Manscorpions are usually neutral and evil in alignment, though some few have a personal code of honor or still worship Idu (Ixion). It is not impossible to find ones such as these who are both lawful and good, it is simply unusual. Though they often appear aloof or reserved, a fierce, angry spirit forms the core of every manscorpion, and competition and aggression burn brightly in each heart. The best of them use these traits to perform great deeds, while the worst give way to their basest instincts.

Lifestyle: To some extent, the manscorpions' lifestyle is dictated by the curse laid upon them by Idu when they drove out the enduks. The Immortal made sunlight excruciatingly painful for them. Normal clothing is insufficient to stop the curse's effects. Only protective makeup and armor can shield them from the deadly rays and the pain. Direct sunlight blinds them unless they wear dark lenses to protect their eyes. Artificial light doesn't affect them.

Because they must constantly shield themselves from the sun, most manscorpions live underground. The cities of the enduks lie atop vast underground networks of manscorpion tunnels, pits, and chasms. Only those manscorpions who have business in the overcities reside there, and even they usually have retreats below ground.

On the surface, manscorpion cities consist of a great many mud brick houses, storehouses, slave quarters, and shops that lie at the feet of a grand palace, a series of monuments (some ruins, some intact), and a great ziggurat that serves as a place of worship. The ziggurat is usually decorated with several colors and has green trees and gardens on some of its levels. Many manscorpions live in these overdwelling, and most visitors assume that the surface picture of the city is the true one. In fact, the surface city usually only holds a fraction of the manscorpion population of the city. The majority of them live in the vast caverns underneath the structures. These are reached by tunnels and sloping ramps constructed under the houses and shops, the palace and the ziggurat. Visitors are discouraged from enquiring too closely about the interiors of these structures in order to keep the underground section of the city secret.

The manscorpions employ large numbers of slaves for raising food, manufacturing fine oils and perfumes, and tending sheep. Manscorpions are omnivorous. Though they prefer meat when available, they can survive on carrion, if necessary. They are soldiers, artists, traders, administrators, and seekers of ancient knowledge - most particularly of lore regarding the ancient star devices, weapons of potentially great destruction, found in many Nimmurian cities. Though not quite as likely to be in positions of authority, a good number of female manscorpions rule dominions and serve as priests, administrators, or troop commanders.

6inTruder

12-28-2008 12:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Wicked! My tlincallis are going to be Tiamat worshipers, but there's some cool stuff there.

Also, anyone have a better idea how those underground upside-down cities'd look??? I just can't pictue them. Like, if they're just upside-down in giant caverns then it just feels kinda silly and lame; but making it all ampitheatre-esque just lacks the grandure of huge ziggurats.

Kakita Kojiro

12-28-2008 01:58 AM

Huh, I'd forgotten their other name, but: anyone know where tlincalli came from? Actual Aztec myth, or something pseudo-Aztec like Ixitchitl?

JRM

12-28-2008 05:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9773975)

Wicked! My tlincallis are going to be Tiamat worshipers, but there's some cool stuff there.

Also, anyone have a better idea how those underground upside-down cities'd look??? I just can't pictue them. Like, ij they're just upside-down in giant caverns then it just feels kinda silly and lame; but making it all ampitheatre-esque just lacks the grandure of huge ziggurats.

Well the only canon D&D inverted ziggurat I can think of offhand is the one in White Plume Mountain, but I don't think that's what you were aiming at.;

JRM

12-28-2008 05:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9774079)

Huh, I'd forgotten their other name, but: anyone know where tlincalli came from? Actual Aztec myth, or something pseudo-Aztecy like Ixitachitl?

I suspect it's from the grand country of "we made something up 'cause it sounded cool".

Hold on, I'll do a quick glance around the internet...

...well then only mention of tlincalli I could find were all D&D references, so it looks like an original name. They can't all be mythic beasts like heucivas.

If you fancy giving them a historical name, Wikipedia says the Akkadians called scorpion men aqrabuamelu or girtablilu, although to me those sound more like made-up monster names than tlincalli does!

Kakita Kojiro

12-28-2008 09:52 AM

Well, girtab-lillû just means "scorpion-man"; girtab-liltû would be "scorpion-woman". IIRC, there were also ku-lillû ("fish-man"), and lion-men too... um... (googles), apparently those were urmah-lillû.

But I hadn't known of an Aztec/mesoamerican scorpion-man tradition. And the only Nahuatl glossary I have doesn't have "scorpion" listed. tch.

JRM

12-28-2008 09:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9774929)

*Well, girtab-lillû just means "scorpion-man"; girtab-liltû would be "scorpion-woman". IIRC, there were also ku-lillû ("fish-man"), and lion-men too... um... (googles), apparently those were urmah-lillû.*

But I hadn't known of an Aztec/mesoamerican scorpion-man tradition. And the only Nahuatl glossary I have doesn't have "scorpion" listed. tch.

According to this webpage, Scorpion is "Colotl" in Nahuatl.

Since "human" is "Tlacatl" does that mean a "Scorpion Human" is a Colotl-tlacatl or a Tlacatl-colotl?

noisms

12-28-2008 10:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9775783)
According to this webpage, Scorpion is "Colotl" in Nahuatl.

Since "human" is "Tlacatl" does that mean a "Scorpion Human" is a Colotl-tlacatl or a Tlacatl-colotl?

Where are those Nahuatl speakers when you need them?

There are quite a few living in California I hear. Some of them must be roleplayers.

The Last Conformist

12-29-2008 12:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The -tl at the end of many Nahuatl words is an ending that would presumably not be duplicated in compounding, so perhaps colo-tlacatl or tlaca-colotl.

JRM

12-29-2008 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9776075)
The -tl at the end of many Nahuatl words is an ending that would presumably not be duplicated in compounding, so perhaps colo-tlacatl or tlaca-colotl.

Ta Conformist, I half-suspected the ending would be dropped. I think I prefer the ring of Tlacacolotl better than Colotlacatl. It sounds like a manscorpion could "say" Tlacacolotl just by snapping its chitinous fingers.

Hmm, maybe that's how manscorpions talk? Then if you want to learn how to communicate with one in its own language, you have to be a master of playing the zill (aka finger cymbals). Maybe that tinker gnome with the clicker and clacker can speak Manscorpion as well as Hook Horror.

Kakita Kojiro

12-29-2008 02:29 AM

Even odder, in the glossary I have and several others googled... "calli-" means "house". "tlin-" doesn't show up in any of 'em.

So it's probably pseudo-nahuatl, since it seems unlikely you'd refer to a monster as a <something>house.

Vultur10

12-29-2008 04:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9776305)

Even odder, in the glossary I have and several others googled... "calli-" means "house". "tlin-" doesn't show up in any of 'em.

So it's probably pseudo-nahuatl, since it seems unlikely you'd refer to a monster as a <something>house.

Unless it means "house-destroyer" or something.

Kakita Kojiro

12-29-2008 06:19 AM

As far as I know, in Nahuatl, the modifier comes first in compound words. (E.g., Nezhucoyotl - "hungry coyote", Quetzalcoatl - "feathered serpent"). Ergo, <something>house.

Not beyond the realm of possibility -- we use "brick house" to describe something other than a house, occasionally. But unlikely that the Aztecs had the Commodores.

noisms

12-29-2008 08:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Manticore

Manticores always put me in mind of an anti-Santa Claus, which makes them a fitting entry for this time of year. A jolly old fellow with a big white beard, except the beard isn't white, it's grey, and he isn't jolly, he's mean...and he has THE BODY OF A LION AND BIG BAT'S WINGS!!!!

Manticores' best trick is to fire spikes from their tails, which doesn't say a whole lot for the monster when you think about it - especially since the spikes only do 1-6 points of damage and aren't poisonous, which surely they should be. They also can't be ridden, which isn't much fun at all. (There is basically no point in trying to domesticate a Manticore, because adults have an 80% chance of reverting to a wild state. 80%!) Maybe I was spoiled by Warhammer and Fighting Fantasy manticores, which I think could be ridden (though don't quote me on that).

Manticores will cooperate with evil humanoids, though, which means that they can end up with magical bracelets and collars to turn them into proper killing machines. This would be a nice surprise to spring on an overconfident mid-level party of adventurers.

The pelt of a Manticore, with wings, is worth 10,000 gp - not bad work if you can get it.

Wakboth

12-29-2008 09:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Manticore's a kind of underutilized monster; I think it may be in part because the art in 2e MM is pretty weak. I'd really like to see a DiTerlizzi manticore... (Also, I'm one of the people who liked the 3e MM manticore pic, which seems to be almost universally disliked.)

And IIRC, manticores were really ornery critters in Warhammer, as well, and went on murderous rampages if the rider was killed, or if they failed leadership checks, and so on.

JasonK

12-30-2008 12:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9778730)

I'd really like to see a DiTerlizzi manticore... (Also, I'm one of the people who liked the 3e MM manticore pic, which seems to be almost universally disliked.)

Then you have already seen and enjoyed a DiTerlizzi manticore pic. :)

http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/MM...MM35_PG180.jpg

And now you've done it again!

~ Jason

demiurge1138

12-30-2008 12:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I'm a big fan of manticores. They make for a good mid-level monster, sniping across the battlefield with their tail spikes, then diving in for a good scrum. And 2e flavor-text be damned. Manticores are there to be ridden by evil humanoids.

Like Patrick Swayze, the goblin. I don't know why he was dubbed Patrick Swayze, but he was damn near unkillable. During a big ol' goblin fight, that little bastard avoided every hit, tripped our giant half-orc barbarian and crittalled him twice whilst standing on his chest, passed every Reflex save, escaped when we started just magic missleing him by climbing a sixty-foot high wall, jumping onto a manticore's back and riding to freedom.

He later returned, riding a chimera. And we kicked his ass effortlessly. Should have stuck to the manticore.

The Last Conformist

12-30-2008 05:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

ObEtymology: The word "manticore" arose by scribal corruption of Greek martikhoras, in turn almost certainly derived from the Old Persian for "man-eater".

demiurge1138

12-30-2008 05:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've heard it said that the manticore comes from garbled tales of tigers reaching Greece. I find this one more unlikely than the connection between griffins and Protoceratops skeletons, or between leucrotta and hyenas. Those tale-tellers must not have been paying very much attention!

The Last Conformist

12-30-2008 06:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9780359)

I've heard it said that the manticore comes from garbled tales of tigers reaching Greece.

Pausanias thought so back in the 2nd century AD:

Quote:

The beast described by Ctesias in his Indian history, which he says is called martichoras by the Indians and "man-eater" by the Greeks, I am inclined to think is the tiger. But that it has three rows of teeth along each jaw and spikes at the tip of its tail with which it defends itself at close quarters, while it hurls them like an archer's arrows at more distant enemies; all this is, I think, a false story that the Indians pass on from one to another owing to their excessive dread of the beast.

Myself, I incline to think the martikhoras corresponds to no real animal at all. I'm generally deeply suspicious of supposed explanations of mysterious events or things that can't be shown to have happened or existed in the first place.

It doesn't get any better when we note that Ctesias probably never visited India himself, and his account is chokeful with absurdities.

YojimboC

12-30-2008 12:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I always kind of liked the manticore. The three rows of teeth thing is just so weird to think about... that jaw must be huge!

Although it may be unwise to admit this, I read A Spell for Chameleon as a young lad, and the cover had a wicked looking manticore on it with a huge scorpion tail.

But the spike flinging thing is deadly. Sure, they only do 1D6 damage, but they can fire up to 6 spikes in a volley. Six dice of damage in the face from 180 yards away is nothing to sneeze at.

Äkräs

12-30-2008 03:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9780359)

I've heard it said that the manticore comes from garbled tales of tigers reaching Greece. I find this one more unlikely than the connection between griffins and Protoceratops skeletons, or between leucrotta and hyenas.

I'm skeptical, too. At the time there was still a strongish population of asiatic lions in the Middle East so there's no really good reason why the tales would get garbled as the lions would give a conceptual reference for big cat predators.

kelvingreen

12-30-2008 06:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9773955)

By the way, you can download that Orc's Head sourcebook from Wizards' website here. Scroll down to the "Savage Coast Campaign Setting". It includes rules for playing manscorpions in AD&D. Here's the most interesting chunks of relevant text:

I love the bit about the wigs and false beards. Also the "dark lenses to protect their fragile eyes".

"Eeek! A manscorpion!"

"Shhh! I am in disguise!"

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9778609)

Maybe I was spoiled by Warhammer and Fighting Fantasy manticores, which I think could be ridden (though don't quote me on that).

There's nothing in Out of the Pit about riding manticores, and they are described as having "a hatred for all life", so I suspect it's unlikely that they could be tamed. That's not to say that a manticore can't be ridden in one of the individual gamebooks, however.

Hellzon

12-30-2008 07:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Someone on the 4E design team agrees with you guys about riding - a 4E manticores even gets a bonus to its spike attacks if it has a rider. And it has one of the better illustrations in the 4E MM too.

noisms

12-31-2008 07:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Medusa

We all know what a Medusa is - you've seen Clash of the Titans, after all. What, you haven't? Do so at once. The first and most obvious thing to say about them is that they're instakill heaven, possessing not one but two attacks which can put an immediate end to an adventurer's life. The first is the poisonous bites of their snake hair. The second is the famous petrification gaze.

The mirror scene from the myth of Perseus, when the eponymous hero angles a mirror so that he can look at the medusa directly without suffering ill effect, is one of the most famous in Greek legend. Oddly, the D&D version makes no reference to such ingenious uses of reflective surfaces - instead relying on the hoary old "if she looks into a mirror she turns into stone herself!" routine. Isn't that Basilisks? I think the D&D version of the medusa is notably diminished in the terror factor by this twisting of the myth; it can be defeated or neutralised far too easily for my tastes.

I also find it unusual that Medusa should be Lawful Evil in alignment. They seem classically Chaotic Evil to me - being unpredictable, solitary, malicious and hateful. Maybe I'm missing something.

That said, the Medusa is probably one of my favourite mythical monsters. There's something deeply and intrinsically frightening in the story, and even the D&D-isation of the monster can't quite diminish it entirely. I hope to foist one on my players in my next campaign.

Wakshaani

12-31-2008 10:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mmmmmm, Medusa.

Such a fantastic critter, but one that's such a trope that it's both used poorly and has a terrible reputation. Anytime, anywhere, you mention "Amazingly lifelike statues," every player at the table goes, "Aw crap. Medusa. Alright boys, break out the mirrors..." The statue bit's always a dead giveaway, but, it's also been used in the past.... has anyone not had a Medusa working through a 'sculpter' scam artist, selling 'statues' to the wealthy? I mean really.

Of course, of equal overuse has to be the "Beautiful princess in captivity", clad in a shroud and pulling against walled manacles (But partially in shadow) that, once the heroes get near ... BAM! Medusa. (Of course, she's still chained to a wall, so, that just doesn't really end well, now does it?)

Now, once you take the Medusa and blow it up into a creature with an ecology and a lifestyle and so forth, things get interesting. How do they interact with human, or humanoid, society? Are they naturally evil? What do they eat? The original Medusa, the lone mortal of the three Gorgons, was a dynamite archer... is there a culture to the bow, or was she a special case? Are there male medusa? Do they mate with human(oid)s? Do they just lay eggs which hatch into more of their kind or are they just created by divine curse?

