07-07-2008 01:04 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by wingedcoyote (Post 9089115)

Yep! This time around they "came to the world long ago from the Elemental Chaos in search of prey."

They also have a mechanically-defined Stone Form ability that gives them very high damage resistance and some regeneration, as well as Tremorsense, in exchange for being an immobile statue. They can shift in and out at will, against a lot of parties I think they'd be very hard to hurt in that form, so that has the potential to be very annoying. :)

I think I prefer the 2e ones out of all of the editions, then. Close to real-world Gargoyles (i.e. statues on big buildings), but animated long ago by an evil arch-mage. It's just that little bit more interesting than "oh, they came from the Elemental plane of Earth/came from Elemental Chaos/are demons/are constructs".

wingedcoyote

07-07-2008 01:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9089202)

I think I prefer the 2e ones out of all of the editions, then. Close to real-world Gargoyles (i.e. statues on big buildings) but animated long ago by an evil arch-mage. It's just that little bit more interesting than "oh, they came from the Elemental plane of Earth/came from Elemental Chaos/are demons/are constructs".

I agree, and that's the explanation I'd use if I ever needed one in my campaign.

6inTruder

07-07-2008 02:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by wingedcoyote (Post 9089115)

They also have a mechanically-defined Stone Form ability that gives them very high damage resistance and some regeneration, as well as Tremorsense, in exchange for being an immobile statue. They can shift in and out at will, against a lot of parties I think they'd be very hard to hurt in that form, so that has the potential to be very annoying. :)

So they're sorta the Aliens of D&D's overdecorated cathedrals and crypts?

Brandi

07-07-2008 02:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 8922627)
I would have loved to have seen PETA girl try to write an entry on them. :D

You do realize for all your ranting about "PETA girl" these entries were more likely to have been written by some neckbearded male furry?

[Edit: Reducing harshness level, but from the way noisms talks it sounds like the Wolf entry was written by someone like the infamous Ebonlupus.]

Brandi

07-07-2008 03:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9001622)
There's some Greyhawk material by the late lamented Gary Gygax which suggests Derro are mutant humans, not dwarves, and that's the way I view them in my campaign.

Gary would've been a little young to be reading early-/mid- '40s SF when it first came out, but it wouldn't surprise me if he came across some of the old Amazing Stories articles about The Shaver Mystery.

kelvingreen

07-07-2008 05:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The Doctor Who episode "Blink" does a lot of good for Gargoyles and other looks-like-a-statue type monsters. They're basically quantum creatures who literally are statues when you look at them, but run around free when not observed. Quite creepy, and I think it would be fun to transfer that to a game.

Celiasu

07-07-2008 06:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Skims Ye Olde 2nd Edition Monster Manual along with various Monster Compendiums When we get all the way through the MM I'm tempted to do this with the Dark Sun stuff. :)

While I approve of the superior balance of 4E monsters compared to 2E or 3E monsters, I miss 2E's fluff. Comparing the same monsters in the 2E, 3E, and 4E books(which I'm doing right now), you can see the shift from fluff to crunch. 2E monsters tend to have more fluff than 3E monsters which have more than 4E monsters(some 4E monsters only get two lines of text in fact).

Now switching to gargoyles in 2E, I remember facing these in a Ravenloft campaign a friend ran once. In all honesty it was probably our worst campaign but then again it was also one of our first so it's understandable how many things went wrong. The gargoyle fight actually went okay though. We fought two of them along with a golem. The golem was the real threat. We went after the gargoyles first though figuring they'd die faster and that'd be less things hitting us.

ogier300

07-07-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

you can see the shift from fluff to crunch.

Back in the day, we thought of that "fluffs" as crunch... Which is one of the reasons the MM and MC were so chock full of adventure ideas.

Frank Armoton

07-07-2008 08:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu (Post 9089716)

2E monsters tend to have more fluff than 3E monsters which have more than 4E monsters(some 4E monsters only get two lines of text in fact).

I noticed this also. It is really a shame, the old monster descriptions were really entertaining.. Now most you get is the name of the monster, a (pretty!) picture and stat-block..

Celisasu

07-07-2008 08:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Hell, let me use the Aarakrocra from Dark Sun Monstrous Compendium 2 as an example. It has almost two full pages that are solely devoted to fluff. Even the combat section has more fluff than stats in it. I kid you not. It's not until halfway into the 2nd paragraph of the combat section that it gives you a combat statistic(double damage for diving if the dive is at least 50 feet). Before that is explanation of why they prefer aerial combat(it's the hollow bones. They realize that their bones break a lot more easily than human ones). It then gives a few more combat stats....and gives some more paragraphs of fluff info. Then you get 2/3rds of a page of habitat/society and about 1/4 page of ecology.

noisms

07-07-2008 10:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9089402)

You do realize for all your ranting about "PETA girl" these entries were more likely to have been written by some neckbearded male furry?

[Edit: Reducing harshness level, but from the way noisms talks it sounds like the Wolf entry was written by someone like the infamous Ebonlupus.]

Oh, the PETA girl stuff is just tongue-in-cheek. She's entirely imaginary. It's just funnier for me to envisage a 13-year-old vegan in the TSR offices, chastising all the other monster designers and ranting about how vicious beasties are just misunderstood.

EDIT: And yes, definitely more likely written by a neckbearded male furry.

JRM

07-08-2008 05:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9088532)

Curiously enough, 1st ed AD&D gargoyles are LE. Gargoyles are one of those monsters that have gone through several fluff divergences over the course of editions. In BD&D they're constructs, built by wizards and clerics to protect their stuff, while in AD&D they've been both things from the elemental plane of earth, prime material creatures that breed, and things that are vaguely demonic in origin. None have really stuck. I guess gargoyles have never acquired iconic fluff like the gith races or D&D orcs, despite being fairly popular as monsters.

Eh? They're Chaotic Evil in 1st edition too, unless my memory plays me false. Their multiple origins are certainly confusing though - are they magical constructs? demonic creatures? elementals? supernatural material-plane predator? Not to mention all the confusion as to how you get more gargoyles (eggs? babies? some wizard mucking about?), and whether they're really made out of rock or have flesh and blood insides.

I've never known a gargoyle to succeed at its "I'll just stand very still and pretend to be a statue of a demonic creature, why would anyone suspect me" strategy and, frankly, why should it in the default milieu of AD&D? I came up with two ways around this -

A 'standing very still' gargoyle could blend into rock surfaces, becoming almost perfectly camouflage.

A 'standing very still' gargoyle could look like a less obviously threatening statue using a weak form of alter self - so that statue of the naked nymph suddenly spouts wings, claws, horns and a tail and leaps upon you!

wingedcoyote

07-08-2008 05:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9091509)

Eh? They're Chaotic Evil in 1st edition too, unless my memory plays me false. Their multiple origins are certainly confusing though - are they magical constructs? demonic creatures? elementals? supernatural material-plane predator? Not to mention all the confusion as to how you get more gargoyles (eggs? babies? some wizard mucking about?), and whether they're really made out of rock or have flesh and blood insides.

I've never known a gargoyle to succeed at its "I'll just stand very still and pretend to be a statue of a demonic creature, why would anyone suspect me" strategy and, frankly, why should it in the default milieu of AD&D? I came up with two ways around this -

A 'standing very still' gargoyle could blend into rock surfaces, becoming almost perfectly camouflage.

A 'standing very still' gargoyle could look like a less obviously threatening statue using a weak form of alter self - so that statue of the naked nymph suddenly spouts wings, claws, horns and a tail and leaps upon you!

Good ideas. Wouldn't it be pretty easy to spring a regular gargoyle encounter on players, though, if you planned ahead properly? Just toss a lot of (non-animate) gargoyles all over the place, and eventually the players should get used to them.

JasonK

07-08-2008 05:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by wingedcoyote (Post 9091571)

Good ideas. Wouldn't it be pretty easy to spring a regular gargoyle encounter on players, though, if you planned ahead properly? Just toss a lot of (non-animate) gargoyles all over the place, and eventually the players should get used to them.

Or they'll smash every damn statue they ever see because they know that one day one of them will be a gargoyle. :)

But, yeah, I'd put regular stone statues around, too.

~ jason

noisms

07-08-2008 12:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Genie

A mammoth entry, with four (count 'em) pictures - two of which were especially interesting to my male 13-year-old mind. I'm sure you can guess which ones.

Djinn

Djinn are Genies from the Plane of Air. They ride around on whirlwinds, and can create food and water, soft goods, wooden goods, metal, illusions, wine...you name it. Ordinary Djinn can't grant wishes - that's only available to a Noble Djinni, who can give three. (Although we all know the way around that. "For my first wish, a night of passion with [insert favourite Hollywood starlet here], for my second, a kazillion gold pieces, and for my third.... TEN MILLION MORE WISHES!!!!")

Dao

Dao are from the Plane of Earth, and they come to the Prime Material because they like to "work evil" so damn much. They can grant limited wishes but only ever in a perverse way, and live in a place called the Great Dismal Delve. That seems like an odd choice to me; okay, your hometown may be dismal, but even if it is, don't shout about it. Then nobody's ever going to want to visit.

Efreet

Efreet are from the Plane of Fire, and are the enemies and rivals of the Djinn. As with the Dao, they interpret their wish commands in perverse and overly literal ways, mainly out of spite.

Marid

These are the most powerful of all the Genies. (Does this have a basis in Middle-Eastern legend, or is it just a decision of the designers?) They come from the Plane of Water, and are typical Chaotic Neutral monsters - unpredictable, egotistical, and boorish, just like a Topaz Dragon.

Jann

Jann are the weakest Genies, and are composed of all four elements. They look like humans and live a nomadic existence in the desert.

One thing I noted about the Genie entry is that each 'race' is modeled after a different Middle Eastern culture. Djinn are ruled by a Caliph, and so are meant to be like 'Arabian' Arabs. Dao have a Khanate, with Atamans and Hetmans, and so are roughly modeled after the nomads of Eurasia. Efreet have a Sultanate, which makes them like Turks. Marid have a Padishate, like old Persia. And Jann are like Bedouin.

wingedcoyote

07-08-2008 12:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I was a big fan of the Jann at age 12 as well. :)

Something that jumped out at me, rereading the genie entry -- there are lots of places throughout the book where it tells you something like "1% of Djinni are Noble". Back in the day, I think I took that as being synonymous with "if you meet a Djinn, there is a 1% chance that it is Noble". I think later on I realized I could just decide that the party meets a Noble Djinn (for example), but it felt a little bit like cheating.

demiurge1138

07-08-2008 01:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I know--when I was a kid, that blue efreet intrigued me too. "Why is it blue?" I asked myself.

Oh yeah, and that jann was pretty hot, I guess.

Naxuul

07-08-2008 01:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9092862)

I know--when I was a kid, that blue efreet intrigued me too. "Why is it blue?" I asked myself.

It's supposed to be black, but black in that ink style is just a real dark blue, because black is the color of basalt and the Efreeti description says they are made of fleshy basalt.

I've liked the D&D genies ever since I played the Al-Qadim PC game. At one point you go to a island where the genies send their earthly ambassadors and have to deal with essentially iconic members of each Noble Genie. It was very flavorful and fun, from being unintentionally dicked around by the well meaning but uncaring Djinni to having to maintain the interest of a egotistical, hedonistic and jaded Marid.

Plus fun stuff like the Efreeti guardian of the Island sends you on alot of pointless quests to prove your worth for entrance.. including getting the World's Wisest Snake. Which she then promptly eats and informs you if it was so wise it would of avoided that.

-Naxuul

Crinos

07-08-2008 03:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always thought the efreet was more purple than blue. Ah well.

The Marid, OTOH, was definitely blue, and Hot.

wingedcoyote

07-08-2008 03:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9093094)

The Marid, OTOH, was definitely blue, and Hot.

That's the one I always thought was a Jann, but now that I look at it again you're definitely right.

noisms

07-08-2008 04:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Even if that black jacket thing is a little too conveniently gravity resistant.

Crinos

07-08-2008 04:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9093235)
Even if that black jacket thing is a little too conveniently gravity resistant.

Well she is a Genie afterall. +2 Jacket of nipple coverage is probably a fairly commonplace item on the Elemental plane of water.

What always cheesed me though is we never got a definitive picture of the Dao.

Celisasu

07-08-2008 06:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9092705)

Genie

A mammoth entry, with four (count 'em) pictures - two of which were especially interesting to my male 13-year-old mind. I'm sure you can guess which ones.

Djinn

Djinn are Genies from the Plane of Air. They ride around on whirlwinds, and can create food and water, soft goods, wooden goods, metal, illusions, wine...you name it. Ordinary Djinn can't grant wishes - that's only available to a Noble Djinni, who can give three. (Although we all know the way around that. "For my first wish, a night of passion with [insert favourite Hollywood starlet here], for my second, a kazillion gold pieces, and for my third.... TEN MILLION MORE WISHES!!!!")

Dao

Dao are from the Plane of Earth, and they come to the Prime Material because they like to "work evil" so damn much. They can grant limited wishes but only ever in a perverse way, and live in a place called the Great Dismal Delve. That seems like an odd choice to me; okay, your hometown may be dismal, but even if it is, don't shout about it. Then nobody's ever going to want to visit.

Efreet

Efreet are from the Plane of Fire, and are the enemies and rivals of the Djinn. As with the Dao, they interpret their wish commands in perverse and overly literal ways, mainly out of spite.

Marid

These are the most powerful of all the Genies. (Does this have a basis in Middle-Eastern legend, or is it just a decision of the designers?) They come from the Plane of Water, and are typical Chaotic Neutral monsters - unpredictable, egotistical, and boorish, just like a Topaz Dragon.

Jann

Jann are the weakest Genies, and are composed of all four elements. They look like humans and live a nomadic existence in the desert.

One thing I noted about the Genie entry is that each 'race' is modeled after a different Middle Eastern culture. Djinn are ruled by a Caliph, and so are meant to be like 'Arabian' Arabs. Dao have a Khanate, with Atamans and Hetmans, and so are roughly modeled after the nomads of Eurasia. Efreet have a Sultanate, which makes them like Turks. Marid have a Padishate, like old Persia. And Jann are like Bedouin.

I remember a friend commenting on the Marid once. We got into a weird debate about about where half-Marids and could a human man or woman survive them seeing how the description put them at 18' tall if I remember correctly.

JRM

07-08-2008 07:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by wingedcoyote (Post 9091571)

Good ideas. Wouldn't it be pretty easy to spring a regular gargoyle encounter on players, though, if you planned ahead properly? Just toss a lot of (non-animate) gargoyles all over the place, and eventually the players should get used to them.

Yes, the only time I remember some gargoyles coming close to succeeding at their pretend to be regular statues tactic was as part of the traditional "evil temple festooned with ghastly images", I think the gargoyles didn't attack until the party left the temple, which helped their surprise...

Nevertheless, it's a hard sell for experienced D&D players who, rightly, are extremely suspicious of statues, especially demon/gargoyle shaped ones and it may take an awful long time for them to get used to them. I know if I had a PC in such a location there'd be a lot on Detect Evil going on those statues, just in case.

Evil temples help neutralize that ploy since you can just say the unholy aura of the altar (or wherever) makes everything detect as evil. They're also one of the few places that seem justified in having lots of inanimate statues of gargoyles. There doesn't seem much call for people of good alignment to create them for warning/warding against evil forces - unlike medieval Europe, most D&D characters would need no reminding about the perils of supernatural Evil.

JRM

07-08-2008 07:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu (Post 9093474)

I remember a friend commenting on the Marid once. We got into a weird debate about about where half-Marids and could a human man or woman survive them seeing how the description put them at 18' tall if I remember correctly.

As the great Gygax himself once said concerning the possibility of a Pixie/Storm Giant half breed, all you need is a Philter of Love and a Potion of Growth.:)

JRM

07-08-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Anyhows, back in my old 1st edition AD&D days one of my player's had a couple of unfortunate experiences with Genies.

Firstly, they were playing Mordenkainen's Magnificent Adventure with the pregen characters and met the Weaver in his twenty foot cube of a workshop. After some waffling, he revealed himself to be an Efreet and we roll initiative.

DM: Okay (name withheld to prevent embarrassment), what does Bigby do?

Bigby: Fireball!

DM: Are you sure you want to Fireball! an Efreet while your party is standing in a 20' cube with it?

Bigby: Sure.

A lot of dice rolling later, half the party (including Bigby) are Fireball-charred corpses. The Efreet is completely unharmed, of course, having immunity to fire.

Secondly, the same PC was part of a party delving into The Lost Caverns of Tsojcanth and they met some Dao in a 25' long cave - this is the first adventure ever to feature these monsters, incidentally. Bigby had learned his lesson about using Fireball in enclosed spaces by then.

He cast Lightning Bolt instead.

Do you know 1st edition's rules about Lightning Bolt ricochets? After some dice rolling and playing about with a protractor I determined he'd managed to kill most of the Dao, and himself.

Good times, good times.:)

Wakboth

07-08-2008 08:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9092705)

One thing I noted about the Genie entry is that each 'race' is modeled after a different Middle Eastern culture. Djinn are ruled by a Caliph, and so are meant to be like 'Arabian' Arabs. Dao have a Khanate, with Atamans and Hetmans, and so are roughly modeled after the nomads of Eurasia. Efreet have a Sultanate, which makes them like Turks.

Marid have a Padishate, like old Persia. And Jann are like Bedouin.

Yeah, that was a nifty little bit of implied worldbuilding.

And the blue marid lady is still my favorite of the genie pics. :D

Edit: IIRC, we very quickly houseruled the "rebounding lightning bolts" / "fully expanding fireballs" away, or at least into something a bit less omnidestructive. Sure, it's amusing for the DM when the wizard accidentally burninates himself... but the rest of the party may not enjoy it as much, and soon enough you're having to deal with players using FAE-style fireballs to wipe out entire dungeons.

see

07-09-2008 04:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9093564)

Do you know 1st edition's rules about Lightning Bolt ricochets? After some dice rolling and playing about with a protractor I determined he'd managed to kill most of the Dao, and himself.

Er. But the rule specifically was that the lightning bolt will "rebound toward its caster", so who needs a protractor? The angle at which it hits the wall is irrelevant.

JRM

07-09-2008 05:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9095106)

Er. But the rule specifically was that the lightning bolt will "rebound toward its caster", so who needs a protractor? The angle at which it hits the wall is irrelevant.

Oh, I'd interpreted the DMG entry on Lightning Bolt as meaning the line of the lightning bounced off solid, smooth surfaces in a similar manner to light-beams reflecting off mirrors, so it could reflect off at an angle.

(I didn't actually use a protractor, by the way - that would have been silly.:p)

That reminds me, at one time I wanted to have an enemy magic-user install carefully angled and highly polished steel shields around a dungeon's corridors, so they could shoot lightning bolts round corners. Never happened, alas.

noisms

07-09-2008 12:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ghost

D&D Ghosts are the kind who are still hanging around and haunting an area because of some great injustice - other types of spirit-visions are put under the Phantom entry.

I remember accusing the Catoblepas of being the most unfair of monsters, but I think the Ghost gives it a good run for its money: A monster immune to silver and non-magical weapons, which ages you 10 years on sight if you fail a saving throw, and which ages you 10-40 years on a successful hit. If it kills you it leaves you permanently dead with no hope of resurrection. And to top it off, it can only be hit by spells cast by other ethereal creatures.

Talk about cheap.

The best way to do away with a Ghost is to put right whatever situation led to the person's death - typically by bringing revenge down on the head of whoever did wrong. So a woman who was jilted by a lover and killed herself would demand retribution against the man responsible, or whatever. A good adventure hook, if a little cheesy. "The old fellow at the bar sidles up to you and says, 'Have you heard the tale of Old Nell, who hung herself by moonlight....?'"

The entry ends with this, which made me laugh: "The dreadful fear caused by the ghost, which ages a victim 10 years, is not well understood by the common man, who often ascribes it to the fact that a ghost is 'dead.' If this were the case, then certainly skeletons and zombies would have the same effect, which they do not. Common folklore further confuses this fact by relating details of the ghost's physical form: the classic example of which is the headless horseman, thought by many to be particularly frightening simply because he had no head. Under this belief, one could face a ghost if only one had the courage to stand up to him. Such a mistaken impression has cost many lives over the years. Actually, the fear is caused by the supernatural power of the ghost, and has nothing whatsoever to do with courage."

wingedcoyote

07-09-2008 12:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9095230)

Oh, I'd interpreted the DMG entry on Lightning Bolt as meaning the line of the lightning bounced off solid, smooth surfaces in a similar manner to light-beams reflecting off mirrors, so it could reflect off at an angle.

That's my reading too.

Reason #1: It's cooler that way.

Reason #2: That's how it works in Crawl. :)

Celiasu

07-09-2008 03:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ah, old school D&D from 1st and 2nd Edition. Where death was far more brutal and often far more permanent. And energy drain was even more fun than in 3rd Edition.

Ghosts sure were dicks weren't they? Our group never faced them though thankfully.

Crinos

07-09-2008 03:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I always liked Ghosts, their aging power made them so unique.

noisms

07-09-2008 10:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9096791)
I always liked Ghosts, their aging power made them so unique.

I always thought it would be fun to role play a guy zapped from the age of 20 to 60 by a Ghost.

Wakboth

07-09-2008 11:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9096791)
I always liked Ghosts, their aging power made them so unique.

Of course, it totally screwed humans, was pretty bad for halflings, gnomes and dwarves, and had very little to no impact on elves. Go 2e! :D

Malignant Marionette

07-10-2008 12:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9097537)
I always thought it would be fun to role play a guy zapped from the age of 20 to 60 by a Ghost.

Provided you survive the system shock roll, that is. ;)

Just noticed there's a 6th level priest spell that restores youth lost to magic, ghosts and stuff so it won't fuck you up permanently. Thought they were pretty evil before I found it. :p

noisms

07-10-2008 12:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

1000th post!!!!!!

Waaaaaaahhhhhh!!!!!!!!!!

Carry on.

6inTruder

07-10-2008 04:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9097537)

I always thought it would be fun to role play a guy zapped from the age of 20 to 60 by a Ghost.

Ah.... The "fun" of my Third level Druid's combat effectiveness going from "eh" to "crap." Memories....

noisms

07-10-2008 11:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Ghoul

The 'G' section just keeps rolling out the hits. Ghouls are another personal favourite, guaranteed to make an appearance in one of my campaigns.

I love the description of Ghouls: "the change from human to ghoul has deranged and destroyed their minds"; "the tongue becomes long and tough for licking marrow from cracked bones"; they have a "terrible cunning". Great OTT stuff.

Obviously, Ghouls main trick is to cause paralysis. I'd be interested to know what the design decision behind that was: who was it who decided that D&D Ghouls should have that power - and does it have any basis in legend or fairy tales? Regardless, it's a nasty ability that's enough to make Ghouls genuinely scary. Even better is the way those killed by Ghouls become Ghouls themselves - we all know how fun it is to come across ex-party members who have to be killed, and Ghouls are a way of pulling this off. (Another favourite is Lycanthropy.)

As an added bonus to the entry, the Ghoul section closes with a pleasingly ridiculous line: "Ghouls (and ghaasts, as described later) delight in revolting and loathsome things -- from which we draw our adjectives 'ghoulish' and 'ghastly.'"

Lacedon

A Lacedon is a marine Ghoul which is most frequently found around shipwrecks.

Ghast

A Ghast is like a super-Ghoul, whose paralysis is so powerful it can even affect elves, and who stinks so badly of carrion that it causes nausea.

Kakita Kojiro

07-10-2008 11:23 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9092705)

Marid

These are the most powerful of all the Genies. (Does this have a basis in Middle-Eastern legend, or is it just a decision of the designers?) They come from the Plane of Water, and are typical Chaotic Neutral monsters - unpredictable, egotistical, and boorish, just like a Topaz Dragon.

Yes, there is a basis for that in Arabic folklore, although it is not something from the Quran as far as I know. Wiki suggests it might come from the Nights, but I'm leery of trusting wiki on this topic (people tend to muddle their sources -- I've seen obviously D&D sourced material plonked down in there without qualm). The marid association with water also apparently has some basis in folklore, although the efreet association with fire does not AFAIK (other than that all jinn are "beings of smokeless flame").

There's actually not much coherence to the folklore, though. For example, it is never really clear if marid and ifrit are a type of jinn, or a tribe of jinn -- and are sometimes both. The "source" material (such as the Quran) is not big on the taxonomy of jinn. And adding transliteration only muddies the waters -- "jinn", "djinn", "jann", and "genie" all mean the same thing.

I've never been able to find out where "dao" came from, though.

edit: oddly appropriate to be ninja'd by the Ghoul post...

noisms

07-10-2008 11:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9100204)

I've never been able to find out where "dao" came from, though.

It might just be because they already had fire, water and air slots filled in, needed a djinni of earth, and made something up.

kelvingreen

07-10-2008 05:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I've never been able to work out, and this may be a Lovecraft influence, whether D&D ghouls are actually dead. Aside from being killed by a ghoul and then subsequently rising as one, the general fluff on the creatures seems to describe them as humanoids that feast on the dead and thus take on aspects of said food source.

But then there are references to ghouls speaking the language they spoke "in life", and they also get turned like (un)dead things. It's always been a mystery to me. Are ghouls dead, or are they living things with undead attributes? Answer this for me, rpg.net! ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9100204)

And adding transliteration only muddies the waters -- "jinn", "djinn", "jann", and "genie" all mean the same thing.

edit: oddly appropriate to be ninja'd by the Ghoul post...

Indeed. Ghouls in Arabian folklore are also sometimes considered a type of jinn!

noisms

07-10-2008 07:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9101208)

*I've never been able to work out, and this may be a Lovecraft influence, whether D&D ghouls are actually dead. Aside from being killed by a ghoul and then subsequently rising as one, the general fluff on the creatures seems to describe them as humanoids that feast on the dead and thus take on aspects of said food source.*

But then there are references to ghouls speaking the language they spoke "in life", and they also get turned like (un)dead things. It's always been a mystery to me. Are ghouls dead, or are they living things with undead attributes? Answer this for me, rpg.net! ;)

Indeed. Ghouls in Arabian folklore are also sometimes considered a type of jinn!

I always thought that ghouls were a combination of people who were killed by other ghouls, or cannibals who had eaten one too many corpses. A bit like the Wendigo of Native American legend.

Sleeper

07-10-2008 10:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9101208)

I've never been able to work out, and this may be a Lovecraft influence, whether D&D ghouls are actually dead. Aside from being killed by a ghoul and then subsequently rising as one, the general fluff on the creatures seems to describe them as humanoids that feast on the dead and thus take on aspects of said food source.

But then there are references to ghouls speaking the language they spoke "in life", and they also get turned like (un)dead things. It's always been a mystery to me. Are ghouls dead, or are they living things with undead attributes? Answer this for me, rpg.net! ;)

I always thought it was pretty clear that ghouls in D&D were undead. They spawn, they're a line on the turning table, and the text explicitly says they're undead. Almost mindless, and cartoonishly evil.

Which kind of disappointed me. I wanted cults of corrupted and degenerate nobles who have grisly banquets where they devour entire peasants with their preternaturally mobile mouths; and who, in police society, wear half-masks and are always cloaked by the sickly sweet smell of attar and other heavy perfumes. I wanted desperate halflings in the wilderness who take elevenses on an errant kobold child, and are turned into ravening and feral wendigo by the ancient curse, until they are put down like beasts. I wanted a caste of untouchables who are responsible for taking care of the dead and ensuring that they do not rise and plague the living; yet if you deign to speak to one, she is surprisingly cosmopolitan and urbane, and in their ever present inconspicuousness they hear everything, and their rumor network rivals the greatest imperial spy networks.

Lovecraft, Niven, Canadian myth....

noisms

07-10-2008 10:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9101827)

I always thought it was pretty clear that ghouls in D&D were undead. They spawn, they're a line on the turning table and the text explicitly says they're undead. Almost mindless, and cartoonishly evil.

Which kind of disappointed me. I wanted cults of corrupted and degenerate nobles who have grisly banquets where they devour entire peasants with their preternaturally mobile mouths; and who, in police society, wear half-masks and are always cloaked by the sickly sweet smell of attar and other heavy perfumes. I wanted desperate halflings in the wilderness who take elevenses on an errant kobold child, and are turned into ravening and feral wendigo by the ancient curse, until they are put down like beasts. I wanted a caste of untouchables who are responsible for taking care of the dead and ensuring that they do not rise and plague the living; yet if you deign to speak to one, she is surprisingly cosmopolitan and urbane, and in their ever present inconspicuousness they hear everything, and their rumor network rivals the greatest imperial spy networks.

Lovecraft, Niven, Canadian myth....

I want those things too! Thank God I'm not alone!

Kakita Kojiro

07-10-2008 11:11 PM

I always thought, though, that ghouls made the most sense of any of the spawning undead -- at least there was some implication that they had to eat. All of the rest apparently need no sustenance, and can spawn endlessly with minimal effort... especially if they can get their claws on some NPCs (rather than PCs). And they have no natural predators to keep their population in check (other than PCs).

It is a wonder that Greyhawk wasn't overrun by sudden hordes of ghouls, wights, vampires, etc. The place should look like a zombie apocalypse movie, really.

Sleeper

07-11-2008 01:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9101961)

It is a wonder that Greyhawk wasn't overrun by sudden hordes of ghouls, wights, vampires, etc. The place should look like a zombie apocalypse movie, really.

Yes, I've always wondered about that.

Another thing I always wanted to do was run a campaign based on that premise. Adventurers aren't just random thugs who go out and kill things that go bump in the night. No, they're sanctioned thugs who go out and kill things that go bump in the night. Chartered and empowered by the crown, they are above the law and have almost unlimited powers to question, detain... and slaughter entire villages if need be. Because they're the one thing that stands between the kingdom and the tides of darkness. Necromancy, the undead, lycanthropes, aren't just occasional threats, random monsters. They're a plague. A disease, that spreads like wildfire and might just consume the world. They need to be stamped out. By any means necessary. The PCs are tarred black and morally reprehensible, but it needs to be done. Someone needs to stop any incipient outbreak before it starts spreading wildly out of control. They call in the legions who quarantine the area, and then the crazy bastards go in. The retirement package is amazing. Unfortunately, there are long odds you'll never claim it.

And if the PCs fail?

Well, there's a real life model for the consequences. The black death wiped out something like 40% of the population of Europe. Entire cities were quarantined by force, or burned to the ground. Lines of penitents walked from town to town flagellating themselves and prostrating before the gods. Wagons with bells called "bring out your dead". Horribly disfigured survivors hid their faces. Cults of nobles walled themselves up in their manors, and threw massively decadent balls in the hopes that red death wouldn't find its way in. The death toll led to the foundation of the modern world, because the peasant population became suddenly valuable and turned mobile, breaking their ties of servitude to the land and creating the foundation for a sizeable middle class.

Except, this isn't a mindless disease. It's cunning, and hungry. The only place left to retreat might be the underground. The dungeons. Hordes of refugees at the walls of the dwarven strongholds. Accommodations and deals being made with the great evils of the underdark. Entire nations voluntarily become the herds of the mind flayers, because becoming cattle and accepting the occasional culling is less horrible than the plague scouring all life from the surface. Some converting to the worship of the slimy yet compellingly half-human goddess of the kuo-toa. Some choose to become something other than human, by the caress of an aboleth's tentacles.

The free and young races of the surface have forgotten, but this is the perpetual cycle of the world. Time and time again they came crawling back to their elder masters, asking once again to be slaves. Again and again, the ancient races have taken them as their brood, and the cycle of the world turns to its usual darkness.

Until, generations upon generations later, the races rebel and break their voluntary shackles once again, under the sway of a fierce like the legendary Gith. For a time, at least. The old races simply retreat, pull back, and wait. Their memories are long, and they know these brash upstarts will soon enough come crawling back to the succor of the night. They need not plot, or plan, or scheme. Simply wait.

Pat

JasonK

07-11-2008 04:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9101926)
I want those things too! Thank God I'm not alone!

You are very much not alone. That's pretty much what I've always wanted out of ghouls, too.

That said, I don't actually mind them being undead. The two are not mutually exclusive and, as vampires like Strahd have proved, the line between life and undeath does not need to be crossed with a moment of death and violence.

~ jason

Setebos

07-11-2008 05:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9101961)
I always thought, though, that ghouls made the most sense of any of the spawning undead -- at least there was some implication that they had to eat. All of the rest apparently need no sustenance, and can spawn endlessly with minimal effort... especially if they can get their claws on some NPCs (rather than PCs). And they have no natural predators to keep their population in check (other than PCs).

It is a wonder that Greyhawk wasn't overrun by sudden hordes of ghouls, wights, vampires, etc. The place should look like a zombie apocalypse movie, really.

That's an excellent point, actually...I'm ashamed I didn't realize it earlier.

I think I get so blinded by genre convention that I forget to ask for any kind of verisimilitude. What do fantasy zombies do? They lurk in crypts. What do modern zombies do? They spread like a plague. Why?

In keeping with the perpetual awesomeness of this thread, I'm now inspired to think, really think, about the ecology of undeath. Assuming it's not a new phenomenon in most fantasy worlds, the easy replicability and (apparently) unlimited energy of the undead should have radically altered (demi-)human society, but most people (myself included) play it like a pseudo-medieval kingdom that has apparently developed in a tiny, zombie-free bottle, and is perpetually surprised by the walking dead. In a low-magic world, I can keep my disbelief suspended, but places like the Forgotten Realms really have no excuse.

Onward to verisimilitude.

Belchion

07-11-2008 06:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9103084)

What do fantasy zombies do? They lurk in crypts. What do modern zombies do? They spread like a plague. Why?

Because ancient people tended to build undead-proof crypts. Once in, they won't get out again. Nowadays, we tend to overlook this problem and not take proper care in sealing our crypts anymore. Not to forget that in fantasy settings, there are usually plenty of gods and heroes around who slaughter undead for a living, you lack those guys in the modern world.

Not to forget the other reason: In ancient times, the undead were often the result of improper burial or an unclean death. You forgot to add the Obulus? How bad, aunt Agnetha will spook till she can afford to cross the Styx. That guy was drowned in blood and you forgot the proper cleansing rites? Too bad, he will be hunting for even more blood. In modern times, improper burial is not that much a point in the creation of undead, them as symbol of de-humanized humanity became much more important, as can best be seen by the treatment of vampires.

Anaxamander

07-11-2008 07:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9103084)

In keeping with the perpetual awesomeness of this thread, I'm now inspired to think, really think, about the ecology of undeath.

Perhaps ghouls eat other undead. That would work pretty well I think, at least for the lower ranks. (and maybe the higher ranks don't want competition) Although you might end up with ghouls farmers, i.e. ghouls who keep herds of zombies and feed them living beings to keep the herd size stable.

noisms

07-11-2008 10:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Anaxamander (Post 9103531)

Although you might end up with ghoul farmers, i.e. ghouls who keep herds of zombies and feed them living beings to keep the herd size stable.

How's that for an adventure seed?

noisms

07-11-2008 10:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9102391)

Except, this isn't a mindless disease. It's cunning, and hungry. The only place left to retreat might be the underground. The dungeons. Hordes of refugees at the walls of the dwarven strongholds. Accommodations and deals being made with the great evils of the underdark. Entire nations voluntarily become the herds of the mind flayers, because becoming cattle and accepting the occasional culling is less horrible than the plague scouring all life from the surface. Some converting to the worship of the slimy yet compellingly half-human goddess of the kuo-toa. Some choose to become something other than human, by the caress of an aboleth's tentacles.

The free and young races of the surface have forgotten, but this is the perpetual cycle of the world. Time and time again they came crawling back to their elder masters, asking once again to be slaves. Again and again, the ancient races have taken them as their brood, and the cycle of the world turns to its usual darkness.

Until, generations upon generations later, the races rebel and break their voluntary shackles once again, under the sway of a fierce like the legendary Gith. For a time, at least. The old races simply retreat, pull back, and wait. Their memories are long, and they know these brash upstarts will soon enough come crawling back to the succor of the night. They need not plot, or plan, or scheme. Simply wait.

Pat

Love it.

lkrast

07-11-2008 11:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9101827)

Which kind of disappointed me. I wanted cults of corrupted and degenerate nobles who have grisly banquets where they devour entire peasants with their preternaturally mobile mouths

Friend, the American presidential campaigns have been going on for months now. Haven't you had enough?

(Yes, sorry, I know, take it to Tangency, etc.)

Wakboth

07-11-2008 03:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

One odd thing about ghouls: I don't think they've ever had a good illustration in any of the MMs. The 1e one is by the non-Trampier and therefore crap; the Monstrous Manual one is horribly cartoony; the 3e one is just awful (one of the cases where the quality of art went way down between editions); and I can't remember the 4e version.

This one's good third-party pic, I think: <http://pachycrocuta.deviantart.com/a...ketch-71929048> (The same fellow does excellent D&D- and RPG-inspired stuff in general.)

noisms

07-11-2008 05:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9104708)

One odd thing about ghouls: I don't think they've ever had a good illustration in any of the MMs. The 1e one is by the non-Trampier and therefore crap; the Monstrous Manual one is horribly cartoony; the 3e one is just awful (one of the cases where the quality of art went way down between editions); and I can't remember the 4e version.

This one's good third-party pic, I think: <http://pachycrocuta.deviantart.com/a...ketch-71929048> (The same fellow does excellent D&D- and RPG-inspired stuff in general.)

I agree the art isn't great for the Ghoul anywhere in D&D. The guy you linked to is much better, although his Ghouls seem strongly influenced by Gollum in the LOTR films (especially the top figure).

Anyway, we have Giants coming up. I'll try to do three per entry; I've learned my lesson after the Dragon marathon, which turned into a brutal, awful slog.

kelvingreen

07-11-2008 05:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9101926)

I want those things too! Thank God I'm not alone!

Me too. I've always found the idea of the degenerate ghoul more interesting than the undead ghoul. That's probably where my confusion lies. ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9102391)
Yes, I've always wondered about that.

Another thing I always wanted to do was run a campaign based on that premise. Adventurers aren't just random thugs who go out and kill things that go bump in the night...

It's dark, but it's brilliant.

As for the ecology of the undead, China Mieville's High Cromlech, sketched out in The Scar, is a fascinating approach to an undead society, particularly in the way vampires are handled, more like desperate drug users than noble hunters.

noisms

07-11-2008 06:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9104851)
Me too. I've always found the idea of the degenerate ghoul more interesting than the undead ghoul. That's probably where my confusion lies. ;)

It's dark, but it's brilliant.

As for the ecology of the undead, China Mieville's High Cromlech, sketched out in The Scar is a fascinating approach to an undead society, particularly in the way vampires are handled, more like desperate drug users than noble hunters.

Yeah, High Cromlech is a really nice concept. I like how the language incorporates mime and signing, because many of the population no longer have vocal cords with which to speak!

noisms

07-11-2008 10:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Okay, Giants, here we go, take a deep breath....

Giant, C-D

Cloud Giant

I always thought of the Cloud Giants as the Elves of Gianthood. You know - highly intelligent, appreciate the finer things in life, into magic, nice jewelery, playing the harp.... Pass me the sick bucket!

No, I'm being unfair. Cloud Giants are one of the better Giants, in my opinion, although the one in the picture looks a bit like a vampire. A Greek or Roman vampire, possibly. Or a refugee from one of the worse Star Trek Original Series episodes - one of those races who were encountered by the Enterprise and never spoken of again.

Cloud Giants live in small clans at the tops of mountains or on "magical cloud islands" which they mine for silver lining. (That's check number two for that gag....I wonder how many times it will appear over the course of the book?) The evil ones raid the local areas and beat up the humanoids living there; the good ones like to trade.

Cyclops and Cyclopskin

There are two kinds of Cyclops - Cyclopskin and proper Cyclops. They're basically the same thing - just bigger or smaller versions of a one-eyed Giant which herd sheep and "smell of equal parts dirt and dung".

I like to imagine Cyclops and Cyclopskin as the degenerate remnants of a race which once ruled the world. Like the humans in The Planet of the Apes, they have regressed into creatures of lower intelligence. The shattered ruins of their statues and monuments can still be found here and there, but nobody knows what they signify and the Cyclopskin are no longer intelligent enough to explain.

Desert Giant

There's a bit of annoying setting-specific stuff in this entry, but that's by the by - I rather like Desert Giants, who remind me of a sort of combination of Bedouin, Touareg and Masai.

By far the most intriguing aspect of these ones is their ancient curse of fossilisation - which gradually transforms them into stone over the course of their lives. I love the idea of an entire race being condemned to the same fate, which none of them know how to solve. In fact, I seem to remember one of the Native American fae from Changeling: The Dreaming having a similar curse. The Navajo spirits... I forget the name. Numazahu or something?

Desert Giants once had a civilisation of their own, but the curse has destroyed it - now they're just roaming nomads, who typically end up in conflict with pastoral peoples. (Quite realistic, that.) They find employment as mercenaries most often.

Lugh

07-11-2008 11:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9105473)
Cyclops and Cyclopskin

There are two kinds of Cyclops - Cyclopskin and proper Cyclops. They're basically the same thing - just bigger or smaller versions of a one-eyed Giant which herd sheep and "smell of equal parts dirt and dung".

*I like to imagine Cyclops and Cyclopskin as the degenerate remnants of a race which once ruled the world. Like the humans in The Planet of the Apes, they have regressed into creatures of lower intelligence. The shattered ruins of their statues and monuments can still be found here and there, but nobody knows what they signify and the Cyclopskin are no longer intelligent enough to explain.*

Hmm. I was just thinking about what the old Cyclops empire would look like. The art would have one-eyed beings as significant elements. What other one-eyed beings do we know? Perhaps Gruumsh was either once a god of the Cyclops, or was a Cyclops himself when the orcs were a slave race.

So, imagine a world in which cyclops rule a mighty empire. Their intelligentsia learn the secrets of fantasy-style bioengineering and eugenics. Gradually, a rift begins to occur, as the intelligentsia modify themselves to become more and more powerful. They actually remove their own bodies, as unnecessary appendages, relying solely on their heads, the seat of their power. They add more and more eyes, and give those eyes greater and greater magical abilities. Eventually, a civil war erupts, and the empire falls.

Ten thousand years later, only a rare few scholars suspect that the cyclops and the beholders were once one people.

Kakita Kojiro

07-11-2008 11:00 PM

Splitting up the Cyclops and Cyclopskin (which reads like it's Cyclop-skin, doesn't it?) is probably an attempt to capture the dichotomy of Greek myth, where the cyclopes are both godlike crafters of Zeus' thunderbolts, helms of invisibility, earthshaking tridents, divine bows, etc. -- and also poor Polyphemus, the shepherd whose neighbors think a fool and also the butt of the only satyr play we have left.

And while I like that D&D cribs from myth and legend, it has always done far better by jettisoning some of that baggage to make its own mythology. The progression of dragon legends --> chromatic vs. metallic dragons (& others) in D&D was cool. Cyclopskin showing up in a game, though, was just an excuse to make sheep jokes ("Why do cyclops kin wear kilts?" "Cause the sheep can hear zippers").

noisms

07-11-2008 11:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9105602)

Hmm. I was just thinking about what the old Cyclops empire would look like. The art would have one-eyed beings as significant elements. What other one-eyed beings do we know? Perhaps Gruumsh was either once a god of the Cyclops, or was a Cyclops himself when the orcs were a slave race.

So, imagine a world in which cyclops rule a mighty empire. Their intelligentsia learn the secrets of fantasy-style bioengineering and eugenics. Gradually, a rift begins to occur, as the intelligentsia modify themselves to become more and more powerful. They actually remove their own bodies, as unnecessary appendages, relying solely on their heads, the seat of their power. They add more and more eyes, and give those eyes greater and greater magical abilities. Eventually, a civil war erupts, and the empire falls.

Ten thousand years later, only a rare few scholars suspect that the cyclops and the beholders were once one people.

Nice. Very nice.

Sleeper

07-11-2008 11:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9105602)

Hmm. I was just thinking about what the old Cyclops empire would look like. The art would have one-eyed beings as significant elements. What other one-eyed beings do we know? Perhaps Gruumsh was either once a god of the Cyclops, or was a Cyclops himself when the orcs were a slave race.

So, imagine a world in which cyclops rule a mighty empire. Their intelligentsia learn the secrets of fantasy-style bioengineering and eugenics. Gradually, a rift begins to occur, as the intelligentsia modify themselves to become more and more powerful. They actually remove their own bodies, as unnecessary appendages, relying solely on their heads, the seat of their power. They add more and more eyes, and give those eyes greater and greater magical abilities. Eventually, a civil war erupts, and the empire falls.

Ten thousand years later, only a rare few scholars suspect that the cyclops and the beholders were once one people.

They learned to forge eyes? Neat. All you need is something to explain why the beholders went bugfuck crazy. Divine retribution for hubris would be very in keeping with the original myths.

Lugh

07-11-2008 11:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9105687)

They learned to forge eyes? Neat. All you need is something to explain why the beholders went bugfuck crazy. Divine retribution for hubris would be very in keeping with the original myths.

What do you mean "went?" You pretty much have to be bugfuck crazy already to harvest other people's eyes, enchant them, and stick them on your own head.

And, I much prefer the explanation of "a sense of what they could do developed much faster than a sense of what they should do" to any kind of divine retribution. Essentially, you have an entire group that falls into the kind of sanity trap you seen in, say, Reanimator or Frankenstein.

Zartes

07-12-2008 12:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9103084)

That's an excellent point, actually...I'm ashamed I didn't realize it earlier.

I think I get so blinded by genre convention that I forget to ask for any kind of verisimilitude. What do fantasy zombie do? They lurk in crypts. What do modern zombies do? They spread like a plague. Why?

In keeping with the perpetual awesomeness of this thread, I'm now inspired to think, really think, about the ecology of undeath. Assuming it's not a new phenomenon in most fantasy worlds, the easy replicability and (apparently) unlimited energy of the undead should have radically altered (demi-)human society, but most people (myself included) play it like a pseudo-medieval kingdom that has apparently developed in a tiny, zombie-free bottle, and is perpetually surprised by the walking dead. In a low-magic world, I can keep my disbelief suspended, but places like the Forgotten Realms really have no excuse.

Onward to verisimilitude.

Personally, in my pet fantasy campaign, Undead are kept in check by three factors: they're not easy to make, heroes kept to take exception to them and...

Anti-ghouls.

Ghouls crave the flesh of the dead, right? So, Anti-ghouls are ghouls that crave the flesh of the undead. The Department of Necromancy in my campaign's primary magical school keeps an antighoul called Nigel on hand for "waste disposal" purposes.

EDIT: of course, the dominant species in my campaign world is gnomes, so whether logic still applies to anything involved therein is a matter of opinion...

Setebos

07-12-2008 12:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9105473)
Okay, Giants, here we go, take a deep breath....

By far the most intriguing aspect of these ones is their ancient curse of fossilisation - which gradually transforms them into stone over the course of their lives. I love the idea of an entire race being condemned to the same fate, which none of them know how to solve.

God help me, but all I can think of is the Desert Giants, convinced that petrification is divine retribution for weakness of character, choosing their leaders by dance-off.

g026r

07-12-2008 12:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9105473)
By far the most intriguing aspect of these ones is their ancient curse of fossilisation - which gradually transforms them into stone over the course of their lives. I love the idea of an entire race being condemned to the same fate, which none of them know how to solve.

I see vast wind-swept deserts where it's said that the adventurous or mad who venture far enough out into them can find groupings of statues, worn and pitted by time and the sands, standing where no signs of any habitation can be found. The sages themselves are confused as to the source, for their tomes speak not of any tribes of men who lived before them in the great desert.

The desert giants know of their origin, but remain silent. The curse is their great shame, and they do not speak of it to outsiders. Instead, they hide their petrifying body parts beneath wound sheets and flowing robes until the day approaches when such further efforts at concealment would be futile. The giant then quietly says their last farewell to their family and loved ones, and begins their trek towards the heart of the great desert--there to find peace and death near what was once the heart of their long fallen and forgotten empire.

JRM

07-12-2008 01:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9101961)

I always thought, though, that ghouls made the most sense of any of the spawning undead -- at least there was some implication that they had to eat. All of the rest apparently need no sustenance, and can spawn endlessly with minimal effort... especially if they can get their claws on some NPCs (rather than PCs). And they have no natural predators to keep their population in check (other than PCs).

It is a wonder that Greyhawk wasn't overrun by sudden hordes of ghouls, wights, vampires, etc. The place should look like a zombie apocalypse movie, really.

Sorry for being late to the ghoulish party*, but I felt like sharing my solution to the undead spawning problem. Back in the 1st edition Monster Manual for Demons & Devils it says that the most powerful of the damned souls they collected were used to create intelligent undead, and these may eventually be 'promoted' into true fiends.

That means if uncle Albert comes back as a ghoulish it isn't really Albert, it's the dead body of your uncle being occupied by some random evil dead person. The spirit occupying it might be able to use some of the memories in its decaying brain, which might explain how it knows exploitable facts about the body's friends & family. Alternatively, the ghoulish that remember people are evil souls sent back from the abyss to reoccupy their own corpses, although I think that should mainly happen with vampires, and ghoulish are made from weaker spirits that have lost most of the identity of their previous lives.

Anyhows, that means that the number of 'ghoulish-worthy' souls is the limiting factor, and once they're all running around the prime material eating people they can't spawn any more ghoulish. This may also explain why so many ghoulish are locked up in tombs. If you kill a ghoulish its demonic spirit may return in a different corpse, but if you lock a ghoulish in a crypt it could stay trapped there for millenia.

*Hmm, a ghoulish party. I can see that going two ways - (1) you do NOT want to know what's in the birthday cake, or (2) "vote for me, and I'll make cremation and burial illegal!"

JRM

07-12-2008 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Anaxamander (Post 9103531)

Perhaps ghoulish eat other undead. That would work pretty well I think, at least for the lower ranks. (and maybe the higher ranks don't want competition) Although you might end up with ghoul farmers, i.e. ghouls who keep herds of zombies and feed them living beings to keep the herd size stable.

That reminds me of a tiny kingdom of the undead in my own campaign which never got used in play. The aristocracy are a handful of vampires, the middle class are ghouls and the peasants are skeletons who toil in the fields and fight as cannon fodder. The skeletons farm crops used to feed living humanoids who are raised in pits. These wretches used to be a mixture of races, but have been bred for so many generations that they've become deranged, animalistic creatures with little resemblance to people, fated to become food and animated skeletons. They are not animated as zombies... it'd be a waste of perfectly edible flesh.

The kingdom's biggest problem is that any 'livestock' that seemed intelligent or rebellious enough to pose a potential threat was the first to be eaten, and the herd is now so stunted and reduced in intelligence they make weak and stupid ghouls - and most ghouls are pretty stupid to begin with. As a result, the kingdom has decided they must mount raids to capture fresh stock from the lands of the living, both to turn into superior ghouls and to replenish their livestock's bloodlines.

And that's where the player characters come in!::eek:

Sleeper

07-12-2008 02:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9105773)

And, I much prefer the explanation of "a sense of what they could do developed much faster than a sense of what they should do" to any kind of divine retribution. Essentially, you have an entire group that falls into the kind of sanity trap you seen in, say, Reanimator or Frankenstein.

That gets into interesting territory. Reanimator and Frankenstein are cautionary tales, which are fundamentally predicated on the fear of change, specifically the fear of technology. Fear is inherently irrational, so while the stories can be powerful and gripping, they fundamentally deal with emotional issues. They're not rational explorations of how morality should be applied to new developments. Maybe the beholders aren't nuts. Maybe they have rationally considered the consequences and have willingly given up their own personal identities to evolve into a new, more limitless lifeform. They are organic AIs, brains downloaded into a giant lens and fluid matrix, and they continually augment their form by incorporating new AIs, new identities. They're the transhumanists of the fantasy world. The ordinary peasant considers them to be bugfuck insane not only because the physical process is disturbing (plucking eyes), but because those who join the collective lose their own sense of self, which is terrifying. Almost all those stories about beholders are lies, cautionary tales spread out of raw, naked, primal fear.

A Letter From Prague

07-12-2008 03:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9106379)

Fear is inherently irrational,

Being afraid of shit that hurts you is generally pretty rational...

Sleeper

07-12-2008 07:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by A Letter From Prague (Post 9106875)
Being afraid of shit that hurts you is generally pretty rational...

Rational implies reasoning. Fear is an instinctive emotional response.

6inTruder

07-12-2008 09:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9105473)
Cloud Giant

Cloud Giants live in small clans at the tops of mountains or on "magical cloud islands" which they mine for silver lining. (That's check number two for that gag....I wonder how many times it will appear over the course of the book? The evil ones raid the local areas and beat up the humanoids living there; the good ones like to trade.

If I ever get to run my Spelljammer Homebrew the PCs will encounter, as a trade planet in their home system, an air planet where Cloud Giants live on their wierd little floating islands.

Not much more too it, but I kinda liked the idea of Giants being the dominant life/civ on some other planet.

noisms

07-12-2008 11:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9107935)
If I ever get to run my Spelljammer Homebrew the PCs will encounter, as a trade planet in their home system, an air planet where Cloud Giants live on their wierd little floating islands.

Not much more too it, but I kinda liked the idea of Giants being the dominant life/civ on some other planet.

That would be fun. The Giants could be embroiled in the middle of a civil war between the good and the evil varieties - but the PCs wouldn't know straight off the bat which side was which.

David J Prokopetz

07-12-2008 02:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9106379)

Reanimator and Frankenstein are cautionary tales, which are fundamentally predicated on the fear of change, specifically the fear of technology. Fear is inherently irrational, so while the stories can be powerful and gripping, they fundamentally deal with emotional issues. They're not rational explorations of how morality should be applied to new developments.

Random pet peeve: that's a simplistic reading of Frankenstein, albeit a common one. It's more accurate to state that Frankenstein is about humankind's collective refusal to take responsibility for the consequences of the technologies it develops. The text is not at all subtle about this point - it hammers on it pretty hard on several occasions.

Naxuul

07-12-2008 02:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9108708)

Random pet peeve: that's a simplistic reading of Frankenstein, albeit a common one. It's more accurate to state that Frankenstein is about humankind's collective refusal to take responsibility for the consequences of the technologies it develops. The text is not at all subtle about this point - it hammers on it pretty hard on several occasions.

Yeah, Frankenstein doesn't make a monster because he raises the dead. He makes a monster because he raises the dead then runs scared shitless from it and all that entails.

-Naxuul

noisms

07-12-2008 02:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9108708)

Random pet peeve: that's a simplistic reading of Frankenstein, albeit a common one. It's more accurate to state that Frankenstein is about humankind's collective refusal to take responsibility for the consequences of the technologies it develops. The text is not at all subtle about this point - it hammers on it pretty hard on several occasions.

That's one of its themes, sure. But fear of change is another - hence The Modern Prometheus: be careful how far you go in the pursuit of technological advancement. (Because you might end up creating a monster - or, being chained to a rock and having your liver pecked out by a vulture every day.)

David J Prokopetz

07-12-2008 03:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9108788)

That's one of its themes, sure. But fear of change is another - hence The Modern Prometheus: be careful how far you go in the pursuit of technological advancement.

I have a problem with this reading because the monster is not a product of cutting-edge science. The text delves at some length into the fact that the Doctor is operating on the basis of outmoded principles more akin to alchemy than modern chemistry - he's a throwback to a more primitive and superstitious (or mystical, if you prefer) understanding of the universe.

As an aside, I've always felt that the subtitle is meant to be ironic, as the mythic Prometheus was made to suffer because he refused to abdicate his responsibility toward his creation (i.e., the human race). He's the precise opposite of the Doctor in this sense.

noisms

07-12-2008 04:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9108820)

I have a problem with this reading because the monster is not a product of cutting-edge science. The text delves at some length into the fact that the Doctor is operating on the basis of outmoded principles more akin to alchemy than modern chemistry - he's a throwback to a more primitive and superstitious (or mystical, if you prefer) understanding of the universe.

I'm not sure I agree with that reading. Shelley herself probably had a primitive and superstitious (i.e. mystical and Romantic) view of the universe; she apparently disliked Prometheus because she believed that the discovery of fire had brought about meat-eating in mankind. If I remember rightly the story was also partly inspired by Percy Shelley's experiments with electricity and magnetism - indicating that Shelley herself was suspicious of the new sciences.

Quote:

As an aside, I've always felt that the subtitle is meant to be ironic, as the mythic Prometheus was made to suffer because he refused to abdicate his responsibility toward his creation (i.e., the human race). He's the precise opposite of the Doctor in this sense.

See above: Prometheus irresponsibly created a monster (fire) in Shelley's eyes, which meant that humans could kill and eat animals. This is paralleled by Frankenstein, who irresponsibly created an actual monster.

Don't forget that The Modern Prometheus was a term coined by Immanuel Kant in reference (I think) to Ben Franklin and his electrical experiments. Shelley likely knew of the reference, and was referring to modern scientists in general.

(This is all half-remembered from my university Romanticism course, 8 years ago, so I might be mistaken.)

Crinos

07-12-2008 05:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Well when I read the story for a humanities class, we learned it as Frankenstein was playing God and doing a piss poor job at it was the general gist of the story. Course its kind of foggy at this point, it was a few years ago that I read it.

noisms

07-12-2008 05:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9109068)

Well when I read the story for a humanities class, we learned it as Frankenstein was playing God and doing a piss poor job at it was the general gist of the story. Course its kind of foggy at this point, it was a few years ago that I read it.

Well yeah, to cut a long story short. But then we'd be putting thousands of university literature lecturers out of a job.... ;)

Anyway, enough Frankenstein! On with the Giants! New entry coming up shortly.

Sleeper

07-12-2008 06:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9108708)

Random pet peeve: that's a simplistic reading of Frankenstein, albeit a common one. It's more accurate to state that Frankenstein is about humankind's collective refusal to take responsibility for the consequences of the technologies it develops. The text is not at all subtle about this point - it hammers on it pretty hard on several occasions.

I don't entirely agree with your interpretation, but I wasn't trying for a balanced literary analysis of a classic novel either. I was just bringing up a theme that unites almost all science-runs-amok stories, and that it primarily appeals to the emotions, not the intellect. Frankenstein is a rather sophisticated piece of work that is far more subtle and nuanced than its descendants. Reanimator and its kind are what the original story has devolved into: Primarily just raw exploitation, built on a simplistic and almost mindless treatment of "science is bad".

But yes, on to the giants :).

kelvingreen

07-12-2008 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9108820)
The text delves at some length...

Also bear in mind that there are at least two texts, one from 1818 and a revised edition from 1831, and there are significant differences in tone between the two. The first is more ironic and satirical, as I recall.

DMH

07-12-2008 08:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9105605)
Splitting up the Cyclops and Cyclopskin (which reads like it's Cyclop-skin, doesn't it?) is probably an attempt to capture the dichotomy of Greek myth, where the cyclopes are both godlike crafters of Zeus' thunderbolts, helms of invisibility, earthshaking tridents, divine bows, etc. -- and also poor Polyphemus, the shepherd whose neighbors think a fool and also the butt of the only satyr play we have left.

True cyclops were divided up in Legends and Lore into lesser (the version in the MM) and the greater (which has immunity to heat because of the work at the forge plus a bunch of other things that I can't remember at the moment).

Cyclopskin is like the verbeeg- a size change and not much else.

JRM

07-12-2008 09:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9105473)
Cloud Giant

Cloud Giants live in small clans at the tops of mountains or on "magical cloud islands" which they mine for silver lining. (That's check number two for that gag....I wonder how many times it will appear over the course of the book? The evil ones raid the local areas and beat up the humanoids living there; the good ones like to trade.

Maybe they're not different instances of the same gag - what if Cloud Giant's magical cloud islands are made from tempests?

David J Prokopetz

07-12-2008 11:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9108962)
I'm not sure I agree with that reading. Shelley herself probably had a primitive and superstitious (i.e. mystical and Romantic) view of the universe [...]

While I respect your request to leave the debate aside, I feel compelled to point out that this isn't quite what I meant. The text explicitly describes the Doctor as operating on the basis of outmoded principles - he's even upbraided by one of his more progressive colleagues at one point. I'm not slamming the novel for being written by someone with an imprecise understanding of contemporary science. :)

noisms

07-12-2008 11:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9109409)
Maybe they're not different instances of the same gag - what if Cloud Giant's magical cloud islands are made from tempests?

They'd make quite a pair of allies...

JRM

07-13-2008 12:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9109700)
They'd make quite a pair of allies...

That's not what I meant. The tempests would hardly stay allied once the cloud giants started mining them for silver.

noisms

07-13-2008 12:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Giant, E-F

Ettin

If Cloud Giants are the Elves of Giantkind, Ettins are the Ogres - mean, dirty, brutish, two-headed things that like to squish stuff. There isn't a great deal more to say about them, except for two things:

- Ettins are so dirty that their lairs are a haven for parasites and vermin. Adventurers rooting around in them could easily find themselves picking up diseases or having to deal with a new, secondary set of enemies (rats and giant insects would be fun).
- There is a hint that Ettins hoard treasure in order to pay orcs and goblins as mercenaries. There's only a short leap from there to imagine an Ettin warlord gradually gathering power and taking on the world of men with his (their?) almighty horde...

Firbolg

These are big, beardy, Grizzly-Adams types who live in forests and mountains and keep themselves to themselves. They're the only kind of giants who I genuinely have difficulty getting excited about; their entry is one of the few in the MM to offer essentially nothing in the way of hooks. If you think differently, by all means get your creative gears whirring and come up with something.

Fire

An old favourite, Fire Giants are, as well as being really cool, an interesting insight into the differences between the editions. The 2nd edition picture makes the creature look like an oversized dwarf in plate mail armour, whose only real relation to fire is that he has a reddish beard. Compare that with the Fire Giant pictures in 3rd and 4th edition and you'll see essentially a completely different beast; back in the day there really was something more...low key...about the artwork where everything now is overblown.

I like how the Fire Giants carry around a sack, and how its contents are detailed. All of them contain, naturally enough, a tinderbox.

Fire Giants rule an area of my long-running campaign world. It's a mountainous, volcanic zone, rather like Yellowstone Park but covering a much wider and more arid area. They are the upper caste in a strictly stratified hierarchy of races, with Duergar, Hobgoblins and Goblins below them. There's something very appealing about Giantish rulers - it reminds me of The Silver Chair or, even better, Gene Wolfe's The Wizard Knight. Huge castles and fortresses hundreds of times bigger than those used by humans, with staircases you have to climb up and massive oak doors towering above you. The imagery gets even better if you imagine a backdrop of steaming geysers and volcanoes oozing magma.

noisms

07-13-2008 12:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9109791)

That's not what I meant. The tempests would hardly stay allied once the cloud giants started mining them for silver.

In that case, I suppose you could conceive of Tempests being captured and enslaved by the Cloud Giants. The Tempests would be kept in a permanent debased state but prevented from dying, because then their silver supply would run out. The Cloud Giants want to keep them alive forever as a perpetual source of the metal.

kelvingreen

07-13-2008 01:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9109797)

If Cloud Giants are the Elves of Giantkind

Speaking of which, we're soon going to get to that awful forest giant picture...

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9109797)

Firbolg

These are big, beardy, Grizzly-Adams types who live in forests and mountains and keep themselves to themselves. They're the only kind of giants who I genuinely have difficulty getting excited about; their entry is one of the few in the MM to offer essentially nothing in the way of hooks. If you think differently, by all means get your creative gears whirring and come up with something.

It's a case where they took a name from folklore/mythology/legend, left the rest behind, and didn't replace it with anything better. If they weren't going to bring the Fir Bolg intact from mythology, they should have just had it as an alternate name for another kind of giant, rather than the generic nothingness we actually got. At least Fomorians did a bit better, although their chief Balor unfortunately didn't make it, for obvious reasons.

You know, with the rubbish forest giant picture and the general unimaginativeness of the rest (desert giant and Formorians aside), the Giant section of the MM is a bit of a let-down.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9109797)

back in the day there really was something more...low key...about the artwork where everything now is overblown.

Overblown in a different way, I think. There was some truly mental stuff in the early days, which calmed down by the time 2e came about, and now we've got a case where the artwork is really rather conventional, but everything's been Turned Up To 11.

JRM

07-13-2008 03:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9109804)

In that case, I suppose you could conceive of Tempests being captured and enslaved by the Cloud Giants. The Tempests would be kept in a permanent debased state but prevented from dying, because then their silver supply would run out. The Cloud Giants want to keep them alive forever as a perpetual source of the metal.

Yup, that's more what I was thinking, with a family of evil cloud giants building their castle atop a black cloud formed from the shackled bodies of numerous Tempests. Can't see the good cloud giants doing the same - although they may hunt tempests through the sky, to collect their silver.

Now I'm imagining a cloud giant with a wooden leg and an eye patch, captaining a flying ship on his obsessive quest to hunt down the Great White Tempest.

Sleeper

07-13-2008 04:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Speaking of overblown, it might be interesting to combine the fire giants with the dwarves of Norse mythology. They're the great smiths, forging adamantite and mithral into powerful armor and weapons like hammers of thunderbolts and vorpal swords. Their name comes from their fiery nature, and their resistance to heat comes from generations of slaving at the forge. Except, that's not all. The elder generation of fire giants guards a forbidding secret: They were the dwarves of Norse of mythology. An age ago, they fled Jotunheim, where they were the smallest of the small, and came to Midgard where even their diminutive stature made them seem like giants to the puny humans. The PCs could be sent on a quest to find one of the mad forefathers of the race, to inveigle and beguile him into forging an artifact worthy of the gods. To craft impossibly hard metals, jewels, chains of thought, and half-baked dreams into gossamer chariots of ethereal beauty, living swine made of gold, or axes that can cleave mountains. And across the Nine Worlds, sent to stop them, is a cadre of true giants three times the height of the so-called giants of the middle realm.

6inTruder

07-13-2008 04:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9108347)

That would be fun. The Giants could be embroiled in the middle of a civil war between the good and the evil varieties - but the PCs wouldn't know straight off the bat which side was which.

Hey! ... That's a great idea! :o

demiurge1138

07-13-2008 07:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9109797)

If Cloud Giants are the Elves of Giantkind, Ettins are the Ogres.

I was under the impression that ogres were the ogres of giant-kind...

Sleeper

07-13-2008 09:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9111016)

I was under the impression that ogres were the ogres of giant-kind...

No, ogres are the halflings of giant-kind. Small, puny, and you can't leave them alone with your good silverware.

Sleeper

07-13-2008 09:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9111295)

No, ogres are the halflings of giant-kind. Small, puny, and you can't leave them alone with your good silverware.

To riff on that, then what are halflings to giants? Well, they're rats. And like rats, they're everywhere -- even if the giants don't always see them. They're in the baseboards and the trees, they burrow under the foundations, and dart across the open spaces. Eating scraps, gnawing holes in barrels, feasting on the cereals. The halflings in this world are half-feral, twitchy and scampering. Rat-like in demeanor if not appearance. Occasionally one gets stomped by an annoyed giant, and once in a while an incautious whelp gets caught in a trap or nibbles on some poisoned peanut butter. But not very often.

To giant-hunters, halflings can be a good source of information. But they're furtive and hard to catch, and very reluctant. They don't trust the the semi-big ones, like humans and elves, who are just too small to easily hide from. And while they don't necessarily like or trust the giants, they live on their leavings and don't want to hurt their food source. The party's best bet may be a distraught halfling widow, whose husband was pulped and children were poisoned. In her grief, she doesn't care about the rest of her clan. She just wants the giants smashed. So from the shadow of her hole in the base of the wall, she tattles to the adventurers in a squeaky whisper.

ogier300

07-13-2008 12:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Given all the debate about Frankenstein, I can't wait for the Flesh Golem entry now...

demiurge1138

07-13-2008 05:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9111349)

To riff on that, then what are halflings to giants? Well, they're rats. And like rats, they're everywhere -- even if the giants don't always see them. They're in the baseboards and the trees, they burrow under the foundations, and dart across the open spaces. Eating scraps, gnawing holes in barrels, feasting on the cereals. The halflings in this world are half-feral, twitchy and scampering. Rat-like in demeanor if not appearance. Occasionally one gets stomped by an annoyed giant, and once in a while an incautious whelp gets caught in a trap or nibbles on some poisoned peanut butter. But not very often.

To giant-hunters, halflings can be a good source of information. But they're furtive and hard to catch, and very reluctant. They don't trust the the semi-big ones, like humans and elves, who are just too small to easily hide from. And while they don't necessarily like or trust the giants, they live on their leavings and don't want to hurt their food source. The party's best bet may be a distraught halfling widow, whose husband was pulped and children were poisoned. In her grief, she doesn't care about the rest of her clan. She just wants the giants smashed. So from the shadow of her hole in the base of the wall, she tattles to the adventurers in a squeaky whisper.

These shouldn't be halflings. These should be gnomes.

Gnomes and giants already don't get along--gnomes get mad plusses to avoid being attacked by giant-type creatures. Because they make a good living in the shadow of giants, raiding their cupboards, nicking the occasional goose with golden eggs, and generally making a nuisance of themselves. Plus, while halflings are generally friendly and pastoral folk, gnomes keep their secrets to themselves, being generally, well, gnomic among outsiders.

Sleeper

07-13-2008 07:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9112388)
These shouldn't be halflings. These should be gnomes.

Nice. The "scurry, scurry don't squash me" bonus to AC isn't some fancy trained combat technique. Wee gnomelings dare each other to dart in front of giantish sentinels, and over the years they just become very, very good at not being stepped on. The whack-a-kobold or -goblin bonus is because those two races are their main competitors for living space under the straw and in the hollows between walls; like rats, gnomes are vicious when cornered and threatened in their homes. The kobolds are the black rats, notorious plague vectors who spread across the world by stowing away on ships, and are now being displaced by the brown rat (gnome). The gnomish talent for illusion is a natural survival skill: Blurred or invisible, false scuttling sounds in the baseboards, and multiplying gnome-rats (using mirror image) when startled by a giant who opens a cupboard. Like rats, they're everywhere but rarely seen.

The hill giant infestations would be the best known, whole clans and warrens hidden within and under their vast steadings. Only a few hardy varieties would infest the volcanic homes of the fire giants, a rather inhospitable environment. Swarms of heavily-furr(coated)ed gnomes infest the glacial rifts. Like brown rats who rarely stray far, many gnomes would live their entire lives within the rift of a single giant jarl. Totally unsuited for crossing the icy wastes, the occasional young band would hitch a ride in pouches or in great wagons across the tundra when the population grows to large to sustain them, and spread in that fashion. Family groups would also hide in the cloud giants' elegant halls of stone and vapor, and the storm giants' rough and ready stockades formed of lashed-together trunks of giant firs. The giants might hire adventurers, particularly the quarter-sized ones like dwarves and halflings, to clear out the larger nests. Kill them, or persuade them to pack up and migrate en masse?

DMH

07-13-2008 08:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

The Role-aids book on giants added one of the most bizzare animals- a rodent that can be squashed flat and survive. Some of the stupider giants use them as clothing (!?) so the "hide" on a hill giant may actually move and squirm.

Quote:

- Ettins are so dirty that their lairs are a haven for parasites and vermin. Adventurers rooting around in them could easily find themselves picking up diseases or having to deal with a new, secondary set of enemies (rats and giant insects would be fun).

Now what would make them immune to rot grubs?

JRM

07-13-2008 09:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9112627)

Nice. The "scurry, scurry don't squash me" bonus to AC isn't some fancy trained combat technique. Wee gnomelings dare each other to dart in front of giantish sentinels, and over the years they just become very, very good at not being stepped on. The whack-a-kobold or -goblin bonus is because those two races are their main competitors for living space under the straw and in the hollows between walls; like rats, gnomes are vicious when cornered and threatened in their homes. The kobolds are the black rats, notorious plague vectors who spread across the world by stowing away on ships, and are now being displaced by the brown rat (gnome). The gnomish talent for illusion is a natural survival skill: Blurred or invisible, false scuttling sounds in the baseboards, and multiplying gnome-rats (using mirror image) when startled by a giant who opens a cupboard. Like rats, they're everywhere but rarely seen.

The hill giant infestations would be the best known, whole clans and warrens hidden within and under their vast steadings. Only a few hardy varieties would infest the volcanic homes of the fire giants, a rather inhospitable environment. Swarms of heavily-furr(coated)ed gnomes infest the glacial rifts. Like brown rats who rarely stray far, many gnomes would live their entire lives within the rift of a single giant jarl. Totally unsuited for crossing the icy wastes, the occasional young band would hitch a ride in pouches or in great wagons across the tundra when the population grows to large to sustain them, and spread in that fashion. Family groups would also hide in the cloud giants' elegant halls of stone and vapor, and the storm giants' rough and ready stockades formed of lashed-together trunks of giant firs. The giants might hire adventurers, particularly the quarter-sized ones like dwarves and halflings, to clear out the larger nests. Kill them, or persuade them to pack up and migrate en masse?

Some nice ideas here, having gnomes living like rats in giant's steadings. Doesn't fit with their habitat/ecology in the Monstrous Manual, but it'd be easy enough to stat up another subrace for these 'Borrower Gnomes'. I'm thinking they'd likely be 2-2½ feet tall like forest gnomes, but would have special abilities more like rock gnomes and be more likely to learn the language of their giant hosts rather than dwarf or elf, for obvious reasons.

Once upon a time I ran an adventure in a giant city whose citizens kept numerous dwarf and goblin slaves who were forced to move about via the gutters rather than at street level like the 'proper sized' people did. Have some of them escape and turn scavenger and bingo, you've got gutter goblins.

As for giants hiring adventures to clear out gnome nests, that doesn't sound like something any good party would do. I'm thinking more of a party trying to persuade a gnome nest to help them steal a macguffin from the bedchamber of the giant king, and have to deal with paranoid gnomes, a kobold tribe of rival scavengers, a 'gnome-catcher' hill giant with his pet giant weasels and maybe a few underfloor/sewer monsters.

Sleeper

07-13-2008 10:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9112748)

Doesn't fit with their habitat/ecology in the Monstrous Manual, but it'd be easy enough to stat up another subrace for these 'Borrower Gnomes'.

That's a perfectly fine interpretation and might be fun, but it's very far away from my intent. I wasn't thinking of a new gnome subrace. I was thinking of making gnomes -- all gnomes in the world --different. Just adding another bizarre subrace doesn't have that impact. Nobody can keep track of the absurd number of humanoid, anyway. And they're not borrowers. These gnomes are inspired by Rattus rattus, R. norvegicus, and invasive species; not a candy-coated kids story.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9112748)

As for giants hiring adventures to clear out gnome nests, that doesn't sound like something any good party would do

Why not? They're dirty little rat-like parasites who live in the wainscotting of the homes of other races. They peep, they spy, they steal food, they might even poison the most annoying little-big brats. And giants don't have to be cartoonishly malevolent. They might have a brutish warlike culture (hill, frost, and storm giants at least), but many barbarian tribes were considered valuable trading partners by Rome, and serving as mercenaries was commonplace. And if hill giants are big peasants, an infestation spoiling all the wheat in a granary would threaten the survival of the entire community. Having absolute alignments and races who are evil for the sake of being evil is fine, but I like the occasional touch of moral complexity. Could even add a Warhammer-inspired gnome-catcher kit, who start with 1d3 gnome pelts on a stick.

JRM

07-13-2008 11:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9112818)

*That's a perfectly fine interpretation and might be fun, but it's very far away from my intent. I wasn't thinking of a new gnome subrace. I was thinking of making gnomes -- all gnomes in the world -- different. Just adding another bizarre subrace doesn't have that impact. Nobody can keep track of the absurd number of humanoids, anyway. And they're not borrowers. These gnomes are inspired by Rattus rattus, R. norvegicus, and invasive species; not a candy-coated kids story.*

Well on Krynn all the gnomes seem to be tinker gnomes, who are considered a subrace in the Monstrous Manual. It depends how different you want them to be - they could just be a cultural variant of regular rock or forest gnomes, maybe a little smaller and twitchier, but if you want them to be verminous parasites in giant house that looks as big a gap from the 'regular' gnome as the other MM gnome subraces.

The borrowers were thieving little vermin too, they just didn't see themselves that way. I doubt your proposed gnomes would boast of being 'rat gnomes' or 'household vermin', wouldn't they'd think of themselves as being 'steadying gnomes' or something like that.

As for the alignment issue, I just fell back on the AD&D defaults of most gnomes being good and a lot of giants being evil.

noisms

07-13-2008 11:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Giant, F

Fog Giant

These are one of the casualties (I think) of the transfer from 2nd to 3rd edition - I'm not so well versed in the multitudinous 3rd edition Monster Manuals, but I don't think Fog Giants ever made an appearance. This is a shame, because Fog Giants are a lot of fun - hunting White Dragons, ganging together with Cloud Giants to cause mischief, playing copsi (boulder-tossing) and bartering for silver. Young Fog Giants have to collect a large item of pure silver before they can mate, and often undergo quests for it, which sounds like something adventurers would get caught up in. Best of all, Fog Giants like to eat Centaurs - which long-term readers will know that I appreciate very much.

I believe Fog Giants are based on Giants of a particular real-life culture, but I'm not sure which.

Fomorian

Fomorians are a bastardised version of the Fomorians of Irish myth, in which respect they are similar to the Fir Bolg, except a little more interesting. I suppose a workable path for a campaign to go down would be a war between Fomorians and Fir Bolg, set in a Celtic-based area, with the players having to choose sides between the two.

Fomorians are mutated, deformed horrors whose society is "ruled by depravity and wickedness". The picture looks like Quasimodo, although my understanding is that the Fomorians of legend were man-goats. I'm not sure where the D&D people got the idea to turn them into hunchbacks.

Fomorians like the meat of large animals "who beg not to be eaten". Their cooking consists of torture, rather than measures to improve taste. Ulp.

Frost Giant

Frost Giants are like huge, malicious vikings - big blokes with horned helmets and two-handed axes. They love burying themselves in the snow, and then leaping out shouting "I'm a Frost Giant!!" before lopping off your head.

In my long-running campaign world there is a mercenary company of Frost Giants moving inexorably across a continent, rather like Alexander the Great and his armies. Nobody knows where they are going and they probably don't know themselves. They are just traveling ever onwards, leaving a trail of destruction in their wake.

Sleeper

07-14-2008 12:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Despite a few superficial similarities, the Borrowers (and gully dwarves for that matter) would be vastly different in terms of themes, imagery, and culture. But that's just fine, too. Easier to incorporate into a one-shot, too, if they're just an obscure aberrant offshoot.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9112935)

As for the alignment issue, I just fell back on the AD&D defaults of most gnomes being good and a lot of giants being evil.

Well, doesn't have to be a good party, either. 2E definitely had a strong focus on the Good with a capital G party and their Evil with a capital E opponents, but oD&D and 1E definitely had a morally ambiguous sword & sorcery vibe. There was good, and there was evil, but mercenary behavior and using hirelings as cannon fodder was common, and there were assassin PCs. Wicked was viable, and expedience was the norm.

Sleeper

07-14-2008 12:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9113010)
Fog Giant

These are one of the casualties (I think) of the transfer from 2nd to 3rd edition - I'm not so well versed in the multitudinous 3rd edition Monster Manuals, but I don't think Fog Giants ever made an appearance.

They apparently were hidden away in a setting-specific bestiary, the Monsters of Faerûn. Image here.

JRM

07-14-2008 12:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9113030)

Well, doesn't have to be a good party, either. 2E definitely had a strong focus on the Good with a capital G party and their Evil with a capital E opponents, but oD&D and 1E definitely had a morally ambiguous sword & sorcery vibe. There was good, and there was evil, but mercenary behavior and using hirelings as cannon fodder was common, and there were assassin PCs. Wicked was viable, and expedience was the norm.

Erm, that's why I said it didn't seem like a job a good (or should that be Good?) party would accept. An Evil or Mercenary-Neutral party, no problem. My first impression was the giants were looking to hire mercenaries to kill a bunch of sapient beings because they steal some of the giants' food in order to survive. That's doesn't seem a terribly moral act. It'd be like some AD&D humans deciding to get the ratcatcher to kill all the jermlaines or house-brownies in their kitchen, or execute the goblin beggars scavenging in their rubbish heap. Your other proposal of relocating the 'steading gnomes' would be a more moral solution, if the party could find a way to make it sustainable.

If I was a PC in such a scenario I'd probably try to persuade the two parties to form a more symbiotic relationship - I'm sure there'd be all kinds of work the gnomes could perform for the giants in return for their keep. (keeping down vermin, precision tasks that are awkward for giant fingers etc)

demiurge1138

07-14-2008 12:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9113060)

*They apparently were hidden away in a setting-specific bestiary, the Monsters of Faerûn. Image here.*

Monsters of Faerun stole a bunch of monsters that should've been core, or at least not setting-specific, like bullywugs, deepspawn and leucrotta.

JRM

07-14-2008 01:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9113010)

Fomorians are mutated, deformed horrors whose society is "ruled by depravity and wickedness". The picture looks like Quasimodo, although my understanding is that the Fomorians of legend were man-goats. I'm not sure where the D&D people got the idea to turn them into hunchbacks.

Fomorians like the meat of large animals "who beg not to be eaten". Their cooking consists of torture, rather than measures to improve taste. Ulp.

AD&D fomorian giants have loved torture since their first appearance in Gygax's The Lost Caverns of Tsojcanth. It reminds me of 2000 AD's Slainé comics, doesn't it have fomorians who are horrible sea demons that delight in suffering, drinking the tears of mortals. Maybe AD&D fomorian giants literally enjoy the taste of pain and fear, that would explain why their cooking consists of torture.

[had to edit the first line of the previous paragraph since I mucked around with it so much in the original version I ruined the sense of it.]

The Irish sources do seem very mixed up as to what they were like - one was handsome enough to make desirable husbands for Tuatha de Danaan, one was a huge ghastly monster with a death-ray eye (the "not a type VI demon" Balor), some were one-eyed one-armed one-legged monsters resembling Fachan with curse-inflicting powers. It does make things confusing, eh.

Sleeper

07-14-2008 02:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9113108)

Erm, that's why I said it didn't seem like a job a good (or should that be Good?) party would accept.

That's why I proposed another option, when you didn't agree :). I'm not at all interested in getting into a discussion about alignment. Personal moral codes always seem to get mixed up with the fiction, and that never ends well.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9113117)

Monsters of Faerun stole a bunch of monsters that should've been core, or at least not setting-specific, like bullywugs, deepspawn and leucrotta.

And the wemic! Can't forget the bizarre liontaurs. That's reason alone for noisms to get ahold of a copy. :)

JRM

07-14-2008 03:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9113331)

That's why I proposed another option, when you didn't agree :). I'm not at all interested in getting into a discussion about alignment. Personal moral codes always seem to get mixed up with the fiction, and that never ends well.

And the wemic! Can't forget the bizarre liontaurs. That's reason alone for noisms to get ahold of a copy. :)

That's fine, I don't want to start a D&D alignment debate either, those never end well!:)

Monsters of Faerun is one of the few softback WotC books in my 3rd edition collection. It's thin for the cover price but there's some quality beasties in it.

kelvingreen

07-14-2008 03:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9113203)

*It reminds me of 2000 AD's Slainé comics, doesn't it have fomorians who are horrible sea demons that delight in suffering, drinking the tears of mortals...*

I can't remember if those were the actual Fomorians, or if they were allied demons.

Hang on...

It's a bit ambiguous. The opposing (humanoid, vaguely orcish) armies in The Horned God are called "Fomorians", "Sea Demons" and just plain "Demons" at various points. The weird tear-drinking man-beasts in their flying longship are simply called "Demons".

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9113203)

...one was a huge ghastly monster with a death-ray eye (the "not a type VI demon" Balor)

This Balor also makes it into Sláine, and it would have been great to have seen him as a unique Fomorian NPC in D&D too, but I suspect the name made that an impossibility.

Crinos

07-14-2008 05:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9113537)

I can't remember if those were the actual Fomorians, or if they were allied demons.

Hang on...

It's a bit ambiguous. The opposing (humanoid, vaguely orcish) armies in The Horned God are called "Fomorians", "Sea Demons" and just plain "Demons" at various points. The weird tear-drinking man-beasts in their flying longship are simply called "Demons".

This Balor also makes it into Sláine, and it would have been great to have seen him as a unique Fomorian NPC in D&D too, but I suspect the name made that an impossibility.

I think he was stated out (or at least described) In the celtic adventures book.

It was one of those green softcover books for playing in actual historical settings. My older brother had that one and the Ancient Greece one.

JRM

07-14-2008 06:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9113537)

I can't remember if those were the actual Fomorians, or if they were allied demons.

Hang on...

It's a bit ambiguous. The opposing (humanoid, vaguely orcish) armies in The Horned God are called "Fomorians", "Sea Demons" and just plain "Demons" at various points. The weird tear-drinking man-beasts in their flying longship are simply called "Demons".

Yup, I couldn't remember for sure what kinds of demons in Slainé liked tear drinking, but I'm pretty sure it included the Fomorians who had invaded Ireland, although the "just plain 'demons'" may have been some kind of El-world creatures that weren't Fomorians.

To make matters worse, the more recent Slainé books introduced another kind of Fomorian Sea Demons who are fish-like monsters that parasitically latched onto human hosts.

Kakita Kojiro

07-14-2008 11:50 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9113010)
Fog Giant

These are one of the casualties (I think) of the transfer from 2nd to 3rd edition - I'm not so well versed in the multitudinous 3rd edition Monster Manuals, but I don't think Fog Giants ever made an appearance. This is a shame, because Fog Giants are a lot of fun - hunting White Dragons, ganging together with Cloud Giants to cause mischief, playing copsi (boulder-tossing) and bartering for silver. Young Fog Giants have to collect a large item of pure silver before they can mate, and often undergo quests for it, which sounds like something adventurers would get caught up in. Best of all, Fog Giants like to eat Centaurs - which long-term readers will know that I appreciate very much.

I believe Fog Giants are based on Giants of a particular real-life culture, but I'm not sure which.

So. Fog giants pal around with cloud giants. Fog giants undertake quests for silver so they can get laid. Cloud giants mine silver from their clouds. (that might be Tempests.) It'll be interesting to see how far they can play this plot-hook chain out...

Wakboth

07-14-2008 04:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

For whatever reason, I don't remember using giants very much in any game I've run. Maybe it was just the amount of entries and the fine-grained separation between the varieties; "this is a cloud giant, this is a fog giant; this is a mountain giant, this is a hill giant and this is a stone giant".

JasonK

07-14-2008 05:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9115368)

For whatever reason, I don't remember using giants very much in any game I've run. Maybe it was just the amount of entries and the fine-grained separation between the varieties; "this is a cloud giant, this is a fog giant; this is a mountain giant, this is a hill giant and this is a stone giant".

I'm with you on the lack of giant usage, but for me I think it's more conceptual. As I imagine a character fighting most giants, I can't picture that character reaching more than a leg, and a bunch of characters slashing at a giant's legs to kill it just isn't very appealing to me.

Maybe if giants were only 10 or 12 feet tall, max, I wouldn't have this problem? Or if I played through/saw a few battles with giants involving highly uneven ground? Where, say, characters had to climb up on boulders/ledges/whatever to effectively hit the giants? I dunno.

~ jason

Sleeper

07-14-2008 08:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9115387)

I'm with you on the lack of giant usage, but for me I think it's more conceptual. As I imagine a character fighting most giants, I can't picture that character reaching more than a leg, and a bunch of characters slashing at a giant's legs to kill it just isn't very appealing to me.

Maybe if giants were only 10 or 12 feet tall, max, I wouldn't have this problem? Or if I played through/saw a few battles with giants involving highly uneven ground? Where, say, characters had to climb up on boulders/ledges/whatever to effectively hit the giants? I dunno.

Or the highly cinematic running up the giant's club to plunge a sword between its ribs? Or the vicious but eminently practical hamstringing it, then slitting its throat while it's laying in the dirt? What about the tarrasque? Treants? Krakens? Purple worms? Dragons? I tend to think the cinematic approach is the only one that really works in a world of giants.

I always had the same problem with halflings. They're not supposed to be supernaturally powerful for their size, like redcaps; they're essentially little humans, the size of toddlers.

Setebos

07-14-2008 09:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9115368)

For whatever reason, I don't remember using giants very much in any game I've run. Maybe it was just the amount of entries and the fine-grained separation between the varieties; "this is a cloud giant, this is a fog giant; this is a mountain giant, this is a hill giant and this is a stone giant".

I know what you mean. Unless playing in a world inspired by Norse myth, I rarely used giants at all. For me, it was:

(a) For most purposes, the giants were just different shades of very large people, and since I wasn't particularly intrigued by their largeness per se, I could just as well use a kingdom of cloudhumans, and at least let the PC's use stairs (and doors) (and bathtubs) (and windows).

(b) Along the same lines as your second point, I didn't find the giant categorization and naming convention (taxonomy? Is that the word?) very creatively fertile, either. "Thing+giant" = new species! Thing? Cloud! Thing? Desert! Man, we're great at this!

In fact, they should have realized the rut they were falling into and run headlong into it; maybe make giants into animist avatars for associated objects/areas. Make them part of druidic myth; as dryads are to trees, a family/clan of fire giants are to a volcano.

noisms

07-14-2008 10:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9115917)

In fact, they should have realized the rut they were falling into and run headlong into it; maybe make giants into animist avatars for associated objects/areas. Make them part of druidic myth; as dryads are to trees, a family/clan of fire giants are to a volcano.

That's actually a very nice idea. It even works for Fog Giants - a race of beings who are literally fog made real, and who dissipate with the mist only to reform the next morning (or whenever).

I get what you mean about the Noun + Giant naming convention. I'd quite like more esoteric and unusual variants: Cactus Giants who stand motionless in the desert waiting for rain; Reed Giants who prey on travelers through a vast marshland; Coral Giants who slumber in shallow tropical seas and whose bodies are homes for thousands of fish...who rouse themselves only when their hunger compels them to destroy a passing ship and feed on the drowning sailors.

Sleeper

07-14-2008 11:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

I like that. There isn't enough traditional spiritualism in most generic fantasy. The giantkin or not-quite-true giants could be domestic spirits. Ettins could be symbolic of familial strife. Fight with your sister too many times, and an ettin appears with your heads and lashes out at whatever spurred your anger. Ogres might be symbolic of teenage rebellion and angst; the moody outsider would have a large ugly shadow that appears whenever she's being bullied or picked on, and smashes. Could even be a sign of untrained talent at wizardry; magical talent scouts would hunt down rumors of bestial giants, and try to rescue their unknowing creators before the enraged villagers burn them as witches.

Setebos

07-15-2008 01:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9116218)

I like that. There isn't enough traditional spiritualism in most generic fantasy. The giantkin or not-quite-true giants could be domestic spirits. Ettins could be symbolic of familial strife. Fight with your sister too many times, and an ettin appears with your heads and lashes out at whatever spurred your anger. Ogres might be symbolic of teenage rebellion and angst; the moody outsider would have a large ugly shadow that appears whenever she's being bullied or picked on, and smashes. Could even be a sign of untrained talent at wizardry; magical talent scouts would hunt down rumors of bestial giants, and try to rescue their unknowing creators before the enraged villagers burn them as witches.

Perhaps this would help to explain why the larger, "true" giants also look like people, because unquestioned anthropocentrism kind of bugs me. Do the nature giants, as ontologically independent creatures, take on humanoid form in order to interact with humanoids, or are they also creations of the subconscious, perhaps so much larger because they are a collective dream rather than an individual one?

I like the latter, at first...then I realize that it could get us into "Clap your hands if you believe" territory :mad:

noisms

07-15-2008 02:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9115387)

I'm with you on the lack of giant usage, but for me I think it's more conceptual. As I imagine a character fighting most giants, I can't picture that character reaching more than a leg, and a bunch of characters slashing at a giant's legs to kill it just isn't very appealing to me.

I have that problem too - although for me the bigger issue is, if a 20' tall bloke was swinging a tree-trunk club at you, one hit would be enough to turn you into a big splat no matter who you are. How do you envisage a 'glancing blow' from a tree trunk? And what earthly use would armour be against such a weapon? "I protect myself from the tree trunk swinging at my head by raising my shield!"

(I know hit points are abstract, so it isn't strictly necessary to imagine lost hit points in a Giant fight being from actual 'hits'. But still.)

The Complete Book of Rangers, of course, had a Giantkiller kit. I always liked the illustration, which was a man with a massive spear, more like an awl-pike, which he was using to try to bring down an unidentified Giant.

ShannonA

07-15-2008 03:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual

Locked due to size.

Here's the new thread:

<http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=404795>

Please read on to continue the discussion.

JasonK

07-15-2008 04:55 AM

[Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

EDIT: This thread is a continuation of Noisms' epic attempt to read/review the entirety of the 2nd Edition Monstrous

Manual. Here's the thread where he got started. As you can see, much discussion and many campaign ideas came out of it and all involved had a rockin' good time.

Anyway, I'm not noisms, but I'm continuing this myself 'cause I don't want to leave off discussion of giants just yet. :)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Or the highly cinematic running up the giant's club to plunge a sword between its ribs? Or the vicious but eminently practical hamstringing it, then slit its throat while it's laying in the dirt? What about the tarrasque? Treants? Krakens? Purple worms? Dragons? I tend to think the cinematic approach is the only one that really works in a world of giants

I agree in theory, but for some reason my head doesn't want to make it happen in practice. Run up the club? Mmm... no. Doesn't work for me, in a D&D game. Dunno why. The larger, wyrmy monsters (dragons, tarrasques, purple worms) I see heroes ducking past claws to stab at their chests or slashing at the throat/head as the beast comes in for a bite. I don't think of treants as having legs, so a cut to the trunk is fine no matter how big they are... Krakens you never really kill - just do enough damage to their flailing tentacles so that they sink into the depths again.

I'm well aware that this is all a stupid, illogical, nonsense distinction here. It's a dumb perception to hold onto. But I can't seem to let it go. And that bothers me because I actually really like giants. Especially frost giants. It's the love of Norse myth that sits in my heart.

I guess I'll just have to settle, in my head, for giants that are never more than 12 feet tall. :)

~ jason

g026r

07-15-2008 05:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

You forgot the link to the first thread though. ;)

<http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=389945>

Sleeper

07-15-2008 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9116897)

I'm well aware that this is all a stupid, illogical, nonsense distinction here. It's a dumb perception to hold onto. But I can't seem to let it go. And that bothers me because I actually really likegiants. Especially frost giants. It's the love of Norse myth that sits in my heart.

I guess I'll just have to settle, in my head, for giants that are never more than 12 feet tall. :)

I almost kind of agree, but dragons are actually much worse. Even assuming giants are disproportionately strong and dragons don't have the edge most animals have over puny humans (compare adult chimpanzee and human lifting strength), the giant faux-lizards still have armor, nasty talons, deadly teeth, and all kinds of other adaptations. Sounds like the big issue is opportunity attacks: The worst a hero'll do against a giant with a 20 ft. club is force him to uproot another tree because the champion broke his old one; while a dragon clawing or biting would get slashed in the forelimbs or face. If that was actually the case however, dragons would have long ago learned to keep their heads high and to use their claws to throw loose boulders at their attackers, instead of risking death. Or just do the drive-by breathing thing.

Combat in D&D is a strange mix of the very abstract and the fairly specific. Hit points are so amorphous it's really hard to pin down exactly what they represent, armor class is a mix of tin plates and dodging, and even the length of a round and the number of attacks have an abstract element. On the other hand, there are rules for death by massive damage (which kind of defeats the purpose of hit points), a detailed subsystem for aerial combat, and a specific note that a thief needs to be able to get near a giant's vitals to backstab. To really do justice to creatures of different sizes would require a massive rewrite of the combat system, incorporating not only reach and hit locations, but the fog of combat, fatigue, morale, and the dynamic ebb and flow of a mass melee. Because a real fight is about a lot of chaotic action and counteraction, and taking advantage of any opportunities. Not just standing in place and swinging once every 60 seconds (miniatures tend to create the impression it's more static than it really should be).

I think in a lot of ways, hit points have to be regarded as a war of attrition. Over time, the dragon strains a muscle from overextending itself, gets a claw severed, gets stabbed in the pink of the belly, and finally begins to stagger from fatigue and lose track of all the darting humans, until one jumps up at the right time and thrusts under a scale and through its heart. It only takes one real hit. The same applies to giants. A melee might involve many nicks and scratches around the shins and knees, maybe a lost toe, a few cuts to the hand, until the titan starts to get confused and tired, swings wildly to smash one of the more obvious nuisances, overextends, trips and falls on one hand, and while his neck is within reach the fighter jumps up and slashes his throat and everybody runs back and waits until he bleeds to death.

kelvingreen

07-15-2008 07:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9116897)

I'm with you on the lack of giant usage, but for me I think it's more conceptual. As I imagine a character fighting most giants, I can't picture that character reaching more than a leg, and a bunch of characters slashing at a giant's legs to kill it just isn't very appealing to me.

Maybe if giants were only 10 or 12 feet tall, max, I wouldn't have this problem? Or if I played through/saw a few battles with giants involving highly uneven ground? Where, say, characters had to climb up on boulders/ledges/whatever to effectively hit the giants? I dunno.

Shadow of the Colossus. 'Nuff said. ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9117028)

A melee might involve many nicks and scratches around the shins and knees, maybe a lost toe, a few cuts to the hand, until the titan starts to get confused and tired, swings wildly to smash one of the more obvious nuisances, overextends, trips and falls on one hand, and while his neck is within reach the fighter jumps up and slashes his throat and everybody runs back and waits until he bleeds to death.

Although it was smaller than most D&D giants, the fight with the Moria troll in the film version of The Fellowship of the Ring was a good example of this kind of approach.

JasonK

07-15-2008 08:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Both of your comments, kelvin, touch on my own response when I read Sleeper's own comments, above:

I like what Sleeper's suggesting and, yes, Giants work for me like that. I can mentally handle a party of adventurers versus a giant or two in that "war of attrition, wear them away" sense (and I have); it's once you put seven of them "on the board" (so to speak) that my mind starts to find the 20 - 30 foot tall versions ridiculous.

I'm thinking increasingly in 4E frames these days, and so I'd say that giants work for me as Elites or Solo monsters, not as much else. But that, of course, is just me. I don't assume it should or has to work that way for anyone else.

~ jason

Setebos

07-15-2008 12:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9117028)

Combat in D&D is a strange mix of the very abstract and the fairly specific. Hit points are so amorphous it's really hard to pin down exactly what they represent, armor class is a mix of tin plates and dodging, and even the length of a round and the number of attacks have an abstract element. On the other hand, there are rules for death by massive damage (which kind of defeats the purpose of hit points), a detailed subsystem for aerial combat, and a specific note that a thief needs to be able to get near a giant's vitals to backstab.

How appropriate; I just now came across an example of schizophrenic abstraction vs. specificity so hilarious that I feel compelled to share it:

From an epic spell that sends its victims into orbit:

Quote:

Depending on the world where Nailed to the Sky is cast, conditions so far from its surface may be deadly. Deleterious effects include scorching heat, cold, and vacuum. Targets subject to these conditions take 2d6 points of damage each from heat or cold and 1d4 points of damage from the vacuum each round. The target immediately begins to suffocate.

Is it only me? Fritz the naked 20th-level Fighter gets sent into orbit and, provided he has a breathing effect (for purposes of illustration), survives in space for roughly two minutes.

Worse, based on conventional explanations of hit points, 90% of that is not his flesh boiling and freezing simultaneously; he's just becoming increasingly fatigued and demoralized.

JasonK

07-15-2008 12:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9118335)

Worse, based on conventional explanations of hit points, 90% of that is not his flesh boiling and freezing simultaneously; he's just becoming increasingly fatigued and demoralized.

To be fair, I'd be pretty demoralized and tired if I were rocketed into space and couldn't breathe... :)

~ jason

David J Prokopetz

07-15-2008 12:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9118335)

Is it only me? Fritz the naked 20th-level Fighter gets sent into orbit and, provided he has a breathing effect (for purposes of illustration), survives in space for roughly two minutes.

Worse, based on conventional explanations of hit points, 90% of that is not his flesh boiling and freezing simultaneously; he's just becoming increasingly fatigued and demoralized.

Amusingly, this subject comes up a lot in the context of sci-fi games; according to studies by NASA and the US Air Force, it turns out that humans really can survive a couple of minutes in hard vacuum, though you probably have - at most - ten to twelve seconds before you lose consciousness.

(This is more an example of Hollywood logic, tho'; in the movies, people are unreasonably resistant to blunt trauma, but incredibly fragile when faced with just about everything else. Humans generally aren't as squishy as you'd think.)

Setebos

07-15-2008 12:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9118353)

...according to studies by NASA and the US Air Force, it turns out that humans really can survive a couple of minutes in hard vacuum, though you probably have - at most - ten to twelve seconds before you lose consciousness.

Was that a room-temperature vacuum, or pushed-out-of-the-space-station vacuum?
I'm not challenging your science or anything; I really am curious.

David J Prokopetz

07-15-2008 12:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9118368)

*Was that a room-temperature vacuum, or pushed-out-of-the-space-station vacuum?
I'm not challenging your science or anything; I really am curious.*

Hard vacuum doesn't have temperature. Direct sunlight is probably going to broil you alive in short order, of course, but barring that the thermal effects would be quite minimal. In a vacuum, there's simply nothing there to conduct your body heat away from you, so heat loss via radiant energy is all you have to worry about - and the human body doesn't radiate all that much.

Setebos

07-15-2008 12:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9118380)

Hard vacuum doesn't have temperature. Direct sunlight is probably going to broil you alive in short order, of course, but barring that the thermal effects would be quite minimal. In a vacuum, there's simply nothing there to conduct your body heat away from you, so heat loss via radiant energy is all you have to worry about - and the human body doesn't radiate all that much.

And suddenly I realize that I asked you how much kinetic energy Nothing has.

OK, back to monsters, before I step even further outside my expertise and start trying to have this conversation in Hungarian.

Here, to steer back toward the topic: I know what Jason K means. A party of PC's vs. a party of giants seems hard to describe tactically. You can't really block, parry, disarm, or engage them at all per se.

Only one answer: Transforming mecha, preferably with an awesome summoning song, sung by the upcoming bard class.

Mark my words. Wizards knows what it's doing.

P.S. Suddenly, I realized I'm not kidding. If giants are projections of the human subconscious, how better to fight them than with OTHER projections? Facilitated by some sort of psychic class, item, or potion, the pc's engage huge monsters at the same level with their own dream-selves. Daikaiju ho! Maybe not a good long-term campaign idea, but a hell of a one-shot. Perhaps set in an enchanted valley or whatnot, where the pc's get to build alternate-class sub-characters and take some unusual builds out for a spin...

noisms

07-15-2008 01:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Oh well, I was hoping to keep the whole thing in the same thread, but never mind.

Giant, H-M

Hill Giant

Continuing the theme of Giant-equivalents-to-humanoid-races, Hill Giants are definitely orcs; ugly, brutish types who like violence. They're also probably the stereotypical, iconic Giant - what the average person thinks of when the word is mentioned. The Giant out of Jack and the Beanstalk was probably a Hill Giant.

Their favourite tactic is, naturally enough, chucking boulders, which they can also catch with a straight 30% chance of success - although I'm not sure when that skill ever comes in handy; do adventurers ever turn around and start throwing boulders back at the Giants?

Like orcs, Hill Giants are tough to imagine as anything other than big ugly things that want to kill you. That's okay, though - big ugly things that want to kill you are an integral part of any good D&D adventure.

Jungle Giant

We have another candidate for the "Elven-Cat List of Rarely Used Languages": Jungle Giants have their own tongue.

Jungle Giants are modeled on what might loosely be termed "Pulp Amazon Native". Big, lanky, Tarzan-esque things with jaguar-skin loincloths - except for the women, who have tasteful jaguar-skin bikinis a la 1,000,000 years B.C. They like to swing around on vines, carry out ambushes, and hunt big game.

The entry bizarrely goes into some detail about the size of the Giants' bows (15') and arrows (6'), which is too big for any ordinary sized creature to use. It seems obvious to me - not sure why it has to be made explicit. Their lairs are "50% likely to shelter 1-6 giant dragonflies".

Jungle Giants are a good candidate, I think, for the "degenerate remnants of a long-lost civilization" shtick. Like the Maya peoples who the Spaniards discovered in the early 1500s in the Yucatan, they could be the survivors of a great disaster centuries previously, which laid waste to their mighty jungle society. Now they are just a shadow of their former selves, and have forgotten much of what they once knew.

Mountain Giant

It's quite difficult to separate Mountain and Hill Giants, and I suppose a case can be made that there really doesn't need to be two separate species or entries. Like Hill/Mountain Dwarves, they probably could have been done on the same page. The main difference is that Mountain Giants are Chaotic Neutral, and so can live in peace with other races - unlike their Chaotic Evil Hill Giant brethren.

Mountain Giants can summon ogres, hill giants or trolls, who they can give loose commands. They also sometimes have shamans.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9118539)

Oh well, I was hoping to keep the whole thing in the same thread, but never mind.

Giant, H-M

Hill Giant

Continuing the theme of Giant-equivalents-to-humanoid-races, Hill Giants are definitely orcs; ugly, brutish types who like violence. They're also probably the stereotypical, iconic Giant - what the average person thinks of when the word is mentioned. The Giant out of Jack and the Beanstalk was probably a Hill Giant.

Their favourite tactic is, naturally enough, chucking boulders, which they can also catch with a straight 30% chance of success - although I'm not sure when that skill ever comes in handy; do adventurers ever turn around and start throwing boulders back at the Giants?

Like orcs, Hill Giants are tough to imagine as anything other than big ugly things that want to kill you. That's okay, though - big ugly things that want to kill you are an integral part of any good D&D adventure.

Jungle Giant

We have another candidate for the "Elven-Cat List of Rarely Used Languages": Jungle Giants have their own tongue.

Jungle Giants are modeled on what might loosely be termed "Pulp Amazon Native". Big, lanky, Tarzan-esque things with jaguar-skin loincloths - except for the women, who have tasteful jaguar-skin bikinis a la 1,000,000 years B.C. They like to swing around on vines, carry out ambushes, and hunt big game.

The entry bizarrely goes into some detail about the size of the Giants' bows (15') and arrows (6'), which is too big for any ordinary sized creature to use. It seems obvious to me - not sure why it has to be made explicit. Their lairs are "50% likely to shelter 1-6 giant dragonflies".

Jungle Giants are a good candidate, I think, for the "degenerate remnants of a long-lost civilization" shtick. Like the Maya peoples who the Spaniards discovered in the early 1500s in the Yucatan, they could be the survivors of a great disaster centuries previously, which laid waste to their mighty jungle society. Now they are just a shadow of their former selves, and have forgotten much of what they once knew.

Mountain Giant

It's quite difficult to separate Mountain and Hill Giants, and I suppose a case can be made that there really doesn't need to be two separate species or entries. Like Hill/Mountain Dwarves, they probably could have been done on the same page. The main difference is that Mountain Giants are Chaotic Neutral, and so can live in peace with other races - unlike their Chaotic Evil Hill Giant brethren.

Mountain Giants can summon ogres, hill giants or trolls, who they can give loose commands. They also sometimes have shamans.

Like the Eblis, Mountain Giants were an oddball monster I always wanted to use in the numerous 2E campaigns I'd think up but never run, lacking players and friends and all back in my youth.

My basic idea was to have said Mountain Giant as a shaman and wiseman the player could ally with and consult, though approaching him could be very risky. I can't recall exactly, but I think they could be up to 5th level clerics.

I did not like the 3E revamp of the Mountain Giant, which made it a CR 22, 23 critter and made them stupid and nasty as hell. Rendered my old idea very hard to utilize.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

Crinos

07-15-2008 02:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by J Harper (Post 9118560)

I did not like the 3E revamp of the Mountain Giant, which made it a CR 22, 23 critter and made them stupid and nasty as hell. Rendered my old idea very hard to utilize.

I think they did the revamp in order to A) make the Mountain Giants more unique, rather than just (non evil hill giants who can summon monsters), and B) in order to flesh out more high level monsters for the MM2, which was kind of one of its selling points (they sort of did the same thing with the Banshees and some of the monsters brought over from Dark Sun like the Famine Spirit and the Nightmare Beast)

J Harper

07-15-2008 02:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9118605)

I think they did the revamp in order to A) make the Mountain Giants more unique, rather than just (non evil hill giants who can summon monsters), and B) in order to flesh out more high level monsters for the MM2, which was kind of one of its selling points (they sort of did the same thing with the Banshees and some of the monsters brought over from Dark Sun like the Famine Spirit and the Nightmare Beast)

I think I recall hearing that the purpose of the MM II was to get some higher level beasties into play. WOTC's reasoning to revamp the Mountain Giant is perfectly valid - I just didn't care for the results, but it ultimately wasn't a big deal. Certainly didn't keep me from running 3.5 for (combined in two big chunks) nearly a year straight.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

demiurge1138

07-15-2008 03:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The problem with the high CR MMII monsters is how generally useless they are for their CR. All of the undead are ridiculously fragile, but have too many Hit Dice to ever, ever turn. The linnorms are also very underpowering, and the hellfire wyrm, their most powerful, is basically a red dragon with a weaker breath weapon, no spellcasting, and a higher CR.

There's a reason I re-wrote many of them for my own purposes.

J Harper

07-15-2008 03:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9118676)

The problem with the high CR MMII monsters is how generally useless they are for their CR. All of the undead are ridiculously fragile, but have too many Hit Dice to ever, ever turn. The linnorms are also very underpowering, and the hellfire wyrm, their most powerful, is basically a red dragon with a weaker breath weapon, no spellcasting, and a higher CR.

There's a reason I re-wrote many of them for my own purposes.

MM II 3.0 never really impressed me. I didn't manage to get my game to high enough level, but I don't think there were any critters in that book I would have used, save for the Linnorms, which I found to my taste. Didn't realize they're underpowered, though.

Cheers,

Jeremy Harper

Skiorht

07-15-2008 05:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9118539)

Their favourite tactic is, naturally enough, chucking boulders, which they can also catch with a straight 30% chance of success - although I'm not sure when that skill ever comes in handy; do adventurers ever turn around and start throwing boulders back at the Giants?

The catching rocks reference is a relic of earlier editions, and probably harkens back to D&D's wargaming roots. When you have a horde of humanoids assaulting a keep, the logical reaction is to chuck big rocks with your catapult at the biggest, baddest creatures you see. Then the crew gets a nasty surprise as the giant catches the rock and returns the favour.

Wakboth

07-15-2008 08:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I remember using hill giants in BECM I D&D a few times; including once when the party was beat up after the previous encounter (a blue dragon, IIRC), so they quickly retreated into a side cavern too small for the giants to get into, and too long that they could be reached.

So I had the giants practice their boulder-bowling skills. :D

(The jungle giantess is another one for the highly incorrect list of Babes of Monster Manual, by the way. :))

sim_james

07-15-2008 08:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The only way this thread will make it to Z is if nobody makes any comments.

So keep bringing the awesome, even if it ends up spawning even more sequels.

Kakita Kojiro

07-15-2008 10:39 PM

You know, that [Terrain] Giant nomenclature just goes vaguely wrong with the Jungle Giant. Their name seems so... I dunno... like something Colonial-era settlers use to sneeringly refer to natives, maybe? Too similar to racial pejoratives, in any case.

noisms

07-15-2008 11:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9119715)

You know, that [Terrain] Giant nomenclature just goes vaguely wrong with the Jungle Giant. Their name seems so... I dunno... like something Colonial-era settlers use to sneeringly refer to natives, maybe? Too similar to racial pejoratives, in any case.

The Jungle Giants are rather "Ooga Booga!" if you know what I mean. Not exactly a nuanced portrayal of people who live in jungles; then again they are giants, not humans, so it's probably okay if they're completely one-dimensional.

Sleeper

07-15-2008 11:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9118416)

P.S. Suddenly, I realized I'm not kidding. If giants are projections of the human subconscious, how better to fight them than with OTHER projections? Facilitated by some sort of psychic class, item, or potion, the pc's engage huge monsters at the same level with their own dream-selves. Daikaiju ho! Maybe not a good long-term campaign idea, but a hell of a one-shot. Perhaps set in an enchanted valley or whatnot, where the pc's get to build alternate-class sub-characters and take some unusual builds out for a spin...

Y'know, that might explain the size problems. Movies are horribly inconsistent when it comes to the size of giant monsters (King Kong swatting planes from the Empire State Building is a lot bigger than the original island beast), but the problem predates that medium. In Rabelais' epic satire for instance, Pantagruel has an entire nation of people living in his teeth, but also fits into an ordinary courtroom.

Maybe it's not the stories that are inconsistent. Maybe it's the giants themselves. When you face a giant in the distance, they appear to be huge, legendary monstrosities. But if you get up the courage to challenge one, to face one in combat, you're humanizing it. The giant appears more mundane, more manageable, and starts to shrink. As you start to land blows, as it starts to appear the colossal challenge might be overcome, the giant shrinks even further. Until, finally, you slay it -- and laid out there in the dirt is a mere 9 or 10 ft. tall form. Not the 50 or 100 ft. tall titan you initially faced.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9118539)

Jungle Giants are modeled on what might loosely be termed "Pulp Amazon Native". Big, lanky, Tarzan-esque things with jaguar-skin loincloths - except for the women, who have tasteful jaguar-skin bikinis a la 1,000,000 years B.C. They like to swing around on vines, carry out ambushes, and hunt big game.

You might be able to see a band of jungle giants coming in the distance by the swaying of the palms as the trees bend like bows under their weight. Their terror might be marked by the splintered trunks of once-straight and tall trees.

Mark Krawec

07-15-2008 11:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9118539)

Their favourite tactic is, naturally enough, chucking boulders, which they can also catch with a straight 30% chance of success - although I'm not sure when that skill ever comes in handy; do adventurers ever turn around and start throwing boulders back at the Giants?

When somebody's packing a girdle of giant strength. Then you end up with a boulder volley like Travolta &

Slater pitching the same hand grenade back & forth in Broken Arrow.

Maybe.

JRM

07-16-2008 12:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9118539)

Jungle Giant Jungle Giants are modeled on what might loosely be termed "Pulp Amazon Native". Big, lanky, Tarzan-esque things with jaguar-skin loincloths - except for the women, who have tasteful jaguar-skin bikinis a la 1,000,000 years B.C. They like to swing around on vines, carry out ambushes, and hunt big game.

Jungle Giants are a good candidate, I think, for the "degenerate remnants of a long-lost civilization" shtick. Like the Maya peoples who the Spaniards discovered in the early 1500s in the Yucatan, they could be the survivors of a great disaster centuries previously, which laid waste to their mighty jungle society. Now they are just a shadow of their former selves, and have forgotten much of what they once knew.

Well there's no mention of Jungle Giants swinging from vines in the description, though with a Climb speed of 6 they do work as 'giant tarzans'. There are a couple of bits I'm surprised you didn't mention.

Firstly, they're really skinny - an 18' tall 3000 pound male Jungle Giant is equivalent to a 6' human weighing 111 pounds. And their females are even taller and thinner. Despite this they're as strong as frost giants, who have the same height but weigh almost three times as much (8000 pounds).

That reminds me - the 2nd edition giants heights, weights and strength are all over the place. Firbolg and Desert Giants are both as strong as a 16', 4500 pounds Hill Giant, but the former are 10'6" and 800 lbs, the latter 17' and 7000 lbs - although being partially petrified may account for Desert Giants' high weight.

Hmm... Stone Giants are also very heavy for their size due to high density flesh, maybe they're cousins of Desert Giants that found a way to live with their petrifying curse?

Also, Jungle Giants are friendly for giants, but are ravenous carnivores who only respect other predators & hunters, there are potential story hooks in there apart from the obvious one of them eating defeated PCs: Jungle Giants would hunt their relatives the Wood Giants as prey just because they're herbivores, and the PCs may try to stop them; or the party could go after a fearsome quarry in order to impress a tribe of Jungle Giants and gain their aid.

Quote:

Originally Posted by J Harper (Post 9118560)

I did not like the 3E revamp of the Mountain Giant, which made it a CR 22, 23 critter and made them stupid and nasty as hell. Rendered my old idea very hard to utilize.

Yup, they're pretty feeble as a CR 22/23 threat. They just do a lot of mundane damage and have a high fort save. Any 15th+ level party that targets a 3rd edition Mountain Giant's weaknesses, such as Reflex / Will save spells, will bring them down with contemptuous ease.

Belchion

07-16-2008 12:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9119853)

Maybe it's not the stories that are inconsistent. Maybe it's the giants themselves. When you face a giant in the distance, they appear to be huge, legendary monstrosities.

That reminds me of the "Scheinriese" in "Jim Knopf und Lukas der Lokomotivführer" (however those are translated to English). Basically, "Herr Tur Tur", the Scheinriese, grows the larger the farther you are from him, in the end, Lukas and Jim offer him to stay at Lummerland, because the island is too small to get so far from him as to be scared of his size and he is very useful as lighthouse for ships, who are farther away. As a sidenote, Herr Tur Tur says that one could call ordinary humans "Scheinzwerge", because they would shrink the farther away you get.

Setebos

07-16-2008 12:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9120185)

That reminds me of the "Scheinriese" in "Jim Knopf und Lukas der Lokomotivführer" (however those are translated to English). Basically, "Herr Tur Tur", the Scheinriese, grows the larger the farther you are from him, in the end, Lukas and Jim offer him to stay at Lummerland, because the island is too small to get so far from him as to be scared of his size and he is very useful as lighthouse for ships, who are farther away. As a sidenote, Herr Tur Tur says that one could call ordinary humans "Scheinzwerge", because they would shrink the farther away you get.

Hang on...if person A and person B are different distances away from him, how big is he? Is it based on the average distance to other intelligent creatures?

Not that the story necessarily tells you, but I'd love to hash out the rules.

Details!

Belchion

07-16-2008 01:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9120218)

Hang on...if person A and person B are different distances away from him, how big is he? Is it based on the average distance to other intelligent creatures?

Not that the story necessarily tells you, but I'd love to hash out the rules.

In the story it is all an optical effect, just as normal people seem to shrink if you get away from them, Scheinriesen seem to grow if you get away from them. Kinda reversed optics, if you want to. Thus, he would be of different size for person A and person B.

demiurge1138

07-16-2008 01:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mark Krawec (Post 9119879)

When somebody's packing a girdle of giant strength. Then you end up with a boulder volley like Travolta & Slater pitching the same hand grenade back & forth in Broken Arrow.

Maybe.

I think the "giants can catch boulders" is a vestigial relic of the game from its origins as Chainmail, an add-on of fantastic elements onto medieval wargaming. In a game where your opponent is fronting catapults at you, having some boulder-catching giants in your warband is a good idea.

Setebos

07-16-2008 02:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9118539)

Their favourite tactic is, naturally enough, chucking boulders, which they can also catch with a straight 30% chance of success - although I'm not sure when that skill ever comes in handy; do adventurers ever turn around and start throwing boulders back at the Giants?

The oddity of the rule aside, I'm surprised no one's complained about what a hideous bit of exception-based design it is, because there's no reason to make it a percentage roll at all.

And so I'll do it.

It's one thing to toss an ad hoc system into the book for things that have no obvious basis in stats--"Chocolate puddings have a 50% chance of having sprinkles"--but this is a Dexterity check if I ever saw one. If 30% is an important number, the MM could just give the action a default check penalty (if their Dex isn't that low already...). If you really want, require a secondary Strength check to hold onto a particularly large rock they managed to put their hand in front of.

Come on, TSR. Gitcher shit teggither.

EDIT: And then I remember...2e monsters don't HAVE Dexterity scores.

sigh

Malignant Marionette

07-16-2008 06:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9120345)

In the story it is all an optical effect, just as normal people seem to shrink if you get away from them, Scheinriesen seem to grow if you get away from them. Kinda reversed optics, if you want to. Thus, he would be of different size for person A and person B.

I wonder what would happen if you catapulted him into space, where there is no horizon to block line of sight and whether thinking about him too much will make my brain hurt. :p

ogier300

07-16-2008 07:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I always assumed the "catch a boulder" % was included as part of the world-building that seemed to happen in the old days. As a DM, you needed to know what would happen if there was every Giant on Giant fights with rock tossing.

Though now I'm imagining a Hill Giant baseball team...

noisms

07-16-2008 11:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9120163)

That reminds me - the 2nd edition giants heights, weights and strength are all over the place. Firbolg and Desert Giants are both as strong as a 16', 4500 pounds Hill Giants, but the former are 10'6" and 800 lbs, the latter 17' and 7000 lbs - although being partially petrified may account for Desert Giants' high weight.

Maybe different types of Giant flesh are stronger. Although it does seem odd that Firbolgs should be as powerful as Hill Giants, given that the text description mentions that Hill Giants are very powerful for their size, with bigger muscles than larger Giants.

Wakboth

07-16-2008 04:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9120597)

The oddity of the rule aside, I'm surprised no one's complained about what a hideous bit of exception-based design it is, because there's no reason to make it a percentage roll at all.

Come on, if we ragged on every bit of (clumsy) exception-based design in 2e, we'd fill this thread before we got out of H. :D

Belchion

07-16-2008 04:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9121409)

I wonder what would happen if you catapulted him into space, where there is no horizon to block line of sight and whether thinking about him too much will make my brain hurt. :p

1) No idea, I am not even sure there was anything like "space" in that novel's world. 2) Probably, because I took this from a children's tale (age 5-10) which also includes propagating steam locomotives and pirate ships that bounce cannon balls back on the attackers ship.

JRM

07-16-2008 05:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9123180)

1) No idea, I am not even sure there was anything like "space" in that novel's world. 2) Probably, because I took this from a children's tale (age 5-10) which also includes propagating steam locomotives and pirate ships that bounce cannon balls back on the attackers ship.

What, the locomotives have carnal relations with each other? Isn't that too steamy to be suitable for a children's book?

JRM

07-16-2008 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9122375)

Maybe different types of Giant flesh are stronger. Although it does seem odd that Firbolgs should be as powerful as Hill Giants, given that the text description mentions that Hill Giants are very powerful for their size, with bigger muscles than larger Giants.

Yes, I assume some sorts of giants have relatively stronger flesh than others just like halflings have muscles stronger than an equivalent sized human. It's not unheard of in nature - female chimpanzees, for example, can be as small and light as a D&D gnome or halfling, but have 4-6 times the upper body strength of an average male human.

Belchion

07-16-2008 06:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9123281)

What, the locomotives have carnal relations with each other? Isn't that too steamy to be suitable for a children's book?