These things are rich in use.

6inTruder

12-31-2008 11:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Male medusa?! I don't think even D&D got THAT crazy!

;))

I like to think that a veiled medusa could act at least semi-openly in a forgiving enough community. Like beholders and illithids in Spelljammer. And the master archer thing is really cool (and suitably yonked!).

Now that all said... What about that picture?! Easily one of my favourites in the book, though I'd not've minded a bit of tuskyness. But maybe I'm just kinky that way? AND the Clash medusa was a D&D Greater Medusa, which had the serpentine lower torso vs normal lady-type legs.

JRM

12-31-2008 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9778609)

Manticore

Manticores always put me in mind of an anti-Santa Claus, which makes them a fitting entry for this time of year. A jolly old fellow with a big white beard, except the beard isn't white, it's grey, and he isn't jolly, he's mean...and he has THE BODY OF A LION AND BIG BAT'S WINGS!!!!

Manticores' best trick is to fire spikes from their tails, which doesn't say a whole lot for the monster when you think about it - especially since the spikes only do 1-6 points of damage and aren't poisonous, which surely they should be. They also can't be ridden, which isn't much fun at all. (There is basically no point in trying to domesticate a Manticore, because adults have an 80% chance of reverting to a wild state. 80%!) Maybe I was spoiled by Warhammer and Fighting Fantasy manticores, which I think could be ridden (though don't quote me on that).

Oh blast it to blastery, I've missed one of my favourite monsters.

Anyhow, traditionally manticores don't have wings, and I've long wondered why they do in D&D. Maybe there are a few pre-D&D stories or pictures of winged manticores, or Gygax just liked the idea.

I've also wonder about the mythological explanation for manticores. There's a fabulous beast called an Ant-Lion, which has the front half of lion and the back half of an ant, which according to legend is born after a lion "spills its seed" on an ant's nest. Maybe a manticore is the result of a lion doing the same to a female scorpion?

The oldest version of the manticore I'm aware of is in Pliny, and they're quite different from the D&D version. IIRC (being too lazy to look up the precise details) they have red fur and scorpion-type stings at the end of their tails, live in jungles and have voices like brass trumpets. They also occasionally hunt in groups (prides?) and have a peculiar talent for mimicry and ventriloquism - so you may hear someone calling out to you from one bush, only for a manticore to pounce out from another. They don't have the wings or the spike-hurling, alas.

Another version of the beast I'm fond of is the one in The Worm Ourobours by E R Eddison. These were mountain-dwellers who loathed their own kind with a passion, so if you bathed in the blood of a manticore, any others would not attack you, being revulsed by the scent. These had scorpion-tails as well, but also had porcupine spines bristling from their hindquarters. The book doesn't say they can shoot these spines out at foes, but I don't see why they shouldn't in my world. Oh, and these mountain manticores don't have wings either.

JRM

01-01-2009 12:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9787362)
Mmmmmm, Medusa.

*Such a fantastic critter, but one that's such a trope that it's both used poorly and has a terrible reputation. Anytime, anywhere, you mention "Amazingly lifelike statues," every player at the table goes, "Aw crap. Medusa. Alright boys, break out the mirrors..." The statue bit's always a dead giveaway, but, it's also been used in the past.... has anyone not had a Medusa working through a 'sculpter' scam artist, selling 'statues' to the wealthy? I mean really.*

Of course, of equal overuse has to be the "Beautiful princess in captivity", clad in a shrift and pulling against walled manacles (But partially in shadow) that, once the heroes get near ... BAM! Medusa. (Of course, she's still chained to wall, so, that just doesn't really end well, now does it?)

Now, once you take the Medusa and blow it up into a creature with an ecology and a lifestyle and so forth, things get interesting. How do they interact with human, or humanoid, society? Are they naturally evil? What do they eat? The original Medusa, the lone mortal of the three Gorgons, was a dynamite archer... is there a culture to the bow, or was she a special case? Are there male medusa? Do they mate with human(oid)s? Do they just lay eggs which hatch into more of their kind or are they just created by divine curse?

*These things are rich in use.*

Oh dear, so much to quibble about in this post.

The original medusa was not an archer, there's nothing in the classical myths about her or her immortal sisters using bows, or any other artificial weapon. I am very fond of Mr Harryhausen's interpretation of Medusa, but it does differ in many respects from the original.

(EDIT: Nor did their arrows end in sticks of high-explosive, although I won't promise that the next medusa my players meet won't be such a "dynamite archer" ;))

Oh, speaking of differences, the original gorgons all had wings and were swift fliers. Why does that rarely feature in roleplaying game versions of the monster? They don't have snaky lower bodies in the myths either, like Harryhausen's version or AD&D's greater medusa. Nor did their tails have rattles on the end, rattlesnakes being unavailable in ancient Greece.

As for male medusa, these do exist in D&D and are called Maedar. A male medusa doesn't have venomous snake-hair. They are immune to petrification and can turn stone to flesh, so make ideal mates for a medusa, since they make her petrified victims a permanently preserved larder.

The AD&D version of the medusa does lay eggs, by the way. One thing I like about the right-up is that a medusa's severed head keeps its petrifying power for days after its death, an obvious homage to the myth.

Wakshaani

01-01-2009 01:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9787469)
Male medusa?! I don't think even D&D got THAT crazy!

In point of fact, the old Dragon Magazine Ecology of teh Medusa introducer the ... I want to say Madaer, the Male Medusa. His big schtick was that his touch could turn STONE into FLESH. This was explained as how the Medusa actually ate. It'd freeze something, they'd bash it into shards with ahammer, then the Madaer would turn the bits into flesh to cook and eat.

It also used a spell ability to merge with stone, and just hid in walls most of teh time, which is why nobody ever saw 'em.

noisms

01-01-2009 02:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9787931)
In point of fact, the old Dragon Magazine Ecology of teh Medusa introducer the ... I want to say Madaer, the Male Medusa. His big schtick was that his touch could turn STONE into FLESH. This was explained as how the Medusa actually ate. It'd freeze something, they'd bash it into shards with ahammer, then the Madaer would turn the bits into flesh to cook and eat.

It also used a spell ability to merge with stone, and just hid in walls most of teh time, which is why nobody ever saw 'em.

It's the very next entry. ;)

Hellzon

01-01-2009 02:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

'kay, you're making me do this. 4E has male medusae, who either fight with longswords or poison people with their gaze. And they don't have snaky hair. Females remain as bow(wo)men with a petrifying gaze.

Of course, I'm pretty sure male medusae are coming up next in this thread. EDIT: Too slow.

kelvingreen

01-01-2009 03:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9787469)
Male medusa?! I don't think even D&D got THAT crazy!

The very next page, I believe, complete with body tattoos and a fetching bathtowel accessory. ;)

demiurge1138

01-01-2009 04:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9787469)

Now that all said... What about that picture?! Easily one of my favourites in the book, though I'd not've minded a bit of tuskyness. But maybe I'm just kinky that way? AND the Clash medusa was a D&D Greater Medusa, which had the serpentine lower torso vs normal lady-type legs.

You are not alone--that medusa is hot. Which I think is hilarious, because they're supposed to be the ugliest things ever.

Kakita Kojiro

01-01-2009 04:09 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9787633)

Oh, speaking of differences, the original gorgons all had wings and were swift fliers. Why does that rarely feature in roleplaying game versions of the monster? They don't have snaky lower bodies in the myths either, like Harryhausen's version or AD&D's greater medusa. Nor did their tails have rattles on the end, rattlesnakes being unavailable in ancient Greece.

Yeah, D&D really sucked the life and wonder out of Medeusas and replaced it with pure bleah.

Just calling them Medeusas is annoying to begin with -- they're Gorgons; EEG should have found some other name for iron-skinned bulls with petrifying breath.

In some sources, they're described as golden-scaled, brazen-winged -- cursed by Athena because they were more beautiful than her. Sounds like they were goddesses supplanted by the latecomer Olympians.

Furthermore, Athena then sends her boy to whack Medeusas just because she hadn't done enough to the poor girl, already. Which he does, and flies off with her head -- leaving poor, immortal Stheno and Euryale to grieve for their sister, forever. And, let's note, who still turn people who see them to stone... which was kind of the horror that we thought Perseus was supposed to be stopping, wasn't it? Except he couldn't have killed Stheno and Euryale, anyway, and his patroness caused the whole mess in the first place.

(in some tellings, Athena was miffed because Medeus had the cheek to be raped in Athena's temple by Athena's uncle, Posiedon. lovely lady, Athena.)

Then, too, when Medeus was killed, Pegasus and Chrysaor sprang forth. How cool is that?

Instead, we get "medeusas" with bows and arrows. bleah.

noisms

01-01-2009 04:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 9788065)

'kay, you're making me do this. 4E has male medusae, who either fight with longswords or poison people with their gaze. And they don't have snaky hair. Females remain as bow(wo)men with a petrifying gaze.

Of course, I'm pretty sure male medusae are coming up next in this thread. EDIT: Too slow.

Do the 4e types have the stone-to-flesh ability?

Kakita Kojiro

01-01-2009 04:20 AM

No, no stone-to-flesh ability. Although they do remember to be Immune petrification.

And they're just "Medeus Warrior (Male)"; no mention of maedar.

Sleeper

01-01-2009 04:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9788377)

Yeah, D&D really sucked the life and wonder out of Medeus and replaced it with pure bleah.

(snip a bunch of stuff from the always-cool Greek mythology)

*D&D is the Viking raider of legends, killing dozens of ancient mythologies and taking their best stuff. The results is a scattershot hodge-podge of creatures, some gloriously successful some... not (shedu, I'm thinking of you). Not a purist's game. It's Dungeons & Dragons, not Mazes & Minotaurs.*

Inyssius

01-01-2009 04:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9788412)

No, no stone-to-flesh ability. Although they do remember to be Immune petrification.

And they're just "Medusa Warrior (Male)"; no mention of maedar.

Interestingly, however, female medusas are not immune to the poisonous, mind-affecting, weakening gaze of a maedar. Huh.

Kakita Kojiro

01-01-2009 04:53 AM

Huh, look at that. Moreover, male medusas aren't immune to the slowing and immobilizing portions of the female medusa's gaze.

One is left to assume that medusas do it with the lights out, otherwise it's:

"ooh, baby!" slowed, immobilized

"yes, just like that" damaged, dazed, weakened

...

...

...

ooze wanders by and eats the both of them

Wakshaani

01-01-2009 07:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9788372)

You are not alone--that medusa is hot. Which I think is hilarious, because they're supposed to be the ugliest things ever.

Well, originally Medusa was turned into a Gorgon because either A) she had the audacity to be raped by Posiden in a temple of Athena or, more commonly, B) that she had the audacity to be prettier than Athena, who gave her snakes as a punishment.

Greek Gods ... kinda dickish.

Hellzon

01-01-2009 11:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9788931)
Greek Gods ... kinda dickish.

More like: Ancient gods... kinda dickish, isn't it? ;)

Inyssius

01-01-2009 11:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

More like: Gods ... kinda dickish, isn't it?:D

The Last Conformist

01-02-2009 12:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9787582)
The oldest version of the manticore I'm aware of is in Pliny, and they're quite different from the D&D version.

Pliny got his manticore from Ctesias (writing ca 400 BC), who probably got it from the Persians - as said above, the word surely comes from the Old Persian for "man-eater".

Interestingly, according to Livius.org, a related word, mardomxôr, is the modern Persian name for the tiger. Perhaps my skepticism regarding the manticore-tiger connection above was misplaced - then again, it's not hard to image the label "man-eater" being applied to several different animals, real and otherwise. It may be relevant that while "manticore" (from Greek martikhoras with a scribal slip r>n) and mardomxôr clearly involve the same roots, mart- "mortal man" and xôr- "eat", they seem to have been formed differently.

demiurge1138

01-02-2009 02:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9788931)
Well, originally Medusa was turned into a Gorgon because either A) she had the audacity to be raped by Posiden in a temple of Athena or, more commonly, B) thta she had the audacity to be prettier than Athena, who gave her snaketresses as a punishment.

Greek Gods ... kinda dickish.

Yes, I know. Original Medusa, the woman, tres hot. Medusa the Gorgon? Not so much. That was the whole point of the exercise.

But the origin myth of Medusa cursed sort of conflicts with there being two other immortal gorgons, doesn't it? Or was Athena just inspired by the existence of gorgons for her curse? I don't recall it ever being explained.

Kakita Kojiro

01-02-2009 09:55 AM

Athena punished Medusa's sisters alongside Medusa, apparently for the same infraction -- whether "too pretty for their own good" or "dared to get raped in the wrong place" isn't really specified in the versions I've seen. Likewise no explanation of why Medusa is mortal while her sisters are immortal -- although all three are the daughters of deities (of whom differs depending on the version).

The gorgons were supposed to be both beautiful and horrible at the same time. They are beautiful monsters, and it is implied that you turn to stone because of their beauty and horror.

Which could probably be good for a Cthulu-esque riff, what with the death by seeing life-destroying beauty man was not meant to behold and all...

Sleeper

01-02-2009 02:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9792137)

The gorgons were supposed to be both beautiful and horrible at the same time. They are beautiful monsters, and it implied that you turn to stone because of their beauty and horror.

Which could probably be good for a Cthulu-esque riff, what with the death by seeing life-destroying beauty man was not meant to behold and all...

I really like that, though I'd say it's more a classical metaphorical approach than something that can be explained as an effect of Lovecraftian alienness. The victim is so perfectly trapped between attraction and repulsion that they become unable to move or act; as a statue, perfectly and eternally immobile.

kelvingreen

01-02-2009 06:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9792732)

I really like that, though I'd say it's more a classical metaphorical approach than something that can be explained as an effect of Lovecraftian alienness. The victim is so perfectly trapped between attraction and repulsion that they become unable to move or act; as a statue, perfectly and eternally immobile.

They're not incompatible, I'd argue.

JRM

01-02-2009 07:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9788485)

D&D is the Viking raider of legends, killing dozens of ancient mythologies and taking their best stuff. The results is a scattershot hodge-podge of creatures, some gloriously successful some... not (shedu, I'm thinking of you). Not a purist's game. It's Dungeons & Dragons, not Mazes & Minotaurs.

Oh I've got nothing against that approach, but to my mind they didn't steal all the best stuff from the medusa myth. What's cooler, a lass with reptile hair, or the same lass with golden skin, brazen wings? Still, it's easy enough to add, just bump up her AC and add a fly speed.

JRM

01-02-2009 07:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9792137)

The gorgons were supposed to be both beautiful and horrible at the same time. They are beautiful monsters, and it implied that you turn to stone because of their beauty and horror.

The problem is the myths go both ways, some say the cursed Medusa retained her beautiful face, others write of her being hideous and ugly. I guess you pays your money and takes your pick.

I have trouble reconciling the idea of gorgons being "beautiful and horrible at the same time" with classical Greek pictures of winged gorgons. Unless the ancients had a thing for protruding tongues, tusks and, in some cases, what appear to be beards I have difficulty believing they considered the cursed gorgons the epitome of feminine beauty.

There are also lots of pictures of Medusa with a beautiful face, unfortunately most of them show just her severed head, so we can't tell whether she had a winged or monstrous body attached to it. Although there are rare pictures of Medusa as a winged woman fair in both body and face, like this one.

So, maybe D&D should have five types of medusa:

Standard Medusa (beautiful woman)

Winged Medusa (beautiful woman with wings)

Gorgon Medusa (hideous woman with golden wings and scaly brazen skin)

Greater Medusa (hideous woman with serpentine lower body)

Winged Greater Medusa (hideous woman with wings and serpentine lower body)

Then we can make up more types of male medusa.:

EDIT: Speaking of male medusas*, when are you going to post the Maedar and the Glyptar, Noism? There are a couple of things I'd like to say about their Monstrous Compendium entries.

That reminds me, we forgot to have the traditional argument about what's the correct plural of medusa. Lots of dictionaries give "medusae" like the MM uses, but this is certain to give classical grammarians a fit. My best guess for the plural of the Greek version Medousa would be Medouson or Medousathes. Of course, the three sisters were collectively called the Gorgones or Gorgons anyway, but we know how D&D's bulled-up that name.

Sleeper

01-02-2009 08:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9793146)
So, maybe D&D should have five types of medusa:

Let's see. In keeping with D&D's early conventions, name them medusas, sthenos, euryales, gorgons, etc. Are the Greek and Latin names different?

Then make one half-snake, one beautiful and kills with a glare, one hideous with a petrifying gaze, and one with poisonous snakes for hair. One regenerates, one wears a serpent-belt that grants her her powers, one has wings and flies, one has skin of living bronze. One is a reclusive oracle, one has an order of dragon-sown knights called Aegis who wear her visage on their shields, and one is a flying undead head sent from hell to seek vengeance. One has blood that turns into a squirming mass of snakes and another has blood that can either be instantly fatal or raise the dead. Mix and match.

Poof. One myth, many distinct monsters.

JRM

01-02-2009 09:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9793235)
Let's see. In keeping with D&D's early conventions, name them medusas, sthenos, euryales, gorgons, etc. Are the Greek and Latin names different?

Well Sthenno and Euryale were basically identical in the myth, but that's no reason to stop us - maybe the scaly winged gorgons with legs are descended from Euryale, and ones with a serpentine lower body from Sthenno, or vica-versa?

The Greek and Latin names are different - Medusa being the Latin and Medousa the Greek.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9793235)
Then make one half-snake, one beautiful and kills with a glare, one hideous with a petrifying gaze, and one with poisonous snakes for hair. One regenerates, one wears a serpent-belt that grants her her powers, one has wings and flies, one has skin of living bronze. One is a reclusive oracle, one has an order of dragon-sown knights called Aegis who wear her visage on their shields, and one is a flying undead head sent from hell to seek vengeance. One has blood that turns into a squirming mass of snakes and another has blood that can either be instantly fatal or raise the dead. Mix and match.

Poof. One myth, many distinct monsters.

Good ideas! That's how I like to fashion my mythological monsters to, riffing off the different legends. I was going to mention an "immortal" variety (regeneration and immunity to non-magical weapons, or literally divine?) in my earlier post, but decided to stick more or less to the mainstream.

Hmm...

Serpent belts? While there is mention of gorgons wearing serpents on or as belts, there's nothing to indicate they gave them their powers. Still, magical belts have a grand pedigree, so why not have them.

The Aegis-shielded bodyguard is a neat idea, although pedants may complain that they should be followers of Athena or Zeus, not the Gorgons. Now, do the shields channel their patrons' gaze-powers or just protect their bearers from being poisoned/petrified by their mistress?

The flying head may not be undead. Perhaps it's the severed head of an immortal medusa, searching far-and-wide for its hidden body so it can make itself whole again?

As for the blood, don't forget it can also spawn monsters. In AD&D terms, maybe such medusas automatically cast a Monster Summoning spell when injured?

The Last Conformist

01-02-2009 10:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9793146)

That reminds me, we forgot to have the traditional argument about what's the correct plural of medusa. Lots of dictionaries give "medusae" like the MM uses, but this is certain to give classical grammarians a fit. My best guess for the plural of the Greek version Medousa would be Medouson or Medousathes. Of course, the three sisters were collectively called the Gorgones or Gorgons anyway, but we know how D&D's bulled-up that name.

I don't know about the Greek, but in Latin already classical authors used the name as a regular first declination feminine, the plural of which, if there were one, would indeed be "medusae".

JRM

01-02-2009 11:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9793422)

I don't know about the Greek, but in Latin already classical authors used the name as a regular first declination feminine, the plural of which, if there were one, would indeed be "medusae".

Yes, medusae is the plural of medusa in Latin. I must confess I only added that remark to tease Kakita Kojiro, knowing his abiding passion about -ae endings on plurals of names that were originally Greek (or, worse, neither Greek nor Latin).

I was just being a rotter.:D

The Last Conformist

01-03-2009 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9793538)
Yes, medusae is the plural of medusa in Latin.

Yes, but medusae means jellyfish. The D&D monster is presumably named for the mythological character, who there only was one of, and biological Latin doesn't always follow the same norms as classical literature.

Inyssius

01-03-2009 01:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In 3.X and 4, they're invariably called medusas.

JRM

01-03-2009 02:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9793963)
Yes, but medusae means jellyfish. The D&D monster is presumably named for the mythological character, who there only was one of, and biological Latin doesn't always follow the same norms as classical literature.

We've already brought up the jellyfish connection on this thread back when we were discussing Hydras. Another monster that was originally a single female in Greek myth and became a RPG beastie and a type of cnidian.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 9794000)

In 3.X and 4, they're invariably called medusas.

What a bunch of spoilsports! Arguing over the proper plural of monsters is half the fun.:p

Although I suspect a search of the rules would probably find a mention or two of medusae which slipped through, give me a second...

...Aha!

According to www.d20srd.org there's a single use of medus^{ae} in the variant campaign rules on sanity.

Kakita Kojiro

01-03-2009 02:32 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9793538)

Yes, medusae is the plural of medusa in Latin. I must confess I only added that remark to tease Kakita Kojiro, knowing his abiding passion about -ae endings on plurals of names that were originally Greek (or, worse, neither Greek nor Latin).

I was just being a rotter.:D

Eh, in this particular case my outrage over dodgy pluralizations is superceded by the silliness of trying to pluralize someone's proper name. If they were going to do that and use an authentic plural, I suppose they should've been Medousides, or something.

But since they' went the dumb route, just stick an -s on the end and be done with it. It always faintly reminds me of nouns like "johns", anyway.

Nice idea to steal the names of Stheno and Euryale too, though. There was actually an obscure male gorgon IIRC (googles)... "Nanas". Looks like he was "Zeus' guardian" -- with no further references, so maybe from his infancy on Mount Ida. (which might make Nanas one of the kouretes). So that name could be swiped for the "male medeusas".

Alas, since it already ends with an -s, though, we're back to dodgy plurals with it.

JasonK

01-03-2009 02:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9793235)

...and one is a flying undead head sent from hell to seek vengeance. ...

That'd be the one that shows up in Castlevania. :)

~ jasön

Sleeper

01-03-2009 04:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9793319)

The Aegis-shielded bodyguard is a neat idea, although pedants may complain that they should be followers of Athena or Zeus, not the Gorgons. Now, do the shields channel their patrons' gaze-powers or just protect their bearer from being poisoned/petrified by their mistress?

The flying head may not be undead. Perhaps it's the severed head of an immortal medusa, searching far-and-wide for its hidden body so it can make itself whole again?

That's okay. Pedants obsessed with rigorous adherence to the originals myths ran screaming the first time they cracked the Monstrous Manual. ;)

The flying head is based on a creative interpretation of a passage from the Odyssey, where Persephone supposedly threatens to send up a dreadful head from Hades. Since the gorgon is considered a cthonic deity, this might one of the better links to Lovecraftian interpretation.

And the serpent belt is just an excuse to fashion a new magic item, a la the swanmay's cloak. Could also make the gorgoneion, a powerful mask with strange powers and a creeping sentience made by carving the skin from her living face. The Aegis is obvious. Or make the myth into a kit or a prestige class or paragon path; female rage personified. Akin to the maenad, with mad eyes, fangs, hair that seems to twist and curl on its own. Or mix in elements from the Granae; call them graneas, and focus on the trinity. Share a rolling eye amongst them, with oracular vision and the evil eye, capable of freezing men in their place.

JRM

01-03-2009 06:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

[quote=Kakita Kojiro;9794123]Eh, in this particular case my outrage over dodgy pluralizations is superceded by the silliness of trying to pluralize someone's proper name. If they were going to do that and use an authentic plural, I suppose they should've been Medousides, or something./QUOTE]

Didn't we raise the same point about the Hydra? There must be a lot of unique mythological monsters whose proper names became a species name after being adapted into a RPG, such as the Chimera (another unrecognized female). I'm surprised it doesn't happen more often, leaving D&D replete with monsters based on Cerberus (the Kerberoi?), Scylla and the like.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9794123)

Nice idea to steal the names of Stheno and Euryale too, though.

Credit where it's due, it was Sleeper who first posted the idea on this thread.

As for the proposed D&D monsters I think it made more sense to, ah, "borrow" the name of Euryale for the scaly winged gorgons with legs and Sthenno for winged gorgons who are snaky below the waist. Sthenno means strong or forceful and, in AD&D, it's the greater medusas who have tails. Plus, Euryale means something like far-wandering, far-springer or wide-stepping, which may require the existence of legs, depending on how literal the translation of "stepping" is. I have no idea if that's so, since my Greek is nearly non-existent,

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9794123)

*There was actually an obscure male gorgon IIRC (googles)... "Nanas". Looks like he was "Zeus' guardian" -- with no further references, so maybe from his infancy on Mount Ida. (which might make Nanas one of the kouretes). So that name could be swiped for the "male medusas".*

Alas, since it already ends with an -s, though, we're back to dodgy plurals with it.

Now that is interesting, I've never heard of a male gorgon before. Do you have any references to original sources? All I can find after a short google is duplicates of the same information you posted above. A bit more googling revealed Nanas was an Etruscan proper name (e.g. the Etruscan King named Nanas, son of Tutamides), maybe meaning "wanderer", and the Etruscans were pretty fond of gorgon imagery. I wonder whether there's any connection?

As for the plural, in modern Greek a masculine Nanas would likely pluralize to Nanes, so why not use that?

Inyssi

01-03-2009 06:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9794799)

As for the plural, in modern Greek a masculine Nanas would likely pluralize to Nanes, so why not use that?

"Adventurers, beware: there's a gigantic Nane in those mountains."

JRM

01-03-2009 07:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi (Post 9794932)

"Adventurers, beware: there's a gigantic Nane in those mountains."

Eh? Nanas would still be the singular, regardless of whether I'm right in guessing the plural would be Nanes. Those adventurers better watch out, there may be more than one of them!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9794799)

Didn't we raise the same point about the Hydra? There must be a lot of unique mythological monsters whose proper names became a species name after being adapted into a RPG, such as the Chimera (another unrecognized female). I'm surprised it doesn't happen more often, leaving D&D replete with monsters based on Cerberus (the Kerberoi?), Scylla and the like.

Well, the original use of "Hydra" and "Chimera" parallels that of "Gorgon". The gorgon most talked about is named Medeusa. For all we know, the Hydra could have been named Bob.

I'm irked by using the wrong declension for words that describe a species, category, whatever -- I'd say, either use the correct original plural, or just admit you're speaking English and stick an -s on it. Bad Latin plurals make the zombie baby Jesus cry.

However. If you are turning someone's name into a species, category, whatever... heck, just stick an -s on the thing. It's already rather silly, and I'm just thankful that Medieval bestiarists didn't call a completely different monster a "Hydra", or we'd've been stuck with Gygax giving us Lernean Bobs and Pyrobobs and Cryobobs and Og knows what all else.

'Sides, I'm a grognard; I'm expected to have eccentric opinions. It's in the grognard bylaws, and all.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9795024)

Eh? Nanas would still be the singular, regardless of whether I'm right in guessing the plural would be Nanes. Those adventurers better watch out, there may be more than one of them!

Well, yeah. But unless your players are linguists (some of mine are), they'll probably just assume "Nanes" to be a regular English plural, and mis-extrapolate to "Nane" being the singular. They'd expect "Nanases" as the plural from English rules.

Mind you, the linguist in my group would decry "Nanases" and insist on "Nanes", while his wife would tell us that we're being stupid. If D&D had a "Pedant" class, that'd be all my group would play. :)

Edit: forgot; no, alas, I don't have an original source for the male gorgon. I'm not really sure where I first read about that.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9795254)

Well, the original use of "Hydra" and "Chimera" parallels that of "Gorgon". The gorgon most talked about is named Medeusa. For all we know, the Hydra could have been named Bob.

I'll grant that Hydra may be a bad example for a proper name (even the phrase 'Lernean Hydra' implies that outside the Lernean marshes other examples of her kind could exist), there are better examples. Talking about Greek serpent/dragon monsters, we've got Echidna and Python, both proper names that have become entire genera of animals.* Speaking of Echidna, even classical authors used that as a proper name and a generic one (e.g. Ovid refers to the Hydra as the Echidna Lernaea in Metamorphoses).

*But at least their English plurals are simply pythons and echidnas, so you don't have to suffer "echidnae".:eek:

EDIT: On second thoughts, echidna is a bad example, since it means 'viper' in Greek. Unless venomous snakes were named after Echidna instead of vice-versa. It's not as strong as Python becoming pythons.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9795254)

'Sides, I'm a grognard; I'm expected to have eccentric opinions. It's in the grognard bylaws, and all.

As a card-carrying grognard myself I sympathize. Do you use the original bylaws? I can't abide the new ones the revision committee is proposing. When they're not written in A5 booklets, it just doesn't feel right. ;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9795254)

Edit: forgot; no, alas, I don't have an original source for the male gorgon. I'm not really sure where I first read about that.

That's unfortunate, I have a nasty suspicion it may be a post-classical innovation or a misinterpretation, and would like some confirmation. I'm just hoping some scholar didn't find an Etruscan coin from King Nanas's reign decorated with a gorgon's head and jumped to an erroneous conclusion.

noisms

01-03-2009 07:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Medusa, Maedar

More pseudo-mythological ancient Greek goodness comes in the form of the Maedar - the male medusa. He doesn't have snakes or petrification breath, but he can pass through solid rock, turn stone to flesh, and beat you up with 2d4-dealing fists. But if you catch him with a phase door spell while he's passing through stone, he's curtains.

Maedar are ridiculously rare, and in fact if you think about it for even a second you realise that their numbers are probably declining all the time - when they impregnate a Medusa there is only a 1% chance of a Maedar child being born (all the rest are human young who are instantly petrified by their mother), which would indicate that most Maedar never manage to propagate themselves. Unless they're either incredibly long-lived or the whole strictly-monogamous thing is a huge lie.

I'm interested in why human Medusa babies are always petrified by their mother. Would not Medusae (whatever) love all their young and want to protect them? You could imagine a Maedar taking the young away from the mother as soon as they are born, so she has no chance to look at them, and then either raising them separately from her or maybe depositing them with unknowing foster parents of some kind. That could make an interesting 'special snowflake' character background for a PC - the human young of a Medusa and Maedar, raised in the local village.