The story just says that the locomotive is pregnant and later bears a child. It is never detailed how she gets pregnant and I cannot even remember they met any other locomotives.

JRM

07-16-2008 06:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9123327)

The story just says that the locomotive is pregnant and later bears a child. It is never detailed how she gets pregnant and I cannot even remember they met any other locomotives.

Well I guess sapient locomotives could have very long gestation periods, so the encounter may have taken place a long time before the story takes place. If the gravid train is specified as being female that would imply a male was necessary for reproduction.

Does the original story being in German make the gender-issue unclear? From what I remember of the language it applies gender to nouns more or less at random. Hmm, after glancing in a German-English dictionary a locomotive is feminine in German (Die Lokomotive), but a train and railway carriage are both masculine (Der Eisenbahnzug, Der Eisenbahnwagen). That explains it! A sapient locomotive changes from female to male with the aid of attachments.;

Belchion

07-16-2008 07:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9123362)

Does the original story being in German make the gender-issue unclear?

No, she was named Emma, a distinctly female name. It was quite clear throughout the book that she is female, as well as her daughter Molly. (On the other hand, those locomotives could swim / double as submarine and drive below water without railways when calked)

Oh, the books is available in English, too: Jim Button and Luke the engine-driver. Read it, it is great! (As are all other books by that author)

Jimmy Fingers

07-16-2008 08:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9123421)

Oh, the books is available in English, too: Jim Button and Luke the engine-driver. Read it, it is great! (As are all other books by that author)

The Neverending Story is from the same author for example. Which is a real childrens fantasy classic (and less cheesier than the movie).

JRM

07-16-2008 08:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Jimmy Fingers (Post 9123501)

The Neverending Story is from the same author for example. Which is a real childrens fantasy classic (and less cheesier than the movie).

Oh it's a Michael Ende book is it, never read any of them. I've seen some of his books in bookshops in Austria and Germany, but they aren't very common over here in the UK, I only remember the occasional copy of Puffin's edition of The Neverending Story and Momo. English translations of Mr Ende seem to be a lot more popular in the US.

JRM

07-16-2008 08:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9119853)

Maybe it's not the stories that are inconsistent. Maybe it's the giants themselves. When you face a giant in the distance, they appear to be huge, legendary monstrosities. But if you get up the courage to challenge one, to face one in combat, you're humanizing it.

Come to think of it, I once had a variable-sized giant in an adventure. Now why didn't I remember that sooner? The PCs had stopped for the night in the Secret World (a celtic-style 'Other Side' with all kinds of faerie weirdness) when something like a vertical thundercloud appeared over the horizon, diminishing to a 400' giant by the time it reached their camp. (I chose the giant's size so I could just pick up one of the PC's miniatures and say "If I'm the giant your character is literally this small". A Druidic Lore check told them the giant's weakness was three golden hairs atop his head (hidden among a thatch of black hair), so they needed to climb up his body to reach them - one reckless PCs choosing to climb up inside a giant trouserleg.

Once they reached the giant's scalp the scale changed again so it was hundreds of feet across, and they had to hack their way through hair fighting off head lice the size of hogs in order to reach and uproot the golden hairs, whereupon the giant shrank down to a score or two feet and surrendered.

Zartes

07-16-2008 10:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9123604)

A Druidic Lore check told them the giant's weakness was three golden hairs atop his head (hidden among a thatch of black hair), so they needed to climb up his body to reach them - one reckless PCs choosing to climb up inside a giant trouserleg.

Somebody's gonna be making a sanity check for that one... :p

noisms

07-17-2008 01:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Giant, R-S

Reef Giant

Reef Giants always struck me as one of the more interesting variants, being somewhat reminiscent of Polynesian culture in concept and artwork. If you ask me there never was enough attention paid to Polynesian myth and culture in D&D - which is odd because it strikes me as a fantastic setting for adventure. People striking out into the vast unknown ocean, searching for land, discovering tiny islands peopled by bizarre beasts and hostile monstrous races... Anyway, the Reef Giants are another race who really should have been included in 3rd edition.

Reef Giants are hunter gatherers of the sea, fishing and searching coral reefs for their food. They also sometimes become sailors on bigger ships, something which I'm definitely going to figure into a campaign somewhere. They make a tough fight for a gang of adventurers due to their whirlpool ability and ease of movement underwater, but I suppose their position is more likely to be that of an ally than an enemy. It'd be quite cool to have a big face-off between the PCs plus Reef Giant allies on one side, and Big Bad plus Topaz Dragons on the other. With Crabmen and Sahuagin caught in between, just for shits and giggles.

Man, I really need to get a coastal campaign up and running one of these days...

Stone Giant

In the rock-catching event at the Giant Olympics, Stone Giants always come out on top: unlike the Hill Giants, who can only catch boulders 30% of the time, Stone Giants make 90% of their catches. In case that isn't enough exception-based design for you, apparently 50% of Stone Giants can speak common.

This is one of the rare entries wherein a monster's tactics are described in some detail. Stone Giants will disguise themselves against a stony area and then step out to surprise foes with a broadside of boulders; they will then retreat and cause avalanches of stone once their enemies get too close. It's interesting that the 2nd edition designers didn't include more of this sort of thing in the MM; it just goes to show what a different game it was from the 3rd and 4th editions.

Another point of note: Stone Giants apparently keep Giant Goats as pets, which they use for milk, cheese and butter. Giant Goats! Why don't they get an entry in the MM!?!

Storm Giant

The art work for the Storm Giant makes him look a bit like Zeus, which I suppose is what the race is based on, along with Thor - big guys with beards who can chuck lightning bolts. In fact Storm Giants are all-round badasses. -6 AC with armour, plus huge two-handed swords which do 3-30+12 points of damage, and 19 Hit Dice. Don't piss one off if you can help it. Although then again they "spend their time musing about the world, composing and playing music, and tilling their land or gathering food," which doesn't sound like they're very easily piss-offable. Definitely these are the Giant version of Centaurs, as Cloud Giants are Elves.

This entry is notable for demonstrating the great diversity of languages in the 2nd edition D&D universe: Storm Giants speak their own language, the Cloud Giant language, the common Giant language, and common. If any DMs made use of those languages in actual play, I'll eat my hat.

JRM

07-17-2008 03:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Stone Giants are my favourite of the original D&D giants. Mostly its just that I liked their flavour - keeping bears as pets, camouflage against stone, master boulder-hurlers, impassive features that conceal an often playful nature.

Plus, being neutral they can interact with PCs more often than the evil (or should that be Evil!) Hill, Fire and Frost giants, who my players only met as enemy combatants in the campaigns I ran. I don't remember using Cloud and Storm giants very often, they just seemed too 'fairy tale' for most of my adventures.

kelvingreen

07-17-2008 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9124646)
Storm Giant

The art work for the Storm Giant makes him look a bit like Zeus

I've always loved the art on this one. What is he doing? Why is he gesturing like that? Is he directing the building of a new extension to his castle, or is that some kind of Storm Giant terrorist fist jab? ;)

Setebos

07-17-2008 03:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9124646)
This entry is notable for demonstrating the great diversity of languages in the 2nd edition D&D universe: Storm Giants speak their own language, the Cloud Giant language, the common Giant language, and common. If any DMs made use of those languages in actual play, I'll eat my hat.

Ah...species=culture, my old enemy. We meet again. Why would Storm Giants all speak the same language, utterly distinct from anyone else's?

I realize that not all intelligent species can mix freely in harmony and that there's bound to be a certain amount of balkanization when some of them look so different from each other, so that species and culture will overlap significantly, (racial divides in the real world times a thousand), but in D&D it seems so...automatic. Really, considering the relatively modern values in D&D's pseudo-medieval setting (female adventurers, generally benevolent and altruistic monarchs, streets presumably free of poop), I'd expect a lot more species cohabitation (City of Giants, perhaps, if only because they share scale), such that species-languages almost become extinct.

It's probably just a symptom of resolution incompatibilities when dealing with different races. Humans speak multiple tongues, live in multiple nations across the Earth, seldom get along, and worship any of a thousand gods. Elves? Elves speak Elf, live in forests, period, and worship Elf Gods (unless they're Nazi Elves, who worship Vannelvelielianasushafalan Hitler).

It's Single Biome Planet all over again.

Sleeper

07-17-2008 03:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9124646)
Another point of note: Stone Giants apparently keep Giant Goats as pets, which they use for milk, cheese and butter. Giant Goats! Why don't they get an entry in the MM!?!

In 1st edition AD&D, they did. And regular, non-giant goats got an entry in the MM2. Apparently being a farmer was good practice for being an adventurer.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9124837)

Ah...species=culture, my old enemy. We meet again.

That's actually why I liked the race = class in the old Basic/Cyclopedia/BECMI/whatever sets. If you're going to equate race and culture, you might as well go all the way and codify the stereotype into the game mechanics. And in some ways, it makes sense. If you have a cosmopolitan world where the races intermingle and there are many subtle differences, it's one thing. But if the other rares are very rare, and their homelands are small, distant, and isolated, they might feature in just one or two adventures. In that case, it's a good shortcut and a way to enforce those differences with minimal work. This doesn't work as well for PCs in a long-term campaign, but the monocultures are at least as rich and detailed as most fantasy cultures anyway. Most are inconsistent mixes of poorly remembered medieval history, the latest mass-market fantasy saga, and modern sensibilities tempered with just a dash of fantastic elements. Fantasy runs into the same problem science fiction does -- it's really hard to develop cultures and mindsets that truly diverge from the human norm. It's even harder when you throw players in the mix, because you can't expect them to read, appreciate, and implement a detailed 300-page psychological profile. Something accessible, something different in a few superficial and familiar ways, maybe with a minor twist, is much more practical. Elves as nazis, dwarves as Scots, halflings as bucolic English farmers, etc. Then give them blue hair or a lisp, and call it a culture.

ogier300

07-17-2008 03:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Why would Storm Giants all speak the same language, utterly distinct from anyone else's?

So they can make plans to betray the other giants when the time is right, without having to worry about some pesky Hill Giant or Fire Giant understanding them, of course. How embarrassing to be understood when you're visiting the Hill Giant Chief's Steading otherwise.

Setebos

07-17-2008 04:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Has anyone ever run a campaign in a Giant's world, perhaps to an absurd scale--say entirely behind the baseboards of an otherwise unremarkable Giant home, or in a Giant's backyard? Where the PC's have years of adventures in the basements, crannies, attics, etc of a single village? This being a fantasy world, they wouldn't be limited to tiresome vermin-slaying ("Centipede as dragon" gets a little old, I'd assume); there could be all sorts of tiny magical societies living in the walls.

Any experiences like this?

Kakita Kojiro

07-17-2008 10:21 AM

I find myself wanting to bash together some sort of Ringworld-of-Giants -- long ago the giants settled the Ringworld. Over numberless generations they spread to occupy every freakin' environmental niche that exists. Mostly I want to do so because of this:

PC: "Well, we've concluded our negotiations with the Prarie Giants."

Prarie Giant: "Yes. And now, for the rishathra."

PC: :eek:

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9124927)

In 1st edition AD&D, they did. And regular, non-giant goats got an entry in the MM2. Apparently being a farmer was good practice for being an adventurer.

Probably because of all the ankhegs.

Wakboth

07-17-2008 03:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I'm not sure if they used the name "Reef Giant", but I think they got converted for 3e in one of the later MMs. (Along with the jungle giants, I think...)

And yeah, there's a distinct lack of seafaring campaigns in D&D.

Jimmy Fingers

07-17-2008 05:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9126979)

I'm not sure if they used the name "Reef Giant", but I think they got converted for 3e in one of the later MMs. (Along with the jungle giants, I think...)

And yeah, there's a distinct lack of seafaring campaigns in D&D.

The Golden Voyages campaign, for Al-Qadim is a very nice one. It even features Reef Giants. Well, one at least. ;)

Sleeper

07-17-2008 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9126249)
Probably because of all the ankhegs.

No, it was all the farm animals. Tussle with a few goats and horses, and ankhegs are suddenly a piece of cake. :)

noisms

07-18-2008 01:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Giant, V

And to finish off, two of the lesser-known and lesser-used (I believe) Giant varieties, and another two who were (I think) left out of 3rd edition for good or ill.

Verbeeg

Verbeeg (Verbeegs?) are the smallest Giant, standing only 8 1/2 - 10 feet tall and weighing only 300-400 lbs. This makes them rather skinny, although they are strong for their weight (see above discussion). They are basically oversized humans, as it were, rather than true Giants, and are even given the moniker "human behemoth". Their favourite weapon is the spear, with which they are especially skilled, and they often hang out with dire wolves and wargs. They are the weakest race of Giants, being little better than ogres in a fight. To be honest, I'd love to know what the origin of the Verbeeg is - they sound like a D&D-ised mythical creature of some kind, but I'm not sure what language 'Verbeeg' is (if any).

Verbeeg's are most notable for being the 'brains' of the operation when it comes to Hill Giants and ogres: "To watch a group in action can be hilarious, so long as you are not their intended victim. Hill giants and ogres are too stupid to think much on their own. They tend to follow directions too literally. This usually infuriates the verbeeg. They hop back and forth from foot to foot screaming insults at the befuddled giants that tower over them in height and size, as even the simplest instructions are misinterpreted by these denser humanoids." This ought to make the Verbeeg Big Bad material, or at least more of a serious threat to civilisation and all that jazz. But there's a whiff of the ridiculous that hangs over the entire entry, from the picture right through the text. I can't quite put my finger on what it is, but definitely the art - a fat, balding guy who looks like he should be at work in an insurance office - is a bad starting point.

Verbeeg are just small (in a relative sense) enough to, you would think, be the most common source of half-Giants. I'm extrapolating that out of nowhere, but it seems to make sense.

Wood Giant (Voadkyn)

Okay, so I know I said Cloud Giants are the elves of Gianthood and Storm Giants are the Centaurs, but really I suppose the Voadkyn should take either prize. At 9 1/2 feet tall and 700 lbs, they're basically oversized wood elves, complete with silly ears, long bows, and a love of trees.

One point of interest is that Wood Giants gain a 50% range bonus because of the size of their bows; but this isn't mentioned in any of the other Giant entries - even the ones who commonly use bows. When you think about it, a properly strung bow for one of the bigger Giant races - a Storm Giant, let's say - should be able to fire arrows at targets literally miles away. I'm sure the maths could be worked out by somebody...

Fight-wise, Wood Giants are one of those specially-designed-to-annoy monsters who players love to hate. Not only can they polymorph; they can also turn themselves effectively invisible in forest environments, while all the time popping out of hiding to shoot arrows "as if from nowhere". That sort of thing is bloody irritating as a player. Strangely enough as a DM I get all turned around on the subject.

Last but not least, Wood Giants have special lower jaws just for grinding up leaves, roots and other vegetation. This should mean, I think, that technically they spend basically every single waking moment eating, like all creatures that live off leaves do.

DMH

07-18-2008 01:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128377)

[u][size="5"]

Verbeeg

Verbeeg (Verbeegs?)

"Dat ve are!"

I didn't pick up on that stupid joke until a few weeks ago while scanning ahead for this thread. It makes them even less useful IMO.

Crinos

07-18-2008 01:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

My first dnd monster book was the old 3 ring binder monstrous compendium (both parts 1 and 2) and the Verbeeg picture in that was somewhat better (it made them look creepy because it seemed like the Verbeeg's face was almost melting)

The MM Verbeeg however looks like Danny Devito the barbarian.

noisms

07-18-2008 01:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9128476)

"Dat ve are!"

I didn't pick up on that stupid joke until a few weeks ago while scanning ahead for this thread. It makes them even less useful IMO.

Drat. Where's that damned rolling-eyes smiley when you need it? ;)

noisms

07-18-2008 01:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9128478)
The MM Verbeeg however looks like Danny Devito the barbarian.

Ha! I was thinking George Costanza the Barbarian, but yeah, Danny Devito is a much better fit.

demiurge1138

07-18-2008 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Verbeegs did make it into 3.X, albeit in its latest days. They were in both Expedition to the Ruins of Castle Greyhawk and an issue of Dungeon Magazine, as variant half-ogres with less mental ability score penalties.

The hopping back and forth etc always made me think of verbeegs as good Big Bads for sillier, lighter-toned games. Also, the illustration reminds me most strongly of Gargamel from the Smurfs.

Inyssiis

07-18-2008 01:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128377)
Verbeeg
To be honest, I'd love to know what the origin of the Verbeeg is - they sound like a D&D-ised mythical creature of some kind, but I'm not sure what language 'Verbeeg' is (if any).

Well, see, they are ver' beeg people. Ver', ver' beeg. No's beeg a'de odder giants, but beeg all de same.

Quote:

Last but not least, Wood Giants have special lower jaws just for grinding up leaves, roots and other vegetation.

(brought to you by the Free-Association For The Salvage Of Pathetic Monsters):

But not special upper jaws? They're like Darth Malak or something? I'm getting flashbacks to that one scene in Kotor, with Revan's old outpost under the colossal jungle--a race of solitary nine-foot-tall forest-dwelling megalomaniac cyborg ranger Sith...

shirosan

07-18-2008 04:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9126979)
And yeah, there's a distinct lack of seafaring campaigns in D&D.

This just reminded me of one of my all-time great "campaigns I'll never run". The action would kick off with the PCs forming the core of a pirate crew. They'd have their own ship and spend the first couple levels raising hell and whatnot. Their lucks starts to run out when a pirate hunter starts tracking them. The campaign shifts (away from seafaring, admittedly) when, on the run from the hunter, they're sucked into a whirlpool and gated into the Planescape setting. The good news? Now they've got a flying, interdimensional pirate ship. Much gonzo campaigning to follow.

::sigh::

Oh well, can't run 'em all.

Setebos

07-18-2008 06:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128486)
Ha! I was thinking George Costanza the Barbarian, but yeah, Danny Devito is a much better fit.

Danny Devito's so short, though. Not that the ideal candidate should be 9 feet tall; it's just that someone so exceptionally short as Devito throws me off.

David Koechner the barbarian?

JRM

07-18-2008 06:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9126249)

I find myself wanting to bash together some sort of Ringworld-of-Giants -- long ago the giants settled the Ringworld. Over numberless generations they spread to occupy every freakin' environmental niche that exists. Mostly I want to do so because of this:

PC: "Well, we've concluded our negotiations with the Prarie Giants."

Prarie Giant: "Yes. And now, for the rishathra."

PC: :eek:

To paraphrase from the Ringworld Engineers. "So, do your people perform rishathra with Prairie Giants?"

"Yes, but carefully." :eek:

Crinos

07-18-2008 06:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9129153)

Danny Devito's so short, though. Not that the ideal candidate should be 9 feet tall; it's just that someone so exceptionally short as Devito throws me off.

David Koechner the barbarian?

I just meant the guy in the picture reminds me of Danny Devito: Short, bulky, balding, surly looking, even has sort of a beaked nose like Devito.

Sides, if they can use computers in that lord of the rings movie to make Elijah Wood 3 feet tall so he can be Frodo, they can sure as hell make Danny Devito 9 feet tall to play what equates to a giant crime boss.

JRM

07-18-2008 07:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128486)

Ha! I was thinking George Costanza the Barbarian, but yeah, Danny Devito is a much better fit.

I'm thinking of Vizzini from The Princess Bride as played by Wallace Shawn ("Inconceivable!"), he certainly looks like the Verbeeg picture and did plenty of furious shouting at dim-witted colleagues. Fezzik would make a good Hill Giant, methinks.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128377)

Verbeeg are just small (in a relative sense) enough to, you would think, be the most common source of half-Giants. I'm extrapolating that out of nowhere, but it seems to make sense.

Not necessarily, maybe all giants have the relevant organs built to 'human scale', making cross-breeding easier. Also, the half-giant could be giantish on their mother's side, in which case any size inadequacies on their father's side may have been disappointing for the lady, but would not prevent conception.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128377)

One point of interest is that Wood Giants gain a 50% range bonus because of the size of their bows; but this isn't mentioned in any of the other Giant entries - even the ones who commonly use bows. When you think about it, a properly strung bow for one of the bigger Giant races - a Storm Giant, let's say - should be able to fire arrows at targets literally miles away. I'm sure the maths could be worked out by somebody...

The main limitation on the range/power of a bow is the material its made of. It's basically impossible to make a 6' wooden longbow with a draw-strength much over 200 pounds without it snapping at full draw. Unfortunately the problem scales inversely with length, so a 12' wooden longbow would likely snap if bent with over a hundredweight or two. Realistically, a giant-sized bow would need to be made out of some extraordinary material (magical wood, dragonbone, carbon-fibre laminate or whatever). Its possible to get around this limit using a multi-bow crossbow design, but such a weapon would be very awkward to fire by hand.

Alternatively, a giant 'bow' could be a torsion engine (basically a handheld ballistae) rather than a tension-engine like a bow or crossbow. These can bear much greater loads than a bow because their firing arms don't need to flex to store power so can be built thicker, the missiles energy is stored in skeins of fibre at the firing-arms base instead.

A ballista could throw an arrow 400-500 yards. There are apocryphal accounts of some siege engines spitting an arrow ~1000 yards, which is certainly possible considering there are flight records for crossbows exceeding 2000 yards, while conventional longbow flight archers have difficulty exceeding 400 yards.

Numanoid

07-18-2008 12:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9128478)

The MM Verbeeg however looks like Danny Devito the barbarian.

That makes me want to create a group of giants based off the characters from "It's Always Sunny In Philadelphia."

"Guys, let's form a bandit tribe! We'll call ourselves "The Pecan Sandys"!

(un)reason

07-18-2008 07:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9128377)
Wood Giant (Voadkyn)

Okay, so I know I said Cloud Giants are the elves of Gianthood and Storm Giants are the Centaurs, but really I suppose the Voadkyn should take either prize. At 9 1/2 feet tall and 700 lbs, they're basically oversized wood elves, complete with silly ears, long bows, and a love of trees.

One point of interest is that Wood Giants gain a 50% range bonus because of the size of their bows; but this isn't mentioned in any of the other Giant entries - even the ones who commonly use bows. When you think about it, a properly strung bow for one of the bigger Giant races - a Storm Giant, let's say - should be able to fire arrows at targets literally miles away. I'm sure the maths could be worked out by somebody...

Fight-wise, Wood Giants are one of those specially-designed-to-annoy monsters who players love to hate. Not only can they polymorph; they can also turn themselves effectively invisible in forest environments, while all the time popping out of hiding to shoot arrows "as if from nowhere". That sort of thing is bloody irritating as a player. Strangely enough as a DM I get all turned around on the subject.

Last but not least, Wood Giants have special lower jaws just for grinding up leaves, roots and other vegetation. This should mean, I think, that technically they spend basically every single waking moment eating, like all creatures that live off leaves do.

Voadkyn are another one of those creatures that really shone in the complete book of humanoids. They were one of the few creatures that could be rangers, mages and druids, plus plenty of multiclass options, plus their shapeshifting meant they could sidestep the social and physical problems of being a monster in a normal sized town. And yes, they did carry big bags of seeds and nuts with them so they could spend the whole time chewing. They're one of those monsters who's collection of abilities works really well as a complete package.

noisms

07-19-2008 12:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Phew, last mega-marathon entry for a while over, and a nice easy nonsense monster to be going on with.

Gibberling

I'd love to know which writers wrote which exact entries of the MM. The Gibberlings have such a great opening paragraph:

Quote:

They come screaming, jabbering, and howling out of the night. Dozens, maybe hundreds, of hunchbacked, naked humanoids swarm unceasingly forward, brandishing short swords. They have no thought of safety, subtlety, or strategy, leaving others with no hope of stopping their mass assault. And then, having come and killed, the gibberlings move on randomly back into the night.

The first impression of gibberlings is of a writhing mass of fur and flesh in the distant moonlit darkness. The pandemonium is actually a mass of pale, hunchbacked humanoids, with pointed canine ears, black manes surrounding their hideous, grinning faces. Their eyes are black, and shine with a maniacal gleam. They carry short swords in their overly long arms as they lope ever faster forward.

It's cheesy as hell, but I absolutely adore that kind of stuff. It just suits the atmosphere of AD&D perfectly.

Gibberlings are, essentially, angry humanoid lemmings with a thirst for blood. They come out at night in ravening hordes, rampaging across the countryside and killing everything they come across before disappearing whence they came. If anything the way they are described reminds me a little of the zombies from the 28 [days, weeks] later set of films - shrieking lunatics who jibber and jabber and throw themselves around like the monkey from Braindead. They're individually pathetic (1 HD), but considering that the players will be encountering 40d10 of the things, that makes them pretty dangerous. (Gibberlings are the minions of 2nd edition, clearly.)

I like the mystery that surrounds the Gibberlings. They appear from subterranean tunnels that nobody has ever been able to find the end of, and have no apparent reason for their raging attacks. And where do they get their short swords from?

If you ask me, Gibberlings are the perfect opportunity for all you creative people to get your brains working and come up with origin stories for the things....

Sleeper

07-19-2008 02:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Plants were okay with birds eating their fruit. Childbirth via bird poop seems somehow fitting. But logging? Not so good. So aeons ago, the plants spawned guardians of their vast forestal fastnesses. Treants.

But nobody ever thought of that other kingdom. Not plant, not animal, but somewhere in between. Primal and apparently unsophisticated. Dwelling in sessile harmony in the deep realms under the earth, their spores dancing around the slow drip of lime deposits that eventually swelled and grew into stactites and stalagmites.

And then came the genocide. Or attempted cladocide. Hordes of scurrying humanoids and other things starting eating their fruiting bodies, and multiplied. So the fungi, in their slow passive way, developed a reaction. An allergy. In those realms of the underdark where humanoids colonize and farm toadstools and lichen, the other branch of opisthokonts take on the appearance and apparent behavior of their animalian cousins. The fungi grow, swell, and fruit. And the spores grow rapidly into an apparent horde of swarming pseudo-hominids. Except, they're not. Humanoid, nor even a horde. In actuality, all that matted hair is mycelia, and strands run from one to the next, connecting them into a single organism. And once ripe, that organism boils across the underdark and sweeps a portion clean of the bipedal infestation. So that, in the moist and still darkness, the fungi can once again spread and grow, free from cultivation.

kami2awa

07-19-2008 05:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9131891)

Phew, last mega-marathon entry for a while over, and a nice easy nonsense monster to be going on with.

Gibberling

I'd love to know which writers wrote which exact entries of the MM. The Gibberlings have such a great opening paragraph:

It's cheesy as hell, but I absolutely adore that kind of stuff. It just suits the atmosphere of AD&D perfectly.

Gibberlings are, essentially, angry humanoid lemmings with a thirst for blood. They come out at night in ravening hordes, rampaging across the countryside and killing everything they come across before disappearing whence they came. If anything the way they are described reminds me a little of the zombies from the 28 [days, weeks] later set of films - shrieking lunatics who jibber and jabber and throw themselves around like the monkey from Braindead. They're individually pathetic (1 HD), but considering that the players will be encountering 40d10 of the things, that makes them pretty dangerous. (Gibberlings are the minions of 2nd edition, clearly.)

I like the mystery that surrounds the Gibberlings. They appear from subterranean tunnels that nobody has ever been able to find the end of, and have no apparent reason for their raging attacks. And where do they get their short swords from?

If you ask me, Gibberlings are the perfect opportunity for all you creative people to get your brains working and come up with origin stories for the things....

The tunnels never end. The gibberling are born through spontaneous generation in the Earth, and the tunnels are naturally occurring, like veins in the body of a giant. Gibberlings arise when the land becomes ill, like antibodies, caused by some great source of evil in the area. The gibberlings can never been beaten, because they are effectively infinite in number. The only way to stop their invasion is to find and drive out the source of evil.

kelvingreen

07-19-2008 06:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9131891)

If you ask me, Gibberlings are the perfect opportunity for all you creative people to get your brains working and come up with origin stories for the things....

Isn't there a reference somewhere to Gibberlings having no reproductive organs, with the ever-present "sages" pondering how exactly they breed?

Crinos

07-19-2008 06:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9132871)

Isn't there a reference somewhere to Gibberlings having no reproductive organs, with the ever-present "sages" pondering how exactly they breed?

In one of the later MM compendiums (4 I believe) they explained gibberlings as being created by Brood Gibberlings, which are far realm creatures that look like larger gibberlings that injected a little grub into a bitten victim that burrowed into the victims brain and made them turn into a gibberling.

Personally, I thought it was kind of a cop out, but that's the canon explanation I suppose.

Crinos

07-19-2008 06:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Incidentally, after you're done with the MM, you should totally do the MC appendixes 1-3, or the planescape or Ravenloft appendixes.

The MC compendium 1 is cool because all the artwork is done by Deterlizzi (SP?)

(un)reason

07-19-2008 06:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9131891)

I'd love to know which writers wrote which exact entries of the MM. The Gibberlings have such a great opening paragraph:

They're another forgotten realms monster originally, so probably Ed Greenwood again.

Setebos

07-19-2008 08:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9131891)

And where do they get their short swords from?

This.

My explanations, all satisfactory for hordes of mindless land piranhas, are universally stymied by those goddamn short swords. I'd feel like cheating if gibberlings usually carried them, as some of the most common D&D weapons that could be scavenged off all sorts of soldiers and irregular defenders. They all have them.

The only obvious solutions make them phantasms conjured by an intelligent mind, which is a huge copout (not to mention already used for giants), or are incredibly silly ("Natural mineral growths that just happen to look exactly like shortswords").

OOH. Or: There's only one gibberling, who only happens to be carrying a short sword. He's replicated somehow...it would explain why they don't communicate, breed, or disagree with each other.

He's trapped in a broken Magitech photocopier somewhere deep in the earth (perhaps a machine originally designed to copy slaves, or warriors), Azathoth-like, forced to watch as frothing idiot copies of himself scamper to freedom...The original is surprisingly intelligent, noble even, but his clones are rudimentary at best (Multiplicity, or the Simpsons, if you like). They retain a primitive desire to free him, but can only communicate in howls. Inevitably, the frustration and madness of the ordeal drives them to murder.

Naturally, the faux gibberlings are also physically unstable. They disintegrate at the end of the night on the way back into the underground. The PC's will need to display some serious investigative chops to find the source and end the plague.

How did he get there? Was he one of these original slaves, imprisoned in the machine millennia ago (when he looked like a man), before some cataclysm plunged his society into ruin? How can he be freed?

ogier300

07-19-2008 08:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

the "short swords" are shards of cave-stone cracked from their volcanic-obsidian breeding pods, and wielded without regard to the pain and damage they cause to the gibberling's hands.

Hmm. What if gibberlings are the result of Drow work parties?

Sleeper

07-19-2008 08:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9132944)

They're another forgotten realms monster originally, so probably Ed Greenwood again.

Gibberlings appear in the 1E Fiend Folio, so unless Greenwood was going by the pseudonym "Underworld Oracle" and lived in the UK in the late 1970s, they're not originally Forgotten Realms monsters.

noisms

07-19-2008 10:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9132938)

Incidentally, after you're done with the MM, you should totally do the MC appendixes 1-3, or the planescape or Ravenloft appendixes.

The MC compendium 1 is cool because all the artwork is done by Deterlizzi (SP?)

I wouldn't mind giving the Planescape MCs a whirl. But that's getting ahead of ourselves. ;)

noisms

07-19-2008 10:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9132871)

Isn't there a reference somewhere to Gibberlings having no reproductive organs, with the ever-present "sages" pondering how exactly they breed?

Ah, those bloody sages get everywhere, don't they?

I love D&D sages, with their strange mixture of anachronistic scientific rigor and out-of-left field theories.

DMH

07-19-2008 10:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9132927)

In one of the later MM compendiums (4 I believe) they explained gibberlings as being created by Brood Gibberlings, which are far realm creatures that look like larger gibberlings that injected a little grub into a bitten victim that burrowed into the victims brain and made them turn into a gibberling.

Personally, I thought it was kind of a cop out, but that's the canon explanation I suppose.

The brood gibberling is originally from Gates of the Firestorm Peak- the adventure that first described the Far Realm. It isn't a great origin for gibberlings, but at least they tried.

I still want a write up for cloakers, one that covers what the hell they are and how they interact with each other and other critters and peoples.

Crinos

07-19-2008 10:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9133482)
Ah, those bloody sages get everywhere, don't they?

I love D&D sages, with their strange mixture of anachronistic scientific rigor and out-of-left field theories.

I wonder if anyone ever DMed a campaign based around the adventurers escorting around these sages so they could study all these effed up monsters.

Crinos

07-19-2008 10:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9133523)
The brood gibberling is originally from Gates of the Firestorm Peak- the adventure that first described the Far Realm. It isn't a great origin for gibberlings, but at least they tried.

I still want a write up for cloaklers, one that covers what the hell they are and how they interact with each other and other critters and peoples.

Yeah, that was mentioned in the appendix (MC4 was the only one in the lot with the courtesy to list WHERE the monsters came from at the end of the entry. IIRC it even creatures from obscure as hell settings like Red Steel and Alternity)

DMH

07-19-2008 11:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Alternity isn't a setting, it is a rule set. See sig for more information.

And to make this post of value- why are gibberlings only found in temperate forests when aboveground? Never in hills, jungles or plains. Are they sensitive to warm temperatures? Rain forests provide more shade than most temperate forest types, so that can't be the reason. Could they be creations of fey or drow, the latter using them to exterminate the surface elves?

noisms

07-19-2008 11:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9133525)

I wonder if anyone ever DMed a campaign based around the adventurers escorting around these sages so they could study all these effed up monsters.

No, but after reading this post I'm planning one RIGHT NOW.

Crowetron

07-19-2008 11:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9133175)

OOH. Or: There's only one gibberling, who only happens to be carrying a short sword. He's replicated somehow...it would explain why they don't communicate, breed, or disagree with each other.

He's trapped in a broken Magitech photocopier somewhere deep in the earth (perhaps a machine originally designed to copy slaves, or warriors), Azathoth-like, forced to watch as frothing idiot copies of himself scamper to freedom...The original is surprisingly intelligent, noble even, but his clones are rudimentary at best (Multiplicity, or the Simpsons, if you like). They retain a primitive desire to free him, but can only communicate in howls. Inevitably, the frustration and madness of the ordeal drives them to murder.

Naturally, the faux gibberlings are also physically unstable. They disintegrate at the end of the night on the way back into the underground. The PC's will need to display some serious investigative chops to find the source and end the plague.

How did he get there? Was he one of these original slaves, imprisoned in the machine millennia ago (when he looked like a man), before some cataclysm plunged his society into ruin? How can he be freed?

This is completely awesome, and I am shocked that no one else has commented on this. This is one of those ideas that are obligated by the universe itself to be run, because it is so brilliant.

A quest through the Underdark, perhaps even through dens of Beholders or Mind Flayers, to discover the source of the gibberling plague (which is, at best, a very noisy annoyance), and then END IT?

Utterly awesome. I dunno if this is the right thread for such things, but feel free to take a "I'm-going-to-run-that-so-fucking-hard" Point, Setebos.

JRM

07-19-2008 11:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Doesn't the Gibberlings' entry in the 1st edition Fiend Folio say that their language can't be translated with magic like Comprehend Languages and that they're so insane it's dangerous to contact their minds telepathically, or am I misremembering? I can't work up the energy to dig out my copy from whatever shelf it's buried.

I like Setebos's suggestion that they're magical clones. Maybe the creation device drew its creative matter from the plane of Limbo, but it failed to collimate out the raw chaos like its designers planned. Since they appear in many lands does the device teleport as well as duplicate the creatures?

That would make them faxed gibberlings, not faux gibberlings.;

demiurge1138

07-19-2008 11:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9133525)

I wonder if anyone ever DMed a campaign based around the adventurers escorting around these sages so they could study all these effed up monsters.

There was fiction. Throughout 2e, and a little into 3e, Johnathon Richard's Ecology articles in Dragon Magazine used as a framing device the Monster Hunters Society. Turns out, most of those sages could take care of themselves pretty well.

g026r

07-19-2008 12:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9133631)

Doesn't the Gibberlings' entry in the 1st edition Fiend Folio say that their language can't be translated with magic like Comprehend Languages and that they're so insane it's dangerous to contact their minds telepathically, or am I misremembering? I can't work up the energy to dig out my copy from whatever shelf it's buried.

Nope. All it says on languages is the following:

"Though they clearly have a primitive means of communicating among themselves, they have no discernible language."

Ratoslov

07-19-2008 12:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

A gibberling's sword is a peculiar device- they're always destined to, at least once in their benighted existance, spill the blood of the innocent.

Not necessarily lethally, but they will, even if you melt it down and re-forged it into something else.

The true nature of the gibberlings is that they are monsters destined to distribute these evil chunks of steel and misery to all the planes; when a Gibberling becomes old, they're sent out from their Prime plane to others in bands to die a warrior's death at the hands of another village, and bear the evil away from their homes.

Setebos

07-19-2008 01:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9133631)

Since they appear in many lands does the device teleport as well as duplicate the creatures?

Hmm...good question.

If the device was made to replicate soldiers, it may be automatically distributing them to ruined "staging areas" for (it thinks) assignment and processing. Or they're truly faxed, and the specifications of the original creature are transmitted to several manufacturing centers, where the gibberlings are churned out.

Setebos

07-19-2008 01:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9133594)

A quest through the Underdark, perhaps even through dens of Beholders or Mind Flayers, to discover the source of the gibberling plague (which is, at best, a very noisy annoyance), and then END IT?

I don't completely follow this paragraph. Am I being shenanigan'd? The capitals make me suspicious.

Crowetron

07-19-2008 03:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9133885)

I don't completely follow this paragraph. Am I being shenanigan'd? The capitals make me suspicious.

No shenanigans. I simply meant that if the players could track down the Alpha gibberling, they could stop the cloning process (probably by killing the gibberling or trashing the device, or some other wild violence) and therefore wipe the gibberling race off the planet.

They can't reproduce otherwise, and are pretty damn easy to kill, so soon enough, they'd be faint screaming memory.

I probably just didn't phrase my statement properly. And I probably should've used italics ;)

(un)reason

07-19-2008 03:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9133259)

Gibberlings appear in the 1E Fiend Folio, so unless Greenwood was going by the pseudonym "Underworld Oracle" and lived in the UK in the late 1970s, they're not originally Forgotten Realms monsters.

Rightio. I stand corrected. They do appear in the FR boxed set though. Hell, the 2nd ed set introductory module features them, and includes a canon origin for them. (which is a good deal less impressive than the stuff you guys are coming up with. nach)

JRM

07-19-2008 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 9133745)

Nope. All it says on languages is the following:

"Though they clearly have a primitive means of communicating among themselves, they have no discernible language."

Thanks, I must have got them confused with another maniac monster.

JRM

07-19-2008 07:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9133877)

Hmm...good question.

If the device was made to replicate soldiers, it may be automatically distributing them to ruined "staging areas" for (it thinks) assignment and processing. Or they're truly faxed, and the specifications of the original creature are transmitted to several manufacturing centers, where the gibberlings are churned out.

It also explains the crudely bestial nature of these monsters. If they're anything like some fax machines I've seen, they're barely-legible low quality printouts.

Belchion

07-19-2008 07:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9133631)

I like Setebos's suggestion that they're magical clones. Maybe the creation device drew its creative matter from the plane of Limbo, but it failed to collimate out the raw chaos like its designers planned.

Or the original source has been used up and the clone machine took another sample from one of the clones, repeatedly. So, the gibberling is just a copy of the copy of the copy of the copy of... the first prototype for creating goblins! (Or whatever monster you would prefer for that purpose)

Setebos

07-20-2008 02:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9134432)

Or the original source has been used up and the clone machine took another sample from one of the clones, repeatedly. So, the gibberling is just a copy of the copy of the copy of the copy of... the first prototype for creating goblins! (Or whatever monster you would prefer for that purpose)

Interesting...I hadn't thought of that.

I was hoping to have the original kept alive, so the PC's can actually interact with an emotionally poignant character who's been driven insane by immortality.

However, meeting his copies, especially if several have been made and have decayed in different ways (gibberling strains, as it were), could be just as interesting if not more so. Hmm...

Crinos

07-20-2008 02:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Could just be that a deepspawn once ate a member of a underdark species that went extinct and decided to create a whole mess of them just for the hell of it (complete with swords).

6inTruder

07-20-2008 05:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

At first glance they look kinda shite, what with that whopping single hit-die, but attach any of the origins people are positing here and the Gibberlings are more nasty and devastating than a Tarasque(I'm not looking up that spelling). I mean shit, maybe they reproduce by budding? So that if even one gets away, in a bit you'll have another horde of them razing accross the countryside.

DMH

07-20-2008 07:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Yeah, esp since most humans are zero level a plague of gibberlings can depopulate a nation quickly. If the PCs fail, they have to move or start farming since no one is growing food any more (and their equipment will fail after a while and all the other bad things about being a small group of humans).

Heh, it would be interesting to see crabmen vs gibberlings since both have a huge reproductive capacity.

kelvingreen

07-20-2008 08:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9133482)
Ah, those bloody sages get everywhere, don't they?

I love D&D sages, with their strange mixture of anachronistic scientific rigor and out-of-left field theories.

My favourite bit of sage fluff (!) is from the Demonspawn entry in Out of the Pit:

Quote:

Demonspawn do not have eyes... their lack of eyes has led added much weight to the widespread belief among earthly scholars that the souls of living creatures are contained in the eyes (a belief hotly disputed by most blind sages).

Brilliant.

A sage safari would make a decent campaign, I think. Starting off with some apprentice who's going to study kobolds, and ending with an audacious trip to the Abyss to do some close-up examination of a Demon Prince in his natural habitat, so that the apprentice can complete his PhD project.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9135047)

I was hoping to have the original kept alive, so the PC's can actually interact with an emotionally poignant character who's been driven insane by immortality.

I'd be tempted to have the Original Gibberling be some kind of heroic, and ultimately tragic, figure, who stepped into the broken transporter for some noble purpose, only for it to trap him/her inside and chuck out millions of these strange malformed copies. Perhaps the Gibberlings are, in their own mindless and bestial way, trying to achieve that noble purpose, but it just looks like a destructive plague to those who do not know the truth? It would be a combination of the nanotechnology from the Doctor Who episode "The Empty Child" and all those early bits of D&D gear that never worked properly and did something horrible to whomever used them.

noisms

07-20-2008 10:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9135132)

Could just be that a deepspawn once ate a member of a underdark species that went extinct and decided to create a whole mess of them just for the hell of it (complete with swords).

That definitely works. To make it a genuine big bag, though, the Deepspawn needs some reason for the hateful plague it has unleashed on the world.

Crinos

07-20-2008 12:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9136079)

That definitely works. To make it a genuine big bag, though, the Deepspawn needs some reason for the hateful plague it has unleashed on the world.

Aren't Deepspawn just naturally evil and spiteful anyways?

How's about this? The Gibberling take back whatever they kill to their masters, and nobody ever notices due to the massive amounts of damage.

That way, the Deepspawn gets all the adventurers and monsters and such to expand its repertoire of minions without having to bother with hunting them down itself or waiting for them to show up.

Setebos

07-20-2008 02:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9135850)

It would be a combination of the nanotechnology from the Doctor Who episode "The Empty Child" and all those early bits of D&D gear that never worked properly and did something horrible to whomever used them.

I was definitely getting a heavy "Empty Child" groove off this idea. Quality piece of television, that.

I have to say, though, while I'm posting, that I'm impressed by the elegance and completeness of the deepspawn theory. It's so obvious! I facepalmed vigorously when I read it.

I mean, it's a deepspawn. This is precisely its purpose in the universe.

Kakita Kojiro

07-20-2008 04:09 PM

Am I the only one to have thought that the clone-machine-run-amok gibberling backstory makes for an excellent opportunity to have the players encounter NPC Nikolai Tesla as an Elf wizard, played by... David Bowie? I mean, how awesome would that be.

Crinos

07-20-2008 05:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9136419)

I have to say, though, while I'm posting, that I'm impressed by the elegance and completeness of the deepspawn theory. It's so obvious! I facepalmed vigorously when I read it.

I mean, it's a deepspawn. This is precisely its purpose in the universe.

Well thank you, that's mighty nice to say.

sim_james

07-20-2008 06:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Somewhere underground is one seriously messed-up decanter of endless water.

Someone put seamonkeys into the decanter during the enchantment process, and now look what's happened.

kelvingreen

07-20-2008 10:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9136656)

Am I the only one to have thought that the clone-machine-run-amok gibberling backstory makes for an excellent opportunity to have the players encounter NPC Nikolai Tesla as an Elf wizard, played by... David Bowie? I mean, how awesome would that be.

You remind me of the babe...

JRM

07-20-2008 11:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9135132)

Could just be that a deepspawn once ate a member of a underdark species that went extinct and decided to create a whole mess of them just for the hell of it (complete with swords).

That solution has possibilities, but there are a couple of problems:

Deepspawn can only spawn living creatures, not inanimate objects, so won't be able to make the swords.

A deepspawn can spawn any prime-material living creature, so why is it only sending Gibberlings rather than a mixture of monsters to create a 'combined arms' army? For that matter, why spawn such a weedy 1 HD monster when there are many others the same size or smaller which are more powerful? It could be spawning an army of Urds (winged kobolds), for example, which have more HD, can fly and just need rocks as weapons.

Of course, since a deepspawn's Chaotic Evil it could just be doing it "for the hell of it", but they're also geniuses, so I'd like their to be some reason it only use Gibberlings in its assault on the surface world.

Hmm... maybe Gibberlings are incredibly fast maturing monsters, and the deepspawn can produce hundreds of mouse-sized 'baby' Gibberlings in one spawning, which grow to full size in a matter of days.

kelvingreen

07-21-2008 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Going back to the broken teleporter idea, perhaps the Deepspawn is "broken" in some way. Perhaps it's been injured, or is diseased, and either isn't in its right mind, or can't use its reproductive abilities properly. As a result, it just continuously generates hundreds of Gibberlings instead of something more useful.

JRM

07-21-2008 01:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9137417)

Going back to the broken teleporter idea, perhaps the Deepspawn is "broken" in some way. Perhaps it's been injured or is diseased, and either isn't in its right mind, or can't use its reproductive abilities properly.

Of those options my favourite is the deepspawn's insane. Its mad, mad I tell you!;

harleysa

07-21-2008 03:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

One possible plotline for the deepspawn might be this.

Long ago a minor underdark race (the gibberlings) were driven to the brink of extinction by other mightier races and in desperation summoned an extradimensional horror (the deepspawn) to defend them. As per the terms of its contract so long as it defends them it can reside within our dimension. However to prevent the gibberlings from becoming strong enough to be able to stand on their own it sends out hordes of mindless creatures to ravage the other races periodically keeping the true gibberlings in a constant state of war with everyone and thus in constant need of its services. Over time the gibberlings may have even come to worship it as a protector god and could have even have forgotten that they have the power to banish it themselves

Crinos

07-21-2008 04:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Well thanks Noisms, your thread has made me go out and buy a PDF of the old MM with my last six bucks. I hope you're proud. :D

Now hurry up with the Giff entry dammit! Shakes fist

noisms

07-21-2008 11:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by harleysa (Post 9137688)

One possible plotline for the deepspawn might be this.

Long ago a minor underdark race (the gibberlings) were driven to the brink of extinction by other mightier races and in desperation summoned an extradimensional horror (the deepspawn) to defend them. As per the terms of its contract so long as it defends them it can reside within our dimension. However to prevent the gibberlings from becoming strong enough to be able to stand on their own it sends out hordes of mindless creatures to ravage the other races periodically keeping the true gibberlings in a constant state of war with everyone and thus in constant need of its services. Over time the gibberlings may have even come to worship it as a protector god and could have even have forgoteen that they have the power to banish it themselves

This is my favourite. Constant warfare induced by the Deepspawn has reduced the gibberlings to a shadow of what they once were; barely able to communicate or do anything other than kill and destroy.

noisms

07-21-2008 11:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9137912)

Well thanks Noisms, your thread has made me go out and buy a PDF of the old MM with my last six bucks. I hope you're proud. :D

*Now hurry up with the Giff entry dammit! *Shakes fist

Now you have to find people to play 2nd edition with... ;)

noisms

07-21-2008 11:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Giff

So, we come to the first (if I remember correctly) of our true Spelljammer natives. The whole Spelljammer phenomenon sort of passed me by, I have to confess, so although I know of it and about it, I never took part in a Spelljammer campaign. Nowadays the material is too hard to get hold of, so I suppose I never will.

The Giff are a race of 9' tall Hippo-men. With Arquebuses. Ah, the 1980s. Militaristic and violent, they hire themselves out as platoons of mercenaries across the multiverses. They don't care who they fight for - the entry says that it could equally be a local gambling den, or an illithid city. That latter idea just seems like D&D at its finest - a mindflayer city guarded by regiments of Giff.

I was always struck by the idea of a race of mercenaries. It raises all sorts of questions: How did it end up that an entire species became involved in the same trade, and what were they doing before they became mercenaries? I suppose there is some historical precedent in that at various times in human history certain nations of people have produced large numbers of mercenaries - like the Swiss, the Irish, or the Thracian tribes. But it's not as if the entire population of Switzerland just upped-sticks and became a nation of travelling sellswords during the 16th century. Anyway, best not think about it too deeply, because Giff are cool.

The method of payment for Giff is somewhat...odd. They require only smoke powder (or sometimes weapons generally); seven charges per week. Obviously they need it for their arquebuses. But is that really all you would ask for if you were a Giff? Not even once teency little gold piece?

My favourite plot idea for the Giff would be a mercenary rebellion. Perhaps started by somebody trying to force two bands of Giff to fight each other. All the Giff fighting on various sides in a war would group together and essentially go apeshit, leaving a trail of destruction across a continent and carving out an empire for themselves.

Crinos

07-21-2008 12:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Technically speaking, the first spelljammer species were the Argos or the Arcane (whichever came first, since they both come from the setting), and although they didn't originate there, Beholders are also a major force in the spelljammer setting.

As for the Giff, I kind of picture them as being friendlier versions of the Judoon or Sontaran from Dr. Who (course, I wasn't into Dr. Who at the time I was into ADnD, more the pity for me).

As for material, I'm sure you can get PDF's of spelljammer at drivethrurpg.com, and probably cheap (most 2nd edition stuff, even the boxed sets, run at about 5 bucks a pop).

David J Prokopetz

07-21-2008 12:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9138800)

The method of payment for Giff is somewhat...odd. They require only smoke powder (or sometimes weapons generally); seven charges per week. Obviously they need it for their arquebuses. But is that really all you would ask for if you were a Giff? Not even once teency little gold piece?

If I recall correctly, thanks to wonky D&D economics, on some worlds smoke powder is literally worth its weight in gold. At least. I imagine they sustain themselves financially by selling the excess smoke powder to the inhabitants of backwater worlds for a tidy profit.

Heh... hippo-man gunpowder pushers. :D

Crinos

07-21-2008 12:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9138756)

Now you have to find people to play 2nd edition with... ;)

Or just convert them to MnM when the new Warriors and warlocks book comes out.

noisms

07-22-2008 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9138870)

If I recall correctly, thanks to wonky D&D economics, on some worlds smoke powder is literally worth its weight in gold. At least. I imagine they sustain themselves financially by selling the excess smoke powder to the inhabitants of backwater worlds for a tidy profit.

Heh... hippo-man gunpowder pushers. :D

A race of inter-planar mercenary gunpowder dealers.

Lugh

07-22-2008 03:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9137162)

You remind me of the babe...

What babe?

The giff also remind me of the Mangalores from Fifth Element, but much more British. I also always took that "entire race of mercenaries" bit with a grain of salt. One explanation I favor is that the only giff in Wildspace are mercenaries. The other giff are all back on their home world, living well off the money made by selling smokepowder back out to the denizens of the phlogiston. Intermediaries are used so that a) no one ever figures out that the giff only charge smokepowder for their services because they are also the sole manufacturer, and b) no one knows where the giff homeworld is, so no one can attack their wives and children.

6inTruder

07-22-2008 04:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Wild! I was thinking that the Arcane (or whatever you want to call them) had actually destroyed or completely devastated the Giff homeworld enslaving/subjugating the remaining Giff as their mercenary-bodyguards. Which is also why they are so rare: They only hire themselves out when the Arcane say its okay. (and when both sides have Giff, and those Giff renig because Giff don't fight Giff? Yeah, the Arcane wanted that.)

I also like to imagine the Giff as looking a bit more like those statues of Egyptian gods. Huge! Imposing! Then again, I also like to imagine them in classicly Egyptian dress.

Crinos

07-22-2008 05:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 9140544)
What babe?

Babe with the power.

kelvingreen

07-22-2008 07:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9140698)
Babe with the power.

What power?

I like the idea of the Giff as colonial Brits IN SPACE!!! only hippos. All the Giff you encounter are mercenaries because they're working for the Far Phlogiston Company, which is securing Giff interests out there in wild space. The civilian Giff, the ones you never see, are on the homeworld; they sit around drinking their tea and feeling jolly good about the superiority of the Giff Empire, on which the many suns never set. Retired mercenaries get cushy jobs as ministers in Her Majesty's government, where they get to bluster on about the issues of the day, before retiring to their Giff gentlemen's clubs to drink brandy and reminisce about the days they spent out on the fringes of the Empire, subjugating the natives and having a bally good show of it all, wot wot.

Crinos

07-22-2008 09:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9141068)
What power?

Power of Voodoo!

kami2awa

07-22-2008 09:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9133791)

A gibberling's sword is a peculiar device- they're always destined to, at least once in their benighted existence, spill the blood of the innocent.

Not necessarily lethally, but they will, even if you melt it down and re-forged it into something else.

The true nature of the gibberlings is that they are monsters destined to distribute these evil chunks of steel and misery to all the planes; when a Gibberling becomes old, they're sent out from their Prime plane to others in bands to die a warrior's death at the hands of another village, and bear the evil away from their homes.

Gibberlings are the result of a 1000-year-old curse... on a shortsword. The warrior who picked up the sword was transformed into a gibberling. The sword was intelligent and sought to create more of itself, so forced its owner to forge a new sword with the same properties, which created another gibberling. And so on, until the swords and gibberlings were a plague...

MuscaDomestica

07-22-2008 09:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Thanks to Harvey Birdman it is even harder for me to take a Giff seriously.

Crinos

07-22-2008 09:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MuscaDomestica (Post 9141528)

Thanks to Harvey Birdman it is even harder for me to take a Giff seriously.

"Excuse me dear boy, did you perchance get that parcel I had shipped to you?"

demiurge1138

07-22-2008 11:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MuscaDomestica (Post 9141528)
Thanks to Harvey Birdman it is even harder for me to take a Giff seriously.

With the giff, that thing they sent ya is always explosives.

kelvingreen

07-22-2008 05:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9141434)
Power of Voodoo!

Who do?

(Someone's going to put a stop to this soon...)

The Harvey Birdman hippo is of course an errant Giff. He's got suitably colonial clothing too. There must be a Spelljammer ship somewhere near those offices.

Crinos

07-22-2008 09:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9142753)
Who do?

(Someone's going to put a stop to this soon...)

The Harvey Birdman hippo is of course an errant Giff. He's got suitably colonial clothing too. There must be a Spelljammer ship somewhere near those offices.

You do!

And he does, remember Harvey was complaining about him parking it over his parking place in one episode.

noisms

07-22-2008 11:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gith

It's interesting, isn't it, that the ugly creatures are almost always evil? You couldn't get a more stereotypically evil monster than the Gith - a hunched, scrawny, gangly reptilian with a permanent slouch and no opposable thumbs. It is ugly and therefore it is BAD. (I was trying to think of examples which buck this trend, and could only come up with Mongrelmen. Of course, there are some good-looking evil creatures, so it doesn't always work the other way around.)

The Gith are actually a good orc-alternative to bring off the substitutes bench. Their jumping ability and their psionic strength gives them a real advantage, although I suppose a lot of people don't have psionics in their campaign. (I'd be interested to know what proportions of this thread's readership are positive, neutral or negative about psionics. I always felt there was a psionic niche that needed to be filled, but unfortunately they filled it with something that wasn't very good or consistent. Magic and psionics interact in very clumsy ways, in particular.) There are also shamans, though, who use priestly magic.

Unfortunately, being orc-alternatives, there isn't much in the way of plot-hooks for the Gith. They're pretty much the definition of a mook monster. I suppose they'd be a decent candidate for a "once world-ruling, now degenerate and fallen, race", but it seems like I've been talking about that rather a lot recently (what with the Cyclops and Jungle Giants and everything).

What else is there to say about the Gith? They'll eat anything, including Thri-Kreen, but apparently the mantis-people don't taste so good. I don't know - I've eaten locust, and it was okay. Mantis can't taste that different, can it?

Crinos

07-22-2008 11:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I think the Gith are supposed to be the Orcs of the Dark Sun setting, since they specifically mention using obsidian weapons and Thri-Kreen (which are a playable race in Dark Sun IIRC)

g026r

07-22-2008 11:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9143522)

I think the Gith are supposed to be the Orcs of the Dark Sun setting, since they specifically mention using obsidian weapons and Thri-Kreen (which are a playable race in Dark Sun IIRC)

Yep. This is one of the setting-specific Gith* entries.

If I recall correctly, the next one is Spelljammer-specific.

kelvingreen

07-23-2008 12:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9143137)
You do!

Do what?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9143419)
(I'd be interested to know what proportions of this thread's readership are positive, neutral or negative about psionics. I always felt there was a psionic niche that needed to be filled, but unfortunately they filled it with something that wasn't very good or consistent. Magic and psionics interact in very clumsy ways, in particular.)

I don't mind it in theory, and the addition of psionics makes D&D, that most vanilla of fantasy rpgs, actually quite unique and different. However, in practice it's a bolted-on afterthought, and would have been much better served being part of the system from the start.

Sleeper

07-23-2008 12:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9143419)
[u](I'd be interested to know what proportions of this thread's readership are positive, neutral or negative about psionics. I always felt there was a psionic niche that needed to be filled, but unfortunately they filled it with something that wasn't very good or consistent. Magic and psionics interact in very clumsy ways, in particular.)

I think it works very well as one of the foundations of a non-traditional fantasy setting (crystal armor and githyanki and cross-planes raiding parties, oh my), and it's fine in a cosmopolitan kitchen sink universe where anything goes and the average adventure thinks more like a 20th century humanist than a Roman legionnaire or a Hun (many D&D worlds become this over time). But it's basically modernized magic, and therefore it's a bit anachronistic if I want a setting that hews closer to traditional medieval fantasy or sword & sorcery. "Teleportation" isn't a word or a concept from hoary old legends; while fairy roads or circles fill a similar niche, the practical and thematic gulf is vast.

That ignores the rules wonkiness and poor integration with the magic system that have plagued psionics over the decades, but that's an implementation issue not a conceptual issue.

Crinos

07-23-2008 01:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9143691)
Do what?

Remind me of the babe.

Anyways, I always liked psionics, but I much prefer their use in 3rd edition when they were made more like spells.

JasonK

07-23-2008 03:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9143771)

I think it works very well as one of the foundations of a non-traditional fantasy setting (crystal armor and githyanki and cross-planes raiding parties, oh my), and it's fine in a cosmopolitan kitchen sink universe where anything goes and the average adventure thinks more like a 20th century humanist than a Roman legionnaire or a Hun (many D&E worlds become this over time). But it's basically modernized magic, and therefore it's a bit anachronistic if I want a setting that hews closer to traditional medieval fantasy or sword & sorcery. "Teleportation" isn't a word or a concept from hoary old legends; while fairy roads or circles fill a similar niche, the practical and thematic gulf is vast.

That ignores the rules wonkiness and poor integration with the magic system that have plagued psionics over the decades, but that's an implementation issue not a conceptual issue.

Except for the middle part ("fine in a cosmopolitan..."), where I think the rules have always gotten in the way, I'm pretty much with Sleeper here. If you're deliberately going non-trad it's a very cool alternative to magic, but if you're sticking closer to actual legendry and myth it's a bit too far out there.

~ jason

Xyxox

07-23-2008 05:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Wow, two setting specific creatures from two settings I ran campaigns in, Spelljammer and Dark Sun.

I really went big into Spelljammer and as a consequence it became a money pit since it linked the the major campaign worlds together via the Phlogiston. This was later accomplished by the Planescape setting, too.

Dark Sun was great fun and one of the better settings.

It's too bad the most fun settings all ended up on the 3E cutting room floor. That's what happens when a game suffers from both rules bloat AND fluff bloat.

DMH

07-23-2008 06:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Dark Sun gith would have been better had they not tried to turn them into a degenerate, reptilian version of the githX (I forgot if they are yanki or zerai) in one of the adventures.

As for psionics, I prefer the 2nd edition version, Green Ronin's Psychic Handbook and Alternity's version over the 3rd edition version (spells with another name).

g026r

07-23-2008 06:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9144746)

Dark Sun gith would have been better had they not tried to turn them into a degenerate, reptilian version of the githX (I forgot if they are yanki or zerai) in one of the adventures.

I seem to recall that it's yanki, but I haven't read through any of the adventures in ages.

lkrast

07-23-2008 06:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Psionics bad. If you don't have them, someone who does can overshadow you, at least in early AD&D. If you do have them - I ran into this in a homebrew game system I played in for a few years - the monsters tend to have it better than you, which means you end up with fried brains a lot.

noisms

07-23-2008 01:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Xyxox (Post 9144636)

It's too bad the most fun settings all ended up on the 3E cutting room floor. That's what happens when a game suffers from both rules bloat AND fluff bloat.

Yeah, I never understood how all the interesting settings (Planescape, Dark Sun, Al Qadim, Spelljammer) went unsupported, while Forgotten Realms (snore) and Dragonlance (pass me the sick bucket) continued to get attention.

Crinos

07-23-2008 03:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9145935)

Yeah, I never understood how all the interesting settings (Planescape, Dark Sun, Al Qadim, Spelljammer) went unsupported, while Forgotten Realms (snore) and Dragonlance (pass me the sick bucket) continued to get attention.

Cause they were the ones supported by big name fantasy authors.

How many Planescape and Spelljammer novels did you see floating around.

Cricket chirps

Yeah, exactly.

Even Ravenloft got ressurected by White Wolf's d20 division (which is oddly appropriate since that was the setting most of the WOD set was attracted too back in the day), hell back when I was in high school it was the most popular system hands down.

noisms

07-23-2008 03:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9146158)

Cause they were the ones supported by big name fantasy authors.

How many Planescape and Spelljammer novels did you see floating around.

Cricket chirps

Yeah, exactly.

That's a whole other question in and of itself. Why weren't there any good Planescape or Spelljammer books floating around? It's also kind of off-topic I suppose..

Crinos

07-23-2008 04:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9146213)

That's a whole other question in and of itself. Why weren't there any good Planescape or Spelljammer books floating around? It's also kind of off-topic I suppose..

I dunno, maybe they were just too "out there" for most "conventional" fantasy writers to get into.

I mean Planescape got a kick ass computer game (which, I must admit, I never played), and Spelljammer didn't even get that.

Meanwhile, Forgotten Realms and Dragonlance get ass loads of books because they're conventional fantasy world. And Ravenloft gets picked up by the goth horror Anne Rice set.

Not that there's anything WRONG with those settings, but it kind of sucks they're the ones that get the attention and the philosophical and fantasy sci fi settings get left in the dust,

EDIT: Of course, it could be that, in the case of Planescape, nobody could take writing in cockney sigil speak for the length of a book.

Anyways, Planescape's background was so involved they really didn't NEED novels, especially considering it was pretty much Di Terlizzi's pet project.

Plus, the Planescape Monstrous Compendium Appendix 3 is the ONLY monstrous compendium that features a monster entry written from the POV of the monster.

Crowetron

07-23-2008 04:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

As much as I love the Forgotten Realms setting (it's the damn Dwarves, they rock so hard), I've always been curious about Spelljammer.

Planescape seems interesting, but flying organic/magical ships through the cosmos to fight Space-Beholders sounds like my kinda game. I'm sure there's much more to it than that, but I'm already sold.

Crinos

07-23-2008 04:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9146373)

As much as I love the Forgotten Realms setting (it's the damn Dwarves, they rock so hard), I've always been curious about Spelljammer.

Planescape seems interesting, but flying organic/magical ships through the cosmos to fight Space-Beholders sounds like my kinda game. I'm sure there's much more to it than that, but I'm already sold.

They even had their own form of Daleks: The Clockwork horrors.

Plus Guyver Units.

Crowetron

07-23-2008 05:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Well shit. Now I must play this game. FOREVER.

To Amazon, away!

JohnBiles

07-23-2008 05:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9146373)

As much as I love the Forgotten Realms setting (it's the damn Dwarves, they rock so hard), I've always been curious about Spelljammer.

Planescape seems interesting, but flying organic/magical ships through the cosmos to fight Space-Beholders sounds like my kinda game. I'm sure there's much more to it than that, but I'm already sold.

One of the few campaigns I was ever a player in that lasted over a few months (I've DMed some really long games but played in few long ones) we did some spelljamming which was pretty cool, even though at one point we got mind-controlled by mind flayers who sold us as slaves to a Beholder ship.

(Which lead to one of our coolest campaign moments. Our low wisdom barbarian somehow was the first to throw off the mind control. He had no weapons, but they'd let him keep his Belt of Storm giant strength so he could move heavy objects for them. So he ambushed a beholder by jumping down the big central flight shaft of the ship, landing on its head, ripping off two eyestalks and BEATING IT TO DEATH with them.)

glass

07-23-2008 05:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Damnit, I want to play in a Spelljammer game now. :eek:

glass.

sim_james

07-23-2008 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9146213)

That's a whole other question in and of itself. Why weren't there any good Planescape or Spelljammer books floating around? It's also kind of off-topic I suppose..

Planescape novels suffered from being handed to authors who didn't really grok the setting. Most of the possible authors who did have a strong grip on the setting were writing supplements, and for the most part that's what PS fans read instead.

Planescape had five books, if I recall correctly - Pages of Pain, the Blood Wars trilogy, and a Torment tie-in. The best was Pages of Pain... but it was unconventional and somewhat of a departure from the canonical setting. The Blood Wars trilogy was appallingly bad (i.e, about as bad as most FR and DL novels). Torment was basically readable, but not even a fraction as entertaining as the actual game.

Spelljammer had a series (with some kind of silly 90s TSR title like "The Wildspace Quintet" or somesuch). I only caught a couple of them, so I can't give much of a review. They were a bit game-y, unfortunately.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9146316)

Anyways, Planescape's background was so involved they really didn't NEED novels, especially considering it was pretty much Di Terlizzi's pet project.

Plus, the Planescape Monstrous Compendium Appendix 3 is the ONLY monstrous compendium that features a monster entry written from the POV of the monster.

There was a lot of good reading in Planescape supplements, that for sure.

The Planescape Monstrous Compendiums were extremely entertaining to read. My personal favourite is the Sunfly entry!

noisms

07-23-2008 06:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9146555)

There was a lot of good reading in Planescape supplements, that for sure.

The Planescape Monstrous Compendiums were extremely entertaining to read. My personal favourite is the Sunfly entry!

Yep. After this thread (threads?) is over, I'm toying with the idea of doing a series on the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums.

Malignant Marionette

07-23-2008 09:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9143419)

I'd be interested to know what proportions of this thread's readership are positive, neutral or negative about psionics.

Fluffwise I'm positive, ruleswise I'm neutral. I mean, (using Complete Psionics Handbook) pretty much all psionic powers that affect someone else need to establish contact first. So that regular illithid just tells you to roll your save vs. mindfuck, while the psionic illithid needs to cast Contact and roll their power stat (high but still has a chance to fail), then cast whatever mind-affecting power they want to use, again rolling their power stat which can fail and even after that the target can still roll their saves. And the same deal for any other psionic monster, meaning they're standing there for a round looking silly and trying to establish contact. Good lord if their power stat is lower than 15. And the same thing all over again if they want to psionic up another target.

I suppose smart opponents could establish contact in the middle of a conversation, but it seems lone psionists are totally screwed if attacked before they manage to do that. Of course, I'm not interested in PC psionists, so any advice on making psionic users kickass will be gladly accepted, if anyone's a bit more experienced with them. I also have Skills & Powers, in case the psionics section in that makes any difference. Didn't get around to reading it, since all the psionics lingo makes me confuzzled. :o

Crinos

07-23-2008 11:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9146424)
Well shit. Now I must play this game. FOREVER.

To Amazon, away!

You should try drivethrurpg.com, you can get pretty much all the speljammer things on PDF for like five bucks a pop.

(un)reason

07-23-2008 11:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9146558)
Yep. After this thread (threads?) is over, I'm toying with the idea of doing a series on the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums.

I hate you so much right now. ;) When I finish this, I am never doing anything like it ever again. (unless I'm getting paid for it.) It just eats up so much time and energy.

Belchion

07-24-2008 12:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9146316)

I mean Planescape got a kick ass computer game (which, I must admit, I never played), and Spelljammer didn't even get that.

Well, but Spelljammer got a computer game where you could miss the plot:

Quote:

Originally Posted by <http://www.the-underdogs.info/game.php?id=3094>

Spelljammer suffers from a limited plotline... a VERY limited plotline. In fact, you may miss the fact that there is one at all.

noisms

07-24-2008 12:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9147260)

I hate you so much right now. ;) When I finish this, I am never doing anything like it ever again. (unless I'm getting paid for it.) It just eats up so much time and energy.

I find that if I can keep the momentum of one entry approximately every 24 hours going, it's not too bad. I think if I missed two days in a row, I'd grind to a halt. And if I tried to do more, I'd burn out.

I'm lucky that my job involves me sitting at the computer for quite long periods doing nothing much.

EDIT: Also, Dragon magazine is a different beast to monster entries. The MM really lends itself to this sort of thing. Dragon really doesn't!

(un)reason

07-24-2008 02:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9147536)

I find that if I can keep the momentum of one entry approximately every 24 hours going, it's not too bad. I think if I missed two days in a row, I'd grind to a halt. And if I tried to do more, I'd burn out.

I'm lucky that my job involves me sitting at the computer for quite long periods doing nothing much.

EDIT: Also, Dragon magazine is a different beast to monster entries. The MM really lends itself to this sort of thing. Dragon really doesn't!

Yeah. Reading and summarising 1 page per day compared to 80+ pages every 2-3 days is a very different workload. It's my own fault really.

Sleeper

07-24-2008 03:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9147908)

Yeah. Reading and summarising 1 page per day compared to 80+ pages every 2-3 days is a very different workload. It's my own fault really.

Don't worry, you're almost there. Only 309 print issues and 6 annuals to go :)

Also, I think your thread's suffering an attention deficit because relatively few people have copies of the oldest issues. You're into the 1980s now, and the number of readers who can follow along or reminisce should start increasing.

(un)reason

07-24-2008 10:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9147977)

Don't worry, you're almost there. Only 309 print issues and 6 annuals to go :)

Also, I think your thread's suffering an attention deficit because relatively few people have copies of the oldest issues. You're into the 1980s now, and the number of readers who can follow along or reminisce should start increasing.

A bit of cross-forum promo work to get the attention of people on places like ENworld and dragonsfoot would probably be a good idea. But I am loathe to sign up to forums just to say, hey, look at what I'm doing. Seems rather like spamming. And being banned does not appeal.

noisms

07-24-2008 11:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gith, Pirate

This entry all revolves around Spelljammer, so it's full of stuff that goes way over my head. Take this sentence, for instance: These inherent abilities also enable the pirates to pilot ships with series helms. These abilities function only in wildspace, not in the phlogiston. Rather than just bandy around terms like "series helms", "phlogiston" and "wildspace" which I know nothing about, I'll concentrate on the meat and bones of things.

Pirate Gith are a tertiary branch of the Githyanki/Githzerai axis, although in appearance they look like Githyanki. (Was it ever explained why Githyanki and Githzerai look so different? I forget, and I can't be bothered reading the entries to find out, just yet.) Whereas Githyanki live in the Astral Plane and Githzerai live in Limbo (I understand those), Pirate Gith live in "arcane space" (I don't understand that), where they fly around in ships trying to catch other ships and generally being pirates and stuff. They live a strict militaristic lifestyle and have a clearly defined hierarchy in their asteroid homes, and think nothing of committing genocide (!) if other races try to settle nearby.

As a non-Spelljammerist, I think I'd be more tempted to use Pirate Gith as actual pirates on the high seas. Perhaps I would hand wave their existence away, if pressed, as the descendants of a group of Pirate Gith from "arcane space" who somehow ended up in the campaign world. Ever since then they have gradually prospered and proliferated until now they are the scourge of the seven seas. Can YOU take on....The Fell Fleet of the Pirate Gith!!!??

There's a lot of stuff about how Pirate Gith like Elven ships, although I'm not sure why. This entry is also notable for having just about the shortest Ecology section ever: "The Gith pirates are carnivores, pure and simple. They do not care what state, short of putrefied, the meat is in. Some of the pirate bands also engage in cannibalism." Yep, so much for mating rituals, gestation periods and stats for children and females.

Crinos

07-24-2008 11:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Basic rundown of spelljammer terms:

Helms: Basically the things that turn normal ships into spelljammer ships: IIRC they're magic thrones that you sit in that make the ship your in go into space.

Wildspace: Basically Outer Space.

Phlogiston: In the Spelljammer cosmology, each universe is contained in a "crystal sphere" which floats around in this weird smoky stuff called phlogiston. (each crystal sphere containing a different world: One for Toril, one for Krynn, Athas, Oerth, etc.)

Also, IIRC: Elvish Spelljammer ships tend to resemble insects.

I'll be able to explain it better once I get a job and buy the spelljammer boxed set and the appropriate supplements. (although my first buy will be the planescape stuff)

demiurge1138

07-24-2008 03:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Arcane space literally means, I think, the areas of space dominated by the arcans (all the way from the beginning of the book). Frankly, I'd just use githyanki and put 'em on a pirate ship.

JohnBiles

07-24-2008 04:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9149707)

Gith, Pirate

Pirate Gith are a tertiary branch of the Githyanki/Githzerai axis, although in appearance they look like Githyanki. (Was it ever explained why Githyanki and Githzerai look so different? I forget, and I can't be bothered reading the entries to find out, just yet.) Whereas Githyanki live in the Astral Plane and Githzerai live in Limbo (I understand those), Pirate Gith live in "arcane space" (I don't understand that), where they fly around in ships trying to catch other ships and generally being pirates and stuff. They live a strict militaristic lifestyle and have a clearly defined heirarchy in their asteroid homes, and think nothing of committing genocide (!) if other races try to settle nearby.

A very brief set of notes on spelljammer cosmology: In Spelljammer, each of the major 2E settings was inside a crystal sphere which shielded it from the great ocean of phlostigon which floats in Arcane Space between the crystal spheres. You could use spelljammer ships to fly around inside Crystal Spheres, but you could also head into Arcane space to cruise between game worlds.

So Gith Pirates lived out there in the phlostigon.

As for different appearance, I assumed the Githyanki altered their appearance as part of some move to better adapt to living in the Astral Plane.

Wakboth

07-24-2008 05:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9149707)

(Was it ever explained why Githyanki and Githzerai look so different? I forget, and I can't be bothered reading the entries to find out, just yet.)

I always assumed that living in the Astral Plane wasn't good for the 'yanki.

Crinos

07-25-2008 12:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9150504)

I always assumed that living in the Astral Plane wasn't good for the 'yanki.

I think it has to do with the way they age. Since time does not pass on the Astral, The Githyanki have to leave the Astral in order to age, and then the accumulated age comes in all at once.

So instead of aging naturally over time, they age in short bursts. Not cool.

Sleeper

07-25-2008 12:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9151255)

I think it has to do with the way they age. Since time does not pass on the Astral, The Githyanki have to leave the Astral in order to age, and then the accumulated age comes in all at once.

So instead of aging naturally over time, they age in short bursts. Not cool.

I always assumed it had more to do with the zero-gravity environment of the astral.

DMH

07-25-2008 01:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

So you 3 are saying that Limbo is better on the body than the Astral plane?

Mortality

07-25-2008 01:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9151455)

So you 3 are saying that Limbo is better on the body than the Astral plane?

Limbo? It's just a bit brisk.

Good for the skin, you know. Invigorating, even.

Except for the times when the air turns to intelligent acid and tries to eat you but let's not mention that, eh?

Crinos

07-25-2008 02:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9151455)
So you 3 are saying that Limbo is better on the body than the Astral plane?

Considering that most Githyanki look like yellow lizard mummies and Githzerai look like relatively normal humans with reptilian eyes, then yes.

I mean, just look at the cover of the 1e fiend folio:

http://farm4.static.flickr.com/3034/...54dacbe8_o.jpg

I mean just LOOK at him! Skull like face, unhealthy yellow skin, bandaged arms and legs with folds of skin hanging out like he was originally 500 pounds and he just got liposuction. That s NOT a good look. Hell, if you didn't know any better, you'd probably assume that they're undead.

Heck, that's probably it: The Lich Queen probably modified the Githyanki so that they would look like this out of vanity. I mean we already know she eats all her most powerful subjects, so its not that much of a stretch.

Hellzon

07-25-2008 02:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

And in 4e, the Gith* have evolved towards looking almost exactly the same, except yanki are still yellow and zerai are green.

The artist even used the same three models when drawing the two races. Nice touch.

kelvingreen

07-25-2008 02:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 9151735)
And in 4e, the Gith have evolved towards looking almost exactly the same, except yanki are still yellow and zerai are green.*

They've also got Spangly Disco Armour! Many fear the cruelty of the Githyanki, but the truly sensible adventurer fears the Gith's love of bling!

I can't stand that chuck-a-picture-of-my-mate-through-Photoshop stuff. Give me a pen and wash DiTerlizzi Githzerai anyday,

Crinos

07-25-2008 03:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9151811)

They've also got Spangly Disco Armour! Many fear the cruelty of the Githyanki, but the truly sensible adventurer fears the Gith's love of bling!

I can't stand that chuck-a-picture-of-my-mate-through-Photoshop stuff. Give me a pen and wash DiTerlizzi Githzerai anyway,

As far as I'm concerned, they should have done what they did for the MM Appendix 1 and planescape and use DiTerlizzi for ALL their monster manual artwork

kelvingreen

07-25-2008 03:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

No arguments there.

Sleeper

07-25-2008 03:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The githyanki are pirates. Their wasted bodies are the result of a life of flamboyant danger and dissipation, of squalor and hardship and bad personal hygiene. Their limbs are festooned with the gaudy and fantastic loot from a thousand worlds, arrayed in a screaming panoply of bad taste. In many ways, they're the aging rockers of the D&D setting; what Keith Richards would become if he held onto a frail thread of life for thousands upon thousands of years. And had a bigass glowing silver sword.

The githzerai are ninja. Their lean bodies are the result of a lifetime of asceticism, obedience, and dedication to personal perfection. Muscles as spare and firm as adamantite, and a bare and minimalistic style evinced by a simple robe, sandals, and a bare cell to sleep in.

Crinos

07-25-2008 03:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9151995)

what Keith Richards would become if he held onto a frail thread of life for thousands upon thousands of years. And had a bigass glowing silver sword.

or What Mick Jagger would become if he had a bigass glowing silver sword.

Sleeper

07-25-2008 04:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9152027)
or What Mick Jagger would become if he had a bigass glowing silver sword.

Except I don't think Mick Jagger snorted his dad's ashes, which is strangely appropriate for a bunch of Jack Sparrows who worship a desiccated but strangely-well preserved wannabe goddess.

Crinos

07-25-2008 04:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9152096)
Except I don't think Mick Jagger snorted his dad's ashes, which is strangely appropriate for a bunch of Jack Sparrows who worship a desiccated but strangely-well preserved wannabe goddess.

On that subject, was the lich queen ever give stats at all?

g026r

07-25-2008 04:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9152209)
On that subject, was the lich queen ever give stats at all?

According to Wikipedia, they'd be in Dungeon #100: The Lich Queen's Beloved.

Sleeper

07-25-2008 04:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9152209)
On that subject, was the lich queen ever give stats at all?

Of course. This is D&D, after all. If it doesn't have stats and you can't kill it, it doesn't exist. "The Lich-Queen's Beloved" adventure in Dungeon magazine #100 statted her out for 3E (githyanki lich wizard 25). However I don't know about 2E, or if there was anything more than "24th-level of magic-use or higher" in 1E.

JRM

07-25-2008 04:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9152209)
On that subject, was the lich queen ever give stats at all?

Yes, she's statted up in the Dungeon #100 mega-adventure "The Lich-Queen's Beloved".

EDIT: Oh well, not fast enough to the keyboard. Anyhows, as far as I know Dungeon #100 is the first time she got a full write-up.

see

07-25-2008 05:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

"Arcane Space" simply means "the Spelljammer setting".

[One of the two Spelljammer boxed set books is the "Concordance of Arcane Space". The first chapter in said book is titled "Arcane Space". Said chapter covers the subjects of celestial bodies, wildspace (the type of space that's vacuum, inside crystal spheres), Spelljammer's gravity rules, spelljamming helms, how crystal spheres work, the phlogiston (the type of space filled with an explosively flammable gs, outside of crystal spheres), breathing and air rules, temperature, and time.]

glass

07-25-2008 06:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9151995)
The githyanki are pirates. Their wasted bodies are the result of a life of flamboyant danger and dissipation, of squalor and hardship and bad personal hygiene.

'In the morning, we'll dance the hempin jig
'so lift up your pint of rum and take another swig
'the curse of Captain Morgan has lead us to this fate
'so have no fear & don't look back; the afterlife awaits!'

glass.

noisms

07-25-2008 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Wow, I turn around for five minutes and you've already produced two pages of stuff on my next two entries!

Githyanki coming up shortly...

sim_james

07-25-2008 10:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9151995)

In many ways, they're the aging rockers of the D&D setting; what Keith Richards would become if he held onto a frai thread of life for thousands upon thousands of years. And had a bigass glowing silver sword.

Holy crap. Githyanki as the Rolling Stones; if ever I run D&D/Planescape again, that's going to make it in.

noisms

07-26-2008 01:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Githyanki and Githzerai

I'm doing these as one entry. So sue me! It's with these sort of races - the stalwart icons of the D&D game - that you really struggle to come up with something interesting or new to say. As with orcs, elves, dragons, trolls, beholders, etc., the Gith* are races that pretty much everyone uses and everyone is familiar with. So this is just a retread of very familiar territory.

The first thing to be said is that both races get entries in the first Planescape Monstrous Compendium, and they're big improvements. Firstly, the art was done by Diterlizzi (a familiar theme recurs....), and secondly the production values were second to none; they are beautiful spreads to look at. The MM versions just aren't. (The Githzerai picture is, I think, a candidate for the worst in the book. It manages to combine a complete lack of understanding of composition with horribly poor execution and terrible production - at least in my copy, the picture itself is slightly blurred and faded. The Githyanki isn't much better - it looks like a skeletal monkey pirate with a two-handed sword.)

The second thing to be said is that Githzerai and Githyanki are just really cool ideas. (I heard that actually George R. R. Martin came up with the Githyanki - yet another case where TSR and WotC have appropriated IP they had no right to, like the Displacer Beast). What I liked most about them as a kid, and what I still like about them now, is that they hint at a whole other level of stuff going on in the background to a standard D&D campaign. You're adventuring in some prime material world which is massive in and of itself. And you might rise to become a great hero in that world. But then suddenly, BLAM! Interplanar war! Mighty humanoids from the far reaches of the infinite multiverse! Scrawny yellow freaks riding red dragons!

The third thing is that I really like the cheesy back story. Slave rebellion? Lich queens? Mindflayers? It's silly as anything, but brilliant fun.

The fourth thing is that Rakkma bands are a great idea. Gangs of Githzerai travelling the planes to hunt Illithids? Yes, please.

The ecology section for the Githzerai has it that: "Although man and githzerai are not natural enemies, battles are frequently fought between the two races, due in part to some humans' desire to capture a live githzerai for study. To date, no such creature has been secured." Sadly, the ever-present 'sages' don't get a mention. But I definitely want to make catching a live Githzerai part of my "monster-hunting sages" campaign.

So how often do you use the Gith*, and how?

demiurge1138

07-26-2008 01:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Not George R. R. Martin. Both the githyanki and githzerai were written by Charles Stross for White Dwarf Magazine and the Fiend Folio, as were the slaadi.

I used githyanki once, briefly, a long time ago, so long ago that I forgot until just now. The party went to the githyanki capital, Tu'nurath, in order to track down an ancient Tarterian dragon who had something they wanted--the sword that killed the god the city was now built on (that the githyanki use dead astral gods as building materials? Love that). In order to gain permission to set foot in the caverns beneath Tu'nurath, they had to secure audience with the Lich Queen herself and bribe and flatter her sufficiently to be allowed. Roleplaying Vlaakith was good fun.

I've never used githzerai as NPCs, but I have seen one as a PC once. A very strange githzerai PC... he thought that humans were the males and elves the females of the same species.

You know what's really weird about githyanki? They lay eggs! I guess this makes a certain amount of sense--the Astral Plane is timeless, so a pregnancy will just last forever and get in the way of savage warring. If I ever use the githyanki again, this is what I want to capitalize on: a hidden nursery, where the githyanki mate, lay eggs and rear their children to adulthood, attended by githyanki who are no longer optimal warriors. Ooh! Maybe a red dragon incubates the eggs, and thinks of them as his treasure!

And why, with the glut of half-dragons in 3e, did we never see half red dragon githyanki? That actually makes sense, flavorfully. Mad, vicious shock troopers, used as a suicide squad by the uncaring lich queen.

g026r

07-26-2008 01:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9155498)

Not George R. R. Martin. Both the githyanki and githzerai were written by Charles Stross for White Dwarf Magazine and the Fiend Folio, as were the slaadi.

The name of the Githyanki is lifted from Martin though.

There's an interview with Stross that has more information on the creation of them: http://www.sevendead.com/?page_id=12

Sleeper

07-26-2008 02:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9155449)

The Githyanki isn't much better - it looks like a skeletal monkey pirate with a two-handed sword.)

You say that like it's a bad thing. :)

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9155449)

The second thing to be said is that Githzerai and Githyanki are just really cool ideas. (I heard that actually George R. R. Martin came up with the Githyanki - yet another case where TSR and WoTC have appropriated IP they had no right to, like the Displacer Beast).

Aside from the name, I'd be interested to know how similar Martin's version is to Stross'. The soulsuckers apparently just show up in the back story and never actually appear in A Dying of the Light. There's a tendency these days to cry "thief" if there's even the slightest resemblance between two creative works, which is kind of silly because all creative endeavors build upon what came before. It takes more than a superficial similarity or simply drawing inspiration from an earlier work for it to qualify as theft. After all, we don't say modern writers are stealing from Chaucer because the poet influenced the development of the modern English language.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9155449)

The third thing is that I really like the cheesy back story. Slave rebellion? Lich queens? Mindflayers? It's silly as anything, but brilliant fun.

That part's apparently inspired by Niven's World of Ptavvs (this is also covered in the interview with Charles Stross). And that's clearly just inspiration; I would have never made the connection without reading about it.

The Githyanki were also really cool in the "Ecology of the Mind Flayer" article in Dragon #78.

Brandi

07-26-2008 02:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9155498)
Both the githyanki and githzerai were written by Charles Stross

Charles "Accelerando" Stross?

Sleeper

07-26-2008 02:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9155610)
Charles "Accelerando" Stross?

Yes.

noisms

07-26-2008 10:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9155587)
There's a tendency these days to cry "thief" if there's even the slightest resemblance between two creative works, which is kind of silly because all creative endeavors build upon what came before. It takes more than a superficial similarity or simply drawing inspiration from an earlier work for it to qualify as theft.

Yeah, but it's a bit rich for WotC to claim the Githyanki as their own IP. For the very reason you cite. As with the Displacer Beast.

Brandi

07-26-2008 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9155623)
Yes.

Huh. (For the record, Accelerando didn't give me the best initial impression of the guy, but that has nothing to do with this.)

Wakboth

07-26-2008 04:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9157789)

Huh. (For the record, Accelerando didn't give me the best initial impression of the guy, but that has nothing to do with this.)

He also came up with the Slaadi and the Death Knight, if memory serves. And he's a kick-ass SF writer, too! :)

shirosan

07-26-2008 06:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9155449)

The Githzerai picture is, I think, a candidate for the worst in the book. It manages to combine a complete lack of understanding of composition with horribly poor execution and terrible production - at least in my copy, the picture itself is slightly blurred and faded.

Well, no surprise there, as I see it's an illustration by Thomas Baxa, whose work used to drive me and my friend up the wall. On the other hand, I now feel a slight twinge of pity for him, as he had to share illustration duties with Brom in the first Dark Sun boxed set, and anyone is going to look weak next to that. But yeah, the name of Baxa was practically an epithet for us back in the early 90s. We were a couple of young aesthetes. :cool:

Zartes

07-26-2008 07:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by shirosan (Post 9158556)

Well, no surprise there, as I see it's an illustration by Thomas Baxa, whose work used to drive me and my friend up the wall. On the other hand, I now feel a slight twinge of pity for him, as he had to share illustration duties with Brom in the first Dark Sun boxed set, and anyone is going to look weak next to that. But yeah, the name of Baxa was practically an epithet for us back in the early 90s. We were a couple of young aesthetes. :cool:

I think I just got inspiration for an alien swearword for my next scifi campaign... :D

Wakboth

07-26-2008 07:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Baxa isn't my favorite by any means, but I've heard the colorization in MM screwed his pics; they work much better in B&W.

Naxuul

07-27-2008 01:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9158595)

Baxa isn't my favorite by any means, but I've heard the colorization in MM screwed his pics; they work much better in B&W.

I've seen his B&W pics.

They still look alot like kindergarten scribbles.

-Naxuul

Brandi

07-27-2008 02:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Baxa's art for the Ravenloft MM supplements was-- okay. Not great, and a few were real clinkers (the halfling vampire, though 2nd edition hobbit-style halflings are going to be a hard sell as scary monsters), but still better than the art for Islands of Terror.

sim_james

07-27-2008 07:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I ran Planescape in 2nd (and 3e for awhile) so yeah, Gith* got a fair bit of use. If you need a planar race that can range in power from ordinary mortal to dragonkillers, gith* are a good option.

I'm used to githzerai as NPCs rather than PCs, though.

noisms

07-28-2008 09:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gloomwing

I've never used a Gloomwing in a game. But looking over the entry, I'm surprised to find that they're actually quite a fun monster.

Essentially a big (8') moth, Gloomwings swoop in from the night to attack, confusing their enemies with shimmering wings and emitting weakness-causing pheromones which summon more of their kind. They can also carry off smaller creatures (those annoying halflings and gnomes) and fly them away to certain doom. Their young - caterpillars called "Tenebrous Worms" are ferocious predators, armed with toxic mandibles.

In many ways the Gloomwing is almost the Quintessential 2nd Edition Creature. It causes annoying, debilitating effects (confusion and weakness). It has a shedload of exception-based rules (they are 50% undetectable in darkness, twilight or moonlight; there is a 20% chance per turn of them being able to summon more of their kind; the chance of an attacker being poisoned by the Tenebrous Worms' bristles is 10% times AC...etc.). It has an insta-kill attack. (The Tenebrous Worms' bristles cause paralysis and then death on a failed save.) It has a superfluous but pleasantly grotesque Ecology bit. ("Gloomwing moths live only 4-9 (1d6+3) weeks. During this time they search for mates and eat voraciously. Egg-laden females (½ chance) use corpses of small sized or larger creatures as incubators for their eggs. The eggs hatch in 12 days, sprouting 1d6+4 small tenebrous worms. The corpse cannot be resurrected unless the infestation is removed with a cure disease spell first. Unless killed, the young worms completely devour the body when they emerge.") It checks pretty much all the boxes.

Gloomwings would be a very nasty foe for a halfling or a gnome. Being carried off, killed, and used for egg-incubation would not only spell death, but permanent death. It would be a fun side adventure for such an unfortunate's friends, having to track the Gloomwing across the Plane of Shadow to its nest, hoping to get there in time before the eggs hatch...

JRM

07-29-2008 03:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9164620)

Gloomwing

They can also carry off smaller creatures (those annoying halflings and gnomes) and fly them away to certain doom.

I've said it before and I'll say it again, it can sure suck to be a gnome or halfling in D&D. There are so many monsters with special attacks that only affect smaller than man-size characters. At least in AD&D they have normal human movement, so they didn't have to worry so much about the "you don't need to outrun the owlbear, just the slowest party member".

noisms

07-29-2008 12:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9165867)

I've said it before and I'll say it again, it can sure suck to be a gnome or halfling in D&D. There are so many monsters with special attacks that only affect smaller than man-size characters. At least in AD&D they have normal human movement, so they didn't have to worry so much about the "you don't need to outrun the owlbear, just the slowest party member".

The bonus is that if anybody ever decides to play a kender character, it's really easy to kill them off.

Crinos

07-29-2008 02:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9168030)

The bonus is that if anybody ever decides to play a kender character, it's really easy to kill them off.

I read on wikipedia today that Kender were meant to be the dragonlance equivalent of Halflings.

I personally never saw the kender hate, I think they're adorable.

noisms

07-29-2008 03:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9168265)

I read on wikipedia today that Kender were meant to be the dragonlance equivalent of Halflings.

I personally never saw the kender hate, I think they're adorable.

Get thee behind me, Satan! ;)

I think Kender can be played well, i.e. as sort of super-innocent and fearless halflings. But more often than not "Kender" just ends up meaning "License to annoy the other players". It all depends on the player, and most players in my experience usually give in to the temptation to be irritating.

kelvingreen

07-29-2008 05:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9168265)

I personally never saw the kender hate, I think they're adorable.

Where's the RPGnet charter, because I think Crinos just violated it! ;)

Setebos

07-30-2008 12:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9164620)

It would be a fun side adventure for such an unfortunate's friends, having to track the Gloomwing across the Plane of Shadow to its nest, hoping to get there in time before the eggs hatch...

Ah, but can the eggs be extracted and sold? Valuable squishy bits. That's all it's missing (that or the fearsome regalia that is (are?) Moth Armor).

noisms

07-30-2008 12:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Setebos (Post 9169812)

Ah, but can the eggs be extracted and sold? Valuable squishy bits. That's all it's missing (that or the fearsome regalic that is (are?) Moth Armor).

Yep, the eggs are worth 1,000-3,000 gps each, I think. (I don't have the book on me right now.)

No armour rules are provided, but I'm sure it could be statted up... ;)

Crinos

07-30-2008 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9169832)

Yep, the eggs are worth 1,000-3,000 gps each, I think. (I don't have the book on me right now.)

No armour rules are provided, but I'm sure it could be statted up... ;)

How do you make armor out a giant moth?

Me? I'd make a bitching cloak out of its wings. That'd be sweet, flying around with a gloomwing cloak, Like I was the bastard son of David Bowie and Meatloaf.

kelvingreen

07-30-2008 03:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9169961)
How do you make armor out a giant moth?

Me? I'd make a bitching cloak out of its wings. That'd be sweet, flying around with a gloomwing cloak, Like I was the bastard son of David Bowie and Meatloaf.

Crinos wins.

noisms

07-30-2008 12:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gnoll

Hooray!

I like Gnolls. A lot. I think they were always my favourite humanoid enemy monster, and so much of it is down to the artwork.

I mean, just look at this guy:

<http://www.bajasafaris.com/padnd/images/mm2/gnoll.gif>

Is he not the best picture of a Gnoll there has ever been?

As I've said before, though, it's hard finding things to say about the really iconic and generic monsters. So you're going to say it for me. Tell us of the Gnollish goodness in your campaigns.

David J Prokopetz

07-30-2008 12:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9172933)
As I've said before, though, it's hard finding things to say about the really iconic and generic monsters. So you're going to say it for me.

What, not even a comment on 2E's tendency to create completely new subspecies of standard humanoids to serve as "elites" rather than just providing some guidelines for "levelling up" the existing critter?

(Or the fact that, if the description is taken at face value, flinds evidently wield nunchuks? :D)

Zartes

07-30-2008 12:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I always wanted to invent a chocolate bar called a "flind bar" :D

Sleeper

07-30-2008 01:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I always loved gnolls. Gangly, rangy, opportunistic scavengers. No so much evil in the minion of a dark power sense, as lazy and selfish and raucous. Their barking howls carry from the tents and campfires far across the sweltering air of the arid plains. In the shadows between the great bonfires, goblin and halfling and dwarf and elf slaves futilely scamper away from the laughs and kicks of the great bullies. The number of captives swell as hooting bands of gnolls lope back into camp, with small terrified bundles over their shoulders. Inevitably, the raids slow as the gnolls grow fat and luxuriate in the surfeit of menial workers, until their masters' casual inattentance and nightly drunken stupors allow the slaves to escape, and the cycle begins again. In the fringes, emaciated ghouls haunt the pits and piles of waste that surround the disorderly huts, like a train of camp followers lured by the copious and pungent leavings.

The original ghul was a creature of smoke and fire, a ravaging spirit of the wastes. I always wanted to run a campaign where one of the two or three greatest sorcerers of the age was a gnoll, known as the Ravening Wind. The dry hot wind, that rises in the night and scours the lights of civilization from the land is a lank and shaggy beast. As terrifying as Jezda, the great bone mother of the northern forests.

Sleeper

07-30-2008 01:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9172964)

What, not even a comment on 2E's tendency to create completely new subspecies of standard humanoids to serve a "elites" rather than just providing some guidelines for "levelling up" the existing critter?

(Or the fact that, if the description is taken at face value, flinds evidently wield nunchuks? :D)

Once again, the 2nd edition is credited with 1st edition oddness. I sometimes think that the source of all that's strange and weird in D&D is the original Fiend Folio. :)

demiurge1138

07-30-2008 01:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I just don't get flinds. Why do bigger, badder gnolls get their own species name? And why do they use nunchuks?

Sleeper

07-30-2008 01:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9173142)

I just don't get flinds. Why do bigger, badder gnolls get their own species name? And why do they use nunchuks?

For some reason, my brain is trying to connect it to the image of the flail snail, on the opposite page of the Fiend Folio. Gnolls supremacists with nunchuks seem like a logical counter for an infestation of gastropods with spinning clubs for heads.

There must have been something in the water in late 1970s Britain.

Crinos

07-30-2008 02:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9173142)

I just don't get flinds. Why do bigger, badder gnolls get their own species name? And why do they use nunchuks?

Probably the same reason there are so many subspecies of dwarves, Gnomes, Goblins, Giants and Elves.

Me? I can't wait till we get to the golems, those have always been my favorites.

Also, I got a job that I'm starting in a week and a half or so, so I'll finally have money to buy some old MM's.

I may just do a "lets read" of the Mystara appendix in celebration, seeing as it was one of my all time favorites.

g026r

07-30-2008 02:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9173281)

I may just do a "lets read" of the Mystara appendix in celebration, seeing as it was one of my all time favorites.

I just received my recently purchased copy in the mail today. Flipping through it, it's certainly different.

If I can ever convince my players to play in 1 2e game, I may have to dig it out just to through some unexpected/unknown creatures at them.

Crinos

07-30-2008 02:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 9173351)

I just received my recently purchased copy in the mail today. Flipping through it, it's certainly different.

If I can ever convince my players to play in 1 2e game, I may have to dig it out just to through some unexpected/unknown creatures at them.

Well I've found out recently that its just more economically feasible for me to get them in PDF format.

Celisasu

07-30-2008 03:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Maybe Flinds were created during the "Ninja are cool!" era? Hence nunchucks?

Obviously Flinds are gnoll ninja. But gnolls being...well gnolls never really grasped the black pajamas or throwing stars(why throw little metal blades when you can throw bigger stuff?) just decided they liked nunchucks instead.

JasonK

07-30-2008 04:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I have a problem with gnolls, in that they're cool but not actually what I want them to be. I wasn't much looking for hyena-men in my D&D. I wanted them, really wanted them, to be Wolf-men. Like Palladium Fantasy's Wolfen.

That's in standard D&D, of course. In an al Qadim / Arabian Nights-esque setting, of the sort Sleeper's writing about, there I could seriously get behind the ghul-binding dogs of the plains... :)

~ jason

YojimboC

07-31-2008 04:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The thing about gnolls is... well, I never really had a thing for gnolls. I mean, what is that they can do that orcs or goblins (even the heavy lifting goblins, hobs and bugbears) can't do?

I do remember that either the Scarlet Brotherhood or the Red Wizards of Thay (or both) employed gnolls as guards/cannon fodder/thugs. And the Northern Reaches supplement for Mystara put gnolls in the hills as the primary humanoid antagonists, because although trolls would have been more thematically appropriate, the regenerating bastards were just too dangerous to be so common a threat.

I do like flinds and their flind bars, though. Fiend Folio is full of crazy fun ideas.

Crinos

07-31-2008 04:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I remember a webcomic called dungeon damage that was based on an alternate history dnd setting set in the time of Charlemagne (One of the main PC's was a Christian Elf cleric) That mentioned that the Gnolls had been converted to islam.

They were never shown on screen (the webcomic, IIRC, died,) but I find the idea of Muslim Gnolls oddly awesome.

Alas, thats the only Gnoll story I can think of

...oh, and once in a campaign, my necromancer scared some gnolls shitless, to the point where they dropped their weapons (one of them a big ass lightning gun, which my character confiscated) and ran off. She was cool like that.

glass

07-31-2008 04:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9173142)

I just don't get flinds. Why do bigger, badder gnolls get their own species name? And why do they use nunchuks?

I might be mis-remembering, but I thought they were smaller badder gnolls.

glass.

Sleeper

07-31-2008 04:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 9176317)

I might be mis-remembering, but I thought they were smaller badder gnolls.

Think you're right. Wasn't it 6 1/2 ft. to 7 or 7 1/2 ft?

Maybe the ordinary gnolls are the lanky hippie types with long flowing locks, and the flinds are the stocky fireplugs with closely-trimmed fur.

Crinos

07-31-2008 05:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I had an idea just now for a fantasy MnM campaign/novel I'm thinking about where goblin genetics are so screwy that they can crossbreed with virtually anything and produce offspring, with the different goblin subspecies and other races being the result of goblin crossbreeding in ancient times (Hobgoblins are part human, Bugbears are part elf or Dwarf, Kobolds are part gnome or Halfling, Trolls are part giant, etc.)

So, maybe Flinds are part goblin/part Gnoll

Rasmus Wagner

07-31-2008 05:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

As I recall it, anyone could spend a Weapon Proficiency Slot to train in Flindbar-Fu. And that kicked serious ass.

kelvingreen

07-31-2008 06:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9176589)
So, maybe Flinds are part goblin/part Gnoll

Gnome + Troll = Gnoll? :eek:

Thranguy

07-31-2008 06:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9176792)
Gnome + Troll = Gnoll? :eek:

That way lies the madness of Red-Box D&D, and the Thoul (Troll+Hobgoblin+Ghoul, the child or a truly bizarre monster orgy of some sort...) (Were those in the Mystara appendix?)

Crinos

07-31-2008 07:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 9176975)

That way lies the madness of Red-Box D&D, and the Thoul (Troll+Hobgoblin+Ghoul, the child or a truly bizarre monster orgy of some sort...) (Were those in the Mystara appendix?)

As a matter of fact they were.

I'm still trying to figure out how the hell a Ghoul managed to get in on the act.

Anyways, its definitely gonna be my first pdf buy when I start working next week (probably gonna get 1-2 of the old edition books a week, since they're only 5 bucks).

glass

07-31-2008 07:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9173281)

I may just do a "lets read" of the Mystara appendix in celebration, seeing as it was one of my all time favorites.

Do it! I love the monsters in that book!

glass.

kelvingreen

07-31-2008 07:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 9176975)

That way lies the madness of Red-Box D&D, and the Thoul

You say madness, I say genius.

trippingsatyr

07-31-2008 07:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Am I the only one who saw Crinos's post about wearing gloom wings as a cape and immediattly thought of..THE MONARCH!

Kakita Kojiro

07-31-2008 10:47 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9176792)
Gnome + Troll = Gnoll? :eek:

Heh. Good ol' EGG and his zany ideas. I'd think this would be a good question for Old Geezer... but it seems likely the hyena-men take on gnolls came about in later days than he would have been involved in, alas.

But. While checking wiki for that half-remembered Gnome + Troll thing, I found out about The Gnoll -- a joint rugby and cricket venue. In Wales.

Runequest had its trollball... perhaps we need gnollball. Which would be sort of like rugby, but with more hyenaesque feeding frenzies. And the effette flinds off playing a game of cricket, with their flindbar bats and in their prep school uniforms... against the visiting giff team.

randomgamer8466

07-31-2008 11:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gnolls, baby! Gnolls!

My PCs were traveling through the desert when they first heard the sharp staccatto barks. I suggested that they might come from jackals, but my players weren't buying it. They prepared for battle.

Team 1 of gnolls advances with shortbows, zings arrows at the PCs (~3rd level) with minimal effect. As the gnolls grow nearer, the fighters charge. The gnolls retreat.

Then team 2 of gnolls appears. They run up to the party's unprotected camels, slash their water bags, and whip the camels into running away.

After that, there were no more gnoll attacks. The gnolls just hung out, just outside missile range, waiting for the inevitable.

Crinos

07-31-2008 11:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9178024)
Gnolls, baby! Gnolls!

My PCs were traveling through the desert when they first heard the sharp staccatto barks. I suggested that they might come from jackals, but my players weren't buying it. They prepared for battle.

Team 1 of gnolls advances with shortbows, zings arrows at the PCs (~3rd level) with minimal effect. As the gnolls grow nearer, the fighters charge. The gnolls retreat.

Then team 2 of gnolls appears. They run up to the party's unprotected camels, slash their water bags, and whip the camels into running away.

After that, there were no more gnoll attacks. The gnolls just hung out, just outside missile range, waiting for the inevitable.

Oooh, how did your PC's get out of that fix?

Brandi

07-31-2008 02:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9177898)

Heh. Good ol' EGG and his zany ideas. I'd think this would be a good question for Old Geezer... but it seems likely the hyena-men take on gnolls came about in later days than he would have been involved in, alas.

Wikipedia mentions the gnome + troll claim, and also mentions the Lord Dunsany story "How Nuth Would Have Practiced His Arts Upon the Gnoles". I'd also throw in the story "The Man Who Sold Rope to the Gnoles" by Magaret St. Clair (1951, so no etext that I know of).

kelvingreen

07-31-2008 05:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9177898)

Runequest had its trollball... perhaps we need gnollball. Which would be sort of like rugby, but with more hyenaesque feeding frenzies.

And a trussed up drow as the ball.

I like it!

EDIT: And I had no idea about the early origins of the gnome/troll/gnoll thing; I thought I was being clever! ;)

Crowetron

07-31-2008 06:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ah, Gnolls. I love those crazy fuzzy bastards. I always used to skip over them in the monster manual, and none of my DMs ever really used them, but then I played the original Baldur's Gate. One wacky rescue mission in a fortress full of murderous hyena-men later, Gnolls are my favorite fodder critter.

Orcs are boring, goblins are too easy, and hobgoblins...Why bother? So far, every game I've DMed, or even been allowed to suggest ideas for, has featured Gnolls and Kobolds, because they're so much damn fun.

Also, the one time I used a Flind, he was equipped with a halberd, while one of his ordinary Gnolls took his nunchuck thingy. The Gnoll had no idea how to use it, and proved to be vastly entertaining.

kelvingreen

07-31-2008 07:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9179073)

Ah, Gnolls. I love those crazy fuzzy bastards. I always used to skip over them in the monster manual, and none of my DMs ever really used them, but then I played the original Baldur's Gate. One wacky rescue mission in a fortress full of murderous hyena-men later, Gnolls are my favorite fodder critter.

That's pretty much the same for me. I'd barely registered them, beyond the neat DiTerlizzi picture in the MM, but they've become firm favourites since that quest in Baldur's Gate. I seem to recall that the BG gnolls were pretty huge though, about ogre size. I don't have the book with me right now, but that's not right, is it? I'd always imagined them at roughly human size.

EDIT: Also, gnoll pimp:

http://wizards.com/d20modern/images/..._088190_90.jpg

(from d20 Modern, I think)

Kakita Kojiro

07-31-2008 10:47 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9178932)

EDIT: And I had no idea about the early origins of the gnome/troll/gnoll thing; I thought I was being clever! ;)

Well, your line of thinking was the same as that of Gary Gygax... surely, nothing to be dismayed by!

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9179163)

That's pretty much the same for me. I'd barely registered them, beyond the neat DiTerlizzi picture in the MM, but they've become firm favourites since that quest in Baldur's Gate. I seem to recall that the BG gnolls were pretty huge though, about ogre size. I don't have the book with me right now, but that's not right, is it? I'd always imagined them at roughly human size.

EDIT: Also, gnoll pimp:

http://wizards.com/d20modern/images/..._088190_90.jpg

(from d20 Modern, I think)

The average Gnoll is about seven feet tall, so they are technically taller than normal humans, though not enough to warrant a size change.

Also, I love that modern picture. Can we break out the modern Medusa and Mind flayer pics when we get to them?

noisms

08-01-2008 12:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gnome

Another hit from the folks at the 'G' section. Gnomes are a favourite of mine, ever since I ran my first Gnome Fighter back in the early days. People often level criticisms at Gnomes, calling them a poor man's dwarf, and those criticisms have now been enshrined in the core rules for the new edition - but I never saw a problem with the race. If anything they're the most interesting because they have the least baggage. Halflings, Elves and Dwarves already have a fixed image in the fantasy genre. Gnomes don't, which means you can do a whole lot more with them.

That said, they really do suffer (in the MM) from being very much like Dwarves. They live underground, mine, work hard, and are small guys with beards. The key distinction seems to be that Gnomes enjoy nature more than Dwarves, and they like to make friends with burrowing animals. So the place where Dwarf meets Elf, maybe.

Rock Gnome

These are the 'standard' Gnomes - the ones from the core rules.

Sverfneblin

Deep Gnomes inhabit the underdark and war incessantly with the Drow, Mind Flayers, and Kuo-Toa. They are notable for being yet another example of the designers getting carried away with racial languages: they can apparently speak their own language (Sverfneblin), Kuo-Toan, Drow, and the Elemental Plane of Earth Common Tongue. That latter one is definitely up there on the Elven Cat List of Unlearned Languages.

Deep Gnomes also like to use 'mithral' steel a lot. Did the D&D people choose the word 'mithral' because Christopher Tolkien would have sued them if they'd called it 'mithril'?

Anyway, I ran a Deep Gnome Fighter for quite some time in an Underdark campaign. The special abilities the creatures get - blur, blindness, change self - are pretty sweet, especially blur. Combined with my character's high dexterity and special Sverfneblin armour, he was practically impossible to touch in a fight, and became the de facto tank of the party.

Tinker Gnome

God, I'd forgotten about these. It's funny how the Dragonlance universe had not one but TWO of the most irritating D&D races ever. The less said about these the better (you'll understand if you've read any Dragonlance novels), but there are two notable 'huh?' moments in the entry: first, the home of the Tinker Gnomes beneath Mount Nevermind has the intriguingly precise population figure of 59,000; second, apparently all Tinker Gnomes have a 'Life Quest', which is "to attain perfect understanding of a single device". I suspect that's based on something from a Dragonlance book, but thankfully I forget which.

Forest Gnome

These are the most elf-like of the Gnomish subspecies, being a race of diminutive humanoids who live in the forest, get along well with animals, and shun contact with other races.

Crinos

08-01-2008 01:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Again, never understood the tinker gnome hate. I for one found them endlessly fascinating, and because of that, in most settings I come up with Gnomes end up being the technologically apt species inventing flying machines and trains and such.

And the gnome being between elf and dwarf is a GREAT idea.

Äkräs

08-01-2008 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9180074)

God, I'd forgotten about these. It's funny how the Dragonlance universe had not one but TWO of the most irritating D&D races ever.

Three. You have also forgotten gully dwarves.

demiurge1138

08-01-2008 01:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Äkräs (Post 9180233)
Three. You have also forgotten gully dwarves.

Damn, you beat me to it.

Personally, I love gnomes, and I'm lucky enough to have players who also love them. One of my favorite PCs from a game I ran was the violently insane tinker gnome in my Planescape game. Built all sorts of infernal devices and goofy, brightly colored homunculi, before spending seven years in the Abyss and becoming even crazier.

Ah, good times...

Kakita Kojiro

08-01-2008 02:36 AM

Ahh, the tinker gnomes. I actually ran a Dragonlance adventure where all the PCs were kender and tinker gnomes. And "helpful" gully dwarf NPC sidekicks. It was the Battle of Hylo against Dragonlord Toede. And it was awesome.

I let the kender PCs randomly "acquire" items from other people they came into contact with -- so all the gnomes immediately stuffed their pockets with rocks. ("I got a rock! cool!"). The tinker gnome PCs all had lifequests, of varying utility ("Deploy tactical sewing machine mkV", "something to do with gears").

Absolute insanity reigned for one glorious evening, culminating in Toede fleeing in humiliation after his dragon mount got brutally stitched by the aforementioned tactical sewing machine. (it was only a white dragon; not too terrifying, really.)

It was such a hit that one of the kender PCs got carried over into my regular Dragonlance campaign, and the players kept agitating for more hijinks. So... their regular PCs got to ally with the gnomish army and save Sancrist from invasion. Some of their old characters showed up again -- as did that damn sewing machine, now mobile and outfitted with many, many gears. They ended up saving the day by recruiting some really mean goats, and absolutely crushing the enemy army with a timely attack by the Gnomish Doomball Armored Brigade (= gnomes, sealed up in huge, metal hamster balls). They were all awarded with the Order of the Golden Screw by the gnomish high command.

And their PCs never, ever talked about it again. Even the kender was kind of embarrassed by the whole thing. :D

Alas, it all happened well before Giant Space Hamsters and Woolly Rupert, or I'd've been tempted to go so over-the-top that they'd've ended up in wildspace...

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9180074)
...They live underground, mine, work hard, and are small guys with beards.

What is up with all the little guys in D&D being beardy types? Dwarves - long, bushy beards. Gnomes - probably trimmed beards or long ones like the Travelocity gnome. Halflings - weedy beards and probably big sideburns. Overcompensating for height? Trying not to get confused with the (previously) not-so-tall elves?

E.T.Smith

08-01-2008 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9180074)

Gnome If anything they're the most interesting because they have the least baggage. Halflings, Elves and Dwarves already have a fixed image in the fantasy genre. Gnomes don't, which means you can do a whole lot more with them.

Contrarily, I think that's exactly the problem. Gnomes don't have a strong image associated with them, so there's not much of a framework to hang a character concept on, or even a broader cultural one of that matter. Elves, Dwarves, etc. there's an off-the-rack suite of imagery to work from. "Elven tribe", "Dwarven fortress", "Halfling village", I bet you can visualize what they're like in a moment. "Gnomish city" ... not so much.

If you look over the various D&D lines, you'll see that there are competing ideas as to what a gnome should be like, and not necessarily limited to a particular setting. Greyhawk gives us forest-dwelling illusionists, and for a while that was the general image. But in basic D&D they were just short Dwarves, and that idea started migrating about. When Dragonlance was popular, the tinker gnome came close to being the standard archetype in every setting.

Crinos

08-01-2008 02:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Äkräs (Post 9180233)
Three. You have also forgotten gully dwarves.

I once played a Gully Dwarf PC for one adventure, didn't get to do much though.

David J Prokopetz

08-01-2008 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9180460)
Alas, it all happened well before Giant Space Hamsters and Wooly Rupert, or I'd've been tempted to go so over-the-top that they'd've ended up in wildspace...

Giant space hamsters really were ahead of their time, weren't they? The infamous fire-breathing phase doppelganger giant space hamster sounds exactly like an exercise in 3E creature templating gone horribly wrong.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9172933)

Gnoll

Hooray!

I like Gnolls. A lot. I think they were always my favourite humanoid enemy monster, and so much of it is down to the artwork.

Another big gnoll fan here! (My avatar, although technically a werehyena, is close enough. :))

Quote:

I mean, just look at this guy:

<http://www.bajasafaris.com/padnd/images/mm2/gnoll.gif>

Is he not the best picture of a Gnoll there has ever been?

Not sure if it is the best, but it's certainly among the best, and one of the finest in MM. DiTerlizzi sure knew how to make the critters look interesting!

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9173142)

I just don't get flinds. Why do bigger, badder gnolls get their own species name? And why do they use nunchuks?

Because 1e and 2e couldn't handle leveled monsters straight off the books; thus, the existence of flinds, lizard kings, ologs and ogrillions, and others.

(I did use the name "Flind" for the distant homeland of gnolls in one setting.)

As for the gnollish goodness... well, let me link to some artwork by a guy known as Leucrotta / Pachycrocuta:

Gnoll sketch

Gnoll pirate \(check out the flag!\)

Gnoll ranger riding a leucrotta

Gnoll bard\(!\)

And a gnoll slaver.

I like gnolls as a barbaric, even bestial race, that's not quite without a honor of their own sort; more "red in tooth and claw" than the "slavering semi-demons" of 4e. (Pity, since they're mechanically excellent!)

I enjoyed the idea of a world with goblin moneylenders and gangsters hiring gnoll thugs as combined bodyguards, kneebreakers and evidence disposal system, and where gnoll queens are carried to war on their palanquin-thrones by an amazon guard of their daughters and nieces, and where you could, with care and enough strength, deal and trade with them. :)

kelvingreen

08-01-2008 03:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9179649)

Well, your line of thinking was the same as that of Gary Gygax... surely, nothing to be dismayed by!

"Innovative" then! But yes, not bad company to keep.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9180074)

Tinker Gnome

God, I'd forgotten about these. It's funny how the Dragonlance universe had not one but TWO of the most irritating D&D races ever.

As I recall, the Tinker Gnomes got split into two subraces by the time Fifth Age came about; the others were the Thinker Gnomes (groan). Their machines were smaller and portable, far less chaotic, and actually worked as designed, but took longer to build.

Wakboth

08-01-2008 04:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9180074)

If anything they're the most interesting because they have the least baggage. Halflings, Elves and Dwarves already have a fixed image in the fantasy genre. Gnomes don't, which means you can do a whole lot more with them.

Not too much baggage, maybe, but not enough hooks, or distinctive traits and fluff, I'm afraid. I can wax poetic about gnolls, but can barely muster enthusiasm to complain about gnomes. ;)

Quote:

So the place where Dwarf meets Elf, maybe.

One idea I had was to have the gnomes originally be dwarf-elf crossbreeds: dwarven physique combined with elven longevity and interest in magic. They were never numerous, but had become a true-breeding race of their own.

The DiTerlizzi illustrations are very nice, once again.

Brandi

08-01-2008 06:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9179163)
http://wizards.com/d20modern/images/..._088190_90.jpg

"Gnollemite is my name and fuckin' up motha fuckas is my game." (I don't have a particular interest in d20 Modern but I LOVE that illos.)

A Letter From Prague

08-01-2008 07:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9180461)
Gnomes don't have a strong image associated with them,

<http://www.jjcardinal.com/gnome-group.jpg>

?

glass

08-01-2008 07:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9180570)
*Giant space hamsters really were ahead of their time, weren't they? The infamous fire-breathing phase doppelganger giant space hamster sounds exactly like an exercise in 3E creature templating gone exactly right!

FIFM. Well, maybe. :D

glass.

noisms

08-01-2008 10:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9180461)

Contrarily, I think that's exactly the problem. Gnomes don't have a strong image associated with them, so there's not much of a framework to hang a character concept on, or even a broader cultural one of that matter.

But that means there's more space to get creative.

demiurge1138

08-01-2008 10:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Is it too late to post a gnoll story?

In a homebrew game I ran about 4 years ago, the primary Humanoid Antagonists were gnolls. The game took place in the city of Termana, a colony of a distant empire known for its mastery of divine magic. They landed in an area very heavily populated by gnolls, and so tried to drive them back. The war progressed and prolonged, until a council of gnoll shamans turned to Doresain, the king of the ghouls, in desperation. Doresain raised hundreds of fallen gnolls as ghoulish soldiers and drove back the human colonists, but his influence blighted the once-great hunting lands of the gnolls into a twisted wreckage of bodies and undead, where nothing larger than a raven or goat could persist. The gnoll homeland became the Sea of Graves.

It took me by surprise how sympathetic my PCs were to the gnolls. I was planning for them to have a Kill The Humanoids type adventure to get the McGuffin lost in that war to the Jawcrack Gnolls, but instead they parleyed, getting the McGuffin for the price of monetary tribute, a test of cunning (fulfilled by tracking and hunting a mad slasher, an insane little whirlwind-attacking beastie) and a test of savagery (fulfilled by beating the shaman's personal guard in melee combat).

E.T.Smith

08-01-2008 03:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9182366)

But that means there's more space to get creative.

I agree with that sentiment to a point, but that logic taken to its furthest extreme would mean a PHB made up completely of blank pages would be totally awesome. I don't dispute that for you personally (and others of a similar bent) the fuzzy conception of gnomes looked like an opportunity. But for other players (and given the gnomes' perennial role as second-stringers, the majority I think) the gnomes ill-defined status in a game built around strong archetypes made them unappealing.

Crowetron

08-01-2008 05:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9181542)

"Gnollemite is my name and fuckin' up motha fuckas is my game." (I don't have a particular interest in d20 Modern but I LOVE that illos.)

I love this thread.

s/LaSH

08-01-2008 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9176268)

*I remember a webcomic called dungeon damage that was based on an alternate history dnd setting set in the time of Charlemagne (One of the main PC's was a Christian Elf cleric) That mentioned that the Gnolls had been converted to islam.*

They were never shown on screen (the webcomic, IIRC, died,) but I find the idea of Muslim Gnolls oddly awesome.

Er, that'll be my old webcomic. Guess this means I don't get to share my own tales of gnolls :) And I'm really very sad I had to let DD lapse (career pressures etc). Chapter 5 would have involved said North African gnolls in large quantities, plus Assassins, crazy stunts in the alleys of Tunis, Babylonian necromancers, and at least one panel of Caterina in this recent outfit design:

<http://smg.photobucket.com/albums/v3...tCatforWeb.jpg>

...before it was discarded as completely impractical. (What is typical wear for a European adventuress with a bad attitude in medieval North Africa? There is no acceptable answer, I fear.) One day I'll have to go back and write the whole thing up as a liberally illustrated text story, packed full of Cossack orcs, mysterious dead people, ninjas with too many mouthparts, big-ass dragons of unexpected allegiance, exploding underwater zombies, and characters who increasingly discover that they don't know who or what they really are.