Glyptar

Glyptar are the spirits of 'extremely evil' Maedar who transfer their souls to rocks before death. They float around beneath the earth until they eventually become trapped in rock crystals and, of course, go insane. They can then be used to animate golems, swords, and presumably whatever else you can put a crystal in.

Wakboth

01-03-2009 11:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9796660)

Maedar are ridiculously rare, and in fact if you think about it for even a second you realise that their numbers are probably declining all the time - when they impregnate a Medusa there is only a 1% chance of a Maedar child being born (all the rest are human young who are instantly petrified by their mother), which would indicate that most Maedar never manage to propogate themselves. Unless they're either incredibly long-lived or the whole strictly-monogamous thing is a huge lie.

Medusas and maedars have it worse than even the sphinxes, who are well known for having really wonky sex lives...

Quote:

Glyptar are the spirits of 'extremely evil' Maedar who transfer their souls to rocks before death. They float around beneath the earth until they eventually become trapped in rock crystals and, of course, go insane. They can then be used to animate golems, swords, and presumably whatever else you can put a crystal in.

A zombie with a crystal eye?

JRM

01-04-2009 12:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9796660)

Medusa, Maedar

Maedar are ridiculously rare, and in fact if you think about it for even a second you realise that their numbers are probably declining all the time - when they impregnate a Medusa there is only a 1% chance of a Maedar child being born (all the rest are human young who are instantly petrified by their mother), which would indicate that most Maedar never manage to propogate themselves. Unless they're either incredibly long-lived or the whole strictlymonogamous thing is a huge lie.

It's worse than that, a Maedar-Medusa pairing results in 25% males and 75% females, and ALL the females and 99% of the males are petrified on sight of their mother. That means each Maedar must sire an average of four hundred babies just to replace its own numbers, and produces no (zero, zilch, nada) Medusas in the process. However, when a Medusa mates with a human all the babies are medusas.

EDIT: And that's assuming all the boys make it to maturity, considering the dangers of the dungeon lots of them will be killed before breeding so the maedar would likely have to sire several times 400 infants to account for losses. As there's only 2-6 per clutch, this would surely take a very long time. It's made worse by Maedar being monogamists - they only have one mate to produce children with, and going by the fluff text they are so devoted they may never take another one if she dies. :END EDIT

How the blazes does that make sense! A female medusa can only perpetuate females by not mating with her own kind.

I'd have rewritten it to somethings like: A medusa can mate with either a human male or a maedar, in either case the resulting offspring are 25% male and 75% female. Male babies resulting from a medusa-human pairing are only 1% likely to be Maedar, while female babies are 50% likely to be medusa. A medusa-maedar pairing always results in medusa and maedar offspring.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9796660)

I'm interested in why human Medusa babies are always petrified by their mother. Would not Medusae (whatever) love all their young and want to protect them? You could imagine a Maedar taking the young away from the mother as soon as they are born, so she has no chance to look at them, and then either raising them separately from her or maybe depositing them with unknowing foster parents of some kind. That could make an interesting 'special snowflake' character background for a PC - the human young of a Medusa and Maedar, raised in the local village.

Ooh, that sounds like a good plot hook. Maybe a medusa or maedar becomes the secret patron/founder of an orphanage to house their offspring, at least until they grow large enough to reveal whether they're medusas or unwanted humans?

As for petrifying the human babies, the AD&D medusa can't switch its gaze's petrifying power off (except by closing its eyes), and I guess the assumption is they are cold-hearted enough not to care about their human children.

Although how human can they really be, considering they are "fledgelings" that hatch from eggs.

Come to think of it, if two "humans" born from medusas mate, is there a small chance the baby will grown into a medusa or maedar? That could be the basis of an interesting character. I'm imagining a beautiful LG human priestess who suddenly starts growing snaky hair as a teenager.

Maybe that's how Medousa really became a Gorgon.:D

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9796660)

Glyptar

Glyptar are the spirits of 'extremely evil' Maedar who transfer their souls to rocks before death. They float around beneath the earth until they eventually become trapped in rock crystals and, of course, go insane. They can then be used to animate golems, swords, and presumably whatever else you can put a crystal in.

One thing bugged me about this. Any Maedar can send his spirit into the rock before dying, but only the extremely evil ones retain their consciousness. What about the moderately evil ones or even the blessedly good ones, do their spirits simply wander mindless for all eternity or disperse?

Sleeper

01-04-2009 02:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9797139)

It's worse than that, a Maedar-Medusa pairing results in 25% males and 75% females, and ALL the females and 99% of the males are petrified on sight of their mother. That means each Maedar must sire an average of four hundred babies just to replace its own numbers, and produces no (zero, zilch, nada) Medusas in the process. However, when a Medusa mates with a human all the babies are medusas.

Maybe they're not really evil. Maybe they're just driven mad (in the Lancelot running through the woods like a wild man kind of madness, not based on any modern clinical understanding) by the tragic curse of their species. Consumed by the ultimate in true and devoted courtly love; and yet their joyous union leads to dead children, by the dozens. Tiny grasping hands, frozen perpetually in the act of reaching for their mother. This tragedy alone perhaps could be borne, but mocking them is that tiny sliver of hope, that this child, or the next, might be the one in many hundreds to survive, to thrive. And even that is a shallow joke, because the vanishingly rare survivor is always male. Female children can only be born through infidelity. A romantic tragedy for the ages.

demiurge1138

01-04-2009 02:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

As far as "special snowflake" characters go, the human child of a medusa is a pretty good concept. Maybe a spellcaster focusing on earth and poison magic, or a fantastic archer... I'm getting PC ideas from this thread, which isn't how it usually happens!

I am proud to note that I was a contributor to the 3e stats of the maedar, as they appear in Dragon 355. I only worked on the statistics, not the flavor text--which, by the way, only has medusas giving birth to humans if they have sex with humans (which makes more damn sense). At my urging, they were given the ability to overcome hardness and the Improved Sunder feat, so they can actually pull off that trick of smashing apart medusa-created statues and then turning them back into meat. The fact that they could then do it to PC weapons...

Wakboth

01-04-2009 05:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

While we're speaking of medusas, I had an unusual, good-aligned medusa NPC in one game. She had some loyal human servants (she'd saved them from the orcs who'd captured them by turning the orcs into stone, and then taken the orcs' loot) who wore blindfolds around her, and always wore heavy veils and a hooded cloak when traveling.

She was courting a local nobleman (one of the PCs) through letters, hoping to convince him of her good intentions and pure heart so that he wouldn't get shocked when he would eventually find out that she was a medusa. Unfortunately, the game fell apart long before that.

kelvingreen

01-04-2009 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9794123)

*There was actually an obscure male gorgon IIRC (googles)... "Nanas". So that name could be swiped for the "male medusas".*

Only then, mischievous players would expect them to either look like yellow fruit, or old ladies wielding bags of sweets...

Vultur10

01-04-2009 06:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Scholarly mentions of male gorgons in Roman British art

A male gorgon, son of Typhon and Echidna and father of the female gorgons \(!\); attributed to Hyginus

So, the idea of a male Gorgon seems to have been around in the classical period. Interesting.

Zartes

01-04-2009 11:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Wow, lots of cool ideas for using Medusas... Medusae.. Medu-thingies.

For my own part, having noted the fact that "disturbingly realistic statues" always tip off the PCs, I now want to put a Medusa into my next campaign who doesn't have such a "statue" garden. Because she's blind, and thus can't petrify anybody.

Of course, to make up for it, she's a spectacular blind-fighter, and can make very good use of her snake-hair.

I'm imagining her weilding a cane, dressed in a semi-victorian style lady's dress, and with small, round sunglasses to cover her gaping eye sockets.

Kakita Kojiro

01-04-2009 02:12 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9798085)

A male gorgon, son of Typhon and Echidna and father of the female gorgons (!); attributed to Hyginus

Ooh, this link continues on with some good stuff about the gorgons, connecting them to the Erinyes (originals, not the D&D devils) and sea nymphs. And a cute note about "only a few of her snakes stayed awake to guard her" when Medusa was asleep at Perseus' approach.

I've always wondered how that worked for "medeusas" -- are their little snakes independent critters? Or is it just an extra bunch of little eyes to use? You'd think that would be a better combat advantage to exploit than using the things to bite adventurers. Frankly, I'm dubious about the tactic of shoving your coiffure at people armed with sharp, pointy things.

sim_james

01-04-2009 02:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9798931)

For my own part, having noted the fact that "disturbingly realistic statues" always tip off the PCs, I now want to put Medusa into my next campaign who doesn't have such a "statue" garden. Because she's blind, and thus can't petrify anybody.

There was a blind medusa in one of Monte Cook's Ghostwalk adventures, if I recall correctly.

Inyssius

01-04-2009 02:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9798931)

For my own part, having noted the fact that "disturbingly realistic statues" always tip off the PCs, I now want to put Medusa into my next campaign who doesn't have such a "statue" garden. Because she's blind, and thus can't petrify anybody.

Hmm... waitaminute. How about a band of humanoid gargoyles who keep a medusa slave to assuage suspicion? No player will ever ignore any statue you mention, but they'll pass right over the poor mooks in a medusa's garden.

Right?

And then, once they've dealt with the gargoyles, they have to deal with an innocent medusa. Or, um, "innocent" medusa. Who still turns people to stone at a glance in any case.

noisms

01-04-2009 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9799434)

Ooh, this link continues on with some good stuff about the gorgons, connecting them to the Erinyes (originals, not the D&D devils) and sea nymphs. And a cute note about "only a few of her snakes stayed awake to guard her" when Medeusa was asleep at Perseus' approach.

I've always wondered how that worked for "medeusas" -- are their little snakes independent critters? Or is it just an extra bunch of little eyes to use? You'd think that would be a better combat advantage to exploit than using the things to bite adventurers. Frankly, I'm dubious about the tactic of shoving your coiffure at people armed with sharp, pointy things.

Maybe the snakes stretch out for a couple of feet? They would pretty much have to, I think. Then the medusa could just whip her head around and generate a kind of whirlygig of snake poison death.

I like how the Diterlizzi picture has the snakes bound up into a pony tail. Are there medusa hair stylists, I wonder?

Zartes

01-04-2009 05:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9799761)

Maybe the snakes stretch out for a couple of feet? They would pretty much have to, I think. Then the medusa could just whip her head around and generate a kind of whirlygig of snake poison death.

I like how the Diterlizzi picture has the snakes bound up into a pony tail. Are there medusa hair stylists, I wonder?

Hair stylist, snake charmer... same thing :p

JRM

01-04-2009 07:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9798085)

Scholarly mentions of male gorgons in Roman British art

Well, after a bit of thought the first example doesn't really convince me.

Firstly, how do we know it's a gorgon? The text describes it as a conflation of Medousa and Neptune, which opens the possibility it's a god or daimon with snaky aspects rather than a gorgon per se. Roman myth feature other entities with snake-parts, so it may be a representation a Cthonic being like Typhon. Alternatively, it may be a Celtic deity such as the god Cernunnos, who usually has snakes on its horned head. Indeed, after a bit of googling I found several descriptions of a "horned male gorgon" on sculpture or coin which might well be a horned god.

Secondly, the sculpture's just a head, so how can we be sure it is male? As I mentioned earlier, there are many images of female gorgons with beards (at least they have female dress and body-shape), so unless there's an inscription giving a masculine name its gender is, ah, problematic.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9798085)

A male gorgon, son of Typhon and Echidna and father of the female gorgons (!); attributed to Hyginus

So, the idea of a male Gorgon seems to have been around in the classical period. Interesting.

Now that's much more promising, since it gives an author and parentage.

Aha! here we are, it's a reference to the GORGO AIX, who some sources say was the mother or the father of the three Gorgon sisters. However, and I quote theoi.com "An elder Gorgon was sometimes described as the father of Medousa and her sister Gorgones. This figure may be the same as Aix, for the primeval Gorgon was of indeterminable gender or at best a bearded woman."

So we may be talking about a hermaphrodite/transsexual/asexual gorgon here, not a male one.

JRM

01-04-2009 07:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9799761)

Maybe the snakes stretch out for a couple of feet? They would pretty much have to, I think. Then the medusa could just whip her head around and generate a kind of whirlygig of snake poison death.

I like how the Diterlizzi picture has the snakes bound up into a pony tail. Are there medusa hair stylists, I wonder?

Yes, I always fancied gorgons with long hair, say a yard or more. Of course, traditional images of gorgons show them with shortish snakes only 6-9" long but they didn't have conditioner back in those days, so suffered a lot from split ends.:)

JRM

01-04-2009 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi (Post 9799498)

Hmm... waitaminute. How about a band of humanoid gargoyles who keep a medusa slave to assuage suspicion? No player will ever ignore any statue you mention, but they'll pass right over the poor mooks in a medusa's garden.

Right?

And then, once they've dealt with the gargoyles, they have to deal with an innocent medusa. Or, um, "innocent" medusa. Who still turns people to stone at a glance in any case.

Oh I approve, the old "reverse the player's expectations" trick. Although come to think of it, wouldn't it make a lot of sense if a Maeder pretends to be a statue in his medusa mate's garden?

JRM

01-04-2009 07:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9799434)

Ooh, this link continues on with some good stuff about the gorgons, connecting them to the Erinyes (originals, not the D&D devils) and sea nymphs. And a cute note about "only a few of her snakes stayed awake to guard her" when Medeusa was asleep at Perseus' approach.

I've always wondered how that worked for "medeusas" -- are their little snakes independent critters? Or is it just an extra bunch of little eyes to use? You'd think that would be a better combat advantage to exploit than using the things to bite adventurers. Frankly, I'm dubious about the tactic of shoving your coiffure at people armed with sharp, pointy things.

Presumably they're a bit like an octopus's arms and each have their own "sub-mind" to control them, so the medusa issues general directives ("all snakes bite foes forward", "wake me if you see movement") which the snake-heads interpret. That would likely mean they're incapable of coordinated or highly dexterous action, which fits my conception of gorgon hair. It also opens the idea of a neurological disease that causes a gorgon to lose control of its snakes, maybe a species of schizophrenia?

noisms

01-04-2009 09:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I love this thread. Schizophrenic medusa hair.

Sleeper

01-04-2009 10:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9799919)

Yes, I always fancied gorgons with long hair, say a yard or more. Of course, traditional images of gorgons show them with shortish snakes only 6-9" long but they didn't have conditioner back in those days, so suffered a lot from split ends.:)

Lernean medusas?

Hmm. To start on almost entirely unrelated tangent, perhaps that's just part of the nature of snakes. They do have split tongues, after all. Occasionally, one takes after their biological namesake, those little flat worm things that can be chopped up in all kinds of ways and still grow back. But serpents aren't lizards. Chop off the tail, and it won't grow back. As a tail at least. But sometimes, you get a second head.

Those two-headed ouroboros serpents are called amphisbaenas. Then the question becomes, what happens when you chop off the head of a naturally forked serpent, instead? Or one of the two heads, of an already forked amphisbaena? The head grows back, and then an extra alongside it.

A three- or more- headed snake won't last long. They'd start having trouble moving. You can't slither in three, four, five directions at once. They figure out a new way to get around. So after a while, they start to bulge in the middle, and grow legs.