I will confess to taking no end of inspiration from that awesome diTerlizzi, of course. Who wouldn't? That's a great picture. In fact, much of the Dungeon Damage campaign was based on a read-through of this very Monstrous Manual, figuring out what critters would fit where in a world that had to remain at least cosmetically medieval Europe. Needless to say I'm following this thread very fondly.

noisms

08-01-2008 06:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH (Post 9183529)

Er, that'll be my old webcomic. Guess this means I don't get to share my own tales of gnolls :) And I'm really very sad had to let DD lapse (career pressures etc). Chapter 5 would have involved said North African gnolls in large quantities, plus Assassins, crazy stunts in the alleys of Tunis, Babylonian necromancers, and at least one panel of Caterina in this recent outfit design:

<http://smg.photobucket.com/albums/v3...tCatforWeb.jpg>

...before it was discarded as completely impractical. (What is typical wear for a European adventuress with a bad attitude in medieval North Africa? There is no acceptable answer, I fear.) One day I'll have to go back and write the whole thing up as a liberally illustrated text story, packed full of Cossack orcs, mysterious dead people, ninjas with to many mouthparts, big-ass dragons of unexpected allegiance, exploding underwater zombies, and characters who increasingly discover that they don't know who or what they really are.

I will confess to taking no end of inspiration from that awesome diTerlizzi, of course. Who wouldn't? That's a great picture. In fact, much of the Dungeon Damage campaign was based on a read-through of this very Monstrous Manual, figuring out what critters would fit where in a world that had to remain at least cosmetically medieval Europe. Needless to say I'm following this thread very fondly.

I never read that webcomic, but I just have to say that it sounds like one of those brilliant ideas I occasionally come across and think "Now why didn't I think of that?"

Great stuff.

Crinos

08-01-2008 11:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH (Post 9183529)

Er, that'll be my old webcomic. Guess this means I don't get to share my own tales of gnolls :) And I'm really very sad had to let DD lapse (career pressures etc). Chapter 5 would have involved said North African gnolls in large quantities, plus Assassins, crazy stunts in the alleys of Tunis, Babylonian necromancers, and at least one panel of Caterina in this recent outfit design:

<http://smg.photobucket.com/albums/v3...tCatforWeb.jpg>

...before it was discarded as completely impractical. (What is typical wear for a European adventuress with a bad attitude in medieval North Africa? There is no acceptable answer, I fear.) One day I'll have to go back and write the whole thing up as a liberally illustrated text story, packed full of Cossack orcs, mysterious dead people, ninjas with to many mouthparts, big-ass dragons of unexpected allegiance, exploding underwater zombies, and characters who increasingly discover that they don't know who or what they really are.

I will confess to taking no end of inspiration from that awesome diTerlizzi, of course. Who wouldn't? That's a great picture. In fact, much of the Dungeon Damage campaign was based on a read-through of this very Monstrous

Manual, figuring out what critters would fit where in a world that had to remain at least cosmetically medieval Europe. Needless to say I'm following this thread very fondly.

Wow, small world.

Anyways, don't worry about it, I know how these things work.

YojimboC

08-04-2008 06:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gnomes. I dunno. Like gnolls, they never really did anything for me. I do have fond memories of a gnome ranger I ran ages ago named Slanter, based off the Terry Brooks character of the same name, but I only had the one. The "little people" didn't appeal to me very much in the old days. And now I'm all about the dwarves.

Dawnforge tweaked gnomes a bit, if I recall, emphasizing the propensity for magic and connection to burrowing mammals. The setting gnomes were very much fey, moreso than even the elves, and that helped carve out a useful niche for them at least.

demiurge1138

08-04-2008 12:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9192349)

Dawnforge tweaked gnomes a bit, if I recall, emphasizing the propensity for magic and connection to burrowing mammals. The setting gnomes were very much fey, moreso than even the elves, and that helped carve out a useful niche for them at least.

The Pathfinder setting also makes gnomes more fey. Recent immigrants from the First World, the setting's fey realm, they do their best to blend in and learn about human society, but they just... don't get it. Which made for great fun when I ran Rise of the Runelords. The gnome PC was the First World equivalent of a cubicle drone, working in controlling the weather, who got the opportunity to go to the human world and have an adventure, just like in those human stories he liked reading so much. He treated adventuring like a giant vacation, and had a checklist of "101 Things To Do in the Mortal World", a phrasebook of Common aphorisms (most of which did not work), and kept a log of his teammates' more unusual behaviors.

kelvingreen

08-04-2008 05:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9193126)

He treated adventuring like a giant vacation, and had a checklist of "101 Things To Do in the Mortal World", a phrasebook of Common aphorisms (most of which did not work), and kept a log of his teammates' more unusual behaviors.

That sounds dangerously close to Kenderism... ;) On the other hand, it also sounds like Twoflower, so it balances out.

randomgamer8466

08-05-2008 11:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9178079)
Oooh, how did your PC's get out of that fix?

(in reference to the time that gnolls cut my PCs' waterbags and drove off their camels in the middle of the desert)

The party included a druid, who definitely earned her mistletoe that week by creating water and charming some new camels.

Crinos

08-05-2008 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9198065)
(in reference to the time that gnolls cut my PCs' waterbags and drove off their camels in the middle of the desert)

The party included a druid, who definitely earned her mistletoe that week by creating water and charming some new camels.

Bet that spoiled the Gnolls day.

noisms

08-05-2008 11:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Sorry for the delay. My hard drive died two days ago, and I'm only now getting back into action. New post coming up shortly.

Steve H

08-06-2008 08:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9200161)

Sorry for the delay. My hard drive died two days ago, and I'm only now getting back into action. New post coming up shortly.

Nasty. But good to see you back - was worried you'd given up on us!

noisms

08-06-2008 12:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

So, let's get the old ball rolling again with the Goblin!!!!!!

Goblins, eh? Where would we be without them? Well...we'd be hard pressed to dream up fodder for 1st level adventurers, that's for sure.

I'm not sure how I feel about Goblins. On the one hand, I do like the Goblin - Hobgoblin - Bugbear axis of evil, and I generally prefer my enemy creatures to be LE (even if, bizarrely, the 3rd edition people chose to make Goblins NE). And sneaky, ambushy type monsters are often the most fun.

But on the other hand, they are one of those monsters who suffer from ubiquity. Along with kobolds, they are just about the only humanoid creature in the MM who a group of 1st level adventurers can take on in any numbers, which means they're pretty much guaranteed an appearance in a campaign. Which is as boring as hell, really. And there are only so many times you can use giant insects and suchlike as alternatives.

This is another one of those occasions where you have to say that the Warhammer creators really had the right idea. Goblins in Warhammer aren't just sneaky, cowardly runts. They're sneaky, cowardly runts who take poisonous fungus to drive themselves berzerk, ride Squigs like giant space hoppers, catapult themselves at enemies, eat troll steaks to give themselves regenerative powers, and use trained giant spiders to do their fighting for them. Their gonzo weirdness elevates them far above D&D Goblins in the interest stakes.

The other route to go down when making interesting Goblins is, I think, to make them more fairy-like. You could base them on the malignant spirits of old stories - the kind of mean fairies who curdle milk, scatter hay, rattle doorknobs in the night, poison the pig feed, and kidnap babies...

Crinos

08-06-2008 12:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Personally, I liked Magic: The Gatherings goblins, with their general cluelessness and tendency for cartoonish self destruction.

demiurge1138

08-06-2008 12:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Pathfinder also has good goblin flavor. Somewhere in between Warhammer zaniness and evil fey. They steal babies, hate dogs, love setting things on fire, and sing jolly songs as they slice your throat with rusty knives.

Goblins, oddly, have been much more common as PC races in my games than, say, halflings. I once ran a game with Trinton McKinton, an apparently Irish goblin who learned how to be a cleric through correspondence courses. We joked that, after failing Knowledge checks on ghosts, ghouls and plagues in rapid succession, he somehow missed the volume G-P.

Ratoslov

08-06-2008 12:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Goblins really are best done as a PC race, I think. They fit into the 'gnome' niche much better than gnomes do, what with being nasty, cowardly, and short in place of gnomes' short.

Nathan P. Mahney

08-06-2008 03:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Man, I love goblins. I usually use them as ingenious little beggars that are continuously coming up with absurd (and occasionally effective) plans to ambush PCs. The best one was the goblin horde that unleashed a few rust monsters onto some mid-level PCs before charging in wearing hide armor and wielding clubs.

kelvingreen

08-06-2008 05:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9203630)

This is another one of those occasions where you have to say that the Warhammer creators really had the right idea. Goblins in Warhammer aren't just sneaky, cowardly runts. They're sneaky, cowardly runts who take poisonous fungus to drive themselves berserk, ride Squigs like giant space hoppers, catapult themselves at enemies, eat troll steaks to give themselves regenerative powers, and use trained giant spiders to do their fighting for them. Their gonzo weirdness elevates them far above D&D Goblins in the interest stakes.

Yep, Warhammer wins again. I love the idea that they've somehow realised, on a racial level, that they're useless, so have tried to force an uplift in the most chaotic way.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9203764)

I once ran a game with Trinton McKinton, an apparently Irish goblin who learned how to be a cleric through correspondence courses. We joked that, after failing Knowledge checks on ghosts, ghouls and plagues in rapid succession, he somehow missed the volume G-P.

Brilliant.

I'm a big fan of goblins in games. To avoid them falling into that 1st-level-fodder trap, I tend to bulk them up in various ways, although not always to the Warhammer extreme. I also tend to ignore the bugbear as a separate creature and just use it as a "Boss" Goblin. Ditto the hobgoblin, which I treat as a big goblin rather than a separate species; I then use the name for those unfortunates who are half-goblin. I think "hobgoblin" works nicely in this context as a racial pejorative.

noisms

08-06-2008 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9204424)

Yep, Warhammer wins again. I love the idea that they've somehow realised, on a racial level, that they're useless, so have tried to force an uplift in the most chaotic way.

Yeah, I loved that too. I also liked the willful disregard they have for the lives of their comrades and even themselves - like they know that, as goblins, they're pretty much worthless. The guys who catapult themselves at the enemy were my favourite: they don't care that they'll die, so long as they have a fun death which causes lots of carnage.

I've just realised what I want goblins to be in my next campaign: Redcaps. Not like in Changeling: The Dreaming. I'm talking ultra-violent Scottish fairies who crack bones with their teeth and chew the marrow, then bathe their caps in buckets of blood.

The Last Conformist

08-06-2008 08:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Count another Warhammer goblin lover here.

Don't count, however, the number of painted Warhammer goblin minis I have. It's rather embarassingly large.

kelvingreen

08-06-2008 09:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9204839)

Don't count, however, the number of painted Warhammer goblin minis I have. It's rather embarassingly large.

I always wanted to do an all-Goblin army for WFB, but I was too intimidated by the idea of painting 200+ miniatures. One day perhaps, when I can get someone else to do it.

noisms

08-06-2008 09:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9204978)

I always wanted to do an all-Goblin army for WFB, but I was too intimidated by the idea of painting 200+ miniatures. One day perhaps, when I can get someone else to do it.

I haven't played Warhammer in about 10 years, but when I did I was always one of those lazy people with loads of miniatures just decked out in plain white or black undercoat, with perhaps a green face here or there.

Aaron.Brown

08-06-2008 11:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I love goblins. In fact, the next D&D game I run I'm going to include them as a major race that runs around civilized lands and cities.

I'm also a big fan of the Gnoblar from Warhammer Fantasy. Their silly, but viciously petty behavior is always how I've pictured goblins.

aaron

Crinos

08-07-2008 12:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9204424)

I'm a big fan of goblins in games. To avoid them falling into that 1st-level-fodder trap, I tend to bulk them up in various ways, although not always to the Warhammer extreme. I also tend to ignore the bugbear as a separate creature and just use it as a "Boss" Goblin. Ditto the hobgoblin, which I treat as a big goblin rather than a separate species; I then use the name for those unfortunates who are half-goblin. I think "hobgoblin" works nicely in this context as a racial pejorative.

IIRC, that's how they handle Goblins in the Birthright setting: they're all the same species, some are just bigger than others.

Cerulean Goblins are, of course, described in MCA 3.

Wakboth

08-07-2008 12:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I noticed you left the goblin "art" undescribed, no doubt out of respect for Tony DiTerlizzi. But! Look at... mm, page 398? At the very end of the book and the last page of the index.

I think the small guy with the axe and shield is a DiTerlizzi goblin that was, for some weird reason, not used in the actual entry. (Same with the minotaur.)

noisms

08-07-2008 12:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9205652)

I noticed you left the goblin "art" undescribed, no doubt out of respect for Tony DiTerlizzi. But! Look at... mm, page 398? At the very end of the book and the last page of the index.

I think the small guy with the axe and shield is a DiTerlizzi goblin that was, for some weird reason, not used in the actual entry. (Same with the minotaur.)

You could be right, although in the previous incarnation of this thread, a theory was muted that the official MM Goblin pic was actually an early example of a kobold drawn by DiTerlizzi that somehow ended up being used for the Goblin.

However, it looks so unlike a DiTerlizzi piece...

Kudos for mentioning the Minotaur in the Index page, by the way. I love that pic, and can't imagine why it wasn't used for as the official Minotaur artwork.

kelvingreen

08-07-2008 03:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9205669)

However, it looks so unlike a DiTerlizzi piece...

He's even got horns poking out of the top of his hat. I suspect it was either an early piece, or a last-minute job after the rejection of the Index Goblin; it certainly has the look of a quick sketch, but it does look like DiTerlizzi's style, just the kind of thing he'd do at a convention when pushed for time.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9205669)

Kudos for mentioning the Minotaur in the Index page, by the way. I love that pic, and can't imagine why it wasn't used for as the official Minotaur artwork.

Probably because he's a bit weedy, and I'd imagine that they were looking for a brawnier, more comic-booky type. They were wrong, of course.

Crinos

08-07-2008 04:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9206420)

He's even got horns poking out of the top of his hat. I suspect it was either an early piece, or a last-minute job after the rejection of the Index Goblin; it certainly has the look of a quick sketch, but it does look like DiTerlizzi's style, just the kind of thing he'd do at a convention when pushed for time.

Probably because he's a bit weedy, and I'd imagine that they were looking for a brawnier, more comic-booky type. They were wrong, of course.

Probably also that the pic they did use for the Minotaur came, in all likelihood, from a previous MM supplement, and they just decided to use it again instead of paying DiTerlizzi for a Minotaur drawing, found out he already did one, and decided to use it anyways.

Anyways, Kobolds have gone through more changes over the years than any monster, but more about that when we reach them.

see

08-07-2008 05:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The gnoll as a gnome-troll hybrid goes back to the original three booklets, while the gnoll as a hyena-humanoid goes back to the 1st edition Monster Manual. So, looks like Gary Gygax is directly responsible for both in D&D.

The quote from OD&D is "A cross between Gnomes and Trolls (. . . perhaps, Lord Sunsany did not really make it all that clear) with +2 morale." That is, of course, a one-letter-off typo for Lord Dunsany.

The Last Conformist

08-07-2008 11:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I like the sound of "Lord Sunsany" ... let's add it to the list of PC names to use at some point.

David J Prokopetz

08-07-2008 11:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9205669)

You could be right, although in the previous incarnation of this thread, a theory was muted that the official MM Goblin pic was actually an early example of a kobold drawn by DiTerlizzi that somehow ended up being used for the Goblin.

No theory. That little dude first shows up as a kobold in the Dragon Mountain boxed set, which was also illustrated by DiTerlizzi and published earlier the same year. If I recall correctly, the reason that the Monstrous Manual "goblin" is so low-quality isn't because it's a quick sketch, but because it's cropped from a larger piece and blown up to fit the illustration box.

kelvingreen

08-08-2008 12:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9210337)

If I recall correctly, the reason that the Monstrous Manual "goblin" is so low-quality isn't because it's a quick sketch, but because it's cropped from a larger piece and blown up to fit the illustration box.

That would have been my other guess. :)

noisms

08-08-2008 11:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Golem, General

Golems are a real favourite of mine, and I suspect most other D&D players; they're a must for the sinister archmages, unholy cult leaders, sneaky grand viziers and goodly wizards the fantasy genre loves so much.

I am, however, troubled by the explanation given for Golem creation. Firstly, it seems odd that Golem creation involves tricking, luring or forcing a spirit from the Elemental Plane of Earth into inhabiting a created body, when you consider that Clay Golems can only be created by a Lawful Good priest. It doesn't sound like a very Lawful Good thing to do, really. Secondly and more seriously, what exactly is the spirit doing when it's inside the Golem body? It can't be controlling it, because Golems are mindless. And yet the general description for Golems says that the spirit can rebel and go into a bloodcurdling frenzy - which suggests it does have control. Rather strange, and makes me wonder whether the designers really thought about it or just decided....oh hell, let's make it a spirit from the Elemental Plane of Earth.

There's a healthy smattering of pseudo-setting bits scattered through the general description - those odd and mysterious hints that crop up throughout the MM along the lines of "nobody knows the reason why..." and "some have written..." and "it is thought that..." It's interesting that the designers chose to keep such lore even from the games lorekeepers - the DMs. Presumably it was to spur creativity, although the cynical part of me thinks it was just because the designers themselves couldn't be bothered to fully set out the truth of things.

Anyway, a full Golem entry will follow this one.

Crinos

08-08-2008 11:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've always interpreted the elemental spirit thing as being similar to more conventional elemental summoning: You summon the elemental, only instead of giving it a body of dirt and stone, you jam it into a statue or whatever.

As for the mindless thing, I think the idea is that the elemental spirit is just a battery to power the golem, not the driving force behind its actions.

Anyways, Golems have always been a personal favorite of mine, so I greatly look forward to the next couple of days.

Sleeper

08-08-2008 11:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9213055)

There's a healthy smattering of pseudo-setting bits scattered through the general description - those odd and mysterious hints that crop up throughout the MM along the lines of "nobody knows the reason why..." and "some have written..." and "it is thought that..." It's interesting that the designers chose to keep such lore even from the games lorekeepers - the DMs. Presumably it was to spur creativity, although the cynical part of me thinks it was just because the designers themselves couldn't be bothered to fully set out the truth of things.

I appreciate that more and more these days. Hints that inspire the DM to create and invent, instead of official answers everyone will read. The reason dark continents and lost peoples engendered so much mystique. Foreknowledge can be diminishing.

Brutus

08-08-2008 11:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9203630)

So, let's get the old ball rolling again with the Goblin!!!!!!

Goblins, eh? Where would we be without them? Well...we'd be hard pressed to dream up fodder for 1st level adventurers, that's for sure.

This... This is how I feel about goblins. Always my favorite monster and I felt they never quite got the iconic status and attention they deserved. They're the most basic of monsters. An evolution of the idea of the fae boogeyman to a squishable thug. I never really felt they captured the roots or feel of any of the folklore that birthed the little buggers.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9203630)

The other route to go down when making interesting Goblins is, I think, to make them more fairy-like. You could base them on the malignant spirits of old stories - the kind of mean fairies who curdle milk, scatter hay, rattle doorknobs i the night, poison the pig feed, and kidnap babies...

This! Yes. They're one-hit (literally, squish) wonders instead of interesting pranksters, boogeymen, or clever annoyances they really could be. That's my beef with most of D&D though, we very rarely get much information beyond how hard it is to cave in a creature's skull.

I guess Jermlaine will have to sate some of my need for fae jerkwads. But it's not the same. :p

6inTruder

08-08-2008 12:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9213140)

As for the mindless thing, I think the idea is that the elemental spirit is just a battery to power the golem, not the driving force behind its actions.

This is pretty much my take on it. With the addendum that a golem's rage ability is actually the (now insane) spirit battery taking over.

Nathan P. Mahney

08-08-2008 12:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I used to hate the Goblin illo, until I hit on the idea that it was actually drawn by a Goblin master artiste.

Also, Golems are way cool, but I can't recall ever encountering one in a game. That's a side effect of playing in mostly low-level games, I suppose. There are a lot of weird ones in the MM, so I'm looking forward to these.

Crinos

08-08-2008 12:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The only thing that ever really cheesed me about golems is their immunity to nearly all magic.

Anyways, the berzerker golem thing is odd because the only golems that suffer from it are the Flesh and Clay golems. The two greater golems don't, and neither do any of the following golem types ever made.

I know that originally there were just the four types of Golem (Flesh, Clay, Stone and Iron), and that the idea of lesser golems were that they were easier to make but also had the risk of going batshit crazy during a fight, but why didn't any of the newer golems do this?

Also, amusing fact, aside from the stone variants at the very end, most of these golem variants come from Ravenloft.

(un)reason

08-08-2008 01:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9213055)

Golem, General

I am, however, troubled by the explanation given for Golem creation. Firstly, it seems odd that Golem creation involves tricking, luring or forcing a spirit from the Elemental Plane of Earth into inhabiting a created body, when you consider that Clay Golems can only be created by a Lawful Good priest. It doesn't sound like a very Lawful Good thing to do, really. Secondly and more seriously, what exactly is the spirit doing when it's inside the Golem body? It can't be controlling it, because Golems are mindless. And yet the general description for Golems says that the spirit can rebel and go into a bloodcurdling frenzy - which suggests it does have control. Rather strange, and makes me wonder whether the designers really thought about it or just decided....oh hell, let's make it a spirit from the Elemental Plane of Earth.

You know how in Sonic, when they smash the eggman robots, little animals come out. They're powering the machines, but are in no way in control. Yeah, it's like that. They're trapping the spirits in a metaphysical hamster wheel, and using that fury to power the golems. There are probably more efficient ways of doing it, but wizards will be wizards. And as for priests. They don't even have a clue, they're just following their gods instructions. As we've seen, deities are held to a different set of standards when it comes to morals. A little fucking with humans, particularly in the right cause (those earth spirits might well be grues or something else that deserves to be trapped and tortured for eternity) impacts their karmic balance as much as squashing the odd bug now and then does for humans.

see

08-08-2008 01:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Remember, the inhabitants of the Elemental Plane of Earth include "animentials", which are direct analogs of terrestrial animals. The spirit bound in a clay golem might be the mental equivalent of an animal (a vicious, murdering animal, but an animal all the same). Lawful good characters generally don't have much trouble with, for example, the enslavement of horses.

David J Prokopetz

08-08-2008 01:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9213251)

Anyways, the berzerker golem thing is odd because the only golems that suffer from it are the Flesh and Clay golems. The two greater golems don't, and neither do any of the following golem types ever made.

I think it's more likely that there's no overarching reasoning behind it; flesh and clay golems are prone to flipping out because of Frankenstein's monster and Rabbi Loew's golem, respectively.

Crinos

08-08-2008 02:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9213503)

I think it's more likely that there's no overarching reasoning behind it; flesh and clay golems are prone to flipping out because of Frankenstein's monster and Rabbi Loew's golem, respectively.

Well I know that, that's where I first learned about Golems (Well read Crinos was well read even in grade school)

Course, I didn't equate Frankenstein's monster with Golems back then, another thing I have DnD to thank for.

noisms

08-08-2008 02:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9213500)

Remember, the inhabitants of the Elemental Plane of Earth include "animentials", which are direct analogs of terrestrial animals. The spirit bound in a clay golem might be the mental equivalent of an animal (a vicious, murdering animal, but an animal all the same). Lawful good characters generally don't have much trouble with, for example, the enslavement of horses.

Yeah, but horses get something out of the deal, don't they? i.e. Feed and security.

Animentials used for Golem-power don't get anything except an infinity of hurt, it seems.

Crinos

08-08-2008 02:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Actually I think I read somewhere that the spirits used to animate golems are roughly the elemental equivalent of plants.

Personally, In my setting I'd make the spirits that animate Golems Lawful spirits, who exist solely for the purpose of animating Golems.

Sleeper

08-08-2008 02:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9213500)

Remember, the inhabitants of the Elemental Plane of Earth include "animentials", which are direct analogs of terrestrial animals. The spirit bound in a clay golem might be the mental equivalent of an animal (a vicious, murdering animal, but an animal all the same). Lawful good characters generally don't have much trouble with, for example, the enslavement of horses.

That was always one of my biggest problems with the inner planes. Either silly random things with tentacles, or horses and turnips caked with mud. Except for the borrowed genies, there was a desperate lack of anything resembling originality or even the rudiments of sense. That and the terribly inconsistent subjective gravity. The City of Brass was evocative and cool, but it was set in the midst of a poorly defined morass.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9213251)

The only thing that ever really cheesed me about golems is their immunity to nearly all magic.

Agreed. Though I suspect it was originally just a mechanical shortcut that later editions tried to justify without much success.

Crinos

08-08-2008 03:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213702)

That was always one of my biggest problems with the inner planes. Either silly random things with tentacles, or horses and turnips caked with mud. Except for the borrowed genies, there was a desperate lack of anything resembling originality or even the rudiments of sense. That and the terribly inconsistent subjective gravity. The City of Brass was evocative and cool, but it was set in the midst of a poorly defined morass.

I dunno, the elemental planes have always held a little bit of charm for me. I didn't like em at first, but after the planescape appendix 3 they definitely became a favorite of mine.

Sleeper

08-08-2008 03:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9213716)

I dunno, the elemental planes have always held a little bit of charm for me. I didn't like em at first, but after the planescape appendix 3 they definitely became a favorite of mine.

I missed out on Planescape.

David J Prokopetz

08-08-2008 03:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213719)

I missed out on Planescape.

Among other things, Planescape formalises the way subjective gravity works, which might address one of your points. There's a mechanic for convincing yourself that up is down, with the expected consequences. :D

(It even makes the Quasielemental Plane of Salt make sense, which is no mean feat.)

noisms

08-08-2008 03:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213719)

I missed out on Planescape.

You should see if you can track down two of the books: Monstrous Compendium III and the Campaign Expansion: The Inner Planes one. The latter is written entirely in character, mostly by various kinds of mephits, and it has to rank as one of the best supplements ever released for D&D.

EDIT: I may do the Planescape MCs as a follow up to this thread, so keep your eyes peeled once, in a century's time, I get this finished.

Crinos

08-08-2008 03:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213719)
I missed out on Planescape.

I never got into Planescape proper, just got the monstrous compendiums for completist purposes.

But what I gleaned from the planes from them I really liked. Especially the paramental and quasimental planes (the fact they were never included in 3e is a travesty of justice).

Sleeper

08-08-2008 03:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9213751)
Among other things, Planescape formalises the way subjective gravity works, which might address one of your points. There's even a mechanic for convincing yourself that up is down, with the expected consequences. :D

(It even made the Quasielemental Plane of Salt make sense, which is no mean feat.)

Well, probably not entirely. The idea of zero g is a strange fit for fantasy (like psionics in many ways), and the attempt to mesh it with metaphorical will-driven magical thinking (the subjective nature) felt clumsy. In many ways, that was true for the entire design of the inner planes. It felt like the writers were trying to create an exotic science fiction world, except with fantasy. So there was a strange mix of modern concepts, relativism, and fantasy elements without any coherent logic holding the whole together. There were horses of rock, and water. But why? In an endless sea without any bottom, or an endless expanse of rock with a few tunnels where all the natives can pass through the stone like we can pass through the atmosphere, why does that form make any sense? There wasn't any attempt to create the mythic resonance in good fantasy either, with strange tectonic entities from our subconscious. It never quite came together. I once tried to justify the elemental plane of air to myself using the concept of the smoke ring (a torus of breathable air around a neutron star) from Niven's Integral Trees duology, which kind of worked (though it would be a trick to extrapolate to the other planes) but that's very different from what was presented.

I've been keeping an eye out for Planescape supplements, but since it's just a casual interest I have a hard time justifying spending the money the books go for these days (and reading more than a dozen pages in a pdf gets painful).

David J Prokopetz

08-08-2008 03:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213809)

Well, probably not entirely. The idea of zero g is a strange fit for fantasy (like psionics in many ways), and the attempt to mesh it with metaphorical will-driven magical thinking (the subjective nature) felt clumsy.

Again, Planescape explicitly addresses all of the stuff you've mentioned here. The way it handles the material may not be to your taste, but it doesn't just gloss over it as you suggest.

(Yes, it even tries to explain walruses made of fire and suchlike in metaphysical terms. It's quite entertaining. :))

Sleeper

08-08-2008 03:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9213815)

Again, Planescape explicitly addresses all of the stuff you've mentioned here. The way it handles the material may not be to your taste, but it doesn't just gloss over it as you suggest.

I didn't suggest that :p. I haven't read Planescape, so I'm talking about the pre- (and some post-) Planescape planar material.

The whole Planescape thing is very strange, from an outsider's perspective. There's the adoring love, but the bits and pieces that spill out in internet discussions and find their ways into post-Planescape books often seem absurdly, almost painfully silly. I can't figure out if it's just really strong writing, or if the point is the absurdity, and the material somehow surpasses the underlying elements and becomes a thing of zany beauty, like Gamma World at its peak, or if it's something else entirely.

Wakboth

08-08-2008 04:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9213503)

I think it's more likely that there's no overarching reasoning behind it; flesh and clay golems are prone to flipping out because of Frankenstein's monster and Rabbi Loew's golem, respectively.

Yah, that's fairly obvious IMO.

The whole magic immunity thing is a bit baffling, though. 3e improved on this by giving them essentially infinite Spell Resistance, so you could affect golems with the specific anti-golem spells (as appropriate for the type), and with a handful of others. This meant spellcasters weren't suddenly totally worthless against golems. (Of course, they then screwed things horribly up by giving us the Orb of Foo spells, but that's a rant for different thread and edition. ;))

kelvingreen

08-08-2008 05:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9213195)
There are a lot of weird ones in the MM, so I'm looking forward to these.

Yes, it's probably my favourite multiple-monster section, and I wish there'd been more (like the wonderful maggot golem!) included.

noisms

08-08-2008 05:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9214035)
Yes, it's probably my favourite multiple-monster section, and I wish there'd been more (like the wonderful maggot golem!) included.

If you like Golems and want another take on them, I recommend Iron Council by China Mieville. Like all his writing it's hit and miss, but it has some great Golem ideas. One of the main characters specialises in their creation, and does seem pretty weird and wonderful things - including animating a collection of dead bodies on a battlefield into one humanoid shape, and crafting a Golem out of moonlight.

sim_james

08-08-2008 09:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213859)
*The whole Planescape thing is very strange, from an outsider's perspective. There's the adoring love, but the bits and pieces that spill out in internet discussions and find their ways into post-Planescape books often seem absurdly, almost painfully silly. I can't figure out if it's just really strong writing, or if the point is the absurdity, and the materic somehow surpasses the underlying elements and becomes a thing of zany beauty, like Gamma World at its peak, or if it's something else entirely.*

Well, the fact that the writing was really strong certainly didn't hurt!

When you take things in context, Planescape is often surreal. Out of context, the surreal becomes absurd.

For example, a dimension of "really boring mud that drains colour out of everything" might seem a bit silly, but the Grey Waste was no joke.

noisms

08-08-2008 09:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9213859)

The whole Planescape thing is very strange, from an outsider's perspective. There's the adoring love, but the bits and pieces that spill out in internet discussions and find their ways into post-Planescape books often seem absurdly, almost painfully silly. I can't figure out if it's just really strong writing, or if the point is the absurdity, and the material somehow surpasses the underlying elements and becomes a thing of zany beauty, like Gamma World at its peak, or if it's something else entirely.

A mixture of great writing, great art, and great production values keep it from sliding into zaniness or absurdity. It just strikes the right balance between not taking itself too seriously, and not turning into a joke.

kelvingreen

08-08-2008 09:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9214072)

If you like Golems and want another take on them, I recommend Iron Council by China Mieville. Like all his writing it's hit and miss, but it has some great Golem ideas. One of the main characters specialises in their creation, and does seem pretty weird and wonderful things - including animating a collection of dead bodies on a battlefield into one humanoid shape, and crafting a Golem out of moonlight.

Yeah, it's my least favourite of his books so far, but it does at least maintain the high Good Idea Quotient of all his novels.

noisms

08-08-2008 10:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9214570)

Yeah, it's my least favourite of his books so far, but it does at least maintain the high Good Idea Quotient of all his novels.

Yeah. This is getting off topic but I wish the man would stop it with the political screeds and just write stories. The Scar was by far his best, because it was just a good adventure tale above all else.

Inyssius

08-08-2008 11:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9213055)

There's a healthy smattering of pseudo-setting bits scattered through the general description - those odd and mysterious hints that crop up throughout the MM along the lines of "nobody knows the reason why..." and "some have written..." and "it is thought that..." It's interesting that the designers chose to keep such lore even from the games lorekeepers - the DMs. Presumably it was to spur creativity, although the cynical part of me thinks it was just because the designers themselves couldn't be bothered to fully set out the truth of things.

Skipping back a ways... I despise this stuff. I'm cool with keeping things ambiguous, but these damned ubiquitous sages should either be mentioned in more detail or left out entirely.

It seems like this "some have written" and "sages suggest" nonsense could only be useful in-game if your players actually find the books in question or track down one of those sages. That's anawesome plot point, but then there has to be something interesting or useful in those writings or those suggestions. There never is, and that irritates the hell out of me. If the writers could keep all of these notes out of the actual monster entry (just say "they might live in swamps," for god's sake!) and then have an actual section detailing the views of individual oddball sages and competing wizard-college schools of thought and maybe-inaccurate ancient bestiaries... well, that would be awesome.

Crinos

08-09-2008 12:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

While we're on the subject of Planescape, I'd like to suggest Li Po's hermitage, a website by a christian gamer describing his own interpretation of the outer and inner planes, along with some role playing and gaming hints.

I really enjoy this site, and back in the days of 2e before PDF books and Paypal, this was the closest thing to a real manual of the planes I had.

Thranguy

08-09-2008 01:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9213195)

I used to hate the Goblin illo, until I hit on the idea that it was actually drawn by a Goblin master artiste.

Also, Golems are way cool, but I can't recall ever encountering one in a game. That's a side effect of playing in mostly low-level games, I suppose. There are a lot of weird ones in the MM, so I'm looking forward to these.

That's why the Carytid Column was my favorite monster out of the original Monster Manual 2. Golems you could throw at low-level parties! Genius!

Sleeper

08-09-2008 03:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 9215543)

That's why the Carytid Column was my favorite monster out of the original Monster Manual 2. Golems you could throw at low-level parties! Genius!

Fiend Folio not MM2 :). To expand on something that just came up in (unreason)'s sister thread, caryatid columns are mentioned in Ed Greenwood's Fiend Folio rant in issue #55. He thinks the name "caryatid column" is terribly uneuphonic (along with the symbiotic jelly and the atrocious protien polymorph). From the context, it's not clear if he's aware the name is actually a reference to an element of Greek architecture. In any case I don't agree. It's trippingly alliterative.

Sleeper

08-09-2008 04:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Continuing with a caryatid column riff: The party enters a forgotten temple, supported by two series of pillars. Each is carved in the shape of a woman, holding a sword at rest. Some weapons are held quillon up, with the tip resting on the ground. Others lay across shoulders, or are cradled in arms. As the party enters there is a grinding sound followed by a swirl of dust, as one of the granite women steps forward off her plinth. She strikes a martial stance, and once again becomes immobile.

If the party continues, there is a whirl of blood and footwork before she is shattered into rubble. Immediately, her sister from the opposing row of columns steps forward, and stikes a new pose. The new combatant freezes in position, and in the stillness before the inevitable melee, a slight creak and groan can be heard from the distant ceiling.

As the sisterhood of caratid columns are defeated one by one, dust continues to shake from the arched vault until the PCs start to cough and choke until a virtual waterfall. The roof starts to groan, then moan, creak, and at times almost seems to whimper. The remaining pillars start to shake and shift as each new caryatid steps forth. Scattered clatters are heard as rocks drop and skitter across the floor, and these sounds turn into thumps and thuds.

If the party heedlessly presses forward, there is a great billow of dust as the last caryatid column steps forth. The floor heaves, and the world becomes one roar so great and deep that it seems like howl of white noise is rising from the character's bones. The last thing they see is a huge block shattering the impassive visage of the last of the amazonian columns, before it all goes dark. The structural supports are gone, and the entire edifice has tumbled down on top of the foolish burglars.

noisms

08-09-2008 09:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 9214776)

If the writers could keep all of these notes out of the actual monster entry (just say "they might live in swamps," for god's sake!) and then have an actual section detailing the views of individual oddball sages and competing wizard-college schools of thought and maybe-inaccurate ancient bestiaries... well, that would be awesome.

That would be nice. I've said it before, but I've always wanted a bestiary written in situ, as it were - with the entries compilations of accounts by sages, eyewitnesses and adventurers. There would be no stats - the DM would have to make up their own based on the descriptions - and some of the accounts for the same monster would be conflicting, so that you could never be sure what exactly that Umber Hulk was going to do next...

6inTruder

08-09-2008 10:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217508)

That would be nice. I've said it before, but I've always wanted a bestiary written in situ, as it were - with the entries compilations of accounts by sages, eyewitnesses and adventurers. There would be no stats - the DM would have to make up their own based on the descriptions - and some of the accounts for the same monster would be conflicting, so that you could never be sure what exactly that Umber Hulk was going to do next...

So..... Almost exactly the opposite of the 4ed MM?

noisms

08-09-2008 10:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9217580)

So..... Almost exactly the opposite of the 4ed MM?

Maybe you could call it the Anti-4ed-MM.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Golem, Greater

Greater Golem, Stone Golem

This is the one I always imagine when I think of Golems, although technically I suppose the Clay Golem is the real archetypal one. (I do have to say, though, that I find it odd there is no Wood Golem in D&D. One of my earliest memories of getting into the fantasy genre was when I was about 10 or so years old and reading one of the Sorcery! Fighting Fantasy gamebooks, which had a particularly vivid scene of an evil enchantress animating a Wood Golem to attack the reader.) Anyway, I like the vaguely Egyptian tone the artwork has, which means you can imagine the thing inhabiting some sort of underground temple to the dark god, Set.

There's not much more to Stone Golems (or indeed any Golems) than just hitting stuff, but there is a relatively lengthy expounding on the effects of various stone-shaping magics. The upshot is that rock to mud slows the Golem down, mud to rock heals it, and flesh to stone makes it vulnerable to ordinary weapons. (Shome mishtake, shurely? Stone to flesh would make more sense for that, no?)

Greater Golem, Iron Golem

A big, metal humanoid which will kill you. A bit like the Terminator, I suppose. Points of interest:

- They sometimes have short swords, which are occasionally magical... (cue sinister DM laugh).
- Electrical damage slows them, but by contrast magical fire heals them - which I suppose is because magical fire is involved in their creation.
- They are subject to Rust Monster attacks, although it's difficult to imagine how a DM could get away with putting a Rust Monster in close enough proximity to an Iron Golem to be useful, without having it seem like a sop to the players. ("Okay, so there's an Iron Golem coming to beat you up. I know you all hate me now. But look what's in the next room - a Rust Monster! What a coincidence!")
- Bizarrely, Iron Golems automatically breathe a cloud of poisonous gas every 7 rounds ("beginning on either the first or second round of combat"[?]); it doesn't say why they do this, or what kind of poison it is. It's just...poisonous gas. I'm interpreting that to mean it's the save or die kind of poisonous gas. Because it just wouldn't be any fun otherwise.

David J Prokopetz

08-09-2008 11:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217653)

- Bizarrely, Iron Golems automatically breathe a cloud of poisonous gas every 7 rounds ("beginning on either the first or second round of combat"[?]); it doesn't say why they do this, or what kind of poison it is. It's just...poisonous gas. I'm interpreting that to mean it's the save or die kind of poisonous gas. Because it just wouldn't be any fun otherwise.

I know that there's a specific precedent for the poison gas thing, but for the life of me I can't recall the context - only that I read it at some point.

Crinos

08-09-2008 11:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Yeah, I noticed too that there was never an official wood golem, although many 3rd party wood golems sprung up during 3rd edition.

As for the poisonous gas, I think its supposed to be cloudkill (since that's one of the spells used to make them), but don't quote me. I always imagined that the Golem would breath it out, or release it as some sort of exhaust like they were toxic fumes.

BTW, aren't stone golems capable of casting slow on people? I've never been able to explain how to work that thematically.

EDIT: As for the Rust Monster thing, it actually makes for an interesting plot hook: Low level PC's need to get into a dungeon/through a pass but the front guards are Iron Golems. Since the PC's would be slaughtered in a fair fight, they have to hunt down and capture some rust monsters in the surrounding wastelands, train them, then send them against the Iron Golems so they can continue.

JasonK

08-09-2008 11:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9213761)

EDIT: I may do the Planescape MCs as a follow up to this thread, so keep your eyes peeled once, in a century's time, I get this finished.

I would vote for YES! :D

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9216284)

Continuing with a caryatid column riff:

-snip-

The structural supports are gone, and the entire edifice has tumbled down on top of the foolish burglars.

Yeah, I'm stealing the hell out of that idea. :)

That said, re: golems in general, they just never seemed worth it to me. I mean, sure they're tough, but they are not either easy or cheap for a wizard/priest to make, and all it takes is one solid group of adventurers to come by... Better off with the undead, in my opinion. Besides - immune to magic? What's a wizard going to do when they go crazy on him, then?

noisms

08-09-2008 11:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9217717)

That said, re: golems in general, they just never seemed worth it to me. I mean, sure they're tough, but they are not either easy or cheap for a wizard/priest to make, and all it takes is one solid group of adventurers to come by... Bette off with the undead, in my opinion. Besides - immune to magic? What's a wizard going to do when they go crazy on him, then?

If literature and films have taught me anything, it's that evil archmages and priests are curiously incapable of thinking logically about these things...

Crinos

08-09-2008 11:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217730)

If literature and films have taught me anything, it's that evil archmages and priests are curiously incapable of thinking logically about these things...

except only two types of golems can go berserk, and one of them can only be made by GOOD clerics.

Course, Clay Golems have a built in plot hook: Clay Golem belonging to a local Good Cleric has gone apeshit, needs to be put down, enter the PC's to track it down before it can hurt anyone.

(un)reason

08-09-2008 11:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217653)

[]They are subject to Rust Monster attacks, although it's difficult to imagine how a DM could get away with putting a Rust Monster in close enough proximity to an Iron Golem to be useful, without having it seem like a sop to the players. ("Okay, so there's an Iron Golem coming to beat you up. I know you all hate me now. But look what's in the next room - a Rust Monster! What a coincidence!")*

Just remember how many dungeons with medusae or gorgons also had scrolls of stone to flesh nearby. (I'm sure its well over 50% in dozens of different modules.) It's really rather amusing to see just how few designers are willing to be truly random and mean with their encounters.

Crinos

08-09-2008 11:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9217737)

Just remember how many dungeons with medusae or gorgons also had scrolls of stone to flesh nearby. (I'm sure its well over 50% in dozens of different modules.) It's really rather amusing to see just how few designers are willing to be truly random and mean with their encounters.

Well I think that's just a safety precaution on behalf of the dungeon builders. I mean when you're handling monsters that can turn you to stone you have to be prepared for some sort of mishap.

DMH

08-09-2008 11:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Does anyone have a link or quote about how the clay golem's insane damage (ie it can only be healed by a 17th level cleric) is because the creator was drunk at the time of writing?

noisms

08-09-2008 11:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9217754)

Does anyone have a link or quote about how the clay golem's insane damage (ie it can only be healed by a 17th level cleric) is because the creator was drunk at the time of writing?

Yeah, how weird is that? Anyway, I'll come to it in the next entry.

Sleeper

08-09-2008 01:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217653)

A big, metal humanoid which will kill you. A bit like the Terminator, I suppose.

[snip]

- Electrical damage slows them, but by contrast magical fire heals them - which I suppose is because magical fire is involved in their creation.

I originally thought of iron golems as a big lump of cast iron, but the hollow armored shell (with an echoing clang when you hit it) perhaps with steampunk pipes and bellows works better. D&D golems are just weird. Clear mythological antecedents, stirred up with all kinds of random strangeness. The fire thing is at least a cool visual -- in the inferno of a fireball, the golem beats against its white-hot chest, reshaping the metal twisted by blows and nicked by swords back into its original form. Though they're still not as weird as making the gorgon into a steel-plated bull that turns you stone when it coughs.

Crinos

08-09-2008 01:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218026)

Though they're still not as weird as making the gorgon into a steel-plated bull that turns you stone when it coughs.

Well, that's what a gorgon was according to some myths (I think middle eastern).

Basically they had too vastly different monsters with the same name, so they named the snake women Gorgons Medusa and kept the Bulls Gorgons.

Sleeper

08-09-2008 01:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9218054)

Well, that's what a gorgon was according to some myths (I think middle eastern).

Basically they had too vastly different monsters with the same name, so they named the snake women Gorgons Medusa and kept the Bulls Gorgons.

I hadn't heard that. The older classical versions often have animal features attributed (like many of the composite monsters, such as unicorns being described as having the feet of elephants and beard of a goat or such) like tusks and tails, but I never heard of an armored bull version. The closest I could find with a quick search is an ancient coin, that has a bull on one side and the face of a gorgon on the other:

<http://www.snible.org/coins/parion.html>

Crinos

08-09-2008 02:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218100)

I hadn't heard that. The older classical versions often have animal features attributed (like many of the composite monsters, such as unicorns being described as having the feet of elephants and beard of a goat or such) like tusks and tails, but I never heard of an armored bull version. The closest I could find with a quick search is an ancient coin, that has a bull on one side and the face of a gorgon on the other:

<http://www.snible.org/coins/parion.html>

Wasn't really a Metal Bull, it was more like a scaly Buffalo with poisonous breath.

I read about it in a Halloween issue of Ranger Rick that featured all sorts of crazy creepy animals and had an article on mythical creatures. (It was an older issue, with a picture of a Mandrill on the front. I had it in one of my classrooms when I was a kid and read the hell out of it when I was a kid.

Kakita Kojiro

08-09-2008 02:34 PM

EEG lifted the metallic, bullish gorgon from a medieval bestiary -- see here for a post commenting on that. (I actually like the commentor's take better.)

The catoblepas is the water-buffalo-like critter with the poisonous breath. Also from medieval bestiaries. Alas, that we never got a D&D bonnacon.

Crinos

08-09-2008 02:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9218221)

EEG lifted the metallic, bullish gorgon from a medieval bestiary -- see here for a post commenting on that. (I actually like the commentor's take better.)

The catoblepas is the water-buffalo-like critter with the poisonous breath. Also from medieval bestiaries. Alas, that we never got a D&D bonnacon.

Think you may be right, wish I could find that issue of Ranger Rick so I could look it up. But its super old and there aren't any sites with ranger rick cover galleries or anything.

Anaxamander

08-09-2008 02:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217653)

They are subject to Rust Monster attacks, although it's difficult to imagine how a DM could get away with putting a Rust Monster in close enough proximity to an Iron Golem to be useful, without having it seem like a sop to the players. ("Okay, so there's an Iron Golem coming to beat you up. I know you all hate me now. But look what's in the next room - a Rust Monster! What a coincidence!")

But there is nothing stopping a player from rounding up some rust monsters and putting them in wooden cages to throw at the iron golems guarding the entrance to the evil temple. It might come up in a battle too, where one side has animated iron golems and the other has trained rust monsters to counter them. (Also why aren't rust monsters used on the battlefield more often?)

Sleeper

08-09-2008 03:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9218221)

EEG lifted the metallic, bullish gorgon from a medieval bestiary -- see here for a post commenting on that. (I actually like the commentor's take better.)

The catoblepas is the water-buffalo-like critter with the poisonous breath. Also from medieval bestiaries. Alas, that we never got a D&D bonnacon.

Nor the yale (oxen who fence with their horns :)).

Thanks for the link. The specific medieval bestiary isn't mentioned, and another poster suggests that the gorgon was actually based on the fire-breathing bulls Jason had to harness to sow the dragon's teeth, and Gygax agrees in an elliptical fashion to that as well. I'd be interested to know the original source.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Anaxamander (Post 9218246)

But there is nothing stopping a player from rounding up some rust monsters and putting them in wooden cages to throw at the iron golems guarding the entrance to the evil temple. It might come up in a battle too, where one side has animated iron golems and the other has trained rust monsters to counter them. (Also why aren't rust monsters used on the battlefield more often?)

Polymorph other the rust monsters into a harmless portable form, and then deploy along with a dispel magic. They're a never-leave-home-without-them item, along with green slime in ceramic flasks, and large boulders shrunk down with the item spell.

Anaxamander

08-09-2008 03:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218302)

Polymorph other the rust monsters into a harmless portable form, and then deploy along with a dispel magic. They'r a never-leave-home-without-them item, along with green slime in ceramic flasks, and large boulders shrunk down with the item spell.

Those are some great tricks. Still, herding rust monsters might happen at very low levels against iron golems (as a way to get in the front door when the DM explicitly put them there to make you go in the back door. In such a situation you should never go in the back door; the DM is expecting that. Consider tunnelling in from below if all else fails.).

Sleeper

08-09-2008 03:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Anaxamander (Post 9218311)

Those are some great tricks. Still, herding rust monsters might happen at very low levels against iron golems (as a way to get in the front door when the DM explicitly put them there to make you go in the back door. In such a situation you should never go in the back door; the DM is expecting that. Consider tunnelling in from below if all else fails.).

I always liked tossing in a couple monsters way beyond the PCs ability to handle through standard methods (sword and spell and straight-up combat). The important things are to make it very clear the monster is totally out of their league, to make sure there's an obvious escape route, and to make them of incidental importance. Iron golems are perfect for that. Simple-mindedly constrained by the commands of their long-gone creator, they are easy to avoid (just leave the circumscribed area), and with some creativity that's just one of many ways a party could come up with to bypass or even destroy the automaton.

Crinos

08-09-2008 03:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218335)

I always liked tossing in a couple monsters way beyond the PCs ability to handle through standard methods (sword and spell and straight-up combat). The important things are to make it very clear the monster is totally out of their league, to make sure there's an obvious escape route, and to make them of incidental importance. Iron golems are perfect for that. Simple-mindedly constrained by the commands of their long-gone creator, they are easy to avoid (just leave the circumscribed area), and with some creativity that's just one of many ways a party could come up with to bypass or even destroy the automaton.

That's actually a very good idea.

If I ever live my dream of running a Fantasy MnM campaign, I will certainly take your advice.

demiurge1138

08-09-2008 03:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217508)

That would be nice. I've said it before, but I've always wanted a bestiary written in situ, as it were - with the entries compilations of accounts by sages, eyewitnesses and adventurers. There would be no stats - the DM would have to make up their own based on the descriptions - and some of the accounts for the same monster would be conflicting, so that you could never be sure what exactly that Umber Hulk was going to do next...

Check out the Monsternomicon for Iron Kingdoms. It's still got stats, but is full of quotes and anecdotes from its (NPC) author, and various rumors, adventure hooks, and usable body parts. The d20 stats are sort of wonky, but the flavor is exquisite.

noisms

08-09-2008 03:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218335)

I always liked tossing in a couple monsters way beyond the PCs ability to handle through standard methods (sword and spell and straight-up combat). The important things are to make it very clear the monster is totally out of their league, to make sure there's an obvious escape route, and to make them of incidental importance. Iron golems are perfect for that. Simple-mindedly constrained by the commands of their long-gone creator, they are easy to avoid (just leave the circumscribed area), and with some creativity that's just one of many ways a party could come up wit to bypass or even destroy the automaton.

I often do that too. Elementals are another good example - in my PBEM game the party recently had to flee their enemy's den because of a summoned Earth Elemental, but it was too slow to catch up with them. It could easily have squished them and they knew it, but it wasn't so unfairly overpowered that it could prevent them from escaping.

David J Prokopetz

08-09-2008 04:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218335)

I always liked tossing in a couple monsters way beyond the PCs ability to handle through standard methods (sword and spell and straight-up combat). The important things are to make it very clear the monster is totally out of their league, to make sure there's an obvious escape route, and to make them of incidental importance. Iron golems are perfect for that. Simple-mindedly constrained by the commands of their long-gone creator, they are easy to avoid (just leave the circumscribed area), and with some creativity that's just one of many ways a party could come up wit to bypass or even destroy the automaton.

Here we see the origin of those hidden optional bosses in console RPGs that are orders of magnitude tougher than the "real" big bad of the scenario they inhabit, yet inexplicably never have any effect on the broader gameworld if simply left alone.

glass

08-09-2008 07:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218026)

Clear mythological antecedents, stirred up with all kinds of random strangeness.

IMO, that described a most of the coolest things in D&D.

glass.

kelvingreen

08-09-2008 08:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9217653)

(I do have to say, though, that I find it odd there is no Wood Golem in D&D. One of my earliest memories of getting into the fantasy genre was when I was about 10 or so years old and reading one of the Sorcery! Fighting Fantasy gamebooks, which had a particularly vivid scene of an evil enchantress animating a Wood Golem to attack the reader.)

I swear that I remember some monster book featuring wood golems and saying that they're actually animated furniture. I thought it was during 2e, but it may have been Out of the Pit now that I think of it.

noisms

08-09-2008 09:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9218743)

I swear that I remember some monster book featuring wood golems and saying that they're actually animated furniture. I thought it was during 2e, but it may have been Out of the Pit now that I think of it.

It may well have been. Actually now that you mention it I think said evil enchantress used a table to make her wood golem...

Sleeper

08-09-2008 09:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 9218701)

IMO, that described a most of the coolest things in D&D.

Yep. That, and random crap that only makes sense if dungeons developed their own ecology.

kelvingreen

08-09-2008 10:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9218849)

It may well have been. Actually now that you mention it I think said evil enchantress used a table to make her wood golem...

Maybe I'll do an Out of the Pit cover-to-cover. ;)

DMH

08-09-2008 10:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Not exactly a wood golem, there was a paper golem from Ravenloft (Children of the Night: Created). It was a treant cut down to make magical paper- scrolls and spellbooks. I forgot how it animated, but now it trying to regain all of its parts. The 3rd edition version in the MM IV or V is suped up but flavor wise a pale imitation.

Crinos

08-09-2008 10:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9218913)

Not exactly a wood golem, there was a paper golem from Ravenloft (Children of the Night: Created). It was a treant cut down to make magical paper- scrolls and spellbooks. I forgot how it animated, but now it trying to regain all of its parts. The 3rd edition version in the MM IV or V is suped up but flavor wise a pale imitation.

I once came up with a similar creature for an online fan based web supplement called a Scroll Golem (scrolem?), which was basically a bunch of scrolls over a wooden frame, that was intelligent and could cast the spells off the scrolls it was made with (although if it exhausted all the spells on the scroll, it would lose its magic and die).

I actually made 3 monsters for that supplement: The other two being a 3e update of a 2e monster I made called the Adros (a type of Devil who specialized in gluttony and fattening people up) and the grubblers (normally inoffensive creatures that caused bad luck).

Ratoslov

08-09-2008 11:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The golem is probably the single easiest monster in D&D to think up a new variant.

Think of a material. For extra credit, think of a kind of statuary.

Add a thematic special attack.

Come up with a reason for a wizard to make a animate pile of parmesan cheese.

There you go! You've got a new golem variant.

Sleeper

08-09-2008 11:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9219017)

Think of a material. For extra credit, think of a kind of statuary.

Add a thematic special attack.

Come up with a reason for a wizard to make a animate pile of parmesan cheese.

Appearance: Long and stringy. Strips peel away and flail at the party. The ends are bubbling globs of super-heated cheese.

Special attack: Burns the top of your mouth. Communication is difficult. For the Real Roleplaying Experience, it is recommended that the DM keep a bag of cotton balls by the table. If the player wants to communicate with other players, fill mouth and (try to) chat away.

Ta-da! Now somebody can do the oregano golem :)

Crinos

08-09-2008 11:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9219017)

The golem is probably the single easiest monster in D&D to think up a new variant.

Think of a material. For extra credit, think of a kind of statuary.

Add a thematic special attack.

Come up with a reason for a wizard to make a animate pile of parmesan cheese.

There you go! You've got a new golem variant.

Reminds me of that free adventure they had that featured a Calzone Golem.

Shame that never made it into a monstrous manual.

kelvingreen

08-09-2008 11:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9219027)

Ta-da! Now somebody can do the oregano golem :)

It's more likely to be a Shambling Oregano, surely? ;)

Ratoslov

08-09-2008 11:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9219045)
Reminds me of that free adventure they had that featured a Calzone Golem.

Every time we run that adventure, at least one PC ends up dying to the Calzone Golem. It's not because it's overpowered, it's just dumb luck.

Sleeper

08-09-2008 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9219055)
It's more likely to be a Shambling Oregano, surely? ;)

Parmesan isn't exactly a traditional mineral, either :)

Typing is a very common trick to add variety to traditional monsters in D&D. Dragons come in colors, giants are differentiated by their elemental association, golems are defined by their composite substance, and chimerae and sphinxes had different heads while hydras lost count. What other mythological beasts could be expanded by applying an easily-expandable type? Griffons with exotic hindquarters? Harpies with patterned plumage? Rowan, ash, and oak treants?

David J Prokopetz

08-10-2008 12:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9219082)
What other mythological beasts could be expanded by applying an easily-expandable type?

Anything based on a dog or possessed of dog-like bits can be "typed" by fiddling with the precise breed of dog involved, off the top of my head. I've seen several examples of this, though nothing that's specific to D&D springs readily to mind.

(I did see a pretty convincing interpretation of a Hell Poodle in a not-entirely-serious fan supplement, tho'.)

Sleeper

08-10-2008 01:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9219150)

Anything based on a dog or possessed of dog-like bits can be "typed" by fiddling with the precise breed of dog involved, off the top of my head. I've seen several examples of this, though nothing that's specific to D&D springs readily to mind.

(I did see a pretty convincing interpretation of a Hell Poodle in a not-entirely-serious fan supplement, tho'.)

In that vein, there are also a ton of giant wolves and hounds in various mythologies, though the D&D variants have disorderly types. In the spirit of the wolves that chase eat the sun and the moon, there might be great hounds of other stellar phenomena: comets, falling stars, the firmament, auroras, etc; and wolves of the seasons, adding giant summer, autumn, spring, solstice, and equinox wolves to the traditional winter variety.

6inTruder

08-10-2008 04:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Wood Golems were in the Dark Sun MC.

Crinos

08-10-2008 05:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9219799)

Wood Golems were in the Dark Sun MC.

Huh. I never got the Dark Sun MC's, so i guess its an easy one to miss.

Though it kind of figures they'd be from the one place where wood is so friggin scare that having enough to make a golem would bankrupt an adventuring party.

6inTruder

08-10-2008 05:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ooh! Ooh! Ooh! (Mr. Kotter!)

I had an odd notion about Gnolls the other day: What if Flinds are acctually the females of the species? Everyone tend to assume they're males cause... Well... They got those freaky hyena cilts and fux balls.

The idea doesn't really go much beyond that twist, but I thought it could be an interesting twist.

Crinos

08-10-2008 05:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9219833)
Ooh! Ooh! Ooh! (Mr. Kotter!)

I had an odd notion about Gnolls the other day: What if Flinds are acctually the females of the species? Everyone tend to assume they're males cause... Well... They got those freaky hyena ciltis and fux balls.

The idea doesn't really go much beyond that twist, but I thought it could be an interesting twist.

You know, in 2e they didn't have female Minotaurs at all, They were produced by curses or by raping human women. But 3e retconned it so Minotaur males and females looked virtually identical.

I suppose the same could be true of 2e gnolls.

6inTruder

08-10-2008 05:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9219845)

You know, in 2e they didn't have female Minotaurs at all, They were produced by curses or by raping human women. But 3e retconned it so Minotaur males and females looked virtually identical.

I suppose the same could be true of 2e gnolls.

I'd always assumed it was. But then I decided I wanted Gnolls in the 4ed dungeon I'm working on (Assult on the Mumpires Tomb!) and so lacking in a 4edMM I picked some animal books up at the library (cause it's also gonna have giant bugs and a giant anenome) and reading about hyenas got me thinking about making Gnolls a little more... Hyena-like. So I thought that maybe, as female hyenas are larger than the males and badder D&D humanoids are larger than the less bad, maybe Flinds being an inversion of the basic D&D 'bigger is badder' would also invert the female Gnolls being bigger. So Flinds are the leaders because they are female. But no one really notices cause really who wants to look THAT closely at Gnoll-bits? Other than the ubiquitous "sages"?

Crinos

08-10-2008 05:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9219859)

I'd always assumed it was. But then I decided I wanted Gnolls in the 4ed dungeon I'm working on (Assult on the Mumpires Tomb!) and so lacking in a 4edMM I picked some animal books up at the library (cause it's also gonna have giant bugs and a giant anemone) and reading about hyenas got me thinking about making Gnolls a little more... Hyena-like. So I thought that maybe, as female hyenas are larger than the males and badder D&D humanoids are larger than the less bad, maybe Flinds being an inversion of the basic D&D 'bigger is badder' would also invert the female Gnolls being bigger. So Flinds are the leaders because they are female. But no one really notices cause really who wants to look THAT closely at Gnoll-bits? Other than the ubiquitous "sages"?

I actually read on a message board somewhere that female Hyena's have so much testosterone that their genitals look like the males, making sex hilarious and childbirth very VERY painful.

JRM

08-10-2008 06:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9218302)

Polymorph other the rust monsters into a harmless portable form, and then deploy along with a dispel magic. They'r a never-leave-home-without-them item, along with green slime in ceramic flasks, and large boulders shrunk down with the item spell.

As soon as you twig the rust monster vs iron golem trick it makes them easy for a prepared party to get rid of them. As soon as your magic-user hits 7th level they can use Polymorph Other to transform a cockroach or mouse into a rust monster, no need to wait until 16th level and Polymorph Other.

As for flasks of green slime, I'd never have my PC carry something like that unless I was really desperate or was absolutely sure it couldn't break. I was careful enough with flasks of flaming oil, and at least with those you had to contact naked flame and break them to suffer damage. Green slime flasks though, that's just asking for trouble. I'd prefer only to use it if it was made safe with a Polymorph Other spell or the like.

Hmm that reminds me of another trick, use Polymorph Other to turn Green Slime or Rot Grubs into arrows, shoot them into your foe, Dispel Magic.

6inTruder

08-10-2008 07:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9219917)

I actually read on a message board somewhere that female Hyena's have so much testosterone that their genitals look like the males, making sex hilarious and childbirth very VERY painful.

Pretty much. But I got it out of a book on African animals. With pictures.

glass

08-10-2008 07:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9219150)

Anything based on a dog or possessed of dog-like bits can be "typed" by fiddling with the precise breed of dog involved, off the top of my head. I've seen several examples of this, though nothing that's specific to D&D springs readily to mind.

The dog creatures from Savage Coast (Lupins? something like that) were dog humanoids with a bunch of different breeds, IIRC.

glass.

JRM

08-10-2008 07:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9218221)

The catoblepas is the water-buffalo-like critter with the poisonous breath. Also from medieval bestiaries. Alas, that we never got a D&D bonnacon.

There are AD&D stats for the Bonnacon in the Fiend Factory article of an old issue of White Dwarf magazine (#24, April-May 1981). If I recall correctly, there was also a winged variant of the monster that used its "expulsion" to give it rocket-assisted flight.

Alas, they never achieved official status by making it into the original Fiend Folio, which included lots of Fiend Factory monsters, possibly because of time constraints (White Dwarf #24 came out about the same time as Fiend Folio), or maybe someone just thought killer-fart cattle were just too vulgar for TSR.

JRM

08-10-2008 07:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9219845)

But 3e retconned it so Minotaur males and females looked virtually identical.

That's absurd, they should look udderly different.:p

The Last Conformist

08-10-2008 07:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9219917)

I actually read on a message board somewhere that female Hyena's have so much testosterone that their genitals look like the males, making sex hilarious and childbirth very VERY painful.

Not merely painful - the death rates for both mothers and cubs are horrendous.

This is the spotted hyena, BTW, which is the species you usually hear about. In the other hyena species (brown, striped, and aardwolf), the females don't have as much testosterone, and consequently have more normal genitals (and lower rates of death in childbirth), and are smaller and less aggressive than the males.

Kakita Kojiro

08-10-2008 09:49 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9220120)

There are AD&D stats for the Bonnacon in the Fiend Factory article of an old issue of White Dwarf magazine (#24, April-May 1981). If I recall correctly, there was also a winged variant of the monster that used its "expulsion" to give it rocket-assisted flight.

rocket-assist bonnacon flight? holy, uh, crud. :eek:

noisms

08-10-2008 11:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Golem, Lesser

Flesh Golem

Frankenstein's monster, basically - a shambling thing made of stitched together corpses and which can emit "a hoarse roar of sorts". (Not altogether like the real Frankenstein's monster, then, who was a pretty loquacious chap.) It strikes me that you could quite easily create a sort of D&D version of 'The Modern Prometheus' by putting in a Flesh Golem gone berserk. Just if you wanted to get all literary-pseud with your orc-slaying. The chance of this happening is reasonably high - 1% cumulative chance per round of combat.

Clay Golem

The original Golem of Jewish myth, though bizarrely rendered here as a Terracotta figurine. (Which kind of works, actually, though the textual description is nothing like the picture - setting it out as what seems almost like a giant clay gorilla.)

As with the Stone and Iron Golems, there's a fair amount of detail about rather obscure spells and their effects, including move earth and earthquake. Spells like rock to mud don't apparently work, though.

This entry is notable for perhaps the strangest example of exception-based design in the whole volume - indeed, in all of D&D: "Damage done by the golem can only be cured by a heal spell from a priest of 17th level or greater." Utterly weird. I don't know if there's some precedent for that in the Rabbi Loew story.

(I've just realised something. The character in China Mieville's Iron Council who manipulates golems is called... Judah Low. I can't believe I didn't make the connection before now.)

Naxuul

08-10-2008 11:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9218913)

Not exactly a wood golem, there was a paper golem from Ravenloft (Children of the Night: Created). It was a treant cut down to make magical paper- scrolls and spellbooks. I forgot how it animated, but now it trying to regain all of its parts. The 3rd edition version in the MM IV or V is suped up but flavor wise a pale imitation.

It was actually a pretty cool creature. Azenwrath, the evil wood golem in question, was a evil Treant killed and rendered down into dozens of magical items by a enterprising wizard. But there was a problem: the magic that was incscribed in all the scrolls, staves, idols and wands returned Azenwrath's consciousness from the dead. So after a fireball scroll 'accidently' went off and killed the wizard all the parts of Azenwrath in the workshop came together to form a create with bones made from staves, muscles made from wands and idols and skin made from scrolls. He then proceeded to go on a killing spree looking for the rest of his body.

The moral of the story: If you render a monster down into magical items, make sure it's dead first.;

-Naxuul

Crinos

08-10-2008 12:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Don't forget that Clay Golems can haste themselves.

I remember hearing in an X files episode with a Golem, the wounds left by the Golem were filled with clay from its body, which would prevent the wounds from closing and would grow back if attempts were made to scrape it out. I know X files came out after this, but its as good an explanation as any.

noisms

08-10-2008 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9220788)

Don't forget that Clay Golems can haste themselves.

I remember hearing in an X files episode with a Golem, the wounds left by the Golem were filled with clay from its body, which would prevent the wounds from closing and would grow back if attempts were made to scrape it out. I know X files came out after this, but its as good an explanation as any.

Hmm. Makes sense. Kind of.

Cognitive Dissident

08-10-2008 05:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9219017)

Come up with a reason for a wizard to make a animate pile of parmesan cheese.

There you go! You've got a new golem variant.

Because that squad of Bolognese Golems was just a little bit bland on its own.

Cognitive Dissident

08-10-2008 05:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9219845)

You know, in 2e they didn't have female Minotaurs at all, They were produced by curses or by raping human women. But 3e retconned it so Minotaur males and females looked virtually identical.

Even in Dragonlance? Because that would have made the existence of the entire Minotaur culture...problematic.

demiurge1138

08-10-2008 07:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Terry Pratchett has the best clay golems ever. Since they know that the words written in their heads are what govern them, the free-willed clay golems work together to buy other golems and write scrolls of freedom into their heads. The most peaceful, well-organized slave rebellion ever.

I love flesh golems, for the Frankenstein connection. In a game I ran (same one I mentioned earleir with the gnoll scavenger culture in the Sea of Graves), the villain was a gnome necromancer who had developed a spell to teleport organs out of living people's bodies--so his flesh golem would be as fresh as possible. He did actually succeed in his goal of creating for the awful thing an artificial soul made out of a union of positive and negative energy... and the golem promptly went berzerk, killing him and teaming up with a gestalt soul of all of the necromancer's victims to wreak havoc. Good times.

DMH

08-10-2008 08:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9220788)

I remember hearing in an X files episode with a Golem, the wounds left by the Golem were filled with clay from its body, which would prevent the wounds from closing and would grow back if attempts were made to scrape it out. I know X files came out after this, but its as good an explanation as any.

As I mentioned upthread, I have read the real reason is the author (Mike Nystul?) was drunk when we was writing part of the 1st edtion MM.

trippingsatyr

08-10-2008 09:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

One of my favorite characters I played was a golem. It was in a fantasy Savage Worlds game with a D&D flavor. I played a newborn clay golem named Phyl which was short for his full name, Phylactery. He assumed this was his name because when his "father" animated him, he called him his phylactery. The character was hilarious cause he was a muscle man with the mind of a 6 year old.

sim_james

08-10-2008 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9214715)

Yeah. This is getting off topic but I wish the man would stop it with the political screeds and just write stories. The Scar was by far his best, because it was just a good adventure tale above all else.

Really? I thought that The Scar was his best work because of the multiple layers of metaphor, along with a truly unique and complicated protagonist. :)

noisms

08-11-2008 12:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9221573)

As I mentioned upthread, I have read the real reason is the author (Mike Nystul?) was drunk when we was writing part of the 1st edition MM.

I'd love it if that were true...

It would explain a whole lot else besides.

noisms

08-11-2008 12:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9221700)

*Really? I thought that The Scar was his best work because of the multiple layers of metaphor, along with a truly unique and complicated protagonist. :)*

Well, that too. But the point remains - he wasn't so overt with all the pseudo-Marxism in The Scar, which is why I like it. (Even if you agree with the politics, it can get a bit much. I mean, I want to read a novel, not a propaganda piece.)

Crinos

08-11-2008 01:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9222038)

I'd love it if that were true...

It would explain a whole lot else besides.

There's also the fact that early DnD was very adversarial, DM Vs. PC style of play, mainly because Gary Gygax was a sadistic SOB of a player killer (may he rest in peace).

So a lot of the insane things from 1e were probably brought over to 2e via TSR's overwhelming sense of not giving a damn.

Anywho, can clay golem damage be healed naturally? Thinking about it that "can only be healed by a 17th level cleric" jazz may only apply to magic healing.

sim_james

08-11-2008 09:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9222046)

Well, that too. But the point remains - he wasn't so overt with all the pseudo-Marxism in The Scar, which is why I like it. (Even if you agree with the politics, it can get a bit much. I mean, I want to read a novel, not a propaganda piece.)

Yeah, fair enough. I feel very much the same when it comes to Sheri S. Tepper.

The Scar did have some great world-building bits in it too! The blood empire of the mosquito people, the thaumaturgical underpinnings of the world, the Scar itself... great stuff.

kelvingreen

08-12-2008 06:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9225158)

The Scar did have some great world-building bits in it too! The blood empire of the mosquito people, the thaumaturgical underpinnings of the world, the Scar itself... great stuff.

Yes, that's part of the reason it's my favourite. You seem to find out more about the world in this one novel than anywhere else in his work. You've got the island of the mosquito women, the Deep One-esque fish beasties and their undersea empire, and of course the brilliant undead kingdom of High Cromlech. Great stuff.

Er, golems. Yeah.

noisms

08-12-2008 02:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Golems, Ravenloft Oddballs

Bone Golem

This is essentially an animated pile of bones which I think was mainly designed as a way for DMs to be able to say, "Ah ha! You thought it was undead didn't you?" when the party cleric steps forward with his holy symbol. And gets squished. They are immune to all magic except for shatter spells, and are generally pretty badass - one of the most powerful types of Golem. Rather ridiculously, "Once every three rounds, the bone golem may throw back its head and issue a hideous laugh that causes all those who hear it to make fear and horror checks. Those who fail either check are paralyzed and cannot move for 2-12 rounds. Those who fail both checks are instantly stricken dead with fear." I'm all for instadeath, but even I recognise instadeath through hideous laughter is a bit much.

Doll Golem

These are basically animated children's toys which jump at you and bite you. Once this has happened you laugh yourself to death. Sounds like something lifted directly from a horror film, but I can't think which one.

Gargoyle Golem

Rather obviously, an animated gargoyle statue. It can leap up to 100' (!), and its main trick is to turn people to stone with its fists. It's impressive how many of the golem oddballs have instakill attacks.

Glass Golem

A figure made out of stained glass, which regenerates when in direct sunlight and generally just hits you with its sword - although it can also cast prismatic spray spells. This is one of my favourite Golems. The idea of a knight in a sheet of stained glass suddenly stepping out from the window to attack a party of adventurers is very cool.

Necrophidius Golem

The 'Death Worm' - basically a skull on the end of a snake skeleton, judging by the picture - which does a 'Dance of Death' to hypnotize opponents into unconscious submission.

Scarecrow Golem

I've always been afraid of scarecrows, ever since an episode of the popular Australian kids show Round the Twist which I saw when I was about eight years old. So the image of a scarecrow going apeshit and chasing people around while cackling insanely is a particularly resonant one for me. Their shtick is to paralyse people with their gaze. On occasion they can gain sentience - whereupon they go on psychopathic killing sprees.

Crinos

08-12-2008 02:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ah the Ravenloft Golems. It's easy to see why Ravenloft was so popular back in the day; after Planescape it had the coolest monsters.

It's a shame they left the machine and Zombie Golems out of the MM proper. But hey, they had to make due with what they did.

And how unfair is it that they mention making fear and horror checks without first saying what those things ARE. I mean COME ON.

And, guess I was wrong: Here we have the only other type of Golem that can go berzerk: OI Pumpkinhead.

The Ravenloft Appendix had another sort of killer Scarecrow monster that wasn't a Golem, only this one laid a curse on you that made you a walking bug magnet.

Man that settles it, first thing I'm doing when I get paid is replenishing my 2e monster manual collection.

kelvingreen

08-12-2008 05:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9229318)

These are basically animated children's toys which jump at you and bite you. Once this has happened you laugh yourself to death. Sounds like something lifted directly from a horror film, but I can't think which one.

Child's Play is the obvious one, and the doll golem even looks a lot like Chucky, but I think the MM may predate the film. Not sure.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9229318)

Rather obviously, an animated gargoyle statue.

Only in D&D would you get gargoyles which look like statues and animated statues of gargoyles!

Quote:

I've always been afraid of scarecrows, ever since an episode of the popular Australian kids show Round the Twist which I saw when I was about eight years old. So the image of a scarecrow going apeshit and chasing people around while cackling insanely is a particularly resonant one for me. Their shtick is to paralyse people with their gaze. On occasion they can gain sentience - whereupon they go on psychopathic killing sprees.

Definitely the best imagery of the lot. Killer scarecrows are always a sign of scary fun to be had.

Wakboth

08-12-2008 05:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9229344)

And how unfair is it that they mention making fear and horror checks without first saying what those things ARE. I mean COME ON.

That's a recurrent issue with the MM, and caused by its omnibus nature. A bit more editing would have done the book good.

JasonK

08-12-2008 05:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9229344)

Its a shame they left the machine and Zombie Golems out of the MM proper. But hey, they had to make due with what they did.

Between the missing machine golems and the present scarecrows, I always assumed they were intentionally going for a Wizard of Oz reference, much like Castlevania: Symphony of the Night later did. Am I alone in this?

Quote:

And how unfair is it that they mention making fear and horror checks without first saying what those things ARE. I mean COME ON.

Ah, I'm very sorry that someone beat me to pointing that out...

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9229686)

Only in D&D would you get gargoyles which look like statues and animated statues of gargoyles!

Indeed. Seems needlessly redundant, to me...

~ jason

JRM

08-12-2008 07:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9229318)

Golems, Ravenloft Oddballs

Glass Golem

A figure made out of stained glass, which regenerates when in direct sunlight and generally just hits you with its sword - although it can also cast prismatic spray spells. This is one of my favourite Golems. The idea of a knight in a sheet of stained glass suddenly stepping out from the window to attack a party of adventurers is very cool.

Yup, it was also very cool when they did it in Young Sherlock Holmes as ILM's first 'photorealistic' computer generated character. I remember reading the Glass Golem entry in a Ravenloft book for the first time and suspecting they got the idea from that film, since it came out a few years earlier.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9229318)
Necrophidius Golem

The 'Death Worm' - basically a skull on the end of a snake skeleton, judging by the picture - which does a 'Dance of Death' to hypnotize opponents into unconscious submission.

The Necrophidius first entered official canon in the original Fiend Folio, so it predates Ravenloft. If I remember correctly, it's first appearance in 2nd edition AD&D was as a Ravenloft monster though.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9229318)
Scarecrow Golem

I've always been afraid of scarecrows, ever since an episode of the popular Australian kids show Round the Twist which I saw when I was about eight years old. So the image of a scarecrow going apeshit and chasing people around while cackling insanely is a particularly resonant one for me. Their shtick is to paralyse people with their gaze. On occasion they can gain sentience - whereupon they go on psychopathic killing sprees.

Apropos of very little, there's a great scarecrow golem in the Danish fantasy film Island of Lost Souls. The best picture I could find of it after a brief internet search was in this review - or just click here to link directly to it. Unfortunately the picture doesn't do it justice, imagine it leaping around like a malevolent spider-monkey while making eerie clattering sounds.

EDIT: You can catch a few glimpses of it in the trailers (see here for the original Danish trailer or here for the German version). There's also an official website, but I have no idea what it says, since it's all in Danish.

Crinos

08-12-2008 11:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

IIRC: The Ravenloft creators actually do say that the Glass Golem was inspired by Young Sherlock Holmes, as was the assassin Imp (I've never seen the movie, so I cannot comment).

demiurge1138

08-13-2008 02:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I recall the illustration of the Doll and Bone golems freaking me out lots when I was a wee one.

Crinos

08-13-2008 03:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The funny thing is the doll golem picture shows THREE golems: The baby doll with the pin, the voodoo teddy bear, and the little copper action figure in the corner.

Still don't get why they didn't use the machine and Zombie golems though. Must have been constrained for space at that point.

kelvingreen

08-13-2008 04:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9231774)

The funny thing is the doll golem picture shows THREE golems: The baby doll with the pin, the voodoo teddy bear, and the little copper action figure in the corner.

It's one of the more useful pieces of art in the MM, I think. I know that I often forget that doll golems need not necessarily be literally dolls; they can also be stuffed toys, and little toy statues, and all sorts. So the image is a good reminder of that.

Brutus

08-13-2008 10:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9229318)

Scarecrow Golem

I've always been afraid of scarecrows, ever since an episode of the popular Australian kids show Round the Twist which I saw when I was about eight years old. So the image of a scarecrow going apeshit and chasing people around while cackling insanely is a particularly resonant one for me. Their shtick is to paralyse people with their gaze. On occasion they can gain sentience - whereupon they go on psychopathic killing sprees.

I wasn't scared of them until that "Scary Stories" book when I was little. Those illustrations still creep me out. How'd you like to see that thing coming at you? To skin you. Nice.

Crinos

08-13-2008 11:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brutus (Post 9233663)

I wasn't scared of them until that "Scary Stories" book when I was little. Those illustrations still creep me out. How'd you like to see that thing coming at you? To skin you. Nice.

Gets even scarier when you realized that scarecrow golems are pumpkin headed:

*Keep away from Pumpkinhead, Unless you're tired of living,
His enemies are mostly dead, He's mean and unforgiving,
Laugh at him and you're undone, But in some dreadful fashion,
Vengeance, he considers fun, And plans it with a passion,
Time will not erase or blot, A plot that he has brewing,
It's when you think that he's forgot, He'll conjure your undoing,
Bolted doors and windows barred, Guard dogs prowling in the yard,
Won't protect you in your bed, Nothing will, from Pumpkinhead.*

Brutus

08-13-2008 11:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9233795)

Gets even scarier when you realized that scarecrow golems are pumpkin headed:

*Keep away from Pumpkinhead, Unless you're tired of living,
His enemies are mostly dead, He's mean and unforgiving,
Laugh at him and you're undone, But in some dreadful fashion,
Vengeance, he considers fun, And plans it with a passion,
Time will not erase or blot, A plot that he has brewing,
It's when you think that he's forgot, He'll conjure your undoing,
Bolted doors and windows barred, Guard dogs prowling in the yard,
Won't protect you in your bed, Nothing will, from Pumpkinhead.*

Is that from the movie? I never saw it. :(

This second thread is up to 400 and we're not out of the G's yet. This is the most epic thread series ever. That's not even counting the fuss I'm going to make over gremlins.

Crinos

08-13-2008 11:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brutus (Post 9233824)

Is that from the movie? I never saw it. :(

This second thread is up to 400 and we're not out of the G's yet. This is the most epic thread series ever. That's not even counting the fuss I'm going to make over gremlins.

Me neither, cept for bits and pieces, got this from someones signature on another board.

But yeah, this is the same poem from the film.

Also: I will definitely join you in the gremlin fussing.

Crinos

08-13-2008 03:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Monstrous Manual: the site

Now I feel a bit foolish for buying a copy of the book for five bucks

JasonK

08-13-2008 03:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Holy hell.

I wish I'd had that site earlier, so I could've noted all of the pictures as we were talking about them; now I forget what we ere referencing! Aaugh!

~ jason

Brutus

08-13-2008 05:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9234550)

Monstrous Manual: the site

Now I feel a bit foolish for buying a copy of the book for five bucks

I traded a shadowrun book I didn't want for it in highschool. Your fiver isn't wasted. Like any good bibliomancer, you must have the actual book. It's just not the same otherwise. :)

noisms

08-13-2008 06:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brutus (Post 9234841)

I traded a shadowrun book I didn't want for it in highschool. Your fiver isn't wasted. Like any good bibliomancer, you must have the actual book. It's just not the same otherwise. :)

Absolutely.

pdfs and webpages are no substitute.

Crinos

08-13-2008 08:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9234877)

Absolutely.

pdfs and webpages are no substitute.

Actually the five bucks I spent was on a PDF. Thats how I get all my books these days.

MadWriter

08-13-2008 08:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9235150)

Actually the five bucks I spent was on a PDF. Thats how I get all my books these days.

Can I give you a laugh point for this?

noisms

08-13-2008 10:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9235150)

Actually the five bucks I spent was on a PDF. Thats how I get all my books these days.

Ha. I guess I walked into that one. ;)

Yeah, $5 MMs must be thin on the ground these days. I still have mine in relatively good condition from the old days, but it's developed that weird 'old book' smell from all the time it's spent in my parent's loft.

Crinos

08-14-2008 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MadWriter (Post 9235201)
Can I give you a laugh point for this?

You may.

JRM

08-14-2008 04:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9230689)
IIRC: The Ravenloft creators actually do say that the Glass Golem was inspired by Young Sherlock Holmes, as was the assassin Imp (I've never seen the movie, so I cannot comment).

As for the assassin imps, there's a sequence in the movie where an archeologist is admiring a couple of little bronze devil statues that he sees come alive and scurry inside his clothing, causing him to fatally stab himself in a bid to kill them.

The glass golem and the other (non-human) monsters in Young Sherlock Holmes were actually just hallucinations caused by a Sinister Oriental Drug which incites its victims to kill themselves in a bid to escape appalling phantom.

noisms

08-14-2008 10:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Almost at the end of the 'G' mega-entries. Hooray! (Can you believe the G section stretched from the end of the last thread all the way to half way through this one?)

Golems, Stone Variants

These are basically less powerful cousins of the Stone Golem, whose usual purpose is to perform sentinel or guardian duties.

Caryatid Column

The Caryatid Column ("a supporting column sculptured in the form of a draped female figure", according to dictionary.com) is essentially a beautiful stone pillar carved to look like a woman with a sword. But beware, because as soon as you do That Which You Are Not Supposed To (whatever it may be) she'll come to life and start hitting you with that sword.

We haven't mentioned XP in a very long while, but this is another stage at which I have to wonder whether the values given in the MM aren't irredeemably broken. 420 XP seems like peanuts for a Caryatid Column, which has tough magical resistances and causes weapons to shatter 25% of the time when hitting it. Why it is only worth 420 XP (the same amount as the woeful and boring Stone Guardian described below) is beyond me.

Juggernaut

Sadly, not a Juggernaut of Khorne, but a rather vague "stone vehicle of some sort". Its main (and indeed only) modus operandi is to roll over you and make you go splat. I picture something along the lines of a Babylonian Ziggurat on wheels, for some reason.

Juggernauts also sometimes apparently combine with mimics, which allows them to grow up to six multi-purpose arms.

Stone Guardian

This is possibly the most boring monster in the book - even the designers seem to completely lack enthusiasm for it: they don't even give it a description! It's the poor man's Stone Golem, essentially. A big stone guy who hits you. For the less discerning evil mage.

demiurge1138

08-14-2008 03:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I never really got why the Stone Guardian was in there. So lower-level parties can fight big stone dudes too?

noisms

08-14-2008 04:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9239153)

I never really got why the Stone Guardian was in there. So lower-level parties can fight big stone dudes too?

I suppose it's the goblin to the Stone Golem's orc.

Crinos

08-14-2008 04:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9238440)

Almost at the end of the 'G' mega-entries. Hooray! (Can you believe the G section stretched from the end of the last thread all the way to half way through this one?)

I wouldn't say we're almost done yet: We still have 6 GR entries to get through, including 2 Gremlin entries, Griffons, Grimlock, Grell and Gripli. Plus Gorgons (Isn't it weird that the entry right after the stone golem variants is a monster that turns you to stone?)

Yep, we still have miles to go before we sleep.

(BTW: majorly looking forward to the Hag entry)

Wakboth

08-14-2008 04:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9238440)

Juggernaut

Sadly, not a Juggernaut of Khorne, but a rather vague "stone vehicle of some sort". Its main (and indeed only) modus operandi is to roll over you and make you go splat. I picture something along the lines of a Babylonian Ziggurat on wheels, for some reason.

That's more interesting than my mental image, which is basically a steamroller made of stone. (Along the line of the rock creature's bike in The Neverending Story.)

Quote:

Stone Guardian

This is possibly the most boring monster in the book - even the designers seem to completely lack enthusiasm for it they don't even give it a description! It's the poor man's Stone Golem, essentially. A big stone guy who hits you. For the less discerning evil mage.

IIRC, this one appeared first in the 1e MM2. And, for some reason, I think it was modeled after the stone guest in the Don Juan legend... If true, that didn't make the transition to 2e.

Littleredfox

08-14-2008 05:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9238440)

420 XP seems like peanuts for a Caryatid Column, which has tough magical resistances and causes weapons to shatter 25% of the time when hitting it.

The weapons shattering bit can be useful to the party and may thus lower the XP value.

After all how else are you going to get rid of those cursed weapons.?)

kelvingreen

08-14-2008 05:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9238440)

Juggernaut

Sadly, not a Juggernaut of Khorne, but a rather vague "stone vehicle of some sort". Its main (and indeed only) modus operandi is to roll over you and make you go splat. I picture something along the lines of a Babylonian Ziggurat on wheels, for some reason.

Juggernauts also sometimes apparently combine with mimics, which allows them to grow up to six multi-purpose arms.

Completely mental, and as such, I love it. I can imagine an orcish warband that's somehow enslaved one of these and goes charging around the countryside with it, hanging off the edges like a bunch of GIs on a jeep. While it's practical in getting them from looting point A to pillaging point B, they mainly love it because it's fast. They may even have painted it red. ;)

MadWritter

08-14-2008 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9235945)

You may.

+1 Laugh Point to Crinos from MadWritter. Billed in full.

noisms

08-14-2008 07:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Littleredfox (Post 9239384)

The weapons shattering bit can be useful to the party and may thus lower the XP value.

After all how else are you going to get rid of those cursed weapons.?)

Ah, you've played this game before, haven't you? ;)

Sleeper

08-14-2008 10:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9239280)

IIRC, this one appeared first in the 1e MM2. And, for some reason, I think it was modeled after the stone guest in the Don Juan legend... If true, that didn't make the transition to 2e.

I believe the first appearance of the stone guardians was in L1: The Secret of Bone Hill. Low level module, low level stone golem equivalent designed specifically to guard an area. Along with the spectator, the cheap low-level (and not evil) equivalent of the beholder. Also designed specifically to play watchdog.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9239280)

That's more interesting than my mental image, which is basically a steamroller made of stone. (Along the line of the rock creature's bike in The Neverending Story.)

The juggernaut first appeared in T1-4: The Temple of Elemental Evil. There was art. I don't have my copy in front of me, but IIRC they were big pillars on stone wheels with all kinds of odd heads on extension poles. Sort of like an Amerindian totem pole, if the heads could shoot out and pin you to the wall while you're trying to rescue your buddy who's being ground underneath its wheels. It's been a while, though. I could be creatively misremembering.

Canis Major

08-14-2008 11:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

No, I believe the Juggernaut first appeared in the Tomb of Horrors as a trap component.

Sleeper

08-15-2008 12:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Xaos (Post 9240398)

No, I believe the Juggernaut first appeared in the Tomb of Horrors as a trap component.

Was it a monster, or just a trap?

Canis Major

08-15-2008 12:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

<http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/To...HGraphic23.jpg>

I think it could be attacked and destroyed, but my memory is hazy.

Cultist of Sooty

08-15-2008 12:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

That picture does seem to suggest that whoever wrote the monster up for D&D was aware of the origins of the "juggernaut".

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wikipedia

The word is derived from the Sanskrit Jagannātha (meaning "Lord of the universe") which is one of the many names of Krishna from the ancient Vedic scriptures of India. One of the most famous of Indian temples is the Jagannath Temple in Puri, Orissa, which has the Ratha Yatra (chariot procession), an annual procession of chariots carrying the murtis/statues of Jagannāth (Krishna), Subhadra and Baladeva (Krishna's elder brother). During the British colonial era, Christian missionaries promulgated a fallacy that Hindu devotees of Krishna were lunatic fanatics who threw themselves under the wheels of these chariots in order to attain salvation. Such a description can also be found in the popular fourteenth-century work "The Travels of Sir John Mandeville." In rare instances in the festival's past, people had been crushed accidentally as the massive 45 foot tall, multi-ton chariot slipped out of control, with others suffering injury in the resulting stampedes. This sight led the Britons of the time to contrive the word "Juggernaut" to refer to examples of unstoppable, crushing forces.

In modern times, the government officers and temple priests managing the festival take elaborate precautions to protect people from injury during these processions.

And a picture of it, from 1851:

http://upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedi...Book_11921.jpg

Sleeper

08-15-2008 12:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Xaos (Post 9240484)

I think it could be attacked and destroyed, but my memory is hazy.

I seem to recall an instant-death mechanic rather than a normal attack, but it's terribly fuzzy. The T1-4 version was definitely a full stat block. In the back, along with the fungus queen and the swords that plundered the English language for every possible synonym of the word "answerer" (which was also stolen from mythology -- Celtic this time).

Lord Shark

08-15-2008 01:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I'm pretty sure the Tomb of Horrors one was just part of a trap (walk into a corridor full of knockout gas, fall asleep, and that thing comes out and rolls over you), and the juggernaut was first statted up in T1-4.

I also vaguely recall that the T1-4 one resembled a giant horse's head on wheels, although in this case I may be confusing it with the juggernaut from the Archon computer games from back in the '80s...

Crinos

08-15-2008 01:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Xaos (Post 9240484)

<http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/To...HGraphic23.jpg>

I think it could be attacked and destroyed, but my memory is hazy.

That is the most awesome thing ever. Gary Gygax was an evil effin genius.

Canis Major

08-15-2008 01:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

It looks like the juggernaut also appeared in X4: Master of the Desert Nomads (David Cook, 1983).

Sleeper

08-15-2008 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Xaos (Post 9240770)

It looks like the juggernaut also appeared in X4: Master of the Desert Nomads (David Cook, 1983).

That definitely predates (the much delayed) T1-4 (by two years), though it would be interesting to compare the two stat blocks. The Basic D&D line and the AD&D line often had very different takes.

demiurge1138

08-15-2008 01:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9239413)

Completely mental, and as such, I love it. I can imagine an orcish warband that's somehow enslaved one of these and goes charging around the countryside with it, hanging off the edges like a bunch of GIs on a jeep. While it's practical in getting them from looting point A to pillaging point B, they mainly love it because it's fast. They may even have painted it red. ;)

They did that in Expedition to the Ruins of Castle Greyhawk, the official Last Greyhawk Product Ever (the good 3e one, not the shitty "comedy" module Castle Greyhawk). Only instead of orcs, the passengers were redcap expatriates from Dungeonland.

kelvingreen

08-15-2008 03:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9240872)

Only instead of orcs, the passengers were redcap expatriates from Dungeonland.

Not as much fun as orc 'ooligans then. ;)

DMH

08-15-2008 05:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

They had no problem taking some critters from BD&D for the MM, I wonder why the drolem wasn't one of them. The most powerful construct, made from bits of monsters adventurers were expected to slay and a challenge for players- who could ask more?

Crinos

08-15-2008 06:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9241902)

They had no problem taking some critters from BD&D for the MM, I wonder why the drolem wasn't one of them. The most powerful construct, made from bits of monsters adventurers were expected to slay and a challenge for players- who could ask more?

Same reason they didn't use the last two ravenloft Golems: Space constraints.

They can only fit so many monsters into one book.

Sides which, they get more money by putting the left out creatures into other books (and of course, hinting about the new monsters in the MM, like they did for the Baatezu and Tanar'ri)

JRM

08-15-2008 10:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9240805)

That definitely predates (the much delayed) T1-4 (by two years), though it would be interesting to compare the two stat blocks. The Basic D&D line and the AD&D line often had very different takes.

From what I remember of it, the X4 version of the Juggernaut was a siege engine on wheels, like a small fort with a battering-ram prow.

Here are a couple of pictures of what one looks like from the covers of Master of the Desert Nomads and Adventures in Blackmoor

Don't have that module so I can't quote the original stat block, but there's a 3rd edition conversion on Enworld here. It also appears in the 3rd edition version of Monster Manual II.

noisms

08-16-2008 10:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gorgon

No, not a woman with snakes on her head who turns you to stone (that's the medusa), but a big metal bull with bad breath which turns you to stone. Apparently there's some reason for this, which a more informed reader will tell you about.

This is a nice monster, but almost spoiled by the silly image conjured up by the line that "Gorgons walk on two hooves if necessary". Suddenly all I can think about is a cow tottering around on its hind legs snorting at people.

Anyway, the designers can be forgiven, because the Gorgon has a) instakill murder breath; b) a corpse that can be used to make stuff (the scales can be forged into a special coat of scale mail or ground up to make scrolls of petrification, and the blood can 'seal an area against astral and ethereal intrusion'); c) droppings that sometimes contain treasure it has accidentally eaten. (The last is easily my favourite. Next time I play in a game my character is going to spend the whole time checking out monster manure for gems.)

An adventure hook is provided in the form of hints that the stone statues left by rampaging Gorgons often contain, inside, the treasures of the unfortunate victim. Cue quest to the Gorgon's lair to try to recover ancient artifact set in the petrified body of a dead adventurer... Perfect if the characters are low level, and so have to sneak in without the Gorgon noticing.

I feel good about this entry. It's been a while since we've come across a monster which can fit into my upcoming supplement - Monsters Whose Corpses Can Be Turned Into Useful Stuff, Especially Armour, Vol. 1.

Crinos

08-16-2008 10:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Well, as I said above, I read somewhere (I think it was an issue of Ranger Rick) that there were two gorgon myths: The snake haired woman from Greece, and a Bull with Killer breath from some other mythology. Sadly I can find zero evidence to back up my claims, so for now just ignore my sober ramblings.

JasonK

08-16-2008 10:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9247741)

An adventure hook is provided in the form of hints that the stone statues left by rampaging Gorgons often contain, inside, the treasures of the unfortunate victim. Cue quest to the Gorgon's lair to try to recover ancient artifact set in the petrified body of a dead adventurer... Perfect if the characters are low level, and so have to sneak in without the Gorgon noticing.

Serious question:

Why is it that when gorgons (or medusae, for that matter) turn someone into stone, their gear also turns to stone with them? Makes no sense to me and, to be honest, seems a lot less cool. I think there's a certain horror associated with coming on a standing suit of armor, sword raised to strike, or a set of robes fluttering in the wind, their wearer holding a staff, arms outstretched, only to realize that the person wearing them is made of immobile stone. Much worse than "some strange statues - they all seem terrified", in my opinion.

Crinos

08-16-2008 10:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9247778)

Serious question:

Why is it that when gorgons (or medusae, for that matter) turn someone into stone, their gear also turns to stone with them? Makes no sense to me and, to be honest, seems a lot less cool. I think there's a certain horror associated with coming on a standing suit of armor, sword raised to strike, or a set of robes fluttering in the wind, their wearer holding a staff, arms outstretched, only to realize that the person wearing them is made of immobile stone. Much worse than "some strange statues - they all seem terrified", in my opinion.

~ jason

My guess is the Gorgons petrifying breath is magic and works on contact, forgoing the need to breath to be affected.

But hey, its your campaign, do what you want.

noisms

08-16-2008 11:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9247778)

Serious question:

Why is it that when gorgons (or medusae, for that matter) turn someone into stone, their gear also turns to stone with them? Makes no sense to me and, to be honest, seems a lot less cool. I think there's a certain horror associated with coming on a standing suit of armor, sword raised to strike, or a set of robes fluttering in the wind, their wearer holding a staff, arms outstretched, only to realize that the person wearing them is made of immobile stone. Much worse than "some strange statues - they all seem terrified", in my opinion.

~ jason

Interesting. The Gorgon's breath is a cone, so it could affect everything within that cone - but in that case, surely, it would turn all the vegetation within the cone to stone too.

The medusa, however, works on sight - so in that case your idea works much better: whatever looks at her is turned to stone. Which obviously doesn't include armour, which can't look at anything.

Crinos

08-16-2008 11:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9247936)

The medusa, however, works on sight - so in that case your idea works much better: whatever looks at her is turned to stone. Which obviously doesn't include armour, which can't look at anything.

Well, the original Medusa's petrification power was due to a divine curse. So it could be that the God that cursed the original medusa just decreed that "anyone who saw a medusa would turn to stone" and didn't bother to differentiate between the person and their possessions.

JRM

08-16-2008 06:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9247980)

Well, the original Medusa's petrification power was due to a divine curse. So it could be that the God that cursed the original medusa just decreed that "anyone who saw a medusa would turn to stone" and didn't bother to differentiate between the person and their possessions.

It's the blessing within the curse! If your possessions also turn to stone it means your companions can't loot your petrified body, they have to Stone To Flesh you to get your stuff. Of course, if they're evil, they may knock your 'stoned' head off first.;

Sleeper

08-16-2008 07:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9247778)

Serious question:

Why is it that when gorgons (or medusae, for that matter) turn someone into stone, their gear also turns to stone with them? Makes no sense to me and, to be honest, seems a lot less cool. I think there's a certain horror associated with coming on a standing suit of armor, sword raised to strike, or a set of robes fluttering in the wind, their wearer holding a staff, arms outstretched, only to realize that the person wearing them is made of immobile stone. Much worse than "some strange statues - they all seem terrified", in my opinion.

~ jason

Clothing decomposes, armor rusts, and straps rot and snap. Old gorgon dens would be like walking into a cave and finding a random collection of anatomically correct Michaelangelo nudes in dramatic poses, with expressions of shock or horror on their faces. Some stained with rust, and most surrounded by a circle of scattered tatters of cloth and leather, which gradually becomes a film of deliquescing organic material, and then just a discoloration on the rocks with a few of the more durable objects hidden away in crevices.

And what kind of stone do gorgons turn people into? I'm imagining a veined marble for medusae; perhaps a harsher stone for the armored unglant.

JRM

08-17-2008 03:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9248796)

Clothing decomposes, armor rusts, and straps rot and snap. Old gorgon dens would be like walking into a cave and finding a random collection of anatomically correct Michaelangelo nudes in dramatic poses, with expressions of shock or horror on their faces. Some stained with rust, and most surrounded by a circle of scattered tatters of cloth and leather, which gradually becomes a film of deliquescing organic material, and then just a discoloration on the rocks with a few of the more durable objects hidden away in crevices.

And what kind of stone do gorgons turn people into? I'm imagining a veined marble for medusae; perhaps a harsher stone for the armored unglant.

In my campaign the stone a petrified victim is made out of is porous inside, like pumice, so that their body weighs the same as it did when they were organic. That means it's pretty frangible for a piece of stone. The surface of the petrified victim's skin is more or less as smooth as they were in life, I think most of the vacuoles inside the victim are too small to see with the naked eye - maybe the size of living cells, indeed they may replace the stoned victim's living cells.

Crinos

08-17-2008 03:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9248796)

Clothing decomposes, armor rusts, and straps rot and snap. Old gorgon dens would be like walking into a cave and finding a random collection of anatomically correct Michaelangelo nudes in dramatic poses, with expressions of shock or horror on their faces. Some stained with rust, and most surrounded by a circle of scattered tatters of cloth and leather, which gradually becomes a film of deliquescing organic material, and then just a discoloration on the rocks with a few of the more durable objects hidden away in crevices.

Well, according to the Gorgon entry, its believed that Gorgons eat the statues they create (either by pulverizing it into dust with their teeth or by turning it back to flesh with their saliva as they eat it). So you probably wouldn't see any whole statues in a Gorgon lair anyways.

Only Medusa and Beholders keep petrified victims as trophies.

Sleeper

08-17-2008 06:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9249664)

In my campaign the stone a petrified victim is made out of is porous inside, like pumice, so that their body weighs the same as it did when they were organic. That means it's pretty frangible for a piece of stone. The surface of the petrified victim's skin is more or less as smooth as they were in life, I think most of the vacuoles inside the victim are too small to see with the naked eye - maybe the size of living cells, indeed they may replace the stoned victim's living cells.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9249719)

Well, according to the Gorgon entry, its believed that Gorgons eat the statues they create (either by pulverizing it into dust with their teeth or by turning it back to flesh with their saliva as they eat it). So you probably wouldn't see any whole statues in a Gorgon lair anyways.

Perhaps exfoliating using pieces of gorgonstone is considered absolutely essential for truly exquisite skin by the pampered courtesans of the great decadent empires in the south. They pay high prices, and use it directly on the rough skin on the soles of their feet, and have lesser slaves grind it into salves composed of many exotic ingredients like honey and pomegranate for use on their face and other more delicate body parts.

A secondary market quickly sprang up that used captive medusas to dispose of feeble or crippled slaves, but this was quickly merged with a rather unusual form of entertainment. Now, the occasional gladiator faces a captive medusa in a duel to the death. To ensure the safety of the audience (though the slightly chance for death is what draws the huge crowds), the medusa is caged in a special mirror-ringed platform that is hauled by great lobotomized dragons with hobbled wings into the center of the great amphitheatre. The cunning use of reflection allows to the audience to watch the spectacle without harm (a legion of blindfolded soldiers is on hand for eventualities), as the desperate captured barbarian scrambles to keep an eye on her deadly opponent amid the disorientating dance of reflections. Because while the adamant mirrors are set up so the duel is almost like a motion picture, moving from screen to screen (or mirror to mirror), to the outside observer; from the inside, the cage is like a funhouse with perception shifting wildly every time a combatant moves, and never is it clear which is the real medusa and which is just a reflected image.

JRM

08-17-2008 08:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9249719)

Well, according to the Gorgon entry, its believed that Gorgons eat the statues they create (either by pulverizing it into dust with their teeth or by turning it back to flesh with their saliva as they eat it). So you probably wouldn't see any whole statues in a Gorgon lair anyways.

Only Medusa and Beholders keep petrified victims as trophies.

A D&D Medusa can eat its petrified victim if she's mated to a Maedar, the male of the species. All Maedar have an innate Stone to Flesh ability, so they can break pieces off their mate's petrified victims and turn these portions edible. Those statues the medusae are keeping may be a larder, not trophies.

Crinos

08-17-2008 08:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9250353)

A D&D Medusa can eat its petrified victim if she's mated to a Maedar, the male of the species. All Maedar have an innate Stone to Flesh ability, so they can break pieces off their mate's petrified victims and turn these portions edible. Those statues the medusae are keeping may be a larder, not trophies.

On the same subject, the Basilisk don't have a habitat or ecology in the MM, but I assume since they're fairly dangerous without their gaze, they only use the gaze for self defense, not hunting. The same goes for Cockatrice, who hunt for small insects and lizards and don't really need petrification.

As for Medusa and Maedar, that may be the case, but since Maedar are so rare compared to Medusa, the more pragmatic Medusa will most likely destroy any statues of her victims so they can't be restored or warn intruders or her presence, and perhaps keep the more interesting statues as trophies (as Beholders are wont to do).

Sleeper

08-17-2008 08:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9250353)

A D&D Medusa can eat its petrified victim if she's mated to a Maedar, the male of the species. All Maedar have an innate Stone to Flesh ability, so they can break pieces off their mate's petrified victims and turn these portions edible. Those statues the medusae are keeping may be a larder, not trophies.

And, apparently, since medusas turn any worn or carried clothing and metal to stone as well, maedar can convert those now-lithoid swords and pieces of armor into meals. I wonder which is tastier... stone-preserved twice flesh, or steel-turned-stone-turned-flesh?

David J Prokopetz

08-17-2008 08:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9250401)

And, apparently, since medusas turn any worn or carried clothing and metal to stone as well, maedar can convert those now-lithoid swords and pieces of armor into meals. I wonder which is tastier... stone-preserved twice flesh, or steel-turned-stone-turned-flesh?

I swear, the fact that stone to flesh can affect stone that was never flesh in the first place is the source of more creepy strategies in 1E and 2E than just about any other spell. Isn't the idea of turning a stone wall to meat and carving a bloody tunnel through it explicitly mentioned in the spell description?

Sleeper

08-17-2008 08:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9250407)

I swear, the fact that stone to flesh can affect stone that was never flesh in the first place is the source of more creep strategies in 1E and 2E than just about any other spell. Isn't the idea of turning a stone wall to meat and carving a bloody tunnel through it explicitly mentioned in the spell description?

Piers Anthony may not be a very good author, but there was an entertaining bit in Crewel Lye where a massive stone to flesh spell goes off, and turns the top of a mountain into a huge piece of flesh. Unlike in D&D, it was apparently living — but brainless and organless and without eyes or any senses except touch. So trapped in the darkness of its own mind, it did the only thing it could — it started instinctively and blindly thrashing around, which caused a series of avalanches. I imagine afterward the scavengers had quite a feast.

JRM

08-18-2008 08:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9250401)

And, apparently, since medusas turn any worn or carried clothing and metal to stone as well, maedar can convert those now-lithoid swords and pieces of armor into meals. I wonder which is tastier... stone-preserved twice flesh, or steel-turned-stone-turned-flesh?

The steel-turned-stone-turned-flesh shouldn't work, since the reversed petrification spell turns the victims equipment back to their former state. Unless they've carrying something that's made of stone in the firstplace, I guess. ("Thank you for saving me from petrification, allow me to reward you with these valuable gemstones" . . . pulls a handful of squishy little lumps out of belpouch . . . "Ewww")

That does beg the question of why a medusa family with a Maedar would need to hunt at all, if they can turn the walls of their cave into meat. I suspect that original rock turned flesh is missing some vital nutritional ingredient(s) (vitamins? fat?) or has too much trace metals to make a healthy diet.

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9250407)

I swear, the fact that stone to flesh can affect stone that was never flesh in the first place is the source of more creep strategies in 1E and 2E than just about any other spell. Isn't the idea of turning a stone wall to meat and carving a bloody tunnel through it explicitly mentioned in the spell description?

Yes, I think that tactic is described in one of the core books, either the Player's Handbook or the 1st edition DMG's "stuff the wizard doesn't know about their spells that will screw them over" section.

Crinos

08-18-2008 08:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9253455)

That does beg the question of why a medusa family with a Maedar would need to hunt at all, if they can turn the walls of their cave into meat. I suspect that original rock turned flesh is missing some vital nutritional ingredient(s) (vitamins? fat?) or has too much trace metals to make a healthy diet.

Or maybe it just tastes bad.

I mean flesh made from stone is probably like spam or something, so I don't think it tastes too good.

Besides which, if you carve too much flesh from the walls of the cave, you could damage the integrity of the cave.

Besides, Medusa and Maedar are evil, do they really need an excuse to hunt and kill?

Sleeper

08-18-2008 10:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9253512)

Besides which, if you carve too much flesh from the walls of the cave, you could damage the integrity of the cave.

Unless they team up with some other monster that understands the basics of structural engineering.

Just imagine a pairing between a band of derro with their not-quite-in-check dementia and a couple of newlywed medusas looking for a place to call their own. Insane artistic sensibilities direct the more sedate maedar into crafting strangely organic and repellent yet beautiful shapes out of the negative space of the rock-turned-flesh. The derro would pair their shock-white hair with glistening white teeth, filed into points, to eat their way out of their starter cave and into a vast underground palace they hunger for (in another sense). As long as they're still hungry, they'll never have to worry about being crowded, so sloppy bellies spilling over belts become desirable. And when the mad architects have a fit and are possessed by an artistic frenzy, and beguile and browbeat the maedar into creating another flesh-tunnel, and yet another, and again and again... to dispose of the surfeit of food, they'd have to carve out huge slabs of raw meat and throw it into a vast crevice, which would soon become infested with scores of mindless scrabbling monsters feeding on the discards. Even when their home has expanded into an enormous and alien network of caves twisting like intestines (or to be more precise, the space left behind by intestines if they grew through rock), it would still be known as the Bloody Caves, for the permanent red stains in the rock and the thin film of gore that seems to cover everything, tracked in from the latest banquet hall slash new wing.

Crinos

08-18-2008 10:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9253835)

Unless they team up with some other monster that understands the basics of structural engineering.

Just imagine a pairing between a band of derro with their not-quite-in-check dementia and a couple of newlywed medusas looking for a place to call their own. Insane artistic sensibilities direct the more sedate maedar into crafting strangely organic and repellent yet beautiful shapes out of the negative space of the rock-turned-flesh. The derro would pair their shock-white hair with glistening white teeth, filed into points, to eat their way out of their starter cave and into a vast underground palace they hunger for (in another sense). As long as they're still hungry, they'll never have to worry about being crowded, so sloppy bellies spilling over belts become desirable. And when the mad architects have a fit and are possessed by an artistic frenzy, and beguile and browbeat the maedar into creating another flesh-tunnel, and yet another, and again and again... to dispose of the surfeit of food, they'd have to carve out huge slabs of raw meat and throw it into a vast crevice, which would soon become infested with scores of mindless scrabbling monsters feeding on the discards. Even when their home has expanded into an enormous and alien network of caves twisting like intestines (or to be more precise, the space left behind by intestines if they grew through rock), it would still be known as the Bloody Caves, for the permanent red stains in the rock and the thin film of gore that seems to cover everything, tracked in from the latest banquet hall slash new wing.

dude.... THAT. WAS. AWESOME.

Its like a dnd module written by Clive Barker!

I am so gonna use that at some point.

Sleeper

08-18-2008 11:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Thanks. The whole mythology surrounding D&D is fascinating, and despite everything that's been published the surface has hardly been scratched.

demiurge1138

08-18-2008 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

My roommate actually ran a character who was a monk turned into a ghoul. Because his monastic vows forbade him harming an animal, he fulfilled his ghoulish hunger by using stone to flesh on granite blocks. He called it "vegan meat".

Crinos

08-18-2008 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

In fact, that idea gives me an idea for a temple to a God of Gluttony run by a Medusa and Maedar who force slaves and cultists to eat themselves into obesity carving out new additions to their temple.

noisms

08-18-2008 12:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Grell

Ah, the Grell. Everybody's favourite look-like-refugees-from-a-bog-standard-STNG-episode monster. Big floating telepathic octopus-brains with tentacles.

In behaviour and society, Grell are a bit like daleks. They roam around saying things like "Human slime!" and "We will destroy you, man flesh!" - or at least they do in my imagination. Divided into workers, 'philosophers' (though one wonders how much philosophising they do other than "Grell are the best, and eat what they like!") and 'patriarchs', they act like a kind of ant or bee colony, with the patriarch acting as the Queen. Odd that it isn't a matriarch, really.

I hate Grell, and I rather dislike the entry, too. For starters, there are the scattering of references to 'ships', which we could really have done without: I assume that what is meant is Spelljammer ships, but it's silly that one should have to make assumptions like that at all. TSR really should have done some editing before just copying and pasting entries from other bestiaris.

But I also can't help but feel they didn't flesh out the Grell nearly enough. Almost the entire entry is given over to descriptions of what the workers do in combat, which is all very well, but doesn't give a DM much else to go on. So, okay, Grell are a bit like Beholders and it's tough to make them interesting. But at least try, guys!

Worst of all, Grell are just really annoying, it has to be said. Their ability to levitate and paralyse is both powerful and irritating, and I can remember many near TPKs at their hands (tentacles?) in games I've played in over the years. On one occasion a party of 12 was wiped out to the last man - a mage - who managed to acid arrow the last of the Grell and was then left to pick up the pieces of 11 dead comrades. We eventually got the Patriarch, though...

Crinos

08-18-2008 12:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I always pegged the Clockwork horrors as the DnD daleks, the Grell are just weird for weirdness sake.

Oddly enough, they made their debut in the original fiend folio, so there's no real reason to use their spelljammer writeup.

Hellzon

08-18-2008 05:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9253455)

The steel-turned-stone-turned-flesh shouldn't work, since the reversed petrification spell turns the victims equipment back to their former state. Unless they've carrying something that's made of stone in the firstplace, I guess. ("Thank you for saving me from petrification, allow me to reward you with these valuable gemstones" . . . pulls a handful of squishy little lumps out of belt pouch . . . "Ewww")

Now I can't stop myself. NetHack has the "Stone to Flesh" spell. If you cast it on yourself, you turn any stone items in your inventory to meat. Gems turn into meatballs. :D

Can't dig with it, though.

demiurge1138

08-18-2008 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I like grell, brains-with-tentacles weird as they are. I like that their philosophy consists mainly of eating stuff. And I like that they're random wandering monsters--unless they have philosophers and lightning lances and all that stuff. There's the implication of multiple grell cultures, when most D&D monsters are all mono-culture.

Apropos of nothing, I once had an idea for a near-future game where mankind finally received signals from alien intelligence... but they were all D&D aberrations. How would man enter the space race when their competitors were illithids, grell, neogi and beholders?

Steve H

08-18-2008 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9254926)

Apropos of nothing, I once had an idea for a near-future game where mankind finally received signals from alien intelligence... but they were all D&D aberrations. How would man enter the space race when their competitors were illithids, grell, neogi and beholders?

That's beautiful :)

I'm trying to remember now how D20 Modern/Urban Arcana handled the aberrations - but I think they just slipped through the same magic portal as everything else in that game.

Sleeper

08-18-2008 09:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9253950)

My roommate actually ran a character who was a monk turned into a ghoul. Because his monastic vows forbade him harming an animal, he fulfilled his ghoulish hunger by using stone to flesh on granite blocks. He called it "vegan meat".

:)

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9254132)

Ah, the Grell. Everybody's favourite look-like-refugees-from-a-bog-standard-STNG-episode monster. Big floating telepathic octopus-brains with tentacles.

There was a Star Trek episode with grellalikes? Now I want to see a screencap :). The grell clearly predate the second series, so if there's any copying it's the other way around.

One thing I really disliked about the grell chapter in 3E's Lords of Madness is they're no longer giant brains with beaks and tentacles. Rather, they just look like giant brains. What is it, some kind of camouflage? How does happening to look like the contents of someone's skull translate into a defense mechanism? Just keeping them as giant brains wouldn't be any less logical, and, well. Giant brains with beaks and tentacles. Much cooler.

DMH

08-18-2008 11:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I don't remember the title, but the episode where the away team ends up in a western (and Checkov dies?) is the only OST alien that is grell like that I can think of.

I don't care for grell and wish the pages in Lords of Madness were devoted to some other aberration.

noisms

08-19-2008 12:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9255353)

:)

There was a Star Trek episode with grellalikes? Now I want to see a screencap :). The grell clearly predate the second series, so if there's any copying it's the other way around.

No, but they just feel like a Star Trek or Dr. Who monster, do they not?

glass

08-19-2008 12:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9254192)

Oddly enough, they made their debut in the original fiend folio, so there's no real reason to use their spelljammer writeup.

They were also in the Grayhawk MC Appendix for 2e before they were in the SJ one. I always liked them, FWIW, but I've never really done anything with them.

glass.

YojimboC

08-19-2008 03:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've always liked the grell as well and yet never did anything with them. Now I'll have to, of course. A grell enclave in the heart of a yuan-ti city, perhaps? Yeah, that could work.

JRM

08-19-2008 05:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9256594)

I've always liked the grell as well and yet never did anything with them. Now I'll have to, of course. A grell enclave in the heart of a yuan-ti city, perhaps? Yeah, that could work.

I've used grell in my campaign, but based on the original Fiend Folio version. Never much cared for the Planescape expansion of grell, with their interstellar philosophers and zap-guns, so I just kept them feral but uncannily cunning monsters. My players learnt to be rightly leary about them, like carrion crawlers they're almost certain to paralyse their victim what with their multiple paralysis attack, and unlike crawlers they'd then flense their victims to death in a few rounds.

I far prefer their original look to the reimagined one - a floating brains with eyes, beak and tentacles seems far cooler than the blobs they look like now.

Kakita Kojiro

08-19-2008 10:59 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9254132)

In behaviour and society, Grell are a bit like daleks. They roam around sayings things like "Human slime!" and "We will destroy you, man flesh!" - or at least they do in my imagination. Divided into workers, 'philosophers' (though one wonders how much philosophising they do other than "Grell are the best, and eat what they like!") and 'patriarchs', they act like a kind of ant or bee colony, with the patriarch acting as the Queen. Odd that it isn't a matriarch, really.

For some reason, I'm thinking Grell patriarchs = aberrant pseudo-Mormon polygamist cult leaders. Which would probably make the workers their chattel wives... although it'd be more creepy if you could squeeze the adventurers into that role...

add sort of a "the Grell patriarch paralyzes your companion and caresses her brain lovingly" moment, maybe.

David J Prokopetz

08-19-2008 11:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9257055)

I've used grell in my campaign, but based on the original Fiend Folio version. Never much cared for the Planescape expansion of grell, with their interstellar philosophers and zap-guns, so I just kept them feral but uncannily cunning monsters.

Spelljammer, rather - I don't think they played a significant role in Planescape.

noisms

08-19-2008 11:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gremlin

No, not Mogwai. Just one of those "chaotic and mischievous" D&D monsters that we all, er, love so much. Irritating bastards with which to annoy your players, basically, summed up in the line in the second paragraph which runs, "The angrier their victims are, the happier the Gremlins" - although that's by no means a bad thing. If you're the DM.

There's some ecology fluff ("Gremlins originate in an unknown plane plane of existence." Grr...) but what do we care?

Gremlins like to torment people with humiliating traps, the nastier the better, and that's their raison d'etre.

They like to breed with other humanoid races, and there are several subspecies:

Fremlin - A fat and lazy but harmless type, which can make "tolerable" companions, with (presumably) 'hilarious' results.

Galltrit - Tiny mosquito like creatures which suck blood and drain Constitution points - which can only be recovered at the rate of one point per two weeks!

Mite - "Mites are tiny, mischievous, wingless gremlins that waylay dungeon adventurers for fun and profit." That's pretty much all you need to know, although mites get the most attention of all the subvarieties. Their favourite trick is to stun somebody, drag them to their lair, torment them for one to four days, steal all their possessions, then deposit them somewhere embarrassing once they get bored. Sound like all the ingredients of a good night out.

Mites live in groups in small tunnel networks, with each group having a King. Cue party of adventurers having to enter said network to recover something or other.

Snyad - These are expert thieves, snatching things right out of adventurers' hands. Dropped in is the fact that they "mate for life", which doesn't sound particularly Gremlin-like to me.

David J Prokopetz

08-19-2008 11:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9258352)

Fremlin - A fat and lazy but harmless type, which can make "tolerable" companions, with (presumably) 'hilarious' results.

Presented as a playable race in the Complete Book of Humanoids, disturbingly enough.

Crinos

08-19-2008 11:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9258363)

Presented as a playable race in the Complete Book of Humanoids, disturbingly enough.

Yes, making it the only 2e PC race that can only be hit by +1 or better (to my knowledge).

Sleeper

08-19-2008 02:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9258352)

Dropped in is the fact that they "mate for life", which doesn't sound particularly Gremlin-like to me.

All the sub-races except the fremlin originated in the Fiend Folio (and presumably White Dwarf before that). The whole gremlin thing was tacked on later. The first gremlins that I remember seeing were in Dragon #79, and the plane they came from was Earth — specifically, Earth during WW2. Think aviator goggles and bomber jackets.

Boris

08-19-2008 02:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The Grell kind of remind me of the Affronters from Excession - tentacles, beaks, gas sacks et al.

JRM

08-19-2008 05:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9258270)

Spelljammer, rather - I don't think they played a significant role in Planescape.

Gah, what was I doing, I was thinking of all those Spelljammer ships and Planescape typed out. Oh well, such things happen.

Brutus

08-19-2008 05:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hello Gremlins, my old friends.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9258352)

Gremlin

No, not Mogwai. Just one of those "chaotic and mischievous" D&D monsters that we all, er, love so much. Irritating bastards with which to annoy your players, basically, summed up in the line in the second paragraph which runs, "The angrier their victims are, the happier the Gremlins" - although that's by no means a bad thing. If you're the DM

Gremlins always seemed like an attempt to put the fae back into goblins. Maybe literally ;). They can produce hybrids with all the goblins. Awww yeah baby. So now we get various flying and non flying goblinoid tricksters with varying degrees of malice and mischief on their fickle little minds. They're not really "evil" or serious enough to be part of any big-bad equation on their own. These are the goblins I always wanted. They have some few things in common with their gremlin namesake, and it's not too hard to imagine them sabotaging a carriage or plaguing a fleet of spelljammer ships. Now where do we shoehorn them into a game otherwise?

Adventure hooks that don't have you playing ghostbusters to an infestation of gremlins in a quiet hamlet or spelljammer ship are hard to come by. Gremlins have a marked tendency to play comic relief. Especially the fremlin, who takes the vaunted goblinoid Jar Jar role in a group. He's an exciting way for a DM to torture players for entertainment. And really... Isn't that what the game is all about?