And that's where the Lernean hydras come from. A simple snake once, that got beheaded too many times.

JRM

01-04-2009 11:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9800222)

Lernean medusas?

That very idea occurred to me when I wrote that semi-joking remark about medusas with split ends, but I took it a different way. Maybe if a medusa doesn't control her hair, letting her snakes grow too long and too numerous, all those little snakey sub-minds begin to overwhelm her sapient, humanoid nature and she begins to turn into a beast, her feminine body mutating into something more draconic. Then hey presto!, we've got a hydra.

JRM

01-04-2009 11:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9797542)

Maybe they're not really evil. Maybe they're just driven mad (in the Lancelot running through the woods like a wild man kind of madness, not based on any modern clinical understanding) by the tragic curse of their species. Consumed by the ultimate in true and devoted courtly love; and yet their joyous union leads to dead children, by the dozens. Tiny grasping hands, frozen perpetually in the act of reaching for their mother. This tragedy alone perhaps could be borne, but mocking them is that tiny sliver of hope, that this child, or the next, might be the one in many hundreds to survive, to thrive. And even that is a shallow joke, because the vanishingly rare survivor is always male. Female children can only be born through infidelity. A romantic tragedy for the ages.

That would certainly work if they are medusas due to a divine curse, like the original Medousa was in some myths. I wouldn't put it past a certain Greek Goddess to damn a person with "your husband and children will be petrified before your eyes".

As far as medusas as a race of creatures, it doesn't make to much sense. Why would the females medusas breed with their males if it is going to end in heartbreak for 99.75% of the offspring? Far better to stick to blindfolded human males, they're sure of always getting viable children that way.

Even if medusas felt no emotional trauma from the loss of human children resulting from a union with a Maedar, just consider the physical stress they'd have to undergo to produce hundreds of kids in clutches of 2-6, each of them as large as a human infant. I doubt an ordinary mammal or reptile of a medusa's size could produce a tenth that many babies without dying of internal trauma or exhaustion.

noisms

01-05-2009 02:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Merman

My imaginary AD&D playing Germaine Greer style feminist would be pissed off at the title of this entry, no doubt. Merfolk, I think is the more PC term. Made up of Mermen and Merwomen. Not Mermaids. No. The one in the picture is hot, though, whatever you choose to call her.

Mermen in AD&D aren't as interesting as they could have been. I'm sure Mermaids were traditionally siren-like figures in most mythologies, tempting sailors and fishermen beneath the waves to a watery death. There are admittedly rather a lot of that sort of creature in the MM, but it gives the Mermaids something to do at least. As it stands they just seem to be glorified underwater housewives for the males.

And nor do the males seem to be particularly well fleshed out. They live in underwater communities, eat a lot of fish, and like to ambush ships from underneath. No surprises there.

Mermen can't survive for long out of water, and start to dehydrate. I don't believe that the same is true of the other aquatic races, though I could be wrong.

demiurge1138

01-05-2009 02:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Aquatic elves also suffer from dehydration, if memory serves me right. So do their weird fishy counterparts, the sahaugin.

What I think is neat is that in most tales about mermaids, the male mers were in fact huge and monstrous. That's where the name "merrow" comes from, which is used in D&D for aquatic ogres. But what if those aquatic ogres were indeed male merfolk? The "mermen" one might see would be adolescent mers, not yet fully grown to large size and mighty strength.

JRM

01-05-2009 03:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9800771)

Aquatic elves also suffer from dehydration, if memory serves me right. So do their weird fishy counterparts, the sahaugin.

Goes to check

"Sea elves can survive on land for a few minutes at a time, though in a state of growing discomfort." ... "Even with magical assistance to enable them to breathe air, aquatic elves are uncomfortable above the waves, and so very few have seen the forests that the high elves speak of with such enthusiasm."

Yup, looks like your memory did not fail you.

The Locathah suffer dehydration on land too. Curiously, there's no mention of dehydration in the Triton's entry, and they don't even have a land speed!

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9800771)

What I think is neat is that in most tales about mermaids, the male mers were in fact huge and monstrous. That's where the name "merrow" comes from, which is used in D&D for aquatic ogres. But what if those aquatic ogres were indeed male merfolk? The "mermen" one might see would be adolescent mers, not yet fully grown to large size and mighty strength.

So if that is true, then if a land-dweller falls in love with an adolescent merman, one half of the relationship could literally turn ugly.:o

JRM

01-05-2009 03:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9800647)

Merman

Mermen in AD&D aren't as interesting as they could have been. I'm sure Mermaids were traditionally siren-like figures in most mythologies, tempting sailors and fishermen beneath the waves to a watery death. There are admittedly rather a lot of that sort of creature in the MM, but it gives the Mermaids something to do at least. As it stands they just seem to be glorified underwater housewives for the males.

That's what strikes me most about the Merman entry, it's really pretty dull.

Considering the wealth of legend about merpeople you'd think they'd be able to come up with something a bit more interesting: Mermaid priestesses with Charm spells, Mermen Kings able to lead a communal casting of a summon storm spell, the ability to temporarily assume fully human form to venture on land, some interesting custom or interaction with another underwater race or just, well, something to add to their MM traits of isolationism, underwater crossbows and attaching grapples to ship.

Oh, and how do you go about herding fish? Would it help to have a aquatic equivalent of a border collie? The sea elves have their dolphin partners, who'd be ideal for such a task, but Merfolk have trained barracudas. Are these barracudas a particularly intelligent breed who can play fetch and herd cod, or are merely vicious guardians who bite anyone they recognize as an intruder?

JRM

01-05-2009 03:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9800873)

Oh, and how do you go about herding fish? Would it help to have a aquatic equivalent of a border collie? The sea elves have their dolphin partners, who'd be ideal for such a task, but Merfolk have trained barracudas. Are these barracudas a particularly intelligent breed who can play fetch and herd cod, or are merely vicious guardians who bite anyone they recognize as an intruder?

Oh dear, I wish I'd never thought of that. Now I'm visualizing a barracuda wearing a shiny collar, that swims up to people and communicates via body-language and weird, unbarracuda-like noises:

*"What's that boy? Little Ariel has beached on Merrow Rock?
Quickly my compadres, the Sea Caballeros must ride to the rescue!"*

music

Finny, Finny, Finny the Reef Barracuda

I'd go on longer, but will spare you... I couldn't remember any more of the lyrics for Skippy, anyway.:D

kami2awa

01-05-2009 04:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9800370)

That would certainly work if they are medusas due to a divine curse, like the original Medousa was in some myths. I wouldn't put it past a certain Greek Goddess to damn a person with "your husband and children will be petrified before your eyes".

As far as medusas as a race of creatures, it doesn't make to much sense. Why would the females medusas breed with their males if it is going to end in heartbreak for 99.75% of the offspring? Far better to stick to blindfolded human males, they're sure of always getting viable children that way.

Or BLIND human males. Which leads to a number of possibilities; e.g. a blind, saintly LG man in love with a medusa (creating a dilemma for good PCs if they think all Medusa are evil - she might be, she might not, and that's doubly true for any offspring), and evil medusa who put out someones eyes to make them a love slave, or even a blind man living isolated from the world who doesn't realise his girlfriend has a certain secret...

Sleeper

01-05-2009 04:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9800873)

Considering the wealth of legend about merpeople you'd think they'd be able to come up with something a bit more interesting:

Yes, I can't think of a time I used mer(women/men). The entry is just so uninspired. Overall, the aquatic races seem to suffer from a bout of blandness. Sahuagin and tritons and kuo-toa have a little flavor, but the merthings and locathah and the one-short-paragraph notes under elves, ogres, and even ghouls are dull. Shame. There's some good source material.

I'd avoid the Little Mermaid associations, or at least draw on elements that are present in the original story and downplay the Disney characteristics. My personal favorite treatment of merfolk is in Poul Anderson's The Merman's Children, but their role as one of the amoral and inhuman races of fey who lack souls and are persecuted by the Church doesn't really work in D&D, and even their conflict with the kraken would be outside the rules. Though there are certainly aspects of the story that remind me of Lovecraft's deep ones, which might make a better reskinning for merfolk than the more obvious kuo-toa.

Wakboth

01-05-2009 04:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9800873)

That's what strikes me most about the Merman entry, it's really pretty dull.

I think all the underwater races get pretty dull entries. Well, apart from Sahuagin, who are neat.

The mermaid in the illustration always reminded me of Ariel, too. It's not a bad pic, but... it's a bit boring, just like the rest of the entry.

Kakita Kojiro

01-05-2009 05:24 AM

I'm curious; someone with the Manual at hand want to check the various swim speeds and tell us which aquatic race is slowest/fastest? I vaguely recall being mildly surprised at how random they all seemed... before I moved on to reading about monsters I'd actually use.

JRM

01-05-2009 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9800994)

Or BLIND human males. Which leads to a number of possibilities; e.g. a blind, saintly LG man in love with a medusa (creating a dilemma for good PCs if they think all Medusa are evil - she might be, she might not, and that's doubly true for any offspring), and evil medusa who put out someones eyes to make them a love slave, or even a blind man living isolated from the world who doesn't realise his girlfriend has a certain secret...

He'd have to deaf as well not to hear the hissing from her hair.:D

Not to mention that she'd find it very difficult to have any intimate relations with her blind beau without him feeling there's something different about her head - I guess she could insist she belongs to an obscure cult which doesn't approve of people touching their heads, but it'd be tricky.

JRM

01-05-2009 05:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9801143)

I'm curious; someone with the Manual at hand want to check the various swim speeds and tell us which aquatic race is slowest/fastest? I vaguely recall being mildly surprised at how random they all seemed... before I moved on to reading about monsters I'd actually use.

OK, I think these are all the humanoid, vaguely humanoid, ex-humanoid (in the case of Lacedons) and optionally humanoid aquatic races. If anyone notices any that are missing, it's easy enough to re-edit the list.

In alphabetical order as they appear in the Monstrous Manual:

Crabman - 9, Sw 6

Elf, Aquatic - 9, Sw 15

Gargoyle, Kapoacinth - 9, Sw 15 [plus possibly FI 15(C)?]

Ghoul, Lacedon - Sw 9

Giant, Reef - 15, Sw 12

Giant, Storm - 15, Sw 15

Hobgoblin, Koalinth - 9, Sw 12

Kuo-Toa - 9, Sw 18

Ixitxachitl - Sw 12
Locathah - 1, Sw 12
Lycanthrope, Lesser Seawolf - 12, Sw 30
Lycanthrope, Greater Seawolf - 9, Sw 27
Merman - 1, Sw 18
Ogre, Merrow - 6, Sw 12
Sahuagin - 12, Sw 24
Selkie - 12, Sw 36
Sirine - 12, Sw 24
Sprite, Nixie - 6, Sw 12
Sprite, Sea - 6, Sw 24
Tako - 3, Sw 9
Triton - Sw 15
Troll, Scrag - 3, Sw 12 [Both freshwater and saltwater]
Umber Hulk, Vodyanoi - 3, Sw 6

And the winner as faster swimming species is ... the Selkie! Admittedly, they cheat by turning into seals, but them's the breaks.

EDIT: Oh, and I added the Ixitxachitl despite them not being humanoid, since they're a significant marine race. But if I add one non-humanoid sapient to the list, why not eyes of the deep, takos and all those other nonanthropoid aquatic races. Oh well, I can't have everything. Except I'll add the Takos, just because I think they're cute.

Kakita Kojiro

01-05-2009 07:05 AM

Whoah, that is a lot more than I'd expected. Thanks, JRM!

Not quite as wonky as I'd recalled, but still some serious weirdness: everyone swims circles around the ixitxachitl (? , rays are quick swimmers!), sahuagin and seawolves are apparently rocket-propelled, and storm giants are really fast swimmers (D&D apparently ignores drag resistance, also).

It still seems odd that they thought we'd need this many aquatic races. I'd don't even recall seeing any module use, say, mermen anyway.

demiurge1138

01-05-2009 08:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yeah, most modules use sahuagin or kuo-toa for their fishman needs. I only recall seeing two modules ever using locathath. No merfolk.

The Last Conformist

01-05-2009 02:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9800222)
But serpents aren't lizards.

Yes they are. Only not ones who are into autotomy.

Wakshaani

01-05-2009 09:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yeah, Merfolk are a kind of non-starter for aquatic adventures in terms of what's been used for modules and the like, but, on the flipside, this means that A) nobody's every ready for 'em when you use 'em in a campaign and, B) you can pretty much write their culture yourself.

Which can get FUN.

JRM

01-06-2009 02:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9801472)
*Whoah, that is a lot more than I'd expected. Thanks, JRM!

Not quite as wonky as I'd recalled, but still some serious weirdness: everyone swims circles around the ixitxachitl (?), rays are quick swimmers!), sahuagin and seawolves are apparently rocket-propelled, and storm giants are really fast swimmers (D&D apparently ignores drag resistance, also).

It still seems odd that they thought we'd need this many aquatic races. I'd don't even recall seeing any module use, say, mermen anyway.

Don't mention it, old bean.

As for the Storm Giants, they may have more drag but they've got more power to compensate for it. Don't forget that Blue Whales, the largest animal in the sea (and anywhere else on the planet) is also one of the fastest swimmers. Obviously, they are less agile and probably have worse acceleration, but I see no reason Storm Giants can't rival the swim speed of other humanoid aquatic races.

EDIT: Oh, one weird point I forgot to mention. Lacedon's don't have a land speed. Does that mean a marine ghoul that has been pulled up on deck just flops about like a beached fish? I wonder why this is, they'd have had perfectly functional land legs before they became undead. Maybe they've gone all soft and bloated, so can't stand up unsupported by water.

Kakita Kojiro

01-06-2009 09:27 AM

Ah, but blue whales are extremely hydrodynamic, and have that honkin' huge fluke designed specifically to propel them in the water. Very efficient swimming design.

Storm giants, however, are basically really big humans. Humans are terribly inefficient swimmers -- the surface area available to push them forward is extremely limited, and humans present more cross-section to resist moving forward

-- lots of drag in the water. Basically, storm giants should swim like humans who're stuck in water that has probably eight times more resistance to them moving forward.

Of course, they also shouldn't be able to stand up, what with the square cube law being what it is. So let's just say they wear really, really big flippers, eh?

I would think that the lacedon problem may be that they are waterlogged dead bodies. Corpses in water tend to bloat, lots. They're not fantastic swimmers, but if they're waterlogged they're probably neutrally buoyant. On land, though: squish, squish

Bloated corpses are really gross, by the way. I used waterlogged zombies to great effect in a water adventure one time, and managed to squick everyone out with the description.

hmm... Wonder how creepy it would be to use a merman community that animates dead on the surface dweller corpses thrown into the sea, and uses them as menial labor (and fish food)? Bet that would make a memorable merfolk encounter.

JRM

01-06-2009 10:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9806008)

Ah, but blue whales are extremely hydrodynamic, and have that honkin' huge fluke designed specifically to propel them in the water. Very efficient swimming design.

Storm giants, however, are basically really big humans. Humans are terribly inefficient swimmers -- the surface area available to push them forward is extremely limited, and humans present more cross-section to resist moving forward -- lots of drag in the water. Basically, storm giants should swim like humans who're stuck in water that has probably eight times more resistance to them moving forward.