They don't stand and fight. They're not worth much xp. They're a chance for some fun. They annoy and vanish. Have I mentioned how much I want to play one as a PC?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9258352)

There's some ecology fluff ("Gremlins originate in an unknown plane plane of existence." Grr...) but what do we care Gremlins like to torment people with humiliating traps, the nastier the better, and that's their raison d'etre.

Now this is the odd part. I don't know what setting this entry originated in, but I feel like there's something else happening here. This plane of existence thing has to have meant something in its original context. In any game I chair this plane of existence is the yonder, fae wild, call it what you'd like. Gremlins are near the lowest tier of fae existence, (not far above squeakers and stwigers) but they're a sign that you're not entirely in Kansas anymore. They would herald the coming of other fae and intrigue. Or they would be attached to it like rats riding the boat to the new world.

Gremlins are the vermin of their "plane of existence", surely. They find their way into the world through cracks or portals into reality and go joyriding. Few where they come from would miss them, care, or be interested in their doings here. But an infestation of gremlins in quantity means that something may notice the exodus of the annoying little things. The way into the world they traverse is big enough for their larger cousins, bred from more powerful fae and more powerful goblin stock may come calling. Goblins, ogres, spriggans or any of the creatures cribbed from faerie tales could fall under this heading. A party of PCs could find themselves driving off a surprising number of these annoyances as they stop in an isolated village to recuperate. They are haunted (gremlin), annoyed (fremlin), ankle bitten (galltrit), Harassed and humiliated and their iron rations devastated (mite), and their pockets picked (snyad). Jermlaine surely begin to infest the walls of houses in the later stages. All the residents will be shaved and trussed up naked in the streets by morning.

Then larger things begin to leave footprints in town leading from the woods. Find the source, storm the breach, save the town before everyone is shaved hairless, their children stolen by fae elves, and everyone is gobbled up by ogres.

Quote:

Mite - "Mites are tiny, mischievous, wingless gremlins that waylay dungeon adventurers for fun and profit."

Mites are just low-rent Jermlaine. Snyads are the other half of that equation. Who knows why we got them all? We just needed more varieties of the little bastards to showcase the line that says they get very friendly with all the goblin species. Jermlaine are cooler and have a much longer entry - as well as a much deserved DiTerlizzi illustration.

JRM

08-19-2008 05:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9258917)

All the sub-races except the fremlin originated in the Fiend Folio (and presumably White Dwarf before that). The whole gremlin thing was tacked on later. The first gremlins that I remember seeing were in Dragon #79, and the plane they came from was Earth — specifically, Earth during WW2. Think aviator goggles and bomber jackets.

...and Bugs Bunny, at least if you're anything like me. WW2 gremlins usually remind me of Falling Hare, which is now viewable as a public domain video.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brutus (Post 9259578)

Now this is the odd part. I don't know what setting this entry originated in, but I feel like there's something else happening here. This plane of existence thing has to have meant something in its original context. In any game I cha this plane of existence is the yonder, fae wild, call it what you'd like. Gremlins are near the lowest tier of fae existence, (not far above squeakers and stwigers) but they're a sign that you're not entirely in Kansas anymore. They would herald the coming of other fae and intrigue. Or they would be attached to it like rats riding the boat to the new world.

I have a vague memory of an old Dragon magazine article which strongly suggested gremlins came from Earth, or an alternative version of it ... Hmm, yup, it was probably Dragon #79. An April issue, needless to say.

DMH

08-19-2008 07:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9258352)

Snyad - These are expert thieves, snatching things right out of adventurers' hands. Dropped in is the fact that they "mate for life", which doesn't sound particularly Gremlin-like to me.

You missed their AC (-4) and speed (almost twice that of humans). In tunnel situations, it is easy to have one take something from a PC's belt and then run into a hole that leads to their lair.

noisms

08-19-2008 08:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9259789)

You missed their AC (-4) and speed (almost twice that of humans). In tunnel situations, it is easy to have one take something from a PC's belt and then run into a hole that leads to their lair.

See, this is why it's good to have such a knowledgeable and sharp-eyed readership. ;)

Canis Major

08-19-2008 09:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I think Gremlins first appeared in a Basic D&D iteration, perhaps Castle Amber.

I think mites were originally a sub-race of jermaline, taken from the Descent/Drow original series.

Nathan P. Mahney

08-20-2008 01:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Oh, and just back on the Grell for a second - they were created by Ian Livingstone, co-founder of Games Workshop and the Fighting Fantasy gamebooks. Which automatically makes them super-awesome.

noisms

08-20-2008 01:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9263740)

Oh, and just back on the Grell for a second - they were created by Ian Livingstone, co-founder of Games Workshop and the Fighting Fantasy gamebooks. Which automatically makes them super-awesome.

Serious? Was that in one of the FF books? I'm wracking my brains to see if I can remember - I must have read the whole series.

noisms

08-21-2008 01:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Gremlin, Jermlaine

An amazingly long entry for these creatures, who are incredibly minor in the grand scheme of things. Two pages seems rather a lot for what is essentially a tiny, malevolent variety of gnome. Able to communicate with rats, and infesting underground tunnel systems, they wait in the shadows to ambush the unwary.

Their main job is to dart out and cut bag straps, steal things, trip people, and in some cases disenchant magic items. Preferably they disable opponents, beat them senseless, and then either eat them (5% chance) or leave them shaved, naked, and trussed up ready to be eaten by, say, a Carrion Crawler.

There's an interesting little bit of pseudo psychology in the entry to explain the Jermlaines' destructive impulses: they are apparently suffering from a massive Napolean complex (if you excuse the pun) which causes them to want to take sadistic revenge on 'normal sized' humanoids. I'm not sure I like that - I think the idea of cruelty for cruelty's sake is more in keeping with the idea of the monster.

There are quite a few adventure hooks scattered liberally throughout the entry (it seems like a while since there has been a good adventure hook), mostly to do with dead bodies:

1 - Jermlaine are essentially dungeon-cleaners who scavenge dead bodies. This means that if adventurers are looking for somebody lost down a dungeon, Jermlaine are the men to know, so to speak.

2 - They can be allied with and, presumably, used as spies, although they have a unreasonably high chance of breaking such alliances (75%). They like sweets, through which they can possibly be induced into cooperation.

3 - They usually know everything about everyone who passes through their territory. The knowledge can probably be had, for a price, although it is likely to be unreliable...

Final point of interest: the entry feels it necessary to point out that crossbreeding with Jermlaine is impossible - as if it needed to be pointed out that trying to mate with a 1' tall humanoid isn't likely to work!

demiurge1138

08-21-2008 01:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I remember that crossbreeding thing! Weird. I guess, if you were trying to come up with the components of a mongrelfolk, that that information might come in handy...

One of my players (same guy who played the vegan ghoul) loves jermlaine to death. In a high-level Planescape game, which was specifically anything-goes, character-wise, he played the Crazy Rat Man, a druid who lived in the catacombs and sewers beneath Sigil. His Charisma was 2! He could only communicate by repeating what he had heard recently verbatim. Which, of course, made it hilarious when the game turned out to be high-stakes interplanar diplomacy. He was still quite useful, though: sneaking to the other diplomat's rooms to spy on them, for example.

JRM

08-21-2008 09:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9263875)

Serious? Was that in one of the FF books? I'm wracking my brains to see if I can remember - I must have read the whole series.

It wasn't in a Fighting Fantasy book, Ian Livingstone invented the grell as a D&D monster for White Dwarf magazine's Fiend Factory column, many of the better entries of which went into the Fiend Folio. Mr Livingstone was an editor and co-founder of said publication.

The fellow must have been awfully fond of the acronym 'FF', there's three of them in that first sentence.

DMH

08-21-2008 09:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

For some reason they remind me more of Crites than Gremlins even though they don't eat people??

Crinos

08-21-2008 09:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9267670)

For some reason they remind me more of Crites than Gremlins even though they don't eat people??

The Jermlaine remind me of those tiny evil mini ashes from Army of Darkness.

Nathan P. Mahney

08-21-2008 11:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ian also gave us the Hook Horror, so far as semi-iconic D&D monsters go. Strangely enough, his partner in crime Steve Jackson doesn't have a single monster in the Fiend Folio.

Crinos

08-21-2008 11:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9268090)

Ian also gave us the Hook Horror, so far as semi-iconic D&D monsters go. Strangely enough, his partner in crime Steve Jackson doesn't have a single monster in the Fiend Folio.

Steve was saving all of his good ideas for GURPS.

Nathan P. Mahney

08-21-2008 12:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Though I'm not sure if you're joking or not... different Steve Jackson. The GURPs guy is American, the Games Workshop and Fighting Fantasy co-founder is English. Though funnily enough, GURPS Steve Jackson wrote some Fighting Fantasy gamebooks as well.

Crinos

08-21-2008 12:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9268244)

Though I'm not sure if you're joking or not... different Steve Jackson. The GURPs guy is American, the Games Workshop and Fighting Fantasy co-founder is English. Though funnily enough, GURPS Steve Jackson wrote some Fighting Fantasy gamebooks as well.

Wow, so they're are two guys named Steve Jackson that work in the rpg industry. Did not know that.

noisms

08-21-2008 03:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9268305)

Wow, so they're are two guys named Steve Jackson that work in the rpg industry. Did not know that.

The British Steve Jackson is my hero. I used to love the Final Fantasy books - especially the Sorcery! mini series he came up with solo.

kelvingreen

08-21-2008 09:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9263875)

Serious? Was that in one of the FF books? I'm wracking my brains to see if I can remember - I must have read the whole series.

A lot of the original Fiend Folio monsters first appeared in White Dwarf, and a good number of them were created by Ian Livingstone, who was editor and contributor of WD at the time. As far as I'm aware, there's been no crossover from Fighting Fantasy, which comes as a surprise, as there were some neat monsters in there; a Gonchong would be a great surprise for a D&D party.

glass

08-21-2008 09:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9268305)

Wow, so they're are two guys named Steve Jackson that work in the rpg industry. Did not know that.

Confused me for a while, too.

glass.

noisms

08-22-2008 11:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Griffon

Man, talk about beating you over the head with the idea that Griffons like to eat horses. I counted more than 10 mentions of horses, and how Griffons like to eat them a whole lot, in the first dozen or so lines. Anyway, Griffons like horses, and will fight to the death when horseflesh is at stake. They spend their lives soaring around on the look out for horses, and are 90% likely to attack anybody riding a horse who they see - but the rider can usually get away by releasing his or her horses for the Griffons to eat, and the horse horse horse the horseflesh horse horse. Horse.

Horseplay aside, I do like Griffons, hippogriffs, pegasi, unicorns and other "not quite dragons but still based on real-world mythology" monsters. They're easy to envisage for the players and the DM, and there's something iconic and archetypal about them: when a monster often appears on coats-of-arms and embossed on knights' shields, you know that it taps into some undercurrent of psychic energy buried deep within the human soul, or something.

I always found it unusual that Griffons should lay eggs, though. Okay, they have beaks and wings, but the organs relevant to reproduction are a lion's, surely. Then again, it wouldn't do to press the point too much, as Griffon eggs (at 2,000 gp a pop) are clearly one of the stalwarts of my patented Egg Thief Campaign idea.

An obvious plot hook is the theft of Griffon fledglings to be raised as mounts for a vain nobleman or other. Or, alternatively, for the goody-two-shoes party: returning a captured fledgling to its parents. Aww.

Sleeper

08-22-2008 12:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Now I want to play an awakened griffin trying to kick "horse". Shakes, interventions, 12 step programs, waiting in line for the daily dole of horse substitute, self-loathing after going on a binge in the royal stables....

Belchion

08-22-2008 04:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Griffons 11 - a band of griffons up to sneak into a very well protected horse stable to get some handful of finest horse meat. The heroes are there to catch the griffons before they succeed (or to catch them after their success).

kelvingreen

08-22-2008 05:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9272862)

Now I want to play an awakened griffin trying to kick "horse". Shakes, interventions, 12 step programs, waiting in line for the daily dole of horse substitute...

That Stone to (Horse) Flesh spell is looking more viable now, isn't it?

glass

08-22-2008 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9272862)

Now I want to play an awakened griffin trying to kick "horse". Shakes, interventions, 12 step programs, waiting in line for the daily dole of horse substitute, self-loathing after going on a binge in the royal stables....

One of the old cartoons in Dragon had a talking griffon who was most put out at the suggestion he would eat horses, to the point of laying it on a bit thick. Maybe he was your guy a few years down the line?

glass.

Sleeper

08-22-2008 07:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9273661)

That Stone to (Horse) Flesh spell is looking more viable now, isn't it?

The law of sympathy... shape = taste? Take the form, take on the flavor. Craft a piece of stone into a beautiful horse then turn it into a horse-shaped piece of flesh (boneless even), and the griffins gorge themselves in a frenzy. The best maedar sculptors might be in demand as haute cuisine chefs, creating exotic flavor combinations via creative chipping.

JRM

08-22-2008 08:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9272862)

Now I want to play an awakened griffin trying to kick "horse". Shakes, interventions, 12 step programs, waiting in line for the daily dole of horse substitute, self-loathing after going on a binge in the royal stables....

Well the bit about Griffins attacking horses is from Medieval and Classical Greek Bestiaries, which also say they're maneaters and have a habit of digging up gold and gems (to decorate their nests?). One source says men can make drinking horns from their claws, plus bows from their ribs and pens (flight feathers) - although I'd have thought the latter would be more suited for arrows.

It's curious that the AD&D version makes no mention of the treasure-collecting habit, it's an obvious adventure hook - maybe the players try to distract the Griffins with a couple of old nags while they steal its gold and/or gems. If they're evil it'd be easier if they just smeared poison over the horse, then they'd get griffin-parts to sell as well.

Some medieval bestiaries say griffins were huge, "eight times larger than a lion", although there are some sources that suggest they're of more modest dimensions, about horse or lion sized. Look at these pictures, that's a horse the first griffin is clutching, and a man in the second one (who, if he's a six-footer would make the griffin the size of a shire horse).

<http://bestiary.ca/beastimage/img4458.jpg>

http://www.eso-garden.com/images/upl...uscripts_2.jpg

The ancient Greeks usually describe griffins as being smaller, horse to wolf-sized. Here are some classical Greek vase paintings that show lion- or pony-sized griffins:

<http://www.theoi.com/image/M16.3Grypes.jpg>

<http://www.theoi.com/image/M16.2Gryps.jpg>

Apropos of nothing I've long preferred the alternative spelling Gryphon, partly because the ancient Greeks usually spelled the beast's name with a Y, but mainly just because it looks nicer.

sim_james

08-22-2008 09:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9272698)

Man, talk about beating you over the head with the idea that Griffons like to eat horses. I counted more than 10 mentions of horses, and how Griffons like to eat them a whole lot, in the first dozen or so lines. Anyway, Griffons like horses, and will fight to the death when horseflesh is at stake. They spend their lives soaring around on the look out for horses, and are 90% likely to attack anybody riding a horse who they see - but the rider can usually get away by releasing his or her horses for the Griffons to eat, and the horse horse horse the horseflesh horse horse. Horse.

To be fair, horses were pretty important back in The Olden Days. Residents of Your Campaign World may very well consider the griffon's horse-eating ways to be of direst importance and dreadful to consider. Who cares if the mind flayers are building a brain empire deep beneath the earth? At least they're not after your horses!

Back before 3.5 turned paladin's steeds into pokemon, a few griffons was a great way to make Sir Poncy feel a bit nervous.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9272698)

I always found it unusual that Griffons should lay eggs, though. Okay, they have beaks and wings, but the organs relevant to reproduction are a lion's, surely.

Clearly, griffons are monotremes. Like the platypus.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9272698)

An obvious plot hook is the theft of Griffon fledglings to be raised as mounts for a vain nobleman or other.

The way I'd run that is to make the Profit! seem appealing, only to reveal that, like a house full of otters, what initially seems manageable and kinda cute is in fact a chaotic catastrophe waiting to happen. ;)

kami2awa

08-22-2008 10:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9274051)

Clearly, griffons are monotremes. Like the platypus.

Haha! Brilliant... the platypus is probably the closest thing to a griffon IRL. It looks like it's half beaver, half duck; maybe evolution will one day give us a large, predatory platypus with an eagle-like beak.

demiurge1138

08-23-2008 02:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've heard a theory posited that griffons were inspired by Scythian stories about the bones of Protoceratops, a smallish dinosaur.

<http://scienceblogs.com/afarensis/up...ratops%202.jpg>

Huge beak, the body's sort of leoine if you squint, big scapulae for wing-attachment... I can buy it.

Crinos

08-23-2008 02:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9275087)

I've heard a theory posited that griffons were inspired by Scythian stories about the bones of Protoceratops, a smallish dinosaur.

<http://scienceblogs.com/afarensis/up...ratops%202.jpg>

Huge beak, the body's sort of leoine if you squint, big scapulae for wing-attachment... I can buy it.

I have a book of drawings of creatures from fantasy novels and myths, and they have a drawing of a Griffin that's based on those skeletons. Looks more like a dinosaur with feathers than a lion/bird hybrid.

Sleeper

08-23-2008 07:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9275097)

I have a book of drawings of creatures from fantasy novels and myths, and they have a drawing of a Griffin that's based on those skeletons. Looks more like a dinosaur with feathers than a lion/bird hybrid.

Well, all known dinosaurs with feathers are saurischian coelurosaurs, and Protoceratops is an ornithischian.

Still a neat theory. Especially plausible if it was based on a skull and couple scattered bones, and not an articulated specimen. After all fossils are usually jumbled and require considerably expertise to reassemble, and the biggest bones have the best chance of surviving (like the humerus, or the the skulls of ceratopsians). Far more plausible than pinning the unicorn myths on supposed sightings of Elasmotherium (a huge rhino with a giant horn that went extinct hundreds of thousands of years ago), for instance.

Crinos

08-23-2008 07:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9276135)

Well, all known dinosaurs with feathers are saurischian coelurosaurs, and Protoceratops is an ornithischian.

Still a neat theory. Especially plausible if it was based on a skull and couple scattered bones, and not an articulated specimen. After all fossils are usually jumbled and require considerably expertise to reassemble, and the biggest bones have the best chance of surviving (like the humerus, or the the skulls of ceratopsians). Far more plausible than pinning the unicorn myths on supposed sightings of Elasmotherium (a huge rhino with a giant horn that went extinct hundreds of thousands of years ago), for instance.

And people thought Mammoth skulls belonged to Cyclops, because they assumed the big hole in the center was an eye socket.

Khuxan

08-23-2008 06:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Wow... Over the last two or three days I've read through both of these huge threads - all 161 pages of them. It's been a pretty incredible journey.

These threads have inspired me to try a Dogs in the Vineyard-style game, with isolated villages and towns each succumbed to some sort of monstrous problem. Often, in a preachy, moralistic way, the outsiders will purify the village only to realise the corruption came from within the hearts of man, not the wilds beyond the town walls. I'm not sure if I'll use Reign or Labyrinth Lord or 4E, but in any case I'll definitely be using gnolls, ghouls, dragons and golems.

Thanks!

JRM

08-23-2008 09:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9276135)

Well, all known dinosaurs with feathers are saurischian coelurosaurs, and Protoceratops is an ornithischian.

True enough, but not really relevant since the people who came up with the idea of griffins lived thousands of years before Owens even coined the term dinosaur, or people had associated them with feathers for that matter.

The Protoceratops-Griffin theory is an interesting idea though. There are enough connections (e.g. ancient Greek stories about Gryphons and Scythians, the central Asian location, the gold, Scythian artworks of griffins, Protoceratops fossils & eggs) to make it possible, but its just speculation. They could have just developed the idea of a lion-eagle chimera from scratch, there are plenty of winged monsters in mythology which don't appear to derive from a single animal, living or extinct - winged bulls, winged horses, winged lions, winged humanoids (some with animal heads), winged bulls with lion's paws and man's faces et cetera et cetera.

Oskar Breytenbach

08-24-2008 08:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9277744)
but its just speculation. They could have just developed the idea of a lion-eagle chimera from scratch Exactly - people have always had imaginations. I'd always pick that as the most likely explanation.

see

08-25-2008 01:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9268244)
Though I'm not sure if you're joking or not... different Steve Jackson. The GURPs guy is American, the Games Workshop and Fighting Fantasy co-founder is English. Though funnily enough, GURPS Steve Jackson wrote some Fighting Fantasy gamebooks as well.

Those Fighting Fantasy books make the U.S. Steve Jackson one of the few people in the world to have ghost-written something under his own name.

The Last Conformist

08-25-2008 09:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The coat of arms of Östergötland, the Swedish province in which I live, depicts a griffon with the wings of a dragon rather than those of an eagle:

http://upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedi...at_of_arms.png

Clearly we need rules for the hybrid offspring of griffons and dragons!

Crowetron

08-25-2008 09:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Y'know, I once commented to a friend that "there should be Grifgons in DnD". He misheard me, and came up with something far more awesome than a half griffon/half dragon.

ascendance

08-25-2008 09:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9180074)

God, I'd forgotten about these. It's funny how the Dragonlance universe had not one but TWO of the most irritating D&D races ever. The less said about these the better (you'll understand if you've read any Dragonlance novels)

You forgot the third race of annoyingness... the Gully Dwarf.

Crinos

08-25-2008 10:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crowetron (Post 9282061)

Y'know, I once commented to a friend that "there should be Griffons in DnD". He misheard me, and came up with something far more awesome than a half griffon/half dragon.

Which is probably why they made the half dragon template in dnd.

noisms

08-25-2008 02:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by ascendance (Post 9282076)

You forgot the third race of annoyingness... the Gully Dwarf.

I have a mental block there - like how people often can't recall childhood traumas.

Gully Dwarfs? What Gully Dwarfs?

Anyway, update soon. Things are hellishly busy.

Crinos

08-25-2008 02:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Don't look now Noism's but I've Bit your style.

Gonna try and hit one monster a day. Hopefully it will pick up as much interest as this bad boy did.

noisms

08-26-2008 09:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Grimlock

Grimlocks: the Zatoichi of D&D. Blind warriors with such good sense of hearing and smell that they can fight and kill. Is it believable? Not really. Do I care? Not a jot. The blind warrior trope is cool. Grimlocks also have one of the better non-Diterlizzi pictures in the book; the featured Grimlock looks a bit like one of the members of Kiss on a particularly bad hair day, but everything is in proportion and quite 1980's-comic-book in style.

Grimlocks are like big, muscular ape-men with metal hair and blank eyes, who like to chop you up with big axes. The best way to fight Grimlocks is to use spells which make noise, or else to throw strong-smelling perfumes at them; this is like blinding the creatures, given that they have such well developed hearing and scent. Nice idea, but one of those things that's difficult to DM: How do you separate player knowledge from character knowledge in cases like that?

The other notable thing about Grimlocks is that they are cannibals (man-eaters, strictly speaking), and perform the function of, basically, bin-men for Illithids: the Mind Flayers eat the brains and the Grimlocks then chomp on the bodies. This often 'decimates' their communities through disease - perhaps the only mention in the MM of a monster race having any sort of ill-effects from the dissolute lifestyle it leads. As well as being chummy with Illithids, the things also sometimes knock around with Medusae - for obvious reasons. Quite a nice touch, that, although you have to wonder where Medusae and Grimlocks meet up to make such arrangements. During the monster mash, maybe.

It should be noted that Grimlocks are Neutral Evil, which doesn't really make sense to me - surely they're Chaotic Evil, based on the contents of the entry?

David J Prokopetz

08-26-2008 10:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9287667)

It should be noted that Grimlocks are Neutral Evil, which doesn't really make sense to me - surely they're Chaotic Evil based on the contents of the entry?

I tend to think of neutral evil as the "we can sort of cooperate in groups and will only kill each other if there's advantage to be had" alignment, as opposed to chaotic evil's "we'll flip out and kill each other just because".

kelvingreen

08-26-2008 10:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I seem to remember that the Grimlock picture in the 1e MM showed them with some kind of metal grill in their mouth. It didn't appear in later editions, so I assume it must have been some sort of weird error.

EDIT: Oops, it was the Fiend Folio, I think.

David J Prokopetz

08-26-2008 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9287881)

I seem to remember that the Grimlock picture in the 1e MM showed them with some kind of metal grill in their mouth. It didn't appear in later editions, so I assume it must have been some sort of weird error.

Perhaps that particular grimlock had braces. Underdark races have very advanced dentistry. They basically have to - I mean, have you seen the teeth on some of those beasties?

Zartes

08-27-2008 12:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9287901)

Perhaps that particular grimlock had braces. Underdark races have very advanced dentistry. They basically have to - mean, have you seen the teeth on some of those beasties?

OOooooo... now you've done it. You've given me an idea for a campaign.

The players are a group of specialists of various sorts (Dentist, cobbler, other stuff that doesn't spring to mind right now) who wander around the underdark supplying their services to anybody they encounter (well, anybody who doesn't immediately try to eat them. That's why everybody would have combat training), for a fee. Adventure ensues, of course, when they get caught up in various political and territorial disputes, through which they can wander with semi-impunity thanks to the fact nobody wants to piss off the only dentist for several hundred miles.

JRM

08-27-2008 12:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9287667)

Grimlock

It should be noted that Grimlocks are Neutral Evil, which doesn't really make sense to me - surely they're Chaotic Evil, based on the contents of the entry?

I've liked Grimlocks since the Fiend Folio, but never really used them. There was just something about the idea of eyeless cannibalistic humans lurking in the deep caverns, creeping out at night to prey upon the surface dwellers, that appealed to me.

That said, I don't like them being pure carnivores. There are already far too many such monsters in D&D for it to be credible. My campaign's version of grimlocks are omnivores, mainly eating roots and mushrooms but lusting for the luxury of flesh, especially human. Not all their victims are immediately eaten, the unfortunate ones are kept as slaves, facing a grisly life of darkness and pain - I assume torture is a popular Grimlock pastime, them being Evil and all.

I had a nice outline for a Grimlock scenario I never got around to playing, based around a group of low-level PCs discovering what happened to people who have been disappearing from some isolated settlements. I remember they'd come across a 'trusty' Grimlock slave who was so broken that the "Masters" let him farm mushrooms with little supervision, who the PCs could capture as a guide. The poor wretch was missing his eyes, and his legs below his knees - the latter as a result of a failed escape attempt shortly after he was captured. It was the last time he remembered seeing light, which the Grimlocks provided so he could see them eat his feet.

Canis Major

08-27-2008 12:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ah! Perhaps the Grimlock are responsible for the Gibberlings?

Results of their torture experiments?

Defected grimlocks born with sight? The grimlocks wont slay thier mutant offspring, but put them into pens until they need to release them, arming them with short swords. Unleashed upon the surface world, they devastate a region, and afterwards the grimlocks creep above to gather survivors and loot. They could also use them as a weapon against other underdark races, who may find them easily channeled into other direction.

Or, going back to just the gibberlings, perhaps they are a result of mind flayer feeding...every so often a victim survives the brain eating, and transfroms slowly into a gibberling. Again the mind flayers or their slaves gather these things up, arm them and use them as a living weapon.

Or they are failed results of the mind flayers' breeding, where the ceramorphosis doesn't take.

YojimboC

08-27-2008 12:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Grimlocks are kind of dumb. So their senses of smell and hearing allow them to "see" within 20 feet?

Dwarves have darkvision (or wasn't that infravision in 2E?) out to 60 feet. Talk about surprise round. A handful of dwarven crossbowers would wipe out a gang of grimlocks before the grimlocks were even remotely aware of their presence.

Heck, orcs and goblins would wipe these guys out without too much trouble. I think grimlocks would have to retreat under the protection of illithids just to survive, which would give them an interesting niche: Mind Flayer garbagemen.

Malignant Marionette

08-27-2008 06:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I think someone whose hearing is so keen they "see" everything within 20 feet would hear noises coming from a bit farther away than that. I mean, even I can hear noises from more than 20 feet away and I can barely manage to not bump into furniture too much in my own home if I close my eyes and walk really slowly.

JasonK

08-27-2008 07:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9289481)

I think someone whose hearing is so keen they "see" everything within 20 feet would hear noises coming from a bit farther away than that. I mean, even I can hear noises from more than 20 feet away and I can barely manage to not bump into furniture too much in my own home if I close my eyes and walk really slowly.

Your furniture emits noise to let you know where it is? Or is it more that you remember where that stuff is from looking at it and have a good mental map?

The point in your first sentence still stands, of course, but your logic for getting there is a little fuzzy, that's all. :)

~ jason

6inTruder

08-27-2008 07:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9289714)

Your furniture emits noise to let you know where it is?

Yours DON'T?!

JasonK

08-27-2008 08:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9289855)
Yours DON'T?!

Only my TV and my 'Fridge. :)

~ jason

Celisasu

08-27-2008 09:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9287667)

Grimlock

It should be noted that Grimlocks are Neutral Evil, which doesn't really make sense to me - surely they're Chaotic Evil based on the contents of the entry?

Remember, this is 2nd Edition. Nobody could agree on what the alignments meant. Look at the descriptions of various characters in different settings such as Lawful Good(in official suppliments) elves for Dragonlance that condone slavery. Or Chaotic Good Alustriel in Forgotten Realms who is an avid supporter bringing law and order to the Silver Marches and follows those laws more religiously than everyone else there. I think they just spun a wheel and whatever alignment it landed on became the official alignment half the time.

Matthew L. Martin

08-27-2008 09:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu (Post 9290069)

Remember, this is 2nd Edition. Nobody could agree on what the alignments meant. Look at the descriptions of various characters in different settings such as Lawful Good(in official suppliments) elves for Dragonlance that condone slavery.

Bad choice of evidence if you really want to limit this to 2nd Edition. In Dragonlance, "Lawful Good" has translated as "self-righteous, hypocritical Lawful Evil" since First Edition, and I think it persisted into 3rd to some extent as well.

noisms

08-27-2008 10:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Matthew L. Martin (Post 9290144)

Bad choice of evidence if you really want to limit this to 2nd Edition. In Dragonlance, "Lawful Good" has translated a "self-righteous, hypocritical Lawful Evil" since First Edition, and I think it persisted into 3rd to some extent as well.

The moral of the story being that you shouldn't pay much attention to Dragonlance if you can possibly help it.

Crinos

08-27-2008 10:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu (Post 9290069)

Remember, this is 2nd Edition. Nobody could agree on what the alignments meant. Look at the descriptions of various characters in different settings such as Lawful Good(in official suppliments) elves for Dragonlance that condone slavery. Or Chaotic Good Alustriel in Forgotten Realms who is an avid supporter bringing law and order to the Silver Marches and follows those laws more religiously than everyone else there. I think they just spun a wheel and whatever alignment it landed on became the official alignment half the time.

Yeah, in the spelljammer appendix there's a lawful good creature whose primary goal is to mentally enslave and dominate anyone he comes across.

kami2awa

08-27-2008 05:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9290022)

Only my TV and my 'Fridge. :)

~ jason

It's a fantasy world... maybe the Grimlocks hear the infrasonic singing of Earth elementals resonating through the Underdark and use that to know where things are.

noisms

08-27-2008 05:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9291537)

It's a fantasy world... maybe the Grimlocks hear the infrasonic singing of Earth elementals resonating through the Underdark and use that to know where things are.

Like whalesong. Then they could set up massage and aromatherapy parlours for stressed out gibberlings.

Celisasu

08-27-2008 06:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9290391)

Yeah, in the spelljammer appendix there's a lawful good creature whose primary goal is to mentally enslave and dominate anyone he comes across.

Oh? What creature does this? Doesn't have any Spelljammer stuff

JRM

08-27-2008 08:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9289481)

I think someone whose hearing is so keen they "see" everything within 20 feet would hear noises coming from a bit farther away than that. I mean, even I can hear noises from more than 20 feet away and I can barely manage to not bump into furniture too much in my own home if I close my eyes and walk really slowly.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9289714)

Your furniture emits noise to let you know where it is? Or is it more that you remember where that stuff is from looking at it and have a good mental map?

The point in your first sentence still stands, of course, but your logic for getting there is a little fuzzy, that's all. :)

Aren't you missing the point? Surely it's a question of precision vs range. A grimlock's ear&nose-vision can accurately target creatures up to 20' away, but it's reasonable to suppose it allows the creatures to be aware of the sound & smell of creatures at considerably greater distances. A dwarf with 60' infravision can target warm bodies up to 60' away, but what about greater distances?

Unfortunately AD&D is vague on this issue, a lot of sources seem to assume that a sense just cuts off at its range limit, so the grimlock wouldn't be able to "see" a herd of ogres playing steel drums if they were 21' feet away, and a dwarf's infravision would be blind to a nest of salamander more than twenty yards off. That is, of course, very silly.

JRM

08-27-2008 08:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9290391)

Yeah, in the spelljammer appendix there's a lawful good creature whose primary goal is to mentally enslave and dominate anyone he comes across.

Personally, I welcome our new Formian overlords. :)

(Originally Formians came from the outer plane of Arcadia, so they were LG/LN rather than pure LN as they are now. Add in the Taskmasters slavery ability and you've effectively got LG Borg.)

Crinos

08-27-2008 10:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

IIRC the LG enslaving creature was what was left of a guy who was left out in the phlogiston. Basically it was this half dead emaciated guy who couldn't move and would take over a spelljammer crew one at a time after they brought him aboard.

You know, typical lawful good stuff.

Malignant Marionette

08-27-2008 10:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9289714)

Your furniture emits noise to let you know where it is? Or is it more that you remember where that stuff is from looking at it and have a good mental map?

The latter, which is why I said 'in my apartment'. In anyone else's I'd probably be feeling my way forwards, whereas that grimlock would probably 'see' the furniture when the soundwaves from his footsteps bounce back from them, or something. Kind of like a bat-like sonar ability.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9289714)

The point in your first sentence still stands, of course, but your logic for getting there is a little fuzzy, that's all. :)

I'm not sure my logic has ever been too clear to anyone else, actually. :p

JRM

08-27-2008 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9292077)

IIRC the LG enslaving creature was what was left of a guy who was left out in the phlogiston. Basically it was this half dead emaciated guy who couldn't move and would take over a spelljammer crew one at a time after they brought him aboard.

You know, typical lawful good stuff.

Doesn't ring any bells I'm afraid, the closest Spelljammer monster to that description I could find was the Ancient Mariner, which are phlogiston undead who'll try to convert a ship and it's crew into their own ghostly condition, but they're incorporeal, mobile and Chaotic Evil (at least in 3rd edition).

Crinos

08-27-2008 11:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9292217)

Doesn't ring any bells I'm afraid, the closest Spelljammer monster to that description I could find was the Ancient Mariner, which are phlogiston undead who'll try to convert a ship and it's crew into their own ghostly condition, but they're incorporeal, mobile and Chaotic Evil (at least in 3rd edition).

Well, I'll make the spelljammer compendium my next DnD related purchase and get back to you.

DMH

08-28-2008 12:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9291866)

(Originally Formians came from the outer plane of Arcadia, so they were LG/LN rather than pure LN as they are now. Add in the Taskmasters slavery ability and you've effectively got LG Borg.)

Actually originally they were Prime Plane dwellers that acted like ants (see 1e MM II). They had different color schemes to tell the different colonies apart. I didn't care much for them, but they were better than the planar things they turned into.

noisms

08-28-2008 12:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9292493)

Actually originally they were Prime Plane dwellers that acted like ants (see 1e MM II). They had different color schemes to tell the different colonies apart. I didn't care much for them, but they were better than the planar things they turned into.

I rather liked their Planescape incarnation, found in Planes of Law, I think.

noisms

08-28-2008 01:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Grippli

A real oddity, these: big tree frogs with opposable thumbs who live like Amazonian Indians deep in the jungle. A neutral versions of Bullywugs or Tasloi, maybe. As you might expect, they are experts at camouflage and ambush, and like dart traps, nets, blowguns, and other malarkey and tomfoolery and skylarking of that ilk.

They're interesting in a low-grade sort of way, if only because I've never known anyone to use of them in a game, making them a bit of a novelty. Unusually for a minor D&D race, they seem to have an entire pantheon of Gods, including "evil snake gods and spider goddesses" as well as their patron "small frog like deity". I don't know about you, but if I was a Grippli, I'd want to worship a really BIG frog like deity, I think. Anyway, somewhat unusual, as I said: apart from Goblins and Orcs, who have pantheons, it's usually just the case that there is a God of the Gnolls or God of the Lizardmen or what have you. I'm not sure why Grippli warrant a pantheon, but next time I run a Planescape campaign the characters are going to end up visiting their realm. Near Semuanya's Bog, maybe.

Grippli matriarchs have the blood of their God flowing in their bodies. I suspect that could feature in a Herculean Task style campaign: "You must bring me the blood of a God! Mwahahahaha!"

Wakboth

08-28-2008 01:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The grippli lifespan - 700 years?! - and the fact that they give birth to, say, six young in that time, is another lovely little whacked piece of D&D ecology. :)

Celisasu

08-28-2008 01:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The grippli beg for a campaign world where they're the dominant race. Have the PCs go through a portal to an alternative world where they meet their grippli selves. :p

DMH

08-28-2008 02:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Why aren't they poisonous- aren't they modeled after dart frogs?

I did use them once many years ago. They were tribesmen at war with something (tasloi?) and the PCs had to defend their village. The players didn't like it because there was no ground per se (it was a swamp) and the tree dwellers (maybe it was su-monsters?) had a lot of concealment (sp). The rewards were worth it- free healing and other magic whenever they were in the area (which was a lot).

6inTruder

08-28-2008 05:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9291537)

It's a fantasy world... maybe the Grimlocks hear the infrasonic singing of Earth elementals resonating through the Underdark and use that to know where things are.

What? So they listen to the Hum of the Earth.... Maybe they worship the Locust King and do all sorts of stuff in the Dreaming too???

Sleeper

08-28-2008 10:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Xaos (Post 9288216)

Ah! Perhaps the Grimlock are responsible for the Gibberlings?

For their gibberling pets? I can picture a grimlock matriarch with her shock white hair trying to escape a bun, stooped over cane, peering up sightlessly from a face collapsed into wrinkles around a perfectly-preserved set of teeth filed into points. Scampering and squealing at the end of a leash is her pet gibberling, as she takes him on a walk through the Underdark. Her pet wears a collar festooned with tinkly dangly things, and his shiny coat is groomed to resemble a humanoid poodle's. Fluffy runs around yammering and squealing incessantly, humping the legs of larger humanoids who happen by, and making the occasional mess. For which she carries along a magical pooper scooper with a built-in sphere of annihilation.

The standard gibberling is just the wild and feral variety. A pack of wild dogs that run up and eat the occasional kobold baby, compared to the high-strung, pampered, house pet penkingese.

YojimboC

08-29-2008 01:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9289481)

I think someone whose hearing is so keen they "see" everything within 20 feet would hear noises coming from a bit farther away than that. I mean, even I can hear noises from more than 20 feet away and I can barely manage to not bump into furniture too much in my own home if I close my eyes and walk really slowly.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9291855)

Aren't you missing the point? Surely it's a question of precision vs range. A grimlock's ear&nose-vision can accurately target creatures up to 20' away, but it's reasonable to suppose it allows the creatures to be aware of the sound & smell of creatures at considerably greater distances. A dwarf with 60' infravision can target warm bodies up to 60' away, but what about greater distances?

Yes and yes. But in a game setting where every other Underdark race has evolved better eyes, a species of entirely blind humanoids, while more plausible evolutionarily speaking, remains at a distinct disadvantage. Particularly since their vaunted "sonar" ability doesn't really work all that well beyond a very limited range.

The point about precision vs. range is a good one: grimlocks can easily be fooled by a group of noisy dwarves marching down a corridor, or even mining, creating enough noise to distract the grimlocks as some stealthier dwarves with crossbows sneak up to them. This is a gambit that would not work against drow, duergar, derro, orcs, goblinoids, or any other cave dwelling species from the Monster Manual.

Shit, a cadre of dwarven thieves could wipe these guys out.

So. Grimlocks would only be able to exist in the worst, most despicable, most remote caverns in the Underdark. Then their ecology falls apart, because sneaking out to nab humans becomes really tricky when you have to navigate miles of caverns controlled by creatures much better adapted to living underground than you are. I suppose they could exist like some kind of underground Sawney Bean on the fringes of Underdark communities, small groups of them preying on lone or single individuals... but there's not much keeping large communities of svirfneblin or dwarves from taking these guys out like yesterday's garbage.

JRM

08-29-2008 10:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9292493)

Actually originally they were Prime Plane dwellers that acted like ants (see 1e MM II). They had different color schemes to tell the different colonies apart. I didn't care much for them, but they were better than the planar things they turned into.

True enough, guess I should have specified that the Spelljammer/Outsider version of Formians were originally LN/LG. Anyhows, if my memory serves me right the MM2 entry for formians didn't include a caste with the power to Dominate slaves. That came latter, didn't it?

DMH

08-29-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Correct. They were intelligent slaver ants that warred on each other and giant termites.

JRM

08-29-2008 11:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9297346)

Yes and yes. But in a game setting where every other Underdark race has evolved better eyes, a species of entirely blind humanoids, while more plausible evolutionarily speaking, remains at a distinct disadvantage. Particularly since their vaunted "sonar" ability doesn't really work all that well beyond a very limited range.

The point about precision vs. range is a good one: grimlocks can easily be fooled by a group of noisy dwarves marching down a corridor, or even mining, creating enough noise to distract the grimlocks as some stealthier dwarves with crossbows sneak up to them. This is a gambit that would not work against drow, duergar, derro, orcs, goblinoids, or any other cave dwelling species from the Monster Manual.

Oh I wasn't arguing that Grimlocks aren't disadvantaged by their lack of infravision, just that Marionette may have a point about them getting some longer range benefit from their extraordinary sense of hearing and smell.

As written in the Monstrous Compendium, Grimlocks have a lot more disadvantages against other subterranean races - physically they're fairly tough for basic humanoids, comparable to a gnoll but they have no ranged weapons or magic use and should lack numbers because they're pure carnivores (since omnivorous races would be able to maintain far higher population densities). Even worse, their entry specifies they can only eat humanoid flesh so they have to live near a large population of human(oid)s which, for some reason, does not wipe them out.

Not to mention that they're competing with all those other underdark creatures that like to eat humanoids, many of which will be a lot nastier than them. For example, ghouls also specialize in eating humanoids and grimlocks would find it very difficult to compete against them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9297346)

So. Grimlocks would only be able to exist in the worst, most despicable, most remote caverns in the Underdark. Then their ecology falls apart, because sneaking out to nab humans becomes really tricky when you have to navigate miles of caverns controlled by creatures much better adapted to living underground than you are. I suppose they could exist like some kind of underground Sawney Bean on the fringes of Underdark communities, small groups of them preying on lone or single individuals... but there's not much keeping large communities of svirfneblin or dwarves from taking these guys out like yesterday's garbage.

Yup, I was thinking of grimlocks as being monstrous versions of Sawney Bean and his family, except they live in the upper level of the underdark and mainly prey upon surface dwellers who lack night vision. There is another underdark environment they'd be good in though, hot ones. 1st/2nd edition infravision is useless once the environment is hotter than the creatures they're looking for, so grimlocks would be deadly in areas warmed to or about skin-temperature by volcanic heat. Now I'm imagining the subterranean equivalent of a tropical rain forest, vast swelteringly hot chambers filled with a riot of fungal growth, from amidst which leap naked, eyeless axe-wielding cannibals.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

And, approximately 650 posts later, we are out of the G section! How many damn threads is this thing going to take? I reckon four, at this rate. Anyway, onwards and upwards.

Hag

Hags are a bit of a favourite of mine, I have to admit. As we all know, evil children are scary, and it works that way for old women too. Also, when the queen in Snow White turns into a witch, it's spooky. (And how weird is it, by the way, that there isn't a 'witch' monster in D&D?)

Much as I like them, I've never quite managed to play Hags as I think they were meant to be played - i.e. mistresses of disguise, who the players can try to trick into revealing their true identity. Instead, they've tended to appear as damsels in distress who turn nasty as soon as the players get close. Seems like a waste, but I'm probably a bit too lazy to do anything more complicated. Also, Hags are one of those monsters it's difficult to keep secret. Players get suspicious of damsels in distress, I find. Wolfweres have the same problem - victims of the player/character knowledge grey area.

Anyway. Hags are often found in threes (Macbeth, anyone?) and generally work magic together to hatch evil plots against neighbouring settlements of humans or demihumans - mostly revolving around bringing the Hags more victims i.e. food. (They can eat a person within 10 rounds!) Seems like a good way to start off a campaign actually: the players being unwittingly drawn into the schemes of a covey of Hags...

Annis

These are the biggest Hags - 8' tall - and the strongest. Also the most "UG!": they don't have much in the way of special abilities than hitting you very hard.

Greenhag

Smaller hags who can do more disguise-y spells and speak their own language - "a dialect of Annis" - which goes right into the Elven Cat Top 10, I'm sure.

Sea Hag

Sea Hags, who also have their own language, are actually the nastiest Hags despite their rather average stats - they have a killer gaze which either results in death or a coma, and their visage is so revolting as to cause weakness from fright.

Hellzon

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9302181)

Also, Hags are one of those monsters it's difficult to keep secret. Players get suspicious of damsels in distress, I find.

Well, a woman in the D&Dverse is about 90% likely to be a hag, succubus, lamia (4E), doppelganger or likely any of a dozen monsters I didn't remember right now. :p

JRM

08-30-2008 04:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9302181)

And, approximately 650 posts later, we are out of the G section! How many damn threads is this thing going to take? I reckon four, at this rate. Anyway, onwards and upwards.

Hag

Hags are a bit of a favourite of mine, I have to admit. As we all know, evil children are scary, and it works that way for old women too. Also, when the queen in Snow White turns into a witch, it's spooky. (And how weird is it, by the way, that there isn't a 'witch' monster in D&D?)

Much as I like them, I've never quite managed to play Hags as I think they were meant to be played - i.e. mistresses of disguise, who the players can try to trick into revealing their true identity. Instead, they've tended to appear as damsels in distress who turn nasty as soon as the players get close. Seems like a waste, but I'm probably a bit too lazy to do anything more complicated. Also, Hags are one of those monsters it's difficult to keep secret. Players get suspicious of damsels in distress, I find. Wolfweres have the same problem - victims of the player/character knowledge grey area.

I like hags too, but I've never had them play the 'damsel in distress who then attack the party viciously'. Indeed, I very rarely use hag adversaries, they're usually old crones who the players need to bribe/trick/force into helping them defeat some other evil.

A good way of making a hag's 'reveal' surprising is having her masquerading as a member of a community of completely ordinary folk that the party interact with for a session or two - that makes it a lot more surprising when a PC discovers that sweet little old Granny Figgs the baker is actually an unholy monster, and she wants to use them for pie filling.

Hags also make good leaders / powers behind the throne for bands of evil humanoid monsters, some of whom may be their offspring.

demiurge1138

08-30-2008 07:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've used hags surprisingly often; they're mastermind types, but unlike a lot of those (illithids, raksasha), they're good in a straight-up brawl too. Of all the hag encounters I've run, my favorite would have to be the covey of hags throwing spells from their platform inside the ribcage of an immense skeletal giant.

DMH

08-30-2008 08:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Dragon had an article in the 240's, Like Fine Wine, about critters that live much longer than humans. One of the examples is a greehag that corrupts some elves and is in talks with some monsters to eliminate pixies (?) in her forest. They are one of the few 2e creatures that really deserve to earn class levels.

The only downside I have seen of them is a DM who portayed them as feminists gone wrong. He miss the point- they are former humans* who have been cast out of their society. Sort of like women over 40 (25?) in Hollywood.

*The Van Richten's version. Breeding them from giants seems eh when cursed people is much more interesting.

Crinos

08-30-2008 08:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9303569)

Dragon had an article in the 240's, Like Fine Wine, about critters that live much longer than humans. One of the examples is a greehag that corrupts some elves and is in talks with some monsters to eliminate pixies (?) in her forest. They are one of the few 2e creatures that really deserve to earn class levels.

The only downside I have seen of them is a DM who portayed them as feminists gone wrong. He miss the point- they are former humans who have been cast out of their society. Sort of like women over 40 (25?) in Hollywood.*

The Van Richten's version. Breeding them from giants seems eh when cursed people is much more interesting.*

Well in 2e, they had spectral hags that could change mortal women into hags during special rituals.

And in 3e in the scarred lands that had a whole menagerie of hags, all of which were created from humans.

Crinos

08-30-2008 08:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

And on an unrelated note, I LOVE Hags. Ever since I got my first MM I was interested in Hags, not sure why. Maybe it was because Annis hags were so hardcore in combat, or their general uniqueness. I was glad when the scarred lands made like fifty million subdivisions.

When I begin proper work on my True20 Monster book, I'm gonna include some Oriental hags like Yamamba and Hannya, just for fun.

Ratoslov

08-30-2008 10:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 9302683)

Well, a woman in the D&Dverse is about 90% likely to be a hag, succubus, lamia (4E), doppelganger or likely any of c dozen monsters I didn't remember right now. :p

Ever since playing Shadowgate as a kid, I always kind of figured that it was just adventurer SOP to kill any captive you weren't expressly sent into the dungeon to find.

Crinos

08-30-2008 11:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9303941)

Ever since playing Shadowgate as a kid, I always kind of figured that it was just adventurer SOP to kill any captive you weren't expressly sent into the dungeon to find.

Yeah, seriously. There are so many monsters that can pose as innocent travelers (Hags, Doppelgangers, Huecuva, Uthraki, Baldandar, Bhut, Mujinja, most lycanthropes, and what have you) that its no real surprise that many PC's knee jerk reaction to a situation is to cast know alignment or detect evil on everyone they meet.

noisms

08-30-2008 02:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9304012)

Yeah, seriously. There are so many monsters that can pose as innocent travelers (Hags, Doppelgangers, Huecuva, Uthraki, Baldandar, Bhut, Mujinja, most lycanthropes, and what have you) that its no real surprise that many PC's knee jerk reaction to a situation is to cast know alignment or detect evil on everyone they meet.

My friend told me this story about how, in one campaign, the DM had an innocent looking old woman appear walking along the road towards the party. The players immediately had their characters leap on her, throw her in a sack, and beat her to death. Turns out they were right - it was a wolfwere.

I would have deliberately changed it so that she was actually a real old woman - but maybe their DM was too honest to do that.

The Last Conformist

08-30-2008 04:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9304012)

Yeah, seriously. There are so many monsters that can pose as innocent travelers (Hags, Doppelgangers, Huecuva, Uthraki, Baldandar, Bhut, Mujinja, most lycanthropes, and what have you) that its no real surprise that many PC's knee jerk reaction to a situation is to cast know alignment or detect evil on everyone they meet.

Which creates an obvious niche for inexplicably Lawful Good races of shapeshifting anthropophages.

demiurge1138

08-30-2008 05:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The idea that hags make hags out of people has been around for a while. Started in the 1e Ecology articles in Dragon Magazine, methinks. The idea is that hags seduce human men and have human babies, which become hags in a ritual when they reach adulthood.

I played around with that in my Freelance Police game. The Freelance Police were on the road, and in order to gain transportation, they agreed to find a local's missing daughter. Turns out that little Annika was in fact the daughter of a night hag, who had captured her, dragged her off into the woods and was in the middle of transforming her into a hag herself. Annika was rescued only one night into the three-night process. The party cleric cast remove curse on her, which got rid of the bruise-purple skin, but everyone was still freaking out about Annika's newly expanded intelligence and dark cunning. She thought a little too haggishly for anyone's taste, and they were especially worried after they found she had stolen one of their weapons, so she could defend herself when her hag-mother came back.

I really want to play Annika as a PC at some point...

JRM

08-30-2008 07:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9304700)

Which creates an obvious niche for inexplicably Lawful Good races of shapeshifting anthropophages.

And a just as obvious scenario were the PCs have to deal with a party of 'heroes' that have been murdering innocent travellers who they believe are monsters. Could work even if some of the travellers were evil, so long as they were modestly or inactively wicked.

"You must hunt down the killer of the hobgoblin ambassador, or else the Goblin Wars are sure to start again."

As for Lawful Good man-eaters, I've got a society in my campaign that occasionally lets monstrous outsiders run around the streets that are geased to only prey upon 'sinners' of various kinds so it rids them of a few sociopaths and/or undead. Admittedly, it did go a bit wrong when that magistrate went a bit funny and instructed a Vrock to eliminate anybody who defiled the park and it started eating dogs and litterers, but no system's perfect.

noisms

09-01-2008 11:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Halfling

Ah, Halflings. Everybody's favourite homoerotic ringbearers, brought to life in the D&D universe.

My first ever character in D&D (red box basic) was a Halfling, so they have a special place in my heart, but I can't remember much about the character in question. He was armed with a handaxe, as I recall, and killed a Carrion Crawler. But he met his end at the breath of a Red Dragon.

You all know Halflings back to front, I'm sure, so there's little point expounding on the entry in great detail. Instead, post anything interesting, unusual, or noteworthy that's ever happened regarding Halflings in a game you've played in.

Nathan P. Mahney

09-01-2008 12:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

My longest-running character was a halfling - currently he's a 20th level thief, dual-wielding +5 short swords and wearing a girdle of giant strength, plus a whole load of other items that basically make him impervious to everything. A touch munchkiny, but was a light-weight compared to the rest of the party.

Crinos

09-01-2008 12:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9304700)

Which creates an obvious niche for inexplicably Lawful Good races of shapeshifting anthropophages.

There is a Lawful good race of monsters on Al Qadim called Mason Wasps. Basically they're giant intelligent wasps who capture evil creatures, paralyze them, take them back to their nests then lay their eggs in them like a normal wasp does to a spider. Proving once again that lawful good isn't necessarily lawful nice.

demiurge1138

09-01-2008 02:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9310073)

There is a Lawful good race of monsters on Al Qadim called Mason Wasps. Basically they're giant intelligent wasps who capture evil creatures, paralyze them, take them back to their nests then lay their eggs in them like a normal wasp does to a spider. Proving once again that lawful good isn't necessarily lawful nice.

Best. Ever.

Oh, wait a sec, we're supposed to be talking about halflings? I've never played one, although I don't get to be a player too often, but I was in a game where a couple both played halflings. They broke up, but the game stuck together, and the side-quest of him getting the permission of her family to wed fell through. Which is a shame, because the DM was asking for input on it, and I wanted her family to be degenerate man-eaters, Dark Sun style.

Dark Sun had the best halflings, I think. Tolkien pastiche and watered-down kender don't really do it for me. In my games for a while (OK, so it was one player, but it was a trend with him), the plucky, lucky, anything goes type of characterization that usually gets played with halflings was applied to goblins instead. Which I rather liked.

Crinos

09-01-2008 02:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Dark Sun halflings were maneaters?

Sounds like something they brought over to 3e with the BOVD with that race of vicious cannibalistic halflings.

demiurge1138

09-01-2008 04:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9310374)
Dark Sun halflings were maneaters?

Sounds like something they brought over to 3e with the BOVD with that race of vicious cannibalistic halflings.

Yeah, the jerren were expies of Dark Sun's halflings, but more evil. Dark Sun halflings were pragmatic, primitive and vicious, but not necessarily evil (if memory serves me right...)

kelvingreen

09-01-2008 05:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9310029)
You all know Halflings back to front, I'm sure, so there's little point expounding on the entry in great detail. Instead, post anything interesting, unusual, or noteworthy that's ever happened regarding Halflings in a game you've played in.

I've never played a halfling, or seen one in play, but I've always found it fun that in Creature of Havoc the player gets, instead of provisions and potions, wandering hobbits to eat.

I should really stop trying to associate everything with Fighting Fantasy. ;)

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9297346)

Yes and yes. But in a game setting where every other Underdark race has evolved better eyes, a species of entirely blind humanoids, while more plausible evolutionarily speaking, remains at a distinct disadvantage. Particularly since their vaunted "sonar" ability doesn't really work all that well beyond a very limited range.

The point about precision vs. range is a good one: grimlocks can easily be fooled by a group of noisy dwarves marching down a corridor, or even mining, creating enough noise to distract the grimlocks as some stealthier dwarves with crossbows sneak up to them. This is a gambit that would not work against drow, duergar, derro, orcs, goblinoids, or any other cave dwelling species from the Monster Manual.

Shit, a cadre of dwarven thieves could wipe these guys out.

So. Grimlocks would only be able to exist in the worst, most despicable, most remote caverns in the Underdark. Then their ecology falls apart, because sneaking out to nab humans becomes really tricky when you have to navigate mile of caverns controlled by creatures much better adapted to living underground than you are. I suppose they could exist like some kind of underground Sawney Bean on the fringes of Underdark communities, small groups of them preying on lone or single individuals... but there's not much keeping large communities of svirfneblin or dwarves from taking these guys out like yesterday's garbage.

Perhaps Grimlocks could inhabit narrow, winding tunnels so that it is next to impossible for another race to get more than 20' away from one but maintain line of sight.

JRM

09-02-2008 04:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9310053)

My longest-running character was a halfling - currently he's a 20th level thief, dual-wielding +5 short swords and wearing a girdle of giant strength, plus a whole load of other items that basically make him impervious to everything. A touch munchkin, but was a light-weight compared to the rest of the party.

Back in my early days as a DM I had a player who went through several halfling thieves, all of them called Barumbras. The last incarnation (not that there was much difference between them to be honest) was noticeable for his talent for back-stabbing giants with a longsword, of course he had to make multiple Climb Walls rolls to get high enough to reach a giant's back...

It's interesting that although most AD&D halfling adventurers are thieves, you don't very often hear of evil halflings or halfling-run thieves guilds. Despite the cliché of halflings being so larcenous that you need to shake them upside-down after leaving the dungeon to recover all the loot that they've pinched.

JohnBiles

09-02-2008 06:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9312205)

It's interesting that although most AD&D halfling adventurers are thieves, you don't very often hear of evil halflings or halfling-run thieves guilds. Despite the cliché of halflings being so larcenous that you need to shake them upside-down after leaving the dungeon to recover all the loot that they've pinched.

Early Dragon issues had Fineous Fingers, a comic strip about a human Thief, which among other things, features a Halfling Mafia.

Kakita Kojiro

09-02-2008 09:38 AM

Dragon also had Yamara, a comic strip about a halfling thief of dubious morals. And, of course, nowadays we've got Belkar from Order of the Stick as a halfling archetype.

... Come to think, everyone I know who played a halfling in AD&D played 'em as Evil little psychopaths. That's probably more an indictment of those players, of course, than of halfling players in general. But still. As it turned out, those guys got very familiar with indictments, so it all sort of worked out for the best, probably.

Crinos

09-02-2008 10:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9312997)

Dragon also had Yamara, a comic strip about a halfling thief of dubious morals. And, of course, nowadays we've got Belkar from Order of the Stick as a halfling archetype.

Yeah, but Belkar isn't a thief, he's a ranger.

Plus I doubt he's really a halfling. He may be a Jerren who was adopted by unwitting halflings as a babe. I wouldn't be surprised.

EDIT: And, IMHO, the stereotype of the evil Halfling is pretty much the same as the Good Drow stereotype started by our dear friend Drizzt Do'urden; We have a type of race that is pretty much uniformly one alignment, so making one of an opposite alignment and temperament is neat and edgy, so everyone has to do it.

In fact, one may argue that Belkar is a parody of Drizzt, since he's a two weapon ranger (like Drizzt) who is a contrary alignment of the rest of his people. If you want to stretch it, one could even argue that Belkar's relationship with Mr, Scruffy (Shojo's cat) is a parody of Drizzt's pet Panther.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9292736)

They're interesting in a low-grade sort of way, if only because I've never known anyone to use of them in a game, making them a bit of a novelty. Unusually for a minor D&D race, they seem to have an entire pantheon of Gods, including "evil snake gods and spider goddesses" as well as their patron "small frog like deity".

I used to love Grippli; I created a pantheon of gods for them to worship. Hmmm... (finds old txt file) that would be Mother Sah, the Frog; Father Fish, "He Who Swims Slowly"; Old Mother Spider, "She Who Devours Her Young"; Deep One, "She Who Is"; Scorpion, "He Who Strikes Himself"; Young Warrior Lizard, "He Who Loves the Sun"; Old Master Snake, "He Who is Known Only to Himself"; The Swarm, "He/She Who is Multitude, The Many Together"; The Flower, "He Who Finds a Mate, Scented Call"; The Centipede, "Wearer of Many Legs, She Who Finds Food"; and Worm, "The One That Sleeps".

Nothing amazingly original there, but each of them had a full description with avatar and priesthood; I doubt that many people wrote so many words about Grippli religion and beliefs. :p

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9312997)

... Come to think, everyone I know who played a halfling in AD&D played 'em as Evil little psychopaths.

Guilty as charged. 1st edition, halfling fighter/thief; killed shortly after backstabbing the Viking king.

In front of his Viking army.

Our cleric survived.

JRM

09-02-2008 07:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JohnBiles (Post 9312545)

Early Dragon issues had Fineous Fingers, a comic strip about a human Thief, which among other things, features a Halfling Mafia.

Oh how could I have forgotten Fineous Fingers' halfling mafia, that was just the kind of 'edgy' early-edition halfling societies I was talking about not coming across very often, at least in official products.* The 2nd edition Monstrous Manual still sticks with the Tolkienish view of halflings, describing them as "hard-working race of peaceful citizens" who fight fiercely in the defence of good, and that was matched with the rather cliched nature of halfling nations, like the Five Shires of Mystara (although that's D&D not AD&D, of course)

Plus of course, Belker, Yamara and the Fineous Fingers Halfling Mafia are all comics, so I could argue that's it's an inversion of the typical AD&D campaign's 'reality' for humorous effect, not an example of something that the author thinks DMs should include in their campaigns. Although I have a vague memory of an old Dragon magazine article (by Roger Moore, I think) which suggested having a halfling grandmother as the evil mastermind behind a campaign's epic villainous plot.

Guess it's all down to what sort of games you've been involved in, but most of the campaigns I'd seen back in the old days went for the 'bucolic hobbit' type of halfling society, so the contrast with the larcenous throat-slitting halfling characters was a bit bizarre. The only professions halflings seemed to follow in human lands was cook or burglar. I imagine that all the halfling thieves hid their lock picks in trick saucepans and had "chef's block's" full of throwing knives, so no one would suspect them.

Anyhow, I thought of Belker but omitted him, since he's (a) A later edition than I was thinking of (3.5) and (b) an individual who is not representative of any society or culture in the OotS campaign - indeed he's practically the antithesis of any society or culture he comes across. As far as 3rd-edition halflings go, the halfling run thieves guild in Sharn is a good example of the sort of group I don't remember seeing very often in official oldschool products. But then, Eberron made a deliberate effort to break with stereotypes for some of their races, with their nomadic halflings. Not that that's anything new, as Dark Sun shows us - now a civilized version of those halflings would make a very interesting guild of thieves & assassins. (With 'interesting' defined as 'your players may hate you', of course.:cool:)

Steve H

09-02-2008 08:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9313106)

EDIT: And, IMHO, the stereotype of the evil Halfling is pretty much the same as the Good Drow stereotype started by our dear friend Drizzt Do'urden; We have a type of race that is pretty much uniformly one alignment, so making one of an opposite alignment and temperament is neat and edgy, so everyone has to do it.

That reminds me of the time when I banned PC wizards for a campaign. I felt that most AD&D game worlds tend to be at pains to stress how rare magic users are, but for PCs they're positively mundane (since there are usually PC wizards and very frequently enemy ones too). So I ran a Savage Coast campaign with no PC Wizards and (it turned out) no NPC ones either. If it had run long enough we'd have had NPC ones eventually, but in practise we only did a couple of adventures for one reason or another.

noisms

09-02-2008 11:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9312997)

Dragon also had Yamara, a comic strip about a halfling thief of dubious morals. And, of course, nowadays we've got Belkar from Order of the Stick as a halfling archetype.

... Come to think, everyone I know who played a halfling in AD&D played 'em as Evil little psychopaths. That's probably more an indictment of those players, of course, than of halfling players in general. But still. As it turned out, those guys got very familiar with indictments, so it all sort of worked out for the best, probably.

I wonder if there are other anti-stereotypical stereotypes than the Good Drow and the Evil Halfling?

Friendly Dwarf? Stupid Elf? Straightforward Gnome?

Lukas Sjöström

09-02-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9314976)

I wonder if there are other anti-stereotypical stereotypes than the Good Drow and the Evil Halfling?

Friendly Dwarf? Stupid Elf? Straightforward Gnome?

Terry Pratchett's Casanunda would certainly fit in. World-famous seducer, swordsman, all-around cultured fellow and an outrageous liar... who also happens to be a dwarf. He even shaves his beard, preferring to wear an oversized powdered wig.

Kakita Kojiro

09-03-2008 02:22 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9314976)

I wonder if there are other anti-stereotypical stereotypes than the Good Drow and the Evil Halfling?

Friendly Dwarf? Stupid Elf? Straightforward Gnome?

I'm holding out for Ugly Elf. True-ish to the original source material, and added bonus of wails of outrage from the fannish types. But then, I'm just mean that way.

However, I'm not so sure that we have any halfling stereotypes to hold up against these halfling anti-stereotypes we're talking about. The only halfling of note before the 3.0 iconic whatshername* I can think of... is Tasselhoff. Who was a kender, and hence an abomination in the eyes of the Lord.

In Eberron they at least got some play, but mostly what we have are descriptions of what halflings are like... somewhere, over there... that PCs never encounter.

It'd be like all the drow that PCs encounter being Drizzt-a-likes. With no Eclavdra to show the archetype, how do you convince the players that all drow aren't mopey emo* twinkles?

I mean, if you tell me that "halflings are cheerful and happy-go-lucky" and "drow are cruel and evil" -- but all the halflings I meet are psychotic Chaotic Evil, and all the drow I meet are misunderstood Chaotic Good... well?

* and she didn't so much have a personality, as have bozooms in leather.
 whatever his name was.
 wait, there was a FR halfling, Ruskettle or something or other, in one of the FR books. I think.
* yes, used it just to annoy. I said I was mean that way.

Crinos

09-03-2008 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9315728)
I'm holding out for Ugly Elf. True-ish to the original source material, and added bonus of wails of outrage from the fannish types. But then, I'm just mean that way.

We already have an ugly elf: Mialee the wizard from the 3rd edition character archetypes.

JRM

09-03-2008 04:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9314976)
I wonder if there are other anti-stereotypical stereotypes than the Good Dwarf and the Evil Halfling?
Friendly Dwarf? Stupid Elf? Straightforward Gnome?

The nice, cultured half-orc. Seen a few of those in my time.

Cognitive Dissident

09-03-2008 04:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

We need a sub race of overweight elves that like to bake.

Crinos

09-03-2008 05:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Cognitive Dissident (Post 9316233)
We need a sub race of overweight elves that like to bake.

In the world I plan to eventually publish, elves have a very slow metabolism (due to their longevity, being one of the oldest lived humanoid species), and the only reason they are all so thin and willowy is because their diet consists mainly of fruits, nuts, and lean meats. Elves who regularly eat human foods (which are very fatty and rich compared to their normal fare) or dwarven foods (which are even worse) tend to balloon up fairly quickly.

Kakita Kojiro

09-03-2008 05:20 AM

tree nuts = very high in fats and calories.

But good fats, so they'll be chubby elves without cardiovascular issues.

Although that, and the presumed typical elvish diet, probably leave them a little gassy. All those green veggies, oy.

Elves = willowy, pretty, and farty.

John_C

09-03-2008 05:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The only decent part of a really awful book called "Dragon Precinct" that I read a few years back was one of the main characters: A half elf who was astonishingly ugly. She had the worst traits from either side of her heritage, resulting in someone who just looked freakish instead of hauntingly beautiful.

JRM

09-03-2008 06:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Cognitive Dissident (Post 9316233)
We need a sub race of overweight elves that like to bake.

That's just what we need, a PC race for Santa Claus.:eek:

Crinos

09-03-2008 06:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9316367)

tree nuts = very high in fats and calories.

But good fats, so they'll be chubby elves without cardiovascular issues.

Although that, and the presumed typical elvish diet, probably leave them a little gassy. All those green veggies, oy.

Elves = willowy, pretty, and farty.

Alright then, replace nuts with fruits.

Nuts can be a staple of the halfling diet, since they tend to be rather plump as well.

Brandi

09-03-2008 08:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Cognitive Dissident (Post 9316233)

We need a sub race of overweight elves that like to bake.

I think back when White Dwarf wasn't all WHFB/WH40K all the time I remember seeing an NPC writeup of a fat elf-- way too fond of the high-quality sweets and pastries his Halfling chef made for him.

Belchion

09-03-2008 06:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9314976)

Friendly Dwarf? Stupid Elf? Straightforward Gnome?

Gnome Barbarian. The little guy with the axe bigger than himself - I met one once!

kami2awa

09-03-2008 06:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9318772)

Gnome Barbarian. The little guy with the axe bigger than himself - I met one once!

How about an Evil Elf? Not a Drow, just an elf who chose evil. There was also a write-up on the WOTC site of a Half-Orc Wizard.

sim_james

09-03-2008 06:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9318780)
How about an Evil Elf? Not a Drow, just an elf who chose evil.

What, Dalamar?

DMH

09-03-2008 06:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

And the elven woman who performed "surgery" on slaves in A2. She was a mad scientist that they didn't play up her work.

Crowetron

09-03-2008 08:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I once had my players run into a friendly, helpful kobold of Neutral Good alignment. Unfortunately, they killed him before he had a chance to speak.

Friggin' PCs... grumble, grumble

Evilhalfling

09-04-2008 04:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9312997)
... Come to think, everyone I know who played a halfling in AD&D played 'em as Evil little psychopaths. That's probably more an indictment of those players, of course, than of halfling players in general.

Did I game with you in st louis? (1998-2001) That was when it started

After adventuring with 2 psionic evil halflings, a PC decided that all halflings were evil, and most psionic.

It was a self-fulfilling prophecy, as it became a motif in my games. Evil halflings have appeared in 5/7 of my campaigns since, making the jump from 2e to 3e.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

But still. As it turned out, those guys got very familiar with indictments, so it all sort of worked out for the best, probably.

Nope my friends remain unindicted. Nvrmd.

noisms

09-04-2008 10:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Harpy

Whenever I think of Harpies now I always remember that Simpsons episode where Homer and Marge go on a marriage retreat with the church, and they end up in marriage counselling with (I think) Revered Lovejoy and another couple. The other couple are really abusive, hate each other, drink constantly, etc. At one stage the man turns to the woman and says "She's the queen of the harpies! Queen of the harpies!" and starts trying to mount an invisible crown on her head. "Take your crown, o queen!"

I don't know why, but I've always remembered that scene.

Anyway, Harpies. Dirty hags with wings who like to torture and kill. Their main method of attack and defence is their beautiful song, which mesmerises opponents and can be sung even during melee. The only way to resist it is to make preparations such as stuffing ones ears full of wax, a la Ulysses' crew during the Sirens episode. A nice addition to a campaign, I think. You can never have enough pseudo-Greek myth in a D&D game, I tend to believe. Although it would be a mean DM who just threw in a random Harpy encounter without giving the players some sort of clue or warning so they could prepare.

Maybe somebody more informed can tell us more about this, but were Harpies traditionally able to sing, or have the D&D designers just conflated the Harpy and Siren myths into one creature? Also, where does that Harpy in The Tempest fit into all of this? She was 'good', wasn't she?

Harpies seem like a good and unusual addition to the Great Egg Thief Campaign. They lay one egg every year "at will" (they reproduce asexually, because there are no males), although a price isn't given. I reckon, what, 1,000 gps? For the rich duke who has everything?

Crinos

09-04-2008 10:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The original Harpies were meant as a form of divine punishment. Basically they were creatures of waste and gluttony: Whenever the person they were tormenting tried to eat, they would swoop down, eat the food up, defaecate on the rest, then fly away before their victim could retaliate, that way the victim would slowly starve to death, even if they had a lot of food on paper.

I guess that wasn't menacing enough for DnD, so they tacked on the singing power, and its just become tradition by this point (even though they have an actual siren monster later on).

Kakita Kojiro

09-04-2008 11:32 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Evilhalfling (Post 9320727)

Did I game with you in st louis? (1998-2001) That was when it started

I played AD&D in St. Louis... but in the 80s. I'm old, son. ;)

I also lay the blame on my ill-spent youth for poisoning my mental conceptspace of harpies with the ones from Xanth... Piers Anthony has a lot to answer for. The original storm-wind goddesses of punishment from Greek myth are much more evocative.

Boris

09-04-2008 11:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9322047)

The original Harpies were meant as a form of divine punishment. Basically they were creatures of waste and gluttony: Whenever the person they were tormenting tried to eat, they would swoop down, eat the food up, defaecate on the rest, then fly away before their victim could retaliate, that way the victim would slowly starve to death, even if they had a lot of food on paper.

I guess that wasn't menacing enough for DnD, so they tacked on the singing power, and its just become tradition by this point (even though they have an actual siren monster later on).

That could make for an interesting adventure - the PCs are lost in some desolate wasteland, with supplies running low. The local nest of harpies are the only ones with any food and they are tormenting the PCs, stealing what little is left of their supplies. So the PCs have to sneak into this narrow canyon system where the harpies live and get enough food to continue their journey.

Crinos

09-04-2008 12:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Boris (Post 9322253)

That could make for an interesting adventure - the PCs are lost in some desolate wasteland, with supplies running low. The local nest of harpies are the only ones with any food and they are tormenting the PCs, stealing what little is left of their supplies. So the PCs have to sneak into this narrow canyon system where the harpies live and get enough food to continue their journey.

Well, the thing is the Harpies only went after you if you pissed off the Gods.

Of course, since the Greek Gods were such massive douchebags it doesn't really take a lot to earn their wrath.

Menteroso

09-05-2008 12:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9322361)

Well, the thing is the Harpies only went after you if you pissed off the Gods.

Of course, since the Greek Gods were such massive douchebags it doesn't really take a lot to earn their wrath.

I've been advised to tell you that, well, the harpies are a-comin'. Something about the phrase "massive douchebags". Sorry for the inconvenience.

-Your pal,
Mercury.

:D

MadWriter

09-05-2008 01:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Menteroso (Post 9324607)

I've been advised to tell you that, well, the harpies are a-comin'. Something about the phrase "massive douchebags" Sorry for the inconvenience.

-Your pal,
Mercury.

:D

Menteroso--take a laugh point for that one.

Crinos

09-05-2008 01:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Menteroso (Post 9324607)

I've been advised to tell you that, well, the harpies are a-comin'. Something about the phrase "massive douchebags" Sorry for the inconvenience.

*-Your pal,
Mercury.*

:D

Hey, no harm no foul. The Harpies were conceived of in an era that lacked double barrel shotguns. I say bring em on.

And anyways, I'm Christian, so the Greek Gods can suck it.

JRM

09-05-2008 08:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9322013)

Harpy

Whenever I think of Harpies now I always remember that Simpsons episode where Homer and Marge go on a marriage retreat with the church, and they end up in marriage counselling with (I think) Revered Lovejoy and anothe couple. The other couple are really abusive, hate each other, drink constantly, etc. At one stage the man turns to the woman and says "She's the queen of the harpies! Queen of the harpies!" and starts trying to mount an invisible crown on her head. "Take your crown, o queen!"

Now there's an adventure hook in there somewhere, I've long liked the idea of harpies being led by 'queens' (indeed, I've got a Queen of the Harpies in my campaign), so it'd be interesting to have a scenario where the PCs have to negotiate with her. Mmm, maybe someone stole her crown and they have to retrieve it to stop her subjects terrorizing the land. How did they steal it? Well, this illusionist grabbed it and did a runner after hypnotised them into thinking they had had the crown, and it's only when an visitor wondered why the Queen was having an invisible crown being placed on her head that they twigged.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9322013)

Maybe somebody more informed can tell us more about this, but were Harpies traditionally able to sing, or have the D&D designers just conflated the Harpy and Siren myths into one creature? Also, where does that Harpy in The Tempest fit into all of this? She was 'good', wasn't she?

The internet is your friend, the theoi website is an excellent resource for Greek mythology. You can see their entry on harpies here.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9324791)

Hey, no harm no foul. The Harpies were conceived of in an era that lacked double barrel shotguns. I say bring em on.

Unfortunately, they were conceived in an era when immortal wind spirits are completely immune to mortal harm - including shotguns. They were only defeated in the Argonaut myth because Jason had some flying demigods on his side who were prophesied to be the harpies' nemeses.

Better watch the skies!

Although that may not do you much good, since by some accounts that they could snatch away a person (or eat a meal & foul the rest) so quickly that they couldn't be seen.

noisms

09-06-2008 01:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hatori

Hatori are a strange one - a kind of mixture of a monitor lizard, saltwater crocodile, sealion and sandworm from Dune. They range in size from 10-200' in length, although as the ecology section would have it that they grow at the rate of 1' a year it wouldn't be out of the question to imagine a millenium old, 1000' monster of the desert swimming through the sands and gobbling up entire caravans of camels.

Three points in the entry which SCREAM out and positively OOZE plot:

1 - Once every 10 years all the Hatori in an area get together in the middle of the desert where the males duke it out over the females. Although "no civilized man has ever witnessed these mating rituals", the desert people speak of the "time of thunder when the mountains die" - and this "may" refer to such events.

2 - Hatori eat anything but can't digest gems or magical items: young nobleman with magical family heirloom swallowed by Hatori; PCs hired by his father to recover the item, you do the rest.

3 - Hatori, like Elephants, go to communal grave sites to die. Nobody knows where they are - but they are surely a veritable treasure trove of undigested gems and magic items...

demiurge1138

09-06-2008 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Back in the day, I thought hatori were the coolest things ever. But I've never seen them before or since the Monstrous Compendium. Were they refugees from Dark Sun?

Crinos

09-06-2008 01:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

One of the few times I played DnD, my group encountered a Hatori. It had a holy avenger in its stomach. The teams spell caster took it out with a death spell, and because he used death magic near the avenger, we ended up being sent to Ravenloft.

Good times.

JRM

09-06-2008 02:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9329268)

Back in the day, I thought hatori were the coolest things ever. But I've never seen them before or since the Monstrous Compendium. Were they refugees from Dark Sun?

Hmm, I don't think they're original to Dark Sun, although I'm hardly familiar with the beasts, having never used them in my games. They certainly sound like something you'd find in Dark Sun.

Hmm, after glancing through Wikipedia's AD&D monstrous compendium lists Hatori are in Monstrous Compendium 4, the Dragonlance Appendix but aren't on the monster list for 1st edition monsters. They are listed as an acceptable monster for Dark Sun on the athos.org supplement Terrors of Athos.

glass

09-06-2008 03:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9329465)

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9329268)

Back in the day, I thought hatori were the coolest things ever. But I've never seen them before or since the Monstrous Compendium. Were they refugees from Dark Sun?

Hmm, after glancing through Wikipedia's AD&D monstrous compendium lists Hatori are in Monstrous Compendium 4, the Dragonlance Appendix but aren't on the monster list for 1st edition monsters. They are listed as an acceptable monster for Dark Sun on the athos.org supplement Terrors of Athos.

My first encounter with them was in the DL MC, but I always assumed they were somewhere else first (since they don't seem particularly Dragonlancey to me).

glass.

Wakboth

09-06-2008 04:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

On the subject of the harpies, the BECMI D&D basic set mentioned, as a monster variant, a mute harpy who can't sing but plays accordion instead...

JRM

09-06-2008 05:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 9329669)

My first encounter with them was in the DL MC, but I always assumed they were somewhere else first (since they don't seem particularly Dragonlancey to me).

Nor me, but I haven't come across any indications of an earlier origin from my (admittedly pretty casual) trawl of the internet but most of the reference that turned up point to them being a Dragonlance beastie (such as this or this).

I'd check Creature Catalogue but unfortunately the enworld server's down at the moment, they've got a couple of threads over there whose titles suggest hatori are Al-Qadim monsters.

EDIT: Come to think of it, I have a vague recollection of seeing a "desert dragon" monster very similar to a Hatori somewhere. Maybe it did exist earlier under a different name? Or maybe my memory is just acting up again.

JRM

09-06-2008 05:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9329777)

On the subject of the harpies, the BECMI D&D basic set mentioned, as a monster variant, a mute harpy who can't sing but plays accordion instead...

Bah, call that a monster. A harpy's only terrifying if she's also playing a mouth-organ and clashing cymbals with her feet.:)

And why not, that's on a par with some other D&D monsters, like the giant spider who's venom makes you dance.

Although imagine the possibilities if these musical monsters team up - the tarantella, the accordion-harpy, a siren, an evil satyr, the melodemon (an old Fiend Factory monster).

Hmm, I'm breaking into a theme song here. It's the idea for my next adventure.

Crinos

09-06-2008 06:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Where does the dancing venom spider come from?

JRM

09-06-2008 06:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9330269)
Where does the dancing venom spider come from?

It's based on Tarantism, an old Italian belief that the bite of a tarantula (that is the original large wolf-spider kind of tarantula, not the south american Mygalomorph spider) either caused dancing or could be cured by dancing.

The first D&D version I've seen was in the Basic set, where it was a variant giant spider.

Thranguy

09-06-2008 06:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

A lot of the stranger Dragonlance stuff comes from Taladas, the continent on the other side of the world that got one boxed set and then was utterly forgotten. I wouldn't be surprised if the Hatori originally hailed from there...

JRM

09-06-2008 07:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 9330415)
A lot of the stranger Dragonlance stuff comes from Taladas, the continent on the other side of the world that got one boxed set and then was utterly forgotten. I wouldn't be surprised if the Hatori originally hailed from there...

I have no idea whether they originated on Taladas or somewhere else on Krynn, we'd need someone more familiar with Dragonlance than I.

The Dragonlance lexicon webpage for Hatori says they're found in the Panak Desert of Hosk, the Northern Wastes, the Plains of Dust and The Desolation. The Panak Desert is in Taladas, but the other three wildernesses are all on the continent of Ansalom.

Steve H

09-06-2008 08:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 9330415)

A lot of the stranger Dragonlance stuff comes from Taladas, the continent on the other side of the world that got on boxed set and then was utterly forgotten. I wouldn't be surprised if the Hatori originally hailed from there...

There was also a supplement released on Taladas minotaurs and (my memory says and wiki confirms) a couple of adventures there too.

But yeah, pretty much forgotten.

Belchion

09-06-2008 06:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9322013)

Also, where does that Harpy in The Tempest fit into all of this? She was 'good', wasn't she?

If I remember correctly, classical harpies were also good oracles. I always wanted to to run an adventure where the group has to get into a harpies loft to face the harpies queen - without harming her subjects, because they do not want to kill her, but need her advise...

JRM

09-06-2008 09:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9332043)

If I remember correctly, classical harpies were also good oracles. I always wanted to to run an adventure where the group has to get into a harpies loft to face the harpies queen - without harming her subjects, because they do not want to kill her, but need her advise...

Doesn't ring a bell, the only Greek myths I recall connecting harpies with prophecy is when they punished the oracle Phineas for misusing his powers.

Elemental

09-06-2008 10:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9291537)

It's a fantasy world... maybe the Grimlocks hear the infrasonic singing of Earth elementals resonating through the Underdark and use that to know where things are.

Though younger grimlocks don't like earth music that much. They're more into heavy metal.

Brandi

09-07-2008 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9322013)

Also, where does that Harpy in The Tempest fit into all of this? She was 'good', wasn't she?

What harpy? You mean the disguise the air-spirit Ariel took to scare the men Prospero felt had betrayed him?

Belchion

09-07-2008 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9332334)

Doesn't ring a bell, the only Greek myths I recall connecting harpies with prophecy is when they punished the oracle Phineas for misusing his powers.

Hmm, maybe I mixed something up then. Still I like the idea of a harpy oracle.

noisms

09-07-2008 10:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9333162)

What harpy? You mean the disguise the air-spirit Ariel took to scare the men Prospero felt had betrayed him?

Yeah, that's the one I was thinking of. Been a while since I read that play...

sim_james

09-07-2008 10:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9329268)

Back in the day, I thought hatori were the coolest things ever. But I've never seen them before or since the Monstrous Compendium. Were they refugees from Dark Sun?

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 9329669)

My first encounter with them was in the DL MC, but I always assumed they were somewhere else first (since they don't seem particularly Dragonlancey to me).

There's a lot of monsters that originally showed up in DL that work perfectly well in other campaign settings. Krynn isn't all kender and stuff that the Companions saw in the novels!

I just had a quick look at the rulebook from Time of the Dragon (Zeb Cook's first boxed set about Taladas) and hatori aren't in it. I'd guess that they were a monster that first appeared in an obscure section of one of the first edition Dragonlance modules; there's a decent number of deserts in Ansalon. My guess is that they'd be found around the Khur region (being pseudo-Arabic), the Northern Wastes (closer to the equator), or Tanith.

JRM

09-07-2008 10:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9335694)

There's a lot of monsters that originally showed up in DL that work perfectly well in other campaign settings. Krynn isn't all kender and stuff that the Companions saw in the novels!

I just had a quick look at the rulebook from Time of the Dragon (Zeb Cook's first boxed set about Taladas) and hatori aren't in it. I'd guess that they were a monster that first appeared in an obscure section of one of the first edition Dragonlance modules; there's a decent number of deserts in Ansalon. My guess is that they'd be found around the Khur region (being pseudo-Arabic), the Northern Wastes (closer to the equator), or Tanith.

I believe you're right, as I said in an earlier post (#633) the Dragonlance lexicon website says Hatori can be found on Ansalon in the Northern Wastes, the Plains of Dust and The Desolation, as well as the Panek Desert of Hosk.

Anyhow, speaking of Hatori they're an example of one of the things that bothers me about D&D, some of the monsters can be very weak for their size. A 200' long Hatori should weigh somewhere in the region of a thousand tons, but a pair of Mammoths have a fair chance of beating one in a straight-up fight, going by their AD&D stats.

If I where to have AD&D PCs fight monsters that humongous I may have them do reduced damage if they just strike at random parts of their opponent, to do full damage they need to reach small, vulnerable areas (which are either very high AC and/or they need to perform difficult acrobats to reach them, like in Shadow of the Colossus).

noisms

09-08-2008 11:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Haunt

The Haunt is a ghost which lurks in a 60 yard area, waiting for passing adventurers it can beat up and possess. It then uses the body to fulfill - of course - a task that it failed to complete in life.

I wonder how most DMs would handle a character being possessed by a Haunt. I seem to remember the 2nd edition DMG saying that the DM should take control of characters who are affected by lycanthropy or other such conditions. But that doesn't sound as interesting as letting the player run the character as the Haunt. The DM could write down the Haunt's goal in a secret message and pass it to the player, and he would then have to try his best to achieve it. Meanwhile the other players have to work out what they're going to do about it.

Of course, this wouldn't work if the Haunt and the possessee have opposite alignments - because then the Haunt would deliberately strangle itself - a bit like something from a Hammer film.

Haunts can't be hurt by ordinary weapons and only take 1 point of damage from magical or silver ones, plus bonuses. Weirdly, they also take damage from fire. I'm not sure what the justification for that is, other than "we need some way for PCs without silver or magical weapons to be able to hurt them".

Crinos

09-08-2008 12:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9337727)

Haunt

The Haunt is a ghost which lurks in a 60 yard area, waiting for passing adventurers it can beat up and possess. It then uses the body to fulfill - of course - a task that it failed to complete in life.

I wonder how most DMs would handle a character being possessed by a Haunt. I seem to remember the 2nd edition DMG saying that the DM should take control of characters who are affected by lycanthropy or other such conditions. But that doesn't sound as interesting as letting the player run the character as the Haunt. The DM could write down the Haunt's goal in a secret message and pass it to the player, and he would then have to try his best to achieve it. Meanwhile the other players have to work out what they're going to do about it.

Of course, this wouldn't work if the Haunt and the possessee have opposite alignments - because then the Haunt would deliberately strangle itself - a bit like something from a Hammer film.

Haunts can't be hurt by ordinary weapons and only take 1 point of damage from magical or silver ones, plus bonuses. Weirdly, they also take damage from fire. I'm not sure what the justification for that is, other than "we need some way for PCs without silver or magical weapons to be able to hurt them".

That's actually a pretty good idea: Since the Haunt can't be of an incompatible alignment, that means that it wouldn't be that much of a departure in terms of role playing for the PC.

One thing that bothers me though: Haunts have 0 intelligence. Does that mean they assume their hosts Int, or the one they had in life, or do they just make their host mindless?

JasonK

09-08-2008 05:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Wait, why would the Haunt deliberately strangle itself? Even if it's the opposite alignment, after all, it still has its goal to complete, right?

Or am I missing something?

~ jason

noisms

09-08-2008 08:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9338675)

Wait, why would the Haunt deliberately strangle itself? Even if it's the opposite alignment, after all, it still has its goal to complete, right?

Or am I missing something?

~ jason

I think it strangles itself and then looks for another host. I'm not sure why alignment should make a difference to the Haunt, but apparently it does. Maybe the designers just wanted fun "see if your friends can stop you strangling yourself" scenes.

noisms

09-10-2008 05:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hell Hound

Flame-breathing wild dogs, Fire Giant's Best Friend, or alternatively, a kind of cyberspace program in Cyberpunk 2020 which fries netrunners' brains.

The Hell Hound entry is an odd one - it almost feels as if it was written by a different author to all the others: somebody who doesn't know all that much about the inner workings of the D&D multiverse. He or she keeps referring in a vague way to "another plane of existence" and "extradimensional planes notable for their fiery, hot landscapes". The entry is also rather thin on superfluous information - in fact it's like how I imagine the 4th edition MM to be (I haven't read it): lots and lots of stats and descriptions of abilities and not a whole lot else.

There's some scope for comedy involving Hell Hound puppies, which "burp" flame once per day, accidentally setting off fires with 'hilarious' results. (I rather think this spoils the Lawful Evil, Hound-of-the-Baskervilles image.) Plot hooks are also provided in the tendency for Hell Hounds to accidentally spark off forest fires (speaking of which, I don't think I've ever run a game in which the characters have had to fight a massive fire - could be fun), and the capturing of puppies for domestication. I also rather like the mention of how "evil beings" brought Hell Hounds to the Prime Material Plane but no reason is given - just the spark a creative DM needs. Maybe an Efreeti Sheikh, now slumbering in the magma in the world's upper mantle, brought them with him when he came six centuries ago, and when he awakes they will rush to meet him and form the vanguard of his conquest of the kingdoms of me. Or something.

It has to be said that the Hell Hound picture is exceedingly weak. Its fiery breath looks not a whole lot more powerful than a zippo lighter. I always imagined Hell Hounds having breath of near-dragon like proportions. (This is probably because of my experience playing roguelike games, in which Hell Hounds are pretty darn nasty.)

JRM

09-10-2008 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9347031)

Hell Hound

The Hell Hound entry is an odd one - it almost feels as if it was written by a different author to all the others: somebody who doesn't know all that much about the inner workings of the D&D multiverse. He or she keeps referring in a vague way to "another plane of existence" and "extradimensional planes notable for their fiery, hot landscapes".

Yes it's a bit odd being so coy about what plane Hell Hounds originate from when it's in the name of the monster.

What struck me about their 2nd edition write-up is how stealthy they are in 2nd edition, making them another of AD&D's many "ninja monsters". Don't recall them having bonus sneakiness back in 1st edition.

Don't much like the colour of their monstrous compendium picture, I've always preferred my Hellhounds as black as the pit, or occasionally as red as blood and as white as death. That picture doesn't even look rust-red to me, more dirt-brown.

As for your point about their breath weapon looking weak, well it is weak. Only 1 hp per HD with a 30' range, halved on a save, their teeth can do more damage. Didn't they have to choose between breathing fire or biting an opponent in 1st edition, and could only use their fire-breath once every ten rounds? That made their breath weapon pretty useless. Back in my old AD&D game I think I changed it so they could spew flames every round, and could do so while chomping on someone, like they do in the Monstrous Compendium. It just seemed more appropriate.

Wakboth

09-10-2008 10:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9347031)

It has to be said that the Hell Hound picture is exceedingly weak. Its fiery breath looks not a whole lot more powerful than a zippo lighter. I always imagined Hell Hounds having breath of near-dragon like proportions. (This is probably because of my experience playing roguelike games, in which Hell Hounds are pretty darn nasty.)

Hell hound pics have always been pretty weak. As lousy as the 2e MM one is, it's worlds better than the scruffy PoS in 3.0 MM (and why they didn't change that for 3.5, I have no idea...)

JRM

09-10-2008 11:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9347533)

Hell hound pics have always been pretty weak. As lousy as the 2e MM one is, it's worlds better than the scruffy PoS in 3.0 MM (and why they didn't change that for 3.5, I have no idea...)

Do you mean this one? I like that a bit better than the Monstrous Compendium version, at least the pose is a bit more dynamic and it hints at the lantern-like eyes that some folklore hellhounds have. Although I don't like the front legs, they make the beast look like it should have a claw/claw attack.

noisms

09-11-2008 01:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9347696)

Do you mean this one? I like that a bit better than the Monstrous Compendium version, at least the pose is a bit more dynamic and it hints at the lantern-like eyes that some folklore hellhounds have. Although I don't like the front legs, they make the beast look like it should have a claw/claw attack.

It's inarguable they're both a bit naff though. What does the 4e one look like?

JRM

09-11-2008 02:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9348117)

It's inarguable they're both a bit naff though. What does the 4e one look like?

Sorry, I can't even remember whether 4th edition has Hell Hounds yet. I do recall the initial 4E Monster Manual includes yeth hounds, worgs and grave hounds (the latter being a kind of zombie).

Canis Major

09-11-2008 04:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

It's a big wolf-like thing on fire, looking almost more fire-elemental-y. It's face is clear of fire except for the eyes, and flame is streaming back from the mouth. They are infact elemental creatures.

noisms

09-11-2008 11:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Canis Major (Post 9348995)

It's a big wolf-like thing on fire, looking almost more fire-elemental-y. It's face is clear of fire except for the eyes, and flame is streaming back from the mouth. They are infact elemental creatures.

That's one direction to take, I suppose.

E.T.Smith

09-11-2008 01:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Canis Major (Post 9348995)

It's a big wolf-like thing on fire, looking almost more fire-elemental-y. It's face is clear of fire except for the eyes, and flame is streaming back from the mouth. They are in fact elemental creatures.

The Hell Hound is one of the more glaring examples of a real world mythological concept roughly translated into D&D terms with dubious faithfulness (England's ghostly Black Dogs, particularly Black Shuck) then steadily modified even more over succeeding editions until it has only passing resemblance to the original at all:

Quote:

For centuries, inhabitants of East Anglia have told tales of a large black hellhound with malevolent flaming eyes that are red or alternatively green. They are described as being 'like saucers'. According to reports, the beast varies in size and stature from that of simply a large dog to being the size of a horse.

One stormy summer afternoon in 1577, on Sunday August 4, 1577 to be exact in Bungay he tore through the congregation of St Mary's Church during a service. The fiery dog killed two and left another injured, shrivelled "like a drawn purse".

As the shocked townsfolk reeled from the tragedy, news came that not long before, Shuck had struck just a few miles away at Blythburgh where he had again attacked the church congregation. A man and boy were killed there and others left scorched and hysterical as the church spire crashed through the roof, breaking the font while the tower bells tumbled down.

As the dreadful dog flew from the church, he is said to have left deep scorch marks on the door. The legend continued for centuries even though there were no signs of the marks on the original door. Then, in 1933, the door was cleaned and burn marks - some say they were the devil's own fingerprints - were there for all to see. They remain there today.

Now it's the last part of that story which scared me the most as we stood by the church door with the burn marks, I was only 9 years old when we were told this story by the vicar on a school visit.

http://bp2.blogger.com/_xhaSU796UAo/...s320/shuck.jpg

JRM

09-11-2008 10:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9350569)

The Hell Hound is one of the more glaring examples of a real world mythological concept roughly translated into D&D terms with dubious faithfulness (England's ghostly Black Dogs, particularly Black Shuck) then steadily modified even more over succeeding editions until it has only passing resemblance to the original at all:

http://bp2.blogger.com/_xhaSU796UAo/...s320/shuck.jpg

Yup, they also remind me of some of the mythic hounds of Celtic and Germanic legend, such as the Hounds of Annwyn, Hel's watchdog Garm, Fenris (except that he's a wolf), The Wild Hunt etc. I'm no linguist so used the easy spellings, as opposed to Annwn, Garmr, Fenrir which may be more authentic.

noisms

09-12-2008 01:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Heucuva

Heucuvus feel like they come from somewhere outside of D&D, but my extensive research (well, okay, looking it up on wikipedia) didn't turn up much. Anyone know anything on them?

In their D&D iteration they are essentially undead monks or priests who failed to keep up with their vows for some reason and hence were cursed to "roam the darkness" forever - which mostly seems to involve making a nuisance of themselves for adventurers. They give plenty of opportunities for over the top, gothic horror of the cheesiest kind - their lairs are often the ruins of an old abbey or temple filled with corpses arranged in the position of parishioners at a service, while there are also nomadic versions who wander around on endless pilgrimages to nowhere - and in my mind at least carry unholy relics, ring eerie handbells, and are followed everywhere by wisps of fog. (I actually had an encounter with a group of pilgrim Heucuva in two separate campaigns, because it was such a success the first time around.)

Heucuvus are one of my favourite obscure undead monsters, as it happens. There's something to be said for the whole corrupt priest motif, even if Dragonlance did almost ruin the whole 'fallen saint cursed for breaking vows' shtick with Lord Soth. It's another weird example of D&D's unusual relationship to Christian belief, though: Heucuva are clearly based on real world Catholic monastic orders like the Franciscans or Gregorians, except with the monotheism taken out. Obviously we're not supposed to think too deeply about it, but nevertheless I always find it odd when you get these blatantly Christian motifs explored in a Christianity-less world.

Another point to mention is that Heucuvus' XP rating, like that of so many other monsters, is completely unfair and surely wrong. 270 points is surely too little for a monster which is immune to anything except silver and +1 weapons, turns as a wight, can polymorph self 3 times a day, and strikes to infect with a deadly debilitating disease. Okay, they only have 2 HD, but still, they seem far too cheap in terms of bangs for buck.

On the plus side, they can be another addition to the Monsters Whose Corpses Are Useful For Stuff supplement - their ground up bones can be used in the creation of control undead potions or "to corrupt the spirits of living beings" (whatever that means).

Kakita Kojiro

09-12-2008 02:31 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9352489)

... while there are also nomadic versions who wander around on endless pilgrimages to nowhere - and in my mind at least carry unholy relics, ring eerie handbells, and are followed everywhere by wisps of fog.

Great. Now I'm imagining this:

Heucuva: "Pie Iesu Domine. Dona Eis Requiem" thwack

Quote:

On the plus side, they can be another addition to the Monsters Whose Corpses Are Useful For Stuff supplement - their ground up bones can be used in the creation of control undead potions or "to corrupt the spirits of living beings" (whatever that means).

It means don't put the stuff in your whisky. It tastes nasty. :)

DMH

09-12-2008 04:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

It is also one of the few creatures to get its name misspelled and the misspelling turned into canon. It was the huecuva initially. One of the tests of trivia in Dragon (150's??) covers this.

JasonK

09-12-2008 05:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9352489)

Heucuva

Wooooooo! This is basically my favorite D&D monster ever. Their pic in the Manual doesn't remotely do them justice - the rough pencil sketch with a cone helm from the Compendium was much more evocative.

You're quite right - they're evocative and spooky as hell, and they do bring something a little special to religion in D&D. The thing that sucks for me is that their listed Intelligence is basically crap (what, 2 - 4?), which precludes them from being the Big Bads such an evocative story involves.

So why do Heucuva do what they do? Why the ritual? Why the pageantry? Why the pilgrimage? Is it in mockery for what they forsook? Is it in service to some new dark lord, tainting holy rituals with impurity? Is it a misguided attempt at redemption? Or is it that they're simply unable to do anything else, cursed to make up for their failures in life by going through the motions endlessly in death?

I think, with their low Int, the game implies the later, but that keeps them in the realm of the simply spooky and that's sad. Me, I'd rather see Heucuva be more like the leadership of the Scarlet Brotherhood in WoW - so fanatical in their zealotry that they're blind to their own perversion. Let them be the Invisible Clergy of a sect of witchhunters, sending their loyal human hounds out to put village after village to the torch for a falsely perceived taint, while at the same time rooting out so many of the real demons lurking in the shadows. Let adventurers work their way up the ranks, tracking witchhunters across blighted moors, calling them out in threatened villages, exposing their allies in the church, grappling with the damage they do versus the good they sometimes serve. And, finally, let them kick open the door of a long-abandoned cathedral to see a congregation of the damned at prayer, led by their Heucuva clergy and let the last battle begin! :)

~ jason

Crinos

09-12-2008 10:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I think the reason their XP is so low is because they only have semi intelligent, which sort of limits its threat, even if it is immune to normal weapons and has disease.

Although I don't have the stats, I think they made the canon 3e Huecuva more dangerous by making them smarter and giving them spellcasting powers (I believe, the only contact I have with them is from the order of the stick webcomic, where one of the three undead used by Redcloak during the sapphire city invasion was a Huecuva who nearly killed Hinjo with his clerical magic (the other two being the death Knight and the eye of fear and flame)).

They also changed the spelling from Heucuva to Huecuva.

Speaking of obscure as hell undead, did the Allip and Mohrg ever appear in 2e? or were they 3e exclusive?

demiurge1138

09-12-2008 12:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The heucuva in 3e is a template; clerics keep their spellcasting, but switch their domains to Death and Evil. Paladins can gain the template too--they get blackguard abilities.

Now, don't quote me on this, but I think allips appeared in one of the Monstrous Compendium Appendicies as "madness spirits" or the like, whereas the morgh was invented for 3e.

kelvingreen

09-12-2008 04:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9353146)

It is also one of the few creatures to get its name misspelled and the misspelling turned into canon. It was the huecuva initially. One of the tests of trivia in Dragon (150's??) covers this.

The name has always rubbed me the wrong way a little. I always read it as "Heck of a..." and while I'm sure that's not right, it has stuck, and it ruins the spookiness of the monster for me. Heck of a what? ;)

noisms

09-12-2008 04:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9353377)

So why do Heucuva do what they do? Why the ritual? Why the pageantry? Why the pilgrimage? Is it in mockery for what they forsook? Is it in service to some new dark lord, tainting holy rituals with impurity? Is it a misguided attempt at redemption? Or is it that they're simply unable to do anything else, cursed to make up for their failures in life by going through the motions endlessly in death?

I always saw them as having had their sanity blasted by their curse, so they can do nothing except go through the motions of their previously held beliefs. When they see a living being the only thing they can do is attack, driven by their confusion and incoherent rage at their condition.

noisms

09-12-2008 04:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9355156)

The name has always rubbed me the wrong way a little. I always read it as "Heck of a..." and while I'm sure that's not right, it has stuck, and it ruins the spookiness of the monster for me. Heck of a what? ;)

Heck of a spooky undead thing?

JasonK

09-12-2008 06:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9355156)

The name has always rubbed me the wrong way a little. I always read it as "Heck of a..." and while I'm sure that's not right, it has stuck, and it ruins the spookiness of the monster for me. Heck of a what? ;)

I have to admit that, much as I like these guys, the name's always gotten to me, too.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9355158)

I always saw them as having had their sanity blasted by their curse, so they can do nothing except go through the motions of their previously held beliefs. When they see a living being the only thing they can do is attack, driven by their confusion and incoherent rage at their condition.

Fair but, to me, a little uninteresting.

~ jason

JRM

09-13-2008 04:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9352489)

Heucuva

Heucovas feel like they come from somewhere outside of D&D, but my extensive research (well, okay, looking it up on wikipedia) didn't turn up much. Anyone know anything on them?

Should have used google.;

I remember when I first saw Huecuvas in the Fiend Folio thinking that they were a cool monster that sounded like they might have come from real-world folklore. There was the vaguely central-American sounding name, the shape-changing and disease-inflicting powers and the hints of backstory.

Anyhows, Huecuvas are a kind of evil spirit in the mythology of the Auca people of Chile. Huecuvas serve the evil deity Pillan, a god of thunder, lightning & volcanoes, by manifested in all manner of horrifying shapes to inflict sickness, blight harvests, freak weather and other misfortunes upon people.

In the Fiend Folio they have average intelligence and instead of just disguising themselves as humans they can Polymorph Self thrice a day, which allows them to assume a much wider range of forms. I prefer that to the 2nd edition version.

But then they're obviously different creatures, since their names aren't spelled the same.:D

I've used them a couple of times in my campaign, the last time I tweaked their Polymorph ability so that most of the shapes they changed into were horrible, rotting apparitions, except that they they could disguise themselves as living humans. However, this human disguise was literally only skin deep. If they got struck their skin could rip to reveal the corruption inside, which also meant they had very bad breath, so couldn't speak without risking giving themselves away, hence the belief they were mute. I guess they could have worn perfume, chewed a lot of garlic, or pretended to be a dung-seller, but the huecuvas my players met hadn't thought of it.

DMH

09-13-2008 07:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9357127)

In the Fiend Folio they have average intelligence

I assume you mean the 2nd ed version. The first lists them as semi-intelligent.

JRM

09-13-2008 08:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9359136)
I assume you mean the 2nd ed version. The first lists them as semi-intelligent.

Nope, I meant the 1st edition. If it says they're Semi intelligent it's just my memory failing me again, I've always played them as Average intelligence in my games.

noisms

09-14-2008 06:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9357127)
I remember when I first saw Huecuvas in the Fiend Folio thinking that they were a cool monster that sounded like they might have come from real-world folklore. There was the vaguely central-American sounding name, the shape-changing and disease-inflicting powers and the hints of backstory.

Aha, you see I thought the name was vaguely latinate. But now I can see the Amerind thing.

JRM

09-15-2008 02:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9362201)
Aha, you see I thought the name was vaguely latinate. But now I can see the Amerind thing.

Funny, it never occurred to me that Huecuvas (or Heucuvvas) was vaguely Latinate, but it does have something of a Spanish/Portuguese ring to it, doesn't it.

noisms

09-15-2008 08:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hippocampus

No, not the part of the brain in charge of short term memory, but an oversized seahorse - the "most prized of marine steeds". Stat-wise they are similar to normal horses, except for the obligatory high intelligence that marine mammals are afforded by the D&D designers. They're not quite on the dolphin level, though.

Try as I might, I have to say I find it hard to say anything even mildly interesting about Hippocampi. I mean - a big seahorse for tritons to ride around on. Need I really say more?

As with Centaurs and Dolphins, I also get a little annoyed at how goody-goody the Hippocampi are. I understand that it's important that good creatures exist in D&D. I'm just not sure why they have to be so bloody smarmy with it. It seems like somewhere along the line "good" became confused with "benevolent", when the two terms aren't in fact indistinguishable at all.

There are some unintentionally humorous contradictions in the entry, though - like were it says that Hippocampi will happily allow evil creatures to drown, and will also accidentally drown riders by diving deep underwater and "forgetting" that said rider is a land dweller. Not so benevolent after all, then...

There is an interesting plot hook in the idea of the legend of a 'Great Herd' of thousands of Hippocampi travelling the uncharted reaches of the high seas. It almost sounds like an underwater version of the Great Modron March. Why are the Hippocampi banding together like that and where are they going? Only the adventurers can find out... and so on.

JRM

09-15-2008 11:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9366282)

Hippocampus

Try as I might, I have to say I find it hard to say anything even mildly interesting about Hippocampi. I mean - a big seahorse for tritons to ride around on. Need I really say more?

As with Centaurs and Dolphins, I also get a little annoyed at how goody-goody the Hippocampi are. I understand that it's important that good creatures exist in D&D. I'm just not sure why they have to be so bloody smarmy with it. It seems like somewhere along the line "good" became confused with "benevolent", when the two terms aren't in fact indistinguishable at all.

As far as adventure hooks go, I preferred the bit about rescuing captured hippocampus foals or eggs. Maybe a lone NPC hires the players for a mission of mercy? Also, there's no mention of what language, if any, hippocampi speak, so the local community surface dwellers may just assume they're dumb beasts like regular horses, which makes it more likely they're hunted for meat & hides as well. Now I'm thinking of a "Save the Great Herd from the fleet of (evil?) fishermen who've trapped them in their nesting grounds within a great Caldera" adventure.

There's a couple of odd things about their stats though. They're described as having "a strong bite" and head-butts that "may stun an opponent or break his bones" but their stats only have one attack doing 1d4 damage, with no mention of a "stun" Special Attack. A mere Dolphin does twice as much damage, despite being much smaller and having half its Hit Dice.

Speaking of size, why is the Hippocampus statted as Huge? Good grief, that's larger than most AD&D

2E Elephants. Surely they should just be Large, like a Heavy Horse or Hippogriff? I'm guessing the author just wrote "14' long" and based the Size category on that, neglecting the importance of shape.

sim_james

09-15-2008 11:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Really long tails.

(Maybe?)

noisms

09-15-2008 11:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9366604)
Really long tails.

(Maybe?)

Possibly. I actually gave up putting any sort of faith in AD&D 2e sizes a long time ago! ;)

noisms

09-16-2008 12:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9366584)
As far as adventure hooks go, I preferred the bit about rescuing captured hippocampus foals or eggs. Maybe a lone NPC hires the players for a mission of mercy? Also, there's no mention of what language, if any, hippocampi speak, so the local community surface dwellers may just assume they're dumb beasts like regular horses, which makes it more likely they're hunted for meat & hides as well. Now I'm thinking of a "Save the Great Herd from the fleet of (evil?) fishermen who've trapped them in their nesting grounds within a great Caldera" adventure.

You've been talking to PETA girl again, haven't you? ;)

Quite a cool idea actually. A bit like an AD&D version of Greenpeace vs. the Japanese whaling fleet. Actually baby Hippocampi are worth 1500 gps, if I recall, so those fishermen would be highly motivated...

JRM

09-16-2008 12:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9366748)

You've been talking to PETA girl again, haven't you? ;)

Quite a cool idea actually. A bit like an AD&D version of Greenpeace vs. the Japanese whaling fleet. Actually baby Hippocampi are worth 1500 gps, if I recall, so those fishermen would be highly motivated...

I believe she prefers to be called PETA woman these days. ;)

Especially considering the Monstrous Compendium did come out almost twenty years ago, that could be enough time for her to become a PETA Grandmother.

Let's see, thousands of Hippocampi, one offspring per mating pair worth 1500 gp (egg) or 2500 gp (foal). Assuming half eggs, half foals, I make that a minimum of a million gold pieces, not including profit from their parents meat & hide.

Those PCs are going to be facing determined opponents!

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9366604)

Really long tails.

(Maybe?)

Then a standard AD&D2E 10-20' long Constrictor Snake would be Huge as well, when in fact they're Medium sized creatures. A 30'+ Giant Constrictor Snake is only Large size. Nope, it makes no sense at all.

Of course, there are some pretty screwy choices of Size for creatures in other versions of D&D, there just seem to be more in 2nd edition AD&D.

Kakita Kojiro

09-16-2008 03:14 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9366604)

Really long tails.

(Maybe?)

Probably. Because the hippocampus? is about the worst design for swimming you could come up with.

Long tails might allow it to lumber around, somewhat, but that thing would just founder in the water. Its upright forebody is nothing but adding water resistance, its weird finny feet are shaped entirely wrong for actually moving it anywhere. Without a long tail for propulsion they're pretty much very very slow sharkbait.

Of course, it'd be even better if they had vertical, rather than horizontal, flukes on their tail. But not by much.

The Great Herd is probably there because the poor things can't swim anywhere else. Hopefully their triton friends will buy them water-wings or innertubes or something.

Crinos

09-16-2008 04:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9367522)

Probably. Because the hippocampus? is about the worst design for swimming you could come up with.

Long tails might allow it to lumber around, somewhat, but that thing would just founder in the water. Its upright forebody is nothing but adding water resistance, its weird finny feet are shaped entirely wrong for actually moving it anywhere. Without a long tail for propulsion they're pretty much very very slow sharkbait.

Of course, it'd be even better if they had vertical, rather than horizontal, flukes on their tail. But not by much.

The Great Herd is probably there because the poor things can't swim anywhere else. Hopefully their triton friends will buy them water-wings or innertubes or something.

And despite your perfectly logical claims the MM lists their movement speed as 24, twice the normal movement speed for a human.

I hate to see how you'll react at the Zaratan at the end of the book.

kelvingreen

09-16-2008 05:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9366282)

Try as I might, I have to say I find it hard to say anything even mildly interesting about Hippocampi. I mean - a big seahorse for tritons to ride around on. Need I really say more?

I've always wondered how that works; surely riding on a fish-like creature is slippery enough without the rider too having the bottom half of a fish?

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9366584)

Also, there's no mention of what language, if any, hippocampi speak

Elven Cat, obviously.

JRM

09-16-2008 05:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9367522)

Probably. Because the hippocampus? is about the worst design for swimming you could come up with.

Long tails might allow it to lumber around, somewhat, but that thing would just founder in the water. Its upright forebody is nothing but adding water resistance, its weird finny feet are shaped entirely wrong for actually moving it anywhere. Without a long tail for propulsion they're pretty much very very slow sharkbait.

Of course, it'd be even better if they had vertical, rather than horizontal, flukes on their tail. But not by much.

The plural is Hippocampi, following the original Greek.

As for bad designs for swimming, I think I could come up with a worse one easily enough. At least it tapers, has bilateral symmetrical and has a sizable tail fin. Nature's come up with some very undynamic designs for free-swimming animals (although "free floating" would be more honest in most cases, considering how slowly they can move). Have you seen what some heteromorph Ammonites looked like?

I agree about the feet, but surely a Hippocampus could stretch its forebody in front of itself when swimming at speed. Plus, doesn't the MM illustration show it with vertical flukes? It's difficult to tell, not that I believe it would make any significant difference. Besides which, suldn't horizontal flukes make sense going by marine mammals like a merman or whale?

Of course, that's assuming it doesn't fall back to the "magic makes it work" for the explanation of their swim speed. Maybe they create a streamlining "bubble of water" around themselves, which also encapsulates any rider. That might help explain how those Tritons stay on their back, especially considering they're sometimes shown with riders but no saddles!

ADDENDUM

I've just had a look at theoi.com Hippocampoi page and they didn't have a single picture of a hippocampus rider using a saddle, and that includes nymphs and sea goddesses who rode them side-saddle! Well, bare-back side-saddle if you follow me.

END ADDENDUM

While were on the subject of marine steeds in AD&D, the Giant Sea Horse has a 21" swim speed despite the real-life variety being notoriously sluggish swimmers.

JRM

09-16-2008 06:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9367841)

I hate to see how you'll react at the Zaratan at the end of the book.

Nah, it's got a perfectly reasonable Swim speed. For a 300' turtle.:o

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9367893)
Elven Cat, obviously.

Well Elven Cats do "enjoy swimming and playing in water" :)

Hippocampi are likely just one of the few AD&D2E sapients they forgot to give their own language to. I vote for Zaratan. And yes, a species of giant island-turtles were obviously given their own, unique language.

Crinos

09-16-2008 07:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9368019)
Nah, it's got a perfectly reasonable Swim speed. For a 300' turtle.:o

Yeah but its sex lasts for years!

Kakita Kojiro

09-16-2008 11:00 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9367957)
The plural is Hippocampi, following the original Greek.

Ironically, your own later cite gives the lie to this claim. ;)

Gamers making bad Latin declension guesses are one of my largest pet peeves, what with that peeve being fed so often. I've trained it to bite the head off of anyone who pluralizes "ninja" as "ninjae".

I dread what it will do to the poor thing once we reach P, and someone starts talking about "pegasi". :(

Boris

09-16-2008 04:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9366901)

Let's see, thousands of Hippocampi, one offspring per mating pair worth 1500 gp (egg) or 2500 gp (foal). Assuming half eggs, half foals, I make that a minimum of a million gold pieces, not including profit from their parents meat & hide.

Those PCs are going to be facing determined opponents!

.

Of course, trying to sell thousands of Hippocampus foals at once would probably drive the price down. There are only so many people who want to buy a big seahorse after all. The market will become saturated and eventually you will be selling the things for coppers to a sausage maker.

I just brought real world economics into a D&D game didn't I? Those poor catgirls.

noisms

09-16-2008 05:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Boris (Post 9369969)

Of course, trying to sell thousands of Hippocampus foals at once would probably drive the price down. There are on! so many people who want to buy a big seahorse after all. The market will become saturated and eventually you will be selling the things for coppers to a sausage maker.

I just brought real world economics into a D&D game didn't I? Those poor catgirls.

BOGOF Hippocampoi.

JRM

09-17-2008 12:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9369052)

Ironically, your own later cite gives the lie to this claim. ;)

Gamers making bad Latin declension guesses are one of my largest pet peeves, what with that peeve being fed so often. I've trained it to bite the head off of anyone who pluralizes "ninja" as "ninjae".

I dread what it will do to the poor thing once we reach P, and someone starts talking about "pegasi". :(

Sure the original Greek used Hippokampoi, I said following not matching.:cool:

Didn't think it worth mention that it was the Latin spelling, which English tends to prefer for classical Greek words that the ancient Romans had got their hands on. I also forgot the switch from -kampos/kampoi to -campus/campi.

Pegasus/Pegasi is in the same situation, don't see anything wrong with English using the Latin form Pegasi. If we stuck to the original Greek shouldn't it be Pegasos?

ADDENDUM

Of course, there's the additional problem in that Pegasus/os was one creature. I've been trying to find a classical source that gives a plural form, theoi.com gives the Latin plural as Pegasi and quotes Pliny describing Ethiopian Pegasi with the translation "winged horses armed with horns, called Pegasi." Unfortunately, after checking Book 8 Chapter 72 of Pliny's Natural History it looks like he used the Greek singular ("Pegasos") when talking about these winged horses ("pinnatos equos"). He also uses Pegasos in Book 10 Chapter 136.

Maybe we could just make up a name for them, like Pterohippus?
END ADDENDUM

As for ninjæ? Good grief! Don't these people know its ninji.:D
(Joke! Joke! Please take my head out of your jaws!)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Boris (Post 9369969)

Of course, trying to sell thousands of Hippocampus foals at once would probably drive the price down. There are on! so many people who want to buy a big seahorse after all. The market will become saturated and eventually you will be selling the things for coppers to a sausage maker.

Actually that million gold pieces was just the Monstrous Compendium market price for 250 Hippocampi foals and 250 eggs. But yes, market saturation could be a worry. Then again, it depends on what kind of campaign it is. A wealthy empire wanting to form a marine cavalry unit would probably want several hundred of them, and individually they cost no more than +1 swords, and we know how many of those are floating around D&Dland.

That begs the question of why the theoretical buyer in such a high-level campaign doesn't just hire some wizards to Polymorph Other a few hundred rabbits into Hippocampi. It would be a lot cheaper and easier.

kelvingreen

09-17-2008 03:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9370870)

As for ninjæ? Good grief! Don't these people know its ninji.:D

Ninjax, actually.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9370870)

Then again, it depends on what kind of campaign it is. A wealthy empire wanting to form a marine cavalry unit would probably want several hundred of them, and individually they cost no more than +1 swords, and we know how many of those are floating around D&Dland.

Assuming they want them for purposes of utility. Demanding that many hippokampoi ninjaxes to me suggests that they're prized for nutritional value.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9370870)

That begs the question of why the theoretical buyer in such a high-level campaign doesn't just hire some wizards to Polymorph Other a few hundred rabbits into Hippocampi. It would be a lot cheaper and easier.

The pesky wizard's union frowns on such practices.

JRM

09-17-2008 03:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9371554)

The pesky wizard's union frowns on such practices.

Yes, but that union only has one member, namely pesky wizard. All the other wizards just ignore it.;

More seriously, why would an organisation of wizards object to such practices if it earns them money and the favour of a nation, are they are getting bribes & cutbacks from the Sea-Caballeros?

EDIT: Cutbacks? Egad! It was supposed to be kick-backs, which makes a lot more sense.

Kakita Kojiro

09-17-2008 10:04 AM

Now, the idea of sea-caballeros is one worth exploiting, I'd think. Y'all git ta round up mustang hippokampoi, git on a sea-cattle drive, fight off sahuagin rustlers... and talk in stereotypical cowboy slang. Or, Spanish cowboy slang!

JRM

09-17-2008 05:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9373392)

Now, the idea of sea-caballeros is one worth exploiting, I'd think. Y'all git ta round up mustang hippokampoi, git on a sea-cattle drive, fight off sahuagin rustlers... and talk in stereotypical cowboy slang. Or, Spanish cowboy slang!

Si, let mee tell you senor, those sahuagin are thee worst for they sweem faster than a caballito de mar, how you say a horse of the sea. Wee had to leave Eduardo's kitchen-boat and some of our poor compadres behind with those devil fishee-hombres, may holy Pholtus have meercy on their souls.

One of my "this would make a cool game, but I've never gotten around to it" ideas was basically Rawhide the D&D campaign. Just transfer that to a marine environment (Salthide?) and give everyone [EDIT: pseudo-Mexican?] accents, and you're mostly there.

Crinos

09-17-2008 09:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9374831)

Si, let mee tell you senor, those sahuagin are thee worst for they sweem faster than a caballito de mar, how you say horse of the sea. Wee had to leave Eduardo's kitchen-boat and some of our poor compadres behind with those devil fishee-hombres, may holy Pholtus have meercy on their souls.

One of my "this would make a cool game, but I've never gotten around to it" ideas was basically Rawhide the D&D campaign. Just transfer that to a marine environment (Salthide?) and give everyone [EDIT: pseudo-Mexican?] accents, and you're mostly there.

Dammit, now I cant help but imagine Sahuagin wearing sombreros and ponchos with long twirly mustaches.

JRM

09-17-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9375170)

Dammit, now I cant help but imagine Sahuagin wearing sombreros and ponchos with long twirly mustaches.

That inspired me to waste more time than I can really spare trawling deviant art for an appropriate picture. I netted a lot of pirate fish, but the closest thing to a Sahuagin in a Sombrero I could find was this.

Let mee tell you senor, sure those Sahuagin banditos are bad, but the Jarabe Sahuagin are the most feendish of them all. Even the strongest sea-caballero weell feel the terror cracking his heart when they hear their monstrous marine Mariachi music playing across the waves.

JRM

09-18-2008 02:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9375538)

Let mee tell you senior, sure those Sahuagin banditos are bad, but the Jarabe Sahuagin are the most feendish of ther all. Even the strongest sea-caballero weell feel the terror cracking his heart when they hear their monstrous marine Mariachi music playing across the waves.

Although there ees one small mercy my freend, my compadres and I have yet to face a Sahuagin Pistolero or Carabinero who could keep hees powder dry.

noisms

09-18-2008 12:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hippogriff

The poor Hippogriff. Forever overshadowed by his horse-guzzling cousin the Griffin, and cursed with one of the worst illustrations in the history of fantasy bestiaries, he's a sadly overlooked monster, forever doomed to the lower reaches of random encounter tables for mountainous areas.

I do like Hippogriffs, I think mainly because I used to have a Hippogriff model in my old Dwarf Warhammer army. He used to soar around the rear ranks of my enemies' armies, attacking war machines and spreading fear and destruction in his wake. The AD&D version seems a bit less ferocious, mainly I think because the entry devotes about two-thirds of its length to describing the monsters' family lives and how the babies behave, which is interesting but not very monstrous.

As well as random encounters, adventurers might come across Hippogriffs for a few other reasons - egg thieving and youth abduction (natch), raiding treasure troves (Hippogriffs are magpie-like in their attraction for shiny things) and riding. Riding is obviously the most interesting of these - nothing beats flying steeds in a D&D session. I also like the idea of a party of characters trailing across a range of barren hills, suddenly having to flee for scampy cover as a flock of Hippogriff-riding Hobgoblin raiders comes sweeping in from the grey sky...

YojimboC

09-18-2008 01:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Oh yeah, griffins are totally cooler than hippogriffs. Half-eagle and half-lion, or half-eagle and half-horse?

I think I may have used hippogriffs at some point in the distant past, probably 1E, actually, but flying animals didn't feature too prominently in my games. Regular mounts didn't feature too prominently -- we were too busy running around the planes. On foot.

noisms

09-18-2008 03:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9379172)

Oh yeah, griffins are totally cooler than hippogriffs. Half-eagle and half-lion, or half-eagle and half-horse?

I think I may have used hippogriffs at some point in the distant past, probably 1E, actually, but flying animals didn't feature too prominently in my games. Regular mounts didn't feature too prominently -- we were too busy running around the planes. On foot.

There isn't much of a contest between Hippogriffs and Griffons. Though the key advantage of a horse - ability to gallop and bear riders - could be exploited better. For example, Hippogriffs should be able to take huge running jumps to gain extra speed, etc.

demiurge1138

09-18-2008 05:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I actually had a mountain range in my game that was well-known as the native range of hippogriffs. Of course, this meant that the party didn't actually encounter any, except as seeing them off in the distance. Likewise, my girlfriend was going to play a character in my current game who was a hippogriff-riding paladin... but got dissuaded by the mechanics and decided to play a swashbuckler instead.

So hippogriffs are basically my Monster of Missed Opportunities. Always so close to getting some limelight, always getting pushed back...

Wakboth

09-18-2008 08:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9379449)

There isn't much of a contest between Hippogriffs and Griffons. Though the key advantage of a horse - ability to gallop and bear riders - could be exploited better. For example, Hippogriffs should be able to take huge running jumps to gain extra speed, etc.

I thought the chief advantage of hippogriffs was that your steed wasn't continuously raring for a bloody horse steak, and ready to ignore your orders to get one? :)

Overall, flying mounts are kind of underused in (A)D&D; teleportation and the various flying magical items have in my experience replaced them almost entirely.

sim_james

09-18-2008 10:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I have an irrational fondness for hippogriffs. Buckbeak was my favourite part of any Harry Potter film.

I imagine that they'd be a darn sight easier to train than griffons!

Crinos

09-18-2008 10:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I think the original mythological concept behind the Hippogriff was that it was the offspring of a Griffon and a Horse, which made it an even more fantastic animal than a Griffon because Griffons and horses are natural enemies.

JRM

09-19-2008 08:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hey! I hadn't finished fooling around with my Caballeros de Mer yet, and you're already on the Hippogriffs..mad:

Anyhows, I forgot to mention that a few ancient sources indicate that when Poseidon's Hippokampoi/Hippocampi came out onto land their fish-tails turned into the hindquarters of horses, so they could gallop about to their hearts desire. Now all they need to do is cross it with a pegasus to add wings, intelligence and speech and you've got a great adventurer's mount...

...A walking, talking, swimming, flying living steed.:o

As for our current beastie. Crinos is right about the myths considering Hippogriffs an even more fantastic animal than a Griffin, due to the latter's enmity towards horses. The book Orlando Furioso has a magician who created a Hippogriff - I guess that's one of the reasons they invented the Philter of Love.

Hippogriffs make much more desirable steeds than Griffins, combining the desirable traits of both horse (a tamable mount that doesn't need to eat meat) and gryphon (flight, beak & claws for offense). Old myths and bestiaries indicate Gryphons prefer eating humans to offering them a taxi service.

I don't think there are many stories of gryphons being ridden by people, although they were sometimes used by magicians, and gods such as Apollo, as steeds or to draw their chariots.

Wasn't there an ancient Greek myth of a sorceress with a chariot drawn by Gryphons? Hmm, wasn't Medea, she used dragons.

noisms

09-20-2008 11:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hobgoblin

Hooray! For some reason as I was about to open up the MM just now I was expecting to be let down by something Hippocampus--esque and boring. I'd forgotten all about Hobgoblins, which I think are everybody's favourite bad-guy monster after Gnolls.

One of my better campaign settings was a continent which had been completely taken over by a coalition of hobgoblin generalissimos some two centuries previously. All the other races had either fled or been wiped out, with gnome and halfling slaves all that remained. But hobgoblins being hobgoblins, it wasn't long before civil war broke out, and 200 years of war ensued, in which a once verdant land was reduced to desert and ash, criss-crossed by old lines of trenches and dotted with abandoned fortifications. Demographic loss had been catastrophic, and the war had descended into a scuffle for the last few resources available. And meanwhile, the Duergar empire in the mountains to the East was watching the descent into chaos, and planning its conquest...

Anyway. Hobgoblins. One of the things I really like about the 2nd edition MM is its detailed expositions of how bands of hobgoblins, orcs, goblins etc. are composed. It really shows D&D's wargame roots - "Hobgoblins in a typical force will be equipped with polearms (30%), morningstars (20%), swords and bows (20%), spears (10%), swords and spears (10%), swords and morning stars (5%), or swords and whips (5%)" - but it also makes it easier to imagine how the creatures fit into the wide world itself. Hobgoblins aren't just evil things for the players to kill. They are part of something bigger. ("In addition to the warriors present in a hobgoblin tribe, there will be half again that many females and three times as many children as adult males. Fully 80% of all known hobgoblin lairs are subterranean complexes. The remaining 20% are surface villages which are fortified with a ditch, fence, 2 gates, and 3-6 guard towers. Villages are often built upon ruined humanoid settlements and may incorporate defensive features already present in the ruins. Hobgoblin villages possess artillery in the form of 2 heavy catapults, 2 light catapults, and a ballista for each 50 warriors. Underground complexes may be guarded by 2-12 carnivorous apes (60%).")

Koalinth

Marine species of evil humanoids are a familiar D&D trope, and they get my vote for being cool. I'm not sure I've ever used Koalinths in a game, though; a situation I soon hope to recitify.

YojimboC

09-20-2008 12:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hobgoblins. Now we're on to something. I absolutely love hobgoblins. They're so totally bad-ass and tough and brutal, they make most of the other (1HD) humanoids look like pansies.

There's an utterly fantastic illustration in one of the Monstrous Compendiums (remember the dividers?) by Jim Holloway that shows a hobgoblin army done up in vaguely Mongolian/Central Asian manner, having triumphed over a force of humans. I think that had some kind of serious impact on me -- I'd used hobgoblins before, but at some point after that I decided they were the coolest. And I remember that I derived a hobgoblin fighter named Dzubokai from The Orcs of Thar, also with art by Holloway.

Jumping editions for a moment, one of the big selling points for the Kingdoms of Kalamar setting for me was the inclusion of not one, but two hobgoblin run kingdoms and the use of half-hobgoblins to go along with half-orcs as a player character race. The setting really played up hobgoblins as the D&D equivalent of klingons -- honorable, warrior-oriented, but ultimately evil culture. Great foes and also workable as allies on occasion.

I'm aware of the DiTirlizzi love in this thread, and normally I'm a huge fan, but I have to say that his hobgoblin illo pales in comparison to the picture from the Monstrous Compendium (again by Holloway, if memory serves), which shows a hulking hobgoblin with a brutal looking morningstar that just rocks on toast. I wish they had colored it and used it in the MM.

demiurge1138

09-20-2008 12:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I love the Di Terlizzi hobgoblin; all sneers and threats, with Mongol-inspired fur garb. Haven't seen the Holloway hobgoblin, though.

checks massive archive of 2e PDFs

OK, it's good. Not DiTerlizzi good, though.

Anyway, Eberron treats hobgoblins in a similar way to Kingdoms of Kalamar--they're successful humanoids. In Eberron, the hobgoblins once were the rulers of an empire, Dhakaan, which stretched over the whole continent. Weakened by skirmishes with the elves, the empire was shattered by the incursion of the daelkyr (a race of flesh-warping Nyarlathoteps from the Realm of Madness). In recent years, though, hobgoblin mercenaries used the Last War as an excuse to seize territory from the warring kingdoms and establish a new empire, Darguun.

For some reason, whenever I run hobgoblins, they always end up overshadowed by either goblins or bugbears in their midst. For example, an Eberron game I ran featured a gang of hobgoblin slavers from the aforementioned Darguun, but the ship's captain, a bellicose bugbear named Captain Gnash Ratcatcher, stole the show (his armament of a wooden door as a shield and a magical talking truncheon might have had something to do with that...).

Kakita Kojiro

09-20-2008 12:28 PM

Good grief, Koalinths! I had completely forgotten there were aquatic hobgoblins. Lacedeons, scraggs, those I've used. Guess I never sent low-level PCs on an aquatic adventure and had to go looking for appropriate fodder.

I'm actually a little surprised that later editions didn't make anything of them, either.

E.T.Smith

09-20-2008 01:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

When did Hobgoblins first pick up their official flavor of disciplined, militarized and vaguely oriental that has become unquestioned in nearly all traditional fantasy rpgs? I think 1st ed. MM pictured its hobgoblin as wearing a samurai-like suit of armor; was that all it took?

Kakita Kojiro

09-20-2008 04:10 PM

I think that hobgoblins became more organized and militarized to distinguish them from orcs. As the latter staked a claim on the Chaotic Evil, monstrous equivalent to Huns and Mongols, they needed to find a Lawful Evil trope that fit the hobgoblins. And, hey, evil legions seems a natural complement to evil barbarian hordes.

And those breakouts of hobgoblin armaments almost look like a Roman legion + auxiliaries... if you handed out morningstars and polearms in addition to the gladius + pilum, I guess.

Not sure about any vaguely oriental flavor, though.

Wakboth

09-20-2008 04:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

On the Roman-looking hobgoblins, here's a wallpaper showing a legion of them, done by Claudio Pozas. Very Gladiator. :)

And yeah, hobgoblins are the humanoids who have "made it". I'm a little surprised it took until Kalamar and Eberron for hobgoblin empires to become canonical part of the setting; they've been lawful, strong and militaristic, with human-level smarts, since the 1e (or before). If, say, dwarves can have their kingdoms, why not hobgoblins? (The answer, of course, used to be "They're humanoids, and therefore unlevelled ugly sword fodder.")

demiurge1138

09-20-2008 05:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9387496)

I think that hobgoblins became more organized and militarized to distinguish them from orcs. As the latter staked a claim on the Chaotic Evil, monstrous equivalent to Huns and Mongols, they needed to find a Lawful Evil trope that fit the hobgoblins. And, hey, evil legions seems a natural complement to evil barbarian hordes.

Of course, in 1e and 2e orcs were also lawful. Gruumsh lives in Acheron, remember. I think orcs were made chaotic in 3e to differentiate them more from hobgoblins, actually.

JRM

09-20-2008 06:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9386910)

Hobgoblin

Hooray! For some reason as I was about to open up the MM just now I was expecting to be let down by something Hippocampus--esque and boring. I'd forgotten all about Hobgoblins, which I think are everybody's favourite bad-guy monster after Gnolls.

Ay! Boring? You 'ave eensulted the honor of the noble Hippocampo, my muchachos will puneesh you!

As for your Hobgoblins, I curse the day their generalissimos drove us into the mer. They are as evil as the Sombrero-danceeng Sahuagin, you know. Now they pursue us on the sea, in galleys armed with ballistae. At leest they do not bring their man-eating gorillas with them. They do not just use them as watchdogs in their homes, you know, when a carneevorous ape can fight beside them in battle. A Simio de guerra is a fearsome sight, let me teel you, in eets spiked armour as eet stands upon the corpses of your friends bellowing eets war-cry.*

Who let that Sea-Caballero back in here? Shoo! Shoo!!

*In case your curious, the previous message was inspired by Noism mentioning Hobgoblin generalissimos which, naturally, made me think of Mexican Army Hobgoblins.

So it's all his fault.:)

Hobgoblins can speak Carnivorous Ape, so it makes sense to me that they'd find other uses for them than household pets. Just imagine what would happen if Tarzan was evil and Cheeta was seven-feet tall and could casually tear people's heads off.:eek:

"Send the War Apes into the forest after those elves!"
"Cheeta! Climb up that wall with this rope ladder!"
"Tear that prisoner's arms off and see if the others will talk!"
...et cetera

Anyhows, I believe the idea of hobgoblins as "über-orcs" comes from Tolkien, as in Uruk-Hai. There are several references to large goblins being called "hobgoblins" (e.g. in the Hobbit). Your folklore hobgoblin was a small fey creature, a sprite or (fairy) goblin that was usually mischievous rather than malignant.

As for Hobgoblin kingdoms, that notion long predates Orcs becoming Chaotic Evil, which didn't happen until 3rd edition. Well, not in the Basic-Immortals D&D series, obviously, which just had a Law-Neutral-Chaos alignment axis, with most monsters on the Chaos side. Then again, Orcs had highly disciplined military kingdoms as well back when they were LE. Wasn't there an adventure in Dungeon magazine that featured an invading orc army from one such land? Dungeon #32's The Siege of Kratys Freehold, unless I'm mistaken.

kelvingreen

09-20-2008 06:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The Warhammer world also has organised, imperial, hobgoblins as part of the backstory. I think it was called the Hobgoblin Hegemony, and was your average fallen empire; the Chaos Dwarfs took over when it collapsed, as I recall. The Hegemony has been hinted at in the fluff for decades, but I don't think we've seen any concrete information, since the hobgoblins tend to get lumped in with all the other C-list races that never get army books.

As I recall, the Warhammer hobgoblins also get decked out in vaguely-East-Asian garb (the Hegemony was located in Warhammer's Mongolia, I think). I'd love to know where that particular association comes from, as it seems rather pervasive across a number of franchises.

noisms

09-20-2008 07:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9387644)
Of course, in 1e and 2e orcs were also lawful. Gruumsh lives in Acheron, remember. I think orcs were made chaotic in 3e to differentiate them more from hobgoblins, actually.

Yep. Actually 2e had more major Lawful Evil races than any other: Goblins, Orcs, Hobgoblins and Kobolds were all LE. Gnolls, Bugbears and Troglodytes were the only CE ones I can think of amongst the "bad guy" races. And Drow I suppose. And it's hard to think of a NE one. Grell?

JRM

09-20-2008 10:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9387797)

Yep. Actually 2e had more major Lawful Evil races than any other: Goblins, Orcs, Hobgoblins and Kobolds were all LE. Gnolls, Bugbears and Troglodytes were the only CE ones I can think of amongst the "bad guy" races. And Drow I suppose. And it's hard to think of a NE one. Grell?

Yuan-Ti are Chaotic Evil. Bullywugs and Ogres too, although they arguably don't count as a major race.

EDIT: I can't think of any NE sapient races of living creature in 2e.

The Last Conformist

09-21-2008 02:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9387694)

The Warhammer world also has organised, imperial, hobgoblins as part of the backstory. I think it was called the Hobgoblin Hegemony, and was your average fallen empire; the Chaos Dwarfs took over when it collapsed, as I recall. The Hegemony has been hinted at in the fluff for decades, but I don't think we've seen any concrete information, since the hobgoblins tend to get lumped in with all the other C-list races that never get army books.

As I recall, the Warhammer hobgoblins also get decked out in vaguely-East-Asian garb (the Hegemony was located in Warhammer's Mongolia, I think). I'd love to know where that particular association comes from, as it seems rather pervasive across a number of franchises.

Actually, I believe the hobgoblin empire is supposed to be still live and kicking in the "present" of the Warhammer world. There's a regiment of renown of renegade hobgoblins from there, who sport vaguely Mongol gear.

There are also hobgoblin slave-troops in the Chaos Dwarf list, who like their masters sport vaguely Assyrian gear. I don't recall whether there is a current official Chaos Dwarf army list, but they're definitely there in the background material.

(Note for non-warhammerers: in the Warhammer world, hobgoblins are stronger than goblins but not as tough as orcs. The extra-tough greenskin rôle is played by the black orcs. There are also gnoblars, who are weedier than even goblins, and snotlings, who are weedier yet - so weedy, in fact, that they occur as swarms rather than individual critters.)

Elliott

09-21-2008 02:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Orcs have gone from chaotic to lawful and then back to chaotic. Like back when they had pig heads.

Basically I think the reason this happened was the same reason modern orcs don't look like people with pig heads: in the 80s and especially the 90s there was a cross pollination of ideas about what orcs looked like and did. The Warhammer and the Warcraft series IMO really made them into what they are today: Turning them from brutal and militaristic but fairly ordered soldiers into a slaving horde of barbarians.

kelvingreen

09-21-2008 03:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9388474)

Actually, I believe the hobgoblin empire is supposed to be still live and kicking in the "present" of the Warhammer world.

That'll be a more recent change, I'd guess, but then I've not kept up with the game in years. It always used to be a fallen empire. ;)

JRM

09-21-2008 05:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Elliott (Post 9388537)

Orcs have gone from chaotic to lawful and then back to chaotic. Like back when they had pig heads.

Basically I think the reason this happened was the same reason modern orcs don't look like people with pig heads: in the 80s and especially the 90s there was a cross pollination of ideas about what orcs looked like and did. The Warhammer and the Warcraft series IMO really made them into what they are today: Turning them from brutal and militaristic but fairly ordered soldiers into a slaving horde of barbarians.

Since we've got seven whole letters before we reach 'O' I think I'll save the few thoughts on Orcs that I can muster, except maybe...

...bring back the pig heads!:p

noisms

09-21-2008 10:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9388999)

Since we've got seven whole letters before we reach 'O' I think I'll save the few thoughts on Orcs that I can muster, except maybe...

...bring back the pig heads!:p

When I was a kid, reading LOTR for the first time, I imagined orcs having crocodile heads. I have no idea why.

Crinos

09-21-2008 12:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I'm personally more of a fan of the Green, muscular, tusked, but otherwise human looking orcs.

Course, I'm also a Dominic Deegan fan (which uses that body type of Orc) but I digress.

noisms

09-21-2008 01:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9390029)

I'm personally more of a fan of the Green, muscular, tusked, but otherwise human looking orcs.

Course, I'm also a Dominic Deegan fan (which uses that body type of Orc) but I digress.

Anyway, let's not metaphorically blow our orc wad before we get to the entry! ;)

David J Prokopetz

09-21-2008 01:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9390029)

Course, I'm also a Dominic Deegan fan [...]

I have lost all respect for you.

JRM

09-21-2008 06:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9390101)

Anyway, let's not metaphorically blow our orc wad before we get to the entry! ;)

With AD&D orcs it's rarely metaphorical, they'll try to breed with anything you know.:eek:

JRM

09-21-2008 06:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9390124)

I have lost all respect for you.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9390029)

I'm personally more of a fan of the Green, muscular, tusked, but otherwise human looking orcs.

Course, I'm also a Dominic Deegan fan (which uses that body type of Orc) but I digress.

Don't worry Crinos, I still respect you despite your clichéd taste in orcs.;

I enjoy Dominic Deegan, too.

Crinos

09-22-2008 12:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9390124)

I have lost all respect for you.

wait...wait.... let me check something.....

Nope. Don't care. Wait..... No, definitely don't care, not even a little. Thought I might, but it was just gas.

Sorry.

JRM

09-23-2008 06:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Tap... Tap... Hello?

Is there anyone out there!

It's so lonely here.:(

What's going on - did Crinos murder the thread?, was everyone driven off by Sea-Caballeros?, or is the whole information superhighway too busy bickering over 3rd/4th edition to have a civil discussion about AD&D hobgoblins? ;)

noisms

09-23-2008 09:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Because of my stupid IP I haven't been able to get online for about 48 hours. Things seem okay now though. Homonculous entry coming up. Talk amongst yourselves. ;)

JRM

09-23-2008 09:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9398398)

Because of my stupid IP I haven't been able to get online for about 48 hours. Things seem okay now though. Homonculous entry coming up. Talk amongst yourselves. ;)

Hiya Noisms, glad to hear from you. It was getting to feel like I was talking to myself around here.

So JRM, what do you think about Homunculi?

noisms

09-23-2008 10:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Homonculus

"Small mystical beings created by wizards for spying and other special tasks," Homonculi are basically like Gremlins from the film Gremlins, except with wings and without the cute Mogwai alter-ego. It's main power of attack is to bite to cause sleep, though it isn't a combat machine - it's mainly a little mobile CCTV camera for the wizard to send around to do his bidding.

Homonculi are cool, but I do have to wonder if they're entirely worth the amount of trouble and money that goes into making them. Not only does a wizard have to spend up to 2,000 gps and give a pint of his blood, he also has to wait 1-4 weeks and cast all kinds of spells; not only that, but the Homonculi turns into a kind of achilles heel for the wizard, as if it is destroyed (a pretty easy thing to do) it causes him damage.

One of the better plot hooks in the MM is provided in the final paragraph:

Quote:

There are rumors of magical means by which non-wizards can acquire their own form of homonculus. Although these are not widely believed to be valid, there are those who report having seen the process or its results first hand. If such a procedure exists, it would be quite valuable to its discoverer.

This seems like the start of a grand adventure if ever there was one.

t@nya

09-23-2008 10:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9398547)

Homonculi are cool, but I do have to wonder if they're entirely worth the amount of trouble and money that goes into making them. Not only does a wizard have to spend up to 2,000 gps and give a pint of his blood, he also has to wait 1-4 weeks and cast all kinds of spells; not only that, but the Homonculi turns into a kind of achilles heel for the wizard, as if it is destroyed (a pretty easy thing to do) it causes him damage.

I believe there was a Dragon magazine article which had variant homoculi with different powers and attributes (I forget what those were, unfortunately, and I no longer have the magazine), due to slight variations in the rituals used to make them. It would be easy enough to, say, have a type of homonculus that can turn invisible and fly, leading to the creatures being much more useful for surveillance and less likely to be discovered and killed.

DMH

09-23-2008 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

They are one of the more nifty adaptations of movie monsters. One of the Sinbad (Golden Voyage?) films has a homonculus that looks identicle to that in the MM. When it was slain, the creator aged.

Too bad they are so weak, otherwise they would be very useful for wizards of all levels. And alchemists as well (if the creators are willing to fork over the xp, the homonculi could even be disposable for dangerous experiments).

demiurge1138

09-24-2008 01:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Well, the homonculi dying = wizard getting screwed is pretty much equivalent to the unfortunate side-effects of familiars, with the advantage that the homonculus is slightly less squishy. And you can rebuild it faster than you can summon a new familiar (a year and a day, I believe).

I've actually had a couple of players build homonculi, especially in/from Eberron. They have a whole bunch of variant homonculi, like the ones described above, that do things like fight, shoot, deliver messages, steal and make magic items for you (you spend the money and XP, but they spend the time). That last one was very popular.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9398666)

They are one of the more nifty adaptations of movie monsters. One of the Sinbad (Golden Voyage?) films has a homonculus that looks identicle to that in the MM. When it was slain, the creator aged.

Too bad they are so weak, otherwise they would be very useful for wizards of all levels. And alchemists as well (if the creators are willing to fork over the xp, the homonculi could even be disposable for dangerous experiments).

It was The Golden Voyage of Sinbad (1974), my favourite among Ray Harryhausen and Charles H. Schneer's Sinbad films.

There are a few differences from the D&D Homonculus and the historical legends about Homunculus, apart from the spelling change that is. Traditional Homunculi were imagined as looking like perfect little humans, or as vaguely human-shaped mandrake roots. They didn't resemble tiny bat-winged devil-men like in AD&D or that Sinbad film, or have a sleep-causing bite, and were created from the magician's sperm, not his blood.

EDIT: 3rd edition spelled Homunculus correctly, so it may only be the 2nd edition MM (or just the dotd webpage) that got the spelling wrong. I'm too lazy to check. :END EDIT

Oh, and I believe they were usually kept in the laboratory bottles as curiosities and/or sources of supernatural intelligence or conversation, rather than being sent out as spies.

Notice that the Monstrous Compendium Homonculus "knows everything that its master knows", does that mean you can capture one, take it outside its master's 480 yard control range, and torture/charm it into revealing all its creator's secrets?

There's a "rescue the wizard's homonculus" adventure hook right there, especially if the creator is a wealthy but low-level wizard* who might die from the 2d10 damage if the homonculus is killed, a variant on the "stay were you are wizard, or your familiar get's it!" ploy.

EDIT: *Hmm, the 2nd edition Homonculus requires the spells Mending, Mirror Image, and Wizard Eye. The latter spell is 4th level unless I'm mistaken, so you'd need a 7th level wizard (or one who can afford scrolls) to make one of these beasties. :END EDIT

Speaking of levels, I believe that in 1st edition AD&D a magic-user had to reach a minimum level to create a Homunculus, something around 14th? In my experience that made it even less likely for wizards to bother making them, since a wizard of that level had lots of other ways to spy on his enemies that weren't as risky. Plus, if I remember correctly they were more expensive than the 2nd edition version.

David J Prokopetz

09-24-2008 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9399288)

*EDIT: Hmm, the 2nd edition Homonculus requires the spells Mending, Mirror Image, and Wizard Eye. The latter spell is 4th level unless I'm mistaken, so you'd need a 7th level wizard (or one who can afford scrolls) to make one of these beasties. :END EDIT

That's still in the risk zone. 2E didn't have any goofy dice-rolling tricks for hit points. Your average 7th-level wizard has eighteen hit points, and negative hit points were an optional rule back then - it's conceivable that 2d10 damage could indeed kill him instantly.

(Heaven forfend if he has a low Constitution score - a 2E 7th-level wizard with lousy Constitution clocks in at an average of 11 hit points!)

JRM

09-24-2008 03:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9399459)

That's still in the risk zone. 2E didn't have any goofy dice-rolling tricks for hit points. Your average 7th-level wizard has eighteen hit points, and negative hit points were an optional rule back then - it's conceivable that 2d10 damage could indeed kill him instantly.

(Heaven forfend if he has a low Constitution score - a 2E 7th-level wizard with lousy Constitution clocks in at an average of 11 hit points!)

True enough, although I was concerned about whether 7th level was "low-level". My preference was for Low-Fantasy rather than Epic campaign, where 5th-8th level is a mid-level character and 9th+ is a high level mover and shaker. Plus, I did use the negative HP rule. I'd probably have made the Homunculus's master around 4th level.

But that's neither here nor there.

Getting back to the Homonculus, one thing I regret about these wizards servant type of monsters in D&D is that very few of them actually help the wizard use magic. There's only a few monsters that do that, such as the artificer-homonculus demiurge mentioned and the AD&D quasit or imp, which boosted their "master's" spell-casting by one level. It just seems unthematic to have most of a wizard's magical servants only act as thugs or spies.

noisms

09-24-2008 06:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9399813)

Getting back to the Homonculus, one thing I regret about these wizards servant type of monsters in D&D is that very few of them actually help the wizard use magic. There's only a few monsters that do that, such as the artificer-homonculus demiurge mentioned and the AD&D quasit or imp, which boosted their "master's" spell-casting by one level. It just seems unthematic to have most of a wizard's magical servants only act as thugs or spies.

I only played it about three times, but didn't D&D 3.X have familiars for sorcerers who could store spells? I forget.

JRM

09-24-2008 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9402473)

I only played it about three times, but didn't D&D 3.X have familiars for sorcerers who could store spells? I forget.

I'm not a great 3rd edition expert but I think you are right about there being such a power in one of the supplement or Dragon articles. I have a vague memory it required a Feat for a relatively small benefit and the sorcerer/wizard had to be in contact with the familiar to cast the stored spell, so wasn't considered cost effective compared to a standard spell-storing item.

But as far as the core SRD goes the only boost a familiar gives its master's magic is that it can deliver touch spells and shares their personal protection spells.

EDIT: I guess I should explain it a bit more, I just like the flavour of a more traditional familiar - a little spirit-animal that can carry curses to inflict upon enemies; aids rituals; acts as an intermediary with supernatural forces; serves as a friend, spy, companion & advisor; boosts senses or concentration; crouches over experiments to keep them ticking while their master rests - or even take over running of a spell its master casts and "hands over" to it.

When running familiars and animal companions I like to give them a personality and useful functions to do. Many D&D familiars just seem a bit colourless, and there isn't much of an incentive for a mid- or high level caster to maintain one. If more of them were like a Homunculus, talking owl or something, then I think they'd be more interesting.

noisms

09-25-2008 12:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9403056)

EDIT: I guess I should explain it a bit more, I just like the flavour of a more traditional familiar - a little spirit-animal that can carry curses to inflict upon enemies; aids rituals; acts as an intermediary with supernatural forces; serves as a friend, spy, companion & advisor; boosts senses or concentration; crouches over experiments to keep them ticking while their master rests - or even take over running of a spell its master casts and "hands over" to it.

When running familiars and animal companions I like to give them a personality and useful functions to do. Many D&D familiars just seem a bit colourless, and there isn't much of an incentive for a mid- or high level caster to maintain one. If more of them were like a Homunculus, talking owl or something, then I think they'd be more interesting.

As it stands they mostly just end up being "Cat which follows me around and gives me a bonus" which is much less interesting.

noisms

09-25-2008 01:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hook Horror

Hook Horrors! I have to admit I'd forgotten all about these, and gave a little chuckle of delight on discovering them lurking between the Homonculus and Horse entries, like how you run into an old friend between the canned goods and dairy product aisles in the supermarket who you haven't seen for years.

Hook Horrors come under that category of D&D creature that were patently created purely for use in dungeons, by DMs who needed something new for the next crawl as the players already knew the stats for everything else. (Other members of this nefarious gang include the gelatinous cube, lurker, cave fisher and cloaker.) They could never exist in anything other than a game of Dungeons and Dragons - because what possible place do "bipedal, underground-dwelling monster[s] that look like a cross between a vulture and a man with hooks instead of hands...stand[ing] about nine feet tall and weigh[ing] almost 350 pounds..." have in any ecosystem other than the entirely imaginary and thoroughly weird world of a random nerd's roughly scrawled gridmap?

The entry also sees the welcome return of speculation by sages, which is another plus. Although in this case "sages" are not cited explicitly, but merely hinted at: "It is thought that the hook horror is distantly related to the cockroach or cave cricket. " We know what the designers mean, though: those people doing the thinking are sages, baby.

Hook Horrors are a nice imaginative trip, whichever way you look at it. Vaguely humanoid, grossly oversized beetle things, as if from Kafka's Metamorphosis, but with hooks for hands (anyone who gets the Seinfeld reference wins a bonus point!) which they can dig into opponents, climb with, and which are presumably really good for nose-picking. To top it off they use echolocation like bats to find their way around, have compound eyes, and have a language which does not have words for indebtedness or gratitude. (Save a Hook Horror from death and it'll happily eat you straight away afterwards.)

Disappointingly though, Hook Horrors' exoskeletons cannot be used in my upcoming Compendium of Monster Corpses and Things Wot You Can Do with Them, because it becomes brittle after death and therefore no good for armour.

Five Eyes

09-25-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

This thread is fantastic.

And all you really have to do is magically preserve the hook horror or parts of its body. Keep it alive but handleless. Maybe give it prosthetic hooks? Or prosthetic hands, making a Hand Horror. Or strap two Crawling Claws to it.

For maximum second-string D&D monster nonsense, my current game has a Flind adversary using a flindbar made out of hook horror forearms. I think that's one weapon my party isn't going to try and salvage.

Two characters have ankheg hide armor and two use weapons made of the chitin of an unusual giant ant, however, so I think we're probably the key market for your sourcebook.

noisms

09-25-2008 02:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Berserk_Seraph (Post 9403677)
This thread is fantastic.

Thanks! I think when it's done I'll download it all and put it out there as a free .pdf to download. There are so many good ideas in it. (Almost none of them down to me.) It's like a DM's recipe book.

Quote:

And all you really have to do is magically preserve the hook horror or parts of its body. Keep it alive but handless. Maybe give it prosthetic hooks? Or prosthetic hands, making a Hand Horror. Or strap two Crawling Claws to it.

For maximum second-string D&D monster nonsense, my current game has a Flind adversary using a flindbar made out of hook horror forearms. I think that's one weapon my party isn't going to try and salvage.

Two characters have ankheg hide armor and two use weapons made of the chitin of an unusual giant ant, however, so I think we're probably the key market for your sourcebook.

Kudos for being the only person I know of to ever actually use ankheg hide armour.

g026r

09-25-2008 02:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9403489)
Disappointingly though, Hook Horrors' exoskeletons cannot be used in my upcoming Compendium of Monster Corpses and Things Wot You Can Do with Them, because it becomes brittle after death and therefore no good for armour.

They can go in the appendix -- "I Don't Think So, Pal" -- which lists those creatures that are explicitly described as not being useful post-killing.

kelvingreen

09-25-2008 03:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9403489)

because what possible place do "bipedal, underground-dwelling monster[s] that look like a cross between a vulture and a man with hooks instead of hands...stand[ing] about nine feet tall and weigh[ing] almost 350 pounds..." have in any ecosystem other than the entirely imaginary and thoroughly weird world of a random nerd's roughly scrawled gridmap?

I believe that particular nerd's name is Ian Livingstone. ;) The Hook Horror is one of the White Dwarf monsters that made it into the original Fiend Folio.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9403754)

Kudos for being the only person I know of to ever actually use ankheg hide armour.

I had some in Baldur's Gate, but quickly sold it because it was nowhere near as good as all the enchanted stuff the game throws at you.

Five Eyes

09-25-2008 04:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9403754)

Kudos for being the only person I know of to ever actually use ankheg hide armour.

Well, it's in Baldur's Gate, so I suspect a lot of people have seen it in there.

I'm basically replacing "magic enhancement" with "superior materials or craftsmanship" for gear (3.5e reacts semi-poorly to party members without the appropriate level of mystic gear, AC and attack roll wise), so the ecology stuff in my much-beloved 2e MM (Also my first gaming book, I think there's a lot of that going on) is a big help in making unusual armor and weapon materials.

Wakboth

09-25-2008 04:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9398666)

They are one of the more nifty adaptations of movie monsters. One of the Sinbad (Golden Voyage?) films has a homonculus that looks identicle to that in the MM. When it was slain, the creator aged.

Yeah, I remember that. One of my favorite movies when I was a kid. :)

(Although IIRC, all the magic the bad guy did aged him... that was one of the reasons he was so keen to have perpetual youth from the magic fountain.)

6inTruder

09-25-2008 09:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9403056)

EDIT: I guess I should explain it a bit more, I just like the flavour of a more traditional familiar - a little spirit-animal that can carry curses to inflict upon enemies; aids rituals; acts as an intermediary with supernatural forces; serves as a friend, spy, companion & advisor; boosts senses or concentration; crouches over experiments to keep them ticking while their master rests - or even take over running of a spell its master casts and "hands over" to it.

When running familiars and animal companions I like to give them a personality and useful functions to do. Many D&D familiars just seem a bit colourless, and there isn't much of an incentive for a mid- or high level caster to maintain one. If more of them were like a Homunculus, talking owl or something, then I think they'd be more interesting.

Hey hey hey now! This is D&D, not one of those foofy games. Like Sorcerer.

:p

And thanks all for the variant Homonculus ideas. I've been steweing on a Dragonstar idea recently and I like remembering where magic and technology meet in trad D&D.

YojimboC

09-25-2008 01:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I had the hook horror toy as a small mammal. Y'know, along with Strongheart and Warduke and such.

noisms

09-25-2008 03:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9404037)

I believe that particular nerd's name is Ian Livingstone. ;) The Hook Horror is one of the White Dwarf monsters that made it into the original Fiend Folio.

Ian Livingstone, is there anything you can't do? ;)

Ragnarok_Engine

09-25-2008 04:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9405847)

I had the hook horror toy as a small mammal. Y'know, along with Strongheart and Warduke and such.

Yeah, until the note about Mr. Livingstone above, I had always assumed that the Hook Horror wa created for the toy line first, and then added into the monster lineup later. Grells as well.

Mikaze

09-25-2008 05:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Another person here signing onto this forum because of this thread. That and the offhand chance of being able to tell the authors of the Wraeththu review that they're monsters forever for making me realize that game exists.

This thread has really brought back some memories.

noisms

09-25-2008 05:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 9406566)

Another person here signing onto this forum because of this thread. That and the offhand chance of being able to te the authors of the Wraeththu review that they're monsters forever for making me realize that game exists.

This thread has really brought back some memories.

Welcome to our shared insanity. ;)

kelvingreen

09-26-2008 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ragnarok_Engine (Post 9406413)

Yeah, until the note about Mr. Livingstone above, I had always assumed that the Hook Horror wa created for the toy line first, and then added into the monster lineup later. Grells as well.

Funny you should mention the Grell. That's one of his too! ;)

JRM

09-26-2008 06:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hook Horrors are yet another of those AD&D monsters I liked the idea of but never got around to using.

Now here's a puzzle, their 2nd edition write-up says, and I quote "The obvious penalty for having hooks instead of hands is that hook horrors cannot use weapons or tools. They can only pick up items in their beaks. This severely restricts their ability to amass large treasures." Why do they collect treasure? They can't use most magical or mundane equipment, and I don't see them doing much trading - they have poor relations with other races and other clans of hook horrors can't produce much in the way of trade goods because, well they don't have hands.

About the only thing Hook Horrors seem to value going by their description is their clan-mates, shelter and food. I guess they could sell food to each other, but how would they preserve, store and transport it without hands?

Now, Hook Horrors could hoard treasure just as a status symbol or for religious/superstitious reasons (and to give player-character's a reason to kill them and take their stuff), but I prefer the idea that they keep treasure because they know the "handed ones" value it, so they can use it as bait in traps, payment for doing something vital they cannot perform themselves or ransoms to buy off attackers.

So, what adventures can revolve around these giant ungrateful hook-handed vulture-headed cockroach-men? Of course they can just be monsters that want to eat the PCs and whoever is hiring the party to get rid of them, but Hook Horrors are not actually Evil, more Amoral Neutral so could there be room for negotiation? Obviously, they'd need the Comprehend Languages spell or the assistant of a very specialized linguist to overcome the communication barrier.

Now I'm imagining a Tinker Gnome holding two peculiar contraptions, a 'clicker' in his left hand and a 'clacker' in his right. "Don't worry noble sirs, Mistress KlikKliklak here says they've only started to eat the Baron's cattle because they've been driven from their caverns by a strange monster. All we need do is slay the beast and they'll return underground. What's that good sirs? How much will they pay and what kind of beast is it? I'll just ask him. Klik Kliklik Klakliklak KlaKlak..."

Alternatively, in an underdark campaign a clan of Hook Horrors is preying on caravans along a newly opened trade-route and the PCs are sent to deal with it in whichever way they see fit - they could kill them all (which should be tough), drive them off with fearsome illusions, make a deal for "safe passage" - I'm not sure how smart they're supposed to be but I'd think that Hook Horrors could understand and observe a deal exchanging easy meals (a couple of hundred pounds of dried fungus and rothé pemmican) for tough ones (a pack-lizard or two snatched in a fight against tough guards).

My final adventure-seed idea is the clan matriarch has become gravely ill, and the Hook Horrors need to get a "handed one" healer to cast Cure Disease on her and are offering treasure valuable enough for it to be worth the risk. The PCs either bump into a Hook Horror seeking this service, or are hired by the healer as a bodyguard. They had better remember to get payment in advance, and present a strong enough "we're too tough to attack" appearance. These creatures don't comprehend indebtedness, remember.

noisms

09-26-2008 08:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9408946)

Now I'm imagining a Tinker Gnome holding two peculiar contraptions, a 'clicker' in his left hand and a 'clacker' in his right. "Don't worry noble sirs, Mistress KlikKliklak here says they've only started to eat the Baron's castle because they've been driven from their caverns by a strange monster. All we need do is slay the beast and they'll return underground. What's that good sirs? How much will they pay and what kind of beast is it? I'll just ask him. Klik Kliklik Klakliklak KlaKlak..."

This is getting yoinked!

noisms

09-26-2008 09:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Horse

Ah, Horsey Horsey. Mighty steed of shining warriors, snackstuff of griffins, perforator of deranged Seattle zoophiles' colons. If you don't know what a horse is, here is a description penned by a nameless TSR person:

Quote:

Horses are large quadrupeds often used for transportation, or as pack and draft animals, by human and demihuman races. They are frequently bred for their speed and for their beauty.

A horse can be solid white, gray, chestnut, brown, black, or various reddish tones; its hide can instead show a variation or combination of these colors. Some of the more interesting variations include the piebald, which has a coat of large, irregular patches of black and white; the palomino, with its rich yellow-gold coat and white mane and tail; and the dapple gray, which is dark gray with flecks of lighter color on the chest, belly, and hindquarters.

In addition to the coat's color, the horse may have markings of various sorts. The long hairs of the mane and tail can be lighter, darker, or of the same color as the body of the horse. Possible markings include socks (meaning the leg from the hoof, halfway to the knee, or hock, is white); a white muzzle; a blaze (a wide band of white from the top of the horse's head to the tip of its nose); and a star (a white, diamond-shaped patch set on the horse's forehead, right between its eyes).

Horses are measured in "hands." One hand equals 4 inches.

Not a bad precis as those things go, but as usual I find myself scratching my head and wondering why they bothered. A sense of completeness, maybe.

Anyway, there's a whole heap of guff to do with loads, speeds and encumbrance rates that we really don't need to go into. The most interesting point of note in the main entry is that loud noises, fires and whatnot panic horses 90% of the time; this is something I almost never use in games but I really think I should. Horse rustling goblin bandits attacking in the night, making loud noises to scare off the party's steeds.

A few types of horses are detailed:

Draft Horses - big buggers who pull stuff.

War Horses - coming in three varieties (heavy, medium, light) and able to fight.

Pony - you know what these are.

Wild Horse - is what it says.

Riding Horse - is also what it says.

Mule - is also what it says. "Their price depends upon how much grief they have given their current owners." I like that.

Steppe Pony - you wouldn't have thought this one gets the most detail, but it does. It's like a cross between a wild horse and a war horse, except tougher and hardier. It isn't truly appreciated outside of its steppland home, and so is usually a good bargain for an adventurer with a good eye who knows his horses.

JRM

09-27-2008 12:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9411328)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9408946)

Now I'm imagining a Tinker Gnome holding two peculiar contraptions, a 'clicker' in his left hand and a 'clacker' in his right. "Don't worry noble sirs, Mistress KlikKliklak here says they've only started to eat the Baron's castle because they've been driven from their caverns by a strange monster. All we need do is slay the beast and they'll return underground. What's that good sirs? How much will they pay and what kind of beast is it? I'll just ask hir. Klik Kliklik Klakliklak KlaKlak..."

This is getting yoinked!

Yoink away my good sir. I wouldn't have posted it if I wasn't willing to share.:)

Hold on, "the Baron's castle" What the blazes? I'm sure I typed "the Baron's cattle".

Glances back at earlier post ... castle! ... Edit ~~castle~~ cattle ...

See, I told you I said cattle.:cool:;)

JRM

09-27-2008 01:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9411384)

Horse

snip

Not a bad precis as those things go, but as usual I find myself scratching my head and wondering why they bothered. A sense of completeness, maybe.

Anyway, there's a whole heap of guff to do with loads, speeds and encumbrance rates that we really don't need to go into. The most interesting point of note in the main entry is that loud noises, fires and whatnot panic horses 90% of the time; this is something I almost never use in games but I really think I should. Horse rustling goblin bandits attacking in the night, making loud noises to scare off the party's steeds.

Yes, I was a bit at a loss for something interesting to say about the Monstrous Compendium's horse entry too. The 'easily spooked unless specially trained' is the one that turned up most often in my games - that's why PCs want trained warhorses, and why they're so expensive.

But then I saw something I'd completely forgotten about:

A horse can also move at speeds higher than those given as their base movement rates, as shown on the table below. The horse's normal movement rate is considered a trot.

| Type | Walk | Trot | Canter | Gallop |
|--------|------|------|--------|--------|
| Draft | 6 | 12 | 18 | 24 |
| Heavy | 6 | 15 | 21 | 27 |
| Medium | 9 | 18 | 27 | 36 |
| Light | 12 | 24 | 36 | 48 |
| Pony | 6 | 12 | 18 | 24 |
| Wild | 12 | 24 | 36 | 48 |
| Riding | 12 | 24 | 36 | 48 |
| Mule | 6 | 12 | 18 | 24 |

What?! Most horses can double their movement speed by just running faster. Don't these people know practically every living species of quadrupedal mammal goes through these gaits? Why make this special rule for horses alone, it's not like they have a unique "turbo-speed" ability like Cheetah's Sprinting or Giant Squid's Jet move. That means the faster horses can run as fast or faster than any of the animals in the 'Bird' entry. They outpace Falcons and Large Hawks!

Dearie, dearie me.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9411384)

Steppe Pony - you wouldn't have thought this one gets the most detail, but it does. It's like a cross between a wild horse and a war horse, except tougher and hardier. It isn't truly appreciated outside of its steppland home, and so is usually a good bargain for an adventurer with a good eye who knows his horses.

Why would any adventurer think of buying a light warhorse when a steppe pony is equal or better in all respects - and cheaper too boot, if I remember my Player's Handbook. At least make the breed hard to obtain or more expensive, so that PCs have a reason to buy light warhorses beyond "Steppe Ponies are ugly and unfashionable".

Five Eyes

09-27-2008 01:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Yoink away my good sir. I wouldn't have posted it if I wasn't willing to share.

Hold on, "the Baron's castle" What the blazes? I'm sure I typed "the Baron's cattle".

I had just assumed that their inability to make sandwiches made them extremely hungry.

Littleredfox

09-27-2008 01:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9404037)

I had some in Baldur's Gate, but quickly sold it because it was nowhere near as good as all the enchanted stuff the game throws at you.

Tis the Best Armour for Druids IIRC. [All the better enchanted armour is metal] So Jaheria likes it.

Also often the Best Armour for PC Paladins [Who's STR is often not that great due to the other stat requirements and need its low weight to have some carrying capacity left]

demiurge1138

09-27-2008 02:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I like that the horse entry has things like names of color patterns and what "hands" mean. It lets the GM talk about horses the PCs encounter or buy like he knows what he's talking about.

JRM

09-27-2008 03:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Berserk_Seraph (Post 9412018)

I had just assumed that their inability to make sandwiches made them extremely hungry.

Actually what happened was the tinker-gnome thought they said "kliK-Laklak Klikkliklak" ("strong-skinned lair") when in fact they said "kliKlaklak KlikKliklak" ("meat beasts"). That's my new story, and I'm sticking to it...

...until I can think of a better one.:p

Failed Saving Throw

09-27-2008 04:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The Savage Tide adventure path actually brings back a whole host of old-school D&D classics. In the first adventure, the PCs get trapped in a series of tunnels beneath a small island, and have to fight off waves of zombies. The lead baddie is a huecuva - and you even find the corpse of a guy who barricaded himself into a room before succumbing to the huecuva's wasting effect.

There's also a cool part where the PCs stumble onto a hidden village of mongrelfolk deep in the Underdark that is guarded by six hook horrors. That definitely provoked cheers of delight when that encounter began. (My PCs resolved it without a fight.)

E.T.Smith

09-27-2008 02:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9403489)

Hook Horror

Incidentally, one of the handful of D&D beasts that warranted inclusion in the early 1980's Dungeons & Dragons line of action figures. I did a double-take when I first came across one of these at a yard sale and recognized it from the Fiend Folio:

http://www.geocities.com/lpittack/dnd/Hook_Horror.jpg

JRM

09-27-2008 06:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9414920)

Incidentally, one of the handful of D&D beasts that warranted inclusion in the early 1980's Dungeons & Dragons line of action figures. I did a double-take when I first came across one of these at a yard sale and recognized it from the Fiend Folio:

Look at that washboard stomach! Who is this, the Muscle Beach Hook Horror?

While he's quite different from the 2nd edition look, that's actually closer to the original Fiend Folio's illustration than the Monstrous Compendium's hook-handed cockroach guy:

<http://www.dotd.com/mm/hookhorr.gif>

Crinos

09-28-2008 05:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9414920)

Incidentally, one of the handful of D&D beasts that warranted inclusion in the early 1980's Dungeons & Dragons line of action figures. I did a double-take when I first came across one of these at a yard sale and recognized it from the Fiend Folio:

http://www.geocities.com/lpittack/dnd/Hook_Horror.jpg

Are you sure that the Hook Horror wasn't one of those monsters that were inspired by a plastic toy? Like the Bullete allegedly was?

Neurotrash

09-28-2008 06:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

No, I had this one too. It was an official D&D toy.

I also had the rubber Chimera and Grell, and the Fire Elemental.

I wish I still had them...they might be somewhere in my parents' attic.

E.T.Smith

09-28-2008 06:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Neurotrash (Post 9416598)

No, I had this one too. It was an official D&D toy.

Yup. Here's a site with information on all the toys, including the Hook Horror. Its kind of surreal that a modestly popular kids' toy series based on AD&D came out during the 1st edition days, when the actual game was still all about assassins, grisly death and naked succubi.

<http://www.toyarchive.com/Dungeons&D...dukeMOSC1a.jpg>

g026r

09-28-2008 07:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9416684)

Its kind of surreal that a modestly popular kids' toy series based on AD&D came out during the 1st edition days, when the actual game was still all about assassins, grisly death and naked succubi.

The amusing thing is that the game inspired the toys, which in turn inspired a module: XL-1: Quest for the Heartstone

sim_james

09-28-2008 12:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9416684)

<http://www.toyarchive.com/Dungeons&D...dukeMOSC1a.jpg>

Warduke's armour never looked more uncomfortable.

Kakita Kojiro

09-28-2008 12:31 PM

Warduke! Good grief, this thread is giving me nostalgia overload.

noisms

09-28-2008 01:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I never even knew there were AD&D action figures. To think I spent my childhood years collecting Star Wars toys.

demiurge1138

09-28-2008 03:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9417541)

Warduke! Good grief, this thread is giving me nostalgia overload.

I love Warduke. I slipped him into the Age of Worms D&D 3.5 game I ran... he killed the same character twice in one round. Then walked through a blade barrier unharmed.

Wakboth

09-28-2008 05:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by g026r (Post 9416728)

The amusing thing is that the game inspired the toys, which in turn inspired a module: XL-1: Quest for the Heartston

Damn, I'd forgotten all about that adventure! IIRC, it had some nice isometric maps, but was otherwise pretty forgettable.

JRM

09-28-2008 06:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9416509)

Are you sure that the Hook Horror wasn't one of those monsters that were inspired by a plastic toy? Like the Bullete allegedly was?

It's all part of the cycle of existence, Crinos.

... plastic toy inspires AD&D monster ... AD&D monster inspires plastic toy ...

The great wheel never stops turning.:cool:

MadWriter

09-28-2008 08:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9418112)

It's all part of the cycle of existence, Crinos.

... plastic toy inspires AD&D monster ... AD&D monster inspires plastic toy ...

The great wheel never stops turning.:cool:

That quote make me smiled--nice job.

David J Prokopetz

09-29-2008 01:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9417829)

I love Warduke. I slipped him into the Age of Worms D&D 3.5 game I ran... he killed the same character twice in one round.

I'd like to hear that story.

E.T.Smith

09-29-2008 01:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9417829)

I love Warduke. I slipped him into the Age of Worms D&D 3.5 game I ran... he killed the same character twice in one round. Then walked through a blade barrier unharmed.

You're not the only one. He's even recently reappeared in official supplements several times, including as a D&D miniature and on the cover of Dungeon #105.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9417633)

I never even knew there were AD&D action figures. To think I spent my childhood years collecting Star Wars toys.

There was a lot of amusing licensed knick knacks that resulted from D&D's time as a full-blown 80's fad. This blog shows some of them, including puzzles, coloring books and even a colorforms set.

demiurge1138

09-29-2008 03:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9418659)

I'd like to hear that story.

High-level, high-resource 3.5 D&D lets PCs do some silly things, like hand out revivify spells (a no-level-cost raise dead if cast within 1 round of death) like candy at Halloween and follow them up with a quickened cure spell chaser. Unfortunately, the poor recently murdered character made the decision to stand up. Attack of opportunity from Warduke, rolled a 20, got her again.

Sleeper

09-29-2008 03:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9415313)

Look at that washboard stomach! Who is this, the Muscle Beach Hook Horror?

Might as well work on his abs. Without an opposable hook, weightlifting is out of the question.

noisms

09-29-2008 12:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Human

So here we are. Us. Homus Sapiens, in all our (questionable) glory.

There are bloody loads of varieties of 'human', though what is notable about them is how weak they are. Almost all are 0-level, and even knights have only 2 HD. Funny how power creep works; I didn't play a great deal of 3.x and haven't played any 4e, but something tells me human soldiers in those games generally don't have 1-6 hit points.

Anyway:

Aborigine/Caveman: I'm not sure if this category would fly these days, especially in the Antipodes!

Aborigine/Caveman. Hmm...

Adventurer: Rival adventuring parties are a huge favourite of mine, and always guaranteed an appearance - preferably in the form of a race towards a prize. Like in the Flaming Lips song.

Bandits/Brigands: Not much to say about these, although I like how the designers made the 'Brigand' a kind of souped-up version of the Bandit; I bet the Bandits were well pissed off about that.

Berzerker/Dervish: A strange confluence of Scandinavian and Arabic cultures in this entry.

Farmer/Herder, Gentry, Knight: You know what these three categories are. The possibility (5%) of meeting a vanquished knight intrigues me; there's no way of having a vanquished knight appear in a campaign without him developing into a hook.

Mercenary: These actually have levels, usually.

Merchant Sailor/Fisherman: These are often armed with belaying pins, which do 1 point of damage. Why bother? A punch does more than that.

Merchant/Trader: Rules are set out here for generating trading caravans, which are presumably ripe targets for Bandits - or even the mighty Brigands.

Middle Class: The most boring type of human.

Peasant/Serf: The most pitiful type of human.

Pilgrim: Bands of pilgrims are sometimes accompanied by special religious artifacts, which also presumably need protecting from thieves. Or stealing.

Pirate/Buccaneer: We can put to bed forever the question of what the difference between a Pirate and a Buccaneer is: Buccaneers are neutral with evil tendencies; Pirates are just any evil. Nods sagely

Police/Constabulary: I like that these are often accompanied by a lynch mob of peasant cronies.

Priests: Wandering religious folks.

Sailor: The good version of pirates.

Slaver: Another nice little adventure hook is the old 'track down family members kidnapped by slavers' routine. One of my longest campaigns as a player started off with that very storyline, in fact.

Soldier: Less detail than one would expect, given how keen the designers of AD&D were on medieval military formations. Then again, we have the 2nd edition DMG for that sort of thing.

Thief/Thug: Unlike the Brigand/Bandit or Pirate/Buccaneer axes, there is no clear distinction between thieves and thugs.

Tradesfolk/Craftspeople: 1% of these are retired adventurers; so watch out that the poor weaver you're bullying doesn't end up being a 20th level wizard doing a few odd-jobs to tide him over in his old age.

Tribal Culture: These don't get the bad press which aborigines do, in that they aren't categorised with cavemen.

Wizards: Random encounter wizards are a strange thing that I haven't ever used. Could be fun, though. I mean, wizards do have to travel sometimes, right?

David J Prokopetz

09-29-2008 01:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9420205)

Human

So here we are. Us. Homus Sapiens, in all our (questionable) glory.

The thing that got me about this entry is that the illustration of the iconic human appears to be a cave man. Why a cave man?

Wakboth

09-29-2008 05:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9420252)

The thing that got me about this entry is that the illustration of the iconic human appears to be a cave man. Why a cave man?

Aren't there also a hawt pirate lady and an axe-wielding viking type, there?

As for the HP inflation of soldier / guard types, that's to make it a bit less easy for a single bored and/or sociopathic player to rampage through a city killing everything in their path... :)

noisms

09-29-2008 07:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9420719)

Aren't there also a hawt pirate lady and an axe-wielding viking type, there?

As for the HP inflation of soldier / guard types, that's to make it a bit less easy for a single bored and/or sociopathic player to rampage through a city killing everything in their path... :)

There's also a hideous caricature of an Arab.

Isn't it worrying that there should have to be HP inflation just to prevent players acting like sociopaths? Sometimes I really wonder about this hobby. ;)

Kakita Kojiro

09-30-2008 03:26 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9420205)

Merchant Sailor/Fisherman: These are often armed with belaying pins, which do 1 point of damage. Why bother? A punch does more than that.

Wonder what kind of itty-bitty belaying pin someone thought was being used? They should be equivalent to a club or sap, at the least.

Are the Sailors better armed than the Merchant Sailors?

Also: linking dervishes to berserkers is enough of a hideous caricature even without bad art, methinks.

Hellzon

09-30-2008 03:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9420205)

Funny how power creep works; I didn't play a great deal of 3.x and haven't played any 4e, but something tells me human soldiers in those games generally don't have 1-6 hit points.

"Human Rabble" have 1 HP in 4e. But they're minions, so that's cheating. :p

The non-minions range from 37 to 66.

YojimboC

09-30-2008 06:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9417829)

I love Warduke. I slipped him into the Age of Worms D&D 3.5 game I ran... he killed the same character twice in one round. Then walked through a blade barrier unharmed.

I've used Warduke myself in 3.0. He kicked a lot of ass and got to be all brooding an evil. The players were very afraid of him -- it was great.

JRM

09-30-2008 06:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9420205)

Human

So here we are. Us. Homus Sapiens, in all our (questionable) glory.

There are bloody loads of varieties of 'human', though what is notable about them is how weak they are. Almost all are 0-level, and even knights have only 2 HD. Funny how power creep works; I didn't play a great deal of 3.x and haven't played any 4e, but something tells me human soldiers in those games generally don't have 1-6 hit points.

Knights are 2+ HD, not only 2 HD. They are all fighters of 2nd level and above who use the Adventurer level/magic-item tables.

At first sight it's a really dull set of entries, although closer examination a lot of weird little details...

Human's may be weak but look at those treasure types, most of them are not worth the trouble of killing to take their stuff. Best to target those humans with treasure type Q like Bandits, Pirates and Thugs and hope your DM rolls high on the gems table. Thieves/Thugs have the best reward to risk ratio, since they have a fair chance of having magical items. But steer clear of the adventurers, you never know what level they will turn out to be. ;)

Why have Aborigines and Tribesmen have separate entries when their stats are identical? The only real differences are the former use stone weapons, live in caves and have fewer and weaker shaman. Surely Cavemen/Neanderthals would have been better off with an entry for themselves?

There's something intriguing about the notion of Dervishes as LG Berserker-equivalents although I've never made anything of it. Why play a goody two-shoes Paladin when you could be a mild-mannered pilgrim who transforms into a frenzied, scimitar twirling nomad that kicks arse for the Lord?

Notice how the odds are stacked in the favour of Pirates in encounters with their Navy equivalent, the Sailors. From the encounter averages, the pirates outnumber the sailors almost four too one (30d10 vs 4d20 = 165 vs 42) and have more and higher level fighters leading them, plus the pirates sometimes have a wizard or cleric as magical support. Not to mention they have more loot! The supposed fighting Sailors are little better than Merchant Sailors or Fishermen.

No wonder my PCs would rather become Buccaneers...:cool:

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9420719)

As for the HP inflation of soldier / guard types, that's to make it a bit less easy for a single bored and/or sociopathic player to rampage through a city killing everything in their path... :)

Been there, had a player who did that. Multiple times.:o

noisms

09-30-2008 10:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hydra

A nice little mythological Greek monster to round out the 'H's. We're almost half way through, I think, if not just past half way. I'm too lazy to count.

Anyway, you all know what Hydras are. What interests me about the entry is how the designers try to come up with at least a pseudo-scientific justification for how decapitation of a head doesn't result in a speedy death - apparently the blood vessels in the hyrda's neck immediately snap shut to stem the bleeding. I mean, come on. This is D&D. Nobody bothers coming up with a scientific explanation for how a medusa turns people to stone. Why bother?

There are a few types of Hydra:

Lernean Hydra - I'm not sure if I'm hallucinating this, so I'll write the blurb out in full with the apparently hallucinatory part in bold: "Although similar to a normal hydra, Lernaean hydrae will regenerate two heads for each one that is severed. A maximum of 12 heads can be grown. New heads form in 1-4 rounds and can be avoided only by the prompt application of flame to the neck following the attack which destroyed the first head. This hydra's body is immune to all attacks." If I'm not dreaming it... how is it that I've never used one of these before!?!?

Pyrohydra: A hydra which breathes flame. I can't remember if this was the one in Harryhausen's Jason and the Argonauts... it must be at least 15 years since I've seen it.

Cryohydra: Similar to the Pyrohydra, except it breathes cold.

I find it strange that the Pyrohydra and Cryohydra only do 8 points of damage with their breath attacks. I know that they shouldn't be as powerful as dragons, but still, it does seem rather measly. Indeed Hydras aren't nearly as fearsome as I would imagine one to be - I would rather have them as the big bad bodyguard of the big bad boss in a mid-level campaign, but I think a mid-level party could put one away rather easily.

Kapten

10-01-2008 12:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9425151)

Hydra

I find it strange that the Pyrohydra and Cryohydra only do 8 points of damage with their breath attacks. I know that they shouldn't be as powerful as dragons, but still, it does seem rather measly. Indeed Hydras aren't nearly as fearsome as I would imagine one to be - I would rather have them as the big bad bodyguard of the big bad boss in a mid-level campaign, but I think a mid-level party could put one away rather easily.

I have always interpreted it as 8 points of damage per head, meaning a damage from 40 to 96. That would make more sense considering the HD and Exp-value of the hydras.

noisms

10-01-2008 12:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9424787)

Why have Aborigines and Tribesmen have separate entries when their stats are identical? The only real differences are the former use stone weapons, live in caves and have fewer and weaker shaman. Surely Cavemen/Neanderthals would have been better off with an entry for themselves?

It find it odd too. I'm not one to be offended at this sort of thing in RPGs usually, but it really does strike me as palpably wrong to lump aborigines in with 'cavemen' - with all the baggage that term brings with it. But enough politics!

Sleeper

10-01-2008 01:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9425650)

It find it odd too. I'm not one to be offended at this sort of thing in RPGs usually, but it really does strike me as palpably wrong to lump aborigines in with 'cavemen' - with all the baggage that term brings with it. But enough politics!

I think they were trying in their clumsy way to be sensitive. In the original MM, tribesmen were lumped in with cavemen, so apparently they added aborigines so they could separate the tribal culture out. Which of course created a new problem. Merging berserkers and dervishes also seems a bit weird since dervishes used to be lumped in with nomads and berserkers were their own subentry.

JRM

10-01-2008 01:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9425151)

Hydra

A nice little mythological Greek monster to round out the 'H's. We're almost half way through, I think, if not just past half way. I'm too lazy to count.

Anyway, you all know what Hydras are. What interests me about the entry is how the designers try to come up with at least a pseudo-scientific justification for how decapitation of a head doesn't result in a speedy death - apparently the blood vessels in the hyrda's neck immediately snap shut to stem the bleeding. I mean, come on. This is D&D. Nobody bothers coming up with a scientific explanation for how a medusa turns people to stone. Why bother?

There are a few types of Hydra:

Lernean Hydra - I'm not sure if I'm hallucinating this, so I'll write the blurb out in full with the apparently hallucinatory part in bold: "Although similar to a normal hydra, Lernaean hydrae will regenerate two heads for each one that is severed. A maximum of 12 heads can be grown. New heads form in 1-4 rounds and can be avoided only by the prompt application of flame to the neck following the attack which destroyed the first head. This hydra's bod is immune to all attacks." If I'm not dreaming it... how is it that I've never used one of these before!?!?

This bothers you, but you let the regular Hydra's "Attacks on the body have no effect unless a single attack inflicts damage equal to the hydra's original hit points" pass without comment? That's saying the Hydra is immune to all attacks to its body that don't kill it in a single attack.

Now I wonder how long it will be before someone starts arguing over whether the plural of Hydra should be Hydrae or Hydras?:D

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9425151)

Pyrohydra: A hydra which breathes flame. I can't remember if this was the one in Harryhausen's Jason and the Argonauts... it must be at least 15 years since I've seen it.

Nope, the Jason and the Argonauts movie's Hydra was a regular seven-headed, non-regenerating beast. Unlike the AD&D version it didn't have any legs, but made up for this deficit by having two prehensile tails.

There is a fire-breathing Hydra in the 1963 movie Captain Sindbad though, a film for which I have a soft spot - bits of it somehow manage to be awesome, awful and hilarious at the same time.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9425151)

I find it strange that the Pyrohydra and Cryohydra only do 8 points of damage with their breath attacks. I know that they shouldn't be as powerful as dragons, but still, it does seem rather measly. Indeed Hydras aren't nearly as fearsome as I would imagine one to be - I would rather have them as the big bad bodyguard of the big bad boss in a mid-level campaign, but I think a mid-level party could put one away rather easily.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9425589)

I have always interpreted it as 8 points of damage per head, meaning a damage from 40 to 96. That would make more sense considering the HD and Exp-value of the hydras.

Each head has its own breath weapon, so if they all breathe on the same victim it can do a respectable amount of damage. The Pyrohydra is hampered by the pathetic 5' range to which it can spit flame - a PC can outreach that with a spear!

Oh, and before I forget, the 2nd edition AD&D Hydra had a nice "Ecology of the Hydra" write up by Jonathan Richards in Dragon #272. My favourite idea from it was that a Hydra, being a swamp and marsh monster, spent a lot of time hiding underwater waiting for passing prey while leaving only one of its heads on the surface as a look-out cum snorkel. I like to imagine a party of adventurers saying "look over there, a snake's head coming towards us ... we can handle it, it's just a Giant Constrictor Snake ... hey there's a bunch more of them, it must be a nest of snakes" and then the monster's dragon-body claws onto shore and someone screams "Aieeee a Hydra!" in their best Legolas impersonation.

By the way, is it evil of me to want AD&D Hydra to have deadly venomous fangs & blood like their mythological inspiration?

Failed Saving Throw

10-01-2008 06:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9416509)

Are you sure that the Hook Horror wasn't one of those monsters that were inspired by a plastic toy? Like the Bulette allegedly was?

I actually had that plastic bulette toy that inspired Gygax. It was a pretty common thing dispensed on boardwalk toy-machines.

Crinos

10-01-2008 08:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

The Lernian Hydra is actually the way the Hydra in the original myth worked: to kill it Hercules had to burn each neck stump as he clubbed them off (and in some versions the final head is immortal, so Hercules has to trap it under a rock).

As to why attacking the body doesn't work, I suppose it was to make it so the heroes had to cut off the heads, since that's how it was done in the myth (why Hercules didn't bother attacking the body is beyond me).

Azimer the Mad

10-01-2008 10:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9425796)

Oh, and before I forget, the 2nd edition AD&D Hydra had a nice "Ecology of the Hydra" write up by Jonathan Richara in Dragon #272.

Yeah, that was the one where it was revealed that farmers hang hydra tongues from roofs because they turn blue when it rained. I loved stuff like that.

Kakita Kojiro

10-01-2008 11:58 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9425796)

*Now I wonder how long it will be before someone starts arguing over whether the plural of Hydra should be Hydrae or Hydras?:D*

My peeve says: "hydrai" if you're Greek or Roman, "hydras" if you're an English type, and just "ninja" if you're into anime. Latin uses Greek declension for Greek nouns, so never "hydrae".

Um, unless you're talking about stars, when "hydrae" is adjectival, anyway.

noisms

10-01-2008 05:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Azimer the Mad (Post 9427218)

Yeah, that was the one where it was revealed that farmers hang hydra tongues from roofs because they turn blue when it rained. I loved stuff like that.

Those must be some bloody tough farmers!

Wakboth

10-01-2008 05:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Hydras have always been a bit "duh" monster, IMO. They're not iconic like dragons, and are essentially Big Dumb Beasties, with a weird HP system.

(un)reason

10-01-2008 06:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9425589)

I have always interpreted it as 8 points of damage per head, meaning a damage from 40 to 96. That would make more sense considering the HD and Exp-value of the hydras.

This is one of those weird bits of evolutionary logic where each step makes sense, but when you look at the end result, you go, how the hell does that work. It goes roughly.

1: Dragons in OD&D do an amount of damage equal to their hit points with their breath weapon.

2: Hydras are sorta like dragons, so they should do the same.

3: If every head could do that much, then players would die instantly. So since each head is a hit die, each head should inflict 8 points of damage. That way, if all of them breathe on one opponent at once, they'll do an amount of damage equal to the hydras starting hit points.

4: DM doesn't realise that, players go WTF when individual heads breathe seperately, and only do piddling amounts of damage.

5: Profit! :D

JRM

10-01-2008 07:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9427529)

My peeve says: "hydrai" if you're Greek or Roman, "hydras" if you're an English type, and just "ninja" if you're into anime. Latin uses Greek declension for Greek nouns, so never "hydrae".

Um, unless you're talking about stars, when "hydrae" is adjectival, anyway.

Mwah hah hah! I suspected someone would fall into my insidious Hydra-trap. Now let's see how Kakita Kojiro copes with my venomous fifty-headed regenerating Hydrai.

:D

Normally I'd use Hydras for the plural, more because Hydrae sounds clumsy to me than because it's an incorrect declension, but since the Monstrous Compendium used Hydrae I decided to leave it in.

Incidentally, I believe Hydrae is sometimes used for multiples of the freshwater polyp Hydra, since the convention for taxonomic names always seem to use Latin endings regardless of the words' origins - e.g. they're of the family Hydridae.

Now why didn't I remember the real-life Hydra earlier? It has some obvious parallels to the fantasy monster Hydra, and could be the basis of a cool monster itself once enlarged to giant size: Five to twelve tentacles with paralyzing stings, able to swallow victims over twice its size, immune to aging and possessing amazing regenerative powers - it can even reform after being pushed through a mesh to separate it into individual cells.

sim_james

10-01-2008 08:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9420205)

Aborigine/Caveman: I'm not sure if this category would fly these days, especially in the Antipodes!

Aborigine/Caveman. Hmm...

It would be more accurate to use the Tribal Culture type for pre-invasion Australian Aborigines, imo.

Boris

10-01-2008 09:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9428277)

Those must be some bloody tough farmers!

They got lots of XP killing Ankhegs and now they can wear Ankheg shell armour while they fight the Hydra. Duh.

David J Prokopetz

10-01-2008 11:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9428522)

Normally I'd use Hydras for the plural, more because Hydrae sounds clumsy to me than because it's an incorrect declension, but since the Monstrous Compendium used Hydrae I decided to leave it in.

I'm suddenly half-tempted to exploit the "Latin plurals are weird" meme to try to convince folks that the proper plural of "hydra" is "hydrangea".

JRM

10-01-2008 11:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9428983)

I'm suddenly half-tempted to exploit the "Latin plurals are weird" meme to try to convince folks that the proper plural of "hydra" is "hydrangea".

Shouldn't that be "hydrangai", since Hydra is Greek?:p;)

David J Prokopetz

10-02-2008 12:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9429095)

Shouldn't that be "hydrangai", since Hydra is Greek?:p;)

All plurals are Latin plurals in RPG-land.

demiurge1138

10-02-2008 02:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9428277)
Those must be some bloody tough farmers!

Nah, they just know how greedy adventurer-types are. If a farming community is willing to scrape together 100 gold between them to hire adventurers to kill the hydra that's been eating their sheep, cows and occasional farmhand, they'll pitch in an extra 5 or 10 gold to get the hydra's tongues, too.

And it's not as if they couldn't hang onto those tongues. Dry them out to use as a barometer. Maybe even pass them down, from generation to generation. And as the hydra tongues become beloved family heirlooms, they might start to pick up a little more magic from the farmers believing they should. Nothing flashy, mind you, but maybe Old Man Smith's hydra tongue turns one color when it's time to plant and another when it's time to harvest. Maybe the Magnussons, good salt-of-the-earth folk, have a hydra tongue that, when you soak it in water, turns that water into a potion that cures livestock of disease, or makes their corn grow just a little bit higher. That sort of thing.

Kakita Kojiro

10-02-2008 02:41 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9428522)
*Incidentally, I believe Hydrae is sometimes used for multiples of the freshwater polyp Hydra, since the convention for taxonomic names always seem to use Latin endings regardless of the words' origins - e.g. they're of the family Hydridae.*

You cannot so easily outwit my peeve! The family Hydridae uses Latin declension because it is a Latin suffix welded onto a Greek stem, which is perfectly acceptable Latin usage. The genus Hydra is pluralized hydras in the very wiki article you cite. ha!

... interesting, some hydrozoa metamorphose into medusas. Wasn't the Lernean hydra was one of the critters that sprung out of Medusa's lifesblood when she was beheaded? Oop, no; it was spawned by Typhon + Echidna. Still, would be an interestingly whacky D&D fantasy biology -- hydras are baby medusas.

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9429153)
All plurals are Latin plurals in RPG-land.

Unfortunately, Latin plurals in RPG-land are usually of the form "just stick an -i on the end". shudder

Dragonlance was particularly bad about this.

JRM

10-02-2008 05:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9429728)

You cannot so easily outwit my peeve! The family Hydridae uses Latin declension because it is a Latin suffix welded onto a Greek stem, which is perfectly acceptable Latin usage. The genus Hydra is pluralized hydras in the very wiki article you cite. ha!

Bah! I am not foiled so easily, for the -ae suffix can also apply to the genus name Hydra, the plural of which can be Hydrae as well as Hydras, of which you can easily find examples in scientific papers such as this abstract.

Now, I wonder what a hardcopy English dictionary will have to say on the matter ... hmm, neither my compact Chambers or Oxford give a plural for the animal, no help there.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9429728)

... interesting, some hydrozoa metamorphose into medeusas. Wasn't the Lernean hydra was one of the critters that sprung out of Medeusa's lifesblood when she was beheaded? Oop, no; it was spawned by Typhon + Echidna. Still, would be an interestingly whacky D&D fantasy biology -- hydras are baby medeusas.

Where's this "medeusas" come from? Isn't the original Greek Medousa, which I guess would make the plural Medousai.

Hydrae (:) are not among the hydrozoa that morph into medusae (:) - they remain polyps throughout their lives. Yes, I did just type hydras and medusae just to tease Kakita Kojiro (:p).

Anyhow, having hydras be larval medusas would be interesting. Of course, hydras are a lot bigger - but then they could be like the frog Pseudis paradoxa and have a tadpole much larger than the adult. If an adult medusa has wings like in the Greek myth they can fly from swamp to swamp to lay eggs which hatch into new hydras. I'd want to tinker with the medusa's stats and appearance though, since I don't think having a hydra larval form fits with them being snaky-haired babes with above human average intelligence as they are in the Monstrous Compendium.

The Last Conformist

10-02-2008 09:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9429728)

You cannot so easily outwit my peeve! The family Hydridae uses Latin declension because it is a Latin suffix welded onto a Greek stem, which is perfectly acceptable Latin usage.

No. It uses pseudo-Latin declension on a Greek stem with a Greek suffix because taxonomic Latinists are a bunch of inconsistent bastards.

The Latin plural of hydra would be hydrae, because the word was treated as a regular Latin first declination noun, not unassimilated Greek. (dictionary entry)

Wakboth

10-02-2008 09:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

You know, I think we got more mileage out of the various bogus plurals of "hydra" than the entire "Human" section. :)

David J Prokopetz

10-02-2008 11:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9429728)

*Unfortunately, Latin plurals in RPG-land are usually of the form "just stick an -i on the end". *shudder

Cactus - Cacti
Walrus - Walri
Penis - Penii
Bus - ... Bi?

:D

(For bonus points, tell me which one of the above is actually valid.)

Kreuzritter

10-03-2008 01:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

on the ever-present monster sages, i'm reminded of the SAGA Dragonlance bestiary, which was written from the perspective of Caramon's memoirs and what he'd heard from others. And being Caramon, he lets the reader know exactly what he thinks of each beastie as i recall, he spends the first couple of lines on the dracolich entry wrapping his head around the notion anybody/thing thinking an undead dragon was a great idea

JRM

10-03-2008 05:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9433357)

*Cactus - Cacti
Walrus - Walri
Penis - Penii
Bus - ... Bi?*

:D

(For bonus points, tell me which one of the above is actually valid.)

Cacti.

Do I earn any more for knowing walrus isn't even Latin?:o

6inTruder

10-03-2008 12:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Latin plurals are lovely, but can we move on to Horse...i?

);p

noisms

10-03-2008 02:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Actually next are Impii.

JRM

10-03-2008 08:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9437009)
Actually next are Impii.

The collective noun for a gathering of imps is impii? Like a Zulu impi?

What a great idea!:cool:

Cant you just see them: disciplined ranks of little devils, wielding stench-kow hide shields, stabbing-spears and knobkerries, their officers decorated with the fur of hellcats!
;)

noisms

10-03-2008 08:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Under their leader, the mighty Impshwayo kaMpandimp.

noisms

10-04-2008 01:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Imp

Rather like a sentient homonculus, the Imp is like a ready-made race of familiars for evil wizards. It's mainly distinguished by having an instakill attack (stingy tail) and being really annoying (can only be harmed by silver or magical weapons, regenerates hit points, has a plethora of Irritation-based spells like invisibility at will). It is not only evil, but very evil.

The most intriguing thing about Imps is that, rather like cats in our universe, they pretend that their 'master' is in charge while secretly manipulating him or her behind the scenes. This brings up a whole host of possibilities in my mind for campaigns in which the players battle for years to defeat a Big Bad Evil Guy, only to discover that it was really said BBEG's pet Imp who was the power behind the throne. The Imp could escape during the final battle and go off to take over his next victim - whereupon the whole cycle would begin again. With hilarious consequences.

Quasit

The Quasit is a Chaotic Evil version of the Lawful Evil Imp, and is in most respects similar. It actually seems less powerful, though (although they do have 1 more HD), which makes me wonder why it gives more XP. Then again I should have learned by now that the XP totals were mostly plucked from thin air.

Quasits' signature move is their ability to contact a creature on the lower planes and ask it 6 questions. There's an adventure in their somewhere, no doubt about it.

demiurge1138

10-04-2008 01:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've done the imp-manipulating-its-master thing before. The imp Jasper played its demented necromancer master like a puppet, leading him onward in his attempts to fuse negative and positive energy to create undead with a greater semblance of life. It even told his master where to build his lab... because Jasper knew that the spot was on a weak point in the Material Plane, and that too great a change in the positive/negative energy balance would open up a portal to Pandemonium.

The party killed Jasper, but got destroyed by the necromancer and his positive-infused undead. By the time the new party got their acts together to storm the place, the portal had opened, the positive-infused undead had killed its creator, and the necromancer, the imp, and all of their victims over the years had fused into one gestalt ghost. In that form, Jasper was clearly in charge, and let its master know exactly what it thought of him.

JRM

10-04-2008 03:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9438450)

Imp

Rather like a sentient homonculus, the Imp is like a ready-made race of familiars for evil wizards. It's mainly distinguished by having an instakill attack (stingy tail) and being really annoying (can only be harmed by silver or magical weapons, regenerates hit points, has a plethora of Irritation-based spells like invisibility at will). It is not only evil, but very evil.

The most intriguing thing about Imps is that, rather like cats in our universe, they pretend that their 'master' is in charge while secretly manipulating him or her behind the scenes. This brings up a whole host of possibilities in my mind for campaigns in which the players battle for years to defeat a Big Bad Evil Guy, only to discover that it was really said BBEG's pet Imp who was the power behind the throne. The Imp could escape during the final battle and go off to take over his next victim - whereupon the whole cycle would begin again. With hilarious consequences.

Now it rather bothers me that there's no mention of Imps or Quasits polymorphing into cats, it's a traditional form for a demon-familiar (although the ferret is an older one) and will allow you to have the BBEG have some use for that fluffy white Persian kitty they're stroking while they taunt the PCs.

Speaking of irritation, I long wanted to inflict a party with an imp who tried to include a word starting with "imp-" in every sentence he said (impulsive, impertinent, impression, important etc), until even its Master would want to sent the little blighter back to Heck. Unfortunately, the only Evil wizard I ever DM'd who gained a special familiar was Chaotic, so I had to settle for an annoying Quasit instead.

:p

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9438450)

Quasit

The Quasit is a Chaotic Evil version of the Lawful Evil Imp, and is in most respects similar. It actually seems less powerful, though (although they do have 1 more HD), which makes me wonder why it gives more XP. Then again I should have learned by now that the XP totals were mostly plucked from thin air.

Quasits' signature move is their ability to contact a creature on the lower planes and ask it 6 questions. There's an adventure in their somewhere, no doubt about it.

Yes, Imps are a lot more powerful, a Quasit claws' minor Dex-sapping venom hardly compares to an Imp tail's insta-kill poison.

The XPs were not 'plucked fro thin air' though, it's just that the DMG tables used to calculate them sometimes gave inconsistent results - they were over reliant on Hit Dice, for example, so a high HD creature with no powers like a whale or Brontosaurus could be worth an awful lot of XP despite being fairly easy for a well-equipped party to slay from a distance. Quasits got higher XP because they had the same powers (poison, spells, magic resistance etc) but more Hit Dice, and they did not allow for the different effectiveness of their poison.

noisms

10-04-2008 10:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9438973)

The XPs were not 'plucked fro thin air' though, it's just that the DMG tables used to calculate them sometimes gave inconsistent results - they were over reliant on Hit Dice, for example, so a high HD creature with no powers like a whale or Brontosaurus could be worth an awful lot of XP despite being fairly easy for a well-equipped party to slay from a distance. Quasits got higher XP because they had the same powers (poison, spells, magic resistance etc) but more Hit Dice, and they did not allow for the different effectiveness of their poison.

Yeah, I know, I was just being facetious. ;) Instakill abilities were never properly represented in the XP totals, so you get ridiculous anomalies like the Catoblepas only being worth 975 points.

DMH

10-04-2008 10:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Now that insects are next up, I want to make an observation on some previous insects- the beetles don't have fly speeds. Beetles have wings and they fly, so why were they not given a fly speed?

MuscaDomestica

10-04-2008 11:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9440331)

Now that insects are next up, I want to make an observation on some previous insects- the beetles don't have fly speeds. Beetles have wings and they fly, so why were they not given a fly speed?

Because on a whole a beetle would rather walk then fly, most of them suck in the air. There are tens of thousands of exceptions, but they are beetles there are over 350,000 known species so there is variation. Anyways its a fun thing to do to the PCs. Jump across a pit to escape the flesh eating scarabs, and they just fly across and swarm over them.

DMH

10-04-2008 11:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

But that is real world facts. Rhino beetles don't get 12' long on Earth. Seeing (and hearing) them flying over a forest on Greyhawk would be terrifying even if they have a manuver class of D or E.

JRM

10-05-2008 12:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9441652)

But that is real world facts. Rhino beetles don't get 12' long on Earth. Seeing (and hearing) them flying over a forest on Greyhawk would be terrifying even if they have a maneuver class of D or E.

Yes, that would make a cool image, and I'd probably homebrew some species of Giant Beetles with functional wings.

I'd like the Giant Praying Mantis to have a fly speed to, which it does in some editions of the game.

see

10-06-2008 02:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I note that the OED goes with "hydras" for the plural of the "fabulous many-headed snake of the marshes of Lerna" and derivative meanings, reserving "hydrae" exclusively for members of the genus of Hydrozoa.

JRM

10-07-2008 02:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9447204)

I note that the OED goes with "hydras" for the plural of the "fabulous many-headed snake of the marshes of Lerna" and derivative meanings, reserving "hydrae" exclusively for members of the genus of Hydrozoa.

It does? That's interesting, the Concise Oxford I looked hydra up in didn't give a plural. Not enough space, I guess. Still, I feel either hydras or hydrae are both acceptable, although I prefer the sound of the former.

E.T.Smith

10-07-2008 08:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9447204)

I note that the OED goes with "hydras" for the plural of the "fabulous many-headed snake of the marshes of Lerna" and derivative meanings, reserving "hydrae" exclusively for members of the genus of Hydrozoa.

But how does Hydrox fit into all of this?

JRM

10-07-2008 09:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9450320)
But how does Hydrox fit into all of this?

What, didn't you know hydra flesh tastes like chocolate, and can be liquidized and baked to a dark, biscuity substance?

I dread to think what they use for the creamy filling....eek;)

Kakita Kojiro

10-08-2008 02:43 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by E.T.Smith (Post 9450320)
But how does Hydrox fit into all of this?

Temporarily reissued, actually. Their head was chopped off, but it has grown back, as it were.

And, as much as I appreciate linguistic pedantry, to be sure... bring on the bugs and, er, Invisible things and such!

JRM

10-08-2008 05:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9453632)
Temporarily reissued, actually. Their head was chopped off, but it has grown back, as it were.

And, as much as I appreciate linguistic pedantry, to be sure... bring on the bugs and, er, Invisible things and such!

We haven't finished with the Imps yet.

Where are our Imps (Mephit), eh, noisms!?

In the meantime I'll try to think of something interesting to say about them. Which may prove difficult, since I never found Mephits very exciting.

noisms

10-08-2008 04:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Having network connection problems. Back in the swing of things tomorrow (I think).

noisms

10-09-2008 07:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Imp, Mephit

Mephits. Tough to find much to say about them as they are in standard 2nd edition AD&D. In various Planescape Monstrous Compendia and the Inner Planes book more of an effort was made to flesh them out, but here they just seem a little... bland? Although I like the plot hook of the party running across one and finding out it is carrying an important message from Fiend A to Fiend B about Plan X or whatever. As ways to start adventures go it's about as subtle as a sledgehammer, but none the worse for that. I also have a special place in my heart for Salt Mephits, who have killed a total of three characters in my games - each time a different campaign. (Though there are no Salt Mephits here.)

A Mephit is a "nasty little messenger" created by lower planar inhabitants from primordial elemental matter. There is thus a type for each elemental, quasi-elemental and para-elemental plane, though not all of them are outlined in the MM. The ones detailed are:

Fire Mephits - the most mischievous variety, who as you would expect can breathe/shoot fire and touch to cause heat damage, as well as gate in other fire mephits, or steam, smoke or lava ones.

Ice Mephit - These are "aloof and cruel, surpassing all other mephits in the fine arts of torture and wanton destruction". Destruction's no good unless it's wanton, really, is it? They can shoot ice shards, and also gate other ice or mist mephits.

Lava Mephit - Renamed the Magma Mephit in Planescape, these are unintelligent and shoot blobs of lava. They can, you've guessed it, gate other mephits.

Mist Mephit - These fancy themselves as spies, and enjoy shopping in other mephits to their fiendish overlords. They can create walls of fog and other misty things.

Smoke Mephit - "Smoke mephits are crude and lazy. They spend most of their time lounging around invisible, smoking pipe weed, telling bad jokes about their creators, and shirking their responsibilities." Smoking pipe weed! I wonder if they're any relation to halflings? Their weapon is a ball of soot which causes blindness - possibly the most piss-poor breath weapon in the MM>

Steam Mephit - These believe themselves to be the lords of all mephits, and like to boss the others around. Their special attack is a mini-rainstorm of boiling hot water.

DMH

10-09-2008 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

In the 3rd edition, they made mephits TN elementals with the outsider type. It gives them more flexibility, but the write up is even more dull than the Monstrous Manual.

(un)reason

10-09-2008 08:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9461129)

Imp, Mephit

Mephits. Tough to find much to say about them as they are in standard 2nd edition AD&D. In various Planescape Monstrous Compendia and the Inner Planes book more of an effort was made to flesh them out, but here they just seem a little... bland?

Well, that's true of all the fiend type entries. They give you just enough info to let you know the other ones are out there, in another book. Which was vaguely galling when I first got the book. What, something this big and they still can't fit all the monsters in? But then, this was the era when they would regularly mention metaplot details that happened in other books and not explain them, to force you to buy all the stuff if you wanted a proper idea of what was going on. This is just part of encouraging the gotta buy them all mentality to squeeze every drop out of their fanbase.

noisms

10-09-2008 11:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9461226)

Well, that's true of all the fiend type entries. They give you just enough info to let you know the other ones are out there, in another book. Which was vaguely galling when I first got the book. What, something this big and they still can't fit all the monsters in? But then, this was the era when they would regularly mention metaplot details that happened in other books and not explain them, to force you to buy all the stuff if you wanted a proper idea of what was going on. This is just part of encouraging the gotta buy them all mentality to squeeze every drop out of their fanbase.

That's always been D&D's greatest failing. I don't think it's changed much down the years, though these days you get less superfluous fluff but more superfluous crunch.

David J Prokopetz

10-09-2008 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9461129)

Smoke Mephit - "Smoke mephits are crude and lazy. They spend most of their time lounging around invisible, smoking pipe weed, telling bad jokes about their creators, and shirking their responsibilities."

I knew a guy back in the day who claimed that smoke mephits are a deliberate racial stereotype - you know, the ones with sooty black skin just happen to be the crude, lazy, indulgent ones. I thought he was out to lunch, given that all mephits are horrible people, but the earlier discussion about racial caricatures in the "human" entry reminded me of it.

(Personally, I think they read more as stereotypical pot-heads than any sort of racial caricature.)

demiurge1138

10-10-2008 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

With the mephits in 3rd Edition, I like to think of them as the common folk of the elemental planes. Sure, the genies are the ones actually in charge (although the salamanders would probably disagree, I don't see them building a City of Brass), and the elementals are what mortals tend to think of as the exemplars of the planes. But most of the actual civilizations are mephits.

In a Planescape game I ran, one of the PCs was a monk who had a steam mephit cohort. The mephit's primary purpose was to provide a distraction in combat and make tea.

Kakita Kojiro

10-10-2008 10:23 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9461226)

Well, that's true of all the fiend type entries. They give you just enough info to let you know the other ones are out there, in another book. Which was vaguely galling when I first got the book. What, something this big and they still can't fit all the monsters in? But then, this was the era when they would regularly mention metaplot details that happened in other books and not explain them, to force you to buy all the stuff if you wanted a proper idea of what was going on. This is just part of encouraging the gotta buy them all mentality to squeeze every drop out of their fanbase.

Maybe all that's old is new again, then: the 4th edition Monster Manual is deliberately missing some of the old, iconic standbys, apparently just so you'll buy the next Monster Manual (and Dragonomicon, etc.). It even mentions, fr'ex, the metallic dragons that are missing.

Even in D&D, some things never change. (although I really don't begrudge them trying to squeeze money out of the fanbase; that's their job, after all)

Kapten

10-10-2008 09:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9464380)

Maybe all that's old is new again, then: the 4th edition Monster Manual is deliberately missing some of the old, iconic standbys, apparently just so you'll buy the next Monster Manual (and Dragonomicon, etc.). It even mentions, fr'ex, the metallic dragons that are missing.

Even in D&D, some things never change. (although I really don't begrudge them trying to squeeze money out of the fanbase; that's their job, after all)

I don't quite agree; if you start playing D&D with 4th edition you won't know that frost giants are missing. If you just started playing 2nd edition, you would be pretty confused by the fiend entries.

This has happened again with the references to the metallic dragons but not to the same degree as some of the entries in the 2nd edition MM.

JRM

10-11-2008 07:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I was stumped for anything to say about mephits, they never sparked my imagination. After reading through their Monstrous Manual entry only a few factoids caught my interest:

"They never eat, but must return to the substance from which they were formed to heal damage (usually 1 hit point per turn in contact)."

That makes them better nuisance hit-and-run monsters - the mephits can summon some pals, mob one of the PCs and fly away to the steam-bath until their wounds heal. Unfortunately, it's too slow to be very useful except for lava mephits.

Speaking of which, the Fire mephit says they "play terrible pranks on other mephits (such as pushing lava mephits into water and watching them harden)", but the lava mephit's entry does not say they're hurt by water. Didn't their 1st edition write-ups have lava and fire mephits injured by water? I remember playing an AD&D character when our party was confronted by a fire mephit, and I just emptied a waterskin over it and the creature just fizzled out.

Also, what happens if a lava mephit shapechanges into a lava pool after grappling someone, do they do 2d8+2 heat damage per round as if they were hitting with both claws? What if they lava-pool while swimming in a lake of lava, do they dissolve into it or are they intact but invisible?

But then I saw noism's smoke mephit write up.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9461129)

[u]Smoke Mephit - "Smoke mephits are crude and lazy. They spend most of their time lounging around invisible, smoking pipe weed, telling bad jokes about their creators, and shirking their responsibilities." Smoking pipe weed! I wonder if they're any relation to halflings? Their weapon is a ball of soot which causes blindness - possibly the most piss-poor breath weapon in the MM>

How could I have missed this - ignorant and indolent, liking to lie about smoking while bitching about authority figures. They might as well have added that they get bouts of the munchies and like to frequent cafés in Amsterdam to the clichéd pot smoker.

Now I'm trying to come up with a reason why these "powerful fiends" would create a Smoke Mephit and not one of the other, more useful types. Hmm...

- The master-fiend only had access to the plane of Smoke when he needed to make a servant. That's a bit boring.
- The master fiend deliberately created disobedient, lazy staff for an over-ambitious underling.
- A pesky mortal wizard demands an imp familiar, but they didn't say what kind of imp...:D
- They're all servants of a wannabe Demon Prince, The Demon Weed (:o)

That third option has the most amusing possibilities. Whenever the smoke mephit familiar gets wounded it'll start whining "I'm feeling really down man" and want to stop and light up, and it will have to completely fill the area with smoke to count as a "return to the substance from which they were formed".

Now if I ever get around to running that adventure with a chest-full of Imps (who take every opportunity to use such words as important, impulsive, impertinent, impacable, impatient, impecunious, impenitent, implacable, impersonating impracticable impoverishing, importune improper, appropriating, improvident, imprudent, impulsive, impugning, impudent and imputable) I've got to lumber the players with a few stoner smoke mephits as well.

noisms

10-11-2008 11:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9466065)

I don't quite agree; if you start playing D&D with 4th edition you won't know that frost giants are missing. If you just started playing 2nd edition, you would be pretty confused by the fiend entries.

This has happened again with the references to the metallic dragons but not to the same degree as some of the entries in the 2nd edition MM.

What bothers me the most are the opaque references to campaign settings - usually to do with stuff from the Forgotten Realms, which I always hated.

The psionics feels oddly misplaced too. Psionics weren't part of the core rules so it seems odd that psionic monsters should be so common in the MM. A psionic monsters compendium would have made a lot more sense.

Wakboth

10-11-2008 04:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9468197)

Speaking of which, the Fire mephit says they "play terrible pranks on other mephits (such as pushing lava mephits into water and watching them harden)", but the lava mephit's entry does not say they're hurt by water. Didn't their 1st edition write-ups have lava and fire mephits injured by water? I remember playing an AD&D character when our party was confronted by a fire mephit, and I just emptied a waterskin over it and the creature just fizzled out.

No, they're not hurt by water; but I always assumed it meant the lava mephit, when immersed in a sufficiently big body of water (so as not to boil it away) would stiffen and be nearly immobilized. Then the fire mephit points and laughs as the lava mephit struggles to walk out of the pool, prudently flying off long before it can take more than a step or two.

Quote:

Now I'm trying to come up with a reason why these "powerful fiends" would create a Smoke Mephit and not one of the other, more useful types. Hmm...

- The master-fiend only had access to the plane of Smoke when he needed to make a servant. That's a bit boring.
- The master fiend deliberately created disobedient, lazy staff for an over-ambitious underling.
- A pesky mortal wizard demands an imp familiar, but they didn't say what kind of imp...:D
- They're all servants of a wannabe Demon Prince, The Demon Weed (:o)

Maybe you can't choose what kind of a mephit you create; if you have fiery elemental stuff, any of the "hot" mephits is a possibility. Thus, tons of mephits that nobody wants, and that have managed to avoid getting squashed instantly... :)

Quote:

Now if I ever get around to running that adventure with a chest-full of Imps (who take every opportunity to use such words as important, impulsive, impertinent, impacable, impatient, impecunious, impenitent, implacable, impersonating impracticable impoverishing, importune improper, impropriating, improvident, imprudent, impulsive impugning, impudent and imputable) I've got to lumber the players with a few stoner smoke mephits as well.

Mephits made great comic relief and annoyance characters/monsters in Planescape. And unlike the sprites, nobody felt bad when they finally turned them into mephit-kebabs after one too many "hot foot" joke on the paladin. :D

demiurge1138

10-11-2008 05:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

My favorite mephit from Planescape was the canon Seamusxanthuzenus, a dust mephit who ran a body part dealership in Sigil. When I ran a Planescape game, my party took an instant liking to him (and his schizophrenic insistence that he "never bargains" or "always bargains", depending on which would be more advantageous), and ended up making a lot of money selling off bits of the monsters they killed.

noisms

10-11-2008 07:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Can you tell I'm trying to recharge my batteries before taking on the mammoth Insect entry?

JRM

10-11-2008 08:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9469615)

No, they're not hurt by water; but I always assumed it meant the lava mephit, when immersed in a sufficiently big body of water (so as not to boil it away) would stiffen and be nearly immobilized. Then the fire mephit points and laughs as the lava mephit struggles to walk out of the pool, prudently flying off long before it can take more than a step or two.

That's a good idea, but it'd have been nicer if their write-up had explained how other elements affected them. I like the idea that mephits can survive in inimical environments and only suffer discomfort, they'd be of less use as long-distance messengers if a lava-mephit can't courier to the swamp-demon the next plane over.

Another curiosity about lava mephits is their write up says they're the dim bulbs amongst their kind ("Lava mephits are the least intelligent of all mephits. They are slow on the uptake and frequently the brunt of fire mephit jokes.") but their stats list the same Average (8-10) intelligence as the other varieties. Would it have killed them to give Lava mephits Low intelligence?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9469615)

Maybe you can't choose what kind of a mephit you create; if you have fiery elemental stuff, any of the "hot" mephits is a possibility. Thus, tons of mephits that nobody wants, and that have managed to avoid getting squashed instantly... :)

Well I guess that's possible, although it says "Each is created from the substance for which it is named", so I was assuming that the creator-fiend can be pretty sure what kind of mephit results just by using a particular material. Maybe if the fiend makes a mistake in the ritual they may get a different mephit than what they aimed for - e.g. they build a furnace to create a fire mephit, but let it get too smokey (= smoke mephit), hot enough to melt stone (= lava mephit) or some liquid falls in at a critical moment (= steam mephit).

Now I wonder what a fiend would do with a ton of unwanted mephits. Set up a "second hand mephit" stall in Sigyl and flog them off as cheap slaves?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9469615)

Mephits made great comic relief and annoyance characters/monsters in Planescape. And unlike the sprites, nobody felt bad when they finally turned them into mephit-kebabs after one too many "hot foot" joke on the paladin. :D

Yes, I can't see any self-respecting fiend using mephits for anything more than errand boys and general dogsbodies, so I've only used them as nuisance monsters.

Now what other adventure-ideas can apply to mephits. The "intercept a mephit carrying a vital message" idea seems a bit forced to me. Would you trust one of these clowns to do anything important? How about a "intercept a smoke/mist mephit who's fled captivity/slavery after stealing something important" or "the land is plagued by swarms of mephits summoned by some mysterious force - you must stop it!"

JRM

10-12-2008 05:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9469864)
Can you tell I'm trying to recharge my batteries before taking on the mammoth Insect entry? ;)

Mammoth Insect?

Is that a huge shaggy beetle with tusks and a trunk?

Sounds good to me! What will these mad wizards come up with next.

Now I'm tempted to stat them up, with Giant Sabre-Toothed Mantises as their "natural" predators.

I'm happy to wait until you're recharged, take your time.

noisms

10-12-2008 11:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Insect

Insects, "the heartiest and most numerous of creatures" according to the MM, get a mega-entry of unprecedented proportions. So with a deep breath, off we go:

Ant, Giant - There are worker and soldier varieties, plus a queen with 10 HD. The No. Appearing is only 1-100, which I suppose it would have to be in the interests of maintaining a sensible game world. Imagine if a Giant Ants' nest was as populous as an ants' nest is in real life - millions upon millions of the buggers stripping the world of all its nutrients until it resembled a barren wilderness.

Ant Lion, Giant - This is a creature which lurks at the bottom of sand pits, and eats anything that falls in.

Aratha - I'm not sure what this is, actually, because there is no picture and the description is extremely terse. It has 8 tentacles and psionic powers, whatever it is.

Aspis Cow, Aspis Drone, and Aspis Larva - I don't know what an Aspis is either, frankly. Some kind of ant thing from 1e?

Assassin Bug - These are nasty creatures that inject eggs into your body, which then hatch and eat you alive. They can only be got rid of by a wish or limited wish, which seems like overkill to me.

Bee, Worker and Bee, Soldier - You know what these are, I'll wager.

Bumblebee - These too. Again, you have to wonder what the world would be like if the numbers of giant insects matched their real-world counterparts; but a nest apparently only contains 1d6+6 of the things.

Cave Cricket - These produce so much noise that they can drown out conversation and spellcasting - specifically designed for a dungeon crawl game, one might say. You can imagine why dwarves would appreciate their existence. An entire citadel could be decked out with captive cave crickets to prevent magical entry.

Dragonfly and Dragonfly Larva - The Giant Dragonfly eats its prey in mid-air; the larva eat them on the ground, but their mandibles are hidden out of sight so they can often represent a nasty surprise. (50% chance - our old friend exception based design, which we haven't seen in a while.)

Ear Seeker - Khaaaaaaaaaannn!!!!!! Sorry. Anyway, you'd better hope you don't end up with one of these, because you'll be dead within d4 days unless the dice are very kind.

Giant Firefly - These can concentrate their light into a laser beam which causes 5d4 in damage.

Fly, Giant Bluebottle and Fly, Giant Horsefly - Self explanatory, really.

Fyrefly - Ah, the good old "replace an i with a y to make it seem more 'fantastycal'" routine. These insects cause fires whenever they alight on flammable materials.

Horax - These things can hold on once they've made a successful hit, and won't let go until death.

Hornet, Giant - Giant Hornets' stingers are among the strongest of the giant insects, causing 5d6 damage and 2d6 hours of paralysation.

Pernicon - Pernicons attack by burrowing under clothes and armour, causing both hit point and constitution damage.

Praying Mantis, Gargantuan - You have to wonder why the Praying Mantis is 'Gargantuan' and not just 'Giant'. Anyway, being eaten by a Praying Mantis wouldn't be much fun. There are lots of them in my neighbourhood and they seem to enjoy taking their time chewing on still-living prey.

Termite, Giant Harvester - The neat trick of the termite is to spit kerosene, which blinds victims and can then be ignited to cause more damage.

Tick - A tick bite can transmit a disease which causes death with 2d4 days unless a cure disease spell is cast.

Wasp, Giant - This is essentially identical to the Giant Hornet.

David J Prokopetz

10-12-2008 12:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472097)

Ear Seeker - Khaaaaaaaaaannn!!!!!! Sorry. Anyway, you'd better hope you don't end up with one of these, because you'll be dead within d4 days unless the dice are very kind.

Another designed-for-the-dungeon beastie - they're a parasite whose life cycle depends on some hapless mammal pressing its ear up against a wooden surface.

(IIRC, Mr. Gyax up and admitted that he'd introduced them into the game solely because the thieves in his party were stopping to listen at every single door, thereby slowing down play. Of course, I'm betting he didn't stop using scenarios that punish players for not listening at doors - I imagine that's how the practice of listening at every door became entrenched in the first place - so this creates a lovely little damned-if-you-do, damned-if-you-don't situation. :D)

demiurge1138

10-12-2008 12:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Yeah, that's the really annoying thing about the 2e mega-condensed entries. Creatures like horaxes, aspis and arathra get the short-end of the stick, because we people in the real world have no idea what they are (as opposed to a giant ant, fly or termite, which we can make reasonable mental images of).

What's the thing in the illustration riding a giant fly? Looks vaguely goblin-y, but not like any of the goblinoids in the book.

Kakita Kojiro

10-12-2008 12:37 PM

Ear Seekers were also the reason our characters used to carry around hearing cones (with wire mesh-covered openings), in addition to our 10-ft poles, etc. Another cause of the D&D armsrace between PC & DM.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472097)

Giant Firefly - These can concentrate their light into a laser beam which causes 5d4 in damage.

o_O

... maybe I just blocked that one from memory.

noisms

10-12-2008 01:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9472120)

Another designed-for-the-dungeon beastie - they're a parasite whose life cycle depends on some hapless mammal pressing its ear up against a wooden surface.

(IIRC, Mr. Gygax up and admitted that he'd introduced them into the game solely because the thieves in his party were stopping to listen at every single door, thereby slowing down play. Of course, I'm betting he didn't stop using scenarios that punish players for not listening at doors - I imagine that's how the practice of listening at every door became entrenched in the first place - so this creates a lovely little damned-if-you-do, damned-if-you-don't situation. :D)

And nothing wrong with those. :D

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9472136)

Yeah, that's the really annoying thing about the 2e mega-condensed entries. Creatures like horaxes, aspis and arathra get the short-end of the stick, because we people in the real world have no idea what they are (as opposed to a giant ant, fly or termite, which we can make reasonable mental images of).

What's the thing in the illustration riding a giant fly? Looks vaguely goblin-y, but not like any of the goblinoids in the book.

I'm not sure, to be honest. Irritatingly the MM doesn't provide sizes for the insects, so there's no way of knowing how big or small the creature would have to be. I love the picture, though.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9472216)

... maybe I just blocked that one from memory.

Well, it doesn't actually say 'laser beam'; the actual line is: "the giant firefly can brighten its abdomen once every turn, creating a beam of greenish light that causes 5d4 points of damage." But that's a laser beam in my book. ;)

David J Prokopetz

10-12-2008 02:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472339)

And nothing wrong with those. :D

Only to a point, to my mind. I'm sure you've seen my recent screeds about how the style of play a game's rules end up encouraging can be wildly different from the style of play the designer was actually going for. Contriving scenarios that punish players for playing as the rules encourage them to play rather than playing as the "flavour text" encourages them to play is only going to get you so far - eventually, you just have to bite the bullet and change the rules.

Azimer the Mad

10-12-2008 05:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I loved the mephit write-ups in Planescape. They weren't messengers, they were MESSAGES. Fiends would send the poor annoying schulbs as "gifts," and each write-up included the "meaning" of the mephit, from "I am plotting your death" to "you do not concern me." Like a winged, sarcastic horse head.

see

10-12-2008 05:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9472216)

Ear Seekers were also the reason our characters used to carry around hearing cones (with wire mesh-covered openings), in addition to our 10-ft poles, etc.

See, hearing cones should be standard anyway, since you'd get the same amplification effect as holding a glass to a door to hear through it. Anybody who put their ears to the door deserved an ear seeker for not having thought to bring a method of amplifying sounds heard through a door. :D

And a ten-foot pole? :eek: No, no, no. Go with a twelve-foot ox-tongue spear, which adds cutting to the things you can do a long way away as well as giving an extra two feet of length.

noisms

10-12-2008 05:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Azimer the Mad (Post 9472719)

I loved the mephit write-ups in Planescape. They weren't messengers, they were MESSAGES. Fiends would send the poor annoying schulbs as "gifts," and each write-up included the "meaning" of the mephit, from "I am plotting your death" to "you do not concern me." Like a winged, sarcastic horse head.

And then the poor unfortunate mephit gets torn apart, because what fiend gives a shit about shooting the messenger? ;)

JRM

10-12-2008 07:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472097)

[u]Aratha - I'm not sure what this is, actually, because there is no picture and the description is extremely terse. It has 8 tentacles and psionic powers, whatever it is.

The Aratha resembles a large beetle which has four 10' long mouth-tentacles that end with slicing shears where a normal beetle's mandibles would be. They originally appeared in Dragon magazine 89, where they're given the common name "Killer Beetle", with Aratha as an alternative name. They have the curious instinct that when they get too old and feel they will soon begin to weaken they go hunting for the most powerful enemy they can find, in order to die in a blaze of glory.

Oh and it's four tentacles, not eight.

They've turned up several times in games I've DM'd, just because I liked the look/feel of them. In my campaign they're animals from the Illithids' alien realm (four mouth tentacles, psionic powers - it's a pretty obvious deduction), although there's nothing in their Dragon magazine write-up that says this.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472097)

Aspis Cow, Aspis Drone, and Aspis Larva - I don't know what an Aspis is either, frankly. Some kind of ant thing from 1e?

Aspis are the bug-people from the Slave Lords series of modules (A1-A4). The male drones basically look like bipedal weevils with four arms they can wield weapons with - see the cover of A1 Slave Pits of the Undercity for an illustration of them. The larvae and adult females ("Aspis Cow") both look like oversized maggots, very oversized in the case of the ladies.

JRM

10-12-2008 07:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9472721)

See, hearing cones should be standard anyway, since you'd get the same amplification effect as holding a glass to a door to hear through it. Anybody who put their ears to the doordeserved an ear seeker for not having thought to bring a method of amplifying sounds heard through a door. :D

But then the DM introduces a door-monster that stuns its victims with a sonic blast, which the ear-trumpet makes you more vulnerable to.

The D&D monster-adventurer arms race must never end!:D

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9472721)

And a ten-foot pole? :eek: No, no, no. Go with a twelve-foot ox-tongue spear, which adds cutting to the things you can do a long way away as well as giving an extra two feet of length.

Definitely agree with you there, my characters usually use a spear rather than a pole - preferably one that unscrews into sections if you need to get through a tight squeeze. The really well prepared ones may have different attachments to screw on the end (e.g. a torch holder to burn objects at a distance; a hook and padded grasper to manipulate things), and the 'neck' of the spearhead had a Continual Light on it which could be obscured with a sliding lockable cover.

JRM

10-12-2008 07:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Azimer the Mad (Post 9472719)

I loved the mephit write-ups in Planescape. They weren't messengers, they were MESSAGES. Fiends would send the poor annoying schulbs as "gifts," and each write-up included the "meaning" of the mephit, from "I am plotting your death" to "you do not concern me." Like a winged, sarcastic horse head.

Oh that's a great idea.

I never got into any of 2nd editions' campaigns world back in the day, which I now regret since some of them, like Planescape, were really interesting.

Does that mean that if a pack of devils have a room full of mephits they send out a lot of form letters? Of the "Dear customer, thank you for your inquiry regarding the status of our agreement. Please be assured you will Burn In Tartarus For All Eternity!!" kind.

sim_james

10-12-2008 08:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9472136)

Yeah, that's the really annoying thing about the 2e mega-condensed entries. Creatures like horaxes, aspis and arathra get the short-end of the stick, because we people in the real world have no idea what they are (as opposed to a giant ant, fly or termite, which we can make reasonable mental images of).

I think that they're all "monster" insects rather than just really big bugs, and as such really needed their own entries.

If I recall correctly, Horax come from the Taladas campaign setting described in Zeb Cook's Time of the Dragon boxed set. They are desert carnivores from the Shining Land, and look a bit like 4' fleas with a hard, almost turtle-like shell. Naturally, you could make armour out of them - AC 3 or 4, I think.

There was a bit of details about their mating rituals that made my Dad laugh, but it's been almost fifteen years so I don't remember what they were. :p

Quote:

Originally Posted by Azimer the Mad (Post 9472719)

I loved the mephit write-ups in Planescape. They weren't messengers, they were MESSAGES. Fiends would send the poor annoying schulbs as "gifts," and each write-up included the "meaning" of the mephit, from "I am plotting your death" to "you do not concern me." Like a winged, sarcastic horse head.

Yeah, I remember that.

Explains why the irritating mephits like smokeys really exist - the fiends create them to be deliberately annoying!

JRM

10-12-2008 09:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9473057)

If I recall correctly, Horax come from the Taladas campaign setting described in Zeb Cook's Time of the Dragon boxed set. They are desert carnivores from the Shining Land, and look a bit like 4' fleas with a hard, almost turtle-like shell. Naturally, you could make armour out of them - AC 3 or 4, I think.

There was a bit of details about their mating rituals that made my Dad laugh, but it's been almost fifteen years so I don't remember what they were. :p

Did a bit of google-fu and what I came across suggests that your recollections are correct. Wikipedia's List of Advanced Dungeons & Dragons 2nd edition monsters says Horax's are from Time of the Dragon (1989) and appeared in the Monstrous Compendium - Dragonlance Appendix (1990), and there's an enworld post on "Critter Bits and Magic Recipes"* which says:

Monstrous Compendium Vol 4 (Dragonlance):

The back plates of the horax can be fashioned into a light-weight and durable armor (AC 4) by armorers experienced at handling the stuff. The Glass Sailors of Taladas are among the best in the world at this art.

*By the way noisms, the afore mentioned post should prove useful for your big book on making armour from monsters.

They also have a 3.0 D&D conversion for the Horax on the Dragonlance nexus.

Couldn't find any info on their mating practices, alas.:o

JRM

10-12-2008 09:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9473057)

Explains why the irritating mephits like smokeys really exist - the fiends create them to be deliberately annoying!

They did it just to be evil, the fiends!:eek:

Well I guess it is pretty fiendish to made a monster just to annoy people.:)

DMH

10-12-2008 10:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472097)

Dragonfly and Dragonfly Larva - The Giant Dragonfly eats its prey in mid-air; the larva eat them on the ground, but their mandibles are hidden out of sight so they can often represent a nasty surprise. (50% chance - our old friend exception based design, which we haven't seen in a while.)

They made the naiads terrestrial? Dragonflies are found around water because their nymphs are aquatic. And they have the coolest prey capture device.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Image:Dragonfly_larva.jpg

It isn't a larva btw, but under the head is a lower lip that extends out like a lobster claw. In the photo, you can see the hinge under the head. Some capture prey as large as themselves.

And they dropped the ball in this entry- where are cockroaches, tiger beetles and giant grasshoppers amongst many others?

JRM

10-13-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9473268)

They made the naiads terrestrial? Dragonflies are found around water because their nymphs are aquatic. And they have the coolest prey capture device.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Image:Dragonfly_larva.jpg

It isn't a larva btw, but under the head is a lower lip that extends out like a lobster claw. In the photo, you can see the hinge under the head. Some capture prey as large as themselves.

And they dropped the ball in this entry- where are cockroaches, tiger beetles and giant grasshoppers amongst many others?

Curiously enough, their full write-up in earlier AD&D sources* specified that giant dragonfly naiads are aquatic. I guess that fact just got squeezed out when shrunk the entry to fit into the Monstrous Manual. Even so, the entry implies dragonfly nymphs are at least amphibious - they have move 9" land, 3" swim, 24" jet (that's a water-jet speed like a giant squid).

*If I remember correctly, giant dragonflies debuted in Gary Gygax's The Land Beyond the Magic Mirror, later to reappear in the original Monster Manual II.

There's nothing wrong with calling them larva, since technically a nymph is a variety of insect larva.

EDIT: And I agree with you about the tiger beetles et al. There are plenty of other insects (and other arthropods) that would make great monsters.

MuscaDomestica

10-13-2008 02:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9473693)

There's nothing wrong with calling them larva, since technically a nymph is a variety of insect larva.

*EDIT: And I agree with you about the tiger beetles et al. There are plenty of other insects (and other arthropods) that would make great monsters.*

Tiger beetles are great, active predators that run down their prey.

<http://gallery.photo.net/photo/5922595-md.jpg>

Also their larvae are fun as well. They hide in holes and jump out when something comes near.

<http://farm4.static.flickr.com/3293/...be9e61.jpg?v=0>

(and technically a larva is the young from an insect that goes through complex/complete metamorphosis. Dragonflies do not so their young would be nymphs.)

JRM

10-13-2008 05:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MuscaDomestica (Post 9473817)

(and technically a larva is the young from an insect that goes through complex/complete metamorphosis. Dragonfly do not so their young would be nymphs.)

Oh sorry, I was trying to say that you can use larva in the general sense of an immature form of an animal that undergoes metamorphosis, while you're talking about holometabolic insects.

I'll agree that's its more correct to say dragonflies have nymphs (or naiads) for young.

As for tiger beetles, it's odd how few roleplaying games with giant insects feature them. The only one I can think of off the top of my head is RuneQuest, where trolls use them as guard and attack beasts (aka "Watch Beetles").

I also think carnivorous bugs like giant assassin bugs (Reduviidae) and water bugs (Nepomorpha) would make excellent monsters, but they're also often ignored in AD&D and most other roleplaying games. Giant water bugs (Belostomatidae) can grow as big as a hand in real life, just imagine how large a monstrous fantasy version of one of those would be!

DMH

10-13-2008 05:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Not only tiger beetles (what species is in that photo, House Fly?), but adult ant lions. How many people know what an owlfly or adult antlion are? Giant dragonfly stats could be used for them.

JRM

10-13-2008 06:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9474366)

Not only tiger beetles (what species is in that photo, House Fly?), but adult ant lions. How many people know what an owlfly or adult antlion are? Giant dragonfly stats could be used for them.

I'd drop their flight speed and maneuverability class since adult antlions are poor fliers compared to dragonflies. Plus, if I remember rightly not all antlions have predatory adults - some just eat nectar and pollen. Although, obviously if this is an AD&D version the adults will tend to be of the more carnivorous variety!

JRM

10-13-2008 07:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9474366)

Not only tiger beetles (what species is in that photo, House Fly?)

Well there are literally thousands of species of tiger beetle. I'm guessing it's a member of the Cicindela genus from its sandy-coloured body with white blobs on the side, since a lot of Cicindela like living on sand. (e.g. Cicindela repanda or Cicindela hybrida)

Kakita Kojiro

10-13-2008 11:04 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9474338)

As for tiger beetles, it's odd how few roleplaying games with giant insects feature them. The only one I can think of off the top of my head is RuneQuest, where trolls use them as guard and attack beasts (aka "Watch Beetles").

I think the reason is that Sandy Petersen is by training a biologist (before he went on to program Doom), whereas none of the D&D creators had that kind of background. That is why RQ had non-laser-bearing giant insects, trolls with their detailed cultures and biologies, prehistorical fauna appropriate to the climate for the Praxians to ride, etc.

... The reason I know this is that I got to listen to Sandy Petersen talk about it -- along with him going on a rant about how unrealistic the physics of giant insects are*. All the while, a biologist friend of mine was muttering under her breath in agreement.

D&D probably could've used a Sandy to polish up some of the odder monster concepts.

* he made an exception for giant spiders, since their lungs were scale-up-able. (edit: yes, I know spiders are not insects, but if the biologists were fine talking as though they were, I'm certainly not going to gainsay them.)

MuscaDomestica

10-13-2008 02:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Not sure the genus, found it in a GiS a while ago, uploaded it to my flickr account.

DMH

10-13-2008 08:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9473693)

There are plenty of other insects (and other arthropods) that would make great monsters.

Not just arthropods. There are plenty of worms* (see Dragon 133), echinoderms, molluscs and others that would make nifty critters.

*Not that worm is any way accurate as there are ~13 phyla that can be called worms.

Personally I would like to see a write up for kinorhynchans and arrow worms

The Last Conformist

10-13-2008 09:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Speaking of giant arthropods, it's a shame no RPG seems to feature eurypterids. The largest ones were over two meters in length.

DMH

10-13-2008 09:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Dragon 176 has eurypterids in Playing in the Paleozoic.

DMH

10-13-2008 09:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

They have ear seekers, but where are rot grubs? I can't find them in the MM or any of the annual MCs.

Has anyone taken the time to describe the adult form?

JRM

10-14-2008 02:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9476692)

They have ear seekers, but where are rot grubs? I can't find them in the MM or any of the annual MCs.

Has anyone taken the time to describe the adult form?

If I remember the Ecology of the Rot Grub article from Dragon #122 correctly an adult rot grub just looks like a larger juvenile. Indeed, calling them "grubs" may be a misnomer, since they're described as resembling flesh-burrowing worms more than the larval form of an insect.

Despite this, it would be cool if rot grubs were literally grubs. Maybe they're the immature form of flesh-eating scarabs? That makes a twisted sort of sense.

My memory might be failing me though, I'll just pull out my Dragon Magazine Archive CDs to check...

...yes, Ed Greenwood's Ecology article says that "rot grubs" can be adults, and that they're hermaphrodites. That's definitely more worm than insect. I think I can safely copy-and-paste the relevant extract under fair-use copyright rules:

...All of you know that a rot grub will burrow to the heart of a man or any larger, living, and blooded creature in a very short time. Know now that rot grubs do this in order to breed.

"Rot grubs need flesh soaked in blood and rich in oxygen, such as that of the heart, in which to lay their eggs, for only in such an environment can the eggs be fertilized. They burrow there by instinct and lay a cluster of from six to a dozen eggs even if no other rot grub is present to fertilize the clutch. My experiments have shown that all grubs can lay eggs, and all can fertilize the eggs of others, although apparently not their own." Noting some stirring from the front rows, the sage lowered the wooden probe and gently poked at the mutton. "We are safe," he said, "so long as our friend is occupied."

The comment drew no laughter. The sage then reached into a pocket in his robes and brought out a slim, firmly-stoppered glass phial. "These are a bit small, but it is perilous to expose them to the air so near a live rot grub. In this phial are four rot grub eggs: small, green-white rubbery spheres a little less than the size of your smallest fingernail. As I've said, one rot grub lays a clutch of these, and if another rot grub comes into contact with the host creature, it will also burrow to the heart, locate the eggs by the scent and burrowing tube left by its predecessor, and exude a red, viscous fluid from its mouth as it rolls the eggs about and examines them. This fluid penetrates the outer skin of the eggs. If the second rot grub arrives within twenty minutes of the laying of the eggs, successful fertilization occurs. Otherwise, the eggs die.