I know all that, a better way of putting my point is that a blue whale is basically built in an identical fashion to the smaller baleen whales, such as the Minke but is, I believe, faster. The cross section to resist moving forward should scale with surface area, so the resistance ought to be proportional to area, not volume, and animal muscle produces force proportional to surface area as well. Ergo, the swim speed may be roughly independent of size. (Oh, and if I remember my fluid dynamics right the resistance to motion scales up with the cube of the speed, so if they swim 10% faster it's requires $(1.1 \times 1.1 \times 1.1 = 1.331)$ 33.1% more effort.

As for the storm giants, a giant would need to be stronger and tougher per pound than a man-sized humanoid just to walk around as easily as a human, so they may be able to swim faster than a human could.

EDIT: Of course, Storm giants also have supernatural powers, so their swim speed may be augmented by the same innate magic that allows them to levitate.

Sleeper

01-06-2009 10:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9807761)

I know all that, a better way of putting my point is that a blue whale is basically built in an identical fashion to the smaller baleen whales, such as the Minke but is, I believe, faster. The cross section to resist moving forward should scale with surface area, so the resistance ought to be proportional to area, not volume, and animal muscle produces force proportional to surface area as well. Ergo, the swim speed may be roughly independent of size. (Oh, and if I remember my fluid dynamics right the resistance to motion scales up with the cube of the speed, so if they swim 10% faster it's requires $(1.1 \times 1.1 \times 1.1 = 1.331)$ 33.1% more effort.

The maximum effective speed of a sailing vessel is proportional to the square root of the hull length, so ignoring scaling issues, big creatures are faster. Resistance is based on the interaction between the vessel and the waves it generates, and larger vessels generate longer waves. Oversimplifying things, the maximum velocity in knots is roughly 1.34 times the square root of the hull length in feet for a traditional vessel. For a more general calculation that determines general resistance, look up the Froude number. I'm not sure how this applies to submerged objects, which have to worry about three dimensional waves, cavitation, and such.

JRM

01-06-2009 11:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9807882)

The maximum effective speed of a sailing vessel is proportional to the square root of the hull length, so ignoring scaling issues, big creatures are faster. Resistance is based on the interaction between the vessel and the waves it generates, and larger vessels generate longer waves. Oversimplifying things, the maximum velocity in knots is roughly 1.34 times the square root of the hull length in feet for a traditional vessel. For a more general calculation that determines general resistance, look up the Froude number. I'm not sure how this applies to submerged objects, which have to worry about three dimensional waves, cavitation, and such.

I'd think that's probably irrelevant for swimming animals, since it's for surface vessels with conventional rigid hulls.

I remember an old Dragon Magazine article that used that equation, and the resulting letters from nautical buffs pointing out it was a gross oversimplification (IIRC something to do with how it wasn't the maximum performance, but the most efficient speed of a vessel of a given size, and that the wind- and oar-power limitations would be the main factor in restricting a ship from that era anyway.)

noisms

01-06-2009 11:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mimic

Good old Mimics. It's been a while since we've seen one of the old 'screw over too-trusting adventurers' monsters, of which Mimics are probably the best example. They basically operate like glorified sentient fly papers for humanoids - tempting them with something they might like, then making them stick with massively strong glue.

There are a few curiosities in the entry:

- Language - Mimics have their own tongue - a rival for Elven Cat in the rarity stakes? Perhaps not; there probably is some use for Mimic language at least.
- Usefulness - Mimics' bodies can be used for a variety of things - polymorph self potions, manufacture of perfumes, alchemical processes, and even food for some cultures.
- Alcohol - they hate the stuff and it's about the only thing that can guarantee them letting go of you if they're stuck. Sounds like the ideal excuse for carrying beer around the dungeon.

Sleeper

01-06-2009 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9807948)

I'd think that's probably irrelevant for swimming animals, since it's for surface vessels with conventional rigid hulls.

I remember an old Dragon Magazine article that used that equation, and the resulting letters from nautical buffs pointing out it was a gross oversimplification (IIRC something to do with how it wasn't the maximum performance, but the most efficient speed of a vessel of a given size, and that the wind- and oar-power limitations would be the main factor in restricting a ship from that era anyway.)

Dragon 70. I don't have the issue in front of me, but I thought the problem was that they had screwed up the equation entirely. Rowboats faster than ships of the line or something. But yes, it's not maximum performance. It's the point at which performance really drops off. And only late vessels like packets and clippers would ever approach that speed. But the general principle should hold. Resistance is determined by waves, and the Froude number should apply. If you look at actual examples, most of the really fast fish fall into the big but not huge size category. The blue whale is one of the exceptions; marlins and sailfish and tuna and such are more typical.

Belchion

01-06-2009 11:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9807974)

Alcohol - they hate the stuff and it's about the only thing that can guarantee them letting go of you if they're stuck. Sounds like the ideal excuse for carrying beer around the dungeon.

In that case, I suspect dwarven teenagers being the reason for the existence of Mimics. "Son, why are you carrying beer with you on the patrol?" "Oh, ah, we might meet an enemy we can only free us from with alcohol." Little later, the gods decided to prevent dwarves from further using magic in order to prevent the further creation of such creature.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9808051)

But the general principle should hold. Resistance is determined by waves, and the Froude number should apply. If you look at actual examples, most of the really fast fish fall into the big but not huge size category. The blue whale is one of the exceptions; marlins and sailfish and tuna and such are more typical.

Resistance is not the only factor playing in to human swimming speed. And while comparing sailing vessels and sea creatures may make sense -- they're all streamlined, after all -- it is a very poor comparison for the mechanics of how humans swim. And it would be even worse underwater; humans are faster on the surface.

Anyway. Everyone knows that you don't bring beer with you in case of Mimics -- too much water content! Bring hard liquor! Can also be used as Molotov cocktails when necessary.

Sheesh. Kids these days. Probably going into dungeons with listening cones without mesh screens and no ten-foot poles, either. tsk.

JRM

01-07-2009 01:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9807974)

Mimic

I remember back when I saw the Monstrous Manual for the first time. I opened it at random, and it happened to be the mimic entry. My first thought was "boy, the picture sucks", then I glanced through the text and read "Common mimics occupy about 150 cubic feet (a 3' x 6' x 8' chest, or a large door frame). Killer mimics occupy about 200 cubic feet" and thought "that's awfully big" - it's the volume of a skip, a dumpster or a small room!

Common mimics occupy the same 150 cubic feet in the 3rd edition MM, their description also quotes 5 feet by 5 feet by 6 feet as typical dimensions and adds they weigh about 4,500 pounds.

Mimics that big has long been a puzzle to me, I can see it going several ways.

Option #1: Mimics really are that big, but chests you find down dungeon's are a more reasonable size, say 2'x2'x4'. As a result a mimic chest would be suspiciously oversized unless it was in the lair of a giant or somesuch. However, a mimic could easily get around this by becoming both a regular-sized chest and a plinth it is "standing" upon. Come to think of it, that would have the added bonus that the mimic's prospective victims could be standing on it when it chooses to attack!

Option #2: Mimics are actually smaller than the Monstrous Compendium says, being the volume of a reasonable sized chest. Say 15 cubic feet for common mimics (enough for the aforementioned 2'x2'x4' chest), 20 cubic feet for killer mimics. If they're flesh is as dense as a typical land animal (~50 lbs per cubic foot), that's still the weight of a bear (750-1000 pounds). This is my preferred solution. A mimic can still make itself bigger just by incorporating vacuoles (air-pockets) in its body.

Option #3: Mimics are really that big, but so are standard-sized dungeon chests. That seems a bit odd. It would help explain why parties rarely carry captured chests to a safe location before opening them if the chests weighed two tons and were too big to fit through the doors! Although it seems excessive to use chests as big as compact cars when they may only contain a few gems and a bag of 50 gp! Furthermore, if the chest is 4-5 feet tall, an average sized adventurer wouldn't be able reach the bottom without using an extended grab or climbing into the chest - whereupon there's a good chance they'd trigger a trap inside the chest such as, oh, a glassteel lid slams shut over the chest and the floor slides away to reveal the chute of a giant mincing machine. (Obviously, the Dungeon Keeper would not use steel bars or a lid since the victim(s) could hold onto bars to stop themselves falling into the supply chute for their Dungeonburger franchise, while an opaque lid would deny the characters outside the chest the pleasure of witnessing the fate of its contents.)

Of course, that's is assuming the mimic assumes its traditional form of a treasure chest. I love mimics, but have never had them disguise themselves as such an object. Why should I when there are so many other amusing alternatives - a urinal, a bedframe (covered with a mattress), a statue, a crude dugout canoe, et cetera.

JRM

01-07-2009 01:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9808411)

Anyway. Everyone knows that you don't bring beer with you in case of Mimics -- too much water content! Bring hara liquor! Can also be used as Molotov cocktails when necessary.

Sheesh. Kids these days. Probably going into dungeons with listening cones without mesh screens and no ten-foot poles, either. tsk.

Now I'm wondering how alcoholic the "alcohol" required to dissolve mimic glue is. If you can use wine, then experienced adventurers could just bring really strong beer. I've got a bottle of Samichlaus waiting for a special occasion that's 14% by alcohol and, in theory, you could brew beer even stronger than that. If you need a really high alcohol content, say 60-90% like some vodkas or Stroh Rum (ghastly stuff the both of them), supplies might be more difficult to acquire with medieval technology.

Wakshaani

01-07-2009 01:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Probably the meanest mimic I ever saw was oen disguised as an iron portculis. It'd clearly been dropped and teh chain to the winch on teh other side cut, so, all you had to do was grab it and lift it with two or three people.

Who then got stuck because ... hello? Mimic?

And so there you were in a ten foot wide tunnel, your strongest guys unarmed and stuck to a Mimic, and everyone else behind them going, "Uh, crap, didn't see that coming. Uh. Crap. What do we do now?!"

The Last Conformist

01-07-2009 02:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9807761)

As for the storm giants, a giant would need to be stronger and tougher per pound than a man-sized humanoid just to walk around as easily as a human, so they may be able to swim faster than a human could.

Strictly speaking, they don't need to be stronger per pound - it's just that achieving even equal strength per pound is hard, since, for a given efficiency of muscle fibers, muscle weight goes up faster than muscle strength when you scale up (weight goes as the third power of linear size, strength as the second).

Now, assuming our natatorial storm giant to have superefficient muscles that give him human-level strength per pound of body mass, he should be able to swim faster than a human because he can produce equal propulsive power per unit body mass, but the drag force per unit body mass will be less (at a given speed) because the total drag force scales as the second power of linear size.

(Obviously, this is a very simplistic analysis, but I feel fairly confident that considering the details won't overturn the qualitative result.)

JRM

01-07-2009 02:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Oh, and a few miscellaneous comments.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9807974)

Mimic

Good old Mimics. It's been a while since we've seen one of the old 'screw over too-trusting adventurers' monsters, of which Mimics are probably the best example. They basically operate like glorified sentient fly papers for humanoids tempting them with something they might like, then making them stick with massively strong glue.

I like the idea of gargantuan monsters using Mimics as a type of pest control. "Honey, adventurers have got in our small change again. Be a dear and lay out some mimics, will you." That would tie in with Mimics being scaled to giant-sized treasure chests, too. There's nothing in "Mimics were originally created by wizards to protect themselves from treasure hunters" that says they were human wizards, maybe they are creations of the Arcane (Mercane), evil Titans or weirder creatures.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9807974)

There are a few curiosities in the entry:

- Language - Mimics have their own tongue - a rival for Elven Cat in the rarity stakes? Perhaps not; there probably is some use for Mimic language at least.
- Usefulness - Mimics' bodies can be used for a variety of things - polymorph self potions, manufacture of perfumes, alchemical processes, and even food for some cultures.

- Alcohol - they hate the stuff and it's about the only thing that can guarantee them letting go of you if they're stuck. Sounds like the ideal excuse for carrying beer around the dungeon.

Unless my memory deceives me, mimics usually only spoke Common in 1st edition AD&D (well, why do you think the talking variety are called Common Mimics, eh? ;)) and I like that notion better than them having a language all of their own. The 2E Mimic entry says the mimic language uses "corruptions of the original language spoken by their wizard creators", which mean the DM may have to decide who created them in order to determine their language.

Although it could be used as a adventure hook - the mimics creators are all long dead, and the players need to learn how to command one of their ancient magical devices to save the day, but the only creatures that can still pronounce their tongue are the mimics, so they have to persuade one to cooperate.

As for all the alchemical and magical uses of mimic bodies and their secretions, maybe that was a deliberate feature built in by their wizard creators. Then they could get some use out of the creatures when they're not eating thieves.

Mr. Teapot

01-07-2009 02:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9807974)
Good old Mimics.

Mimics themselves are great. But they make so many other monsters redundant. Almost any monster that disguises itself as something harmless (of which 2nd ed had lots) could be replaced with a Mimic doing the same thing. Right? I mean, who needs a Lurker Above or a Darkmantle when you could have a Mimic hide as the ceiling or some bit of architecture on the ceiling? Who needs a Trapper or that monster that looks like a bunny and a tree stump when you have a Mimic around?

I imagine that all these second class mimics are really just hyper-specialized mimics. They split off from the "main" branch of mimics a long time ago and evolved into more specific harmless looking forms. Probably Doppelgangers are the sentient/humanoid branch of that family: they are to mimics as humans are to chimpanzees, or something.

So cue up an adventure with some medieval biologist travelling around studying as many mimic wannabe species as you can find between your Monstrous Manuals and Fiend Folios.

Or maybe reverse that: Mimics evolved from Doppelgangers, not vice versa. doppelgangers were once humans, who have been branching off into more monstrous forms (perhaps a race of humanoids who became so skilled in illusions or transmutation that it infused them, but destroyed their culture). Mimics are a stage or two beyond doppelgangers: they have become better at disguising themselves, but in turn become more monstrous as well.

demiurge1138

01-07-2009 03:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

My problem with mimics is really a problem with how they're used. They're always used as chests. There's so many more innovative things for a mimic to disguise itself as.

Vultur10

01-07-2009 03:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I was just thinking earlier today about how a biologist transported to D&D would cope.

I think nothing ever went extinct - and everything kept evolving. Carrion Crawlers are relatives of Hallucigenia; most of the Aberrations are probably descended from Cambrian life. (The Mind Flayer is clearly a case of symbiosis between an invertebrate of this lineage and a humanoid.) Dragons and their kin are derived from Permian and Triassic lineages of reptiles and synapsids that became extinct in the real world. Lizardfolk, Troglodytes, etc. are descended from small swamp-living theropod dinosaurs. Dire Animals are the natural result of evolution in a world with predators much nastier than those in reality.

Elves and halflings are related to humans, possibly magically altered subspecies. Dwarves are more distinct and probably from a separate line of higher primates; gnomes are dwarf relatives. Goblins are probably close to human ancestors, maybe Homo habilis or Homo ergaster. Orcs are Neanderthals that gave up some of their intelligence for a smaller brain, and thus easier birth and a faster breeding rate. Ogres and Hill Giants are Neanderthal-derived as well, but lost intelligence because it was no longer necessary with their brute size and strength. Fire Giants may be related; they seem to have the same heavy build. Frost, Stone, Cloud, and Storm Giants I'm not certain about.

Mr. Teapot

01-07-2009 03:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9808937)

My problem with mimics is really a problem with how they're used. They're always used as chests. There's so many more innovative things for a mimic to disguise itself as.

That's what I'm talking about. If you used a mimic with a little imagination, you wouldn't need all those other monsters.

6inTruder

01-07-2009 04:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9808749)

Mimics themselves are great. But they make so many other monsters redundant. Almost any monster that disguises itself as something harmless (of which 2nd ed had lots) could be replaced with a Mimic doing the same thing. Right? I mean, who needs a Lurker Above or a Darkmantle when you could have a Mimic hide as the ceiling or some bit of architecture on the ceiling? Who needs a Trapper or that monster that looks like a bunny and a tree stump when you have a Mimic around?

I hope the Wolf In Sheep's Clothing makes it into the 4ed MM2.

Sleeper

01-07-2009 09:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9808411)

Resistance is not the only factor playing in to human swimming speed. And while comparing sailing vessels and sea creatures may make sense -- they're all streamlined, after all -- it is a very poor comparison for the mechanics of how humans swim. And it would be even worse underwater; humans are faster on the surface.

Of course not; a rigid hull with an external power source (motor, sails) is hard to compare to a fish, where the body itself deforms (carps twist into a C-shape when starting suddenly) and even the flippers have to be flexible (to make minute adjustments to the surface throughout the stroke). But barring hypercavitation or similar ways of avoiding the issue, you still have to deal with resistance and presumably it scales in the same fashion based on size. I have no idea how to compare a human swimmer with a fish-like monster, but we can at least start to compare a giant human with a regular human.

Beyond the basic scaling of muscle power and resistance with size, I don't know enough about hydrodynamics and the biomechanical adaptations to make any real guesses. A better tool is probably a comparison of observed speeds. I know there have been a few studies that indicate that the running speed of land animals seems to scale with the square root of linear size. I'm not sure if that applies to swimming, but even if it's wrong it probably feels about right since we humans do have a terrestrial bias. And that's usually good enough for a game.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9808508)

I remember back when I saw the Monstrous Manual for the first time. I opened it at random, and it happened to be the mimic entry. My first thought was "boy, the picture sucks", then I glanced through the text and read "Common mimics occupy about 150 cubic feet (a 3' x 6' x 8' chest, or a large door frame). Killer mimics occupy about 200 cubic feet" and thought "that's awfully big" - it's the volume of a skip, a dumpster or a small room!

Common mimics occupy the same 150 cubic feet in the 3rd edition MM, their description also quotes 5 feet by 5 feet by 6 feet as typical dimensions and adds they weigh about 4,500 pounds.

I never noticed that. That is really, really weird. Most mimics are pictured as doors, or mostly empty chests with some miscellaneous shiny things at the bottom. Not a wardrobe filled solid with flesh. Assuming a normalish door (say 7 ft x 3 ft x 2 inches), you're only looking at a couple cubic feet (3.5 in this case). Even a huge portal (say 12 ft x 5 ft x 8 in) would be under 50 cubic feet (40). I wouldn't go with more than 10 cubic feet.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9809065)

I was just thinking earlier today about how a biologist transported to D&D would cope.

I think nothing ever went extinct - and everything kept evolving. Carrion Crawlers are relatives of Hallucigenia; most of the Aberrations are probably descended from Cambrian life. (The Mind Flayer is clearly a case of symbiosis between an invertebrate of this lineage and a humanoid.) Dragons and their kin are derived from Permian and Triassic lineages of reptiles and synapsids that became extinct in the real world. Lizardfolk, Troglodytes, etc. are descended from small swamp-living theropod dinosaurs. Dire Animals are the natural result of evolution in a world with predators much nastier than those in reality.

I think what would drive biologists craziest is magical hybridization. Phylogeny is based on a straight line of descent. Yet with magic, you have owls crossed with bears, insects with humans, and even more convoluted monstrosities like the chimera. The tree of life becomes a lattice.

However, it would be a fascinating exercise to try to extrapolate monsters based on early Cambrian or even Ediacaran lifeforms. Or perhaps an invasion by deep sea animals. A world of strange misbegotten things, alien beyond imagining and yet still based on real creatures.

Zartes

01-07-2009 01:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

If mimics hate alcohol, particularly the strong stuff that can dissolve their natural adhesive coating, perhaps there might be an adventure in a mimic (or even a group of them) infiltrating a brewery or winery and trying to destroy it from the inside. Maybe with the help of a local priest with rather strong views on the evils of drink.

sim_james

01-07-2009 04:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

On the subject of making the Mimic language somewhat relevant in a game, I am imagining a Spelljammer campaign in which the PCs meet a ship crewed exclusively by mimics. They'd be neutral rather than rampaging PC-eaters, perhaps a promising trade partner.

It gives you the opportunity to have the PCs negotiate with a room full of talking furniture.

What would a mimic civilisation be like? Do mimics flow frequently from one form to the next, or do they have their own preferences? Can you perhaps infer something about a mimic's personality based on the type of furniture that he prefers to be?

JRM

01-07-2009 06:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9808661)

Strictly speaking, they don't need to be stronger per pound - it's just that achieving even equal strength per pound is hard, since, for a given efficiency of muscle fibers, muscle weight goes up faster than muscle strength when you scale up (weight goes as the third power of linear size, strength as the second).

Oh blast it, that was just a typo. I meant to say stronger per cross-sectional area not per pound, but my fingers didn't know what my mind was thinking (or something like that). They would need to approximate the same strength-per-pound as the smaller creatures to match their performance.

I may have been mixed up by remembering a giant animal's skeletal structure needs to be tougher per pound if it has identical proportions to a regular sized creature. (Normally built animals have bones which are proportionally thicker as they enlarge, because the stress they're under is roughly proportional to the animal's mass (i.e. cube-power) but they're ability not to break under it scales to the bones cross-section (i.e. square-power). So, an animal twice as tall will need bones some 2.8 times thicker to move about with the same safety. Unfortunately, you eventually reach a point where the leg-bones are too thick for the animal to move. Fabulous oversized monsters, like giants and dragons, don't usually have enormously thick legs, ergo either their bones are tougher than regular creatures (which would explain why dragonbone is such a desirable material), or they have some innate weight-neutralizing property (natural levitation, buoyancy-sacs or whatever.).

JRM

01-07-2009 06:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9808616)

Probably the meanest mimic I ever saw was one disguised as an iron portcullis. It'd clearly been dropped and the chain to the winch on the other side cut, so, all you had to do was grab it and lift it with two or three people.

Who then got stuck because ... hello? Mimic?

And so there you were in a ten foot wide tunnel, your strongest guys unarmed and stuck to a Mimic, and everyone else behind them going, "Uh, crap, didn't see that coming. Uh. Crap. What do we do now?!"

Oh that's an evil idea. I heartily approve! It does not really accord with my conception of the Mimic's shape-changing powers, I always imagined them as being restricted to a single mass without much in the way of holes in it, and a portcullis has so many perforations, but I'm sure I can rationalize that away...

Hmm, obviously the main body of the mimic is the archway, which is thick enough to comfortably contain the mimic's brain(s) and other vital organs. The portcullis and chains are pseudopods the mimic has extruded across itself and then changed to assume the appearance of rusty iron.

JRM

01-07-2009 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9808749)

Mimics themselves are great. But they make so many other monsters redundant. Almost any monster that disguises itself as something harmless (of which 2nd ed had lots) could be replaced with a Mimic doing the same thing. Right? I mean, who needs a Lurker Above or a Darkmantle when you could have a Mimic hide as the ceiling or some bit of architecture on the ceiling? Who needs a Trapper or that monster that looks like a bunny and a tree stump when you have a Mimic around?

Well some of those monsters have abilities mimics don't (e.g. Lurker Aboves and Darkmantles can fly), but I agree in principle. Trappers, Forest Trappers and Wolf-in-Sheeps-Clothing don't bring anything to the table that a Mimic doesn't - well, except for the latter's furry glove puppet.

Would it help to think of it as an example of convergent evolution? Maybe in D&D-World adventurers are such an abundant food source that there are a lot of predator species occupying the "pretend to be scenery and eat passing treasure seekers" niche.
:)

JRM

01-07-2009 06:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9808937)

My problem with mimics is really a problem with how they're used. They're always used as chests. There's so many more innovative things for a mimic to disguise itself as.

I agree entirely, that's why I prefer alternative forms, as I said earlier:

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9808508)

Of course, that's is assuming the mimic assumes its traditional form of a treasure chest. I love mimics, but have never had them disguise themselves as such an object. Why should I when there are so many other amusing alternatives - a urinal, a bedframe (covered with a mattress), a statue, a crude dugout canoe, et cetera.

Oh, and I'm definitely adding portcullis to that list, I'll be sure to tell my players to thank Wakshaani!:D

DMH

01-07-2009 08:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9810237)

I think what would drive biologists craziest is magical hybridization. Phylogeny is based on a straight line of descent. Yet with magic, you have owls crossed with bears, insects with humans, and even more convoluted monstrosities like the chimera. The tree of life becomes a lattice.

Which is sort of like the real world. The fusion of organisms has been known for at least a few decades. Lichens and mitochondria are the two that get the most attention, but there are others like mycorrhiza and gut flora.

Symbiosis is something that should be used more in games.

Sleeper

01-07-2009 08:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9811686)

Which is sort of like the real world. The fusion of organisms has been known for at least a few decades. Lichens and mitochondria are the two that get the most attention, but there are others like mycorrhiza and gut flora.

Symbiosis is something that should be used more in games.

Now that would be fascinating. An owl bear is not just a bear that grew an owl's head. It's a bear's body, with an actual owl's head. The two are separate organisms, in a symbiotic relationship. And since it's a fantasy world, perhaps the head of a slain owlbear can pull out tiny vestigial claws and jump off and then run through the woods, looking for a newly headless bear to fuse with. Are normal animals sometimes born with detachable heads? Does it require the right magical conditions, like the witch's hour on the equinox in the shadow of a gibbet? Do the heads of a chimera sometimes split up and run around on their own, while their body rests?

Studying taxonomy might require a San check.

kelvingreen

01-07-2009 08:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9811256)

I am imagining a Spelljammer campaign in which the PCs meet a ship crewed exclusively by mimics.

"Crewed"? Surely the ship itself would be an oversized mimic!

Sleeper

01-07-2009 08:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9811728)
"Crewed"? Surely the ship itself would be an oversized mimic!

Better yet, a composite mimic. A race that can shape itself into inanimate objects might never learn how to use tools. Instead they must either spend part of their life in some strange twist on the concept of feudal duty, or they have an underclass that perpetually serves an overclass. In either case, the subservient mimics themselves become the tools of the rest of the mimics. As they develop engineering, their designs grow grander. One mimic is fitted into the next, which is fitted into the next. And mimic by mimic, they build simple huts, then walls, then grand cathedrals. Wheels and carts, then boats, then whole ships.

The bowhead sings to itself, the deck whispers gossip from plank to plank, the bed gently hugs. That would explain their own language. If they spend most of their life immobile in a communal environment, they'd naturally develop a great oral culture. If a fireball takes out the rigging, the oars might start crying with grief and rage. A hole in the hull? The ship would shift and change and reengineer itself with much jostling and squabbling, filling in the holes.

They could even transform, perhaps not quickly but overnight, with many whines and complaints from those who have become accustomed to their old shapes as they scabble over each other into their new places. The ship disassembles, and under the direction of the mates becomes a series of wagons and carts as the merchant vessel becomes a caravan. Each shape or form might be a separate skill or profession, and the ship's master has to fit the right mimic to the right new position. One mimic might know how to lead the ship as the bowhead, or become stiff and perfectly round as a wheel and not burn from the friction. Another might just be a series of planks in the wall, but known for discretion and so chosen to hang in the room where confidential meetings are held.

DMH

01-07-2009 08:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9811721)

Now that would be fascinating. An owl bear is not just a bear that grew an owl's head. It's a bear's body, with an actual owl's head. The two are separate organisms, in a symbiotic relationship. And since it's a fantasy world, perhaps the head of a slain owlbear can pull out tiny vestigial claws and jump off and then run through the woods, looking for a newly headless bear to fuse with. Are normal animals sometimes born with detachable heads? Does it require the right magical conditions, like the witch's hour on the equinox in the shadow of a gibbet? Do the heads of a chimera sometimes split up and run around on their own, while their body rests?

Studying taxonomy might require a San check.

Heh. When I create aggregates for Mutant Future, I usually have them act as one (like Bob the chimera or the scaled hog), but to actually give them the ability to separate- now that is gold.

Thanks for the idea!

Wakshaani

01-07-2009 09:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 9810993)

If mimics hate alcohol, particularly the strong stuff that can dissolve their natural adhesive coating, perhaps there might be an adventure in a mimic (or even a group of them) infiltrating a brewery or winery and trying to destroy it from the inside. Maybe with the help of a local priest with rather strong views on the evils of drink.

Sadly, I wasn't around for teh other two threads, so I missed a few BIG ones.

This reminds me of how I missed Dwarf, which makes me sad.

One thing I tossed in on Dwarves a while back was that, originally, Dwarves were close to Deep Dwarves, not the portly gruff fellows we all know and love today. Wayyyy back when, they met humans for the first time and started a trade, things mined from underground (Iron, gold, high-quality rock) and mining technique for food, lumber, and alcohol. Dwarves had something vaguely similar, using moss, but it was pretty awful. Humans, however, lived up top, where sunlight could grow things, like hops and barley, and introduced Dwarves to real beer. In no time at all, it spread like wildfire, turning into a major scourge for Dwarfkind... weight blew up from good food and beerguts, melencholy kicked off, alcoholic children were born and teh civilization declined. There's a Temperence movement being lead by Dwarven women, now, trying to be the salvation of teh race, but the men are simply too much into drinking now to ever go back. And so, quietly, the once proud and noble Dwarven society is crumbling from within.

Mr. Teapot

01-07-2009 09:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9811418)

Oh that's an evil idea. I heartily approve!

It's from (or found in, at least) the 3.5 update to White Plume Mountain
where it replaced a different trap in the original module.

Mr. Teapot

01-07-2009 10:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9811256)

What would a mimic civilisation be like? Do mimics flow frequently from one form to the next, or do they have their own preferences? Can you perhaps infer something about a mimic's personality based on the type of furniture that he prefers to be?

You have a couple of different factions/ideologies:

There are mimics who change form all the time, to fit their mood and their current purpose. They think that adaptability is their race's primary trait, and they should embrace this goal wholeheartedly. They tend to be independent, and are the kinds of mimics most often found by adventurers because they're most likely to wander away from mimic society.

There are mimics that try to perfect a single given form. These mimics expect their children to experiment with different forms throughout childhood, but settle on a single form once they reach adulthood. Some branches of mimic society formalize this into a ceremonial ritual, whereby a form is chosen, but for many mimics this is a more casual force of habit thing. The mimic finds that he likes appearing as a statue, so he doesn't bother coming up with something else to look like each morning. While other mimics will recognize him regardless of form, this tends to make it easier for non-mimics to tell a specific mimic apart from other ones. This ideology is more common among Neutral mimics and those who otherwise work alongside non-mimic races. Mimic diplomats, merchants and other roles that require contact with outside societies.