“Fertilized eggs and grubs can survive for long periods in carrion, even entombed corpses, or anywhere that affords protection from crushing, air, water, and extremes of temperature. They cease to move and function, and thus cease to require food, air, or like sustenance. The rot grub in this meat can wait here for a very long time for a live host — precisely how long, my knowledge at present does not answer, but at least two centuries, as the opening of the tomb of King Eurovan of the now-vanished realm of Nuvorene attests; a tomb-robber was slain by rot grubs then. In such a suspended state does the rot grub lie until vibration, the actual movement of their ‘home’ meat, or contact with warm, living flesh awakens it.”

MuscaDomestica

10-14-2008 06:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I think it would be cooler if the adult form of the Rot grub (there are beetles that have larvae that can reproduce) was some sort of beautiful harmless flying creature... has anyone seen baby fairies before?

DMH

10-14-2008 06:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Fraggle Rock, though I don't remember the name of the critter that was infesting the Gorgs' garden.

As for rot grubs, they could be pedogenic (ie larvae that produce larvae, as MD said) but I would rather see some kind of adult.

When I get back on my computer, I have a quote from Dragon 211's Ecology of the Dungeon that provides a unusual use for rot grubs.

DMH

10-14-2008 09:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

And here is that quote.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Dragon 211

Not all the trash, however, would make it to the dump pit. Many humanoids are lazy and environmentally unconscious. Garbage of the most unpleasant kind may be found throughout the caverns of a dungeon. Piles of gunl and carcasses are in many rooms, a few covering secret chests of "treasure". When dealing with refuse, remember that any mention of trash makes experienced players think of rot grubs, otyughs, and other unpleasant monsters. In many adventures, I have casually stated that the player characters can see wormlike creatures moving through the filth. While these things were nothing more than normal worms, maggots, grubs, and carrion slugs (gross but not deadly), the PCs didn't know this. To my amusement, they went through all kinds of trouble to destroy these beasties and sort through the trash. ("If there are rot grubs, then there must be some kind of treasure".) Simple parasites can cause as much fear and worry in a group of PCs as a lair of trolls.

demiurge1138

10-14-2008 10:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Those death's head beetles over in the B section would make good adult forms for rot grubs, methink.

noisms

10-14-2008 01:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MuscaDomestica (Post 9478391)

I think it would be cooler if the adult form of the Rot grub (there are beetles that have larvae that can reproduce) was some sort of beautiful harmless flying creature... has anyone seen baby fairies before?

Now that is an idea worth stealing.

Wakboth

10-14-2008 01:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

This is pretty off-topic, but while we're on the subject of giant insects:
<http://www.wesleyfleming.com/gallery/index.htm>

If those were made of plastic, they'd make perfect giant insect figures! :)

DMH

10-14-2008 07:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9479420)

Those death's head beetles over in the B section would make good adult forms for rot grubs, methink.

They are in the MC Annual 3.

Crinos

10-14-2008 10:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9480716)
They are in the MC Annual 3.

I thought those were death WATCH beetles.

demiurge1138

10-15-2008 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9480716)
They are in the MC Annual 3.

They are? Really?

goes off to check

Well I'll be. So how the hell do I know about them, then? I blame the Tome of Horrors.

JRM

10-15-2008 05:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9480004)
*This is pretty off-topic, but while we're on the subject of giant insects:
<http://www.wesleyfleming.com/gallery/index.htm>*

If those were made of plastic, they'd make perfect giant insect figures! :)

Oh those are lovely, and just the right size as well. Shame they're made of glass.

JRM

10-15-2008 05:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9479420)

Those death's head beetles over in the B section would make good adult forms for rot grubs, methink.

Death's head beetles? Those don't ring a bell. AD&D has death watch beetles, but I'd think they're too big to be the adult form of rot grubs - rot grubs are only a few inches long, and death watch beetles are as big as a man.

Quote:

Originally Posted by MuscaDomestica (Post 9478391)

I think it would be cooler if the adult form of the Rot grub (there are beetles that have larvae that can reproduce) was some sort of beautiful harmless flying creature... has anyone seen baby fairies before?

Yes, that could work. They could be like antlions, with young far more ravenous than the adults. How about if they can lay eggs in both 'grub' and 'flier' form, and only metamorphose into a winged form when they run out of carrion?

DMH

10-15-2008 06:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

A great way to increase the use of insects is via Are You Bugged About Something? in Dragon 174. Amongst other abilities, there is the massive strength, metal laced exoskeletons (which is somewhat true), senses and resistance to toxins.

The strength section was esp interesting- a giant bumblebee can lift more than 50 tons (if a man sized version can lift 50 tons, then a larger species should be able to lift more). Use that for hornets and wasps and they could be elephant predators.

And that could also be a way of making the aforementioned 12' long rhino beetles that much more dangerous. Or possibly useful.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita

 he made an exception for giant spiders, since their lungs were scale-up-able.*

Oxygen exchange is just one of several problems for large arthropods. They would need some chemical much stronger than chitin to get to the size of the ants in Them!.

demiurge1138

10-15-2008 10:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9483034)

Death's head beetles? Those don't ring a bell. AD&D has death watch beetles, but I'd think they're too big to be the adult for of rot grubs - rot grubs are only a few inches long, and death watch beetles are as big as a man.

Yeah, those are what I was thinking of. The size difference is a bit of an issue--but perhaps rot grubs pupate dramatically in the bodies of those adventurers they kill.

Kakita Kojiro

10-15-2008 11:46 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9483324)

The strenght section was esp interesting- a giant bumblebee can lift more than 50 tons (if a man sized version can lif 50 tons, then a larger species should be able to lift more). Use that for hornets and wasps and they could be elephan predators.

I have long thought that anyone who put giant bees into their games and did not immediately slap reins and saddles on 'em and mount up goblins or what have you is a fool -- a fool, I tell you!

Alas, I've got that aforementioned biologist in my gaming group, and all of her Stern Looks sucked the fun out of me going "bzzz!bzzz!" as my nefarious Bee Goblins swooped in to attack. :(

But, heck, maybe I should've slapped minotaurs on 'em with that carrying capacity! I can weather a few Stern Looks for bee-mounted aerial minotaur cavalry, I think.

JRM

10-15-2008 07:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9483324)

A great way to increase the use of insects is via Are You Bugged About Something? in Dragon 174. Amongst other abilities, there is the massive strength, metal laced exoskeletons (which is somewhat true), senses and resistance to toxins.

The strenght section was esp interesting- a giant bumblebee can lift more than 50 tons (if a man sized version can lif 50 tons, then a larger species should be able to lift more). Use that for hornets and wasps and they could be elephan predators.

Only if you ignore the square-cube rule. The author clearly didn't allow for the fact that tiny creatures are much stronger because they've got more cross-sectional area in proportion to their volume. If you magically shrink a human down to the size of an ant and leave all their physiological efficiency intact they'd likely be stronger than said ant.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9483324)

Oxygen exchange is just one of several problems for large arthropods. They would need some chemical much stronger than chitin to get to the size of the ants in Them!.

Plus gigantic land arthropods would collapse in a dying heap while moulting (Euryperids got away with it because they're aquatic, so had water to support their weight after shedding their old skin).

Not to mention that they'd need lots of anatomical changes for their metabolism to work at the levels that AD&D giant insects imply - new hearts and guts as well as new lungs. That's just to walk about and digest food well enough to compete with ground reptiles and mammals. I dread to think what nature would need to do to the insides of an 8' long wasp to allow it to fly in an Earth-type atmosphere.

DMH

10-15-2008 10:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9485678)

Only if you ignore the square-cube rule. The author clearly didn't allow for the fact that tiny creatures are much stronger because they've got more cross-sectional area in proportion to their volume. If you magically shrink a human down to the size of an ant and leave all their physiological efficiency intact they'd likely be stronger than said ant.

??

Uh, why not just scale up their abilities and make giant insects cooler? Or, why don't you read my response on giant beetles with wings upthread.

noisms

10-15-2008 11:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9485678)

If you magically shrink a human down to the size of an ant and leave all their physiological efficiency intact they'd likely be stronger than said ant.

Now there's an idea for a campaign. The Incredible Shrinking Adventurers. Or Honey, I Shrank the Dwarf!

noisms

10-15-2008 11:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

By the way, I think the Insect entry has officially generated the most traffic for this thread. I wouldn't have predicted that at the beginning.

DMH

10-16-2008 12:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

It helps there are at least 3 entomologists (professional or amateur) posting about it. Though I wonder if the hydra or crabman entries have been longer.

David J Prokopetz

10-16-2008 12:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9486305)

Though I wonder if the hydra or crabman entries have been longer.

If only we had an obscure Latin plural to quibble about.

DMH

10-16-2008 12:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Or we could quibble over some of the misinformation in the first post on insects.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9472097)

Ant, Giant - There are worker and soldier varieties, plus a queen with 10 HD. The No. Appearing is only 1-100, which suppose it would have to be in the interests of maintaining a sensible game world. Imagine if a Giant Ants' nest was as populous as an ants' nest is in real life - millions upon millions of the buggers stripping the world of all its nutrient until it resembled a barren wilderness.

There aren't that many species of ants with huge colonies. That is more of a termite thing. Some ants live in acorns and have less than 10 workers.

Quote:

Bee, Worker and Bee, Soldier - You know what these are, I'll wager.

Bumblebee - These too. Again, you have to wonder what the world would be like if the numbers of giant insects matched their real-world counterparts; but a nest apparently only contains 1d6+6 of the things.

There is no such thing as a soldier bee (at least among the honeybees, I don't know about the stingless species). The adults have different jobs in the hive depending on their age and defense is just one amongst several.

Bumbles have smaller colonies than honeybees and a few dozen is average.

And speaking of stingless bees (Meliponini), they would make a great addition. A famous entomologist (Wheeler) got skin on his face burned off by a colony- they have an acidic spit.

Quote:

Fly, Giant Bluebottle and Fly, Giant Horsefly - Self explanatory, really.

They missed out by not including bots and screw worms.

Quote:

Termite, Giant Harvester - The neat trick of the termite is to spit kerosene, which blinds victims and can then be ignited to cause more damage.

Kerosene? There are termites that "spit" liquid (nasute soldiers) that act as glue.

And ticks should have been in the spider entry.

Kakita Kojiro

10-16-2008 12:52 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by David J Prokopetz (Post 9486413)
If only we had an obscure Latin plural to quibble about.

Well, there's "Aratha" and "Horax" to quibble over -- "arathae" and "horaces",* perhaps. And "Aspis" would probably go to "aspes".

* wait, is "aratha" singular or plural?

* and, really, "horaxes" sounds like something that Harry Potter should be off collecting.

JRM

10-16-2008 04:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9486097)

??

Uh, why not just scale up their abilities and make giant insects cooler? Or, why don't you read my response on giant beetles with wings upthread.

Because it wouldn't just make things cooler if the DM wants to allow for the ramifications. If you have giant insects' strength scale up as their volume scales as you suggest, so you have bumblebees with the payload capacity of C-17 Cargomasters and then they'd out-power all rhinoceros beetles that are literally "stronger than a speeding locomotive" they'd have a major impact on the environment.

They'd be many times stronger than mammals and reptiles and would outbreed them by several magnitudes as well - they'd wipe out most of the large non-insect fauna in a matter of years. It'd be like the film Them! with the giant ants reinforced by lots of other titanic arthropods, all as strong as superheroes.

JRM

10-16-2008 04:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9486225)

Now there's an idea for a campaign. The Incredible Shrinking Adventurers. Or Honey, I Shrunk the Dwarf!

There was an adventure in a Dungeon adventure (Chadranther's Bane in Dungeon #18) based around a magical orb that shrunk humanoids in a garden to the size of insects.

I've toyed with the idea of having something similar in my campaign, but in reverse - a section of countryside were some magical accident causes all the tiny lifeforms to grow to giant size, but they quickly die if they leave its aura.

If you're into GURPS there's some good material on running a "microhuman" campaign on TBone's GURPS website, particularly Book 8 of the "GULLIVER" section.

JRM

10-16-2008 04:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9486515)

Well, there's "Aratha" and "Horax" to quibble over -- "arathae" and "horaces", perhaps. And "Aspis" would probabl* go to "aspes".

* wait, is "aratha" singular or plural?

* and, really, "horaxes" sounds like something that Harry Potter should be off collecting.

If I recall correctly, "Aratha" is singular and plural.

JRM

10-16-2008 04:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9486495)

Or we could quibble over some of the misinformation in the first post on insects.

snip examples

Plus, the AD&D assassin bug has very little resemblance to the real-life version, being a vaguely wasp-like flying insect whose males paralyze humanoids so their females can implant eggs into them. At least that's how I remember them from the original Fiend Folio.

That's a perfectly valid lifestyle for a monstrous fantasy insect, riffing off things like Ichneumon wasps. I just wish AD&D called them something different and statted up a giant version of Reduviidae as Assassin Bugs.

The Last Conformist

10-16-2008 05:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9485678)

Plus gigantic land arthropods would collapse in a dying heap while moulting (Eurypterids got away with it because they're aquatic, so had water to support their weight after shedding their old skin).

You could have, however, an aquatically moulting giant arthropod that still spends most of its time on land. Arthropleura (a milliped-like critter about the size of the largest eurypterids) may have been like this; at least, it was a huge arthropod that left a lot of foot prints on land.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9486515)

And "Aspis" would probably go to "aspes".

Assuming the word to be the same as aspis "shield", a word common in the scientific names of armoured organisms (eg. Cephalaspis, an armoured fish), the plural is aspides.

DMH

10-16-2008 06:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9487283)

Because it wouldn't just make things cooler if the DM wants to allow for the ramifications. If you have giant insects' strength scale up as their volume scales as you suggest, so you have bumblebees with the payload capacity of C-17 Cargomasters and then they'd out-power all rhinoceros beetles that are literally "stronger than a speeding locomotive" they'd have a major impact on the environment.

I don't understand your objection. Like dragons, orcs, undead, etc., these creatures are optional and an article that enhances their use is a bonus in my book. And how can you mention the environment- it is filled with giants, dragons and other super powered monsters already.

Quote:

They'd be many times stronger than mammals and reptiles and would outbreed them by several magnitudes as well - they'd wipe out most of the large non-insect fauna in a matter of years. It'd be like the film Them! with the giant ants reinforced by lots of other titanic arthropods, all as strong as superheroes.

There are several ways around this- sterile wizard creations, egg and larval predators, reduced fecundity (is that a word?), limitations on habitat, population control by intelligent races, divine controls, diet dependency, hell they could be druid created.

randomgamer8466

10-16-2008 08:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9485678)

Only if you ignore the square-cube rule. The author clearly didn't allow for the fact that tiny creatures are much stronger because they've got more cross-sectional area in proportion to their volume. If you magically shrink a human down to the size of an ant and leave all their physiological efficiency intact they'd likely be stronger than said ant.

Really? Marvel Comics has been brainwashing me with this "proportional strength of an insect/spider" nonsense for so long, I'd developed a species-inferiority complex.

I'm going to take that shrinking potion and go whip some bugs' asses.

noisms

10-16-2008 04:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Intellect Devourer

From the sublime to the ridiculous. Well, the previous entry wasn't really sublime, but this is definitely ridiculous. I'm afraid the Intellect Devourer is where I get off the Psionic Monster Bus. I mean, it's a brain on legs, everybody. A BRAIN ON LEGS.

If you don't know or haven't encountered the Intellect Devourer before, the basic precis (other than IT'S A BRAIN ON LEGS) is that it's a nasty little bugger that lives to hunt down psionic creatures or characters, destroy their brain (devour their intellect, one might say), then implant itself in their head and use the body to hunt for more victims. They are typically raised as 'watch dogs' by Illithids, who also enjoy snacking on the larvae.

The Intellect Devourer is definitely one of those creatures which were thrown in more or less entirely to restore game balance; psionic characters were too powerful and there needed to be a way for DMs to get at them. Hence a creature which can only be hit by +3 or better enchanted weapons, takes only 1 hp of damage per hit even with such weapons, is immune to fire, has a movement of 15, and gives birth to young which are specially geared up to mess with psionics' heads in the worst possible way.

To return to a well-worn theme, I also have to say I find the inclusion of psionic monsters in the MM irksome. I liked the idea of psionics, unlike most, and was even relatively pleased with the execution. But they weren't core rules, and monsters whose use necessitated the purchase of the Psionics Handbook should not have been included in a core book. It was a waste of space, and even as an 11 year old I remember feeling mightily jipped that I couldn't use around 5% of the monsters in the volume.

Rant over! :D

demiurge1138

10-16-2008 04:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I loves me some o' them brain-puppies, yes I do. I think they're sublimely ridiculous.

kelvingreen

10-16-2008 05:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9490254)

If you don't know or haven't encountered the Intellect Devourer before, the basic precis (other than IT'S A BRAIN ON LEGS) is that it's a nasty little bugger that lives to hunt down psionic creatures or characters, destroy their brain (devour their intellect, one might say), then implant itself in their head and use the body to hunt for more victims.

See, and that makes me want to use them. They are ridiculous at first glance, but I think they can work, either by playing up the strangeness, or going for a Body Snatchers approach and attempting some Barkeresque body horror. The idea of the brain of a fallen foe detaching itself and either running away or attacking one of the heroes seems like something from The Thing, if played right. I've often lamented that D&D lacks an equivalent to the brilliant Gonchong from Fighting Fantasy, but the Intellect Devourer might fit that niche.

6inTruder

10-17-2008 11:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

There's an old D&D painting that I think became one of the tab-sheets for the Forgotten Realms appendix 1 that had like, a Drow woman, a Beholder and some kind of Dwarf all in some odd underwater luxury suite. And I could swear there were rotwiler sized Intellect Devourers in it too. (note: in the MM the ID is like... 6" big) edit: Huzza!

<http://www.candlekeep.com/images/gallery/beholder.jpg>

JasonK

10-17-2008 11:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Oh! I remember that picture!

It's fucking absurd...

~ jason

g026r

10-17-2008 11:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

It was also the cover to the first ed. sourcebook FR1: Waterdeep & the North

Crinos

10-17-2008 01:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9493649)
Oh! I remember that picture!

It's fucking absurd...

~ jason

I just love that look of boredom/disgust the beholder has.

It's like he see's the PC's and he's like "Oh bloody hell, I thought I ordered a PRIVATE suite."

David J Prokopetz

10-17-2008 02:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Crinos (Post 9493996)
I just love that look of boredom/disgust the beholder has.

It's like he see's the PC's and he's like "Oh bloody hell, I thought I ordered a PRIVATE suite."

He's not the only one with a look of exasperation, either.

Say what you will about 1E art, but I maintain that half the fun of those sourcebooks is looking at the full page illustrations and trying to figure out what, precisely, they're meant to depict. :D

JRM

10-17-2008 09:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9487684)
You could have, however, an aquatically moulting giant arthropod that still spends most of its time on land. Arthropleura (a milliped-like critter about the size of the largest eurypterids) may have been like this; at least, it was a huge arthropod that left a lot of foot prints on land.

Yes, plus aquatic giant scorpions back in the Silurian period may have been able to venture on land - considering some of these grew up to a yard long, such as Brontoscorpio, they'd make effective D&D monsters without having to monkey around with their size.

noisms

10-17-2008 09:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Invisible Stalker

Hooray! Been waiting for this one for a while. Oh, how I chuckled when I turned that page. Is this the most famous (and least funny) designer joke in the history of RPGs? Although I remember feeling good about myself when I first found the 'easter egg' in the MM credits, attributing the Invisible Stalker artwork to Zeb Cook.

Unfortunately the Invisible Stalker itself is one of those nothing-to-write-home-about, quickly-turn-over-the-page monsters. It's really not at all dissimilar to the air elemental, being a creature from the elemental plane of air who is summoned to the prime material plane by a wizard and forced to carry out tasks. (Usually these revolve around 'stalking', as the Stalker has the ability to track a target unerringly provided they stay within a day behind.) Admittedly, Stalkers are slightly more interesting, in that air elementals just have a tendency to go apeshit when summoned, whereas Invisible Stalkers will try to pervert the caster's commands in more passive aggressive fashion. The example given in the book is a caster asking the Stalker to keep him safe from all harm - whereupon he is whisked away to a secret location on the elemental plane of air with no means to get home - but he is safe! A creative DM could have a lot of fun with that - a similar form of fun to that involved with the interpretation of the wording of wish spells.

JRM

10-17-2008 09:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9487761)

I don't understand your objection. Like dragons, orcs, undead, etc., these creatures are optional and an article that enhances their use is a bonus in my book. And how can you mention the environment- it is filled with giants, dragons and other super powered monsters already.

It's a matter of degree, if you scale insects' strength up by volume then going by AD&D strength scaling you'd be giving 3' long giant ants the strength of Titans. They actually work out stronger than titans but Str 25 is the highest the rules allow for.

Thus, I prefer my giant insects to have more "realistic" strengths for an animal of their size - they may be at the high end of the strength/toughness scale, but I don't fancy super-insects.

JRM

10-17-2008 09:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9488214)

Really? Marvel Comics has been brainwashing me with this "proportional strength of an insect/spider" nonsense for so long, I'd developed a species-inferiority complex.

I'm going to take that shrinking potion and go whip some bugs' asses.

Yup, let's run some numbers - say you're a 6' (1830mm) human who can lift his own weight (175 lbs?) who shrinks down to the size of a ¼" (6mm) ant. Going by the square-cube rule your proportional strength will increase by a factor of 288 (72 inches divided by 0.25 inches), so you can lift the equivalent of 50,400 pounds (288 times 175) or some twenty five short tons. I believe that's more than an ant can manage, and remember human body-builders can hoist much greater weights than that.

JRM

10-17-2008 10:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9490254)

Intellect Devourer

I've liked the Intellect Devourer since my first Monster Manual, there was just something about the brain-with-claws that appealed to my sense of the macabre. That said, I don't like how they got devalued in later editions of D&D.

The 1st edition Intellect Devourer had genius intelligence, and there was no mention of them being domesticated animals for illithids. If anything, they would be rivals/threats to the mind flayers - an intellect devourer wouldn't half fancy munching on the the big, juicy brain inside those mauve, tentacled head.

Still, if they did work for illithids they'd make excellent spies/infiltrators - just get an intellect devourer to insert itself into an enemy's skull and the mind flayers have got themselves an instant inside agent.

demiurge1138

10-20-2008 04:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Invisible stalkers are one of those monsters I use very rarely, because they sit on what I call the "fun divide". They have one real power, invisibility. If the PCs have no way to overcome that obstacle, the players don't have much fun struggling with something they can barely hit. If they can overcome the obstacle, the invisible stalker loses its only real oomph, and it become not fun for the DM to run, just a fighty slog.

That said, I did run one memorable invisible stalker encounter, from a module (Hall of Harsh Reflections from the Age of Worms AP, for those keeping score). The party was moving through a warehouse converted into a doppelganger safe-house, and came across a room comprised mostly of narrow, slippery, rotting balance beams suspended over a moat of diseased, spike-filled water. My players are clever people, and this instantly screamed "TRAP!" to them. It was. There were two invisible stalkers waiting in the room for people to cross, whereupon they'd start pushing them off the beams and onto the spikes below.

So the party ranger sends her animal companion, an eagle, in to investigate. And I describe it something like this: "Angel Feathers (the eagle's name, some video game reference) flies into the room and begins to swoop along its perimeter. It begins to fly back, calling as if to indicate 'all clear'. Not ten feet before it reaches you, however, it stops dead in the air, its neck broken in a single wet snap, as if it ran into an invisible wall. Angel Feathers drops like a stone into the filthy water without making a sound."

You should have seen the looks on their faces. The actual fight wasn't great, though--they picked the two stalkers out with glitterdust and let them rush them, rather than move onto the OBVIOUS TRAP. But at least the intro was neat.

Jack of None

10-20-2008 04:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9490254)

They are typically raised as 'watch dogs' by Illithids, who also enjoy snacking on the larvae.

It seems like you wouldn't want to raise guard animals that you could also eat like popcorn.

One mind flayer with a sweet tooth has a bad day tending the elder brain, and voila, you've lost most of this year's brood.

noisms

10-20-2008 12:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ixitxachitl

Everybody's favourite pseudo-Aztec-sounding race of evil intelligent manta rays. I'd dearly love to know if these have any sort of basis whatsoever in Mesoamerican mythology or if they just came completely from the twisted psyche of Dave Arneson. Either way, they're undoubtedly one of the coolest/weirdest D&D bad guy races, although the MM picture naturally doesn't do them justice - is that Ixitxachitl smiling?

I've always wanted to run a campaign in which there is a lost-Atlantis style city submerged in the ocean. It was built by a race of Cthulu-esque Great Old Ones who long ago (supposedly) disappeared, and in the mean time the city was repopulated by Ixitxachitl, who took to worshiping its mysterious statues, pyramids and obelisks. As they could not read the city's hieroglyphs or understand the true nature of its monuments, they invented a new religion for what they found, with a new pantheon of gods. Over the millenia their numbers swelled and their religion took on a life of its own - so that this new invented pantheon of gods actually became real.

Except, it turns out, the Great Old Ones never disappeared. They were just slumbering under the city. And now they are going to return from the depths to crush this upstart pantheon of made-up powers...

JRM

10-21-2008 06:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9503873)

Ixitxachitl

Everybody's favourite pseudo-Aztec-sounding race of evil intelligent manta rays. I'd dearly love to know if these have any sort of basis whatsoever in Mesoamerican mythology or if they just came completely from the twisted psyche of Dave Arneson. Either way, they're undoubtedly one of the coolest/weirdest D&D bad guy races, although the MM picture naturally doesn't do them justice - is that Ixitxachitl smiling?

Look, it's a Chaotic Evil demon-worshiping devilfish that enjoys torture, slavery and human sacrifice. If it's smiling, you should be worried.

How is Ixitxachitl culture supposed to work, I wonder. Their civilization must depend almost entirely on their marine humanoid slaves, who they need to build/carve all their lairs, temples, cities et cetera. The write up says slaves are used "to do heavy labor", but these demon rays don't even have hands, so how do they get all the light labour and precision crafts finished? Maybe those flexible "horns" on either side of their mouths are prehensile.

They may do nasty damage with their barbed tails (3-12), but they're pretty slow swimmers (12") - both mermen (18") and tritons (15") can simply swim away from them, so I'm thinking ixitxachitl must clip their slaves' fins so they can't easily escape.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9503873)

I've always wanted to run a campaign in which there is a lost-Atlantis style city submerged in the ocean. It was built by a race of Cthulu-esque Great Old Ones who long ago (supposedly) disappeared, and in the mean time the city was repopulated by Ixitxachitl, who took to worshipping its mysterious statues, pyramids and obelisks. As they could not read the city's hieroglyphs or understand the true nature of its monuments, they invented a new religion for what they found, with a new pantheon of gods. Over the millenia their numbers swelled and their religion took on a life of its own - so that this new invented pantheon of gods actually became real.

Except, it turns out, the Great Old Ones never disappeared. They were just slumbering under the city. And now they are going to return from the depths to crush this upstart pantheon of made-up powers...

That's got potential. I'm thinking some of the ixitxachitl would start worshipping the Great Old Ones, since CE creatures can be pretty fickle in their favours - especially if they start making sushi of their current pantheon. Then you can have a religious war between their worshippers as well as the gods themselves.

demiurge1138

10-21-2008 09:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Ixitxachitl have been associated variably with the cult of Demogorgon, which is an angle I like. They're freakish enough that a two-headed tentacle-baboon would appeal to them. I'd also probably affiliate them with Dagon, who (in D&D at least) straddles the "Great Old One" and "Demon Prince" niches.

Maybe their tails are prehensile? They could hold things in their head-claspers and hold the tool in their tail for precision work.

kelvingreen

10-21-2008 05:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Or perhaps (gasp) they're a truly alien culture, and have no need for fine crafts. Perhaps all their artworks are writ large on vast slabs of basalt beneath the ocean waves.

TavishArtair

10-21-2008 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

This is D&D. If you're a race that doesn't have hands, you can substitute for them for most purposes using a dazzling variety of spells and psionic powers. Even if only a few individuals amongst your society, say, one in ten, have these abilities, you probably have enough to get done whatever you really need doing if your race has any sort of fecundity.

Kapten

10-21-2008 05:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Details are the enemies of mystery. Neither the players nor the DM needs to know how the Itx-whatever (difficult name) makes their art objects. They are alien and they are evil, unexplainable architecture makes them more scary and weird.

JRM

10-21-2008 09:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9507535)

Ixitxachitl have been associated variably with the cult of Demogorgon, which is an angle I like. They're freakish enough that a two-headed tentacle-baboon would appeal to them. I'd also probably affiliate them with Dagon, who (in D&D at least) straddles the "Great Old One" and "Demon Prince" niches.

I was going to mention old' baboon-heads, who the devil-rays have been worshiping since 1st edition. I'm assuming they dropped mention of him in the Monstrous Compendium due the 2nd editions shyness about mentioning demon and demon-worship, due to a concern about controversy. The 3.0 versions of Demogorgon reinstated the connection, and Dagon would be a good fit as well going by his latest writeup in Dragon magazine #349.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9507535)

Maybe their tails are prehensile? They could hold things in their head-claspers and hold the tool in their tail for precision work.

I'd thought of the prehensile tail possibility, but felt all those barbs would get in the way of fine manipulation so went for head-claspers instead. Although they could use their mouths/tongues as well. Some rays are skilled at manipulating shellfish with their lips, teeth and tongues, so they can crack them open and eat the good bit while spitting out all the shell. Maybe Ixitxachitl have a highly sophisticated form of this?

JRM

10-21-2008 10:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9508879)

Or perhaps (gasp) they're a truly alien culture, and have no need for fine crafts. Perhaps all their artworks are writ large on vast slabs of basalt beneath the ocean waves.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9508895)

Details are the enemies of mystery. Neither the players nor the DM needs to know how the Itx-whatever (difficult name) makes their art objects. They are alien and they are evil, unexplainable architecture makes them more scary and weird.

To my mind, Ixixachitl should certainly be scary and alien to the players, but not necessarily to the DM, who may want some background framework to decide what their devil-rays are capable of and inclined towards doing. Giving them a sense of weirdness will mostly depend on the DM's presentation in the end, so why not help them out with some background ideas about how a non-human sapient like a devil-ray might live?

As for unexplainable architecture, I'm afraid 2nd edition AD&D's Monstrous Manual and the super-adventure The Night Below are pretty clear about what ixixachitl architecture is for (dwelling places and temples to demonic entities), and how it's built (lots of slaves). I was a bit disappointed in the Night Below's ixixachitl architecture, it just wasn't strange enough. I'd have liked it to have been some weird twisted creation of basalt and living coral that surface-dwellers would have difficulty recognizing as a city, rather than having easily identifiable ziggurats.

Kapten

10-21-2008 10:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9509502)

To my mind, Ixixachitl should certainly be scary and alien to the players, but not necessarily to the DM, who may want some background framework to decide what their devil-rays are capable of and inclined towards doing. Giving them a sense of weirdness will mostly depend on the DM's presentation in the end, so why not help them out with some background ideas about how a non-human sapient like a devil-ray might live?

My POV is that if I make something logical in my mind, it's still logical to a human being (that is, to me). If I make it bizarre to my mind but still place it there, it will become truly bizarre. In this case, I would let the Ixi:s be violent, unwilling to talk and wail away with their tails. All of this in a backdrop of advanced architecture and art that would make the PCs and players go "how the heck did they make this? They have no hands!"

JRM

10-21-2008 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by TavishArtair (Post 9508884)

This is D&D. If you're a race that doesn't have hands, you can substitute for them for most purposes using a dazzling variety of spells and psionic powers. Even if only a few individuals amongst your society, say, one in ten, have these abilities, you probably have enough to get done whatever you really need doing if your race has any sort of fecundity

Maybe that's the origin of their worship of Demogorgon? About 10% of the Ixixachitl population are priests/clerics. If they're the only ones capable of fine manipulation due to some gift of Demogorgon (prehensile retractile tentacles? a Spiritual Hand spell?) it would have given his cult an enormous advantage.

My other idea was their write-up says the priests can use spells of the Charm school. Perhaps that's how they control the slave population, instead of using brute force? I like the idea that the more powerful priests can Dominate humanoids by wrapping their bodies around them and use the humanoid as a puppet to perform actions the rays are physically incapable of, although maybe that works better as a variant for Psionic or Vampire Ixixachitls.

Now I'm thinking this hypothetical psionic ixixachitl variant developed sound-based mind-influencing powers and telekinetic flight, then left the water and became Cloakers. It'd be nice to have some relationship between the two species, them both being malignant ray-shaped monsters that congregate in mysterious cities.

JRM

10-21-2008 10:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 9509513)

My POV is that if I make something logical in my mind, it's still logical to a human being (that is, to me). If I make it bizarre to my mind but still place it there, it will become truly bizarre. In this case, I would let the Ixi:s be violent, unwilling to talk and wail away with their tails. All of this in a backdrop of advanced architecture and art that would make the PCs and players go "how the heck did they make this? They have no hands!"

Well having strange creatures do weird stuff that makes no human sense because they're alien is a perfectly reasonable approach, such as Dragonewts in RuneQuest or the way MAR Barker said Empire of the Petal Throne players shouldn't have alien characters, since they wouldn't be able to roleplay their non-human thinking.

Although it's not for everyone, some DMs like a firmer grasp of the how & why of things, and 2nd edition is probably the edition of D&D that leaned most strongly toward this simulationist style of campaign. 3rd edition was probably more simulationist as a rule-set, but didn't go into much depth as to how a typical D&D world worked, with scant details about monster ecology and the like.

noisms

10-21-2008 11:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9509569)

Although it's not for everyone, some DMs like a firmer grasp of the how & why of things, and 2nd edition is probably the edition of D&D that leaned most strongly toward this simulationist style of campaign. 3rd edition was probably more simulationist as a rule-set, but didn't go into much depth as to how a typical D&D world worked, with scant details about monster ecology and the like.

From what I gather 4e has gone even further in that direction. I have to say I think both styles have their advantages and disadvantages, but generally speaking I probably prefer the 2e way on balance.

Kakita Kojiro

10-22-2008 12:30 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9503873)

Everybody's favourite pseudo-Aztec-sounding race of evil intelligent manta rays. I'd dearly love to know if these have any sort of basis whatsoever in Mesoamerican mythology or if they just came completely from the twisted psyche of Dave Arneson...

This is the sort of stuff that I think would be very interesting to learn -- Old Geezer occasionally drops some gems from his experiences, but it would be nice to have some resource to go to for this sort of stuff. D&D has been around long enough that I'm surprised someone hasn't tried to fill this niche.

Just in this thread(s) we've seen interest in "monster etymology" stuff -- we've talked about monsters taken from folklore, mythology, cheap plastic toys, Fiend Folio zaniness, etc. Throw in some stuff on blunt-weaponed clerics, campaign-derived magic items, and sources for all the harlots on EEG's infamous trollop table, and it'd be a gaming goldmine, methinks.

TavishArtair

10-22-2008 01:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I'm reading through the back of this thread (I originally was reading the earlier threads and about when this one started I left off). I just got through Golems, and I'd like to drop in a bit. Sorry if it has already been said earlier, but if not, here you go. I read this from one of Gary Gygax's discussion threads.

The reason the Clay Golem leaves unhealable damage on its foes is... well, the line was something along the lines of "the clay golem's wounds can only be healed by a 17th level cleric." However, it was intended to be parsed as the wounds the Clay Golem had, that is, if you had a cure light wounds spell you could only make it work on the golem if you were that high a level. By misreading and possibly malevolent referees, it was interpreted and rewritten into what it is now today to "clarify" it.

JRM

10-22-2008 05:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by TavishArtair (Post 9510215)

I'm reading through the back of this thread (I originally was reading the earlier threads and about when this one started I left off). I just got through Golems, and I'd like to drop in a bit. Sorry if it has already been said earlier, but if not, here you go. I read this from one of Gary Gygax's discussion threads.

*The reason the Clay Golem leaves unhealable damage on its foes is... well, the line was something along the lines of "the clay golem's wounds can only be healed by a 17th level cleric." However, it was intended to be parsed as the wounds the Clay Golem had, that is, if you had a cure light wounds spell you could only make it work on the golem if you were that high a level. By misreading and possibly malevolent referees, it was interpreted and rewritten into what it is now today to "clarify" it.

That's a fascinating tit-bit. Did you come across it on the Q&A with Gary Gygax on the dragonsfoot.org fora? I've started reading them, but haven't had time to get very far.

JRM

10-22-2008 06:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9509892)

This is the sort of stuff that I think would be very interesting to learn -- Old Geezer occasionally drops some gems from his experiences, but it would be nice to have some resource to go to for this sort of stuff. D&D has been around long enough that I'm surprised someone hasn't tried to fill this niche.

Just in this thread(s) we've seen interest in "monster etymology" stuff -- we've talked about monsters taken from folklore, mythology, cheap plastic toys, Fiend Folio zaniness, etc. Throw in some stuff on blunt-weaponed clerics, campaign-derived magic items, and sources for all the harlots on EEG's infamous trollop table, and it'd be a gaming goldmine, methinks.

Well Mr Geezer is supposed to be working on a rpg.net column on this very subject, so we can just hope he hurries up and does so.

As for the origins of the name Ixtxachitl, I have seen no evidence one way or the other. My suspicion is that the monster doesn't have any mythological precedent, but that's nothing more than gut feeling and a failure to find any folklore beasts of a similar name with a few casual internet searches, so it's hardly conclusive.

TavishArtair

10-22-2008 06:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9511160)

That's a fascinating tit-bit. Did you come across it on the Q&A with Gary Gygax on the dragonsfoot.org fora? I've started reading them, but haven't had time to get very far.

Ah, yes, that's probably the one. I could never remember it. But yes, the reason the Clay Golem was written the way it was, was mostly bad editing. Although, I suppose someone COULD have been drunk when it was edited...

kelvingreen

10-22-2008 08:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9509502)

To my mind, Ixixachitl should certainly be scary and alien to the players, but not necessarily to the DM, who may want some background framework to decide what their devil-rays are capable of and inclined towards doing. Giving them a sense of weirdness will mostly depend on the DM's presentation in the end, so why not help them out with some background ideas about how a non-human sapient like a devil-ray might live?

I agree completely. It's very helpful to imagine how the alien devil ray might live. And while I like the idea of the slaves just fine, it would disappoint me to see it used to explain why the Ixixachitl might have human-like arts and crafts; with a lack of prehensile limbs, and the limited visibility of the deep, small and intricate works seem far less likely than vast bombastic artistic statements. Why even attempt to create fiddly baubles when you could instead carve a massive statue of your god that is recognisable in silhouette from leagues away?

Kakita Kojiro

10-22-2008 09:57 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9511214)

As for the origins of the name Ixixachitl, I have seen no evidence one way or the other. My suspicion is that the monster doesn't have any mythological precedent, but that's nothing more than gut feeling and a failure to find any folklore beasts of a similar name with a few casual internet searches, so it's hardly conclusive.

In the absence of any other provenance, my guess has always been that the name is probably some kind of horrible pun in Nahuatl, or something. Just because that seems to be the way that gamers come up with stuff.

noisms

10-22-2008 11:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by TavishArtair (Post 9510215)

The reason the Clay Golem leaves unhealable damage on its foes is... well, the line was something along the lines of "the clay golem's wounds can only be healed by a 17th level cleric." However, it was intended to be parsed as the wounds the Clay Golem had, that is, if you had a cure light wounds spell you could only make it work on the golem if you were that high a level. By misreading and possibly malevolent referees, it was interpreted and rewritten into what it is now today to "clarify" it.

Heh. The DM who thought to twist things that way must have been some kind of insane genius.

noisms

10-22-2008 11:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9512155)

In the absence of any other provenance, my guess has always been that the name is probably some kind of horrible pun in Nahuatl, or something. Just because that seems to be the way that gamers come up with stuff.

Legend of the Five Rings was unrivalled in that regard.

kami2awa

10-22-2008 06:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9509544)

Maybe that's the origin of their worship of Demogorgon? About 10% of the Ixixachitl population are priests/clerics. If they're the only ones capable of fine manipulation due to some gift of Demogorgon (prehensile retractile tentacles? a Spiritual Hand spell?) it would have given his cult an enormous advantage.

My other idea was their write-up says the priests can use spells of the Charm school. Perhaps that's how they control the slave population, instead of using brute force? I like the idea that the more powerful priests can Dominate humanoids by wrapping their bodies around them and use the humanoid as a puppet to perform actions the rays are physically incapable of, although maybe that works better as a variant for Psionic or Vampire Ixixachitls.

Now I'm thinking this hypothetical psionic ixixachitl variant developed sound-based mind-influencing powers and telekinetic flight, then left the water and became Cloakers. It'd be nice to have some relationship between the two species, them both being malignant ray-shaped monsters that congregate in mysterious cities.

Mind control would make sense; after all, without any limbs they would otherwise have a hard time preventing slaves escaping, or getting them in the first place.

Kapten

10-22-2008 06:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9513236)

Mind control would make sense; after all, without any limbs they would otherwise have a hard time preventing slaves escaping, or getting them in the first place.

Threats of violence would work fine. They could swim up to a community and demand a bunch of slaves. If they don't get the slaves they kill everyone in the community. The same can be said for escaping slaves; the ixis know where they caught the slave, the slaves can be informed that their families/communities will be destroyed if they escape. That kind of thing worked pretty well for the USSR, I bet the ixis can pull it off as well ;).

JRM

10-22-2008 07:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 9513257)

Threats of violence would work fine. They could swim up to a community and demand a bunch of slaves. If they don't get the slaves they kill everyone in the community. The same can be said for escaping slaves; the ixis know where they caught the slave, the slaves can be informed that their families/communities will be destroyed if they escape. That kind of thing worked pretty well for the USSR, I bet the ixis can pull it off as well ;).

Yes, but, as I previously pointed out, many of the marine humanoids Ixixachitl enslave have higher swim speeds than they do so what's to stop them just swimming away when the lookout sees the devil-rays coming? Not to mention that this assumes the communities are fixed, I get the impression a lot of aquatic sapients live a nomadic life (especially the Sea Caballeros, obviously ;)).

JRM

10-22-2008 07:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9511899)

I agree completely. It's very helpful to imagine how the alien devil ray might live. And while I like the idea of the slaves just fine, it disappoints me that it's there to explain why the Ixixachitl might have human-like arts and crafts; with a lack of prehensile limbs, and the limited visibility of the deep, small and intricate works seem far less likely than vast bombastic artistic statements. Why even attempt to create fiddly baubles when you could instead carve a massive statue of your god that is recognisable in silhouette from leagues away?

Erm, the official explanation of Ixixachitl slaves is that they're to do heavy labour like construction, and serve as sacrificial victims. The fine arts and crafts is just wild speculation on our part.

I imagine the demon-rays would use fine manipulation to make torture instruments, practice alchemy, enchant magical items, shape little golden idols of demogorgon and the like, but they wouldn't need it for day-to-day services as much as surface dwellers do. They don't wear clothes or use weapons and likely treat doctor injuries with priest-spells rather than surgery. Similarly, I suspect they eat live prey so don't usually prepare or preserve food, unless they consider torture as being food preparation - which is quite likely!

Kapten

10-22-2008 09:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9513401)

Yes, but, as I previously pointed out, many of the marine humanoids Ixixachitl enslave have higher swim speeds than they do so what's to stop them just swimming away when the lookout sees the devil-rays coming? Not to mention that this assumes the communities are fixed, I get the impression a lot of aquatic sapients live a nomadic life (especially the Sea Caballeros, obviously ;)).

Those are valid points; the scare- tactics will work against stationary tribes of sea humanoids. Also, even if they are slower, they can ambush and it's possible that the children of the victims will be slower than the Ixis.

I don't say mindcontrol is out of the picture, but I don't like the thought of an evil empire that doesn't use scare tactics, terror and bullying ;).

Maybe a combination: The Ixixachitl charm one, say, sea elf and use that sea elf to lure other sea elves into an ambush. They cut the fins of the captives, making them slower and put them to work. If they repeat this procedure often enough they create a paranoia within sea elf communities so that they can make an offer the sea elves can't refuse; give the Ixixachitl slaves or the Ixixachitl won't stop harassing them.

Since the sea elves then can chose who they give up as slaves, it can work into sea elf justice; criminals will be given to the Ixixachitl as a sort of capital punishment.

JRM

10-23-2008 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9513641)

Those are valid points; the scare- tactics will work against stationary tribes of sea humanoids. Also, even if they are slower, they can ambush and it's possible that the children of the victims will be slower than the Ixis.

I don't say mindcontrol is out of the picture, but I don't like the thought of an evil empire that doesn't use scare tactics, terror and bullying ;).

Maybe a combination: The Ixixachitl charm one, say, sea elf and use that sea elf to lure other sea elves into an ambush. They cut the fins of the captives, making them slower and put them to work. If they repeat this procedure often enough they create a paranoia within sea elf communities so that they can make an offer the sea elves can't refuse; give the Ixixachitl slaves or the Ixixachitl won't stop harassing them.

Since the sea elves then can chose who they give up as slaves, it can work into sea elf justice; criminals will be given to the Ixixachitl as a sort of capital punishment.

Well sea elves wouldn't be a very suitable victim for the Ixixachitl, the other marine humanoids don't have 90% resistance to Charm spells, near invisibility and unconstricted travel in kelp forests, elvish eyesight able to spot foes from miles away et cetera.

Considering the alternatives, Koalinth (marine hobgoblins) may be a frequent victim, they've got a slow swim speed (12") and aren't as tough as Tritons (3 HD) or Locathah (2 HD), and being Lawful Evil they'd be more willing to hand over unwanted relatives to extorting demon-rays than the good-aligned marine sapient would be, nor would the latter be likely to hurry to aid them in battle against the Ixixachitl.

kelvingreen

10-23-2008 02:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9513431)

Erm, the official explanation of Ixixachitl slaves is that they're to do heavy labour like construction, and serve as sacrificial victims. The fine arts and crafts is just wild speculation on our part.

Badly phrased on my part, I apologise. I've fixed it now.

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Jackalwere

Out with the Is, in the with Js. I love the Jackalwere picture - in fact it's one of my favourite non-Diterlizzi pieces in the MM. The staring yellow eyes are great.

A Jackalwere is like a Werewolf, but with Jackals. Simple enough. A monster which can take on the form of a Jackal, humanoid Jackal, or human, and uses its wily intelligence, claws, and sleep causing gaze to kill and eat humans and demihumans. There is a rather nice grisly line: "In some cases, a jackalwere has been known to feed on the bodies of fallen enemies without reverting to its jackal or hybrid form." It makes me wonder about a Jackalwere living hidden amongst a band of ordinary human cannibals for protection.

Jackalweres suffer from the same problem that Werewolves do: namely player knowledge. It's difficult to successfully trick players with Jackalweres disguised as helpless old women/damsels in distress/friendly merchants lost in the forest, because players have generally been numbed by years of such shinnanegans into complete paranoia. They might not suspect a Jackalwere per se when they find an old woman all alone and caught in a mantrap, but they'll sure as hell suspect something. This considerably ruins the surprise effect.

JRM

10-24-2008 02:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9517160)

Jackalwere

Jackalweres suffer from the same problem that Werewolves do: namely player knowledge. It's difficult to successfully trick players with Jackalweres disguised as helpless old women/damsels in distress/friendly merchants lost in the forest, because players have generally been numbed by years of such shinnanegans into complete paranoia. They might not suspect a Jackalwere per se when they find an old woman all alone and caught in a mantrap, but they'll sure as hell suspect something. This considerably ruins the surprise effect.

Yes, the obvious answer to that is to have a fair portion of encounters which are helpless old women/damsels in distress/friendly merchants lost in the forest, although that has the unfortunate side-effect of using up a lot of time. It's a similar problem if NPCs frequently cheat or betray the party, resulting in the PCs never trusting anyone. You've got to have a quantity of true coins to hide the bad pennies among.

With jackalweres, I think they work well for an "enemy within" plot. Have the party travel with a group of NPCs (let's say it's a caravan, for the sake of argument) and, unbeknownst to them, a few of their companions are jackalweres plotting to lead the humans to their doom.

Remember that a jackalwere can vary their human disguise at will, so they can use this ability to cover their trail - i.e. one of them could kill and then pretend to be a family's bed-ridden grandmother, then use their sleep-gaze power to overcome its victim's unsuspecting relatives one by one. If they're careful, it may be some time before the travellers even suspect they're being preyed upon - they could find the gnawed bones of a man and not realize it was the guard they set on watch, who appears to be sitting right next to them as right as rain.

One problem is, can jackalweres mimic the speech of a particular human? Gygax's Queen of the Demonweb Pits module indicates that they're capable of human speech. The jackalweres could try to cover up any communication difficulties by pretending to be sick - so a "plague" of fever-victims mumbling incoherently are really jackalweres, and when their loved ones catch the disease they've really been murdered and replaced by other pack members. They could even fake funerals when all the pack-members have infiltrated the caravan and they want to claim another victim.

kelvingreen

10-24-2008 03:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9517160)
a band of ordinary human cannibals

:eek:

I think I've mentioned this before, but I'm quite fond of the obvious-old-lady-jackalwere turning out to be friendly, or at least not actively hostile. The players will be expecting the old lady to be a monster, but not necessarily that the monster is not out to get them.

After all, while disguise is useful in trapping prey, it's also useful in not becoming prey yourself. Perhaps the weres are generally a non-hostile race, who've developed human forms in order to hide from those who hunt them, and the one or two of them who try to kill every human they encounter are merely, to their minds anyway, fighting back.

noisms

10-24-2008 10:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9519402)
one of them could kill and then pretend to be a family's bed-ridden grandmother, then use their sleep-gaze power to overcome its victim's unsuspecting relatives one by one.

Nasty, I like it.

Nathan P. Mahney

10-24-2008 11:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Another option I've seen used is to have Gods walking the Earth disguised as mortals - sort of like in Greek myth. Say the little old lady who wants you to carry her across the river is actually Athena or Hera... But throwing gods up against the PCs is generally frowned upon.

Ratoslov

10-24-2008 11:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9521458)

Another option I've seen used is to have Gods walking the Earth disguised as mortals - sort of like in Greek myth. Say the little old lady who wants you to carry her across the river is actually Athena or Hera... But throwing gods up against the PCs is generally frowned upon.

In myth, if it's a god disguising itself as a mortal, either they're there to personally kill you or they're there for the old slam-bam-thank you ma'am. Usually resulting in you getting turned into a animal by a jealous wife or giving birth to a monster.

Except, of course, for the time you don't respect them, and then they curse you.

Basically, any time the Gods show up, you're fucked.

noisms

10-24-2008 11:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9521517)

Basically, any time the Gods show up, you're fucked.

A good rule of thumb, I think.

demiurge1138

10-24-2008 11:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Three ways to use jackalweres that do not rely on helpless little old ladies in the woods.

1. The party has been sent on the trail of an evil bard, whom it is said uses his magic to knock travellers to sleep, rob them blind, and leave them to be fed upon by wild beasts. Unfortunately, that "bard" is a jackalwere, and parties not expecting a powerful melee combatant, or bringing their cold iron weapons, might be in for a surprise.

2. There's a little roadside tavern on the boundaries of a farming community and the wilderness. The bartender is always polite and engaging, serving drinks while asking about traveler's intentions and destinations. He even helps the soused ones upstairs to a bed to sleep off an evening of too much drink.

The bartender is, of course, a jackalwere, but a canny and patient one. He only kills patrons who have no nearby family to come investigating, travel alone, or are headed off on long voyages with return in the distant future. Nobody gets too suspicious if they're told that ol' Jep decided to get an early start on his journey, after all...

3. This one requires some alignment tweaking, but it's my favorite. Jackalweres are the chosen sons and daughters of Anubis, sent to Earth to ensure that those who are fated to die do so, and are mummified in a way to best preserve them for the afterlife. They serve pharaohs as advisors, military commanders and keepers of the necropoli, almost always in human guise. From these positions of power, they schedule wars, defend tombs, and are on hand to make sure the pharaoh's enemies no longer plague him.

An Anubian jackalwere would be lawful evil. They would use their sleep gaze to nullify their targets before ritually murdering them, perhaps beginning the mummification process while still alive. In necropoli, they would travel with an honor guard of mummies, and some of them might have access to spellcasting as a cleric.

Novatian

10-24-2008 11:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9521619)

3. This one requires some alignment tweaking, but it's my favorite. Jackalweres are the chosen sons and daughters of Anubis, sent to Earth to ensure that those who are fated to die do so, and are mummified in a way to best preserve them for the afterlife. They serve pharaohs as advisors, military commanders and keepers of the necropoli, almost always in human guise. From these positions of power, they schedule wars, defend tombs, and are on hand to make sure the pharaoh's enemies no longer plague him.

An Anubian jackalwere would be lawful evil. They would use their sleep gaze to nullify their targets before ritually murdering them, perhaps beginning the mummification process while still alive. In necropoli, they would travel with an honor guard of mummies, and some of them might have access to spellcasting as a cleric.

All I can say is "Thank you." This idea must appear in my next campaign.

Littleredfox

10-24-2008 01:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Nathan P. Mahney (Post 9521458)

Another option I've seen used is to have Gods walking the Earth disguised as mortals - sort of like in Greek myth. Say the little old lady who wants you to carry her across the river is actually Athena or Hera... But throwing gods up against the PCs is generally frowned upon.

You could drop the power a couple of levels and do the Russian myth thing.

I.e Mother Volk may be a werewolf but if you don't help her now, she's in a trap [politely mind you] she can't or won't turn out to help you down the road when you need to round up Baba Yaga's carnivorous horses.

Or alternatively just treat being a lycanthrope as another source of power. Paladins pray for strength, Werewolves find it by merging with the beast within, both adventure. The Eagle and Jaguar Knight kits could be considered to be a riff on this sort of thing.

JRM

10-25-2008 03:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 9521517)

In myth, if it's a god disguising itself as a mortal, either they're there to personally kill you or they're there for the olc slam-bam-thank you ma'am. Usually resulting in you getting turned into a animal by a jealous wife or giving birth to a monster.

Except, of course, for the time you don't respect them, and then they curse you.

Basically, any time the Gods show up, you're fucked.

Not necessarily, sometimes they turn up to help their favourites, or to test some mortals for worthiness and reward them if they do well, or just steer you down a "path to glory" - although that usually ends badly, you'll probably ride high for at least a while with divine assistance.

If you're really unlucky it's three goddesses who want you to decide which of them is the most beautiful - I've never heard of that ending well.

JRM

10-25-2008 03:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Littleredfox (Post 9522004)

You could drop the power a couple of levels and do the Russian myth thing.

I.e Mother Volk may be a werewolf but if you don't help her now, seh's in a trap [politely mind you] she can't or won't turn out to help you down the road when you need to round up Baba Yaga's carnivorous horses.

Or alternatively just treat being a lycanthrope as another source of power. Paladins pray for strength, Werewolves find it by merging with the beast within, both adventure. the Eagle and Jaguar Knight kits could be considered to be riff on this sort of thing.

Yes, there's good mythological precedence for "warrior weres". It makes an interesting alternative character class for berserker-types and wild druids, although it's not a well supported option in AD&D.

6inTruder

10-25-2008 10:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9521619)

3. This one requires some alignment tweaking, but it's my favorite. Jackalweres are the chosen sons and daughters of Anubis, sent to Earth to ensure that those who are fated to die do so, and are mummified in a way to best preserve them for the afterlife. They serve pharaohs as advisors, military commanders and keepers of the necropoli, almost always in human guise. From these positions of power, they schedule wars, defend tombs, and are on hand to make sure the pharaoh's enemies no longer plague him.

An Anubian jackalwere would be lawful evil. They would use their sleep gaze to nullify their targets before ritually murdering them, perhaps beginning the mummification process while still alive. In necropoli, they would travel with an honor guard of mummies, and some of them might have access to spellcasting as a cleric.

Dude. DUDE! That's fucking brilliant. And totally yonked for the Dragonstar game I want to run!

Wakboth

10-25-2008 05:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9517160)

Jackalwere

Out with the Is, in the with Js. I love the Jackalwere picture - in fact it's one of my favourite non-Diterlizzi pieces in the MM. The staring yellow eyes are great.

Yup, it's creepy as heck!

You're right about the "old lady in trouble" thing, of course. Player paranoia (warranted or not) is a big pain in the ass to deal with, and it's especially frustrating when you as the DM get to reap the effects of another DM's "Screw you for trusting anything, mwahahaha!" gaming style...

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9519402)

With jackalweres, I think they work well for an "enemy within" plot. Have the party travel with a group of NPCs (let's say it's a caravan, for the sake of argument) and, unbeknownst to them, a few of their companions are jackalweres plotting to lead the humans to their doom.

[snip ideas]

Damn, that was cool; I especially liked the idea of the "mumbling fever". :)

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9521619)

Three ways to use jackalweres that do not rely on helpless little old ladies in the woods.

Very cool ideas, all of those; the Anubean jackalweres is probably the greatest, but a bit difficult to insert in many campaigns. The "friendly bartender" thing was great... it works especially well, if you manage to make the place a regular watering hole for the adventurers. :D

JRM

10-25-2008 09:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9526681)

You're right about the "old lady in trouble" thing, of course. Player paranoia (warranted or not) is a big pain in the ass to deal with, and it's especially frustrating when you as the DM get to reap the effects of another DM's "Screw you for trusting anything, mwahahaha!" gaming style...

Well the obvious counter-strategy for such players is the " 'Screw you for mistrusting anything, mwahahaha!' gaming style...", where the party keep on meeting beautiful princesses lost in the woods, little old lady 18th level magic users who just wanted to hire them for an extravagantly recompensed mission, a monster pleading for aid who's really a Paladin polymorphed by an enemy, et cetera.

Wakboth

10-26-2008 12:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9527039)

Well the obvious counter-strategy for such players is the " 'Screw you for mistrusting anything, mwahahaha!' gaming style...", where the party keep on meeting beautiful princesses lost in the woods, little old lady 18th level magic user who just wanted to hire them for an extravagantly recompensed mission, a monster pleading for aid who's really a Paladin polymorphed by an enemy, et cetera.

True... or you might sit down with the players and tell them: "Guys, you're being ridiculous about this. I'm not trying to screw with you; I'm not your enemy. If you help somebody, and it turns out they're a monster, I'm not going to play it as a 'gotcha' and kill you all in your sleep, okay?"

noisms

10-26-2008 10:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9527389)

True... or you might sit down with the players and tell them: "Guys, you're being ridiculous about this. I'm not trying to screw with you; I'm not your enemy. If you help somebody, and it turns out they're a monster, I'm not going to play it as a 'gotcha' and kill you all in your sleep, okay?"

And then kill them all in their sleep.

Brandi

10-26-2008 04:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9527389)

True... or you might sit down with the players and tell them: "Guys, you're being ridiculous about this. I'm not trying to screw with you; I'm not your enemy. If you help somebody, and it turns out they're a monster, I'm not going to pla it as a 'gotcha' and kill you all in your sleep, okay?"

Or have it turn out that sure, they're monsters-- but they actually want the party's help to stave off something worse (IIRC, this is part of the Saltmarsh module series' premise).

JRM

10-26-2008 10:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9529558)

Or have it turn out that sure, they're monsters-- but they actually want the party's help to stave off something worse (IIRC, this is part of the Saltmarsh module series' premise).

That's the one with the Lizardmen who the PCs may decide to help against an evil(er?) foe, isn't it? The Neutral monsters may be friend or foe approach can work quite well.

Sometimes it's more effective presenting the players with an obvious monster they doesn't have a simple solution (i.e. they can't just kill it and take its stuff) rather than a hidden monster for a "gotcha" moment. I've long wanted to have a PC encounter a really evil CE creature who falls madly in love with them - maybe it drank a Philter of Love at just the wrong time - but is powerful enough that trying to slay it would be dangerous, but it keep following them about and "helping" its beloved. This may be useful down the dungeon, but when it kills the Innkeeper after the PC complains about the bill and murders people who look like they may be rivals for its affections the drawbacks will become obvious. For added sadism, the monster that wants this amorous relationship may be something particularly hideous, like a Glabrezu or Otyugh.

Actually, this whole "D&D heroes solve problems by killing things" is something I like to take an occasional break from, maybe the Ultimate Evil is a noblewoman, and they'd all be executed if they've implicated in her death, so they have to bring her down via other means.

Brandi

10-27-2008 05:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9530036)

That's the one with the Lizardmen who the PCs may decide to help against an evil(er?) foe, isn't it?

Yep. There's also a Ravenloft mini-adventure where

Spoiler: from Children of the Night: The Created

sim_james

10-27-2008 10:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9530036)

Sometimes it's more effective presenting the players with an obvious monster they doesn't have a simple solution (i.e. they can't just kill it and take its stuff) rather than a hidden monster for a "gotcha" moment.

I had fun with this kinda deal in a Planescape game.

The PCs had found themselves in one of the Lady of Pain's Mazes (I was trying to run a "dungeon" for them that was significantly different from a standard dungeon). One of the inhabitants was a CE tanar'ri (a Molydeus? Something nasty) with genius-level intelligence that had deduced the only gatekey to escaping the Maze - true and permanent conversion to an opposite alignment.

For centuries the tanar'ri had attempted to corrupt other beings that entered the Maze, but that didn't work very well (due to other alignment-related stuff going on in there). So in the end it decided to become Lawful Good itself.

If you can't see the fun potential in a powerful demon trying to act in a LG fashion, but not having the real motivation to do so... you're probably not a GM. ;)

glass

10-27-2008 11:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9533779)

For centuries the tanar'ri had attempted to corrupt other beings that entered the Maze, but that didn't work very well (due to other alignment-related stuff going on in there). So in the end it decided to become Lawful Good itself. lj you can't see the fun potential in a powerful demon trying to act in a LG fashion, but not having the real motivation to do so... you're probably not a GM. ;)

That sounds cool. How did it play out?

glass.

noisms

10-28-2008 11:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Kenku

I don't know how anyone can fail to love the Kenku. In fact I'm going to go out on a limb and say they're one of my top 10 favourite MM monsters. Possibly top 5. They're one of the very, very few creatures designed to be mysterious and elusive which actually succeed in being so. As somebody who likes the tricky, capricious nature of fairy tale creatures, I appreciate the Kenku for being one of the very few D&D creatures which actually seem like they could be from a fairy tale.

Kenku are like a race of unseen symbiots living in parallel with human society, with no motivations that can be fathomed. They can cloak themselves in invisibility at will, disguise themselves as humans, and create a kind of fool's gold which disappears after a day. This allows them to live alongside human society without ever revealing themselves for what they are - unless they choose to. They're also utterly unpredictable. Most of the time they appear helpful, and might pretend to act as guides or give advice, but there is no way of knowing whether information they give will lead to profit or harm, or whether it is true or false.

Perhaps what's best about the Kenku entry is that it doesn't contain any of the references to sages to which we have become accustomed; there are no heavy-handed hints about origins or motives. The creatures are a blank slate for a creative DM to do whatever he wants with: Why are the Kenku here? Why do they do what they do? What is their secret purpose, if any? Are they the servants of some god, or are they just a nuisance? You have a free rein to decide.

David J Prokopetz

10-28-2008 11:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've never used kenku in my games, but I recall that there was a cynical, blisteringly sarcastic kenku as a recruitable NPC in the AD&D computer game Menzoberranzan. He was one of the high points of an otherwise thoroughly mediocre game.

Kakita Kojiro

10-28-2008 12:52 PM

In a weird bit of gaming circularity, D&D's kenku was taken from Japan's tengu legends. (a somewhat valid alternate pronunciation, from what I understand).

Then, L5R used "kenku" for its tengu-equivalents. And they (logically enough) had much more in common with the D&D kenku than the Japanese tengu -- even though L5R cribs from Japanese folklore. Weird.

demiurge1138

10-28-2008 01:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I just came to a weird realization.

I had thought, for the longest time, that the Monstrous Manual was very strange in having stats for both tengu and kenku, filling about the same niche.

I just looked it up, and nope. No tengu in the MM.

I'm very confused right now.

JRM

10-28-2008 05:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9537236)
I just came to a weird realization.

I had thought, for the longest time, that the Monstrous Manual was very strange in having stats for both tengu and kenku, filling about the same niche.

I just looked it up, and nope. No tengu in the MM.

I'm very confused right now.

AD&D has not one, but two sorts of tengu, just not in the Monster Manual. They first appeared in the 1E Oriental Adventures, the 2E version are in the Kara Tur Monstrous Compendium (MC6).

Getting back to kenku, I've liked them since the original Fiend Folio and they've crop up now and again in my campaign, but I have never seen a D&D scenario where they're much more than incidental encounters. The closest I can think of a major villain kenku is the Age of Worms, isn't there a high-level kenku assassin in one of the adventures? Even that is just a "threat of the week".

Oh, and how many of you remember the little photo-cartoon in the back of an Imagine Magazine with a DM (I think it was Carl Sargent) running an encounter with kenkus, it went something like this:

(panel one) DM: "Seven kenku jump out and attack!"

(panel two) DM: (obviously rolling dice behind his DM's screen)

(panel three) DM: "Take a hundred and thirteen points of damage."

(panel four) DM (looking offended): "Of course those were genuine rolls."

Classic D&D, it always gave me a giggle when I read that issue - although you'd need to see the photographs for the full effect. Oh, and I did some calculations and it was barely possible for the kenkus to do that much damage before the player's could respond, assuming they won surprise, initiative and rolled brilliantly on all their claw-claw-bites.

kelvingreen

10-28-2008 06:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9536740)

Kenku

I don't know how anyone can fail to love the Kenku. In fact I'm going to go out on a limb and say they're one of my top 10 favourite MM monsters. Possibly top 5.

Yeah, me too. There's something brilliant about the mysterious bird monk-scholars. Fighting Fantasy had them too, in the Hamakei, but they were accompanied by all the sage garbage which stripped them of their mystery. Shame.

(un)reason

10-28-2008 10:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

And after spending more than half the thread on the G's, we slip over J like a greased monkey. I knew that the last few letters and Q only had a few each, but I forgot just how underrepresented J is.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9536740)

Kenku

I don't know how anyone can fail to love the Kenku. In fact I'm going to go out on a limb and say they're one of my top 10 favourite MM monsters. Possibly top 5. They're one of the very, very few creatures designed to be mysterious and elusive which actually succeed in being so. As somebody who likes the tricky, capricious nature of fairy tale creatures, I appreciate the Kenku for being one of the very few D&D creatures which actually seem like they could be from a fairy tale.

Kenku are like a race of unseen symbiants living in parallel with human society, with no motivations that can be fathomed. They can cloak themselves in invisibility at will, disguise themselves as humans, and create a kind of fool's gold which disappears after a day. This allows them to live alongside human society without ever revealing themselves for what they are - unless they choose to. They're also utterly unpredictable. Most of the time they appear helpful, and might pretend to act as guides or give advice, but there is no way of knowing whether information they give will lead to profit or harm, or whether it is true or false.

Perhaps what's best about the Kenku entry is that it doesn't contain any of the references to sages to which we have become accustomed; there are no heavy-handed hints about origins or motives. The creatures are a blank slate for a creative DM to do whatever he wants with: Why are the Kenku here? Why do they do what they do? What is their secret purpose, if any? Are they the servants of some god, or are they just a nuisance? You have a free rein to decide

I do have to say I'm quite fond of kenku as well. They show up the neutral as standoffish and purely self-interested side of amorality, and very much have their own best interests at heart. Plus they're one of those creatures that punches above their weight because their powers can be applied cleverly. (shapeshifting plays a big part in this, as ever.) Kobolds might be the classic "play them cleverly and terrify the high level characters" monster, but kenku really are brilliant in that role.

demiurge1138

10-29-2008 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9537810)

Getting back to kenku, I've liked them since the original Fiend Folio and they've crop up now and again in my campaign, but I have never seen a D&D scenario where they're much more than incidental encounters. The closest I can think of a major villain kenku is the Age of Worms, isn't there a high-level kenku assassin in one of the adventures? Even that is just a "threat of the week".

Yeah, but 3e kenku are totally different beasts. They're anthropomorphic crows, cursed into winglessness by Pazuzu, who live in cities as scavengers, thieves and assassins. I'm actually a big fan of them--even played one in a very short-lived piratical campaign. But shapeshifting magical tricksters, they're not.

kelvingreen

10-29-2008 07:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9538425)

Kobolds might be the classic "play them cleverly and terrify the high level characters" monster

When we get to the kobold entry, I'd like to know more about this.

Nathan P. Mahney

10-29-2008 11:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Mostly I remember Kenku from Eye of the beholder. Never did figure out why so many of the bastards were running around in Undermountain.

sim_james

10-29-2008 10:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by glass (Post 9534013)

That sounds cool. How did it play out?

Well...

The Maze wasn't a traditional labyrinth or subterranean structure. Each "room" appeared to be an endless plain; the PCs appeared in an area between four free standing arches. Of course, these were portals leading to other rooms.

The layout of these "rooms" resembled the Great Wheel. It wrapped (like Asteroids) but imperfectly so (it wasn't possible to walk through an arch in A1 to reach A3; you'd get to B3 instead). Whilst this is a fairly simple layout on paper, in play it had the players a bit confused, thus creating a Maze-like feel.

Each of the four "neutral" rooms (NG, LN, CN, NE) featured some kind of artefact or supernatural effect that had some unexpected connection to the alignment in question (eg, the NG room featured an enormous pillar of flame; when a PC stepped into it and was incinerated, he reformed afterwards wearing phoenix feathers). Each of the four "extreme" rooms (LG, LE, CE, CG) had a sentient being associated with that alignment (I think it was an insane archon, an imp and his dead wizard, a tanar'ri, and an eladrin tulani). The central, true neutral room had an oracular woman (Centre of All) trapped inside a thousand overlapping circles (like a messy Venn diagram).

So that's the set-up. The PCs didn't visit every "room", but they fought the imp, saw one PC get incinerated and reborn by the phoenix flame, got messed up by the heart of chaos, saw the Dustman gain Wisdom from the Empty Mirror, met the eladrin (which they saw as a satyr-like being), and "befriended" the tanar'ri. The PCs recognised very quickly that it badly outclassed them should things come to a fight, but that it didn't seem to want a fight. Instead, it followed them (or just communicated telepathically from a distance) suggesting "lawful good" ways to deal with problems.

What a creature of murder, betrayal and malice understands about law and good is rather twisted, of course. And that freaked the PCs out a lot more than just meeting a tanar'ri normally would (they were kinda open-minded about fiends).

How the PCs resolved the scenario (and escaped the Maze) was by deducing what the oracular Centre of All was talking about (that the gate key was "walking the circle") and that the satyr-like fellow had a limited ability to change reality for other beings (he could grant a wish). Realising that the tanar'ri was trying but failing to become lawful good, they got him into the same room as the tulani, encouraged an impassioned conversation about alignment, and prompted* the tanar'ri to verbally express his wish that he could become lawful and good.

The tulani granted the unwitting wish, the portals all activated (allowing anybody who wished to leave the Maze a chance to do so), and the PCs escaped back to Sigil. They never found out what happened to the LG molydeus.

* They didn't trust the tanar'ri enough to tell him that the tulani could grant a wish, rightly fearing that its treacherous nature might make that temptation too much to resist.

noisms

10-31-2008 07:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9543074)
Well...

The Maze wasn't a traditional labyrinth or subterranean structure. Each "room" appeared to be an endless plain; the PCs appeared in an area between four free standing arches. Of course, these were portals leading to other rooms.

The layout of these "rooms" resembled the Great Wheel. It wrapped (like Asteroids) but imperfectly so (it wasn't possible to walk through an arch in A1 to reach A3; you'd get to B3 instead). Whilst this is a fairly simple layout on paper, in play it had the players a bit confused, thus creating a Maze-like feel.

Each of the four "neutral" rooms (NG, LN, CN, NE) featured some kind of artefact or supernatural effect that had some unexpected connection to the alignment in question (eg, the NG room featured an enormous pillar of flame; when a PC stepped into it and was incinerated, he reformed afterwards wearing phoenix feathers). Each of the four "extreme" rooms (LG, LE, CE, CG) had a sentient being associated with that alignment (I think it was an insane archon, an imp and his dead wizard, a tanar'ri, and an eladrin tulani). The central, true neutral room had a oracular woman (Centre of All) trapped inside a thousand overlapping circles (like a messy Venn diagram).

So that's the set-up. The PCs didn't visit every "room", but they fought the imp, saw one PC get incinerated and reborn by the phoenix flame, got messed up by the heart of chaos, saw the Dustman gain Wisdom from the Empty Mirror, met the eladrin (which they saw as a satyr-like being), and "befriended" the tanar'ri. The PCs recognised very quickly that it badly outclassed them should things come to a fight, but that it didn't seem to want a fight. Instead, it followed them (or just communicated telepathically from a distance) suggesting "lawful good" ways to deal with problems.

What a creature of murder, betrayal and malice understands about law and good is rather twisted, of course. And that freaked the PCs out a lot more than just meeting a tanar'ri normally would (they were kinda open-minded about fiends).

How the PCs resolved the scenario (and escaped the Maze) was by deducing what the oracular Centre of All was talking about (that the gate key was "walking the circle") and that the satyr-like fellow had a limited ability to change reality for other beings (he could grant a wish). Realising that the tanar'ri was trying but failing to become lawful good, they got him into the same room as the tulani, encouraged an impassioned conversation about alignment, and prompted the tanar'ri to verbally express his wish that he could become lawful and good.*

The tulani granted the unwitting wish, the portals all activated (allowing anybody who wished to leave the Maze a chance to do so), and the PCs escaped back to Sigil. They never found out what happened to the LG molydeus.

 They didn'ty trust the tanar'ri enough to tell him that the tulani could grant a wish, rightly fearing that its treacherous nature might make that temptation too much to resist.*

Great stuff.

New post coming shortly everyone. I spent the last two days on various planes, so I've had no net access.

JRM

10-31-2008 10:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9551532)
Great stuff.

New post coming shortly everyone. I spent the last two days on various planes, so I've had no net access.

Yes, I heard only Mechanus has a decent internet service. :p

noisms

11-01-2008 12:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9551790)
Yes, I heard only Mechanus has a decent internet service. :p

The Abyss has dial-up. ;)

JRM

11-01-2008 04:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9552349)
The Abyss has dial-up. ;)

Yes, and you have to spin the numbers manually using a dial made from red-hot metal.

Brantai'sPuppet

11-01-2008 06:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9553273)
Yes, and you have to spin the numbers manually using a dial made from red-hot metal.

And the only modem they have is an acoustic coupler, so the screams are constantly interfering with your connection.

DMH

11-01-2008 07:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9552349)
The Abyss has dial-up. ;)

Actually it has numatic (sp?) tubes driven by the last breath of murderers and screams of the damned.

And no, I didn't come up with that- it is in the pact system download for the Secondworld Sourcebook. It has an abyss based mad science group that uses the tubes to keep in contact.

David J Prokopetz

11-01-2008 08:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

There's an obvious "series of tubes" joke in that, but I've already received my "vicious beating" quota for this week. :p

Epoch

11-01-2008 08:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9553788)
numatic (sp?)

Pneumatic.

I hear that the internet is a series of tubes....

HaplessVictim

11-01-2008 05:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9536740)

Kenku

I don't know how anyone can fail to love the Kenku.

I love the Kenku. I had a.. formative DM'ing experience involving these lovelies.

One of the first large adventures/campagins of my own invention that I DM'd began in a small town, near the foothills of a dry mountain range where Kenku were known to live. The initial plot hook involved a nearby cave (I know, I know..) that reportedly contained an ancient brass door that hadn't been opened in living memory. The players hear of this and of course investigate. Unbeknownst to them, this cave-system is the home of a poor but numerous tribe of Kenku , a race whom the players had never encountered, only heard stories of.

Because they hadn't asked around town and found out to avoid it, the players spend the night camped out in the Kenku ceremonial stone circle. The first encounter with a Kenku patrol at dawn went predictably badly. They then advanced on the caves, less interested in role-playing and parlaying than killing the bird people and taking their stuff. They manage to surprise the lone guard, but once inside they are mobbed by furious Kenku soldiers and slaughtered to a single man, the fighter, who turned tail and ran.

Rolling up new characters, the players refused to re-enter the caves. My whole campaign, which hinged on the characters opening that damn door, had lasted about two hours.

P.S. Thanks for reminding me of this 20 year old AD&D session, noisms. I registered here because of this thread. Ah good times.

JRM

11-01-2008 08:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 9555326)

Because they hadn't asked around town and found out to avoid it, the players spend the night camped out in the Kenku ceremonial stone circle. The first encounter with a Kenku patrol at dawn went predictably badly. They then advanced on the caves, less interested in role-playing and parlaying than killing the bird people and taking their stuff. They manage to surprise the lone guard, but once inside they are mobbed by furious Kenku soldiers and slaughtered to a single man, the fighter, who turned tail and ran.

Rolling up new characters, the players refused to re-enter the caves. My whole campaign, which hinged on the characters opening that damn door, had lasted about two hours.

Sounds like you compounded a few of the classic DM mistakes - a whole campaign revolving around the PCs doing one thing, with no allowance for if the PCs refused to do it, or their preferences (kill everything and take their stuff!) contradicted the approach was likely to work (parlaying). I'm guessing it may have been salvageable if you and the players wanted to, just by putting in some side-trek adventures or a "mini adventure path" so that the new PCs got enough levels under their belt so they could return to those caves and wreak revenge.

HaplessVictim

11-02-2008 02:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9555509)

Sounds like you compounded a few of the classic DM mistakes

Oh, precisely. That's why it was formative, although I couldn't have articulated what went wrong at the time as well as you did, I learned my lesson.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9555509)

I'm guessing it may have been salvageable if you and the players wanted to, just by putting in some side-trek adventures or a "mini adventure path" so that the new PCs got enough levels under their belt so they could return to those caves and wreak revenge.

As I recall, the DM rotation went to another member of our group for a while and we ran Barrier Peaks. I don't think we ever re-did my campaign or they ever found out what was behind that door (riches and glory, I'd imagine).

JRM

11-03-2008 02:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 9556303)

Oh, precisely. That's why it was formative, although I couldn't have articulated what went wrong at the time as well as you did, I learned my lesson.

Nothing wrong with that, I doubt I'd have been able to clearly see where I went wrong if I'd done something similar back when I was starting out as a DM.

Of course, now that I'm a seasoned veteran I have developed deeply sophisticated methods of ruining my campaigns, instead of these neophyte errors. ;)

Anyhows, betting back on topic: Come on Noisms, we're waiting for the Ki-rin!

noisms

11-03-2008 04:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Kirin

Hot on the heels of the Kenku is another pseudo-Japanese/Chinese mythological creature, the Kirin. (Kirin is also the Japanese word for a giraffe, as well as being a brewery of tasty alcoholic drinks.) It's not nearly as fun or interesting though - possibly because the horror of a picture that accompanies the entry sucks all the life and fun out of it. As is often the case, there is a Planescape version of the illustration that is approximately 8 billion times better.

A Kirin is a sort of four-legged, furry, horse-like version of Superman: a flying goody-goody who goes around fighting evildoers and righting wrongs. In D&D terms it's a typical Mary Sue monster: When the PCs do something wrong the Kirin is a way for the DM to discipline them; when they aren't powerful enough the Kirin is a way for the DM to help them; and when they need a quest out of the blue the Kirin is a way for a DM to give one to them. As such, I don't much like it, and find it hard to use in a game.

Perhaps their most interesting quality is their ability to create essentially infinite amounts of food, drink and other items. For some reason I want to imagine a Kirin as a kind of moveable logistics camp for a lawful good army, ready to create extra rations and weaponry at a moment's notice. But that's just ridiculous and I'm not sure why it seems so attractive.

Our friends the sages are not mentioned explicitly, but their presence is felt in the line "Only the males ever approach the ground. No encounter with a female ki-rin has ever been recorded, although it is certain such beings exist." It doesn't mention why it is certain. On reading this, my mind immediately threw up a great heap of sheer wrongness: Kirinwives and the quest to find them.

There is one more item of note: a Kirin's skin is worth 25,000 gps, but "possession of such a item is dangerous, due to the retribution that may be visited upon the possessor by other ki-rin, sympathetic humanoids, or intelligent lawful good monsters." Adventure to recover a slain Kirin's skin, anybody?

sim_james

11-03-2008 11:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9559780)

Perhaps their most interesting quality is their ability to create essentially infinte amounts of food, drink and other items. For some reason I want to imagine a Kirin as a kind of moveable logistics camp for a lawful good army, ready to create extra rations and weaponry at a moment's notice. But that's just ridiculous and I'm not sure why it seems s attractive.

It could be handy. A kirin is a passable stand-in for Aslan in AD&D; being able to feed the resistance that you're guiding would be helpful.

You could even do a loaves-and-fishes scene to reinforce the Crystal Dragon Jesus aspect of the whole thing.

Five Eyes

11-03-2008 11:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I've never had much use for most of the "power player" monsters such as the Ki-rin or high-ranking planar beings; I've never had players encounter that level of "heat" for anything that they've done. Mostly, they come forth as parts - i.e., powerful magic items are made out of components from powerful beings. Ki-rin have shown up, but only as components in coats of arms - to show the high status of the family in question, etc.

Wakboth

11-03-2008 04:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9559780)

Perhaps their most interesting quality is their ability to create essentially infinte amounts of food, drink and other items. For some reason I want to imagine a Kirin as a kind of moveable logistics camp for a lawful good army, ready to create extra rations and weaponry at a moment's notice. But that's just ridiculous and I'm not sure why it seems s attractive.

Because it's the good sort of ridiculous that melds smoothly into awesome? :)

"Ours is the Mandate of Heaven! Now eat your K-rations, and let's go trash some villains!"

(un)reason

11-03-2008 10:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9559780)

Kirin

Our friends the sages are not mentioned explicitly, but their presence is felt in the line "Only the males ever approach the ground. No encounter with a female ki-rin has ever been recorded, although it is certain such beings exist." It doesn't mention why it is certain. On reading this, my mind immediately threw up a great heap of sheer wrongness: Kirinwives and the quest to find them.

Female ki-rin were filled in in one of the planescape supplements. They're depressingly similar, only even more insanely powerful. Definitely a case of wasted potential there. My own pet theory had the females be some chaotic evil creature, and ki-rin sex become a deeply embarrassing negotiation process that both sides only put up with to get more kids of their own gender, and treachery and infanticide being common in the child-raising process.

JRM

11-04-2008 07:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9559780)

Kirin

A Kirin is a sort of four-legged, furry, horse-like version of Superman: a flying goody-goody who goes around fighting evildoers and righting wrongs. In D&D terms it's a typical Mary Sue monster:

Is it a bird!? is it a horse!? is it a unicorn!? ... is it what you get when a hollyphant and rhinoceros mate!!?

Yes, I guess the Mary Sue-ishness (or rather Gary Sue-ishness, if all 2E AD&D Ki-rin encountered are male) is part of the reason I never used them. I guess you could come up with scenarios were the Ki-rin doesn't overwhelm the party's role (high level PCs, rescue the helpless Ki-rin, quest to summon the Ki-rin to defeat the Big Bad Demon et cetera)? Another reason I've never used the monster is I didn't get a sense of personality from their write-up apart from "Excessively Lawful Good", like some of AD&D's other good-aligned mythological human-herd animal hybrids like the Shedu, Lammasu etc. All three of these creatures are divine beings in their original folklore, which intervene to protect/aid people against evil, so it really depends how much Heavenly Intervention you like in your games.

Hmm, according to Chinese legend Ki-rin only appear in areas under a benevolent leader, to bless the virtuous, or to protect good people by punishing the wicked. Could that first bit have AD&D applications? Say, a country were a Ki-rin appears to approve its newly crowned rulers, but one Evil Prince creates a fake Ki-rin to pretend to have heaven's mandate, while getting the real Ki-rin who was coming to bless his rival Prince's bid for the crown petrified.

Now, Coatl and Unicorns are more to my tastes as far as good supernatural monsters go, not so "Deus ex machine", I'd even use the wackier ones like Baku and Hollyphant in preference to a Ki-rin, since they strike me as offering more potential as interesting characters, at least as described in their official AD&D write-ups.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9559780)

Perhaps their most interesting quality is their ability to create essentially infinite amounts of food, drink and other items. For some reason I want to imagine a Kirin as a kind of moveable logistics camp for a lawful good army, ready to create extra rations and weaponry at a moment's notice. But that's just ridiculous and I'm not sure why it seems so attractive.

Yes, but according to their write-up Ki-rin can only create food and beverages once a day for 2d12 people. Also, AD&D Ki-rin "sustain themselves by creating their own food and drink" and they're bigger than most elephants [Huge 13'], so logically they should need to consume most, if not all, of the food they can create assuming that "people" means "an average human".

Incidentally, I suspect the reason they only eat magically created food is to remove the risk of them harming a living thing. The legendary Kirin was such a peaceful creature it would take great care not to tread on any living creature - it would step on the ground so lightly that it would not damage a blade of grass - and only ate herbs, never meat.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9559780)

There is one more item of note: a Kirin's skin is worth 25,000 gps, but "possession of such a item is dangerous, due to the retribution that may be visited upon the possessor by other ki-rin, sympathetic humanoids, or intelligent lawful good monsters." Adventure to recover a slain Kirin's skin, anybody?

Isn't there a story about a Kirin's skin having healing powers, or am I getting it mixed up with another mythological beastie? In Jessica Amanda Salmonson's book The Golden Naginata the titular implement was a magical weapon that a Kirin carried within its horn, that the book's heroine was charged to cut off in order to reinforce the emperor's authority. However, I don't think that had any basis in legend, except for a minor parallel with the legend of the sword Grasscutter (Kusanagi) being found in a dragon's tail.

JRM

11-04-2008 07:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9562546)

Female ki-rin were filled in in one of the planescape supplements. They're depressingly similar, only even more insanely powerful. Definitely a case of wasted potential there. My own pet theory had the females be some chaotic evil creature, and ki-rin sex become a deeply embarrassing negotiation process that both sides only put up with to get more kids of their own gender, and treachery and infanticide being common in the child-raising process.

Sounds like a job for the Girdle of Masculinity/Femininity.

"Noble Ki-rin, the good news is we've found a way for you to perpetuate your kind without consorting with the Evil Ones. The bad news is one of you will have to sacrifice his horns."

"Horns, Oh esteemed sages? But we only have one horn."

"We're not just talking about the one on you forehead.":o

Five Eyes

11-04-2008 07:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Hmm, according to Chinese legend Ki-rin only appear in areas under a benevolent leader, to bless the virtuous, or to protect good people by punishing the wicked. Could that first bit have AD&D applications? Say, a country were a Ki-rin appears to approve its newly crowned rulers, but one Evil Prince creates a fake Ki-rin to pretend to have heaven's mandate, while getting the real Ki-rin who was coming to bless his rival Prince's bid for the crown petrified.

This plays out in the anime adaptation of Twelve Kingdoms, sort of. The ki-rin in that are adversely affected by violence and blood, so it's subdued at first by a good deed of blood being dropped on it (if I'm remembering right.)

To riff on the "imprisoned Ki-rin" used to justify a false mandate, then, the Ki-rin is kept captive, fed only meat (violating it's desire to avoid causing harm and keeping it subdued/weakened), and is trotted out for special occasions. In a particularly brutal LE regime, it might even be public knowledge that the Ki-rin is a captive - it's a sign of their nation's strength, which is such that it does not have to submit meekly to the will of Heaven.

(un)reason

11-04-2008 09:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9564589)
Sounds like a job for the Girdle of Masculinity/Femininity.

"Noble Ki-rin, the good news is we've found a way for you to perpetuate your kind without consorting with the Evil Ones. The bad news is one of you will have to sacrifice his horns."

"Horns, Oh esteemed sages? But we only have one horn."

"We're not just talking about the one on you forehead.":o

Hee. This is of course dependent on psychology not being dependent on physiology, which as polymorph spells showed back then, was very much not the case in D&D. (This of course ties in with all the controversy about D&D creatures having inherent morality from birth.) You adopt the form, you start thinking like them pretty quickly.

noisms

11-04-2008 05:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes (Post 9564610)

To riff on the "imprisoned Ki-rin" used to justify a false mandate, then, the Ki-rin is kept captive, fed only meat (violating it's desire to avoid causing harm and keeping it subdued/weakened), and is trotted out for special occasions. In a particularly brutal LE regime, it might even be public knowledge that the Ki-rin is a captive - it's a sign of their nation's strength, which is such that it does not have to submit meekly to the will of Heaven.

Very cool. How is the Kirin kept captive in the first place, though? Perhaps a hostage female or baby?

David J Prokopetz

11-04-2008 11:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9566280)

Very cool. How is the Kirin kept captive in the first place, though? Perhaps a hostage female or baby?

Perhaps forcing it to subsist on "polluted" food is enough to restrain its powers. Ever see The Golden Child?

JRM

11-05-2008 12:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9565039)

Hee. This is of course dependent on psychology not being dependent on physiology, which as polymorph spells showed back then, was very much not the case in D&D. (This of course ties in with all the controversy about D&D creatures having inherent morality from birth.) You adopt the form, you start thinking like them pretty quickly.

Ha! You cannot think to defeat the sages so easily. Know you not of the Helm of Reverse Alignment. :cool:

noisms

11-06-2008 05:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read]AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Gi-Z(?)]

I'll start a new thread before the SINISTER POWERS THAT BE shut down this one for being too long.

noisms

11-06-2008 05:17 AM

[Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre~?]

Part 3. Will this be the final installment of our epic trek? Let's see.

Kirre

I'd forgotten all about the Kirre - and it's easy to see why, because it's quite a forgettable beastie; really all it is is a glorified psionic tiger with horns and six legs. It has no special abilities beyond what is suggested by that: lots of attacks per round (7) and some psychic blast type things.

In fact it's really a rather anticlimactic way of beginning this third section of the thread. Hopefully things will be looking up tomorrow, when Kobolds rear their ugly little heads.

In the mean time, seeing as how we're now over half way through the MM, a poll based on a broadly representative smattering of popular entries.

6inTruder

11-06-2008 06:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre~?]

GAH! Fucking Dark Sun monsters shouldn't be IN the basic MM!! They could'a put in the Flumph and it'd'a been better!

edit: Oh yeah, and I chose Gnoll, because of my idea with the Flinds being the females of the species. Which I still rather like.

DMH

11-06-2008 07:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre~?]

Out of that bunch, the carrion crawler. I like the ankheg and feyr, but they don't invoke that visceral horror the crawler does.

And where is the deepspawn?

6inTruder

11-06-2008 10:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre~?]

Actually, I'd be inclined towards the Anubian Jacklere too. But only one vote...

So... Bollocks to the Kirre and on to the KOBOLD!

Dr. Prunesquallor

11-06-2008 10:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

What, no Ixixachitl?

Gnolls, all the way. Hyena-headed half-man carrion-eaters, what's not to love?

Kakita Kojiro

11-06-2008 10:40 AM

I'll just assume "Hobgolin" is the same as sea caballero, and vote for that, eh? ;)

demiurge1138

11-06-2008 11:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The kirre pisses me off. Why?

1) It has a gore attack. That's cool. But then why do its horns face backwards, where they can't actually poke at anybody?

2) The flavor-text mentions that it is a favored game animal for many peoples in Athas' jungles. No wonder everybody is starving on that planet. Don't feed only on top carnivores, people! There's not much nutrition in 'em!

kami2awa

11-06-2008 04:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9575517)
The kirre pisses me off. Why?

1) It has a gore attack. That's cool. But then why do its horns face backwards, where they can't actually poke at anybody?

Many really animals with backward-pointing horns can gore people. It just requires that the animal can get its head down far enough.

Wakshaani

11-06-2008 08:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Heck, it's a magical critter ... teh horns might be able to unfurl, like a birthday party noisemaker, to impale someone as well.

Bonus points if it makes the same sound. :)

Just wanted to say, here, that I missed alllll ove rthe old threadstuff and have been just recently reading and jotting ideas like a crazy person. These threads are gold and I'm thrilled to finally be in on the ground floor of one. (Just past the Carrion Crawler, currently.) ... Long, LONG pile of reading yet to go, but, you'll have my nutburger self contributing from here on out.

Wakboth

11-06-2008 08:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Gnolls for the win! :)

And yeah, kirre is a disappointing monster. I'm sure they had more interesting critters with wider applicability in other settings in Dark Sun, so why on Athas did they go with something this lame?

This sort of "one monster from setting X, one monster from Y, and ten monsters from Z, with half the information needed to run them missing" thing is the biggest problem with the 2e MM. It really betrays its origins as a collection of monsters from several Monstrous Compendiums.

Ah well, the kobolds will be cool. :)

noisms

11-06-2008 11:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9576643)

*Just wanted to say, here, that I missed alllll ove rthe old threadstuff and have been just recently reading and jotting ideas like a crazy person. These threads are gold and I'm thrilled to finally be in on the ground floor of one. (Just past the Carrion Crawler, currently.) ... Long, LONG pile of reading yet to go, but, you'll have my nutburger self contributing from here on out.*

Welcome aboard. I have promised to pdf-ize the whole thing once it's done, so hopefully that'll make things easier to catch up on.

randomgamer8466

11-06-2008 11:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I voted Carrion Crawler, because The Carrion Crawlers is the name of my band in Rock Band.

HaplessVictim

11-07-2008 12:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I voted beholder out of respect. Ain't nothing more old school and deadly than a huge, magical, flying eyeball that eats you.

demiurge1138

11-07-2008 12:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kir~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9576240)

Many really animals with backward-pointing horns can gore people. It just requires that the animal can get its head down far enough.

Yeah... but can they snap their heads down far enough to gore and then snap them back up to bite within... oh, six seconds? If the kirre got a special charging attack with its horns and had the rest of its natural weapons on a normal attack, it'd be fine, but attacking with both backwards horns and a bite in the same round has it whipping around like it was headbanging.

Inyssius

11-07-2008 12:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kir~?]

I don't know how psionics work in Dark Sun, but the kirre might need less food than you might expect. If it's capable of sustaining itself mostly via its own psychic powers (like mind flayers), that would make it a pretty excellent animal to hunt--you get more food out of it than you put in.

Wakboth

11-07-2008 02:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kir~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9577501)

Yeah... but can they snap their heads down far enough to gore and then snap them back up to bite within... oh, six seconds? If the kirre got a special charging attack with its horns and had the rest of its natural weapons on a normal attack, it'd be fine, but attacking with both backwards horns and a bite in the same round has it whipping around like it was headbanging.

2e melee rounds were 1 minute in length (and every attack was assumed to involve several feints, blows and such), so this isn't really a problem.

sim_james

11-07-2008 07:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kir~?]

One vote for the kenku.

You never know how many kenku are watching you right now.

noisms

11-07-2008 09:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiuss (Post 9577577)

I don't know how psionics work in Dark Sun, but the kirre might need less food than you might expect. If it's capable of sustaining itself mostly via its own psychic powers (like mind flayers), that would make it a pretty excellent animal to hunt--you get more food out of it than you put in.

The solution to the world's hunger problems: Kirre.

Actually the only psionic powers they have are of the psychokinetic and telepathic variety. I think the food creation powers are in the psychometabolic school.

kelvingreen

11-07-2008 09:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre?]

Yeah, I voted for the Kenku. Got to love those feathered sages!

YojimboC

11-08-2008 12:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre?]

My mom says hobgoblins are cool.

Five Eyes

11-08-2008 12:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre?]

The best use I can think of for a Kirre is as some sort of gladiatorial beast - like, as a replacement for normal animals, more powerful/renowned gladiators have to fight naturally-psionic, semi-intelligent relatives.

In a CS where psionics is relatively unknown, or presents a potent threat to most parties, having the party be sent to "round up" a slew of some of the many "Normal beastie + psionics" for a local colloseum could be fun, especially if the party's not entirely certain what the beasts can do.

Gnolls, of course.

JRM

11-08-2008 06:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9575365)
I'll just assume "Hobgolin" is the same as sea caballero, and vote for that, eh? ;)

Ay Caramba! The Sea Caballeros thank you for your support, despite you conflating them with those scourges of the sea, the Koalinth.

JRM

11-08-2008 06:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9575517)
The kirre pisses me off. Why?

1) It has a gore attack. That's cool. But then why do its horns face backwards, where they can't actually poke at anybody?

2) The flavor-text mentions that it is a favored game animal for many peoples in Athas' jungles. No wonder everybody is starving on that planet. Don't feed only on top carnivores, people! There's not much nutrition in 'em!

I had no memory of this creature being in the Monstrous Manual at all. Maybe psionic eight-legged horned tigers just aren't interesting enough to stick in the mind. Anyhows, regarding your points:

1) Yes, being able to gore and bite in the same round used to bother me about gargoyles with their claw/claw/bite/horn routine, Even if they have a whole minute to use both attacks, realistically they'd be better off trying to strike with their horns or fangs twice rather than switching between them, but that's just the way the AD&D melee round works.

...Although I do like the idea of headbanging psionic eight-legged horned tigers. Kirre are sapient after all, and sages say that even dumb beasts can enjoy music. Now I'm imagining them shaking their stuff to Eye of the Tiger.*

(2) To be fair, the 2E MM description says that Kirre are favoured game because they're particularly tasty. That doesn't necessarily mean that they're a major source of food for the Athasian hunting tribes, they're more likely to be prestigious prey items.

*EDIT: Speaking of eyes, the MM illustration shows a Kirre with blue eyes, but the accompanying description says "The yellow eyes of this creature against the dark grey fur of its face create a fearsome appearance." It's not the first illo-text inconsistency in the Monstrous Manual, and I suspect it won't be the last.

Mulling it over, I think I prefer Kirre with blue eyes. Gives them a spooky air, like those creepy Persian cats so beloved of superspy Nemeses like Blofeld.

noisms

11-09-2008 08:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Kobold

Here they are. Everybody's favourite whipping boys. Indeed, it's my theory that kobolds are the most commonly encountered D&D monsters - more frequently found even than orcs or goblins. That's because they're the easiest fodder for 1st level characters, who orcs or hobgoblins can easily be too tough for in numbers.

Like probably everybody I like kobolds. I do however recognise that there's something odd going on with their makeup: why is there such ambivalence about whether they're little dog creatures or little reptilian creatures? There is definitely a place for little dog humanoid creatures in D&D, so why they muddied the waters with the scaly skin is a bit of a mystery.

Some interesting points to note:

- Kobolds attack gnomes on sight, and will not either take them prisoner or even eat them. I wonder if there was ever a justification for the gnome v. kobold idea, other than an attempt to make gnomes seem more interesting?
- Kobolds will generally not attack humans, elves or dwarves unless they outnumber them by 2 to 1, and even then will not attack until they have softened up their opponents with missile attacks. There's plenty of scope for sneaky attritional tactics.
- A favourite tactic is to drop poisonous insects on enemies from murder holes when in their dens. In all my years of playing D&D I don't think I've ever used, or encountered, monsters dropping poisonous insects on people - but I will now. As always, you have to regret the fact that there are no greatly detailed rules for different kinds of natural poisons in AD&D.
- Kobolds also apparently hate goblins, not just gnomes and pixies and the like; there are 'numerous' kobold-goblin wars, which dwarves appreciate for keeping their numbers down.

Urd

Urds are a bit like the flind to the kobold's gnoll, except with wings. They are a tougher, more intelligent, nastier version, who like to drop rocks from above.

Wakshaani

11-09-2008 08:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Tucker's Kobolds pretty much redefined the entire concept of humanoid monsters for me, from "Faceless mooks" ala "10' by 10' room with an orc and a chest" to "Actual thinking, feeling opponents. And they have a plan."

I can't say enough good things about them!

Adventure hooks generally come out of the 3.5 version, with clerics and sorcerers and Draconic lineage, but, we don't have that here, aside from the Bird... pardon ... Urds, who have wings.

But there's that Gnome hate.

Perhaps, as trapmakers, Kobolds just detest the idea of 'cheating' with magical illusions, which Gnomes are famous for? In ancient history, they were friendly races who shared a common love for pranks, but, a huge contest for one-upmanship on trapmaking and prank-crafting turned on Gnomes busting out mad illusion skills and the Kobolds, feeling betrayed, declared never-ending war?

kelvingreen

11-09-2008 08:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9586776)

Kobold

Here they are. Everybody's favourite whipping boys.

And now I get to ask:

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9538425)

Kobolds might be the classic "play them cleverly and terrify the high level characters"

Tell me more! I'm fascinated.

Kakita Kojiro

11-09-2008 09:11 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9586776)

- Kobolds attack gnomes on sight, and will not either take them prisoner or even eat them. I wonder if there was ever a justification for the gnome v. kobold idea, other than an attempt to make gnomes seem more interesting?

Presumably it is a sly wink to their mythical antecedents -- both kobolds and gnomes being little folk associated with underground, mining, etc.

In-game, of course, it got mythologized to a feud between Garl Glittergold and Kurtulmak, which I've always thought was a nice riff (much like the tiff between Gruumsh and Corellon Larethian).

Wakshaani

11-09-2008 10:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9586829)

And now I get to ask:

Tell me more! I'm fascinated.

Back in the Olde Days, before the idea of "Monsters with CLASSES?!" took off, there was a Dragon Magazine article about a DM named Tucker and his Kobolds. These Kobolds weren't skittery lil' yapping guys who ran away at teh first sign of trouble and died in droves to a 3rd level party. No, TUCKER'S Kobolds were kitted out with posioned arrows, fired in fusilades from hollow walls and murder holes. They'd trigger pit traps beneath a party then rain Green Slime on them while they were in teh hole, or rig a door to lockafetr being entered, then push a 10' tall pile of burning debris ahead of them with metal 10' poles until eventually they pinned the adventuring team between a cold hard wall of rock and a 10' by 10' pile of burning wood, pressed until dead.

They were every nightmare story of a Vietnam Vet's come to life, sneaky bastards, full of hate, and they wou dkill you just because you were taller than they were.

(quick websearch)

Ahh, here we go!

Ladies, gentlemen, and newbies, let me present to you the very first bonified revolution in monster encounters... Tucker's Kobolds.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Dragon Magazine #127

Tucker's kobolds

This month's editorial is about Tucker's kobolds. We get letters on occasion asking for advice on creating high-level AD&D® game adventures, and Tucker's kobolds seem to fit the bill.

Many high-level characters have little to do because they're not challenged. They yawn at tarrasques and must be forcibly kept awake when a lich appears. The DMs involved don't know what to do, so they stop dealing with the problem and the characters go into Character Limbo. Getting to high level is hard, but doing anything once you get there is worse.

One of the key problems in adventure design lies in creating opponents who can challenge powerful characters. Singular monsters like tarrasques and liches are easy to gang up on; the party can concentrate its firepower on the target until the target falls down dead and wiggles its little feet in the air. Designing monsters more powerful than a tarrasque is self-defeating; if the group kills your super-monster, what will you do next? "send in its mother? That didn't work on Beowulf, and it probably won't work here.

Worse yet, singular supermonsters rarely have to think. They just use their trusty, predictable claw/claw/bite. This shouldn't be the measure of a campaign. These games fall apart because there's no challenge to them, no mental stimulation - no danger.

In all the games that I've seen, the worst, most horrible, most awful beyond-comparison opponents ever seen were often weaker than the characters who fought them. They were simply well-armed and intelligent beings who were played by the DM to be utterly ruthless and clever. Tucker's kobolds were like that.

Tucker ran an incredibly dangerous dungeon in the days I was stationed at Ft. Bragg, N.C. This dungeon had corridor that changed all of your donkeys into huge flaming demons or dropped the whole party into acid baths, but the demons were weenies compared to the kobolds on Level One. These kobolds were just regular kobolds, with 1-4 hp and all that, but they were mean. When I say they were mean, I mean they were bad, Jim. They graduated magna cum laude from the Sauron Institute for the Criminally Vicious.

When I joined the gaming group, some of the PCs had already met Tucker's kobolds, and they were not eager to repeat the experience. The party leader went over the penciled map of the dungeon and tried to find ways to avoid the little critters, but it was not possible. The group resigned itself to making a run for it through Level One to get to the elevators, where we could go down to Level Ten and fight "okay" monsters like huge flaming demons.

It didn't work. The kobolds caught us about 60' into the dungeon and locked the door behind us and barred it. Then they set the corridor on fire, while we were still in it.

"NOOOOOO!!!" screamed the party leader. "It's THEM! Run!!!"

Thus encouraged, our party scrambled down a side passage, only to be ambushed by more kobolds firing with light crossbows through murder holes in the walls and ceilings. Kobolds with metal armor and shields flung Molotov cocktails at us from the other sides of huge piles of flaming debris, which other kobolds pushed ahead of their formation using long metal poles like broomsticks. There was no mistake about it. These kobolds were bad.

We turned to our group leader for advice.

"AAAAAAGH!!!" he cried, hands clasped over his face to shut out the tactical situation.

We abandoned most of our carried items and donkeys to speed our flight toward the elevators, but we were cut off by kobold snipers who could split-move and fire, ducking back behind stones and corners after launching steel-tipped bolts and arrows, javelins, hand axes, and more flaming oil bottles. We ran into an unexplored section of Level One, taking damage all the time. It was then we discovered that these kobolds had honeycombed the first level with small tunnels to speed their movements. Kobold commandos were everywhere. All of our hirelings died. Most of our henchmen followed. We were next.

I recall we had a 12th-level magic user with us, and we asked him to throw a spell or something. "Blast 'em!" we yelled as we ran. "Fireball 'em! Get those little @#+$%*&!!!"

"What, in these narrow corridors?" he yelled back. "You want I should burn us all up instead of them?"

Our panicked flight suddenly took us to a dead-end corridor, where a giant air shaft dropped straight down into unspeakable darkness, far past Level Ten. Here we hastily pounded spikes into the floors and walls, flung ropes over the ledge, and climbed straight down into that unspeakable darkness, because anything we met down there was sure to be better than those kobolds.

We escaped, met some huge flaming demons on Level Ten, and even managed to kill one after about an hour of combat and the lives of half the group. We felt pretty good, but the group leader could not be cheered up.

"We still have to go out the way we came in," he said as he gloomily prepared to divide up the treasure.

Tucker's kobolds were the worst things we could imagine. They ate all our donkeys and took our treasure and did everything they could to make us miserable, but they had style and brains and tenacity and courage. We respected them and loved them, sort of, because they were never boring.

If kobolds could do this to a group of PCs from 6th to 12th level, picture what a few orcs and some low level NPCs could do to a 12th-16th level group, or a gang of mid-level NPCs and monsters to groups of up to 20th level. Then give it a try. Sometimes, it's the little things used well that count.

Roger E. Moore

Let me add, here, that 6th level was fairly big back then and double-digit levels were nearly unheard of. I never saw a legit game go past 12th level (That'd be about 34th in 3rd edition terms!), so, you should realize how BIG this sort of thing was.

demiurge1138

11-09-2008 10:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Ahh... kobolds. Love those little guys. Love them so much, I ran an entire campaign based on them--a prehistoric world where all of the races were reptilian. Kobolds were the Empire, with loads of oppression, bureaucracy, and getting bigger races to do most of the fighting for them.

The first mastermind villain of the first dungeon I ever wrote was a kobold. Kojark was a kobold sorcerer who, for kicks, would give adventuring parties cursed items, then invite them to test themselves in his castle (built within the skull of a dead god) to see if they were worthy enough to give it back. The whole scenario was something very much akin to a Gygaxian ludicrous dungeon, full of unfair monsters, ridiculously deadly traps and sheer goofiness, written by someone (me) who'd never seen a Gygaxian dungeon in his life. It was deliriously fun, and people who played in it occasionally try to get me to convert it and run it again, but I think the joy would be lost.

(un)reason

11-09-2008 05:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9586829)
And now I get to ask:

Tell me more! I'm fascinated.

To expand on the tuckers kobolds editorial, another excellent example of this was the megadungeon classic Dragon Mountain. There, your primary foe was an entire mountain full of various tribes of kobolds, each with their own distinctive sets of tactics. (although all made heavy use of type E poison, which is the great equalizer, which combined with natural 20's always hitting, made them dangerous to adventurers no matter how tough they were.) The combination of these tactics were more than enough to be a challenge to 10th-15th (the expected party level) PC's, but also allowed for a dungeon that was hard but doable (if your characters played things similarly smart) for a far wider level range than usual. If you managed to make it through the dungeon, the dragon played on this, essentially saying if you had so much trouble with kobolds, how do you think you'll fare against a Great Wyrms Dragon, puny mortals? Rather demoralising. :D

Essentially, the big lesson here is that raw power counts for less than you think, if you can't ever get into a position to properly apply that power. If you control the battlefield, get good equipment, and work together properly, you can take on giant monsters which could swat you in a single hit and win. It's something that is integral to the success of humans in the real world, but it works just as fine against us if we forget to apply those lessons, and just wade in with swords swinging and no plan other than attack till they die. And Kobolds have become the ideal means to apply that lesson.

JRM

11-09-2008 06:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9587798)

To expand on the tuckers kobolds editorial, another excellent example of this was the megadungeon classic Dragon Mountain. There, your primary foe was an entire mountain full of various tribes of kobolds, each with their own distinctive sets of tactics. (although all made heavy use of type E poison, which is the great equalizer, which combined with natural 20's always hitting, made them dangerous to adventurers no matter how tough they were.) The combination of these tactics were more than enough to be a challenge to 10th-15th (the expected party level) PC's, but also allowed for a dungeon that was hard but doable (if your characters played things similarly smart) for a far wider level range than usual. If you managed to make it through the dungeon, the dragon played on this, essentially saying if you had so much trouble with kobolds, how do you think you'll fare against a Great Wyrms Dragon, puny mortals? Rather demoralising. :D

Essentially, the big lesson here is that raw power counts for less than you think, if you can't ever get into a position to properly apply that power. If you control the battlefield, get good equipment, and work together properly, you can take on giant monsters which could swat you in a single hit and win. It's something that is integral to the success of humans in the real world, but it works just as fine against us if we forget to apply those lessons, and just wade in with swords swinging and no plan other than attack till they die. And Kobolds have become the ideal means to apply that lesson.

The closest equivalent in 3rd edition D&D I can think of is MonkeyGod's The Hero Snare, also starring Kobolds. There's also a Dungeon magazine adventure which does something similar with goblins in a mine, but not so mercilessly. Unless my memory fails me it was Tallow's Deep in Dungeon #18. I actually started running that one for my players but they gave up and left after a couple of sessions, one of them complained they wanted to adventure in a place he could stand up without hitting his head on the ceiling.

Once upon a time I played around with ideas as to how to play the "Killer Kobold" game when the kobold's live on the surface, in one of the "overgrown forests" they are noted as inhabiting in their Monstrous Manual's Habitat/Society. It would have been a bit trickier for them to adapt the terrain to suit them than in a dungeon, since movement would be less constricted for the enemy - and remember, Kobolds move more slowly (6") than most adventures, so I had to adapt the equalizers to things like:

- The Kobolds are ruled by shamans, who have a Crystal Ball they use to watch for enemies approaching their town/village, and who use bat familiars and trained bats to send messages to co-ordinate their defense.
- The first time the adventurers know they've entered Kobold territory is when a couple of the kobold's elite scouts sneak into the camp and try to slit the throats of their sleeping companions.
- Lots of traps in the forest - deadfalls, spiked pits, punji stakes, arrows-snares, snares. All the jungle war film clichés.
- The traditional Kobold fighting style relying on ambushes with massed missile fire, flaming oil, green slime flasks and poison. Then running away before the adventures can do much damage to them. Obviously, they flee through a passel of the previously mentioned jungle death-traps, which are primed behind them.
- More numerous trained beasts - and the Kobold chief and his guards ride those boars and giant weasels into battle!
- When they do get to the Kobold's lair they see the traditional pair of 6'+ tall doors. Obviously, it's a trap. The real entrances are hidden trapdoors so small even a fat Kobold may have trouble squeezing through them.

kelvingreen

11-09-2008 07:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

So, essentially, "weak but very clever" covers it. Interesting.

DMH

11-09-2008 07:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Cessna's mother (another poster here) did something similar to MERP using orcs. I'll PM him for the details.

YojimboC

11-09-2008 10:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Even knowing about Tucker's kobolds (I don't think I ever saw that editorial before, but it was a popular topic in Dragon's Forum when I first started reading that magazine), I never really used kobolds. Half a hit die? No thanks. I turned to the goblin races for cannon fodder.

I think I've encountered more kobolds playing Balder's Gate than I ever did playing AD&D.

JRM

11-09-2008 11:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9588158)

Even knowing about Tucker's kobolds (I don't think I ever saw that editorial before, but it was a popular topic in Dragon's Forum when I first started reading that magazine), I never really used kobolds. Half a hit die? No thanks. I turned to the goblin races for cannon fodder.

I think I've encountered more kobolds playing Balder's Gate than I ever did playing AD&D.

Yes, the 1d4 hit points is a big problem with Kobolds and Goblins, especially with the early edition rules on fighters multiple attacks against weak foes. I was thinking of avoiding that by introducing a strain of Killer Kobolds with two or more 1d4 Hit Dice (2-8 hit points, attack as 2HD monsters). Maybe they'd been interbreeding with Urds, which have 2d8+ Hit Dice?

But then I'm cruel.

Kaiten

11-10-2008 01:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Holy Hell, I'd forgotten all about Urds. Kobolds that fly? Yes please!

JohnBiles

11-10-2008 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9586776)

Kobold

- Kobolds attack gnomes on sight, and will not either take them prisoner or even eat them. I wonder if there was ever a justification for the gnome v. kobold idea, other than an attempt to make gnomes seem more interesting?

Gnomes and Kobolds are competing for exactly the same ecological niche and thus are pretty much doomed to inevitable conflict since one race tends good and the other evil.

(Now I have the sudden idea of Kobolds as the 'Drow' to the Gnomes, the way Duergar and Derro are for Dwarves...)

Wakboth

11-10-2008 05:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9586776)

Kobold

Here they are. Everybody's favourite whipping boys. Indeed, it's my theory that kobolds are the most commonly encountered D&D monsters - more frequently found even than orcs or goblins. That's because they're the easiest fodder for 1st level characters, who orcs or hobgoblins can easily be too tough for in numbers.

I don't know; in 2e, we probably slaughtered more goblins than kobolds. That 1d4 hp was a bit too wimpy...

Quote:

[*]A favourite tactic is to drop poisonous insects on enemies from murder holes when in their dens. In all my years of playing D&D I don't think I've ever used, or encountered, monsters dropping poisonous insects on people - but I will now. As always, you have to regret the fact that there are no greatly detailed rules for different kinds of natural poisons in AD&D.

That was a neat little detail; not because of its efficiency, but because of what it implied of kobolds. :)

Anyway, Tucker's kobolds (which really worked only because of GM fiat and the general tendency of GMs not to use good tactics with humanoid enemies) aside, I think these little buggers really started to shine with 3e. The thing that appealed to me about kobolds was the obvious "height envy", and the nasty, trap-making character. In my mind, kobolds were not just vicious little runts like goblins; they had a sense of humor and they indulged it whenever they had the chance.

Of course, the kobold jokes and pranks were generally only funny for the kobolds... :D

Wakshaani

11-10-2008 08:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Modern Kobolds also have the HUGE advantages of having class levels, so, you get Kobold Rogue trapmakers, Kobold Clerics (Of Tiamat!), and, of course, Kobold Sorcerers... lil' bastards tossing volleys of Magic Missiles through murderholes is just ... arrrrg.

sim_james

11-10-2008 12:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JohnBiles (Post 9588963)

(Now I have the sudden idea of Kobolds as the 'Drow' to the Gnomes, the way Duergar and Derro are for Dwarves...)

If so, do gnomes have some kind of draconic heritage that nobody knows about?

Or were the ancient ancestors of the kobold gnome half-dragons whose blood has been thinned over the millennia?

Wakboth

11-10-2008 03:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JohnBiles (Post 9588963)

(Now I have the sudden idea of Kobolds as the 'Drow' to the Gnomes, the way Duergar and Derro are for Dwarves...)

It's interesting that the gnomes are, as far as I can tell, the only demihuman race whose Underdark version isn't evil. Duergar are LE killjoys, derro are insane, and we all know about the drow... yet the svirfneblin are just standoffish, nothing worse.

demiurge1138

11-10-2008 04:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There are, actually, deep halflings. Everybody forgets about them, and I'm not sure if they have any precedent before the 3e Monster Manual. Much like svirfneblin, they're just sort of grumpy and isolationist, not evil.

noisms

11-10-2008 08:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9589517)

Modern Kobolds also have the HUGE advantages of havingc lass levels, so, you get Kobold Rogue trapmakers, Kobold Clerics (Of Tiamat!), and, of course, Kobold Sorcerers... lil' bastards tossing vollies of Magic Missiles through murderholes is just ... arrrrg.

True, although it isn't THAT hard to create tougher Kobold chiefs, shamans, mages and the like with 2nd edition rules. Just give them a few extra hit dice and access to a couple of spells.

noisms

11-10-2008 08:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9590414)

It's interesting that the gnomes are, as far as I can tell, the only demihuman race whose Underdark version isn't evil. Duergar are LE killjoys, derro are insane, and we all know about the drow... yet the svirfneblin are just standoffish, nothing worse.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9590508)

There are, actually, deep halflings. Everybody forgets about them, and I'm not sure if they have any precedent before the 3e Monster Manual. Much like svirfneblin, they're just sort of grumpy and isolationist, not evil.

The underdark versions of halflings and gnomes seem utterly pointless to me. People complain enough as it is that there's little to distinguish gnomes and dwarves, and the sverfneblin are even more dwarf-like than their above-ground cousins. And by taking halflings and making them "grumpy and isolationist" they basically removed everything uniquely halfling and turned them into weaker, less interesting dwarves.

sim_james

11-10-2008 09:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

True. I think that if I were to use an Underdark halfling race, I'd place them in a vast cavern lit by electically-charged gas as seen in Journey to the Centre of the Earth (complete with dinosaurs, giant insects, and other weirdness).

Then I'd use Athasian halflings, hunting amid the giant mushroom jungles..

demiurge1138

11-11-2008 01:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Svirfneblin are interesting, but not the way they're usually played. I'd play them up as being like Norse-myth dwarves-- secretive, live deep underground, access to weird magic and wondrous item-crafting capabilities. OK, so this makes them more like dwarves. But emphasizing their magic might be a good way to further differentiate them.

6inTruder

11-11-2008 05:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9586776)
Urd

Urds are a bit like the flind to the kobold's gnoll, except with wings. They are a tougher, more intelligent, nastier version, who like to drop rocks from above.

Kobold: Average.
Urd: Low.

see

11-11-2008 09:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I favored the idea of kobold necromancers, instead of generalist mages — if only because that maximized their difference from gnome illusionists — with the same "any two allowed classes, but not three" multiclassing option as gnomes. (And let's nevermind the Complete Book of Humanoids.)

Since the ability requirement for necromancy was Wisdom 16, in practice effectively all kobold necromancers would be multiclassed cleric/necromancers, given how well the powers of evil clerics synergize with necromancy. (Much like the Dex 16 requirement meant gnome illusionists were natural illusionist/thieves, especially with how those two synergized.)

The result was that the leadership of the kobold empire was a theomagocracy of cleric/necromancers . . . wise, intelligent, organized, malevolent, and commanding armies of undead. With the undead serving as cannon fodder, kobolds were reserved for specialist tasks in the army — missileers, artillerymen, giant weasel cavalry. The urds of the empire were seen by the kobolds as the dumb brute cousins, but served as air support and reconnaissance.

Nobody messed with the Empire of the Kobolds. Fortunately, it was remote from the centers of human civilization.

noisms

11-11-2008 07:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9592829)

Kobold: Average.

Urd: Low.

That's weird, I completely misread that. Okay, tougher, less intelligent, nastier version...

noisms

11-11-2008 09:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Kuo-Toa

Well, straight after the Kobold we have another famous 'bad guy' monster, the Kuo-toa. These never featured in many of my games because I was never a big fan of the Forgotten Realms or the Underdark, or indeed long winded underground adventures. But the Kuo-toa are undoubtedly an interesting beastie; I'm a sucker for the idea of lost empires and vestigial remnants of once great civilisations. I love the idea that over the millennia they have "become somewhat unstable, possibly as a result of inbreeding, and insanity is common among the species." Indeed, it's a big mystery to me why the Kuo-toa are so much less popular than the boring old Drow.

They also have a good called Blibdoolpoolp. What's not to love?

Some weird titbits:

- The Kuo-toa religious language is a corruption of 'that used on the Elemental Plane of Water' (whatever that is; Water Common?). This means that if a Kuo-toa priest runs across a water elemental being, there is a 75% chance that it will not be attacked. Now that has to be a rare occurrence in a game.
- Kuo-toa have superglue shields, which grab opponents' weapons 25% of the time - with a Bend Bars roll required to remove it.
- They call their babies 'fingerlings' - lord knows why.
- They light up their caverns with phosphorescent fungi. Not as strange as it may sound - I've actually seen phosphorescent fungi.

sim_james

11-11-2008 10:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Deep Ones! Except under the earth rather than in the harbour...

... and their goddess has better boobies than Mother Hydra.

(Thank goodness for the Egyptian deities section of Deities and Demigods, or far too many younguns might have fixated on the unnatural-headed nude...)

Wakboth

11-11-2008 10:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9596071)

ndeed, it's a big mystery to me why the Kuo-toa are so much less popular than the boring old Drow.

Hot evil lesbian dominatrixes vs. goggle-eyed, pallid insane fish-people. :D

Quote:

- The Kuo-toa religious language is a corruption of 'that used on the Elemental Plane of Water' (whatever that is; Water Common?). This means that if a Kuo-toa priest runs across a water elemental being, there is a 75% chance that it will not be attacked. Now that has to be a rare occurrence in a game.
- Kuo-toa have superglue shields, which grab opponents' weapons 25% of the time - with a Bend Bars roll required to remove it.
- They call their babies 'fingerlings' - lord knows why.
- They light up their caverns with phosphorescent fungi. Not as strange as it may sound - I've actually seen phosphorescent fungi.

"Fingerling" is a real term for young fish, especially trout or salmon.

Kuo-toas are an excellent example of 2e's approach to rules, by the way; they're full of odd little exceptions and mechanics that never ever show up anywhere else, like the superglue shields.

I think kuo-toas suffer in comparison with the other, better known species of evil fish-people, the sahuagin. They're rather removed from the world, to begin with, whereas sahuagin are out there in the coastal waters, doing their "aquatic shark Nazis" thing.

Hmm... kuo-toas as stand-ins for Lovecraft's Deep Ones, maybe?

noisms

11-11-2008 10:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9596153)

Kuo-toas are an excellent example of 2e's approach to rules, by the way; they're full of odd little exceptions and mechanics that never ever show up anywhere else, like the superglue shields.

Yep, the entry is chock full of such things. One of my favourites is that, if more than 20 are encountered, they have a 50% chance of being 1d6 miles from their lair.

Wakshaani

11-11-2008 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Taking back to 1st ed, you also find that Kuo-Toa are one of the Elder Races, with Lizardmen, Aarocka, and Bullywugs, all HUGE races back before Elves and Dwarves, let alone humans, walked the world. This Sleestak-like coolness has never been explored deeply enough, but, you can stick all manner of cavern complexes and underground ruined temples to unknown gods, toss some fishyness on there, and, bang, Kua-Toa backstory for the PCs to discover. Ever wotner who made Welm of a certain powerful magic item trilogy? Make it a Kuo-Toa artifact that they search for (Thus the chance of a large group far from home) and boom... hotness.

In a similar style, toss out some magic items that were kitted out for Kuo-Toa and underwaterness, rather than human surface style. Changing something as simple as an Arrow of Slaying to a Crossbow Bolt of Slaying, or make Bracers of Armor Class into coral, inlaid with pearls, and it's no longer just a magic item, but an Old One item.

With their religion, you can tie in coastal cultists, or have a saltwater lake in teh backwoods where a small group of (very!) inbred Kuo-Toa lurk, stealing human women (Or having them sacrificed) to try and freshen up the old genepool. (Ewwwww) Nobody in town talk to starngers about it, but, the whole place is kind of eerie. And the two poles at the end of the dock are awfully tall for mooring posts for rowboats, aren't they? ... Are those manacles on them?!

You can also have plot hooks galore using their Ancient Knowledge, by having Drow hunt them down, or have Aquatic ELves send adventurers to go fetch, say, a Kua-Toa priest, to translate the runes on a magical Conch shell.

These guys are bursting with plots.

demiurge1138

11-12-2008 12:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9596153)

Kuo-toas are an excellent example of 2e's approach to rules, by the way; they're full of odd little exceptions and mechanics that never ever show up anywhere else, like the superglue shields.

I think kuo-toas suffer in comparision with the other, better known species of evil fish-people, the sahuagin. They're rather removed from the world, to begin with, whereas sahuagin are out there in the coastal waters, doing their "aquatic shark Nazis" thing.

Hmm... kuo-toas as stand-ins for Lovecraft's Deep Ones, maybe?

I'm surprised nobody picked up on the pincer staff mechanic, which I noticed while reading the kuo-toa entry is a weird one. It can grip anything in girth between an elf and a gnoll? Where exactly is the "humanoids by girth" table?

And kuo-toa as deep ones has definitely been done, mostly in Paizo's Lovecraft-happy years running Dungeon and Dragon. The deep-water kuo-toa are still out there in the very far reaches, worshiping Dagon, and one of the last 3.5 modules released by Dungeon (online) was "Last Breaths of Ashenport", involving a Dagon cult in a sleepy little coastal town using kuo-toa that used to be people as muscle.

If it makes you feel any better, noisms, I've used kuo-toa a lot more than I ever used drow. In one campaign I ran, the kuo-toa were the only of the sleeping races that could not dream--whether this was some quirk in their psychology or a divine curse was never really answered. The kuo-toa's solution? Pull the Dreamlands physically into the Prime Material Plane, which required dozens of kuo-toa sects around the world working in relative unison on various eldritch rituals. The PCs were called on to stop the local ritual--they succeeded, but not all the other teams around the world did. Which is why the moon is a huge skull, and new races of strange creatures began appearing in the world and nobody really noticed...

And Blibdoolpoolp is a running gag in my apartment. As my roommate said, "it makes sense that the name of their god can be said when completely underwater."

YojimboC

11-12-2008 02:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The two page write-up for the Kuo-Toa in the original Fiend Folio was too intimidating for me as a young DM, so I never really used them. Their Monstrous Compendium picture was so lame, on the other hand, that I was never inspired to make use of them even when I was a little more accomplished at gaming.

But now... the idea of degenerate, underground fish-people sounds really cool.

kelvingreen

11-12-2008 04:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yeah, to me, the whole Kuo Toa canon write up gets chucked out the window, and instead they're fantasy Deep Ones. Works for me. One of the better Neverwinter Nights campaigns features an episode complete with Deep Kuo Toa, and the powerful, but trapped, Illithid they worship.

JRM

11-12-2008 06:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9596071)

Kuo-Toa

Weren't Kuo-Toa's Chaotic Neutral with evil tendencies back in first edition? I like that idea better than just making them yet another Evil with a big E race, having Kuo-Toa psychology mirror the apparently crazy randomness of wild oceans and bottomless darkness.

They were also quite approachable in their inaugural module, D2 Shrine of the Kuo-Toa. They were quite happy for adventurers to come in and make offering to the Sea Mother, if they behaved themselves.

The "One of the Elder Races" bit is something that has to be developed further. It's just begging for a Prehistoric Empires campaign, where savage tribes of humans and elves roam the wilderness fighting dinosaurs and other prehistoric beasts, and reptilian civilizations rule the world.

I don't much care for the Kuo Toans equal Deep Ones bit. It's been done, and sahuagin arguably fill that role better. They're already in the sea, and the existence of malenti hints at the possibility of horrible cross-breeding experiments.

see

11-13-2008 08:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9600138)
Weren't Kuo-Toan's Chaotic Neutral with evil tendencies back in first edition?

No, other way around -- NE with chaotic tendencies.

6inTruder

11-13-2008 08:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Did anyone comment on the strangely familiar picture for the Kobold? Just curious.

As for Kuo-toa, I always felt like they needed to get out of the underdark more. At least on the watery side. But underwater adventures always seemed a little... hard to sell?

JRM

11-13-2008 03:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9602803)
Did anyone comment on the strangely familiar picture for the Kobold? Just curious.

As for Kuo-toa, I always felt like they needed to get out of the underdark more. At least on the watery side. But underwater adventures always seemed a little... hard to sell?

Yes, they were a bit of a damp squib as far as most players' enthusiasm goes, at least in my experience. Maybe they don't like the additional restrictions of adventuring underwater? Plus there's the chance of any support ship they brought along sinking, which is a common complaint about nautical adventures.

Aerial adventures seem to be an easier sell, but I don't think they're as common as underwater ones, for some reason. Which is a bit odd, if you think about it.

noisms

11-13-2008 07:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9602803)

Did anyone comment on the strangely familiar picture for the Kobold? Just curious.

I think it was commented on when the Goblin entry came up.

Wakshaani

11-13-2008 09:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9604009)

Yes, they were a bit of a damp squib as far as most players' enthusiasm goes, at least in my experience. Maybe they don't like the additional restrictions of adventuring underwater? Plus there's the chance of any support ship they brought along sinking, which is a common complaint about nautical adventures.

Aerial adventures seem to be an easier sell, but I don't think they're as common as underwater ones, for some reason. Which is a bit odd, if you think about it.

Yeah, but all you have to do is imply airships and many a geek goes "Oooo" and starts looking for boarding pass.

YojimboC

11-14-2008 01:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9602803)

But underwater adventures always seemed a little... hard to sell?

Which is a shame, given the massive amount of watery adversaries that every edition of D&D offers. I once played with a guy who would have a fit whenever the possibility of an underwater adventure presented itself. "And give the DM a chance to use all those aquatic monsters in the Monster Manual? No way."

Malignant Marionette

11-14-2008 05:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Well, if it's in a longer campaign instead of a one-off adventure, who says you have to sell it to the players? Sink their ship, not the support one. Or have the important item they need be on a ship that sank decades ago, or a plant growing in the deep ocean. Or maybe the latest dastardly villain is an aquatic creature.

Pete Whalley

11-14-2008 07:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The timing on this thread is perfect.

I've been pondering what to do when my party reach Port Blacksand for a while now...and Kuo Toa plots to drag the city down under the waves is a great one.

I'm thinking subterranean temples below the sewer system, boogly eyed cultist-minions roaming the city...Innsmouth meets Humanoids from the Deep. :D

kelvingreen

11-14-2008 07:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pete Whalley (Post 9606669)

I've been pondering what to do when my party reach Port Blacksand for a while now...

Ooh, what system are you using? I'm always interested to see bits and pieces of Fighting Fantasy popping up in other games.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pete Whalley (Post 9606669)

I'm thinking subterranean temples below the sewer system, boogly eyed cultist-minions roaming the city...Innsmouth meets Humanoids from the Deep. :D

There's a precedent for it, as there was a Fishman shrine (and cult) underneath Blacksand in Dungeons.

Pete Whalley

11-14-2008 08:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9606782)

Ooh, what system are you using? I'm always interested to see bits and pieces of Fighting Fantasy popping up in other games.

D&D 4e. I've taken the sort of, slightly default setting of the core books and fleshed it out with bits and bats of FF.

Quote:

There's a precedent for it, as there was a Fishman shrine (and cult) underneath Blacksand in Dungeoneer.

Aye. That's where I got the idea- along with having Xortan Throg as a semi-Big Bad for the early arc of the campaign.

I'm also working up a Deathtrap Dungeon based adventure for later on.

noisms

11-14-2008 09:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pete Whalley (Post 9607029)

D&D 4e. I've taken the sort of, slightly default setting of the core books and fleshed it out with bits and bats of FF.

Aye. That's where I got the idea- along with having Xortan Throg as a semi-Big Bad for the early arc of the campaign

I'm also working up a Deathtrap Dungeon based adventure for later on.

Do you have the Advanced Fighting Fantasy supplement Blacksand? It's pretty good, and I think I still have it somewhere.

Inyssius

11-15-2008 09:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Oddly, the Kuo-Toa actually have those superglue shields in 4th Edition:

Sticky Shield (immediate reaction, when missed by a melee attack; at-will)

The kuo-toa [---] makes an attack against the attacker: +18 vs. Reflex; a weapon wielded by the target drops in the target's space.

This is made rather remarkable by the fact that, as far as I know, they are the only monsters in all of 4E that have any ability related to sundering or disarming weapons. Why this entire class of ability would deserve to be reserved solely for the kuo-toa of all creatures, I have no idea.

'S pretty damn cool, though. Nice bit of legacy there.

6inTruder

11-16-2008 02:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9596071)

Kuo-Toa

But no mention of "sages" thinking the Kuo-toa are third part in the three way stabilizing war between the Drow, Illithids and Kuo-toa?!?!?! Not that I can really figure on the Kuo-toa's beef with the Illithids mind...

Wakshaani

11-16-2008 12:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9613332)

But no mention of "sages" thinking the Kuo-toa are third part in the three way stabilizing war between the Drow, Illithids and Kuo-toa?!?!?! Not that I can really figure on the Kuo-toa's beef with the Illithids mind...

Got this one!

Kuo-Toa are on of teh Elder Races, along with Lizardfolk, Aarokka, and Bullywugs. There was a race before THEM, however, the Eldest Race ... Illithids. Translated properly, Illithid can mean "Eldest Ones" or "Spineless Ones" and, originally, were little more than parasitic slugs who got a break when creatures went bipedal and hitched along for teh ride. Kuo-Toa are the oldest of teh Elder Races, thus were likely the first hosts for the Flayers, which explains the mutal aquatic nature of their kids and vaguely similar lifestyle in the days of yore.

They rebelled against poppa, taking the Eldest out and locking away their Chtonic gods, then got themselves bombed back into teh stone age by teh same magics that shattered teh Bullywugs and Lizardmen ... some great war befell them after they locked "Dad" away, as each tried to claim the leadership post for their own kind. In time, they were all but wiped out, regressed to primitive levels, and younger races (Elves and Dwarves) came in and took over... there was such a huge time gap between them, mind, that Elves and Dwarve shad no clue that these cave-slurping fishmen could have ever been anything close to Dwarvenkind, let alone the predominant species in the entire world.

Teh Mind Flayers need the Kuo-Toa as host bodies even to this day, and have some parental pressure ability to lean on them somewhat, but, neither side trusts one another (After all, teh Kuo-Toa betrayed them ... some day that bill'll come due!) but, for now, it's an arms-length truce. Teh Drow, of course, are investigating all of teh Illithiad's lost cities, culling biotechnology and looking into the Eldest Gods, which the Kuo-Toa Do Not Want. So, they're left trying to play the two sides off against one another, with teh MAIN goal of keeping all the Eldest Gods safely locked away.

Bonus points for using teh Curellean Sign or tying Lloth's origin to being an escaped Eldest.

noisms

11-17-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lamia

Coming relatively hot on the heels of the Jackalwere is another shape-changing "damsel in distress" style creature, the Lamia - although these creatures have the more interesting and useful tactic of "casting an illusion of a lost child in distress or a group of peasants being attacked by a large beast, while hiding itself, awaiting the right moment to attack from the rear."

Lamias are basically centaurs, but with a woman and lion rather than a man/horse. That makes them rather like an old race from the Fighting Fantasy books called the felinaur, which I always liked. (Better than the boring old Wemics.) It also puts them into that rather odd legendary creature category of Female Creatures Which Are Really Horrible And Mean. I quite like that category, because based on long life experience and a few years of marriage I am well aware (like most men) that females definitely are horrible and mean... But it does make you wonder about The Ancients and their ideas. There aren't a heck of a lot of Male monsters which eat people - unless you count things like Hydrae and what have you, who aren't really 'male' in the same sense that Lamias or Medusae are female.

Anyway, Lamias' main modus operandi is illusionary magic, but they can also drain Wisdom from their victims and thereby force them into servitude (if WIS falls below 3). There is also a tougher variant called the Lamia Noble, which is made up of a person (male or female) with a serpent's body rather than a lion's. The nobles seem to prefer to wreak evil, spread chaos, etc., in human society, rather than just eat people. One feels that Lamia would be more interesting if they were based on the actual mythical Lamia, a beautiful queen who ate children, but I suppose they make for a decent mid-level challenge all the same.

demiurge1138

11-18-2008 12:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Manticores are male. Centaurs and satyrs are male, too--centaurs will murder you and rape your women, but satyrs are generally more comical than threatening. Generally.

I like lamiae--the automatic Wisdom drain is nasty, and synergistic with their charms and illusions--and managed to get a lot of use out of them recently. I ran "Rise of the Runelords", Paizo's first Pathfinder series, and it's got lamiae aplenty as mid-level masterminds. It's also got a few new species, like the kuchrima (a disgusting vulture-thing suspected of being the missing link between lamiae and harpies) and the lamia harridan, a Huge lamia that treats giants the same way normal lamiae treat humans. These last ones I tweaked with feats to give them lots of attacks of opportunity. Wisdom-draining attacks of opportunity. The fighters in the party didn't like that one bit.

Hellzon

11-18-2008 02:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Obligatory mention of 4E lamia - they're a swarm of scarabs masquerading as a hot elf chick. What were they like in 3.X?

And since demiurge1138 mentioned satyrs - they're mean in 4E. I've been looking forward to the Satyr entry for a long while now.

Malignant Marionette

11-18-2008 05:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 9619569)

Obligatory mention of 4E lamia - they're a swarm of scarabs masquerading as a hot elf chick. What were they like in 3.X?

In 3,5 they're the same as in 2e, but aren't described as female and have all of six lines of description, including their appearance. Plus of course a lot more (in comparison, at least) on how they fight.

demiurge1138

11-18-2008 07:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 9619569)

Obligatory mention of 4E lamia - they're a swarm of scarabs masquerading as a hot elf chick. What were they like in 3.X?

I really don't get the 4e lamia. I like the concept - hot chick turns out to be made of beetles! - but it's not a lamia. Lamiae have always been human from the waist up, animal from the waist down. Well, by "always" I mean "always in D&D, and since the Renaissance or so in the real world"

randomgamer8466

11-18-2008 09:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I am a Satyr enthusiast, too. I am outraged that 4e didn't stat Satyr as a playable race in the back of the MM; instead they gave us Shadar-kai and Warforged. WAAARRRRRRRRRFOOOOOOOOOOORGEEEEEEEEEEDDDDD how I loathe thee. I'll take my D&D robot-free. I'm glad we won't be discussing them in this thread for 2e.

noisms

11-18-2008 09:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9620879)

I am a Satyr enthusiast, too. I am outraged that 4e didn't stat Satyr as a playable race in the back of the MM; instead they gave us Shadar-kai and Warforged. WAAARRRRRRRRRFOOOOOOOOOOORGEEEEEEEEEEDDDDD how I loathe thee. I'll take my D&D robot-free. I'm glad we won't be discussing them in this thread for 2e.

Should I be embarrassed or proud that I don't really know what Shadar-kai or Warforged are? I saw a picture of Shadar-kai once and thought they looked a bit like a gang of teenage goths, but I have no idea about worforged beyond "they're like robots for D&D".

kelvingreen

11-18-2008 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9622573)

I saw a picture of Shadar-kai once and thought they looked a bit like a gang of teenage goths

Shadar-kai exist because apparently Drow aren't emo enough any more. ;)

JRM

11-18-2008 11:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9619106)

Manticores are male. Centaurs and satyrs are male, too--centaurs will murder you and rape your women, but satyrs are generally more comical than threatening. Generally.

There are a few things worth disagreeing with here.

Centaurs are both male and female, and I'm not just talking about Disney's Fantasia, there have been female centaurs or Kentaurides since classical Greco-Roman times.

As for Manticores, they may have been described as having the faces of men, but (1) I've read that there are a few heraldic depictions of manticores with female faces - although, alas, I haven't been able to see one, and (2) just because it looks like a male human's face doesn't mean the animal it's attached to is male, both sexes could look the same.

Besides which, surely manticores, centaurs and similar hybrids don't use their humanoid front-ends for reproduction. Centaurs and lamias are not usually portrayed with procreative plumbing below their humanoid waists, despite rarely wearing clothes to cover that area. Contrariwise, I've seen a number of images of male centaurs whose equine hindquarters prove without a doubt that they're stallions. (E.g. the Parthenon frieze of Herakles fighting the Centaurs).

Aren't there legends that lamia would conceal their lower bodies in bushes and tempt men towards them by flashing the alluring charms of their female upper bodies. So, maybe lamias have fore-bodies that always look like beautiful female females regardless of their actual gender, but those titties are just for show, their bestial hindquarters are male or female according to their actual gender and do all the real work of procreation and nursing their young.

Now I'm thinking of an AD&D scenario with a male character who develops a depraved obsession about lamias and forced one to drink a philter of love, only to discover the hard way that his victim is the same sex as he is.:eek:

...and hilarity ensues....:p

Oh, and as for Satyrs, at least they were always male in the traditional tales (as far as I know). But then, a satyr is as much nature-spirit as a chimeric monster so presumably isn't quite as restrained by natural biology. Also, Satyrs may be comical in some of their modern manifestations, but classically they were often violent lechers as bad as, if not worse, than Centaurs.

demiurge1138

11-19-2008 12:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9622573)

Should I be embarrassed or proud that I don't really know what Shadar-kai or Warforged are? I saw a picture of Shadar-kai once and thought they looked a bit like a gang of teenage goths, but I have no idea about worforged beyond "they're like robots for D&D".

Shadar-kai - fey spirits trapped in the Plane of Shadow, doomed by a curse to lose their souls if they die (or even go unconscious!). So they nail them in with cold iron spikes. In 3e, anyway. 4e dropped the cursed by fate angle, making them emo without a cause, as it were.

Warforged - D&D robots is where everybody starts, but the Tin Man or sentient golem is probably more accurate. In Eberron (where they belong...), warforged were built during the Last War so that there would be a ready source of well-trained, disposable soldiers that didn't have to eat or sleep. Once the War was over, however, they became a people without a home or purpose, trying to carve out a niche for themselves in a world that no longer really needs them.

Wakboth

11-19-2008 03:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9623271)

Shadar-kai - fey spirits trapped in the Plane of Shadow, doomed by a curse to lose their souls if they die (or even go unconscious!). So they nail them in with cold iron spikes. In 3e, anyway. 4e dropped the cursed by fate angle, making them emo without a cause, as it were.

As I recall it, shadar-kai are not "emo without a cause" (and could people please stop using "emo" as the general term for "the kids these day are so whiny"?). They're the descendants of people who made a deal with Raven Queen, the goddess of death, for immortality. And they got it... only to realize it's not as good as they'd thought, because it involves living in the Shadowfell and developing terminal ennui. So they tattoo, scar, brand and pierce themselves to feel things, so their personalities don't just fade away into the gray.

Quote:

Warforged - D&D robots is where everybody starts, but the Tin Man or sentient golem is probably more accurate. In Eberron (where they belong...), warforged were built during the Last War so that there would be a ready source of well-trained, disposable soldiers that didn't have to eat or sleep. Once the War was over, however, they became a people without a home or purpose, trying to carve out a niche for themselves in a world that no longer really needs them.

Eberron's the home setting of Warforged, but I can see them fitting really nicely into Spelljammer and Planescape, or settings similar to those.

demiurge1138

11-19-2008 09:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9623962)

Eberron's the home setting of Warforged, but I can see them fitting really nicely into Spelljammer and Planescape, or settings similar to those.

Oh, I agree. But I don't think that all Generic Fantasy World Xs need warforged in them. Unless, say, they're made out of ceramic and were built by the ancient Wind Dukes. Or a spaceship crashes...

WalcottTwins

11-20-2008 02:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I like warforged, but I always try to save them for settings where they make sense. Mostly just 'cause playing as a construct is cool, and they're good for navel-gazing.

(Also, heya noisms. This is Rach's Reflections, if you couldn't tell)

YojimboC

11-21-2008 01:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9622573)

Should I be embarrassed or proud that I don't really know what Shadar-kai or Warforged are? I saw a picture of Shadar-kai once and thought they looked a bit like a gang of teenage goths, but I have no idea about worforged beyond "they're like robots for D&D".

You certainly shouldn't be embarrassed, but proud is probably a little strong.

noisms

11-21-2008 09:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lammasu

I've never been able to tolerate this creature in its D&D incarnation, mainly because I first got properly acquainted with Lammasu through the Warhammer Chaos Dwarfs, who use these creatures as mounts for their sorcerers. I also would have preferred pairing the Lammasu and Shedu (who are practically the same thing anyway in AD&D) as the female and male versions of the same creature, which is after all how the Assyrians appeared to see them. That said, I love ancient mesopotamian mythology, indeed its probably my favourite, so Lammasu have to get a grudging thumbs-up.

They do however suffer from that problem which all powerful lawful good creatures do: such beings have to exist as a balance for all the powerful chaotic evil monsters, but they're difficult to include in a game as anything other than a) a stick with which the DM can beat naughty players, b) a walking talking quest dispenser, or c) a handy bodyguard to protect a party which has bitten off more than it can chew. This very problem was discussed in the Kirin entry, and it also applies to creatures like the Shedu, Sphinx and Couatl. What do you use these creatures for?

There are a couple of useful plot point titbits scattered through the entry, though. For one thing, all Lammasu inhabit "old abandoned temples...[which] have not lost their consecration"; you immediately have to imagine ancient pyramids and monuments hidden deep in forests or mountain ranges, full of hidden treasures - a typical trope, but turned on its head because the guardians are good. How would a good party get its hands on the loot?

Another: every month all the Lammasu in a given area get together for a conflag on "the war against ~~terror~~ evil" called a Whitemoon, which causes the entire temple to glow like a beacon. Adventure idea: for years and years people have noticed a strange light glowing deep in the mountains once a month. Now a rich merchant is offering a reward for whoever can find the source...

kelvingreen

11-21-2008 09:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've always preferred the Warhammer Lammasu to the D&D ones. That whole Chaos Dwarf army list was great, one of the best they've produced for the game.

The only way I can think of to make use of these enlightened and powerful LG creatures is to play them as so detached and distant from earthly concerns that, while to their far-reaching cosmic awareness they are acting towards the same goal as the heroes, they may appear unhelpful or even hostile to those they're helping.

DMH

11-21-2008 11:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9634946)
What do you use these creatures for?

That depends on how the setting is constructed. If the PCs are the end all and be all, then there isn't much place for good critters. If the setting is one where there is actions outside those of the PCs and the forces of good and evil are at war, then there are plenty of opportunities for such beings.

The PCs can't be everywhere and can't do everything unless the setting is meant specifically to do that.

demiurge1138

11-22-2008 12:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The only time I've ever used lammasu is in quoting the 3e example of an "unbelievable Bluff": "No, see, I'm actually a lammasu that was polymorphed into a halfling by an evil sorcerer. You know we lammasu are trustworthy, so you can believe everything I say."

No, wait, I take that back. I ran a one-shot in which somebody played a healer (not a cleric, but the dumb class from Miniatures Handbook) who was high enough level to have a lammasu cohort rather than a unicorn (sigh). The lammasu was much better at healing than his supposed master was.

JRM

11-22-2008 04:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9635803)

The only time I've ever used lammasu is in quoting the 3e example of an "unbelievable Bluff": "No, see, I'm actually a lammasu that was polymorphed into a halfling by an evil sorcerer. You know we lammasu are trustworthy, so you can believe everything I say."

No, wait, I take that back. I ran a one-shot in which somebody played a healer (not a cleric, but the dumb class from Miniatures Handbook) who was high enough level to have a lammasu cohort rather than a unicorn (sigh). The lammasu was much better at healing than his supposed master was.

Watch out with that 3rd edition talk, don't you want to maintain the noble mien of a Grognard? Why that's only the next-to-latest-and-a-half edition, it's not even out of the shops yet!:)

As for Lammasu, I only remember once using one in a campaign (or was it a Shedu?) - as a random encounter! It was in my very early days as a DM, and I rolled on on the wilderness encounters table and that's what came up. Unfortunately for the PCs, they were mostly Chaotic Evil in alignment, so it quickly turned to blows and the lammasu nearly wiped them out.

Sleeper

11-22-2008 05:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9634946)

They do however suffer from that problem which all powerful lawful good creatures do: such beings have to exist as a balance for all the powerful chaotic evil monsters, but they're difficult to include in a game as anything other than a) a stick with which the DM can beat naughty players, b) a walking talking quest dispenser, or c) a handy bodyguard to protect a party which has bitten off more than it can chew. This very problem was discussed in the Kirin entry, and it also applies to creatures like the Shedû, Sphinx and Couatl. What do you use these creatures for?

Pets, mounts, allies. The source of rumors, figures in historical events. Strangely inhuman personalities, with similar but not quite the same goals. A world with only monsters for PCs to fight is one-dimensional and shatters my suspension of disbelief. They don't have to play a huge role (and they're definitely underused), but monsters that aren't just growling or sneering things to slaughter is a good thing. They add depth to the world, and are opportunities for conflicts and roleplaying that don't end with one side or the other spitted on a sword.

Plus, despite simplistic interpretations of the alignment system, good can oppose good. Perhaps borrow from the root word of lammasu, "lama". Lammasu are the ascetics who achieved Nirvana, but chose to retain an earthly form. However, in the church proper, this is now considered heresy. There have been no new lammasu in hundreds of years, because to forsake the opportunity to become one with the universe and take on a physical albeit immortal form, is considered... obscene. They could be hunted and slain by the more pragmatic (e.g. LN) members of the faith. They could be persecuted, oppressed. After all, they're a corruption of what should be right and pure, and a distortion of what's familiar is often scarier than something totally different. Or they might be from a foreign, alien religion. The last relics of a lost and forgotten faith. Considered monsters, but largely beneficent. Though occasionally intolerant and judgmental, and even violent. Or just struggling with misunderstanding. Focus on moral dilemmas than combat.

Not that I ever used a lammasu. But the potential is there.

Kakita Kojiro

11-22-2008 11:39 AM

my fun monster-ending-in-u story

Way back when I was in high school (loong time ago, kiddies), I actually played a lammasu character. Or a shedu. We could never quite figure out which.

It was in a 3rd party adventure about Fez, the wizard of clocks, or somesuch. The idea was you traipse around a clock-shaped land, then finally go to the center and confront the dragon whose head may have been stuck in a jewel, or maybe we were supposed to stick its head in a jewel. Hey, it was years ago!

Anyway, there were pregen characters, and you all had amnesia, so you kind of had to figure out what your character could do. The guest-DM asked which of us were great roleplayers, and my perfidious friends sold me out, so I got stuck with... the lammasuish sheduish thingummy. Spent the entire adventure wracking my brains for what, exactly, either of the damn things did. I mean, seriously, without opening a book, can you tell me what powers a lammasu has? (no fair, noisms; you just read the thing). Or how to differentiate between a shedu and lammasu, assuming you don't know what powers are available?

So I had to settle for whacky hijinks, since I wasn't contributing even as much as knows-how-to-fix-a-cuckoo-clock guy. And that poor schmuck was useless in all but one of the places we visited. And in that place? he pushed a button. Whee!

I should say that the guest-DM was awesome awesomeness... he had props for everything we found, including runic writing on several items which we had to decode. (the other group who played through the same adventure never figured out the ring said "Wear me and die", for example. their fixing-clocks guy never even got the chance to push that fateful button.) Also fun stuff such as a bag whose tie was sealed in wax -- and the wax had an explosive rune on it... when anyone but the can't-remember-he's-a-thief tried to get into the bag, guest-DM put mittens on 'em.

I, of course, had hooves or paws or some crazyness, and was told I'd need to use my feet. Because, you know. Lammasu... or Shedu. Oy.

DMH

11-23-2008 07:20 PM

Re: my fun monster-ending-in-u story

By coincidence I watched The Golden Voyage of Sinbad last night. As well as being the source for the homunculus, it might be the source that EGG used for the lammasu. The one that appeared in the film was the good monster (the evil was a one eyed centaur). Too bad the characters were stupid and let the lammasu die for no good reason. But then, there were several stupid decisions made in that movie.

JRM

11-23-2008 08:38 PM

Re: my fun monster-ending-in-u story

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9642243)

By coincidence I watched The Golden Voyage of Sinbad last night. As well as being the source for the homunculus, it might be the source that EGG used for the lammasu. The one that appeared in the film was the good monster (the evil was a one eyed centaur). Too bad the characters were stupid and let the lammasu die for no good reason. But then, there were several stupid decisions made in that movie.

Eh? It was a Gryphon in the Golden Voyage of Sinbad, not a Lamassu. Didn't you notice the eagle's head?

DMH

11-24-2008 03:30 AM

Re: my fun monster-ending-in-u story

Yeah, I was wrong. I was so annoyed at the characters at that point, I was barely paying attention to it.

YojimboC

11-24-2008 04:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

If lammasu dwell in abandoned temples and help keep frontiers free of danger...

... how about a contingent sent by the local church to reclaim a fallen temple in the wilderness, only to find a pride of lammasu operating out of the place. Naturally, there's more negotiation and role-playing than combat in that scenario, as the church representatives discuss reclaiming the temple and the lammasu may or may not cooperate fully...

... but maybe the PCs have the help the lammasu fight off some evil monsters in the area or clear out levels of the dungeon the lammasu can't reach because they're lions with wings and just don't fit in those spaces.

noisms

11-24-2008 08:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Leech

Not much to say about this entry, which I have to confess I had forgotten existed. Three varieties of bloodsucker are described.

Giant Leech - These are 2 - 5 feet in length (!) and require a successful attack to attach themselves to their target, whereupon they begin to suck blood at 1hp damage per HD per round. Amazingly, there is only a 1% chance of this being noticed if the attack occurs in water; I'm sorry, but the idea that somebody wouldn't notice a five foot long leech attaching itself to their leg/back/arm while in water is utterly ludicrous and one of the most absurd things I've read in the MM. I don't care if the creature has "anesthetizing saliva" - I'm going to notice a black slithery five foot long invertebrate attaching itself to my body whether I can feel it bite or not. Imagine if the victim was a halfling; are you trying to tell me he wouldn't notice even though said leech would be considerably bigger than him!? Anyway, giant leeches can pass on deadly diseases (50%), so they aren't to be sniffed at.

Throat Leech - This is a tiny bugger that exists in freshwater bodies, waiting to be swallowed in drinking water (10% chance). It then sticks itself in the throat and sucks d3 hit points of blood for ten rounds before dropping off. There is also a 50% chance of choking each round, which will kill the victim if it continues for three consecutive rounds. The rate at which the Throat Leech sucks blood indicates an appetite well above 10 times as strong as the Giant Leech; it is 1" long and can drain 1-3 points, whereas a 2' long individual of the Giant variety can only manage a paltry 1.

Leech Swarm - This is basically a 10' swarm of small leeches who suck blood for 1d10 damage per turn; they can only be dispersed through recourse to an area effect spell. Nasty.

Interesting that the Leech entry necessitates not one, nor two, but FOUR egregious instances of the 2e style exception-based-design we love so much. Must be some kind of record for a one-pager.

DMH

11-24-2008 09:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There is an ecology of the giant leech in Dragon 123 that is actually quite good. The Y shaped bite marks they inflict could be used on other monsters in the swamp and give the PCs a sign of things to come.

demiurge1138

11-25-2008 12:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

My roommate Casey is obsessed with the idea of playing a halfling wereleech ninja. He would attach to people and they'd have no idea that they just took massive amounts of sneak attack, because of the anesthetizing saliva, then drain all of their blood. As Casey's said, "unlike the ordinary ninja, where the rest of the PCs don't know you're there, the enemies wouldn't know I'm there either! It would be more like playing a complicated area of effect spell."

For obvious reasons, I have denied Casey this satisfaction.

Wakboth

11-25-2008 02:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Throat leech is one of those lovely little creepy-crawly "gotcha!" monsters that literally infest 1e and 2e, along with rot grubs and those ear-burrowing critters that lurked in dungeon doors just waiting for a rogue to come and try to listen what's going on on the other side. :D

6inTruder

11-25-2008 03:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9646775)

My roommate Casey is obsessed with the idea of playing a halfling wereleech ninja. He would attach to people and they'd have no idea that they just took massive amounts of sneak attack, because of the anesthetizing saliva, then drain all of their blood. As Casey's said, "unlike the ordinary ninja, where the rest of the PCs don't know you're there, the enemies wouldn't know I'm there either! It would be more like playing a complicated area of effect spell."

For obvious reasons, I have denied Casey this satisfaction.

I know what the next character I try and play'll be!

sim_james

11-25-2008 04:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Halfling wereleech ninjas do sound kinda cool...

JRM

11-25-2008 09:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9649825)

Halfling wereleech ninjas do sound kinda cool...

Are you sure? I heard they suck...:D

Flees the scene, cackling evilly

I think we all knew someone wouldn't be able to resist that pun.

JRM

11-25-2008 09:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9645827)

Leech

Not much to say about this entry, which I have to confess I had forgotten existed. Three varieties of bloodsucker are described.

Giant Leech - These are 2 - 5 feet in length (!) and require a successful attack to attach themselves to their target, whereupon they begin to suck blood at 1hp damage per HD per round. Amazingly, there is only a 1% chance of this being noticed if the attack occurs in water; I'm sorry, but the idea that somebody wouldn't notice a five foot long leech attaching itself to their leg/back/arm while in water is utterly ludicrous and one of the most absurd things I've read in the MM. I don't care if the creature has "anesthetizing saliva" - I'm going to notice a black slithery five foot long invertebrate attaching itself to my body whether I can feel it bite or not. Imagine if the victim was a halfling; are you trying to tell me he wouldn't notice even though said leech would be considerably bigger than him!? Anyway, giant leeches can pass on deadly diseases (50%), so they aren't to be sniffed at.

Hmm, at first sight I can see two possibilities:

1: Giant Leeches are lightweights for their size, resembling skinny 2-5' long worms. That doesn't match any of their AD&D illustrations though.

2: That anesthetizing saliva is damn good stuff. AD&D characters who get bit by giant leeches are so stoned that they barely notice anything. As a result, 'leech parlours' have become popular vice-dens in which the poor can anesthetize their woes away - it's cheaper than gin and doesn't ruin your liver. Indeed, there may be no harmful side-effects unless the "leech-junkie" is a hemophiliac or the like.

Kapten

11-25-2008 09:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9650521)

Hmm, at first sight I can see two possibilities:

2: That anesthetizing saliva is damn good stuff. AD&D characters who get bit by giant leeches are so stoned that they barely notice anything. As a result, 'leech parlours' have become popular vice-dens in which the poor can anesthetize their woes away - it's cheaper than gin and doesn't ruin your liver. Indeed, there may be no harmful side-effects unless the "leech-junkie" is a hemophiliac or the like.

But then they would notice something, or the poison would be technically a paralyzing poison if the person would be totally stoned. I think that a leech could suck blood undetected as long as the leech and the victim aren't moving, otherwise it would be entirely impossible. Either the weight of the leech or the fact that you would be stumbling about with an anestezied body part would tip you off that something is wrong.

Wakshaani

11-25-2008 09:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

On the one hand, not many plots drop down from simple leechery, save "Village Wisewoman wants the party to go collect her a few leeches, for proper medical bleeding, and awards a bonus for a Giant Leech ... it's said that, despite them being five feet long, they anesthesia saliva is so strong that you don't feel a thing!"

BUT!

For random dungeon encounters, how can you go wrong with either A) giant leeches or B) a SWARM of leeches, for belly-churning flipflops? A simple 10' trap door-covered pit? Fill it with a Leech Swarm! Carion Crawler needs a buddy? Giant leech! Crawler paralyzes, Leech drinks, Crawler eats teh dead ... it's the Sea Anemone/Clown Fish of the dungeon set! Any, of course, any sort of "Elder Wyrn" worshipping cult has got to have leeches on hand. Makes for a great human sacrifice, where the princess is strapped to a rock and leeches dumped on her for a slow, delrium-producing death that gives teh group time to get in there and recue her, but is slow-motion lethal if they don't. Heroism!

Sleeper

11-25-2008 10:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Now I'm imagining a halfling in a slate gray trenchcoat dual-wielding a pair of slick black leeches that are each twice his size. He strides up, cocks his arms back, and strikes out with his horribly unbalanced bloodsucking organic whips... and nobody notices. Sure it's hard for an orc to carry on a causal conversation about gardening gnomes with a giant 40 lb leech plastered over its shoulder. But, somehow, it manages.

JRM

11-25-2008 10:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 9650572)

But then they would notice something, or the poison would be technically a paralyzing poison if the person would be totally stoned. I think that a leech could suck blood undetected as long as the leech and the victim aren't moving, otherwise it would be entirely impossible. Either the weight of the leech or the fact that you would be stumbling about with an anestezied body part would tip you off that something is wrong.

Don't think so, a strong anesthetic can render someone completely insensitve or unaware. A paralysed person is incapable of moving their muscles, they may still be able to feel in their motionless limbs.

noisms

11-25-2008 11:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9650617)

*For random dungeon encounters, how can you go wrong with either A) giant leeches or B) a SWARM of leeches, for belly-churning flipflops? A simple 10' trap door-covered pit? Fill it with a Leech Swarm! Carion Crawler needs a buddy? Giant leech! Crawler paralyzes, Leech drinks, Crawler eats teh dead ... it's the Sea Anemone/Clown Fish of th dungeon set! Any, of course, any sort of "Elder Wyrms" worshippnig cult has got to have leeches on hand. Makes for a great human sacrifice, where the princess is strapped to a rock and leeches dumped on her for a slow, delrium-producing death that gives teh group time to get in there and recue her, but is slow-motion lethal if they don't. Heroism!*

Answer: You can't go wrong with any of those things! ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9650788)

Don't think so, a strong anesthetic can render someone completely insensitive or unaware. A paralysed person is incapable of moving their muscles, they may still be able to feel in their motionless limbs.

But surely if you were in the water you'd be able to feel, hang on, why is it that I can't feel the water temperature just on my left leg? And come to think of it, why is it that I have to practically drag that limb through the water, as if it's three times as heavy as it should be? Oh right, it's because there's a fucking five foot long bloody leech attached to it! ;)

6inTruder

11-26-2008 04:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9649825)

Halfling wereleech ninjas do sound kinda cool...

Screw that, I want to play the Complicated Area Of Effect Spell!

But really, what we're all waiting for (aside from a why there's fucking BBQ smell at the damn library?!?!?) is Leprechauns!

Kapten

11-26-2008 06:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9650788)

Don't think so, a strong anesthetic can render someone completely insensitive or unaware. A paralysed person is incapable of moving their muscles, they may still be able to feel in their motionless limbs.

My experiences with local anesthetics are limited to xylocain, which is the one used in my profession (well, xylocain with or without adrenalin, carbocain, etc etc but they are all variations of the same theme). They make you entirely insensitive to pain if applied right and in small enough incisions (for example, they wouldn't work for gastric surgery). You do feel movement and pressure when anestezized. They paralyze muscles (they block sodium-transporters on the nerve cells, hence the nerve cells can't transmit impulses --> the nerve cells don't work). So even if you wouldn't feel the leech slicing your leg open, you would feel the fall to the ground that a paralyzed leg brings.

With a stretch of imagination, I can accept that someone lying on the ground wouldn't notice a leech of that size sucking blood from him, even if it's unlikely. An overdose of xylocain is dangerous since it brings the risk of a severe drop in blood pressure. Then, of course, I don't think the giant leech uses xylocain ;).

Tangent: Certain paralyzed people can feel in limbs that they can't move. This is often due to spinal cord injuries. The sensoric impulses take other paths in the spinal cord than the motoric, which means that you can have damaged motoric pathways while the sensoric ones are unhurt. This won't happen with a local anesthetic, though, since it puts all nerves in the area out of function.

JRM

11-26-2008 06:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9650992)

But surely if you were in the water you'd be able to feel, hang on, why is it that I can't feel the water temperature jus on my left leg? And come to think of it, why is it that I have to practically drag that limb through the water, as if it's three times as heavy as it should be? Oh right, it's because there's a fucking five foot long bloody leech attached to it! ;)

The point is that the anesthetized character may not be able to wonder about things, since some forms of anesthesia can render the subject incapable of conscious thought. So, a giant leech bit character may be standing in the water with a vacant look on their face, rather than carrying on adventuring as if nothing happened while wondering why one leg is suddenly a hundred pounds heavier than the other.

Or, we could just make giant leeches smaller - a foot-long leech could easily hold a couple of pints of blood, enough to kill if drained from a human-sized victim, and would only weigh a few pounds.

JRM

11-26-2008 06:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9654641)

My experiences with local anesthetics are limited to xylocain, which is the one used in my profession (well, xylocain with or without adrenalin, carbocain, etc etc but they are all variations of the same theme). They make you entirely insensitive to pain if applied right and in small enough incisions (for example, they wouldn't work for gastric surgery). You do feel movement and pressure when anestized. They paralyze muscles (they block sodium-transporters on the nerve cells, hence the nerve cells can't transmit impulses --> the nerve cells don't work). So even if you wouldn't feel the leech slicing your leg open, you would feel the fall to the ground that a paralyzed leg brings.

With a stretch of imagination, I can accept that someone lying on the ground wouldn't notice a leech of that size sucking blood from him, even if it's unlikely. An overdose of xylocain is dangerous since it brings the risk of a severe drop in blood pressure. Then, of course, I don't think the giant leech uses xylocain ;).

Perfectly true. My thinking is that a giant leech's bite has to be more like a general anesthetic to match the description. I'm trying to work backwards from the observed effect - i.e. the victim can not notice a giant blood-sucking invertebrate is attached to them. That suggests the leech's saliva does more than block sensory nerves in the bitten area. To render the victim unaware of its presence it really has to affect their brains in some fashion. If I remember correctly, real-life leech saliva has an extremely complex biochemistry, so it is conceivable AD&D giant leech's have additional properties to help prevent their victims noticing them. Maybe their saliva is a complicated cocktail of anesthetics, sedatives and hallucinogens tailored to render a victim insensible.

Wakboth

11-26-2008 10:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I love these threads. Where else would you get a discussion about the feasibility of someone not noticing a giant leech sucking their blood, complete with people applying actual medical knowledge to it? :D

noisms

11-26-2008 10:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9654662)

The point is that the anesthetized character may not be able to wonder about things, since some forms of anesthetic can render the subject incapable of conscious thought. So, a giant leech bit character may be standing in the water with a vacant look on their face, rather than carrying on adventuring as if nothing happened while wondering why one leg is suddenly a hundred pounds heavier than the other.

Oh, I see what you mean. If that's the case, of course, giant leeches need to have some sort of paralysis-causing mechanic too.

Kapten

11-26-2008 10:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9654705)

Perfectly true. My thinking is that a giant leech's bite has to be more like a general anesthetic to match the description. I'm trying to work backwards from the observed effect - i.e. the victim can not notice a giant blood-sucking invertebrate is attached to them. That suggests the leech's saliva does more than block sensory nerves in the bitten area. To render the victim unaware of its presence it really has to affect their brains in some fashion. If I remember correctly, real-life leech saliva has an extremely complex biochemistry, so it is conceivable AD&D giant leech's have additional properties to help prevent their victims noticing them. Maybe their saliva is a complicated cocktail of anesthetics, sedatives and hallucinogens tailored to render a victim insensible.

I'm definitely OK with some kind of poison that leads to specific neglect that goes for 3' leeches, sort of like the neglect people with rightside cerebral vascular infarctions get but applied to leeches instead of the left side of the body. Actually, it's kind of a neat idea; that would mean that the leech could be visible for the victim, yet the victim isn't aware of it. Both scary and with a certain amount of gallow humour ;).

It could mean that a guy could be walking down the road like nothing is happening while being killed by two giant leeches attached to his torso. If I ever do a 1e/2e- campaign, I will use leeches like that in a horror-themed adventure :)

Kapten

11-26-2008 10:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9655296)

Oh, I see what you mean. If that's the case, of course, giant leeches need to have some sort of paralysis-causing mechanic too.

Not necessarily, see my answer above. It's pseudoscience, but it's not entirely inconcievable IRL (well, practically speaking it is, but the phenomenon neglect definitely exists).

noisms

11-27-2008 12:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Leprechaun

Ah, 'tis a Leprechaun, begorra. How now brown cow. Etc.

First point of business: Leprechauns are rumoured to be a hybrid of halflings and pixies! I never heard that before and must have missed that sentence back in the day. Weird to imagine Bilbo getting it on with Tinkerbell, but hey, if that's what floats their boats. More unusual exception based design in the opening paragraph, with the revelation that 30% of male leprechauns have beards. Next time you plan a leprechaun encounter, don't forget to roll that d100 to find out the clean-shaven to hirsute ratio.

Of all the annoying AD&D monsters, Leprechauns are the most annoying in my opinion, although that could be a biproduct of my extensive experience with the various 'band roguelike computer games, in which Leprechauns breed explosively and rapidly take over a level of the dungeon. Most just steal your gold and items, but others cast curses or fling mana bolts; Leprechaun in a 'band game is like a big sign saying "Get the hell out of Dodge." That said, there must be something to my gut reaction; any monster description in the MM which includes the phrase 'fun loving' is bound to be a complete pain in the arse.

Leprechauns are all about stealing valuable objects, which they can do with a flat 75% chance. There is a 25% chance that they will drop the object on pursuit, but will mislead captors about the true nature of the treasure if they are caught in their lair (10%) chance. Two paragraphs in, and already four weird exception-based-design concepts have cropped up - guess I spoke too soon about the Leech holding the record.

Leprechauns can also grant three limited wishes if somebody manages to get their hands on their gold. They will then tempt the target into asking for a fourth wish, whereupon the first three wishes will be reversed. Kind of ridiculous, but also kind of cool in that fairy-story way that occasionally sneaks into AD&D.

The main plot hook for Leprechauns is, I suppose, the Leprechaun King, whose existence is hinted at. Another low-grade adventure idea would be a Leprechaun stealing a treasured item of either one of the PCs or an adventure dispenser character, and ending up leading a wild goose chase all across the land.

demiurge1138

11-27-2008 12:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

My friend Bowen had a "special guest" character that he played whenever he swung by a game but didn't have an actual character. That would be the ethereal leprechaun. Visible to only one of the PCs, the ethereal leprechaun would jig furiously, make sarcastic comments, and generally make that one PC question his sanity. He only pulled this in one of my games once, but I heard stories from other DMs...

6inTruder

11-27-2008 07:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9655858)

*Leprechauns are all about stealing valuable objects, which they can do with a flat 75% chance. There is a 25% chance that they will drop the object on pursuit, but will mislead captors about the true nature of the treasure if they are caught in their lair (10%) chance. Two paragraphs in an already four weird exception-based-design concepts - guess I spoke too soon about the Leech holding the record.

Just wait for the Slug, Giant...

noisms

11-27-2008 07:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9657588)
Just wait for the Slug, Giant...

We're still a way away from that one. Too bad I didn't keep track of any of the other entries, but we'll put Leech and Leprechaun in provisional joint first place for now.

Wakboth

11-27-2008 09:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The lack of leprechauns, brownies and other twee, annoying fairies is one of the best things about 3e and 4e. Pixies, nixies and grigs I can take, but I draw the line at leprechauns (preferably with a+5 *vorp*al pen).

(If nothing else, they stick out horribly in any setting that doesn't include a faux-Ireland.)

YojimboC

11-28-2008 12:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I never used leprechauns. Actually, if nothing else, this thread has shown me how unvaried and undaring my monster choices have been throughout my DMing career.

But leprechauns... I guess I'm just a little too Irish to have used them in a game. They're too ridiculous... too Darby O'Gill and the Little People... too Lucky Charms. I can't see them as a credible threat to a group of adventurers (certainly not the faux badass twinks that we ran in 2nd Edition).

Conversely, these days, the idea of cannibalistic little fairies obsessed with cobbling shoes and stealing gold sounds kind of cool. But I would have to tweak the traditional leprechaun in order to use them at all -- they're just too damn goofy otherwise.

Kakita Kojiro

11-28-2008 06:08 AM

I think it's the name Leprechaun that is going to snap everyone's disbelief suspenders. You tell players they're being attacked by leprechauns, and suddenly it's wall-to-wall Lucky Charms jokes. Call 'em cobblerues or something, though, and you might get them worried that these anklebiters are going to gnaw off their feet to run off with their footwear, because these fey only wear shoes freshly soaked in blood.

Wakshaani

11-28-2008 10:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Well, for a plot thread, here's a couple off teh top of me wee noggin.

1) A young Leprechaun gets caught by the PCs and teh demand a wish. He'd love to! Only one problem... he can only do three at a time. Turns out that Baron Goodfellow caught him a few years ago and wished to be powerful, wealthy, and beloved by all. "What? Baron Goodfellow? Why, he's a GREAT leader!" "See? Worked like a charm!" Thing is, he was too smart to make a FOURTH wish, so, he gets to keep everything and, until he does, the young 'Chaun has nary a wish to grant! He tells teh PCs that the Good Baron is, in fact, an evil and ruthless man (Which they don't believe ...

that wish sure is something!) and that, if they can get him to make just one more wish, he can turn him back to normal. (And then, in theory, give teh PCs THEIR wishes. But he plans on trying to duck out of that obligation, somehow. And, of course, he might be telling a lie about Goodfellow's roots. Then again, he might be telling teh truth! Which is worse?)

2) Bonnie Bobbie was teh favorite son of Rainbow Village. Every morning he'd set up his pot of gold in a different place, and every morning they'd be greeted by a rainbow, as long as no one went and found where he'd hid it... this agreement gave teh village a name, and it's worked like a charm for a hundred years! Trouble is, when they woke up a week ago, there was no rainbow ... and hasn't been one since! No one's seen Bonnie Bobby, either, and teh town's more worried that their good friend is missing, hurt, or worse, then they are teh rainbow being gone. What happened to him? Was he nabbed? Did he have a hundred year agreement which ended? Did someone not know the rule about never finding teh pot of gold and snatch some, ending the truce? And what does any of this have to do with teh Bullywugs that've suddenly turned up? The Mayor of Rainbow Village needs help!

noisms

11-28-2008 08:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9661476)

Well, for a plot thread, here's a couple off teh top of me wee noggin.

*1) A young Leprechaun gets caught by the PCs and teh demand a wish. He'd love to! Only one problem... he can onl do trhee at a time. Turns out that Baron Goodfellow caught him a few years ago and wished to be powerful, wealthy and beloved by all. "What? Baron Goodfellow? Why, he's a GREAT leader!" "See? Worked like a charm!" Thing is, he was too smart to make a FOURTH wish, so, he gets to keep everything and, until he does, the young 'Chaun has nary a wish to grant! He tells teh PCs that the Good Baron is, in fact, an evil and ruthless man (Which they don't believe ... that wish sure is something!) and that, if they can get him to make just one more wish, he can turn him back to normal. (And then, in theory, give teh PCs THEIR wishes. But he plans on trying to duck out of that obligation, somehow. And, of course, he might be telling a lie about Goodfellow's roots. Then again, he might be telling teh truth! Which is worse?)*

*2) Bonnie Bobbie was teh favorite son of Rainbow Village. Every morning he'd set up his pot of gold in a different place, and every morning they'd be greeted by a rainbow, as long as no one went and found where he'd hid it... this agreement gave teh village a name, and it's worked like a charm for a hundred years! Trouble is, when they woke up a week ago, there was no rainbow ... and hasn't been one since! No one's seen Bonnie Bobby, either, and teh town's more worried that their good friend is missing, hurt, or worse, then they are teh rainbow being gone. What happened to him? Was he nabbed? Did he have a hundred year agreement which ended? Did someone not know the rule about never finding teh pot of gold and snatch some, ending the truce? And what does any of this have to do with teh Bullywugs that've suddenly turned up? The Mayor of Rainbow Village needs help!*

'Tis some feckin' fine ideas ye have t'ere son, begorra.

JRM

11-29-2008 01:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9655296)

Oh, I see what you mean. If that's the case, of course, giant leeches need to have some sort of paralysis-causing mechanic too.

No, I deliberately omitted paralysis since if a giant leech paralyzed its warm-blooded prey they're likely to fall in water (the leech's preferred habitat) and drown. This would be against the leech's interests because:

1) The leech would likely have trouble getting blood from a dead victim (IIRC they don't so much suck blood as let their victim's own blood-pressure do the work. If the victim heart stops beating because they've drowned they won't have blood pressure.)

2) If the victim leaves alive, the leech (or another like it) may get more blood from it at a later date.

JRM

11-29-2008 01:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9655380)

I'm definitely OK with some kind of poison that leads to specific neglect that goes for 3' leeches, sort of like the neglect people with rightside cerebral vascular infarctions get but applied to leeches instead of the left side of the body. Actually, it's kind of a neat idea; that would mean that the leech could be visible for the victim, yet the victim isn't aware of it. Both scary and with a certain amount of gallow humour ;).

It could mean that a guy could be walking down the road like nothing is happening while being killed by two giant leeches attached to his torso. If I ever do a 1e/2e- campaign, I will use leeches like that in a horror- themed adventure :)

Yes that's more or less my take on it, except I was thinking the venom may mainly worked on the victim's somatic awareness rather than his visual awareness, so if they actually could see the leech they may realize something was screwy. (That's just to reflect what I remember of how giant leeches worked in AD&D. My understanding was a leech could attach itself to someone and they'd carry it about on their back or drag it through the water by their leg without noticing, but once they actually looked at the dang thing they usually realized they'd been taken for a sucker. I'm just trying to fit the symptoms to fit the bill.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9655383)

Not necessarily, see my answer above. It's pseudoscience, but it's not entirely inconcievable IRL (well, practically speaking it is, but the phenomenon neglect definitely exists).

No disagreement their, it may be theoretically possible to fiddle with a human's brain chemistry to create such an effect but it's highly unlikely. Plus, from what I know of real life animals that do this are all parasites with highly specific victims (e.g. wasp larvae that control the behaviour of a species of ant, baby tapeworms that make mice find the scent of cat attractive etc). So, the giant leech venom would probably only work on human(oid)s, which could quickly lead to their extinction, since if it only fed on humans then swamp-dwelling folk would quickly learn to check for them and kill them when found. Unless they started worshipping the leeches for their mind-altering toxins, or selling them to drug-dens that is.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9655858)

Leprechaun

Of all the annoying AD&D monsters, Leprechauns are the most annoying in my opinion.

You missed out what is arguably their most annoying ability - see that little bit of text that says they can "polymorph nonliving objects". In 1st edition leprechauns could use Polymorph Any Object at will so long as it only affected non-living items.

That's an 8th level spell! Just think of the possibilities.:p

When a player in an old campaign of mine annoyed a clan of leprechauns (long story) they turned all his fighter's weapons and armour into foam rubber, his clothes into skimpy tutus, his shoes & undergarments into custard, and his fort into blancmange - all the time the little blighters were dancing around invisibly and using ventriloquism to sing about giving him his "just desserts!" :D

It's just lucky they're pacifists, they could do horrible damage with an unlimited supply of Polymorph Any (inanimate) Object.

Although their power to create illusions at will is nothing to be sneered at, either.

At least once you get a see invisibility going they are easy to get rid of. Only 2-5 hit points, remember.

The Last Conformist

11-30-2008 04:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9618780)

Lamias are basically centaurs, but with a woman and lion rather than a man/horse. That makes them rather like an old race from the Fighting Fantasy books called the felinaur, which I always liked. (Better than the boring old Wemics.) It also puts them into that rather odd legendary creature category of Female Creatures Which Are Really Horrible And Mean. I quite like that category, because based on long life experience and a few years of marriage I am well aware (like most men) that females definitely are horrible and mean... But it does make you wonder about The Ancients and their ideas. There aren't a heck of a lot of Male monsters which eat people - unless you count things like Hydrae and what have you, who aren't really 'male' in the same sense that Lamias or Medusae are female.

I've always assumed the Lernean Hydra was a female, probably for no reason but that "hydra" is a feminine word.

demiurge1138

11-30-2008 03:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

It should come to no surprise that Casey, same guy as who wanted to play the halfling wereleech ninja, also wants to play a leprechaun.

JRM

11-30-2008 08:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9667141)

I've always assumed the Lernean Hydra was a female, probably for no reason but that "hydra" is a feminine word.

I believe you're right about that, I've seen some translations of classical sources use "her" when talking about the Hydra. Although I have negligible knowledge of ancient Greek, do we have any classical scholars around here who can enlighten us?

noisms

12-02-2008 12:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9669353)

I believe you're right about that, I've seen some translations of classical sources use "her" when talking about the Hydra. Although I have negligible knowledge of ancient Greek, do we have any classical scholars around here who can enlighten us?

Hmm. Well that just confirms it. To the Greeks, female = maneater. ;)

JRM

12-02-2008 05:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9673871)

Hmm. Well that just confirms it. To the Greeks, female = maneater. ;)

Now, now noisms. You now perfectly well the ancient Greeks believed in equal opportunity anthropophagy.:D

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Leucrotta

An ugly quadruped with a mean bite, the Leucrotta is in my experience a very rarely encountered D&D beastie. It's an above average monster though. As well as having a nice little special ability (shield and armour destruction) it has the interesting shtick of ventriloquism/voice imitation. It uses this to lure its prey into traps, which is a much more worthwhile ploy, I think, than the hoary old 'pretend to be an old woman/damsel in distress' idea. The idea of a monstrous horse with the voice of a terrified child is also damn creepy when you think about it.

There are also some adventure hooks in the entry: mages use Leucrotta hides for boots of striding and springing, and the creature's saliva is an antidote for love potions. It seems a stretch to imagine somebody going to such lengths to avoid a love potion as to slay a Leucrotta and drink its saliva, but there you go.

The Leucrotta entry is also notable for seeing the reappearance of our old friends, the sages. Here they are speculating that "the leucrotta is an unnatural abnormality, an aberration spawned by some demented power or archmage." Who that demented power or archmage is, is up to individual DMs to decide.

Leucrotta are so loathsome that not even druids would make the argument that they are worth keeping around. That raises the interesting question of how druids view other horrible monsters like Manticores, Cockatrices and Catoblepas. Are there Catoblepas rights activist druids out there in the world?

Wakshaani

12-02-2008 09:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

You know, I always did want a 'gestalt' spell, where you could combine two lifeforms together to see what'd happen, or at least a 'magical Experiment' type spell, to create things like this.

I mean, OwlBars had to come from somewhere, right?

Sleeper

12-02-2008 09:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9677688)
I mean, OwlBars had to come from somewhere, right?

Chicago's nightlife? :)

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9677643)

Leucrotta

An ugly quadruped with a mean bite, the Leucrotta is in my experience a very rarely encountered D&D beastie. It's an above average monster though. As well as having a nice little special ability (shield and armour destruction) it has the interesting shtick of ventriloquism/voice imitation. It uses this to lure its prey into traps, which is a much more worthwhile ploy, I think, than the hoary old 'pretend to be an old woman/damsel in distress' idea. The idea of a monstrous horse with the voice of a terrified child is also damn creepy when you think about it.

There are also some adventure hooks in the entry: mages use Leucrotta hides for boots of striding and springing, and the creature's saliva is an antidote for love potions. It seems a stretch to imagine somebody going to such lengths to avoid a love potion as to slay a Leucrotta and drink its saliva, but there you go.

The Leucrotta entry is also notable for seeing the reappearance of our old friends, the sages. Here they are speculating that "the leucrotta is an unnatural abnormality, an aberration spawned by some demented power or archmage." Who that demented power or archmage is, is up to individual DMs to decide.

Leucrotta are so loathsome that not even druids would make the argument that they are worth keeping around. This raises the interesting question of how druids view other horrible monsters like Manticores, Cockatrices and Catoblepas. Are there Catoblepas rights activist druids out there in the world?

I liked the illustration of a Leucrotta in the 1st edition MM far more than the Monstrous Compendium's. The 2nd edition illustration just looks badly drawn, with poor anatomy. While you could argue that a Leucrotta drawing is supposed to be ugly and look like the beast has been ineptly assembled from bits and pieces of other animals, it just doesn't appeal to me.

Oh, and a leucrotta is supposed to look like a monstrous stag (with lion- and badger-bits), not a horse.

Anyhows, as for the description saying "they have no practical use" they do have an obvious ecological role as a scavenger, chewing up the tougher parts of corpses and thereby disposing of them. Why don't the druids think of them as being the mountain-dwelling equivalent of hyenas?

The rule about saving vs the "horrible stench" in their lairs is a bit odd. Surely lots of AD&D monsters would have lairs filled with the decomposing remains of their victims so why pick on the leucrotta, was it to emphasize the monster's uncleanly, ugly nature or its scavenging?

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9677688)

*You know, I always did want a 'gestalt' spell, where you could combine two lifeforms together to see what'd* happen, or at least a 'magical Experiment' type spell, to create things like this.

I mean, OwlBars had to come from somewhere, right?

Wasn't there a Dragon Magazine article with such spells, maybe Magical Crossbreeds in Dragon #243 by Jonathan M. Richards? I've got the magazine around somewhere, but don't have time to check.

DMH

12-02-2008 10:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There wasn't a spell in 243, but there are several in 237 under the merlane class in the article Wild at Heart. Still my favorite class/kit.

Wak, Green Ronin's Advanced Bestiary has an amalgam template for 3.5. It fuses any two creatures.

The Last Conformist

12-02-2008 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Taken as a whole, the MM surely implies the existence of a Crossbreed Anything With Anything Else spell.

(Hill giants, for example, are the result of crossbreeding giants with hills.)

Wakboth

12-02-2008 11:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9677643)

Leucrotta

An ugly quadruped with a mean bite, the Leucrotta is in my experience a very rarely encountered D&D beastie. It's an above average monster though. As well as having a nice little special ability (shield and armour destruction) it has the interesting shtick of ventriloquism/voice imitation. It uses this to lure its prey into traps, which is a much more worthwhile ploy, I think, than the hoary old 'pretend to be an old woman/damsel in distress' idea. The idea of a monstrous horse with the voice of a terrified child is also damn creepy when you think about it.

IIRC, leucrotta as a mythic critter is based on garbled accounts of hyenas, who do make creepy laughing sounds, aren't exactly the most conventionally good-looking critters, and chew up bones and such.

Quote:

There are also some adventure hooks in the entry: mages use Leucrotta hides for boots of striding and springing, and the creature's saliva is an antidote for love potions. It seems a stretch to imagine somebody going to such lengths to avoid a love potion as to slay a Leucrotta and drink its saliva, but there you go.

Didn't the MM entry note that there has been a dearth of volunteers to test the saliva's properties? :D

The Last Conformist

12-02-2008 11:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9678128)

IIRC, leucrotta as a mythic critter is based on garbled accounts of hyenas, who do make creepy laughing sounds, aren't exactly the most conventionally good-looking critters, and chew up bones and such.

The leucrotta (leocrocotta, leocrocota) was asserted by Pliny the Elder to be the offspring of a lion and a crocotta, the later apparently referring to some sort of hyena.

(This, of course, is more evidence for the Crossbreed Anything With Anything Else spell, altho lions and hyenas are fairly closely related compared to many other examples.)

Kakita Kojiro

12-03-2008 01:38 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9678192)

The leucrotta (leocrocotta, leocrocota) was asserted by Pliny the Elder to be the offspring of a lion and a crocotta, th later apparently referring to some sort of hyena.

Lions and hyenas, of course, both being well-known mountain dwellers. Thus explaining the leucrotta's mountain habitat in D&D. Er... or something.

Wakshaani

12-03-2008 02:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9677884)

There wasn't a spell in 243, but there are several in 237 under the merlane class in the article Wild at Heart. Still my favorite class/kit.

Wak, Green Ronin's Advanced Bestiary has an amalgam template for 3.5. It fuses any two creatures.

Don't have that boko or that issue of Dragon.

...

Lo, must I shop!

Littleredfox

12-03-2008 08:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9677894)
Taken as a whole, the MM surely implies the existence of a Crossbreed Anything With Anything Else spell.

Ritual of Twaining.
First published in Imagine and then in the Wizards Spell Compendium.

JRM

12-03-2008 04:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9678192)
The leucrotta (leocrocotta, leocrocuta) was asserted by Pliny the Elder to be the offspring of a lion and a crocotta, th later apparently refering to some sort of hyena.

(This, of course, is more evidence for the Crossbreed Anything With Anything Else spell, altho lions and hyenas are fairly closely related compared to many other examples.)

Well going by Pliny and AD&D, lions appear to be the orcs of the animal kingdom - they'll breed with anything. Ant-lions and manticores spring to mind, evidence the King of the Beasts will cross-breed with arthropods! Plus fish, how else do you explain sealions?

Well, at least they're not as bad as dragons in 3rd edition.:p

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9677688)
I mean, OwlBars had to come from somewhere, right?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9677761)
Chicago's nightlife? :)

Well, some sort of intoxication would help explain how and why two very disparate creatures got it on. * Now I'm imagining a lioness and a salmon waking up in a swimming pool together, both thinking "Oh my head, what did I do last night!"

There's a Dungeon magazine that uses that very explanation to explain the origins of a half-dragon giant crocodile, so it can't just be me.:o

JRM

12-03-2008 04:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9677884)

There wasn't a spell in 243, but there are several in 237 under the merlane class in the article Wild at Heart. Still my favorite class/kit.

Wak, Green Ronin's Advanced Bestiary has an amalgam template for 3.5. It fuses any two creatures.

Ta, I remembered it was around the two-hundreds but couldn't face digging through my back-issues to find it so I just did a search to find which issue had duckbunnies in it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Littleredfox (Post 9680362)

Ritual of Twaining.

First published in Imagine and then in the Wizards Spell Compendium.

Ooh I'd forgotten about that Imagine article! I've got that stashed away in a cupboard to. T'was an excellent magazine.

Of course, it's a fairly obvious idea to have rules for magical hybrids - 3rd edition has the Tauric template, for example, but I'm not sure whether it has an official spell to create one.

kelvingreen

12-04-2008 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9677808)

I liked the illustration of a Leucrotta in the 1st edition MM far more than the Monstrous Compendium's. The 2nd edition illustration just looks badly drawn, with poor anatomy. While you could argue that a Leucrotta drawing is supposed to be ugly and look like the beast has been ineptly assembled from bits and pieces of other animals, it just doesn't appeal to me.

Even the 2e picture is better than that awful 3.Xe version, which not only looks awful, but betrays its source (a Photoshopped image of a greyhound race) far too clearly.

Although it does make me think of a bunch of dwarfs heading down to the leucrotta track on an evening to bet their mining wages on the races and drink lots of poor quality, but more importantly cheap, ale.

noisms

12-04-2008 10:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lich

Liches eh? Where would we be without them? Okay, so the pictures seem to portray a pair of cross dressing mummies camping it up, but Liches were obviously designed to be Big Bads and being Big Bads is something they do very well. Not only are they equivalent to 18th level wizards at the least, they have a whole host of other nasty undead abilities and a special 'phylactery' which stores their soul and allows them to come back again and again for revenge. Sort of a D&D bad guy version of a save game function.

Liches love to chew up the scenery. Everything about them screams 'ham', from the fact that they like to make their lairs in 'ominous fortified areas' to their liking for Hammer-horror psuedonyms like 'The Black Hand' or 'The Forgotten King'. Liches are always voiced by Episode III-era Ian McDiarmid; Christopher Lloyd does the Demiliches.

One concern of mine with Liches is that they're overused. As a DM you can spend an age setting up a mysterious horrible BBEG for the characters to battle against, only for a crushing anticlimax when its identity is revealed and the players collectively sigh 'Oh, it's a Lich'. Use them sparingly, and make them really evil - otherwise they're trite.

Demilich

The Demilich section of the Lich entry has always threatened to drain my will to live; I never seem to be able to plough through it. In this respect it is oddly reminiscent of the Dracolich entry, which as you may remember I simply lacked the necessary fortitude to go through with summarising. Suffice to say the bit about Demiliches is long and insanely complicated. A taster:

Quote:

If the final resting place of a demilich's remains are entered, the dust which was once its body will rise up and assume a man-like shape. In the case of the oldest demiliches (25%), the shape will advance and threaten, but dissipate without attacking in 3 rounds unless attacked. Younger demiliches (75%) still retain a link to their remains, however, and will form with the powers of a wraith. This dust form cannot be turned. In addition, it can store energy from attacks and use this power to engage its foes. If the dust form is attacked, each point of damage which is delivered to it is converted to an energy point. Since the demilich will fall back and seem to suffer injury from each attack (though none is actually inflicted), its attackers are likely to press on in their attempts to destroy it. Once the demilich has acquired 50 energy points, it will assume a manifestation which looks much like the lich's earlier undead form and has the powers and abilities of a ghost, but which cannot be turned.

If anyone touches the skull it will rise into the air and turn to face the most powerful of the intruders (a spell user will be chosen over a non-spell user). Instantly, it unleashes a howl which acts as a death ray, affecting all creatures within a 20' radius of the skull. Those who fail to save vs. death are permanently dead.

On the next round, the demilich will employ another manner of attack. In order to attain the status of a demilich, a lich must have replaced 5-8 (1d4+4) of its teeth with gems. Each of these gems now serves as a powerful magical device which can trap the soul of its adversaries...

See what I mean?

Archlich

As 'rare as Roc's teeth', Archliches are seemingly non-evil Liches or those who were formerly priests rather than mages. These were rumours until 'recently', but they have apparently been verified. When, where and by whom, it is not given for us to know.

YojimboC

12-05-2008 12:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Didn't the demilich first see print in The Tomb of Horrors?

I dig liches. Evil undead spellcasters - what's not to love? Surround 'em with death knights and an army of orcs and you've basically got Sauron.

The Last Conformist

12-05-2008 12:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

If one crosses a lich and a demilich, does one get a three-quarter-lich?

noisms

12-05-2008 12:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9687865)
If one crosses a lich and a demilich, does one get a three-quarter-lich?

I think it makes a semi-demi-hemi ~~quaver~~ lich.

demiurge1138

12-05-2008 01:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Christopher Lee? Demiliches in my mind always possess a high-pitched cackle.

It should come as no surprise by now that my player Casey had a character who was due to become a lich at 20th level. Like, it was a class feature. This was a problem, as the PCs were on the path to fight the God of Undeath, and everyone was concerned that as soon as Casey turned into a lich, he would immediately be controlled by said aforementioned God and turned against them. So they murdered him while he was busily fighting something else, with great efficiency and verve. Then stole his stuff and threw his body into a sphere of annihilation.

I've only seen a few PVP kills in my day, but this one stands out to me as the best planned.

Wakboth

12-05-2008 02:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

It also sounds like one of the best justified ones. :)

Yah, liches are neat, but they're very easily overused. (Vampires, the other big-name undead, have a ton of vulnerabilities that every player knows by heart by now - stakes, garlic, holy symbols, and most importantly sunlight - and are also overused.)

kelvingreen

12-05-2008 02:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9687280)

As 'rare as Roc's teeth', Archliches are seemingly non-evil Liches or those who were formerly priests rather than mages. These were rumours until 'recently', but they have apparently been verified. When, where and by whom, it is not given for us to know.

Sages, obviously.

Usually when that kind of language is employed, it means that the "recent" events occurred in a module. It's often something along the lines of "a group of nameless heroes did X, Y and Z", referring to something players might have done in the course of the adventure, but obviously unable to give names. My bet is that an Archlich appears as an NPC in some module published sometime around the time the entry was written.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9688229)

Yah, liches are neat, but they're very easily overused. (Vampires, the other big-name undead, have a ton of vulnerabilities that every player knows by heart by now - stakes, garlic, holy symbols, and most importantly sunlight and are also overused.)

Well, you can always chuck out a bunch of those vulnerabilities; Dracula had no problem with sunlight until the films came along, and Max the Video Store Vampire loved garlic. It's easy to get rid of or modify the vampire's weaknesses but keep it recognisably a vampire; I'd say the bloodsucking is key, as is a certain level of OCD, but everything else is fair game. I'm sure it's possible to do the same for the lich, if one can identify what the essential lich features are.

demiurge1138

12-05-2008 05:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9688340)

I'm sure it's possible to do the same for the lich, if one can identify what the essential lich features are.

The essential features of the lich are:

1. Spellcasting
2. Immortality, via a phylactery or other cheat death device
3. Megalomania

I remember a Dragon magazine article in the early 3.0 days about how to synergize monsters for fun and profit. Things like a medusa with grimlocks for guards, because they're immune to her gaze, stuff like that. Their capstone was a lich whose phylactery was the gem used to cast trap the soul... on the tarrasque. Kill the lich for good, unleash an even more potent destructive force on the world.

That's the sort of thing I mean by "megalomania". Utter dickery, just because they can. Remember that it was a lich who built the Tomb of Horrors. They've got a lot of time on their hands, and hate everything.

DMH

12-05-2008 05:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9688007)

Christopher Lee? Demiliches in my mind always possess a high-pitched cackle.

He wrote Christopher Lloyd.

I never care for megalomaniac liches. Ones that have spent centuries on some research that is now useless because of changes in the world being pissed off and taking out on some village is okay (for a decade or so when they settle down).

The point I like using, if I use them at all, is they can be a source of new spells and magic items (both those forgotten and brand new). Getting them to sell the spells or way of making the items may be very difficult, but rarely impossible.

noisms

12-05-2008 06:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9688905)
He wrote Christopher Lloyd.

I was picturing a combination of the Klingon guy from Star Trek III and Judge Doom from Who Framed Roger Rabbit?

Wakshaani

12-05-2008 08:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I have to be careful wit Liches ... on the one hand, they can't be TOO overwhelming, despite having a century to work on projects. On teh other, they have to be scary because, otherwise?

That way lies Skeletor.

demiurge1138

12-05-2008 08:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9689160)
I was picturing a combination of the Klingon guy from Star Trek III and Judge Doom from Who Framed Roger Rabbit:

Sorry. Then yeah, totally. Right on the money.

Inyssius

12-05-2008 08:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Generally, I envision lichs as falling into two basic types:

Xykon;

and that paranoid-schizophrenic conspiracy nut with all the contingency plans, living in his concrete bunker and hatching intricate plots and forming incomprehensible theories about the nature of everything.

Nathan P. Mahney

12-05-2008 09:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9689446)

I have to be careful wit Liches ... on the one hand, they can't be TOO overwhelming, despite having a century to work on projects. On teh other, they have to be scary because, otherwise?

That way lies Skeletor.

My next Lich is totally going to wield a ram's-head staff.

JRM

12-05-2008 11:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9687280)

[u]Archlich

As 'rare as Roc's teeth', Archliches are seemingly non-evil Liches or those who were formerly priests rather than mages. These were rumours until 'recently', but they have apparently been verified. When, where and by whom, it is not given for us to know.

I suspect this came about because there are a few non-evil liches in the Forgotten Realms setting (IIRC they're of the "neutral crazy" variety). As for priests, you've been able to have cleric-liches since 1st edition, but nobody seems to make anything of them.

JRM

12-05-2008 11:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 9689526)

Generally, I envision liches as falling into two basic types:

Xykon;

and that paranoid-schizophrenic conspiracy nut with all the contingency plans, living in his concrete bunker and hatching intricate plots and forming incomprehensible theories about the nature of everything.

Oh yes, Xykon was a revelation. I never did use liches since, apart from my PCs being too low level, they were just so much of a cliché as the "immortal schemer hiding in their tombs". But the more gonzo approach of The Order of the Stick's Xykon offers lots of ideas. After all, if you've got vast magical powers and cannot die why not take on risks that would be crazy for mortals?

Xykon's behaviour makes more sense when you remember he's a sorcerer, not a wizard, which is perfectly legal in 3rd edition. He's got a high Charisma to boss people around with, but only a mediocre Intelligence - which would also explain a lot about Skeletor, come to think of it.:cool:

kelvingreen

12-06-2008 01:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

My favourite D&D Lich is the Random Lich from the urban night-time encounters table in, I think, the 1e DMG. That's an unlucky night for the players to be prowling the streets!

Kakita Kojiro

12-06-2008 11:28 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9692284)

My favourite D&D Lich is the Random Lich from the urban night-time encounters table in, I think, the 1e DMG. That's an unlucky night for the players to be prowling the streets!

Curse you, you've caused me to flashback to Dungeons & Dragons II: Wrath of the Dragon God!! :mad:

Not only is there a lich in that movie -- very bad makeup job*, and I'm hazy on what the heck he had to do with the plot, anyway -- but the wandering monster chart being used by the DM apparently had the PCs run into dozens and dozens and dozens of specters in the random woodlands they were passing through.

(And, yes, while viewing it you could almost see the DM's hand in setting up stuff.)

* probably because they spent all their sfx budget on CGI darkmantles. darkmantles, people! tsk.

Matthew L. Martin

12-06-2008 12:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9691689)

I suspect this came about because there are a few non-evil liches in the Forgotten Realms setting (IIRC they're of the "neutral crazy" variety). As for priests, you've been able to have cleric-liches since 1st edition, but nobody seems to make anything of them.

Archliches came from Spelljammer, actually; Nigel Findley cites them as appearing in SJR1 Lost Ships in his article "The Mind of the Vampire" in DRAGON #162.

Priestly liches get a chapter in Van Richten's Guide to the Lich.

Sleeper

12-06-2008 06:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9692284)

My favourite D&D Lich is the Random Lich from the urban night-time encounters table in, I think, the 1e DMG. That's an unlucky night for the players to be prowling the streets!

I always figured that was more a sign that lichs were at least minimally tolerated members of the community. Nobody likes them, but they're not like vampires sucking blood and seducing sons and daughters and killing people every other day just to survive. Liches may be distasteful and distrusted, but if they wear hooded cloaks and restrict their activities to the night, nobody really raises much of a fuss. So, unless you really did something silly to aggravate the lich, it's just like running into a reclusive and somewhat decrepit yet insanely powerful scholar.

noisms

12-06-2008 08:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Living Wall

After the Lich we have another over-the-top horror monster. The Living Wall is basically a collection of corpses cemented together into a wall, which grows by absorbing unfortunate trespassers. Whoever wrote the entry did a great job - the Ecology section is sheer unadulterated melodrama:

Quote:

A fact known only to one or two inhabitants of Ravenloft, is that living walls also arise as rare manifestations of Ravenloft's power, as responses to despair and dread. These walls are born in curses, midwived by death, and nurse on massacre.

The seed for such a living wall is planted when one sapient creature willfully entombs another in a wall. The hapless victim may be bound and walled alive in a rock niche on a windswept mountain trail, a sill in a fetid catacomb, a corner in an asylum, a cave wall, a mausoleum facade, or any other stone or brick wall. Once entombed, the victim will suffocate, dehydrate, or starve in utter darkness and solitude. But even this agony is not sufficient to wake the land's attention -- the entombed creature, in his terror, must curse his slayer, screaming loudly enough for his voice to carry beyond his tomb of stone. Only then does the land hear his agony.

When the victim dies, his life force is trapped within the wall. As he struggles to escape, his life energy becomes soiled by the soot of his screams and curses, which thickly coat the inside of his stone sarcophagus. In a matter of days, madness corrupts the trapped life force, changing it to chaotic evil.

At this point, the bodies of any creatures that have died within 100 yards of the wall within the last month rise, shamble to the wall, and meld into it. Even corpses that have been buried will dig their way to the surface and converge upon the wall. Although the wall retains its previous appearance, it is no longer stone, but a gray and rotting bulwark of limbs, ribs, hands, bones, and faces, twisted and fused together. Bodies of any subsequent deaths occurring within 100 yards also rise and wander to the wall for assimilation.

Most cultures, and all good-aligned characters, attempt to destroy these creations wherever they are found. But many of these assaults merely strengthen the wall with deposits of more corpses.

Great stuff. "Born in curses, midwived by death, and nursed on massacre"! It's like something from a Brian Lumley novel. I love that uber-gothic Ravenloft shtick. Although officially I disapprove of all setting-specific monster descriptions in the Monstrous Manual.

Living Walls shouldn't need much of a reason to exist in an adventure except as a grotesque end-of-level type monster. But there's an interesting idea for a plot hook in that the abomination will dissipate if it gets the chance to destroy its creator. Low-level PCs, unable to deal with the Living Wall themselves, seeking out the creator and kidnapping him in order to feed him to it?

(un)reason

12-06-2008 08:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Ahh, living walls. They're one of the great examples of infinite scaling monsters, along with shambling mounds. Mess with them wrongly, and they just get even scarier. You can see why twink wizard would want to build one. The problem, of course, is keeping control of them.

JRM

12-06-2008 09:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9695197)

I always figured that was more a sign that liches were at least minimally tolerated members of the community. Nobody likes them, but they're not like vampires sucking blood and seducing sons and daughters and killing people every other day just to survive. Liches may be distasteful and distrusted, but if they wear hooded cloaks and restrict their activities to the night, nobody really raises much of a fuss. So, unless you really did something silly to aggravate the lich, it's just like running into a reclusive and somewhat decrepit yet insanely powerful scholar.

Absolutely! Why do these bloody adventurers think that just because a detect evil goes 'ping' they can kill people on the street, or have the right to assault an innocent undead while it's going about its lawful business in town.

An encounter like that could be a great roleplaying opportunity. What's the lich up to? Is it furthering an insidious plot to conquer the Kingdom, or just shopping, catching a show or visiting its still living buddies in the Mages' Guild? Liches have private lives too, you know. It gets very dull sitting in your crypt all day.

Wakboth

12-07-2008 02:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9689446)

That way lies Skeletor.

Funny that you should say that... :D

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9695285)

Great stuff. "Born in curses, midwived by death, and nursed on massacre"! It's like something from a Brian Lumley novel. I love that uber-gothic Ravenloft shtick. Although officially I disapprove of all setting-specific monster descriptions in the Monstrous Manual.

Oh, yes. This is how you pick and choose monsters from a setting-based Monstrous Compendium, not kirre...

Quote:

Living Walls shouldn't need much of a reason to exist in an adventure except as a grotesque end-of-level type monster. But there's an interesting idea for a plot hook in that the abomination will dissipate if it gets the chance to destroy its creator. Low-level PCs, unable to deal with the Living Wall themselves, seeking out the creator and kidnapping him in order to feed him to it?

I was thinking of doing it the other way around, actually; low-level PCs kill the villain by luring him into the room where he entombed his wife (or his cat, or both), because he has no idea the wall there is now alive and thirsting for vengeance!

Kakita Kojiro

12-07-2008 03:14 AM

Er... if a Living Wall is created when someone dies all bricked up, and then adds corpses to itself to grow -- shouldn't it be an UNliving Wall?

demiurge1138

12-07-2008 03:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9696161)

Er... if a Living Wall is created when someone dies all bricked up, and then adds corpses to itself to grow -- shouldn't it be an UNliving Wall?

Well, yes, but that doesn't sound quite right.

I agree that living walls are up at the top of the list for setting-specific imports in the MM; that ecology scared the shit out of me when I was a wee one.

kelvingreen

12-07-2008 04:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9694492)

Curse you, you've caused me to flashback to Dungeons & Dragons II: Wrath of the Dragon God!! :mad:

Weeeeeeell, it's better than the first one, at least!

Sleeper

12-07-2008 06:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9696293)

Weeeeeeell, it's better than the first one, at least!

If you sit down and watch them both, one after the other, Wrath of the Dragon God takes on a certain gravitas and becomes a thing of wonder, of amazement, nigh unto Ben Hur or Lawrence of Arabia in sheer majesty and perfection.

Of course if you watch it by itself, it's merely eh not that bad.

JRM

12-07-2008 08:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9696624)

If you sit down and watch them both, one after the other, Wrath of the Dragon God takes on a certain gravitas and becomes a thing of wonder, of amazement, nigh unto Ben Hur or Lawrence of Arabia in sheer majesty and perfection

Of course if you watch it by itself, it's merely eh not that bad.

I agree with that, Wrath of the Dragon God is by no means a great film but it's so much better than the first one, and is "truer to D&D" (in my arrogant view) that I have little embarrassment in saying I like it. Although I am surely biased by my fond spot for a "good" trashy fantasy films - I enjoy Hawk the Slayer, The Sword and the Sorcerer and the (first) Beastmaster, for example.

Vultur10

12-08-2008 11:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I just found this series of threads, and it's awesome. Subscribed and rated 5 stars.

What's next, locathahs?

see

12-08-2008 11:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Matthew L. Martin (Post 9694628)

Archliches came from Spelljammer, actually; Nigel Findley cites them as appearing in SJR1 Lost Ships in his article "The Mind of the Vampire" in DRAGON #162.

That's true. And the author of SJR1?

Why, the creator of the Forgotten Realms, Ed Greenwood, importing an idea from his home Realms campaign. (There was a specific mention of this in the Ed Greenwood forum over on candlekeep.com)

Wakboth

12-08-2008 03:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9700240)

I just found this series of threads, and it's awesome. Subscribed and rated 5 stars.

What's next, locathahs?

I think so. Salmon-men!

demiurge1138

12-08-2008 04:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9700755)

I think so. Salmon-men!

Nope. Lizards and lizardfolk first.

noisms

12-08-2008 05:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9700240)

I just found this series of threads, and it's awesome. Subscribed and rated 5 stars.

What's next, locathahs?

Thank you very much. Lizards are coming along next.

JasonK

12-08-2008 05:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Holy hell. I don't believe we're 19 pages into this and I missed it thus far!

Leesee... lost out on Kobolds (the gnome rivalry, btw, was just to keep the demihuman parallels strong: elves/orcs, dwarves/goblins, gnomes/kobolds), kuo toa (deep ones!) and lichs (truly some of the best BBEGs ever), but not a whole lot else.

Can't wait to see the rest. :)

~ jasön

Sleeper

12-08-2008 07:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

While we're not too far away, how exactly is "lich" pronounced? I remember a debate back in the day (maybe in Dragon?) between either "lick" or "like" and "litch". I've always pronounced it the last way, myself.

Vultur10

12-08-2008 07:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I'm pretty sure it's "litch", like in "lich gate", the gate to a graveyard. (It's the same word; "lich" is an old word for "corpse". The application to an undead being comes from Clark Ashton Smith, I think.)

Lukas Sjöström

12-08-2008 09:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've always said "lisch", but I'm a dirty furriner, so don't listen to me. As an aside, the Swedish word for "corpse" is still "lik", so I avoid any pronounciations that might confuse the two.

noisms

12-08-2008 09:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9701131)

I'm pretty sure it's "litch", like in "lich gate", the gate to a graveyard. (It's the same word; "lich" is an old word for "corpse". The application to an undead being comes from Clark Ashton Smith, I think.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lukas Sjöström (Post 9701455)

I've always said "lisch", but I'm a dirty furriner, so don't listen to me. As an aside, the Swedish word for "corpse" is still "lik", so I avoid any pronounciations that might confuse the two.

Obviously the two languages' shared Germanic roots are indicated by that. Leiche is a German word if I'm not mistaken.

For what it's worth, I pronounce it Litch.

Wakboth

12-08-2008 10:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've pronounced it as "likh", or "lich" with the "ch" from Scottish "Loch".

noisms

12-08-2008 11:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lizard

A rather perfunctory entry, which as usual with Real Animal entries in the MM refers to Giant versions of whatever creature is in the title. All the lizards are able to swallow opponents and keep them in their mouth, generally causing double damage per round until the victim is dead or released.

Fire Lizard

This is a 'false dragon', or wingless red dragon of animal-level intelligence. Like red dragons, they have a liking for treasure, and can breathe fire. Their eggs are worth 5,000 gp (the entry prints this twice - tut tut, proof readers) and the hatchlings 7,500. A welcome return to the egg-thief motif, there.

Giant Lizard

These are often domesticated by lizard men, and are fed on by black dragons, though otherwise they are rather dull. I prefer the idea of them being domesticated by something unexpected, like, I dunno, dwarves. Why do dwarves never ride things? It never made sense to me, and seems almost entirely based on the fact that Gimli didn't ride a horse.

Minotaur Lizard

These are lizards with horns 'like those of a minotaur'; this raises the obvious question: why not call them Bull Lizards? Disappointingly the horns are used to attract mates, and not to fight. Yawn.

Subterranean Lizard

This is the most interesting of the bunch, which really isn't saying a whole deal. Subterranean Lizards have suction feet, like geckoes, which enable them to walk upside down and climb sheer walls. Some are also able to shoot out their tongues like a chameleon, to drag victims into their maws.

demiurge1138

12-09-2008 01:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In recent months, I've gotten the idea for the a game in which the PCs get a map to a fantastic lost valley of dinosaurs. When they get there, the dinosaurs are actually giant lizards and crocodiles with fins and horns stuck to them, ala the shitty dinosaur movies of old.

Problem is, I have no idea what do to with that idea beyond that point.

Inyssius

12-09-2008 01:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Fin leeches?

6inTruder

12-09-2008 05:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9701893)

Lizard

No thoughts for the picture? I forgot to look it up this morning, but I swear the picture is based on a desert lizard... Which amused me as none of the Giant Lizards are from the desert.

Also, Gray Dwarves. They ride giant spiders.

edit: I think it may be a collard lizard? Oh, and while looking I found this:
<http://www.furiouscylon.com/biomech/...ard-767769.jpg>
Sure that one is hand sized, but BIG, it'd look pretty cul.

The Last Conformist

12-09-2008 08:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9701523)

Obviously the two languages' shared Germanic roots are indicated by that. Leiche is a German word if I'm not mistaken.

For what it's worth, I pronounce it Litch.

Indeed, Sw. lik, Ge. Leiche, and En. "lich" are all cognate, and, outside of gamerdom, all mean the same thing. Your pronunciation is the historically justified one, whether or not it's the commonest one in the post-Gygaxian world.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9701893)

Why do dwarves never ride things? It never made sense to me, and seems almost entirely based on the fact that Gimli didn't ride a horse.

It may be because dwarves archetypically live subterraneously - miners and speleologists don't typically ride, at least not when underground.

see

12-09-2008 08:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Since lizardy kobolds ride giant weasels, mamillan gnomes should ride lizards.

Wakshaani

12-09-2008 08:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Sticky-footed subteranean lizards were eventually brought in as mounts for Drow.

Shocking in their non-listing is any sort of giant sand lizard and swamp-dwellers barely get any mention. Lake-dwellers none at all! 2nd ed needs a herpatologist, stat!

On another note, totally at random, one of teh things I did in my world to make humans stand out was that they were one of teh very few races that ever domesticated animals. Wood Elves would be friendly with some and tend to them, but never DOMESTICATE any, High Elves would never stoop to such things, Dwarves never had any, and Orcs had no patience for it (Tho would sometimes raise giant warbeasts, like Hydras, through sheer intimidation and beatings.) Ony Goblins came close, with Wolfriding, but no other race ever had animals that would actually serve them.

Sounds a bit odd, but, it's kind of neat.

Vultur10

12-09-2008 03:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I never got what the deal was with the minotaur lizards. The Dragonlance SAGA book made them interestingly creepy with the in-character way it talked about their mimicking waterfalls, but here they're just ... huh?

And why no disease-carrying komodo dragon, or a giant chameleon?

kelvingreen

12-09-2008 04:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9701893)

Why do dwarves never ride things? It never made sense to me, and seems almost entirely based on the fact that Gimli didn't ride a horse

Perhaps because they're usually depicted as having disproportionately short legs; as such they're unable to get their legs around the torso of an animal to get a proper grip, and so don't bother. Although one would think that dwarves would just then come up with a different riding style.

Perhaps then it's to do with habitat. Perhaps riding beasts don't provide a useful advantage in terms of speed and versatility in an underground mining setting, and the dwarves' famous resilience means that they can walk or run for much longer and more comfortably than those races that use mounts for long-distance travel.

Sleeper

12-09-2008 05:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9705315)

Perhaps because they're usually depicted as having disproportionately short legs; as such they're unable to get their legs around the torso of an animal to get a proper grip, and so don't bother. Although one would think that dwarves would just then come up with a different riding style.

Perhaps then it's to do with habitat. Perhaps riding beasts don't provide a useful advantage in terms of speed and versatility in an underground mining setting, and the dwarves' famous resilience means that they can walk or run for much longer and more comfortably than those races that use mounts for long-distance travel.

Then they need a low-slung, stable animal that's comfortable in dark, dank, irregular environs and has a relatively small mid-section.

Beware the monstrous centipede riders!

JRM

12-09-2008 06:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9701131)

I'm pretty sure it's "litch", like in "lich gate", the gate to a graveyard. (It's the same word; "lich" is an old word for "corpse". The application to an undead being comes from Clark Ashton Smith, I think.)

Yes, we pronounce it "litch" over here in the UK. Incidentally, I believe in Ye Olde English lich originally meant "body", possibly a live one, and later came to exclusively refer to a dead body.

JRM

12-09-2008 06:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9702295)

In recent months, I've gotten the idea for the a game in which the PCs get a map to a fantastic lost valley of dinosaurs. When they get there, the dinosaurs are actually giant lizards and crocodiles with fins and horns stuck to them, ala the shitty dinosaur movies of old.

Problem is, I have no idea what do to with that idea beyond that point.

Obviously, they start hunting for the Lost Diamond Mines of Legend while fighting off the Infeasibly Pale-Skinned Amazons in Skimpy Bikinis and being helped by the Friendly Ape-Person they rescued from the "Dinosaurs".

JRM

12-09-2008 06:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9703995)

Sticky-footed subteranean lizards were eventually brought in as mounts for Drow.

Don't forget the pack-lizards! Drow and the other subterranean races have been using these animals to transport their goods since the days of D1-D3 Descent into the Depths of the Earth.

Wakboth

12-09-2008 06:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

And duergar have been shown riding giant spiders (called steeders), which is a bit odd to me.

Spiders would seem like a much more likely fit with the drow, while lizards would suit the duergar well.

Sleeper

12-09-2008 07:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9705500)

Yes, we pronounce it "litch" over here in the UK. Incidentally, I believe in Ye Olde English lich originally meant "body", possibly a live one, and later came to exclusively refer to a dead body.

My Websters desktop says "litch" but Wiktionary claims both the "like" and "litch" pronunciations are correct. Old English "lic" meant corpse (I don't know of any earlier, more general definitions), though my old unabridged Websters adds that it is used primarily in combination (the given example is "lich-house"). The corpse definition and the whole lychgate thing appear to be primarily British Englishisms. Wiktionary also claims it can be used poetically to refer to a living body, particularly a torso. Would be interesting to know what the OED says.

Wakshaani

12-09-2008 10:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9705523)

And duergar have been shown riding giant spiders (called steeders), which is a bit odd to me.

Spiders would seem like a much more likely fit with the drow, while lizards would suit the duergar well.

Absolutely agreed.

However, they didn't DO it that way.

Maybe spider-riding makes a Drow look too much like a Drider for their own comfort?

(See also: Silliness of Driders being outcasts.)

JRM

12-09-2008 11:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9705697)

My Webster's desktop says "litch" but Wiktionary claims both the "like" and "litch" pronunciations are correct. Old English "lic" meant corpse (I don't know of any earlier, more general definitions), though my old unabridged Webster adds that it is used primarily in combination (the given example is "lich-house"). The corpse definition and the whole lychgate thing appear to be primarily British Englishisms. Wiktionary also claims it can be used poetically to refer to a living body, particularly a torso. Would be interesting to know what the OED says.

Well I only have a Concise Oxford within easy reach, but it says:

lich, lich, n. ~-gate, roofed gateway of churchyard where coffin awaits clergyman's arrival; ~-house, mortuary; ~-owl, screech-owl (boding death); ~-stone (to place coffin on at lich-gate). [OE lic corpse, = OS lic, OHG lih, ON lik, Goth. leik f. Gmc likam body, form, appearance]

While Chambers 20th Century Dictionary says:

lich lich n. a body, living or dead (obs.). -lich'gate, lych'gate a roofed churchyard gate to rest the bier under; lich'-owl a screech-owl, deemed a death-portent; lich'wake see lykewake; lich'waya path by which the dead are carried to burial. [M.E. lich, liche (Southern), like (Northern) - O.E. lic; Ger. Leiche, corpse]

So it looks like the "body" meaning comes from its Germanic root, but the "corpse" meaning has been the main usage for quite some time.

noisms

12-09-2008 11:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lizard Man

Lizard Men are that rare thing in D&D: a Neutral humanoid enemy-style race. In fact I can't think of any others... except the Locathah maybe? (Coincidentally on the very next page.) This makes them more interesting, in that their malice or danger is entirely due to hunger and/or self-defence, rather than sheer aggression or meanness. They can therefore fulfil something more than the standard orc-substitute role.

I think one of the most common, and more interesting, Lizard Men concepts is the 'fallen civilisation' motif. Whether the Lizard Men are the remnants of an ancient empire now fallen to barbarism, or whether they are merely inhabiting the ruins of a now disappeared and superior people, they go together well with Mayan-style pyramids deep in jungle glades, moss-covered statues, and mysterious golden artifacts. The city of El Dorado would be inhabited by them, I think - perhaps with a slumbering Great Old One under the foundations.

Advanced Lizard Men

These are slightly more developed versions of the ordinary Lizard Men, as the name would suggest. Perhaps they remember more from the old times - or perhaps they have dug deeper beneath the ruins and made greater discoveries. I like to imagine them armed with the occasional magical relic from the old times - a bronze heartseeker axe, or psionic jewelled necklace.

Lizard King

These are the leaders of the race, who generally boss around a tribe of underlings. They demand regular human sacrifice, and can easily be imagined sitting on a pyramid top a la Apocalypso, while a constant stream of human captives are decapitated and their heads thrown down the steep staircase. The only difference, of course, would be that the Lizard King would be eating the headless corpses.

JRM

12-09-2008 11:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9706185)
Absolutely agreed.

However, they didn't DO it that way.

Maybe spider-riding makes a Drow look too much like a Drider for their own comfort?

(See also: Silliness of Driders being outcasts.)

Aren't there spider-riding drow in some later sources?

As for the drider-drow outcast silliness, one possible explanation is that it originated in some sort of lese majesty heresy? Perhaps the original driders were drow wizard-priests who broke with the mainstream Lolth worship and tried to become closer to the goddess by self-transformation, so the fully elf-shaped drow priestesses declared them Abomination and Lolth decided to play along, maybe after the obligatory civil war, so it now became a punishment to unworthy drow, since only the Spider-Goddess and her supernatural handmaidens are "pure" enough to blend the sacred forms of dark elf and spider without stain on their character.

JRM

12-10-2008 12:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9706377)

Lizard Man

Lizard Men are that rare thing in D&D: a Neutral humanoid enemy-style race. In fact I can't think of any others... except the Locathah maybe? (Coincidentally on the very next page.) This makes them more interesting, in that their malice or danger is entirely due to hunger and/or self-defence, rather than sheer aggression or meanness. They can therefore fulfil something more than the standard orc-substitute role.

Crabmen and Mongrelmen are probably next on my list of AD&D's "are they friends or enemies", but Lizardmen are my favourite. There are a few other candidates among the Monstrous Compendium's Neutral aligned monsters, such as Centaurs (which are regrettably unlikely to eat captured PCs) and Quaggoths (which in my opinion are too vicious to offer much potential as PC allies). Oh, and there are Thri-Kreen as well.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9706377)

I think one of the most common, and more interesting, Lizard Men concepts is the 'fallen civilisation' motif. Whether the Lizard Men are the remnants of an ancient empire now fallen to barbarism, or whether they are merely inhabiting the ruins of a now disappeared and superior people, they go together well with Mayan-style pyramids deep in jungle glades, moss-covered statues, and mysterious golden artifacts. The city of El Dorado would be inhabited by them, I think - perhaps with a slumbering Great Old One under the foundations.

snip

Lizard King

These are the leaders of the race, who generally boss around a tribe of underlings. They demand regular human sacrifice, and can easily be imagined sitting on a pyramid top a laApocalypso, while a constant stream of human captives are decapitated and their heads thrown down the steep staircase. The only difference, of course, would be that the Lizard King would be eating the headless corpses.

There's evidence that at least some of the ancient Meso- and South American civilizations that indulged in human sacrifice also practices cannibalism at least on occasion, so that distinction may not hold water.

As for the lost civilization, why not have lizard men who still have a civilization, or even better, are in the process of (re)building one and want the PCs assistance. That would likely tie in well with the "Lost World of Dinosaurs" campaign idea that's been floating around here. Maybe they're trying to rebuild their sacred ziggurat so they can get back in touch with Yig and/or the Coatls?

noisms

12-10-2008 12:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9706532)

Crabmen and Mongrelmen are probably next on my list of AD&D's "are they friends or enemies", but Lizardmen are my favourite.

Oh yeah, Crabmen. I think Mongrelmen are Lawful Neutral though, aren't they? I should have specified True Neutral.

Sleeper

12-10-2008 12:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9706372)

Well I only have a Concise Oxford within easy reach, but it says:

lich, lich, n. ~-gate, roofed gateway of churchyard where coffin awaits clergyman's arrival; ~-house, mortuary; ~-owl, screech-owl (boding death); ~-stone (to place coffin on at lich-gate). [OE lic corpse, = OS lic, OHG lih, ON lik, Goth. leik f. Gmc likam body, form, appearance]

While Chambers 20th Century Dictionary says:

lich lich n. a body, living or dead (obs.). -lich'gate, lych'gate a roofed churchyard gate to rest the bier under; lich'-owl a screech-owl, deemed a death-portent; lich'wake see lykewake; lich'way a path by which the dead are carried to burial. [M.E. lich, liche(Southern), like (Northern) - O.E. lic; Ger. Leiche, corpse]

So it looks like the "body" meaning comes from its Germanic root, but the "corpse" meaning has been the main usage for quite some time.

Aha. Webster's Collegiate says: lich (*lich) n. [[ME < OE lic, akin to Ger leiche, corpse < IE base lig-*, figure, shape, similar, like > LIKE2]] [Now Brit. Dial.] a dead body; corpse.

 with the lower end of the c extending into the h, whatever that's called

My (much older) Unabridged copy is formatted differently but otherwise similar, except the the note that the word is usually used in combination. Note the absence of "body" among the list of synonyms for lig-*.

Sleeper

12-10-2008 12:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9706377)

Lizard King

These are the leaders of the race, who generally boss around a tribe of underlings. They demand regular human sacrifice, and can easily be imagined sitting on a pyramid top a laApocalypso, while a constant stream of human captives are decapitated and their heads thrown down the steep staircase. The only difference, of course, would be that the Lizard King would be eating the headless corpses.

The image of the lizard king that will be forever impressed on my mind comes from the original Fiend Folio. A nasty vaguely black lagoonish lizardman with a trident, futilely skewering squat squarish humanoids with baby-faced Alfred E. Neuman heads. This appeared to be simply because "lava children" and "lizard king" were alphabetically adjacent, rather than due to any natural animosity or in fact any reason at all why the two races would normally come into conflict.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9706377)

Lizard Man

Lizard Men are that rare thing in D&D: a Neutral humanoid enemy-style race. In fact I can't think of any others... except the Locathah maybe? (Coincidentally on the very next page.) This makes them more interesting, in that their malice or danger is entirely due to hunger and/or self-defence, rather than sheer aggression or meanness. They can therefore fulfil something more than the standard orc-substitute role.

I think one of the most common, and more interesting, Lizard Men concepts is the 'fallen civilisation' motif. Whether the Lizard Men are the remnants of an ancient empire now fallen to barbarism, or whether they are merely inhabiting the ruins of a now disappeared and superior people, they go together well with Mayan-style pyramids deep in jungle glades, moss-covered statues, and mysterious golden artifacts. The city of El Dorado would be inhabited by them, I think - perhaps with a slumbering Great Old One under the foundations.

Advanced Lizard Men

These are slightly more developed versions of the ordinary Lizard Men, as the name would suggest. Perhaps they remember more from the old times - or perhaps they have dug deeper beneath the ruins and made greater discoveries. I like to imagine them armed with the occasional magical relic from the old times - a bronze heartseeker axe, or psionic jewelled necklace.

Lizard King

These are the leaders of the race, who generally boss around a tribe of underlings. They demand regular human sacrifice, and can easily be imagined sitting on a pyramid top a laApocalypso, while a constant stream of human captives are decapitated and their heads thrown down the steep staircase. The only difference, of course, would be that the Lizard King would be eating the headless corpses.

Yuppers! Along with Bullywugs, Aarocka, and Kuo-Toa, these are the four known "Elder Races" that predate not only Man, but Elves and Dwarves as well. Some say that they predate Dragonkind as well, or, at the least, that Dragons, LizardMen, and Kobolds all have some kind of relationship. There should be a fifth, mammalian race, but none ever stepped up to the plate as such. (I'm given to understand that there's a race of Ocelot-Men in Maztica, but, I'm sketchy on teh details.)

In this way, Advanced and Kings might be less-regressed types, or those who've discovered some tiny shreds of their Lost Great Empire. Bullywugs are the way to go for swamps, Kua-Toa underground or undersea, Aarocka for mountain peaks or cloud cities, while Bullywugs and Lizardfolk split the difference in the jungles. Lizardfolk, however, make fantastic Lost Civilization types in desert settings, to the degree that, if you haven't run Lizardfolk Mummies, you're seriously missing out.

For a more tame adventure seed, have the party encounter what the map said was a stream but turns out to be a small river. They need to make time, but, luckily, a tribe of advanced lizardfolk is nearby. They need to negotiate (gasp!) for a guide and a barge to reach Point X, but, the lizardfolk don't trust humans/Dwarves/etc due to being preyed upon by a local village's forces. Make peace, then make haste to the adventure, proper!

kelvingreen

12-10-2008 03:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9706723)

The image of the lizard king that will be forever impressed on my mind comes from the original Fiend Folio.

For me, predictably, it's the Fighting Fantasy Lizard King, a brutish thug uplifted to leadership by the alien parasite that lives on/in his head.

Wakboth

12-10-2008 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9706377)

I think one of the most common, and more interesting, Lizard Men concepts is the 'fallen civilisation' motif. Whether the Lizard Men are the remnants of an ancient empire now fallen to barbarism, or whether they are merely inhabiting the ruins of a now disappeared and superior people, they go together well with Mayan-style pyramids deep in jungle glades, moss-covered statues, and mysterious golden artifacts. The city of El Dorado would be inhabited by them, I think - perhaps with a slumbering Great Old One under the foundations.

Funnily enough, I always used lizard men as a race that was just starting to get the hang of this "civilization" stuff - tool use, building mud huts, forming tribes and such. Yuan-ti fitted the role of "regressed survivors of ancient reptilian empire" better, I thought.

Quote:

Lizard King

These are the leaders of the race, who generally boss around a tribe of underlings. They demand regular human sacrifice, and can easily be imagined sitting on a pyramid top a la Apocalypso, while a constant stream of human captives are decapitated and their heads thrown down the steep staircase. The only difference, of course, would be that the Lizard King would be eating the headless corpses.

Nice image, that. Of course, Lizard Kings (like flinds and orogs and whatnot) are monsters that exist only because of AD&D's oddities; namely, that you couldn't give classes and levels to the humanoids and boost them that way.

Vultur10

12-10-2008 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've actually been working up a lizard-man civilization on the Wizards D&D boards, in the dinosaur thread. I have them building towns and cities in the areas where the dinosaurs and such are rare enough that towns won't attract too much predatory attention, and being nomads elsewhere.

The Last Conformist

12-10-2008 04:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9706377)
Lizard King

These are the leaders of the race, who generally boss around a tribe of underlings. They demand regular human sacrifice, and can easily be imagined sitting on a pyramid top a laApocalypso, while a constant stream of human captives are decapitated and their heads thrown down the steep staircase.

While it should perhaps go without saying that creatures demanding regular human sacrifice are chaotic evil, it's stills noteworthy that True Neutral Lizard Men have Chaotic Evil Lizard Kings. Shouldn't there, like, be a lot of ethically-inspired republicanism around in Lizard Man circles?

Also, why specifically human sacrifice? We're told demihumans or other humanoids will do in a pinch, even fellow Lizard Men if nothing else is available, but not why humans are preferred in the first place.

Wakboth

12-10-2008 04:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9707620)
Also, why specifically human sacrifice? We're told demihumans or other humanoids will do in a pinch, even fellow Lizard Men if nothing else is available, but not why humans are preferred in the first place.

Because in the old pulp stories, ~~serpent men~~ lizardmen would sacrifice humans to their evil god. :)

Wakshaani

12-10-2008 05:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9707802)

Because in the old pulp stories, ~~serpent men~~ lizardmen would sacrifice humans to their evil god. :)

Plus, THIS way you get captive blonde-haired princesses, tied to twin posts and left for their Evil Reptile God to wade through the woods, find, and eat her... she gets to writhe and scream in terror beforehand, giving teh heroes plenty of motivation, and time, to get over there and save her.

When it's a slope-browed lizard there, hissing and tongue-flicking ... not so much.

See also Here.

The Last Conformist

12-10-2008 06:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9707919)

Plus, THIS way you get captive blonde-haired princesses, tied to twin posts and left for their Evil Reptile God to wade through the woods, find, and eat her... she gets to writhe and scream in terror beforehand, giving teh heroes plenty of motivation, and time, to get over there and save her.

When it's a slope-browed lizard there, hissing and tongue-flicking ... not so much.

See also Here.

Doesn't really explain why an elven chick wouldn't work.

DMH

12-10-2008 07:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lizardmen could be used as swamp dwelling gillmen. They can stay under in waist deep water and chew on the PCs. Why else would they bite? You don't see a bite attack under orc or kobold.

s/LaSH

12-10-2008 07:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9708226)

Doesn't really explain why an elven chick wouldn't work.

For some people, it would work better.

Except elves tend to hang out in temperate forest, not rainforest ripe with the scent of decay, for some reason. Perhaps only humans ever had the idea of walking south for a while.

Kakita Kojiro

12-10-2008 08:32 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9707919)

When it's a slope-browed lizard there, hissing and tongue-flicking ... not so much.

You know, I am totally going to have to have it be a dragonborn woman tied up, waiting to be sacrificed, in my 4e game. Too funny, having those heaving bosoms be scaly... with the slope-browed, hissing and tongue-flicking damsel in distress. Perfect rug to yank out from under the players, really.

... I suppose I should have her being sacrifice to some horrible, warm-blooded, alien deity, just to complete the trope-reversal. Maybe a giant keetoom?

Wakshaani

12-10-2008 11:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Well, I've had 'em deal with sacrificial medusae and harpies before, so, hey.

Ragnarok_Engine

12-10-2008 01:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9708740)

You know, I am totally going to have to have it be a dragonborn woman tied up, waiting to be sacrificed, in my 4e game. Too funny, having those heaving bosoms be scaly... with the slope-browed, hissing and tongue-flicking damse in distress. Perfect rug to yank out from under the players, really.

... I suppose I should have her being sacrifice to some horrible, warm-blooded, alien deity, just to complete the trope reversal. Maybe a giant keetoom?

An Ape Gargantua, of course! Duh! ;)

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9706817)

*Yuppers! Along with BULLywugs, Aarocka, and Kuo-Toa, these are the four known "Elder Races" that predate not only Man, but Elves and Dwarves as well. Some say that they predate Dragonkind as well, or, at the least, that Dragon: LizardMen, and Kobolds all have some kind of relationship. There should be a fifth, mamallian race, but none ever stepped up to the plate as such. (I'm given to understand that there's a race of Ocelot-Men in Maztica, but, I'm sketchy on teh details.)*

*In this way, Advanced and Kings might be less-regressed types, or those who've discovered some tiny shreds of their Lost Great Empire. Bullywugs are the way to go for swamps, Kua-Toa underground or undersea, Aarocka for mountain peaks or cloud cities, while Bullywugs and Lizardfolk split the difference in the jungles. lizardfolk, however, make fantastic Lost Civilization types in desert settings, to the degree that, if you haven't run Lizardfolk Mummies, you're seriously missing out.*

For a more tame adventure seed, have the party encounter what the map said was a stream but turns out to be a small river. Tehy need to make time, but, luckily, a tribe of advanced lizardfolk is nearby. They need to negotiate (gasp!) for a guide and a barge to reach Point X, but, the lizardfolk don't trust humans/Dwarves/etc due to being preyed upon by a local village's forces. Make peace, then make haste to the adventure, proper!

That reminds me, Lizard Men are one of AD&D's few tribal humanoid monsters with total sexual equality - indeed they're so equal that it's very hard to tell the genders apart, and their patron deity is a hermaphrodite! Most of the other humanoids that are likely to kill and eat adventurers have their males stronger than females - e.g. goblins, bugbears etc.

Yet, lizardmen are one of the few AD&D monsters with Man in their name. It'd make more sense to call the 1st/2nd AD&D versions "lizardfolk" like they are in 3rd edition, since the PCs are likely to be fighting specimens of both sexes at the same time.

Sleeper

12-10-2008 09:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9710607)

That reminds me, Lizard Men are one of AD&D's few tribal humanoid monsters with total sexual equality - indeed they're so equal that it's very hard to tell the genders apart, and their patron deity is a hermaphrodite! Most of the other humanoids that are likely to kill and eat adventurers have their males stronger than females - e.g. goblins, bugbears etc.

Yet, lizardmen are one of the few AD&D monsters with Man in their name. It'd make more sense to call the 1st/2nd AD&D versions "lizardfolk" like they are in 3rd edition, since the PCs are likely to be fighting specimens of both sexes at the same time.

The "-man" is simple mammalian prejudice. Milk-producing breasts are a feature of the furry females, not the scaly ones. No boobs. Plus, they lay eggs so say bye-bye to the wider hips. Of course humans and all the semi- and demi- types just can't tell the two sexes apart.

Instead, the warmbloods have to go by cultural cues. Once or twice a year, half the lizards dress up. The homeotherms just assume all the elaborate dances and frills and pretty colored crests are girly things, but the fork-tongues fool them. It's actually the males playing little rooster and doing their best to attract the more sedately colored and apparently masculinely stoic females. There might even be some visible secondary characteristics. Blood swells the crests on the male heads, which frill out and blossom into Carmen Miranda-style headdresses in all kinds of bright colors. Peacockskulls.

Pat

Wakboth

12-10-2008 09:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9707919)

Plus, THIS way you get captive blonde-haired princesses, tied to twin posts and left for their Evil Reptile God to wade through the woods, find, and eat her... she gets to writhe and scream in terror beforehand, giving teh heroes plenty of motivation, and time, to get over there and save her.

When it's a slope-browed lizard there, hissing and tongue-flicking ... not so much.

See also Here.

I was totally thinking about this. (Darn, I remembered the girl as a blonde, there...)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Most of the other humanoids that are likely to kill and eat adventurers have their males stronger than females - e.g. goblins, bugbears etc.

Although MM talks about gnolls having a male-dominant society, just about everyone I know who has used them, has also given them a hyena-styled matriarchy. :)

Wakshaani

12-10-2008 11:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9710780)

I was totally thinking about this. (Darn, I remembered the girl as a blonde, there...)

Mayhap you were thinking of this?

As for Gnolls, I'm way too late for THAT thread (alas), but I usually see them as A) man-eaters, B) terrifying mercenaries due to A (They're, literally, inhuman), and C) Muslim. Not sure why that last one, but, I've seen no less than five campaigns with muslim-styled Gnolls, dating back over fifteen years.

Weird.

DMH

12-11-2008 04:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I wonder why lizardmen have a bite attack and gnolls don't? With the ofte quote about hyenas being able to shatter bone easily, I would think someone would have added a bite attack.

Is there any other humanoids that have a bite attack?

JRM

12-11-2008 04:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9710739)

The "-man" is simple mammalian prejudice. Milk-producing breasts are a feature of the furry females, not the scaly ones. No boobs. Plus, they lay eggs so say bye-bye to the wider hips. Of course humans and all the semi- and demi-types just can't tell the two sexes apart.

Hmm... Lizard Men are as intelligent as humans, ergo that probably have large brains even as infants, which implies a large egg and "egg-laying hips", although that it contrary to AD&D canon, so possibly lizardmen babies are born really dumb and get smarter later.

Now we just need to explain dragonborn boobs.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9710739)

Instead, the warmbloods have to go by cultural cues. Once or twice a year, half the lizards dress up. The homeotherms just assume all the elaborate dances and frills and pretty colored crests are girly things, but the fork-tongues fool them. It's actually the males playing little rooster and doing their best to attract the more sedately colored and apparently masculinely stoic females. There might even be some visible secondary characteristics. Blood swells the crests on the male heads, which frill out and blossom into Carmen Miranda-style headdresses in all kinds of bright colors. Peacockskulls.

Pat

I've got a species of reptile-hominids where the males are small, colourful show-offs in my homebrew campaign, but that doesn't match the standard AD&D Lizard Man where both sexes appear identical. Maybe AD&D lizard people culture doesn't distinguish between the sexes, they just bump uglies at random and find out who's females by which of them lay eggs afterwards? Of course, that would play havoc with sexual selection - which, come to think of it, could explain why they look identical - there is no gender-difference in mate selection!

Maybe male or female lizard men become more attractive/socially dominant to other lizard people by the same means (success in battle, quantity of food, a really nice tail or whatever), so the "alpha" lizard has a circle of mates all of whom he/she mates with, and the whole tribe shares egg-watching and hatchling-raising duties. The Lizard King could be a mutant or "queen bee" form that has shortcut these signals to dominate an entire tribe.

JRM

12-11-2008 04:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9712571)

I wonder why lizardmen have a bite attack and gnolls don't? With the oft quote about hyenas being able to shatter bone easily, I would think someone would have added a bite attack.

Is there any other humanoids that have a bite attack?

Yes, norkers are the first that spring to mind.

Littleredfox

12-11-2008 05:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9712623)

Hmm... Lizard Men are as intelligent as humans, ergo that probably have large brains even as infants, which implies a large egg and "egg-laying hips", although that is contrary to AD&D canon, so possibly lizardmen babies are born really dumb and get smarter later.

Spelljammer tells us that lizardman intelligence is higher the nearer to the sun they are while in the egg. [Apparently some bright lizardman noticed that he and all the other bright lizardmen came from the inner planets and thick lizardmen come from the outer ones.]

So they build incubation ships to hang in close orbit around stars to give their progeny a better start in life.

Inyssiis

12-11-2008 05:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9712623)

Hmm... Lizard Men are as intelligent as humans, ergo that probably have large brains even as infants, which implies a large egg and "egg-laying hips", although that is contrary to AD&D canon, so possibly lizardmen babies are born really dumb and get smarter later.

Now we just need to explain dragonborn boobs.

Lizards lay eggs, and do not suckle their young.

Lizardmen are lizards, and dragonborn are dragons. But dragons are not lizards, and lizards are not dragons.

Dragons could just as well be egg-laying mammals, like the platypus or echnida--but I think a very good case could be made that they occupy their own taxonomic class.

s/LaSH

12-11-2008 06:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 9712928)

Dragons could just as well be egg-laying mammals, like the platypus or echnida--but I think a very good case could be made that they occupy their own taxonomic class.

They're hexapods. They probably count as vertebrates, but in our world's phylogenetic tree, they'd have branched off somewhere before fish. The lamprey would be the closest relation between us (and the lizard, and other closely-related species) and the dragon. So, considering that lizards and people are thus practically identical compared to that gulf of separation, you can really justify anything over on the draconic side of the tree.

(This does have a slight problem, however. Where are the third pair of limbs on the Dragonborn?)

Sleeper

12-11-2008 07:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH (Post 9713089)

They're hexapods. They probably count as vertebrates, but in our world's phylogenetic tree, they'd have branched off somewhere before fish. The lamprey would be the closest relation between us (and the lizard, and other closely-related species) and the dragon. So, considering that lizards and people are thus practically identical compared to that gulf of separation, you can really justify anything over on the draconic side of the tree.

Now use that logic to explain owlbears (bird/mammal crossbreeds). Or coatl (bird/serpent crossbreeds). Or an ettercap (mammal/insect crossbreed). Dragons are reptiles. The extra set of limbs is just... magic homoplasy. Though in one of the D&D mythology riff threads, I explained it away by claiming dragons are actually arthropods...

Inyssius

12-11-2008 08:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Ettercaps are technically mammals--halfings twisted and tortured and reshaped until they resemble insects; god knows how that cycle started, but it didn't come about the way you're assuming. Coatls are descended from dinosaurs, like our feathered birds--but being Outsiders, they don't necessarily need to have come into being via evolution. I'd suspect a hefty infusion of celestial blood, either from actual intercourse or simply mythological leakage from long residence in the forests of Celestia.

Owlbears are harder to figure out. Could totemism actually be a valid evolutionary strategy in D&D worlds--owls are mythologically linked with awareness, ferocity, destruction, ill fortune and death, after all. Could a bearlike species have developed a more owl-like appearance over time in order to tap into that link? It might go some way toward explaining the profusion of humanoid animals, too...

randomgamer8466

12-11-2008 08:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Recently in 4e, my Eladrin rogue/warlock and his human fighter friend got clues that Drow were around. As an Elf (sorta), my character was dead set on mass drowbicide, but the human fighter was less convinced. Then we encountered some Ettercaps. The way my DM described them, they were brain-damaged humans with mechanical spider limbs and spinnerets (no spider allies). After we killed them, I explained to my human ally that these were called Ettercaps and that name was Drowish for "improved human". He found his motivation after that.

Also: What, all this discussion of Lizard Kings and no Jim Morrison jokes?

Wakboth

12-11-2008 12:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH (Post 9713089)
(This does have a slight problem, however. Where are the third pair of limbs on the Dragonborn?)

Well, DBs aren't dragons, either. Just related to them.

Sleeper

12-11-2008 01:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi (Post 9713479)

Ettercaps are technically mammals--halflings twisted and tortured and reshaped until they resemble insects; god knows how that cycle started, but it didn't come about the way you're assuming.

That's exactly what I'm assuming. Using pseudo-science gobblegook and horribly convoluted and contrived explanations can certainly be fun, but to pick on one of the abominations from the third edition: Are grell giant brains with tentacles and a beak, or are they just an animal that happens to look kind of like a brain, with tentacles and a beak? Sure you can ask which is more logical. But the better question might be: Which is cooler? Sure, the pegasus myth may (or may not) have started when some random shepherd saw an eagle landing on or just silhouetted behind an equine. But riding to the top of mount Olympus on a snowy-white steed to challenge the gods is far more interesting than an isolated fluke of perception. Claiming the winged horse is actually related to fish and dragons because it's a hexapod certainly can make a fun, offbeat setting. But for the default, I'd prefer to keep the irrational amalgam of faithful horse and fierce raptor. Magic is about correspondence and dream logic. It follows the laws authors use when they weave layers of depth and meaning into a narrative. And combining two powerful symbols, even if the result is a phylogenetic monstrosity, still resonates.

But then again, if grouchy old lizards and wizards with big-brimmed hats get blasé, then making dragons the second cousin to lampreys can be a cool twist. Slick black slimey and mostly mindless. Drifting through the skies until they find a gargantuan host, like a roc or a dragon trutle. Dozens might dangle from the side of the megashark of the land, the tarrasque, tails and atrophied limbs flailing around as it rampages.

Pat

HaplessVictim

12-11-2008 01:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9712623)

I've got a species of reptile-hominids where the males are small, colourful show-offs in my homebrew campaign, but that doesn't match the standard AD&D Lizard Man where both sexes appear identical. Maybe AD&D lizard people culture doesn't distinguish between the sexes, they just bump uglies at random and find out who's females by which of them lay eggs afterwards?

Or perhaps, like some amphibian species, lizardmen are hermaphrodites, and change sex depending on environmental and social circumstances.

ObAdventureSeed: The local lizardmen tribe, which for generations has been peaceful if aloof, has suddenly started attacking local towns with extraordinary viciousness. Upon investigation, it turns out that by damming a river for their mill, the townsfolk have stressed the lizardmen habitat, causing many more lizardmen to become male than female. This sex imbalance has awakened the lizardmen urge to expand territory, resulting in the clash.

YojimboC

12-11-2008 02:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Littleredfox (Post 9712777)

Spelljammer tells us that lizardman intelligence is higher the nearer to the sun they are while in the egg. [Apparently some bright lizardman noticed that he and all the other bright lizardmen came from the inner planets and thick lizardmen come from the outer ones.]

So they build incubation ships to hang in close orbit around stars to give their progeny a better start in life.

Holy shit, I forgot entirely about that. Lizard Men were a playable race in Spelljammer. Which is cool, because they come from Flash Gordon anyway, so it makes sense to have lizard people in space.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9713291)

Now use that logic to explain owlbears (bird/mammal crossbreeds).

I thought a wizard did it. Wasn't it a wizard?

The Butcher

12-11-2008 02:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9714630)

I thought a wizard did it. Wasn't it a wizard?

In my campaigns, animal hybrids such as owlbears, chimeras, griffons, hippogriffs, minotaurs and other hybrids are generally assumed to be the result of ancient experiments, from a long fallen empire of unethical sorcerers.

Just for the possibility of sending PCs back in time to fight an ancient sorcerous empire which fielded armored owlbears as shock troops.

Belchion

12-11-2008 03:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9714630)

I thought a wizard did it. Wasn't it a wizard?

I think weird animal mixtures like those smell like druid - I mean, who else would want a strange monster consisting of natural animals to keep intruders out their wood? Wizard can just conjure a demon and be done with it.

sim_james

12-11-2008 08:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Butcher (Post 9714695)

Just for the possibility of sending PCs back in time to fight an ancient sorcerous empire which fielded armored owlbears as shock troops.

...

Owlbears just got a lot more cool.

Dammit, I would have been interested in Eberron if it had this.

Sleeper

12-11-2008 08:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9714788)

I think weird animal mixtures like those smell like druid - I mean, who else would want a strange monster consisting of natural animals to keep intruders out their wood? Wizard can just conjure a demon and be done with it.

I think the ecoterrorist tree-hugging variety of druid that has become the ahistorical but de facto standard would disapprove of animal experimentation. Whereas wizards are the default meddlers with nature.

Then again, I never thought druids and modern environmentalism and animal cruelty advocacy were a good mix. I prefer red in tooth and claw. There is a certain pragmatic appeal in making horrible monsters to shred the soldiers of your culture's faux-Roman conquerors.

Wakshaani

12-11-2008 09:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9713532)

Also: What, all this discussion of Lizard Kings and no Jim Morrison jokes?

ho the heck is Jim Morrison? Wasn't he teh Kool-Aid massacre guy?

Wakboth

12-11-2008 10:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9715331)

I think the ecoterrorist tree-hugging variety of druid that has become the ahistorical but de facto standard would disapprove of animal experimentation. Whereas wizards are the default meddlers with nature.

In 3e, where druids could be any flavor of neutral, I'm sure there would be plenty of CN or NE druids happy to breed owlbears ("Cause... you know, a bear with an owl's head! And big claws! So cool!" vs. "Okay, time to stamp out those pesky farmers. Hmm... what sort of unstable DNA do I have around?").

Wakboth

12-11-2008 10:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9715550)

ho the heck is Jim Morrison? Wasn't he teh Kool-Aid massacre guy?

:eek:

...

..

.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jim_morrison

Squizzle

12-11-2008 10:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9715550)

ho the heck is Jim Morrison? Wasn't he teh Kool-Aid massacre guy?

Be very glad that I can't kill you with my mind.

The Last Conformist

12-11-2008 11:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Dragon wings aren't actually limbs, sensu stricto, but exapted gills*. Their ancestry isn't from reptiles, but from scaly, amphibious basal tetrapods, perhaps temnospondyls.

* In reality, this is the probably origin of insect wings.

randomgamer8466

12-12-2008 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9715550)
ho the heck is Jim Morrison? Wasn't he teh Kool-Aid massacre guy?

He was the Lizard King. He could do anything.

Except say "no" to a double handful of pills and a fifth of bourbon.

Sleeper

12-12-2008 01:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9716510)
He was the Lizard King. He could do anything.

Except say "no" to a double handful of pills and a fifth of bourbon.

Or write good poetry.

Sleeper

12-12-2008 02:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9715331)

Then again, I never thought druids and modern environmentalism and animal cruelty advocacy were a good mix. I prefer red in tooth and claw. There is a certain pragmatic appeal in making horrible monsters to shred the soldiers of your culture's faux-Roman conquerors.

Just to expand on it a bit.

The flames of their fires turn the faces of the legionnaires a ghastly red as they laugh and trade war stories, grope camp followers, and slurp down beans ladled from an iron pot. A scrambling and a querulous hooting is heard from the western side of the encampment, where they spent several hours in the late afternoon digging a shallow ditch and lining it with sharpened tree trunks, pointing out. Bursting through the barrier with a whistling, pained roar is a giant ursine form, with enormous glowing eyes and a hideously sharp beak. It quickly dies under a hail of javelins, but almost twenty soldiers are rent asunder before the sergeants can shout some order out of chaos.

A soldier seeks the privacy of the latrine pit, ignoring the dangling strands. As he conducts his business, there is a huge rustling under the leaves, as the seemingly-solid ground he's standing on suddenly rises into the overhanging trees. His scream is aborted by the piercing mandibles of a strangely spider-eyed humanoid. Five scuttering minutes later, the leaves are scattered again over the newly patched net. The ettercap clammers into the branches, hangs the dead man next to three similar swaying bundles wrapped in gossamer, and waits for the next centurion to heed the call of nature.

These composite monsters aren't ancient magical experiments gone wrong. They're new. Wild stories spread about the latest horrible massacre, and rumors spread about the monsters behind them. These monsters are deliberately forged weapons in a guerilla war against the occupying troops. The empire may hold the cities and the roads, but the farmlands and forest between them have become a fearsome nest of morale-breaking lurking monstrosities.

Kakita Kojiro

12-12-2008 02:12 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Butcher (Post 9714695)

Just for the possibility of sending PCs back in time to fight an ancient sorcerous empire which fielded armored owlbears as shock troops.

Panseruglebjørner!

My players would kill me. ponders

Belchion

12-12-2008 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9715331)

I think the ecoterrorist tree-hugging variety of druid that has become the ahistorical but de facto standard would disapprove of animal experimentation.

See, the AD&D druid is True Neutral - that means when good becomes too strong, he supports evil, if law becomes too strong, he supports chaos.

So, imagine a lawful good empire controls most parts of the world. Or, if you prefer, a lawful good treaty keeps law and good up on a continent full of several realms. Now, the druids have to react somehow. Simply sending existing monsters won't do any good - they are well studied, their weaknesses known and thus they prove no challenge to the defenders of the status quo. Still, the True Neutral druid has to balance things - wouldn't mutating otherwise "harmless" animals into grotesque monsters seem to be the way to achieve this goal for at least some druids, thinking of their "nature is superior" agenda? Especially when considering that the mutations definitely will make people doubt in order?

Thus, I could imagine this behaviour for standard druids under certain circumstances. I could definitely imagine it for some delusional druidic cult.

demiurge1138

12-12-2008 09:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9714630)

I thought a wizard did it. Wasn't it a wizard?

According to the Age of Worms AP, the wizard Thesselar, now a lich, took credit for the creation of owlbears, among other composite monsters. If you remember thessalhydras, he's the guy who made 'em.

And, of course, since you meet him while playing high level D&D, it is fully expected in the module that you kill him (or at least seriously inconvenience him) and take his stuff.

J Harper

12-12-2008 09:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9715331)

Then again, I never thought druids and modern environmentalism and animal cruelty advocacy were a good mix. I prefer red in tooth and claw. There is a certain pragmatic appeal in making horrible monsters to shred the soldiers of your culture's faux-Roman conquerors.

The Wedding of Sheila-Na-Gog

Cheers.

Jeremy Harper

YojimboC

12-12-2008 10:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9718514)

According to the Age of Worms AP, the wizard Thesselar, now a lich, took credit for the creation of owlbears, among other composite monsters. If you remember thessalhydras, he's the guy who made 'em.

And, of course, since you meet him while playing high level D&D, it is fully expected in the module that you kill him (or at least seriously inconvenience him) and take his stuff.

I knew it!

Vultur10

12-12-2008 11:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Would people be interested in my doing this same sort of thread for the Ravenloft MC appendixes?

Sleeper

12-12-2008 11:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9717473)

See, the AD&D druid is True Neutral - that means when good becomes to strong, he supports evil, if law becomes to strong, he supports chaos.

So, imagine a lawful good empire controls most parts of the world. Or, if you prefer, a lawful good treaty keeps law and good up on a continent full of several realms. Now, the druids have to react somehow. Simply sending existing monsters won't do any good - they are well studied, their weaknesses known and thus they prove no challenge to the defenders of the status quo. Still, the True Neutral druid has to balance things - wouldn't mutating otherwise "harmless" animals into grotesque monsters seem to be the way to achieve this goal for at least some druids, thinking of their "nature is superior" agenda? Especially when considering that the mutations definitely will make people doubt in order?

Thus, I could imagine this behaviour for standard druids under certain circumstances. I could definitely imagine it for some delusional druidic cult.

I think Gyax was channelling Lovecraft and contemplating the beauty of non-Euclidean geometries (wait, isn't everything non-Euclidean these days?) when he crafted True Neutral, and alignment languages. Maybe he caught the infection from Moorcock. Or maybe his brain was temporarily swapped out by Greys. Because it makes no sense. It's not how people think, or behave. The thought processes required to adhere to such precepts are inhuman, alien.

Fighting for self, for family. Maybe for friends. That's how humans roll. For personal habit, or collective habits ingrained in customs, cultures and mores. Sure. It saves thinking and gives us that warm feeling that even if we're wrong we were just doing what we were told. Or because someone talked pretty, or loudly, or angrily. After all, we're pack animals. Go alpha go. Stepping further back on Maslow's hierarchy, even an intellectual and non-visceral commitment to saving the world, however you define "world" and what it needs to be saved from, is vanishingly rare but at least it's happened. Once or twice. We think.

But randomly going ape because there isn't enough of one abstract ideal or the other that we've codified and deconstructed until they fit into a nice symmetric disc around which everything revolves? It's like Discordianism, except without that wild let's-destroy-everything nihilistic fishmalk appeal that fascinates its three ardent followers and legions of hah-ha just kidding fans. Balance doesn't work, not for humans. Entropy is a thermodynamic concept, not a philosophy. It doesn't make sense, not that that's actually important. Reason is just a tiny glimmer in the wilderness of human irrationality. But regardless or irregardless or whichever rule or habit you prefer, True Neutral just isn't sexy. That's what's really important.

Now, chucking it all to concoct a fearsome, bloody, horrific revenge against a conquering enemy that will leave stains even Lady MacBeth can't get out with a wirebrush? That we can buy. Sex and blood, fire and passion. Kill them all. Chanting around the moon-drained monoliths, a dirge to lost sons and abused daughters. That I can buy. That's human.

see

12-12-2008 05:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9705697)

My Websters desktop says "litch" but Wiktionary claims both the "like" and "litch" pronunciations are correct. Old English "lic" meant corpse (I don't know of any earlier, more general definitions), though my old unabridged Webster adds that it is used primarily in combination (the given example is "lich-house"). The corpse definition and the whole lychgate thing appear to be primarily British Englishisms. Wiktionary also claims it can be used poetically to refer to a living body, particularly a torso. Would be interesting to know what the OED says.

OED gives the pronunciation as "litj", which would rhyme with ditch.

For etymology:

[OE. líc str. neut. = OFris. lîk, OS. líc (LG. liche, like, Du. lijk), OHG. lîh neut. and fem. (MHG. lîch fem., also weak lîche, G. leiche dead body), ON. lík (Sw. lik, Da. lig), Goth. leik:—OTeut. lîkom* neut. Comparison with the cognate words (see liche, like a., like v.) suggests that the original sense was prob. 'form, shape'.

The OE. líc became by normal development lich(e in the south and like in the north; hence the diversity of forms above. Cf. ditch, dike.)

(un)reason

12-12-2008 05:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9718977)

Would people be interested in my doing this same sort of thread for the Ravenloft MC appendixes?

Go for it. There will be a few monsters that overlap, but hey, different opinions, different writing styles, entirely surmountable problem.

see

12-12-2008 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9710607)

Yet, lizardmen are one of the few AD&D monsters with Man in their name. It'd make more sense to call the 1st/2nd AD&D versions "lizardfolk" like they are in 3rd edition, since the PCs are likely to be fighting specimens of both sexes at the same time.

Well, in Old English, "man" was entirely sexless; the form that indicates members of the male gender is an innovation. Combined forms should be understood to retain the original sense. So, they're all firemen, mailmen, policemen, chairmen, mermen, mongrelmen, and lizardmen, whatever their reproductive equipment.

Male men were "wermen", female men were "wifmen"; the female form of the word evolved into "woman". Of course, in these degenerate centuries, there aren't any male men left, so no wonder we don't have a word for them anymore :)

JRM

12-12-2008 06:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Jeeppers! I should have guessed a throwaway remark about dragonborn boobs would have spun off into three pages of evolutionary theory.

I've mentioned this before, but my take is that magic means that in AD&D Lamarkian evolution works. Will shapes the flesh. A grazer that stretches its neck to reach leaves has kids with a longer neck and in due course they're a giraffe-analogue. Sapient creatures are better at this, which explains why a lot of monster species are intelligent. Furthermore, this effect doesn't only apply to your own kids. If the whole tribe is afraid of a non-existent night-boojum, their collective will might mutate a strain of rats into becoming said night-boojum. Crazy wizards are just good enough to do this by themselves.

Also, AD&D magic obviously allows a animal's young to acquire just the right DNA to acquire the traits of another species and still remain viable. So a horse could acquire the wings of an eagle, plus a bit of a magic boost so it could actually fly. Now this may happen in nature (like real-life bacteria can swap DNA to acquire other strain's traits), but is probably mostly due to the meddling of archmages and gods.

As for dragons, well obviously they're remnants of the million years dead Dinosaur Civilization, boosted by so much magical life-engineering that their original species(es) is impossible to discern.:D

JRM

12-12-2008 06:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 9714438)

Or perhaps, like some amphibian species, lizardmen are hermaphrodites, and change sex depending on environmental and social circumstances.

ObAdventureSeed: The local lizardmen tribe, which for generations has been peaceful if aloof, has suddenly started attacking local towns with extraordinary viciousness. Upon investigation, it turns out that by damming a river for their mill, the townsfolk have stressed the lizardmen habitat, causing many more lizardmen to become male than female. This sex imbalance has awakened the lizardmen urge to expand territory, resulting in the clash.

Now why didn't I think of that. Sex-switching lizardmen is a great idea.

JRM

12-12-2008 06:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9719932)

Well, in Old English, "man" was entirely sexless; the form that indicates members of the male gender is an innovation. Combined forms should be understood to retain the original sense. So, they're all firemen, mailmen, policemen, chairmen, mermen, mongrelmen, and lizardmen, whatever their reproductive equipment.

Male men were "wermen", female men were "wifmen"; the female form of the word evolved into "woman". Of course, in these degenerate centuries, there aren't any male men left, so no wonder we don't have a word for them anymore :)

Yes I know, being old enough to remember the days when saying "chairperson" or "lizardfolk" was considered an eccentricity or affectation. I just found it amusing that the only monsters in the 2nd edition MM with a separate "Man" in their names are all either asexual or of indeterminable gender (Lizard Man, Mold Man, Fungus Man).

Malignant Marionette

12-12-2008 09:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9719926)

Go for it. There will be a few monsters that overlap, but hey, different opinions, different writing styles, entirely surmountable problem.

Indeed. Just make sure you're appropriately committed, so it doesn't end up like the Mystara equivalent. I suppose that's also partly because people don't really care about Mystara. I myself thought about the compendium annuals, but I doubt that'd end up too well. :o

noisms

12-13-2008 01:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quite a discussion has been going on in my absence! Good stuff.

Locathah entry is coming up soon.

Belchion

12-13-2008 03:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9719073)
Because it makes no sense. It's not how people think, or behave.

They do! Look at terrorists, look at any totalitarian ideology, look at any genocide. People behave "alien" as you call it, not to protect their family, but to achieve a philosophical construct. To create the "perfect status". Those delusional druids call this "perfect status" balance.

Wakboth

12-13-2008 05:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9724028)
They do! Look at terrorists, look at any totalitarian ideology, look at any genocide. People behave "alien" as you call it, not to protect their family, but to achieve a philosophical construct. To create the "perfect status". Those delusional druids call this "perfect status" balance.

Fanatics are noted for their inflexibility, which makes the TN druid's frequent shifting between fundamentally opposed positions unbelievable to me.

AFAICT the whole thing about TN as a philosophical position of its own, instead of apathy or laissez-faire, comes from Gyax taking the idea of Cosmic Balance from Moorcock and botching it up - especially since Balance there wasn't about neutrality right between Law and Chaos, but about active Harmony.

Red_Rob

12-13-2008 06:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Well in basic D&D the concepts of Law and Chaos were pretty much analogous to Good and Evil. Having Law and Chaos as opposing forces in a world not specifically dedicated to some kind of eternal struggle between these forces just doesn't really work. I mean in a two word description of a character's worldview in a standard fantasy setting, why the heck would whether he follows laws or not be considered important enough to be included?

To have something like True Neutral not seem insane you have to have examples of overly Lawful or Good societies not just seem more attractive than the Evil ones. What kind of Druids want to overthrow the good Elven society because it has become "too dominant" and so fight alongside the countryside-despoiling orcs and hobgoblins??

(un)reason

12-13-2008 06:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9724168)

To have something like True Neutral not seem insane you have to have examples of overly Lawful or Good societies not just seem more attractive than the Evil ones. What kind of Druids want to overthrow the good Elven society because it has become "too dominant" and so fight alongside the countryside-despoiling orcs and hobgoblins??

The kind who think that things being too nice all the time makes people soft. Let us not forget that high level druids got extended lifespans, and a remit to shape nature and societies throughout the centuries. You certainly see enough people IRL complaining about dang kids, don't know the first thing about X, Y & Z. Wouldn't last a minute back in my day. I oughta show them. :shakes walking stick: Now imagine them with several centuries extra lifespan, enormous magical power, and a belief that it's their responsibility to keep the balance between nature and civilization, by force if needed.

Red_Rob

12-13-2008 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

You seemed to miss the part about it not seeming insane :D

I agree that works as the weird motivation of one particular group of nutcase druids, but to have it as one of the Core 9 alignments you can choose for your character? Seems far too niche to me.

I think the Law/Chaos axis of the alignment scale should be an optional extra rather than something presented in the core system. It only really works if you have a Moorcock-esque Grand Struggle between Law and Chaos, which basically ends up being Good and Evil with a twist anyway.

noisms

12-13-2008 08:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9724231)
You seemed to miss the part about it not seeming insane :D

I agree that works as the weird motivation of one particular group of nutcase druids, but to have it as one of the Cor 9 alignments you can choose for your character? Seems far too niche to me.

I think the Law/Chaos axis of the alignment scale should be an optional extra rather than something presented in the core system. It only really works if you have a Moorcock-esque Grand Struggle between Law and Chaos, which basically ends up being Good and Evil with a twist anyway.

Well, don't forget, True Neutral is considered the rarest alignment. It explicitly states as much in the 2nd edition books, at least.

Red_Rob

12-13-2008 10:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yeah I guess so. Alignment was always one of the "huh?" things about D&D for me, i never really "got" it. It seemed to be torn between being a personal indicator of morality (which it never really seemed to fit very well), and a kind of badge showing which side you were on in the great alignment based struggles that raged across the world (which were always conspicuously missing from campaigns i played in.)

Anyway, this thread isn't about the alignment system, its about exception based design and egg stealing! I want me some redundant Kuo-Toa knock offs!

JRM

12-13-2008 11:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9724231)
You seemed to miss the part about it not seeming insane :D

I agree that works as the weird motivation of one particular group of nutcase druids, but to have it as one of the Cor 9 alignments you can choose for your character? Seems far too niche to me.

I think the Law/Chaos axis of the alignment scale should be an optional extra rather than something presented in the core system. It only really works if you have a Moorcock-esque Grand Struggle between Law and Chaos, which basically ends up being Good and Evil with a twist anyway.

Yes, those lawful types may try to conceal their malignancy in their quest to crush the individuality of our souls, so I'm glad you realize they're just Evil with a twist! Anarchy Rules!! The Sea-Caballeros will always ride free!!!

:D

In other words, I am not entirely convinced by the equating of Law/Chaos with Good/Evil, although sadly it's a common one. I guess it's because humans are naturally inclined to seek patterns and hence Order, and most are conservative enough to like familiar things to stay the way they are. Even in rpgs like Tekumel which have Law & Chaos deities who are (theoretically) equally "noble" the Gods of Change are usually portrayed as being nastier than the Gods of Stability.

Sleeper

12-14-2008 12:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I could buy True Neutrality if there was a subtle change in the philosophy. While the ethos behind True Neutrality is, well, nonsense, if you look at it from a pragmatic standpoint what it's really about is knocking down the side with all the power, and building up the weaker side. Assassinating crown princes and running guns to the rebels is the same basic idea, if you take the focus from some abstract "Alignment" and change it to political factions. Then, it becomes all about destabilizing the prevailing social order (if there is one) and building up alternatives. In other words, they don't really care about any of the major political powers. True Neutrals don't really care who is in charge. They just don't want one group to take over it all over. Fundamentally, they're playing on the side of anarchy. Or to be more precise, they want a passel small scattered states instead of a single unified empire.

Why then? Not because they believe in anarchy as a core principle (which has almost as many problems as True Neutral), but because whatever they believe in (whether it's the almost-extinct Old Religion, or hugging fuzzy animals) is a fringe movement. If there are a dozen squabbling states all worried about their neighbors, or a dozen competing religions or philosophies all worried about heretics and schisms, it's more likely the True Neutrals'll be ignored. Because, well, they're neutral. Not tied to any particular side. They just want to stop a powerful and centralized government from developing, because then it might start paying attention to them, instead of worrying about its aggressive neighbors. And then they'd be gone.

The Last Conformist

12-14-2008 12:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9724539)
I want me some redundant Kuo-Toa knock offs!

There does seem to be an awful lot of fishy-froggy aquatic humanoids around. Was Gygax a big fan of "The Shadow Over Innsmouth" or something?

Felix

12-14-2008 01:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9724168)

To have something like True Neutral not seem insane you have to have examples of overly Lawful or Good societies not just seem more attractive than the Evil ones. What kind of Druids want to overthrow the good Elven society because it has become "too dominant" and so fight alongside the countryside-despoiling orcs and hobgoblins??

Here are two possibly non-insane reasons for a D&D TN:

1) True neutral thinks long term. It seems great to let the elves utterly destroy the hobgoblins, but what happens 20 years from now? Without their totalitarian hobgoblin masters, the goblin population will grow out of control. Rather than facing an army of 1,000 hobgoblins today, which will flee if clearly outnumbered, people will face the 10,000 goblin mob, willing to destroy anything and ready to fight to the death. True Neutral is willing to strengthen the hobgoblins now, knowing the elves will thank they later.

2) Cosmic traffic control. In a system with a great-wheel cosmology, the True Neutral factions work to prevent plane crashes (pun intended). Being good sounds nice in a Planescape world, but if too many people become good, you'll wind up in a world filled with Devas. They'll start slaughtering anyone who isn't sufficiently good for their tastes, or be decimated by (comparatively) vast armies of evil creatures which they've forgotten how to deal with on their good-aligned world.

Wakboth

12-14-2008 03:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9724746)

I could buy True Neutrality if there was a subtle change in the philosophy. While the ethos behind True Neutrality is, well, nonsense, if you look at it from a pragmatic standpoint what it's really about is knocking down the side with all the power, and building up the weaker side. Assassinating crown princes and running guns to the rebels is the same basic idea, if you take the focus from some abstract "Alignment" and change it to political factions. Then, it becomes all about destabilizing the prevailing social order (if there is one) and building up alternatives. In other words, they don't really care about any of the major political powers. True Neutrals don't really care who is in charge. They just don't want one group to take over it all over. Fundamentally, they're playing on the side of anarchy. Or to be more precise, they want a passel small scattered states instead of a single unified empire.

That sounds more like proactive CN to me...

Sleeper

12-14-2008 04:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9725075)

That sounds more like proactive CN to me...

If it doesn't involve fish and pranks, it's not Chaotic Neutral :p

(More seriously, I don't see how liking small or competing governments is CN. CN seems to be about personal freedom, or total anarchy.)

Red_Rob

12-14-2008 04:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9724746)

I could buy True Neutrality if there was a subtle change in the philosophy. While the ethos behind True Neutrality is, well, nonsense, if you look at it from a pragmatic standpoint what it's really about is knocking down the side with all the power, and building up the weaker side. Assassinating crown princes and running guns to the rebels is the same basic idea, if you take the focus from some abstract "Alignment" and change it to political factions. Then, it becomes all about destabilizing the prevailing social order (if there is one) and building up alternatives. In other words, they don't really care about any of the major political powers. True Neutrals don't really care who is in charge. They just don't want one group to take over it all over. Fundamentally, they're playing on the side of anarchy. Or to be more precise, they want a passel small scattered states instead of a single unified empire.

Why then? Not because they believe in anarchy as a core principle (which has almost as many problems as True Neutral), but because whatever they believe in (whether it's the almost-extinct Old Religion, or hugging fuzzy animals) is a fringe movement. If there are a dozen squabbling states all worried about their neighbors, or a dozen competing religions or philosophies all worried about heretics and schisms, it's more likely the True Neutrals'll be ignored. Because, well, they're neutral. Not tied to any particular side. They just want to stop a powerful and centralized government from developing, because then it might start paying attention to them, instead of worrying about its aggressive neighbors. And then they'd be gone.

Well that would work if it was about the political power balance, but it isn't. According to the description its about the Alignment power balance. Lots of small but lawful kingdoms? True neutral isn't happy about that. It wants to introduce some Chaos! Whoops, now all the competing factions are anarchistic and individualistic? Time to bring in some order!

Even referring to "Law" and "Chaos" without an overall framework of competing cosmic forces becomes farcical. Why would the Druids care if the reigning societies are generally rigid in structure or favour the individual? Wouldn't things like their attitude to the natural world, disposition towards the druids etc. be higher on their list of priorities?

6inTruder

12-14-2008 04:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Any chance of the TN debate sprouting its own thread and this one getting on to the TN fishfolk?

Sleeper

12-14-2008 05:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I think this thread'd be far less interesting if it stayed too much on track. I love the way it veers and then starts to careen through the woods before eventually ending up back on the main path.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9725290)

Well that would work if it was about the political power balance, but it isn't.

That's why I said "if you take the focus from some abstract 'Alignment' and change it to political factions...." :)

Red_Rob

12-14-2008 05:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9725327)

I think this thread'd be far less interesting if it stayed too much on track. I love the way it veers and then starts to careen through the woods before eventually ending up back on the main path.

That's why I said "if you take the focus from some abstract 'Alignment' and change it to political factions...." :)

Yeah, it works much better with politics than some vague cosmic forces. I think that's my main beef with the alignment system in D&D. It's obvious to me that it was designed for a world that is built around the 9 alignments, with clearly defined sides for each alignment and a corresponding cosmic battle between "good", "evil", "order" and "chaos". Gygaxian D&D seems to assume this, along with its "1 plane for each alignment" etc, however it doesn't spell it out. Within this framework things like alignment languages, True Neutral etc. all make sense.

However, this has been marginalised in favour of shoehorning in the "alignment as personal ethics code" view. Which, as we have seen, leads to allsorts of problems as it was not designed for this. In my opinion the whole alignment system should be a setting specific rule for Greyhawk, along with the alignment detecting spells. The main rules should include a general "good vs evil" system with varying grades from blackest evil, through shades of grey, to paladinhood (just so detect evil and stuff still works!).

Whether someone favours an ordered society or anarchy just isn't the lynchpin of their personality in 99% of modern D&D settings.

By the way, just to warn people, I am probably never going to be convinced that the alignment system is applicable to most games, so to prevent this debate from hijacking noisums very entertaining thread I'll agree to finish it here :D

6inTruder

12-14-2008 05:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

To clarify: the TN discussion is really rather interesting, and I think it'd be cause for some broader discussion on its own. So please continue, I just want more monsters.

;)

noisms

12-14-2008 08:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Speaking of more monsters...

Locathah

The Locathah are a rather weak and insipid race, being a kind of cross between mackerel, seahorse and human. However, their blandness and their True Neutrality seems to suit a race of fish-people, and their use of moray eels and portuguese man o' wars in defence adds an injection of interesting weirdness.

Some Locathah roles for an AD&D game:

- Locathah items are highly valued by art collectors;
- They can be hired to act as guides;
- They take tolls from fishermen using their waters;
- They will take whatever means necessary to recover corpses of dead comrades - including drilling through the bottom of a ship to sink it.

Oddly, Locathah are given a movement rate on land - a paltry 1. I had forgotten about this, and thought it was just the Locathah, but it seems other aquatic creatures, such as Merfolk and Aquatic Elves, are also given land movement rates.

(un)reason

12-14-2008 08:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9726935)

Speaking of more monsters...

Oddly, Locathah are given a movement rate on land - a paltry 1. I had forgotten about this, and thought it was just the Locathah, but it seems other aquatic creatures, such as Merfolk and Aquatic Elves, are also given land movement rates.

Yeah. That always interested me. The vast majority of D&D aquatic monsters were either unable to function on land due to physiology (mermen, fish, etc, or seemed to cope with it just fine. Locathah were just about the only one that had proper legs, but not the strength to support themselves properly out of the water, as would be realistic for many sea creatures. It kinda threw the unrealism of other similar D&D creatures into sharp relief.

DMH

12-14-2008 08:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

A comment Wakboth made upthread makes me wonder if they would be a little more interesting if they were anadramous (sp? like salmon) or catadramous (sp? like freshwater eels). If they are forced to migrate, then they could disrupt the freshwater and marine races.

I wish Mongoose or Goodman took a crack at them with the creature series.

The Last Conformist

12-14-2008 10:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

"Anadromous" and "catadromous". The root is drom "run", which also gives us among others "dromedary" and "hippodrome".

Sleeper

12-14-2008 10:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9727166)
... and "hippodrome".

Which is of course a magical overgrown and awesomely corpulent hippopotamus the size of a small city, which has been partially hollowed out by a careful combination of surgey and architecture, complete with a whole maze of aqueducts to filter in nutrition and carry away waste, and which now serves as a sporting arena, amphitheatre, and even gladitorial battlefield; all of which take place beneath the pulsating ribcage that serves the ceiling.

The Last Conformist

12-15-2008 12:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

A loxodrome, meanwhile, is a salmon similarly refitted into an airship.

Vultur10

12-15-2008 12:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9727207)

Which is of course a magical overgrown and awesomely corpulent hippopotamus the size of a small city, which has been partially hollowed out by a careful combination of surgey and architecture, complete with a whole maze of aqueducts to filter in nutrition and carry away waste, and which now serves as a sporting arena, amphitheatre, and even gladiatorial battlefield; all of which take place beneath the pulsating ribcage that serves the ceiling.

That is AWESOME.

JRM

12-15-2008 01:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9726966)

Yeah. That always interested me. The vast majority of D&D aquatic monsters were either unable to function on land due to physiology (mermen, fish, etc, or seemed to cope with it just fine. Locathah were just about the only one that had proper legs, but not the strength to support themselves properly out of the water, as would be realistic for many sea creatures. It kinda threw the unrealism of other similar D&D creatures into sharp relief.

Yes, that's odd. Locathah have got what appear to be functional legs but move no faster on land than a merman. Their anatomy must be really odd. If their feet were fixed to run in the same direction as their legs (like a scuba diver swimming with flippers) it'd make sense, but their pictures shows them with feet at right-angle to their legs, like a regular bipedal humanoid.

But then, going by their 2nd ed MM illustration Tritons have humanoid legs with flippers but can't move on land at all - at least in 1st edition it showed Tritons with a pair of fishtails for legs, which made their inability to walk on land make sense.

JRM

12-15-2008 01:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9727440)

A loxodrome, meanwhile, is a salmon similarly refitted into an airship.

A submarine surely, wouldn't you mutate a roc or something for an aerodrome (or a parrot and make a polydrome :)).

If you wanted a living vessel that moved in both directions with equal faculty you could stick a British entertainer and an Alaskan senator back-to-back, resulting in a palindrome.;)

Red_Rob

12-15-2008 02:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

As the description mentions nothing about a dedication to balance in the Universe they seem to be going for the "True Neutral as apathy" stance here. I find their High intelligence a little at odds with their "stone age" technology, but I suppose metalworking is a little difficult underwater!

The Last Conformist

12-15-2008 03:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9727604)

A submarine surely, wouldn't you mutate a roc or something for an aerodrome (or a parrot and make a polydrome :)).

Nah. If you absolutely need something warmblooded (pampered passengers don't want to freeze to death these days), you'd use a huge manatee.

noisms

12-15-2008 03:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9727671)

As the description mentions nothing about a dedication to balance in the Universe they seem to be going for the "True Neutral as apathy" stance here. I find their High intelligence a little at odds with their "stone age" technology, but I suppose metalworking is a little difficult underwater!

Yeah, a little difficult to get a forge going. ;)

demiurge1138

12-15-2008 04:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The thing I only recently noticed about locathath is that they're damned smart. If I ever use them in any capacity (still a long shot), I'll give them levels in psionic classes and treat them sort of like movie-version Abe Sapien from Hellboy. Erudite fishmen with psychic powers and British accents.

Sleeper

12-15-2008 04:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9727782)

Nah. If you absolutely need something warmblooded (pampered passengers don't want to freeze to death these days), you'd use a huge manatee.

The tiny head and hugely bloated body of Steller's sea cow (here) looks like a manatee well on its way to become a bioengineered edifice, perhaps a submarine cruise liner. They certainly didn't survive long in the face of hunting; less than 30 years after their discovery in 1741 by a Westerner they were extinct. Huge, too. Steller contradicted himself, but he estimated either 4 (elephant-size) or 23.4 (baleen whale-size) tons and about 26 feet long.

The Last Conformist

12-15-2008 05:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

23 tonnes seems unreasonably high - scaling up a dugong to that length gives a weight of about six and a half tonnes. Minke whales, of similar length, weigh 5-10 tonnes (teaching us that "baleen whale size" isn't necessarily all that impressive).

Sleeper

12-15-2008 08:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9728133)

23 tonnes seems unreasonably high - scaling up a dugong to that length gives a weight of about six and a half tonnes. Minke whales, of similar length, weigh 5-10 tonnes (teaching us that "baleen whale size" isn't necessarily all that impressive).

There was no scientific measurement. Just a naturalist looking at it, making some guesses, and writing two numbers in his journal. Better than some of those giant anacondas from Amazon myths :).

That's still pretty impressive. Five to ten tons, or even four, is larger than any terrestrial animal except the elephant. And the Minke whale is the 2nd smallest baleen whale. The mid-sized ones are 30 to 40 tons, with the blues reaching over 100 (more than double that, rarely).

Now scale the sea cow up to the size of a cruise ship (Queen Mary 2, 1,132 ft), and it's about 330,000 tons. Then shed about $\frac{3}{4}$ that weight by hollowing it out for passengers. Ignoring the obvious structural problems, it'd probably have to be immobily docked as a kind of sea-station just to run the pipes necessary to feed it. Or perhaps it lives up to its scientific name; it's a siren, and whole pods of whales heed the call a dozen times a day, nuzzle up to its giganantic body in ecstasy, and are slowly absorbed into its mass.

Vultur10

12-15-2008 01:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9728755)

Or perhaps it lives up to its scientific name; it's a siren, and whole pods of whales heed the call a dozen times a day, nuzzle up to its giganantic body in ecstasy, and are slowly absorbed into its mass.

That is so cool. +1 awesome point.

The Last Conformist

12-15-2008 02:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9728755)

There was no scientific measurement.

I know. That's why I'm making statements of reasonableness rather than fact. :)

noisms

12-15-2008 08:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lurker

We haven't discussed bad art in a while....well, since the Lich entry anyway...but here's a prime opportunity, because let's face it: the Lurker picture is a genuine shocker. It's one of those cases where I really think that even I could have done a better job, at the age of 11, if only the designers had asked me. It's the least evocative bit of fantasy art I think I've ever seen. It looks like a grey cow pat with eyes.

Lurker

The Lurker base unit is essentially a manta ray which looks like stone and attaches itself to ceilings so it can drop down on adventurers and eat them. One of those classic dungeon-ecology creatures in other words; something that couldn't exist in a world which isn't full of subterranean labyrinths being explored by naive spelunkers.

The Lurker is also one of those unusual instances of a clearly magical beastie being explained away by pseudoscience: why bother talk about the levitation being generated by gases held in sacs - clearly nonsense - when you could just say "it's magic"?

Lurkers' eggs are worth 900gp, and hatchlings 1,100. Their gases can also be used for Potions of Levitation, so there's plenty of scope for

Trapper

The Trapper is like an anti-Lurker in that it sits on the floor and envelops people, rather than by dropping on them. Otherwise it's pretty similar, although its skin can be used to make +1 leather armour.

Forest Trapper (Miner)

Miners are slightly more interesting (and slightly more believable) in that they operate by burying themselves in the forest floor and stretching out poisonous, barbed tendrils through the soil to paralyse its prey.

The Lurker entry is right up there with the Leech in containing four silly exception-based-design rules:

- There is a flat 10% chance of detecting a Lurker
- Trappers have a 95% chance of being undetected
- Passers-by have a 25% chance of stepping on a Miner's barbs (75% if surprised)
- Druids and rangers have a 5% chance of stopping a Miner's barbs if they are not surprised

There surely has to be an easier way.

Sleeper

12-15-2008 09:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Thanks, Vultur10.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730292)

We haven't discussed bad art in a while....well, since the Lich entry anyway...but here's a prime opportunity, because let's face it: the Lurker picture is a genuine shocker. It's one of those cases where I really think that even I could have done a better job, at the age of 11, if only the designers had asked me. It's the least evocative bit of fantasy art I think I've ever seen. It looks like a grey cow pat with eyes.

Well, why don't you put that to the test? You're probably not 11 anymore, but I'm sure you have a copy of MS Paint or something similar on your machine. Let's see your rendition. :)

Wakshaani

12-15-2008 09:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730292)

The Lurker entry is right up there with the Leech in containing four silly exception-based-design rules:

- There is a flat 10% chance of detecting a Lurker
- Trappers have a 95% chance of being undetected
- Passers-by have a 25% chance of stepping on a Miner's barbs (75% if surprised)

- Druids and rangers have a 5% chance of stopping a Miner's barbs if they are not suprised

There surely has to be an easier way.

Also, the "Only suprised on a 5% chance" creatures vs the "Not suprised 95% of teh time" guys is always a good rule fight.

noisms

12-15-2008 09:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9730397)

Well, why don't you put that to the test? You're probably not 11 anymore, but I'm sure you have a copy of MS Paint or something similar on your machine. Let's see your rendition. :)

For some reason I can only put up attachments of 1 byte in size.

Sleeper

12-15-2008 10:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730466)

For some reason I can only put up attachments of 1 byte in size.

Attachments were blocked for standard users in most forums a long time ago. Have to link to an external site.

JRM

12-16-2008 12:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730292)

Lurker

We haven't discussed bad art in a while....well, since the Lich entry anyway...but here's a prime opportunity, because let's face it: the Lurker picture is a genuine shocker. It's one of those cases where I really think that even I could have done a better job, at the age of 11, if only the designers had asked me. It's the least evocative bit of fantasy art I think I've ever seen. It looks like a grey cow pat with eyes.

Well in all fairness I think the Lurker Above and Trapper have always had pretty crappy art. Let's face it, they're a monster that's easy to draw badly - think about the various goofy renditions of the Mimic we've had over the years.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730292)

*Lurker*The Lurker is also one of those unusual instances of a clearly magical beastie being explained away by pseudoscience: why bother talk about the levitation being generated by gases held in sacs - clearly nonsense - when you could just say "it's magic"?

Lurkers' eggs are worth 900gp, and hatchlings 1,100. Their gases can also be used for Potions of Levitation, so there plenty of scope for

Plenty of scope for what, have you been censored by the Lawful aligned tyrants? Fight the man!

ahem

Anyway, it's clearly magical gas. Air at sea level masses around 1.2 kilograms per cubic metre (about 1.2 ounces per cubic foot) so, if we say a lurker above is two feet thick then its twenty foot diameter would give it a weight of 47 pounds. If a Lurker Above was really that lightweight why can't its victims punch their way out of it like it was an inflated paper bag? Also, the Lurker Above has ten Hit Dice, around the same level as an Ankylosaurus (9 HD) or African Elephant (11 HD), both animals that weigh 4-5 tons - which is a far more reasonable weight for an animal twenty foot across.

That strongly suggest that the Lurker Above's gas uses some kind of negative mass / anti-gravity levitation effect like the "Eighth Ray Buoyancy Tanks" of the Flyers in Edgar Rice Burrough's Martian books. That would also explain why it's so useful for potions of levitation. Some of the other AD&D monsters that use gas for buoyancy may do the same, such as Beholders.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730292)

Trapper

The Trapper is like an anti-Lurker in that it sits on the floor and envelops people, rather than by dropping on them. Otherwise it's pretty similar, although its skin can be used to make +1 leather armour.

What I find weird about the Trappers is that they're highly intelligent. What use is a 13-14 Intelligence to a creature who does nothing more complicated than pretend to be a floor? At least in 1st edition AD&D they explained this by having Trappers be able to talk and willing to make bargains - e.g. I'll give you treasure if you don't kill me, I'll guard this corridor and let you pass safely if you feed me regularly. That hints they were originally another mad wizard's treasure guardian beast, like some sages think was the origin of the Mimic. Of course, Trappers are a bit redundant in a world that has Mimics - the mad wizard could just create an oversized Mimic and have it spread itself across the floor if they wanted a monster to fill a trapper's niche.

Wakboth

12-16-2008 12:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9730292)

The Lurker base unit is essentially a manta ray which looks like stone and attaches itself to ceilings so it can drop down on adventurers and eat them. One of those classic dungeon-ecology creatures in other words; something that couldn't exist in a world which isn't full of subterranean labyrinths being explored by naive spelunkers.

Along with piercer, mimic and... I think ropers would count too, don't you think?

There are a lot of monsters whose shtick is "I'm an innocent dungeon feature, don't mind me... rAWR!" :)

demiurge1138

12-16-2008 12:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I was confused by the lurker art when I was a kid. Doesn't look a damn thing like it's supposed to.

I've only used a lurker once, but it was good fun. Put one in a room with a bunch of mimics. Soundtrack full of plucking, creepy violins.

Kakita Kojiro

12-16-2008 01:52 AM

Here's the thing about the lurker: why does it need to levitate? I mean, it's not pretending to be a dungeon drop-ceiling -- it's pretending to be the ceiling, itself.

There is no need for it to hover up there, just near the ceiling. Adventurers do not exclaim "hey, what is that, hovering up there blocking our view of the ceiling?" It would be better to just stick to the ceiling, and not worry about the levitating rigmarole altogether.

Nonetheless, this whole class of monsters cries out to be deconstructed in some sort of "Flip this Dungeon" sendup. Two whacky wizards -- one a hot chick, the other a quirky elf guy -- have to renovate an older dungeon with the help of the resident kobolds (with heartwarming backstory), and only two days before the adventurers show up! No time to install parquet flooring, but they've hired a cooperative trapper that has a faux marble finish. That beautiful, new ceiling fresco? Lurker with a tattoo fetish. And over here we'll put the mimics, complete with color-coordinated throw pillows.

Will they finish the dungeon redesign in time? We'll find out... right after this commercial.

psychojosh13

12-16-2008 02:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9731409)

Nonetheless, this whole class of monsters cries out to be deconstructed in some sort of "Flip this Dungeon" sendup. Two whacky wizards -- one a hot chick, the other a quirky elf guy -- have to renovate an older dungeon with the help of the resident kobolds (with heartwarming backstory), and only two days before the adventurers show up! No time to install parquet flooring, but they've hired a cooperative trapper that has a faux marble finish. That beautiful, new ceiling fresco? Lurker with a tattoo fetish. And over here we'll put the mimics, complete with color-coordinated throw pillows.

Will they finish the dungeon redesign in time? We'll find out... right after this commercial.

I want to play this game. Seriously. It'll make nice filler in the X-Crawl off-season.

(un)reason

12-16-2008 03:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9731409)

Here's the thing about the lurker: why does it need to levitate?

So it can get back up after doing the killing. Otherwise, it'd have to painstakingly shuffle up the walls again like the piercer.

Kakita Kojiro

12-16-2008 03:58 AM

It is not as though the lurker doesn't have time to get back up to the ceiling (after safely digesting his food, of course. don't swim for 30-minutes after eating, kids!). Adventurers aren't coming through as though the dungeon were a carnival ride needing a room reset every 5-minutes.

demiurge1138

12-16-2008 08:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9731920)

It is not as though the lurker doesn't have time to get back up to the ceiling (after safely digesting his food, of course don't swim for 30-minutes after eating, kids!). Adventurers aren't coming through as though the dungeon were a carnival ride needing a room reset every 5-minutes.

Yes, but it's damned inconvenient for the lurker if it's flopping around on the floor and, say, a couple of trolls wander by. Levitation is a perfectly valid anti-predator adaptation in the weird, hyper-Lamarckian world of

D&D.

Red_Rob

12-16-2008 08:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Picture the scene: A group of adventurers carefully advance down the corridor, their flickering torchlight illuminating the walls as the space opens out into a small room. In the center of the room is a large brass bound oak chest. One of the brave warriors moves cautiously towards the chest and hesitantly pulls the lid...

To find his hand stuck fast. A pseudopod strikes out from the chest and hits him across the head. "Mimic!" he shouts in panic. As the remainder of the group rush towards him the ceiling drops down on them, the lurker enveloping them in its folds. One of the heroes breaks free, wondering why its a lot lighter than it used to be. At this point the trapper masquerading as the floor of the room folds up around the hapless escapee. As the stunjellies arranged as the walls crawl towards the trapped heroes sunlight begins to stream through the gaps created by their movement. At this point the carefully constructed impression of an underground area collapses and the forlorn warrior stuck to the mimic realises the horrible truth as he is slowly digested...

"There was no dungeon! We were in a field all along!"

Kakita Kojiro

12-16-2008 09:02 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9732889)

Yes, but it's damned inconvenient for the lurker if it's flopping around on the floor and, say, a couple of trolls wander by. Levitation is a perfectly valid anti-predator adaptation in the weird, hyper-Lamarckian world of D&D.

Hey, now, trolls have to eat, too! I'm sure they'd like a nice, thick lurker steak for supper. Free range. Fed on 100% organic adventurers. Yum.

And I suppose we're assuming that lurkers are completely helpless once they've dropped if they can't levitate back up. Or something. Best not to think on it...

... Cause then we'd realize that trolls probably don't need a nice lurker steak, since they can just take turns chopping off each other's body parts and letting them regrow.

Also, for some reason, this had me picturing a backlog of trolls, kobolds, rust monsters, etc. -- all waiting to get past the lurker after it has just dropped on another hapless adventuring party. With a big "Lurker X-ing" sign on the dungeon wall, of course.

this thread may have broken my brain

see

12-16-2008 12:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9731100)

Along with piercer, mimic and... I think ropers would count too, don't you think?

There are a lot of monsters whose shtick is "I'm an innocent dungeon feature, don't mind me... rAWR!" ;)

MM has cloakers, lurkers/trappers, mimics, piercers, and ropers. MC Annual 1 has lock lurkers (look like coins), house hunter mimics (above-ground mimics that look like entire buildings), and xavers (a sword-shaped rust monster).

Gargoyles are a natural choice of a symbiote for large house hunter mimics.

Galeb duhr, miners, treants, and the 1e wolf-in-sheep's-clothing, of course, are similarly hard to spot.

And then there are the gas spores, of course, which are harmless dungeon features if left alone, but look like a threat . . .

Malignant Marionette

12-16-2008 05:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9733116)

... Cause then we'd realize that trolls probably don't need a nice lurker steak, since they can just take turns chopping off each other's body parts and letting them regrow.

Considering it takes a week for them to regenerate lost body parts, I doubt that'd be too efficient in the long run. ;)

JRM

12-16-2008 09:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9734612)

Considering it takes a week for them to regenerate lost body parts, I doubt that'd be too efficient in the long run. ;)

Well it's up to a week, so presumably if the trolls took small parts they'd regenerate faster. Maybe they can tear off a few fingers or a hand every couple of hours?

However, the basic premise is likely wrong, since I doubt the troll gains mass when regenerating. If trolls could magically grow flesh from out of thin air (or wherever the matter came from), they likely wouldn't have the ravenous appetites they're credited with. Tear a troll's arm off and destroy it, it probably becomes a skinnier troll, because its total weight is lowered by the mass of the lost limb, then it will want to replace its lost body weight by eating.

noisms

12-16-2008 10:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9733049)

Picture the scene: A group of adventurers carefully advance down the corridor, their flickering torchlight illuminating the walls as the space opens out into a small room. In the center of the room is a large brass bound oak chest. One of the brave warriors moves cautiously towards the chest and hesitantly pulls the lid...

To find his hand stuck fast. A pseudopod strikes out from the chest and hits him across the head. "Mimic!" he shouts in panic. As the remainder of the group rush towards him the ceiling drops down on them, the lurker enveloping them in its folds. One of the heroes breaks free, wondering why its a lot lighter than it used to be. At this point the trapper masquerading as the floor of the room folds up around the hapless escapee. As the stunjellies arranged as the walls crawl towards the trapped heroes sunlight begins to stream through the gaps created by their movement. At this point the carefully constructed impression of an underground area collapses and the forlorn warrior stuck to the mimic realises the horrible truth as he is slowly digested...

"There was no dungeon! We were in a field all along!"

That's an almost Lovecraftian ending.

DMH

12-16-2008 10:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Does anyone have the link to the previous thread? It isn't in the OP or first page.

Wakboth

12-16-2008 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9735465)

Does anyone have the link to the previous thread? It isn't in the OP or first page.

1st thread, A to Gi: <http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=389945>

2nd thread, Gi to Ki: <http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=404795>

DMH

12-16-2008 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Thanks Wak.

There is too much good stuff to let it fall down the rabbit hole.

noisms

12-16-2008 11:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9735568)

1st thread, A to Gi: <http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=389945>

2nd thread, Gi to Ki: <http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=404795>

Thanks for that. I was just about to go looking for those.

Kakita Kojiro

12-16-2008 11:41 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9735253)

However, the basic premise is likely wrong, since I doubt the troll gains mass when regenerating. If trolls could magically grow flesh from out of thin air (or wherever the matter came from), they likely wouldn't have the ravenous appetites they're credited with. Tear a troll's arm off and destroy it, it probably becomes a skinnier troll, because its total weight is lowered by the mass of the lost limb, then it will want to replace its lost body weight by eating.

I totally said that it was best not to think about it. This is why. :D

(anyway, it'll all come back up in the T's, I'm sure. ;))

Sleeper

12-17-2008 01:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9735465)

Does anyone have the link to the previous thread? It isn't in the OP or first page.

The let's read tag (at the bottom of each page) is also a good way to find the prequels, as well as related threads.

Red_Rob

12-17-2008 04:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9735351)
That's an almost Lovecraftian ending.

I always think of those terrible twist endings as more The Twilight Zone or The Outer Limits... "To serve man! Its a cook book!"

noisms

12-17-2008 07:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9736835)
I always think of those terrible twist endings as more The Twilight Zone or The Outer Limits... "To serve man! Its a cook book!"

"In the end it was not guns or bombs that defeated the flying saucers, but the humblest of God's creatures... Tyrannosaurus Rex."

Wakboth

12-17-2008 03:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9735589)
There is too much good stuff to let it fall down the rabbit hole.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9735685)
Thanks for that. I was just about to go looking for those.

"Subscribe to thread" is your friend. :)

noisms

12-17-2008 11:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lycanthrope (S-Werebo)

I'm damned if I'm doing these entry-by-entry; I learned that lesson from the Dragons and the Giants. So we'll split the lycanthropes (therianthropes, whatever) into two groups.

Seawolf

Seawolves are unusual in that they're a three-way hybrid rather than the usual human-animal cross, being a mixture of seal, wolf and human. They're also (I think) the only lycanthropes (therianthropes, whatever) who can be harmed by ordinary weapons.

Seawolves are pretty much what you would expect: Werewolves, but aquatic. They like raiding ships, piracy, and wenching, and generally acting like a bad sort. Probably their most interesting aspect is their longing for their previous life, which can cause them to try to make contact with past family and friends.

Werebat

A Ravenloft-specific lycanthrope (therianthrope, whatever), the Werebat is probably the most boring - at least in my opinion. I prefer my lycanthropes (therianthropes, whatever) to be the savage, brutal type rather than irritating fluttery kind.

"While werebats do look upon humans and demihumans as animals to be devoured," the MM says, "They are not cruel or evil in their attacks. They simply regard such beings as having a lower place in the food chain. Werebats will, typically, refer to themselves as 'predators of the night.'" Why are they Neutral Evil then? Odd.

Werebear

Werebears are the first of the Good lycanthropes (therianthr.... etc.), which seems like a bit of a crock to me. Where's the fun in a Good lycanthrope (ursidanthrope?)? That said, I like the concept of a Werebear - a sort of sage (a proper one that is, as opposed to the Monstrous Manual style sages conjecturing about the sexual habits of bugbears or what have you) who lives in the woods, gathering magical artifacts and ancient scrolls and suchlike, then indulging in a bit of light cannibalism.

Wereboar

For some reason Wereboars were always my favourite of the Man-Animals. I'm not sure why, because reading over the entry now, nothing stands out as being very interesting or noteworthy. I suppose they would be best making an appearance as a misunderstood "monster" who are being unfairly targeted by local villagers; the PCs could be originally hired to kill them but come to see it from their point of view. Then again that has 'railroad' written all over it.

HaplessVictim

12-18-2008 12:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

Lycanthrope (S-Werebo)

Werebears are the first of the Good lycanthropes (therianthr... etc.), which seems like a bit of a crock to me. Where's the fun in a Good lycanthrope (ursidanthrope?)?

Unsurprisingly, the werebear is straight out of Tolkien (oh lord, that sounds like the name of a bad rap filk, "straight outta Tolkien, a crazy motherf*cker name Gimli!")

Anyway, I always felt that, although it worked for Beorn, the idea of a good werecreature doesn't work in general. Mythically, lycanthropy is supposed to be a horrifying curse: literally robbing you of your humanity once a month and causing (or allowing) you to do bestial things that damn your soul for eternity. Somehow it lacks mystery and poetry to be doomed, on each full moon, to go out onto the moors and eat berries and do good deeds.

Kapten

12-18-2008 12:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

[size="5"]

"While werebats do look upon humans and demihumans as animals to be devoured," the MM says, "They are not cruel or evil in their attacks. They simply regard such beings as having a lower place in the food chain. Werebats will, typically, refer to themselves as 'predators of the night.'" Why are they Neutral Evil then? Odd.

Well, that attitude is common for many robbers and hitmen as well. "Nothing personal, I just want your money/life." Yet, robbing and murder is generally regarded as evil practises.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

[size="5"]

Werebear

Werebears are the first of the Good lycanthropes (therianthr... etc.), which seems like a bit of a crock to me. Where's the fun in a Good lycanthrope (ursidanthrope?)? That said, I like the concept of a Werebear - a sort of sage (a proper one that is, as opposed to the Monstrous Manual style sages conjecturing about the sexual habits of bugbears or what have you) who lives in the woods, gathering magical artifacts and ancient scrolls and suchlike, then indulging in a bit of light cannibalism.

I think werebears are based on Beorn from the Hobbit, that probably explains their good habits. Coming from a country with many bears, I can say that most myths regarding bears aren't portraying them as good guys ;).

Vultur10

12-18-2008 01:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9737594)

"In the end it was not guns or bombs that defeated the flying saucers, but the humblest of God's creatures... Tyrannosaurus Rex."

Now THAT would be an awesome story/episode - dinosaurs vs. aliens!

Kakita Kojiro

12-18-2008 02:11 AM

Although Beorn was probably the inspiration for making werebears Good... that is not really an appropriate alignment for what Beorn does in the Hobbit. Gandalf has to trick Beorn into offering hospitality to the dwarves, which he only grudgingly does after getting interested in their story. That's the only reason he shows up later, too.

He hated goblins, sure -- but they were his only real neighbors (other than giant spiders in Mirkwood). So he's got a fearsome reputation, is antisocial, and doesn't like his neighbors. That seems more properly Neutral (and not TN!) territory to me.

Which makes D&D's werecarebears kind of perplexing, really.

Kapten

12-18-2008 02:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9740800)

... is antisocial...

Minor nitpick, but I guess you are thinking of "asocial." Antisocial is about the defenition of D&D Evil ;).

Mr. Teapot

12-18-2008 02:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9733116)

... Cause then we'd realize that trolls probably don't need a nice lurker steak, since they can just take turns chopping off each other's body parts and letting them regrow.

In Eberron, they do.

Red_Rob

12-18-2008 02:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 9740494)

*Unsurprisingly, the werebear is straight out of Tolkien (oh lord, that sounds like the name of a bad rap filk, "straight outta Tolkien, a crazy motherf*cker name Gimli!")*

snip

If you want Tolkien based raps check out <http://www.lordsoftherhymes.com/>. With lyrics like "My name is Merry and i'm 5 foot tall. I used to F*&$ Sh*$ up at Brandybuck hall!" your rap example isnt actually that far from the truth!

Regarding Lycanthropes, does anyone know the origins of the Seawolves? It seems really weird to randomly have wolf/seal crossbreeds when every other Lycanthrope (Therianthrope, what... wait that was Noisms gag!) is just a single creature. Is there some kind of mythological precedent for this, or had the designers just noticed we'd gone 10 or so pages in a D&D monster book without a monster that looked like 2 random animals crossbred and decided to throw them together?

Wakboth

12-18-2008 03:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

Lycanthrope (S-Werebo)

Seawolf

Seawolves are unusual in that they're a three-way hybrid rather than the usual human-animal cross, being a mixture of seal, wolf and human. They're also (I think) the only lycanthropes (therianthropes, whatever) who can be harmed by ordinary weapons.

Seawolves are pretty much what you would expect: Werewolves, but aquatic. They like raiding ships, piracy, and wenching, and generally acting like a bad sort. Probably their most interesting aspect is their longing for their previous life, which can cause them to try to make contact with past family and friends.

They're a bit wonky critters, created because (I think) of the name ("sea wolf" = "pirate" or raider). So they're basically pun monsters!

Quote:

Werebat

A Ravenloft-specific lycanthrope (therianthrope, whatever), the Werebat is probably the most boring - at least in my opinion. I prefer my lycanthropes (therianthropes, whatever) to be the savage, brutal type rather than irritating fluttery kind.

I think werebats might make good distractions or stand-ins for vampires (bat-like monsters attacking people, sucking their blood, and hiding during the day...), or vampiric minions... or heck, why not cheat a bit and make a vampire werebat, to totally throw the players off!

Quote:

Werebear

Werebears are the first of the Good lycanthropes (therianthr.... etc.), which seems like a bit of a crock to me. Where's the fun in a Good lycanthrope (ursidanthrope?)?

The "sage" angle is pretty good; another one might be that they're the "zen" lycanthropes, who've come to terms with their transformations, balancing human and bear harmoniously. Koan-spouting wilderness sages that can be talked into helping the locals when the ninja wererats (Go clan Eshin!) invade...

Quote:

Wereboar

For some reason Wereboars were always my favourite of the Man-Animals.

On the other hand, I've always found wereboars the most boar-ing werebeasts... the non-evil roles are IMO better filled by either werebears or weretigers. I did use a wereboar to make a Ryoga Hibiki (from Ranma) cameo once, though: a stubborn, wandering wereboar with a thick skull and a grudge on the PCs based on them foiling his romantic plans. (True to the form, the players had no idea what he was talking about!)

Brandi

12-18-2008 03:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9740979)

Regarding Lycanthropes, does anyone know the origins of the Seawolves? It seems really weird to randomly have wolf/seal crossbreeds when every other Lycanthrope (Therianthrope, what... wait that was Noisms gag!) is just a single creature. Is there some kind of mythological precedent for this, or had the designers just noticed we'd gone 10 or so pages in a D&D monster book without a monster that looked like 2 random animals crossbred and decided to throw them together?

I only first saw them in Monster Manual II back in the day, and I figured it was just a desire to come up with an aquatic lycanthrope-- though I thought weresharks were there already. Given that they have a wolfman form that somewhat resembles the hybrid form of the regular D&D werewolf, they may have been thought up as a way to confuse adventurers-- the werebat definitely was (their MO strongly resembles that of a vampire, so if the adventurers show up with stake and holy water, they're in for a surprise).

Mr. Teapot

12-18-2008 04:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9740979)

Regarding Lycanthropes, does anyone know the origins of the Seawolves? It seems really weird to randomly have wolf/seal crossbreeds when every other Lycanthrope (Therianthrope, what... wait that was Noisms gag!) is just a single creature.

Arguably, all the other lycanthropes are just variations on the werewolf anyway. Outside of D&D and its ilk, you see pretty much just werewolves. So if one particular shapechanger is going to get an unnecessary underwater version, it's the werewolf.

Then you have D&D's tendency to create unnecessary underwater versions of humanoid races. You get underwater humans (different from mermen, I think), underwater elves, underwater Orcs, halflings, goblins, trolls, Beholders, every PC race in the 3rd ed PHB, etc. So eventually, someone was bound to combine these two factors and create underwater lycanthropes.

The Last Conformist

12-18-2008 04:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

ursidanthrope?

"Arctanthrope" would me more in line with lycanthrope and therianthrope, using a classical Greek word rather than a Neo-Latin oddity like "ursid".

Red_Rob

12-18-2008 04:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 9741237)

*I only first saw them in Monster Manual II back in the day, and I figured it was just a desire to come up with an aquatic lycanthrope-- though I thought weresharks were there already. Given that they have a wolfman form that somewhat resembles the hybrid form of the regular D&D werewolf, they may have been thought up as a way to confuse adventurers-- the werebat definitely was (their MO strongly resembles that of a vampire, so if the adventurers show up with stake and holy water, they're in for a surprise).*

Yeah, a nice surprise! Rather than a charm-casting, level draining, 8 hit dice, gaseous forming badass they find a couple of 4hd D4 damage goons. It doesn't help that they both have the same vulnerability (+1 weapons). If you're gonna trick the players at least have the big reveal elicit gasps and moans of dread, not sighs of relief!

Kakita Kojiro

12-18-2008 04:46 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 9740869)

Minor nitpick, but I guess you are thinking of "asocial." Antisocial is about the defenition of D&D Evil ;).

Beorn is both asocial (does not associate with anyone else) and antisocial (opposed, antagonistic, hostile, etc. to associating with anyone else).

D&D Evil may be either social or not; Lawful Evil is certainly a social Evil. If you're not associating with others, you have no minions to order about, which is one of the big selling points of LE!

On underwater theiranth... whatever... was in Ravenloft that had weremantas? I remember thinking that was a rather stupid idea, but that the illustration of the man-manta ray hybrid form looked rather cool.

Wereseals would make more sense for D&D, but I think that fantasy trope got captured by selkie-type monsters (which I can't recall in which MM or edition made their appearance).

Wakboth

12-18-2008 05:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9741461)

Wereseals would make more sense for D&D, but I think that fantasy trope got captured by selkie-type monsters (which I can't recall in which MM or edition made their appearance).

I think selkies showed up first in MM2 for 1e; they definitely are in 2e MM.

DMH

12-18-2008 05:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

[

They're also (I think) the only lycanthropes (therianthropes, whatever) who can be harmed by ordinary weapons.

Lesser seawolves can be hit by normal weapons. Did they drop the greater from the MM?

kelvingreen

12-18-2008 06:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9735253)

Well it's up to a week, so presumably if the trolls took small parts they'd regenerate faster. Maybe they can tear of a few fingers or a hand every couple of hours?

I am reminded of Grom the Paunch, the Warhammer goblin who ate a troll steak, which continues to regenerate in his belly while his stomach juices at the same time dissolve it. As a result, he is in a state of constant indigestion, is vastly bloated, but has minor regenerative powers himself.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9737594)

"In the end it was not guns or bombs that defeated the flying saucers, but the humblest of God's creatures... Tyrannosaurus Rex."

Beautiful.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

Seawolf

Seawolves are unusual in that they're a three-way hybrid rather than the usual human-animal cross, being a mixture of seal, wolf and human.

Undoubtedly they'll turn out to have been borrowed wholesale from some Nordic myth, but I've never been able to take these guys seriously. I think it's the picture; not even DiTerlizzi can make a seal with a dog head look threatening. It just ends up looking like a "mermaid" from a sideshow.

noisms

12-18-2008 07:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9741795)
Beautiful.

It's part of a Scary Door episode from Futurama, so unfortunately I can't take credit.

Brandi

12-18-2008 08:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Red_Rob (Post 9741450)
Yeah, a nice surprise! Rather than a charm-casting, level draining, 8 hit dice, gaseous forming badass they find a couple of 4hd D4 damage goons. It doesn't help that they both have the same vulnerability (+1 weapons). If you're gonna trick the players at least have the big reveal elicit gasps and moans of dread, not sighs of relief!

Outside of Ravenloft they're no great shakes. IN Ravenloft, where +1 weapons are a damn lucky thing, it's another matter. Lycanthropy is also far less easy to cure in the Demiplane...

[FWIW, the one published adventure I have with a werebat appears to have a 4th-level party in mind, who would probably be TPKed against a vampire. In 3rd edition, where the human form of the were can have levels in various character classes, it gets even more interesting, especially if that includes spellcasting.]

randomgamer8466

12-18-2008 08:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Where can one find a werebat for 3e?

Sleeper

12-18-2008 09:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9742289)
Where can one find a werebat for 3e?

Minus the flavor, you can just make one using the rules in MM using the dire bat (the ordinary bat is too small). I believe there's also one in Monsters of Faerûn.

demiurge1138

12-18-2008 09:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yeah, Monsters of Faerun (and then its pseudo-update, Lost Empires of Faerun) has werebats. But lycanthropes are damn easy to make in 3.x.

I had a PC who was a wereboar once. Not by choice, mind. The party was in Eberron, doing various tasks for the Llesh Haruuc (hobgoblin emperor) ala Hercules in order to earn a boon from him, and one of the tasks was to hunt the Boar of the Torlac Moor, which had killed any and all hobgoblin hunters who had tried to take it down. The party tracked it to a ruin, killed it, cut off its head and ate its flesh.

Then I had them make Fortitude saves.

The elven rogue failed, and became a boar that very night. Since Eberron has twelve moons, she was transformed... yeah, just about every night in a month. And since in Eberron, lycanthropes are very rare, and subject to purges by the Church of the Silver Flame... well, actually, that game ended in a TPK before the inquisitors tracked the party down, but they were coming for her!

DMH

12-18-2008 08:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There is a 3.5 setting based on how a high lycanthrope population affects a region- Steve Trustum's SpirosBlaak (from Green Ronin). It has some high points and low ones, but the constant wars between the humans/dwarves and werewriters seem almost constant in the history. Elves aren't in the region and in this world are raiders.

I wish it sold well enough to get a supplement on the lycanthrope population.

Kapten

12-18-2008 11:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9741461)

Beorn is both asocial (does not associate with anyone else) and antisocial (opposed, antagonistic, hostile, etc. to associating with anyone else).

D&D Evil may be either social or not; Lawful Evil is certainly a social Evil. If you're not associating with others, you have no minions to order about, which is one of the big selling points of LE!

If antisocials wouldn't want to interact with other people, the world would be a better place. Antisocials want to interact with others, they want domination (both large scale and small scale, most of them don't have the opportunity to go large scale).

Stalin is pretty much an example of an antisocial personality disorder (it was what struck me when I read the book The Young Stalin by some English dude), I would consider him mainly LE.

noisms

12-19-2008 10:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Lycanthropes (Weref - Werew

Werefox/Foxwoman

The Foxwomen are another variation on the "alluring female with male slaves" motif - like Dryads, Sylphs, and, er... well, there's a couple more I'm sure. I just can't think of any more than that right now. Foxwomen are less interested in companionship than they are in just having men to pamper them and tell them how beautiful they are, which I think would get boring after a while - God knows having gorgeous women tell me how fantastically handsome I am all day long has started to get medown.

Foxwomen can come into a story as kidnappers - they are barren, and so have to steal children, who they then infect with their disease.

Wererat

Wererats occupy a unique position in 2nd edition AD&D, as they are actually the first monster which any brand new, fresh player will know about (discounting dragons, I suppose). This is because the example of play at the very beginning of the 2nd edition PHB involves an encounter between Fighter 1, Fighter 2, Cleric and a wererat.

I like the idea of wererats - a parallel society of parasitic criminals living underneath our feet, leeching money, food and whatever else they can get their hands on. A more interesting version of a guild of thieves, I suppose.

Wereraven

The wereraven entry is one of those ones that really suffer from being too setting specific. It even refers the reader to the Ravenloft boxed set for further rules, and discusses matters which, as a non-Ravenloft player, I have no clue about - like dark powers and Vistani. These episodes in the MM are really unprofessional, actually - as if they were just cut n' pasted and nobody even bothered to check them.

Weretiger

"For various reasons weretigresses outnumber weretigers five to one", we are told, but we aren't given much clue as to what those reasons are. Perhaps: Female weretigers sound HOT? Anyway, the entry is mostly descriptive and doesn't provide much in the way of plot or adventure hooks, though it does give the impression that weretigers form wandering adventure bands, which might be a fun alternative campaign.

Werewolf

And last of all are the guys who started to whole crazy lycanthrope thing. They also have one of the best pictures, not just for the therianthropes but for the MM in general. It's a great piece.

I'd forgotten that werewolves have different hybrid forms - some the traditional bipedal wolf, others mixtures of human and wolf features, and others looking like large, bearlike wolves. Another thing I'd forgotten is this line: "Many werewolf families roam the countryside in wagons, much like gypsies. In fact, this has caused many gypsies to be accused of being werewolves." I've never used a gypsy werewolf family in a campaign before, but you can bet I'm going to in the near future.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9740152)

Werebear

Werebears are the first of the Good lycanthropes (therianthr... etc.), which seems like a bit of a crock to me. Where's the fun in a Good lycanthrope (ursidanthrope)? That said, I like the concept of a Werebear - a sort of sage (a proper one that is, as opposed to the Monstrous Manual style sages conjecturing about the sexual habits of bugbears or what have you) who lives in the woods, gathering magical artifacts and ancient scrolls and suchlike, then indulging in a bit of light cannibalism.

As everyone else has said, "Beorn." But I think Beorn more classically fits the AD&D druid than the werebear. And when White Wolf put out their splat book for werebears, they were all sagey and healing people and stuff instead of transforming into twelve foot tall bear-men and ripping people's heads off. I don't think WW was stealing from Tolkein, so maybe the "good werebear" comes from some other sources.

Quote:

Wereboar

For some reason Wereboars were always my favourite of the Man-Animals. I'm not sure why, because reading over the entry now, nothing stands out as being very interesting or noteworthy. I suppose they would be best making an appearance as a misunderstood "monster" who are being unfairly targeted by local villagers; the PCs could be originally hired to kill them but come to see it from their point of view. Then again that has 'railroad' written all over it.

Kenzer's Kingdoms of Kalamar setting has an evil god of lust and vice whose symbol is a boar, so his evil priests tend to be wereboars and the like. I thought that was cool. And really creepy.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9748739)

Werewolf

I'd forgotten that werewolves have different hybrid forms - some the traditional bipedal wolf, others mixtures of human and wolf features, and others looking like large, bearlike wolves.

The line "large, bearlike wolves" always made me think of An American Werewolf in London. And then that makes me think of Jenny Agutter...

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9748739)

Foxwomen can come into a story as kidnappers - they are barren, and so have to steal children, who they then infect with their disease.

I always thought the foxwomen were kind of meh. They seem to be partially modeled on the shapeshifting foxes of Chinese and Japanese folklore, but more one-dimensional...

Quote:

Wererat

Wererats occupy a unique position in 2nd edition AD&D, as they are actually the first monster which any brand new, fresh player will know about (discounting dragons, I suppose). This is because the example of play at the very beginning of the 2nd edition PHB involves an encounter between Fighter 1, Fighter 2, Cleric and a wererat.

Yah. Looking at that example, it's noticeable how the characters have no names. I wonder if this is indicative of some major mentality changes between 2e and 3e... or maybe not.

Quote:

I like the idea of wererats - a parallel society of parasitic criminals living underneath our feet, leeching money, food and whatever else they can get their hands on. A more interesting version of a guild of thieves, I suppose.

They're also underutilized, I think - probably because they're the weakest lycanthropes. You could pull off all sorts of Skaven-styled nastiness with them, though, including the ninja rats fighting against sagacious werebears. ;)

Quote:

"For various reasons weretigresses outnumber weretigers five to one", we are told, but we aren't given much clue as to what those reasons are. Perhaps: Female weretigers sound HOT?

The DiTerlizzi illustration does support that theory. Rowr! :)

Quote:

And last of all are the guys who started to whole crazy lycanthrope thing. They also have one of the best pictures, not just for the therianthropes but for the MM in general. It's a great piece.

Indeed.

Quote:

Another thing I'd forgotten is this line: "Many werewolf families roam the countryside in wagons, much like gypsies. In fact, this has caused many gypsies to be accused of being werewolves." I've never used a gypsy werewolf family in a campaign before, but you can bet I'm going to in the near future.

That was a neat plot hook, I always thought. Also, the comments on how werewolves are loving parents and loyal mates, and how it contrasts with their generally bloodthirsty nature, were interesting. Maybe a gypsy woman approaches adventurers, telling them a sad story about her children having been robbed by cruel enemies, and asking for their help.

Then, when the adventurers find the kidnappers they find out that the kids are actually werewolf pups, and the "kidnappers" are embroiled in one of those perennial "what to do with orc children?" dilemmas. (For added bonus, have the mom follow the adventurers, perhaps with several other family members in tow...)

Sleeper

12-20-2008 12:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9749156)

Yah. Looking at that example, it's noticeable how the characters have no names. I wonder if this is indicative of some major mentality changes between 2e and 3e... or maybe not.

Probably, a little. Though naming example characters is nothing new; Basic D&D had Morgan Ironwolf and Black Dougal.

Behemoth

12-20-2008 12:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Black Dougal sounds like a cross between Shaft and the Magic Roundabout.

Oh, and I think the Were bears thing is a celtic (Welsh, i believe) archetype. I remember reading some myth about a wiseman type guy who could turn into a bear, one of the Hero's mentor type characters.

demiurge1138

12-20-2008 01:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9749156)
The DiTerlizzi illustration does support that theory. Rowr! :)

Yeah, hot weretiger women seem to be a trend in D&D illustrations. And the DiTerlizzi illustration made me think... interesting things... when I was a wee one.

Sleeper

12-20-2008 01:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Behemoth (Post 9749324)
Black Dougal sounds like a cross between Shaft and the Magic Roundabout.

Thieves were so much cooler when Isaac Hayes sung their theme song.

Lidda probably just listens to Cypress Hill.

JRM

12-20-2008 02:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Behemoth (Post 9749324)
Black Dougal sounds like a cross between Shaft and the Magic Roundabout.

Oh, and I think the Were bears thing is a celtic (Welsh, i believe) archetype. I remember reading some myth about a wiseman type guy who could turn into a bear, one of the Hero's mentor type characters.

Late to the party again.

Anyhows, I do remember reading a Celtic legend about a noble warrior (whose name temporarily escapes me) who turned into a bear to devastate his liege lord's enemies. There are similar Celtic legends about Knights who turn into wolves. Plus of course their are Norse and Germanic legends of bear- and wolf shapechangers, though these are typically malevolent entities.

Furthermore, the folklore in some regions of Siberia considers "Brother Bear" a noble creature, and some important men were said to turn into bears (or maybe vica versa) and wander about the forest - I remember reading about a shaman who claimed to have met a bear who he claimed wa a Russian communist party leader!

JasonK

12-20-2008 02:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Behemoth (Post 9749324)

Oh, and I think the Were bears thing is a celtic (Welsh, i believe) archetype. I remember reading some myth about a wiseman type guy who could turn into a bear, one of the Hero's mentor type characters.

Welsh, most like - Lloyd Alexander wrote about a very bear-like protector of animals in the Chronicles of Prydain. Dude didn't actually shape-shift as far as I've seen, but the connection's strongly implied.

It's been too long since I read the Welsh myths to tell you who Alexander was aping, though.

~ jasön

JRM

12-20-2008 02:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9741717)

Lesser seawolves can be hit by normal weapons. Did they drop the greater from the MM?

No, the 2nd edition MM still has greater seawolves who are immune to normal weapons. I tend to think of it as being a Master Vampire / Minion Vampire sort of deal, with a "true" greater seawolf infecting a bunch of pirates to turn them into his/her servants.

Hold on, is the dotd.com's seawolf entry correct? It lists the lesser seawolf's movement as "Swim 12, 30". Surely they got that the wrong way around, unless a wolf-seal-man can really flop around on its flippers faster than a race horse when on land, but only swim as quickly as a man can run! Must be a typo, but is it in the MM as well?

Anyhow, there must be a story behind the seawolves instinctive urge to destroy shipping and kill or infect sailors. A curse by an evil aquatic race or their deity trying to rid the seas of human intruders? Certainly, they are no friend of the gallant Sea Caballeros!

Vultur10

12-20-2008 02:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Bodvarr Bjarki had a bear's spirit form, which he sent forth to fight while he slept. People woke him up to fight, which was a bad idea: he was not as powerful as the spirit bear.

JRM

12-20-2008 03:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9741222)

On the other hand, I've always found wereboars the most boar-ing werebeasts... the non-evil roles are IMO better filled by either werebears or weretigers. I did use a wereboar to make a Ryoga Hibiki (from Ranma) cameo once, though: a stubborn, wandering wereboar with a thick skull and a grudge on the PCs based on them foiling his romantic plans. (True to the form, the players had no idea what he was talking about!)

Nah, I like wereboars they've got that "could be friend or foe" thing working for them, and offer a range of roleplaying options - the greedy self-obsessed slob, lusting for food & woman, à la Pigsy in Journey to the West ... the brutal mercenaries who may be won over with bribes and threats ... the confused swineherd who's terrified by the unwholesome feelings he's been having about the sows in his charge ever since that "wild boar" bit him in the woods, et cetera.

However, the lycanthrope I've used the most is the wererat. I've had three story-arcs involving thieves guilds which were really made up of shapeshifting rats, in one of which they were having a secret war with a heroic band of werecats* led by a weretiger.

*A homebrew monster which had a weapon-using hybrid form, so I could have a dual sword wielding black cat ninja wreaking havoc amongst the "goblin-rats".

demiurge1138

12-20-2008 03:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

One thing about foxwomen that I think is cool (and hasn't been mentioned) is that the humanoid form changes appearance too. Human and half-elven women infected by the bite of a foxwoman slowly turn into elven versions of themselves. That's cool, and kinda creepy. Why are foxwomen elves? Is it some form of elven curse?

Kakita Kojiro

12-20-2008 04:48 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Behemoth (Post 9749324)

Oh, and I think the Were bears thing is a celtic (Welsh, i believe) archetype. I remember reading some myth about a wiseman type guy who could turn into a bear, one of the Hero's mentor type characters.

Doesn't ring a bell for me, either. There are any number of Welsh and Celtic heroes who can change shape -- Gwydion, Taleisin, Ceridwen, etc. -- but none I can recall that were specifically bears. Ceridwen might've gone bear to catch Gwion in salmon form (tho wiki says: otter).

Actually, the only Celtic hero with a bear motif I can think of is (King) Arthur. IIRC there is a Gaulic bear goddess of similar name (googles; Artio).

I also suspect the later, White Wolf, association with werebears to healer-types is something from Native American folklore.

Sleeper

12-20-2008 06:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Might be Norse-derived, at least the fierce warrior who transforms part. Isn't "berserker" is sometimes translated as "bear-skin" instead of "bare-shirt"?

Vultur10

12-20-2008 08:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Other were-bear like creatures from legends: the Iroquois legend of Nyagwahe, a monstrous bear (twice as tall as a moose!) which could take human shape. It was a man-eater, though.

There is a Cherokee myth that all bears originated from transformed humans...

Wakshaani

12-20-2008 08:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Wererats I rarely used, since, well, Thieve's Guilds take care of most of THAT work, but, I did have a band of Goblins that were lead by a Goblin Were-Rat, who used Giant Rats and Rat Swarms and soon, rather than Worgs.

OMG, Goblin Rogue + Wererat Dex = GAH!

That poor party. :(

Lukas Sjöström

12-20-2008 05:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9750768)

Might be Norse-derived, at least the fierce warrior who transforms part. Isn't "berserker" is sometimes translated as "bear-skin" instead of "bare-shirt"?

There are examples of werebears in Norse and Saami myth, but they don't shed any light on the LG thing. Berserkers would certainly be more CN/CE.

The Last Conformist

12-20-2008 06:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9750768)

Might be Norse-derived, at least the fierce warrior who transforms part. Isn't "berserker" is sometimes translated as "bear-skin" instead of "bare-shirt"?

"Bear-shirt" is the preferred translation of the few reference works nearest at hand.

JRM

12-20-2008 06:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9750987)

*Wererats I rarely used, since, well, Thieve's Guilds take care of most of THAT work, but, I did have a band of Goblin that were lead by a Goblin Were-Rat, who used Giant Rats and Rat Swarms and soon, rather than Worgs.*

Yes, it's just I feel a wererat thieves guild can do it better. They can do anything normal thieves can, plus additional powers - spying and infiltrating as rats, fighting in mundane-weapon immune hybrid form. A low-level guild of regular thieves would have little chance of competing against them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9750987)

OMG, Goblin Rogue + Wererat Dex = GAH!

That poor party. :(

Unfortunately, I ran that adventure before 3rd edition came out, so they weren't up against Dex 19+ lycanthropic Rogues. I'll have to get them next time!:D

SuperG

12-20-2008 07:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 9740494)

Unsurprisingly, the werebear is straight out of Tolkien (oh lord, that sounds like the name of a bad rap filk, "straight outta Tolkien, a crazy motherf*cker name Gimli!")

Anyway, I always felt that, although it worked for Beorn, the idea of a good werecreature doesn't work in general. Mythically, lycanthropy is supposed to be a horrifying curse: literally robbing you of your humanity once a month and causing (or allowing) you to do bestial things that damn your soul for eternity. Somehow it lacks mystery and poetry to be doomed, on each full moon, to go out onto the moors and eat berries and do good deeds.

Nah, it's awesome. Imagine a Dark Lord cursed to become a Werebear - each night of the full moon, he must lock himself in his chambers to conceal his shame, and regret the harm to his plans he himself will cause...

Perhaps he is even tormented by his bouts of conscience.

Or you can just have them as, well, miscellaneous good creatures. It's useful to have them around. (And Beorn was totally Good! Killing goblins is good, and heck, he was a LOT nicer to the Dwarfs than the Elves were).

Oberon_Unseelie

12-21-2008 03:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

My favorite bit about were-rats? They don't have a bite attack; they use weapons in all three forms. So you've got two-foot long giants rats attacking with itty-bitty swords - which I guess they'd have to hold in their teeth.

Sleeper

12-21-2008 03:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Oberon_Unseelie (Post 9753510)

My favorite bit about were-rats? They don't have a bite attack; they use weapons in all three forms. So you've got two-foot long giants rats attacking with itty-bitty swords - which I guess they'd have to hold in their teeth.

Ahhhhhr! Avast ye scurvy rats!

JRM

12-21-2008 09:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Oberon_Unseelie (Post 9753510)

My favorite bit about were-rats? They don't have a bite attack; they use weapons in all three forms. So you've got two-foot long giants rats attacking with itty-bitty swords - which I guess they'd have to hold in their teeth.

Oh that's hilarious, why did I never notice it before. I've always ran them as having a giant or regular rat's bite attack in rat-form (in my campaign wererats can also turn into regular-sized rats as well as giant rats, a much better form for spying).

That ruins the classic "find the wererat hiding in a nest of mundane rats" plot. Even dim PCs would figure out to kill the one with the sword.

Still, I do like the idea, being a big fan of Fritz Leiber's Lankhmar series which features weapon-wielding regular sized sapient rats.

Zartes

12-22-2008 12:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9735253)

Well it's up to a week, so presumably if the trolls took small parts they'd regenerate faster. Maybe they can tear of a few fingers or a hand every couple of hours?

However, the basic premise is likely wrong, since I doubt the troll gains mass when regenerating. If trolls could magically grow flesh from out of thin air (or wherever the matter came from), they likely wouldn't have the ravenous appetites they're credited with. Tear a troll's arm off and destroy it, it probably becomes a skinnier troll, because its total weight is lowered by the mass of the lost limb, then it will want to replace its lost body weight by eating.

Sorry to do a backtrack, but I simply had to share an idea...

Trolls aren't a species. They're a single entity. Somewhere out (or down) there is the Troll Hub, a huge lump of troll flesh. The actual trolls that people fight are wandering food collectors. They kill things, eat them, and the food gets teleported back to the Hub. When they're damaged, new mass gets teleported to the individual troll from the Hub, although acid and fire can interfere with this.

This explains a couple of interesting things: trolls can't kill each other (would you really want your digestive system to attack itself?), and they can die of starvation (without a constant supply of incoming food, the hub cuts off the individual troll, as it's a waste of resources).

JRM

12-22-2008 06:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9755869)

Sorry to do a backtrack, but I simply had to share an idea...

Trolls aren't a species. They're a single entity. Somewhere out (or down) there is the Troll Hub, a huge lump of troll flesh. The actual trolls that people fight are wandering food collectors. They kill things, eat them, and the food gets teleported back to the Hub. When they're damaged, new mass gets teleported to the individual troll from the Hub, although acid and fire can interfere with this.

This explains a couple of interesting things: trolls can't kill each other (would you really want your digestive system to attack itself?), and they can die of starvation (without a constant supply of incoming food, the hub cuts off the individual troll, as it's a waste of resources).

So they're basically ambulatory bags of devouring. Although why would there be only one hub? There could be many troll-hubs which fight with each other, which would also be an explanation for why there are different species of troll (two-headed, ice et cetera).

Also, since AD&D trolls come in male and female, that would mean the troll hub is actually a hermaphrodite, and the trolls are actually flowering organs as well as food-gatherers.

Zartes

12-22-2008 09:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9756915)

So they're basically ambulatory bags of devouring. Although why would there be only one hub? There could be many troll-hubs which fight with each other, which would also be an explanation for why there are different species of troll (two-headed, ice et cetera).

Also, since AD&D trolls come in male and female, that would mean the troll hub is actually a hermaphrodite, and the trolls are actually flowering organs as well as food-gatherers.

Well, I had one because that makes it sort of legendary and mythological. But one for each troll sub-species works as well.

Flowering Organ Trolls... I can't get over how weird that is, as a sentence. Although, it gets me thinking - I'm pretty sure there are half-trolls (I mean half-human/half-trolls. Since 3.X, there is, of course, half-troll/half-template critters all over the place). Perhaps they have a connection to the hub as well, albeit a more tenuous one. Which gives me the idea of a hub that gets smart, and realizes it can maximize its gains by breeding its Flowering Organs/Food Collectors with other creatures.

This can result in either kidnapping of fair maidens, or else a sudden spate of exceedingly erudite, high-charisma trolls wandering down to the local village with bouquets of flowers and boxes of chocolates...

Vultur10

12-22-2008 01:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Or the troll might be the female. Considering the difficulties of birthing something as large as a half-troll child might be, I think that is more efficient (fewer deaths in childbirth and more live young).

Zartes

12-22-2008 02:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9758031)

Or the troll might be the female. Considering the difficulties of birthing something as large as a half-troll child might be, I think that is more efficient (fewer deaths in childbirth and more live young).

Ah, yes, good point. Please excuse my patriarchal first thoughts about young maidens :P

Vultur10

12-22-2008 03:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9758061)

Ah, yes, good point. Please excuse my patriarchal first thoughts about young maidens :P

Well, that's the traditional way for it to work. It just makes more biological sense to me the other way. (Of course, that ought to be a contra-indication in itself; nothing in D&D makes biological sense.)

JRM

12-22-2008 03:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9757329)

Flowering Organ Trolls... I can't get over how weird that is, as a sentence. Although, it gets me thinking - I'm pretty sure there are half-trolls (I mean half-human/half-trolls. Since 3.X, there is, of course, half-troll/half-template critters all over the place). Perhaps they have a connection to the hub as well, albeit a more tenuous one. Which gives me the idea of a hub that gets smart, and realizes it can maximize its gains by breeding its Flowering Organs/Food Collectors with other creatures.

Well AD&D gives precedent for troll cross-breeds, since two-headed trolls and giant trolls are said to be the result of a troll mating with an ettin or a hill giant respectively. Presumably it is the apocryphal Sages who did the saying.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9757329)

This can result in either kidnapping of fair maidens, or else a sudden spate of exceedingly erudite, high-charisma trolls wandering down to the local village with bouquets of flowers and boxes of chocolates...

What do you think philters of love are for? If the Great EGG himself recognized the possibility of one resulting in a pixie/storm giant cross, why not a troll/human?:)

JRM

12-22-2008 03:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9758061)

Ah, yes, good point. Please excuse my patriarchal first thoughts about young maidens :P

I've long liked the idea of trolls being matriarchal, with the brutish males being ladyed over (as opposed to lorded) by their more intelligent and aggressive wives and daughters. Of course, that wouldn't fit the troll-hub premis, since the trolls would presumably all be part of one psyche rather than having the society and hierarchy of independent beings.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mammal

The Mammal entries seem to have been written by the usual crew, rather than PETA girl - thank the lord. They are deathly dull, although there are one or two instances of weirdness.

Ape, Carnivorous - Good buddies of hobgoblins; I suspect that your liking for these will directly correlate to your liking for pulp fantasy.

Baboon - "Large herbivorous primates".

Badger - A "vicious little creature".

Banderlog - A Baboon with green skin which throws coconuts (1d4+1 damage, making them more deadly than a dagger) and 'retch fruit'.

Bhaergala - A mysterious 'beast' which drops down on people from above and can turn spells; there is no description of its physical appearance.

Wild Boar - Can fight until reduced to -7hp. (Why not -6 or -8?)

Chattur - A small rodent-like animal which is also known as a "space bandit". That really doesn't sound like a high fantasy term.

Cooshee - An elven dog, which unfortunately doesn't have its own language like the elven cats. We all know felines are more intelligent anyway.

Dakon - An intelligent ape which can speak.

Debbi - No, not the one who 'did Dallas', but a cross between a baboon and a hyena with electrical fur.

Goat - Can charge to cause a bit of extra damage. Has no special abilities against Trolls.

Gorilla - "Nonaggressive and shy". Boring!

Hsing-sing - Not a jail near New York, but a kind of oriental meditative simian which goes apeshit (geddit?) for two weeks every year and takes off on a murderous rampage.

Hyena - Taunts its enemies with a cackling howl.

Jackal - A timid scavenger.

Losel - A cross between an orc and a baboon. The designers really like their baboons, don't they? That's the fourth baboon or baboon-like creature in this entry.

Monkey Spider - Not a Spider Monkey? And aren't Spiders Arthropods, not Mammals? Shome mishtake, shorely.

Porcupine - Can't shoot quills, which is a bit rubbish.

Rothe - A kind of subterranean ox which lives on fungi.

Skunk - Causes nausea.

Sleek - A sort of big weasel which can sever arteries with its teeth, causing foes to bleed to death with surprising speed.

Stag, Wild - Big fellows with antlers.

Stench Kow - Lower planar cattle, which smell very bad. As opposed to the normal kind, which smell, er, nice. The plural of Stench Kow is 'Kine'.

Taer - More 'vile primates'.

Tyrg - A tiger-dog crossbreed. Tog, surely. Or Diger?

Warthog - Attacks until it is at -7hp, like the boar.

Weasel - Things wot eat rabbits.

Wolverine - Not Hugh Jackman, but the real thing.

Minimal Mammals - Basically half-sized versions of the ordinary variety, with the stats you would expect.

Giant Mammals - Double-sized versions, again with the stats you would expect.

(un)reason

12-22-2008 11:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9755869)

Sorry to do a backtrack, but I simply had to share an idea...

Trolls aren't a species. They're a single entity. Somewhere out (or down) there is the Troll Hub, a huge lump of troll flesh. The actual trolls that people fight are wandering food collectors. They kill things, eat them, and the food gets teleported back to the Hub. When they're damaged, new mass gets teleported to the individual troll from the Hub, although acid and fire can interfere with this.

This explains a couple of interesting things: trolls can't kill each other (would you really want your digestive system to attack itself?), and they can die of starvation (without a constant supply of incoming food, the hub cuts off the individual troll, as it's a waste of resources).

So how does the tarrasque tie into this? This seems like perfect material for that epic thread.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Mammal

Banderlog - A Baboon with green skin which throws coconuts (1d4+1 damage, making them more deadly than a dagger) and 'retch fruit'.

Bhaergala - A mysterious 'beast' which drops down on people from above and can turn spells; there is no description of its physical appearance.

Cooshee - An elven dog, which unfortunately doesn't have its own language like the elven cats. We all know felines are more intelligent anyway.

Dakon - An intelligent ape which can speak.

Debbi - No, not the one who 'did Dallas', but a cross between a baboon and a hyena with electrical fur.

Hsing-sing - Not a jail near New York, but a kind of oriental meditative simian which goes apeshit (geddit?) for two weeks every year and takes off on a murderous rampage.

Losel - A cross between an orc and a baboon. The designers really like their baboons, don't they? That's the fourth baboon or baboon-like creature in this entry.

Monkey Spider - Not a Spider Monkey? And aren't Spiders Arthropods, not Mammals? Shome mishtake, shorely.

Rothe - A kind of subterranean ox which lives on fungi.

Sleek - A sort of big weasel which can sever arteries with its teeth, causing foes to bleed to death with surprising speed.

Stench Kow - Lower planar cattle, which smell very bad. As opposed to the normal kind, which smell, er, nice. The plural of Stench Kow is 'Kine'.

Taer - More 'vile primates'.

Tyrg - A tiger-dog crossbreed. Tog, surely. Or Diger?

Yeah, there's an amazing number of weird creatures hiding in amongst the supposedly normal animals. Many of them got proper write-ups the previous edition. Another victim of their desire to fit in as much as possible. They'd make good alternatives for the usual goblinoids and other low-level foes.

The Last Conformist

12-23-2008 12:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monstrous Manual
Mammals are the most common of the vertebrate.

There's about twice as many species of birds as of mammals, and about trice again as many of ray-finned fish.

Slightly less pedantically, there's no explicit restriction that the "minimal" and "giant" templates only apply to mammals of this entry. This opens the prospect of giant humans as distinct from giants, as well as giant giants, minimal giants, minimal giant wolves, etc etc ...

JRM

12-23-2008 01:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Mammal

The Mammal entries seem to have been written by the usual crew, rather than PETA girl - thank the lord. They are deathly dull, although there are one or two instances of weirdness.

The mammal entries is another set of monsters that really suffer for lack of space. Many of the mammals desperately need more info. If you're familiar with earlier D&D monster books or the real-life animals it's usually not so bad, although some of the 'real life' info is a little bizarre.

I can recognize quite a few monsters from AD&D campaigns - Chatur's are from Spelljammer, Debbi from Al-Qadim, Hsing-Sing from Oriental Adventures et cetera.

By the way, have you looked at the illustration? It shows a carnivorous ape or gorilla who looks like King Kong's little cousin standing behind a warthog and a squirrel. The great ape and the warthog look in scale, but the squirrel is the size of a small dog, not to mention that squirrels are under a different entry - Mammal, small. Maybe it's supposed to be a Chatur?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Ape, Carnivorous - Good buddies of hobgoblins; I suspect that your liking for these will directly correlate to your liking for pulp fantasy.

Well since I have a liking for pulp fantasy naturally I love carnivorous apes - although I remember them as Ape, giant carnivorous. Here's the first casualty of the size cut, since the poor things have lost their rend special attack. How are they going to tear player characters limb from limb without it?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Banderlog - A Baboon with green skin which throws coconuts (1d4+1 damage, making them more deadly than a dagger) and 'retch fruit'.

Banderlogs are actually alien baboon-analogues who've escaped from a menagerie aboard a crashed spaceship. See Expedition to the Barrier Peaks if you don't believe me. That's where retch fruit and the trees they grow on come from too. I assume the 1d4+1 damage for coconuts includes the banderlog's Strength bonus. If not, my thieves are immediately going to replace their throwing dagger bandoliers with strings of nuts!

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Bhaergala - A mysterious 'beast' which drops down on people from above and can turn spells; there is no description of its physical appearance.

A Bhaergala is from Ed Greenwood's Forgotten realms and looks like a cross between a wolf and a tiger. You can see 3rd edition stats for one on Enworld's Creature Catalog here. They also regenerate, speak Common, are expert mimics and ventriloquists, love music and collect musical instruments (and sometimes musicians!). Obviously, they needed a full write-up.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Cooshee - An elven dog, which unfortunately doesn't have its own language like the elven cats. We all know felines are more intelligent anyway.

These first appeared in the supplement to Gyax's The Lost Caverns of Tsojcanth and are big, fluffy and cute. The last time my players met some they were a version bred by evil elves - still big, fluffy and cute, but murderous!

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Monkey Spider - Not a Spider Monkey? And aren't Spiders Arthropods, not Mammals? Shome mishtake, shorely.

More like shome really bad pun on spider monkeys. I can't help imagining some villain exploiting their ability to automatically bite an opponent on the eye. E.g. Black Pete the werebat empties a sack of Monkey Spiders over his foes and slits a couple of throats while they're all clutching their faces crying "My Eyes! My Eyes!!"

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9759008)

Sleek - A sort of big weasel which can sever arteries with its teeth, causing foes to bleed to death with surprising speed.

I found this really confusing because the description* led me to imagine an ermine, i.e. a ten inch long white furred stoat, with AC 3, Mv 36", HD 2+1, Attacks 1-4/1-4/2-12 and special abilities of surprise and ripping open its foes veins. I'm imagining them as a kind of Killer Rabbit of Caerbannog monster. "Ah, look at the cute lil white fluffy thing ... Arrr! Arrgh! Get it off!! Get It Off!!!!". I fear the original version is less amusing.

Sleek: This ermine-like mammal surprises opponents on 1-5 on 1d6. On an attack roll of 19 or 20, the sleek opens a major vein, causing 2d6 points of damage. Every round thereafter, the victim suffers 1d6 more points damage until the wound is wrapped with a tourniquet, direct pressure, or magical healing.

Multi-Pass

12-23-2008 01:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9759370)

Slightly less pedantically, there's no explicit restriction that the "minimal" and "giant" templates only apply to mammals of this entry. This opens the prospect of giant humans as distinct from giants, as well as giant giants, minimal giants, minimal giant wolves, etc etc ...

"By the thundering thrones of my ancestors, how many times must I explain this? I'm not a human. I'm a minimal storm giant. Get it right!"

JRM

12-23-2008 01:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Multi-Pass (Post 9759548)

"By the thundering thrones of my ancestors, how many times must I explain this? I'm not a human. I'm a minimal storm giant. Get it right!"

Pull the other one son, a minimal Storm giant would still be thirteen feet tall (half a Storm Giant's 26'), not easy to mistake for a human. A minimal Ogre though, they'd look a lot like a brutish human.

(That's for 2nd edition AD&D of course, the giants were smaller in 1st edition so a minimal Storm Giant might just be small enough to look like a really really big human following the original MM1 & 2.)

Sleeper

12-23-2008 01:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Chattur - A small rodent-like animal which is also known as a "space bandit". That really doesn't sound like a high fantasy term.

Obvious reference to the movie Office Space and the satire of the "rat race". Which is conclusive proof that the author was a time traveler.

Quote:

Porcupine - Can't shoot quills, which is a bit rubbish.

Beware it's more aggressive cousin, the chain gatling-gun porcupine with armor-piercing adamantine-tipped quills.

Quote:

Stench Kow - Lower planar cattle, which smell very bad. As opposed to the normal kind, which smell, er, nice. The plural of Stench Kow is 'Kine'.

. Which is also the plural of the regular version. Though the picture in the original MM2 looked more like a bison than a cow.

Vultur10

12-23-2008 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Taer are from Dragonlance. They were in the Dragonlance Bestiary, with the Yeti as a cold-environment subspecies.

"Kine" is indeed a (fairly archaic/poetic, or at least obscure) word for "cows", which has the advantage of not implying female gender.

Banderlogs - cool. I need to hunt up a copy of Barrier Peaks. I don't suppose it's online anywhere?

Weasels! They left out the part about weasels being the deadly foes of basilisks!

Wakshaani

12-23-2008 07:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Also, note that Goat is in teh Mammal section, which includes Giant mammals, so, you CAN, in fact, stat out your Stone Giant's Giant Goat.

They were thinkin'!

Zartes

12-23-2008 09:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9759135)
So how does the tarrasque tie into this? This seems like perfect material for that epic thread.

perhaps the Tarrasque is the Hub? Perhaps a Tarrasque is what you get if you destroy all the trolls belonging to a given Hub, and it has to go looking for food on its own (cue the creation of the "Society from the Preservation of Trolls")

Sleeper

12-23-2008 09:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9760329)

Taer are from Dragonlance. They were in the Dragonlance Bestiary, with the Yeti as a cold-environment subspecies.

They may have been in Dragonlance, but I don't think they were from Dragonlance. They date back at least to the original MM2 (1983).

Quote:

Banderlogs - cool. I need to hunt up a copy of Barrier Peaks. I don't suppose it's online anywhere?

$4.95 at OBS

Zartes

12-23-2008 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9760329)

Taer are from Dragonlance. They were in the Dragonlance Bestiary, with the Yeti as a cold-environment subspecies.

in 3.X they can be found (as a PC race, no less) in the more north-easterly portions of Forgotten Realms. Only example I've found of a medium-sized critter of the giant type.

sim_james

12-23-2008 03:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9761959)

Only example I've found of a medium-sized critter of the giant type.

Dragonlance had a couple too, IIRC. Irda aren't exactly ginormous.

Anybody got the stats for a minimal giant space hamster?

noisms

12-25-2008 01:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mammal, Herd

This entry contains rules for camels, cattle, buffalo, antelopes and sheep. Pedants will be aware that the picture actually depicts a bison, not a buffalo, but hey, what's a little nitpicking between friends? The entry is about as interesting as it sounds, but it does at least contain rules for stampeding and spit attacks, and also points out that animal droppings can be used to make fire. Bonus points for anybody who's seen that used in a game.

Mammal, Small

The Small Mammals are definitely the least interesting MM entry, because the designers didn't even bother throwing in mythical versions like they did in the 'proper' Mammals section - except for something called a 'Giant Black Squirrel' which lives in 'evil dominated forests' and steals shiny items.

I'm hard pressed to find anything else to comment on for the Mammals. Proper monster entries will resume after Christmas..

Kakita Kojiro

12-25-2008 01:37 AM

I actually used the Giant Black Squirrels, in a Dragonlance after-the-war campaign. They infested the Forest of Wayreth and became the nemeses of the kender (who had the most shiny items to steal, obviously). The other players judged them "annoying, but not as annoying as kender".

... I shoulda given 'em a spit attack, though. Missed opportunity. tsk.

Sleeper

12-25-2008 01:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9767545)

Pedants will be aware that the picture actually depicts a bison, not a buffalo, but hey, what's a little nitpicking between friends?

Actually, I don't have a problem with that. "Buffalo" is a colloquial name for the American bison, which is perfectly valid in general usage. When discussing the phylogenetic grouping, might as well use the precise terminology that the ICZN hammered out, which does a very good job of removing any ambiguity: Call American "buffalo" Bison bison and the rest of the "buffalos" Bubalus. The mountain lion isn't a lion either, but the name's still at least as common as "cougar" or "puma".

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9767545)

The Small Mammals are definitely the least interesting MM entry, because the designers didn't even bother throwing in mythical versions like they did in the 'proper' Mammals section - except for something called a 'Giant Black Squirrel' which lives in 'evil dominated forests' and steals shiny items.

Sounds like a perfect opportunity for a splatbook, featuring razor squirrels that scramble up humanoids as easily as trees and then rip out their throats, hypershrews that attack in a berserk fury until their hearts explode, corrupted (i.e. half-cobra) mongeese, and, of course, pika-, pika-, Pikachu! (the half-lightning elemental gerbil).

demiurge1138

12-25-2008 02:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9767664)

Sounds like a perfect opportunity for a splatbook, featuring razor squirrels that scramble up humanoids as easily as trees and then rip out their throats, hypershrews that attack in a berserk fury until their hearts explode, corrupted (i.e. half-cobra) mongeese, and, of course, pika-, pika-, Pikachu! (the half-lightning elemental gerbil).

Why do you think 3e introduced the shocker lizard? Not nearly as cute as a Pikachu, but same idea.

Oh, and I'm currently playing a druid with a bison animal companion. He's surprisingly deadly.

Sleeper

12-25-2008 04:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9767716)

Why do you think 3e introduced the shocker lizard? Not nearly as cute as a Pikachu, but same idea.

Now you're tempting me to stat up a 3E paragon animal of legend shocker lizard with some kind of demonic template and call it Pikazuzu, the Demon Lord of Gerbils (and AEDs).

JRM

12-25-2008 04:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9767545)

Mammal, Herd

This entry contains rules for camels, cattle, buffalo, antelopes and sheep. Pedants will be aware that the picture actually depicts a bison, not a buffalo, but hey, what's a little nitpicking between friends? The entry is about as interesting as it sounds, but it does at least contain rules for stampeding and spit attacks, and also points out that animal droppings can be used to make fire. Bonus points for anybody who's seen that used in a game.

Now I wonder why they make cattle and buffalo Semi-intelligent (2-4) when most mammals are Animal-intelligent (1)? I can understand AD&D making bears, elephants and wolves Semi-intelligent, they're pretty smart animals, but cows? They're hardly the sharpest tools in the box.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9767545)

Mammal, Small

The Small Mammals are definitely the least interesting MM entry, because the designers didn't even bother throwing in mythical versions like they did in the 'proper' Mammals section - except for something called a 'Giant Black Squirrel' which lives in 'evil dominated forests' and steals shiny items.

You omitted the only details that would be of interest to some players how much they're worth. Hmm, a woodchuck pelt's worth one gold piece, I must remember that. Never mind how much wood it can chuck, let's skin the varmint! Giant otter pelt's are worth 1000-4000, that's pretty good, although they're pretty tough - 5 HD and 3-18 damage bite, they must have really sharp teeth.

demiurge1138

12-25-2008 06:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9768125)

Now you're tempting me to stat up a 3E paragon animal of legend shocker lizard with some kind of demonic template and call it Pikazuzu, the Demon Lord of Gerbils (and AEDs).

When I was a wee nipper, I wrote up a netbook full of 3.0 monsters, spells and magic items. One of them was Pikachu as a tanar'ri demon (demons are immune to electricity, after all). Much later, in my epic level game, the demon-worshipping barbarian was bound to a Pika-demon, because it amused Demogorgon immensely.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9768132)

Giant otter pelt's are worth 1000-4000, that's pretty good, although they're pretty tough - 5 HD and 3-18 damage bite, they must have really sharp teeth.

I wouldn't want to fight a giant otter. They'd probably grab you, lay your head on their fluffy bellies, then crack open your skull with a rock. And look adorable doing it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9768356)

I wouldn't want to fight a giant otter. They'd probably grab you, lay your head on their fluffy bellies, then crack open your skull with a rock. And look adorable doing it.

I never thought that giant otters were as cute as sea otters, but they're still rather cute really. And while they don't crack open shells with rocks, they do hunt in packs, and well enough that they're often called "river wolves".

Mind you, I'm not really convinced that D&D "giant otters" are actually supposed to be, you know, giant otters as opposed to one of the other otters with a "giant" template applied. Or maybe you take the giant otter and apply a "minimal" template to get one of the other otters?

JRM

12-26-2008 02:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9768863)

I never thought that giant otters were as cute as sea otters, but they're still rather cute really. And while they don't crack open shells with rocks, they do hunt in packs, and well enough that they're often called "river wolves".

Mind you, I'm not really convinced that D&D "giant otters" are actually supposed to be, you know, giant otters as opposed to one of the other otters with a "giant" template applied. Or maybe you take the giant otter and apply a "minimal" template to get one of the other otters?

Well the giant otter stats don't necessarily match up with a regular otter with the giant mammal template. The 2nd ed MM gives the various otters these stats:

Otter HD 1-1; AC 5; #Enc 1-4; Atks 1@1-2; Mv 12/Sw18; XP 7

Otter (sea) HD 1+1; AC 5; #Enc 1-4; Atks 1@1-3; Mv 12/Sw18; XP 35

Otter (giant) HD 5; AC 5; #Enc 2-5; Atks 1@3-18; Mv 9/Sw18; XP 175

While the Giant Mammal template says:

Giant Mammals: Giant mammals are double-sized breeds of otherwise normal animals. They have the same physical and behavioral traits of their full-sized relatives. These giants generally have double the number of Hit Dice, a corresponding rise in THACO, a -2 AC bonus, and a +2 Morale bonus. The damage caused by the attacks of a giant mammal is twice that of the full-sized relative.

Apply those rules to the above stats and we get:

Giant Otter HD 2-2; AC 3; #Enc 1-4; Atks 1@1-4; Mv 12/Sw18;

Giant Otter (sea) HD 2+2; AC 3; #Enc 1-4; Atks 1@1-6; Mv 12/Sw18;

Giant Otter (giant) HD 10; AC 3; #Enc 2-5; Atks 1@6-36; Mv 9/Sw18;

I don't have a 2nd edition DMG within easy reach to work out the XP.

You can see that a Giant Otter has quite different stats from an Otter (giant), the Otter (giant) has more Hit Dice, although admittedly the Giant Mammal text says it generally has double the hit dice, not always, but it also does greater damage and has an inferior AC.

But then, that's par for the course for giant animals. Its like Dire Animals in 3rd edition, there isn't a consistent rule for converting the one to the other.

Wakboth

12-26-2008 04:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Applied mammalogy and otterism! :D

noisms

12-26-2008 07:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Manscorpion

I sometimes wonder if staunchly old school feminist D&D players get annoyed at creature names like 'manscorpion'? I suppose there aren't actually very many old school feminist role players out there, but I still like to imagine a circa-1970 Germaine Greer-type figure pounding her fist on the table, sending d20s, pencils and character sheets flying, while yelling, "It's humanscorpion, dammit!"

Anyway, Manscorpions are pretty cool, in my opinion. They're the classic example of a monster which could play a big role in a campaign setting, if only you could be bothered. In fact, and I don't know if I'm alone in this, but I think they have a real 'original races' vibe to them; they could be the desert-based part of the aarocokra-lizardman-bullywug axis, inhabitants of a debased society still living in the delapidated ruins of their former civilisation. I especially like the idea of an underground city, with chasms like inverted pyramids and pits instead of buildings. That's just crying out to be a secret realm hidden underneath a thought-to-be-abandoned old city in the dunes.

In a spirit of fairness I also have to speak up for the picture, which is very evocative and one of the better non-Diterlizzi pieces.

Wakshaani

12-26-2008 08:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

You didn't give us info, tho, just plot seeds!

Boo, booooooooo...

YojimboC

12-27-2008 06:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9771381)

In fact, and I don't know if I'm alone in this, but I think they have a real 'original races' vibe to them;

Scorpion men feature in the epic of Gilgamesh. They're guarding the gate to the land of darkness or some such. Bas-reliefs show them with big Sheddu-style beards and bows.

Quote:

In a spirit of fairness I also have to speak up for the picture, which is very evocative and one of the better non-Diterlizzi pieces.

Mark Nelson, if I'm not mistaken. Same guy who did the Crabman illo. My favorite MM artist, ever.

6inTruder

12-27-2008 07:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9771381)

Manscorpion Anyway, Manscorpions are pretty cool, in my opinion. They're the classic example of a monster which could play a big role in a campaign setting, if only you could be bothered. In fact, and I don't know if I'm alone in this, but I think they have a real 'original races' vibe to them; they could be the desert-based part of the aarocokra-lizardman-bullywug axis, inhabitants of a debased society still living in the delapidated ruins of their former civilisation. I especially like the idea of an underground city, with chasms like inverted pyramids and pits instead of buildings. That's just crying out to be a secret realm hidden underneath a thought-to-be-abandoned old city in the dunes.

From wikipedia: These were her [Tiamat's] own offspring: giant sea serpents, storm demons, fish-men, scorpion-men and many others.

Just thought that was a cool reference that'll come up if I ever get my own game running.

Quote:

In a spirit of fairness I also have to speak up for the picture, which is very evocative and one of the better non-Diterlizzi pieces.

And this. Yeah, I'm not too big a fan of that picture. But I also like my hybrids to look more like what they're hybrids of. Which is totally just me!

Ooh! Old school Scorpion-dude! From an old D&D arcade game I think.

The second one is small, but more how I see them.

edit: One more, which is a bit easier on the eyes (if not the best pic. He looks kinda bored honestly).

sim_james

12-27-2008 10:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've even played a scorpionperson (in a fairly free-wheeling Runequest game). The intimidation factor of a stinger should not be underestimated! People fear that thing!

Kakita Kojiro

12-27-2008 10:15 AM

Dude, that's RuneQuest. Ducks with spears are fearsome opponents in RuneQuest. Heck, trollkin rather infamously take out Rune Lords with some regularity.

Saying that people feared the stinger is a tad misleading. You could've been armed with looseleaf paper and they would've feared the papercut. ;)

Plus, they were probably afraid you'd consume them and turn them into chaos monsters. Gloranthan scorpionmen are wonderfully creepy, and like most all Gloranthan beasties, much more fleshed out conceptually than their typical D&D counterpart.

Lee Casebolt

12-27-2008 02:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9772306)

Scorpion men feature in the epic of Gilgamesh. They're guarding the gate to the land of darkness or some such. Bas-reliefs show them with big Shedu-style beards and bows.

And they were totally sweet in the one issue of Arak: Son of Thunder I used to own. Which, not coincidentally, recapped the Epic of Gilgamesh.

sim_james

12-27-2008 05:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9772706)

Plus, they were probably afraid you'd consume them and turn them into chaos monsters. Gloranthan scorpionmen are wonderfully creepy, and like most all Gloranthan beasties, much more fleshed out conceptually than their typical D&D counterpart.

I spent a lot of time impressing my cohort with the fact that I was not a chaosmonster apt to explode into meaningless fury and tear shreds of their flesh from their backs just to wrap the skin around my wrists, rub the still-warm fat on my chest, and paint my face with their blood.

For example.

I wouldn't do any of that stuff.

noisms

12-27-2008 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9772373)

edit: One more, which is a bit easier on the eyes (if not the best pic. He looks kinda bored honestly).

He does look kind of lacklustre, but much more scorpion-like. Not sure I'm a fan of the blue skin, though. For some reason I associate blue (and green) tones with spider people. Scorpion people should have more of a red/black/yellow vibe.

6inTruder

12-27-2008 11:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9773577)

He does look kind of lacklustre, but much more scorpion-like. Not sure I'm a fan of the blue skin, though. For some reason I associate blue (and green) tones with spider people. Scorpion people should have more of a red/black/yellow vibe.

I like how he's conjured up this HUGE storm for some (probably sinister) purpose, but his face just reads like he'd rather be back in his hole reading something.

Also, blue-black is totally a scorpion colour. Like emperor scorpions.

JRM

12-28-2008 12:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9771445)
You didn't give us info, tho, just plot seeds!

Boo, booooooooo...

I agree with the sentiment, but you can just look over here and read the manscorpion's MM entry.

Hmm... there are some interesting bits and pieces.

Firstly, the picture may not look much like a scorpion, but it's a good match with the description and is pretty creepy-looking. Kudos to the artist!

Quote:

The origins of these creatures is thought to lie in an ancient curse placed on evil humans.

Oh good grief, not another one. What kind of curses are these supposed to be? "We're horrible evil folks, so the gods punish us by making us even tougher and nastier!" Why don't they start blessing good humans to make them handsome, powerful creatures - or is that where Shedu and Lammasu come from? "I appreciate you're gift, Oh Divine One, but wouldn't we be more effective servants of goodness if we had hands?"

I like the description of the manscorpion's venom, it gives them a few rounds to do something to help the afflicted, or an opportunity to panic and shout "what do you mean you didn't prepare Neutralize Poison today!"

Quote:

Anyone struck by the tail's spur must make a successful saving throw vs. poison or die in 2d4 rounds. Victims suffer weakness for one round (-2 attack penalty), start to shake in the next round (-3 attack penalty and no Dexterity bonus to AC), then convulse (AC 10 and no attacks possible) until they die.

JRM

12-28-2008 12:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9773882)
I like how he's conjured up this HUGE storm for some (probably sinister) purpose, but his face just reads like he'd rather be back in his hole reading something.

Well, in the original myths scorpion men were immortal, giving them endless opportunities to get bored out of their skulls. Maybe he's thinking "Ho-hum, another day another Control Weather and Meteor Storm to crush a human civilization like ants beneath my claws."

Oh, and thanks 6intruder for that picture of an Akkadian scorpionman carving. Now all my scorpionmen are going to carry bows and arrows poisoned with their own venom, just to be authentic you understand.:D

By the way, you can download that Orc's Head sourcebook from Wizards' website here. Scroll down to the "Savage Coast Campaign Setting". It includes rules for playing manscorpions in AD&D. Here's the most interesting chunks of relevant text:

Quote:

Manscorpions

Present day Nimmurians are manscorpions who usurped the land from its previous occupants, a race of winged minotaurs (enduks). The current Nimmurians are vicious, ruthless, conniving creatures filled with hatred. Pity and remorse are unknown to them. They crave the sun but they also fear it, for, due to Ixion's curse, the sun incinerates them if they are not protected from it. Ruled by an overking but split into several dominions or city-states, the manscorpions are in constant strife for personal and regional power.

Appearance: Manscorpions have a human torso and a bony-plated, arachnoid body with eight legs. Their spines stretch out to form a long tail with a wicked stinger on the end of it. Their hands have two thick fingers and a long thumb, giving them the appearance of a scorpion's claws. Though bald, they wear elaborate wigs of shoulder-length dark hair and beards (for the males). These are styled into elaborate, curled rows. The wigs are easily kept coiffured and were based upon the styles popular with the enduks.

They used to be relatively dark skinned, with sandy-colored tails and lower bodies, but their long tenure underground and the curse imposed upon them by Ixion has turned them horribly translucent, so that their black hearts, ichor, and internal organs now show through in a repulsive vision of nature gone awry. This is not usually apparent to other races because the Nimmurians cover their bodies with a thick makeup to protect themselves from the lethal effect of the sun. Makeup ranges from brown for the lower castes, to red for warriors, and gold with embellishments for the nobility. Priests usually cover their entire bodies with silver runes over black makeup, without which they couldn't cast spells under the sun. When outside, all manscorpions wear masks featuring monstrous grimaces. The masks provide a visor and dark lenses to protect their fragile eyes.

Clothing (usually thin wool) and armor are designed to be worn over the makeup. Most manscorpions wear elaborate shawls or tunics edged with fringes. Filets to keep their elaborate hair in place are popular for both males and females, as are necklaces, earrings, armbands, and bracelets.

Personality: Manscorpions are greedy, self-serving, and brutal. From the enduks they acquired a veneer of civilization, but the curse that afflicts them made them a paranoid, secretive, and frustrated race. They fear to let others know of their vulnerability to sunlight, though they crave its warmth and illumination. They are warlike and care little for the lives or comfort of others.