Finally, you have Mimics who have rejected deception altogether. They refuse to modify their form to appear like anything else. Some try to find an ideal Mimic form, which has a mystic meaning for them. Others just prefer to appear as abstract or artistic forms. After all, if you can look like (almost) anything, why restrict yourself to pieces of furniture? Oftentimes, when these mimics are encountered by humanoid races, the humanoid fails to realize that this is a Mimic at all, especially if the Mimic keeps to a single form throughout the encounter. These mimics are rarely encountered in battle, since disguise is a survival trait for mimics and abandoning it is hazardous in battle situations.

Of course, since these are ideologies, there are Mimics who switch between these subcultures and those who blend two or more of these together and all other sorts of complications.

Mr. Teapot

01-07-2009 10:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9810237)

I never noticed that. That is really, really weird. Most mimics are pictured as doors, or mostly empty chests with some miscellaneous shiny things at the bottom. Not a wardrobe filled solid with flesh. Assuming a normalish door (say 7 ft x 3 ft x 2 inches), you're only looking at a couple cubic feet (3.5 in this case). Even a huge portal (say 12 ft x 5 ft x 8 in would be under 50 cubic feet (40). I wouldn't go with more than 10 cubic feet.

Well, the Mimic might just disguise one side of itself as a door and press up into the doorway. After all, you can't tell how thick a door is until after you open it. So the mimic door could be way thicker than a real door, but by the time you notice this discrepancy, you're busy fighting the horrible abomination.

JRM

01-07-2009 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9811686)

Which is sort of like the real world. The fusion of organisms has been known for at least a few decades. Lichens and mitochondria are the two that get the most attention, but there are others like mycorrhiza and gut flora.

Symbiosis is something that should be used more in games.

I prefer to think magic encourages practically impossible hybridizations. There are whole families of bacteria which can exchange DNA packets to produce children with traits from both parents 'species'. I'm thinking something like this may happen in D&D.

Say, in the case of the manticores a lioness happened to sit on a scorpion's spermatophore in the real world the odds of the DNA combining into something viable would be astronomical, as would be the odds that the scorpion sperm could penetrate the lioness's egg - octodecillions and centillion to one, so unlikely it would probably never happen in the history of the Universe. But maybe magical physics reduces those odds to something extremely unlikely, so it happens once every decade or so, and such creatures can breed "true" with their own kind, and some of the time with half-compatible species.

Of course, wizards and the like discovered how to do this, which is why a lot of monsters are credited to the proverbial mad archmagi.

JRM

01-07-2009 10:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9811790)

Better yet, a composite mimic. A race that can shape itself into inanimate objects might never learn how to use tools. Instead they must either spend part of their life in some strange twist on the concept of feudal duty, or they have an underclass that perpetually serves an overclass. In either case, the subservient mimics themselves become the tools of the rest of the mimics. As they develop engineering, their designs grow grander. One mimic is fitted into the next, which is fitted into the next. And mimic by mimic, they build simple huts, then walls, then grand cathedrals. Wheels and carts, then boats, then whole ships.

The bowhead sings to itself, the deck whispers gossip from plank to plank, the bed gently hugs. That would explain their own language. If they spend most of their life immobile in a communal environment, they'd naturally develop a great oral culture. If a fireball takes out the rigging, the oars might start crying with grief and rage. A hole in the hull. The ship would shift and change and reengineer itself with much jostling and squabbling, filling in the holes.

They could even transform, perhaps not quickly but overnight, with many whines and complaints from those who have become accustomed to their old shapes as they scabble over each other into their new places. The ship disassembles, and under the direction of the mates becomes a series of wagons and carts as the merchant vessel becomes a caravan. Each shape or form might be a separate skill or profession, and the ship's master has to fit the right mimic to the right new position. One mimic might know how to lead the ship as the bowhead, or become stiff and perfectly round as a wheel and not burn from the friction. Another might just be a series of planks in the wall, but known for discretion and so chosen to hang in the room where confidential meetings are held.

There are some nice images there, but why would a civilization of mimics build ships designed to cater to humanoids? I imagine a ship made by mimics for mimics would resemble some weird living creature. It wouldn't need a ship's wheel, because its rudder/tail moves by itself. Its interior doesn't have staterooms, beds or paintings, just storage spaces and passages large enough for mimics to quickly move from place to place. If the mimics build spelljammers, the heart of each flying ship may be a "helm mimic" with spellcasting powers.

I can see a few explanations for a mimic ship looking like a human vessel.

(a) It is designed for the comfort and convenience of a humanoid crew, either its wizard masters (who may be long dead, but the mimic ship's design is constrained by ancient instinct and genetic programming) or the "thinking class mimic" have human form, possibly being doppelgangers or doppelganger-like as previously mentioned.

(b) It's just another aspect of a mimic's instinctive hunting strategy. A ship come across an apparently abandoned vessel floating adrift, which they sail up to to claim as a prize. Some of the crew go aboard, but horror is unleashed when the door to the Captain's cabin is opened to reveal a wall of living flesh from which an inhuman eye the size of a dinner-plate glares. Sticky pseudopods explode from the planks, the holds gape open into fanged maws and the mimic-vessel's masts turn into tentacles which trap the curious ship in their coils. An hour or two later and the mimic vessel has eaten the other ship, and may be halfway to budding off a small yacht offspring.

JRM

01-07-2009 10:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9811983)
It's from (or found in, at least) the 3.5 update to White Plume Mountain
where it replaced a different trap in the original module.

Oh thanks Mr Teapot.

I've got that scenario sitting on my harddrive somewhere, but never got around to looking through it, since I've already read the original version and the 2nd Ed sequel.

Kapten

01-07-2009 10:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812090)
There are some nice images there, but why would a civilization of mimics build ships designed to cater to humanoids? I imagine a ship made by mimics for mimics would resemble some weird living creature. It wouldn't need a ship's wheel, because its rudder/tail moves by itself. Its interior doesn't have staterooms, beds or paintings, just storage spaces and passages large enough for mimics to quickly move from place to place. If the mimics build spelljammers, the heart of each flying ship may be a "helm mimic" with spellcasting powers.

I can see a few explanations for a mimic ship looking like a human vessel.

(a) It is designed for the comfort and convenience of a humanoid crew, either its wizard masters (who may be long dead, but the mimic ship's design is constrained by ancient instinct and genetic programming) or the "thinking class mimic" have human form, possibly being dopplegangers or doppleganger-like as previously mentioned.

(b) It's just another aspect of a mimic's instinctive hunting strategy. A ship come across an apparently abandoned vessel floating adrift, which they sail up to to claim as a prize. Some of the crew go aboard, but horror is unleashed when the door to the Captain's cabin is opened to reveal a wall of living flesh from which an inhuman eye the size of a dinner-plate glares. Stick pseudopods explode from the planks, the holds gape open into fanged maws and the mimic-vessel's masts turn into tentacles which trap the curious ship in their coils. An hour or two later and the mimic vessel has eaten the other ship, and maybe halfway to budding off a small yacht offspring.

Or, the masters are humanoids. Like some very advanced magical technology, they created mimics. The ones in the dungeons are the remains of their civilisation. Sort of the shoggoths of Lovecraft.

Sleeper

01-07-2009 11:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9812010)

Well, the Mimic might just disguise one side of itself as a door and press up into the doorway. After all, you can't tell how thick a door is until after you open it. So the mimic door could be way thicker than a real door, but by the time you notice this discrepancy, you're busy fighting the horrible abomination.

I thought of that, but it would be kind of weird to come upon a mimic-door from the wrong side. Instead of a nice doorfront with frame, knocker and all the touches you'd see from the front, you have a big organic plug or pustule filling in a doorway. Not bad weird, but definitely different.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812090)

There are some nice images there, but why would a civilization of mimics build ships designed to cater to humanoids? I imagine a ship made by mimics for mimics would resemble some weird living creature. It wouldn't need a ship's wheel, because its rudder/tail moves by itself. Its interior doesn't have staterooms, beds or paintings, just storage spaces and passages large enough for mimics to quickly move from place to place. If the mimics build spelljammers, the heart of each flying ship may be a "helm mimic" with spellcasting powers.

I can see a few explanations for a mimic ship looking like a human vessel.

(a) It is designed for the comfort and convenience of a humanoid crew, either its wizard masters (who may be long dead, but the mimic ship's design is constrained by ancient instinct and genetic programming) or the "thinking class mimic" have human form, possibly being dopplegangers or doppleganger-like as previously mentioned.

(b) It's just another aspect of a mimic's instinctive hunting strategy. A ship come across an apparently abandoned vessel floating adrift, which they sail up to to claim as a prize. Some of the crew go aboard, but horror is unleashed when the door to the Captain's cabin is opened to reveal a wall of living flesh from which an inhuman eye the size of a dinner-plate glares. Stick pseudopods explode from the planks, the holds gape open into fanged maws and the mimic-vessel's masts turn into tentacles which trap the curious ship in their coils. An hour or two later and the mimic vessel has eaten the other ship, and maybe halfway to budding off a small yacht offspring.

I try to avoid the "all alien technology is organic and gooey" stereotype. I feel it's tired and overdone. In this particular case, it also doesn't necessarily make a lot of sense. Mimics after all emulate inorganic objects, not plants or animals. And not just any inorganic objects, in particular they seem to emulate manufactured objects. Straight lines, circles, other geometric shapes. Instead of curves and bends or ever-repeating fractal patterns.

Which leaves lots of room for riffs. Mimic origins are obviously tied to civilization and the tools it crafted. But were they originally created to emulate objects, or are they from a wild stock that colonized and adapted to urban environments?

Also, the most important element is the facade, not the substance. The door looks real, the chest looks like it works. But unless they can mimic moving parts and fine three-dimensional detail, the locks won't work. The chest may be solid, or even if it opens the hasps might be a kind of flap not a hinge.

Why do they always seem to appear in remote dungeons and other sparsely inhabited areas? How do they propagate? Perhaps the killer mimics are rogues, or a rare stage in the lifestyle of a typical mimic. They go out, mask themselves, hunt, and eat voraciously. But perhaps they are naturally colonial animals. They live together, in great groups. Sharing whispers, dreams, company, chemical cues, warmth. But when they aren't out hunting and eating, they spend the vast majority of their life in a type of dormancy. They hunt outside on the frontiers and wilderness, but where they live most of the time is in cities.

Imagine a house, abandoned. A few oddities. Objects fused to other objects. Hallways that don't go anywhere. A little touch of Escher. But mostly seemingly normal. But it's got this terrible reputation. Cats and small children have vanished. People hear whispers in strange alien tongues. Things seem to shift and move when backs are turned.

That's because it's a mimic hive. Mostly somnolent, and except for a few mistakes they don't hunt where they live. But every piece of wall, of furniture, is a mimic. When they feel the urge to hunt, which is a tiny fraction of their lifespan, they hitch a ride with a wagon or cart or other object, and ride out of the city into the sewers or dungeons or frontiers. Before eventually finding their way home, flush, sated, and sleepy.

A dreaming, living house. And perhaps, if they are discovered, or the land becomes devastated or depopulated, or there is a disease, or any of a hundred of other reasons, they decide to pick up and move the colony. And overnight, to the horror of the neighbors, the house reassembles itself into a ship, or wagons, or other objects. And trundles off. Maybe you can't blame wizards for all those towers that suddenly appear overnight, as if by magic.

Now imagine those vessels or wagons or whatever. They'd appear to resemble whatever they're mimicking, at least superficially. But there would be pieces where they'd get it wrong, or they'd be lazy, or they'd lack a mimic with the requisite talent, or it's something that can't really be emulated by their bodies. Also, if they're designing it for themselves, they can cut a few corners. Make a few changes. Except for the greeting room where they meet visitors, there might not be any doors or corridors. Afterall, a mimic taking the place of a wall can just move, or become a door. There would be random objects in various places. Mimics resting in a favorite form, when they're not needed elsewhere say as a structural support or part of the hull. And so on.

JRM

01-07-2009 11:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 9812162)

Or, the masters are humanoids. Like some very advanced magical technology, they created mimics. The ones in the dungeons are the remains of their civilisation. Sort of the shoggoths of Lovecraft.

Yes, I've already implied as much in the first bit of option (a), e.g. "It is designed for the comfort and convenience of a humanoid crew, either its wizard masters (who may be long dead, but the mimic ship's design is constrained by ancient instinct and genetic programming)".

Of course, in the case of Shoggoths their original masters were not humanoid. Hmm... maybe Mimic Ships aren't built for humanoids either, with wide hexagonal doors to accommodate the unknown body shape of their long-forgotten masters (no prizes for recognizing the cinematic reference).

JRM

01-08-2009 12:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9812350)

I try to avoid the "all alien technology is organic and gooey" stereotype. I feel it's tired and overdone. In this particular case, it also doesn't necessarily make a lot of sense. Mimics after all emulate inorganic objects, not plants or animals. And not just any inorganic objects, in particular they seem to emulate manufactured objects. Straight lines, circles, other geometric shapes. Instead of curves and bends or ever-repeating fractal patterns.

Well I wasn't thinking they'd look like huge icky Gigeresque aliens, more like a living automaton (apparently) made of metal, stone or wood, the different materials blending together in ways that look nearly impossible to craft (obviously because it wasn't made using Craft skills, they just grew itself that way).

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9812350)

*Why do they always seem to appear in remote dungeons and other sparsely inhabited areas? How do they propagate? Perhaps the killer mimics are rogues, or a rare stage in the lifestyle of a typical mimic. *snip

The official answer is Mimics just split off new mimics when they're large enough. One idea I had was that Common and Killer Mimics are the same species, but Killer Mimics have just developed a fault in their wiring. A mimic's brain is probably spread about its body, so if the parts can't communicate properly the mimic becomes stupid (and hence a Killer Mimic), which most often happens when the mimic is oversized (which is why Killer Mimics are bigger than regular ones).

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9812350)

Imagine a house, abandoned. A few oddities. Objects fused to other objects. Hallways that don't go anywhere. A little touch of Escher. But mostly seemingly normal. But it's got this terrible reputation. Cats and small children have vanished. People hear whispers in strange alien tongues. Things seem to shift and move when backs are turned.

That's because it's a mimic hive. Mostly somnolent, and except for a few mistakes they don't hunt where they live.

There is an official D&D relative of the mimic that masquerades as a house, whose name temporarily escapes me. (I vaguely recall it's some awful pun like House Hunters).

One problem with house- and ship mimics is that, officially, mimics can't cope with sunlight, but that's easily houseruled away.

As for mimic wagons they can't form moving parts, remember. Thus a mimic wagon would either have to climb onto a wagon-frame (or just some ordinary axles and wheels) and spin those with its muscular foot/pseudopods, or do the same with wheels that are actually small, separate mimics (mimic wheels it can throw frisby-style at prey, obviously :D).

Sleeper

01-08-2009 12:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812451)

The official answer is Mimics just split off new mimics when they're large enough.

Oops. Never finished that idea, did I? That's the reason they go out on binge eating runs. Eat food so they can grow enough to spawn. Return home. The big door you walked through easily last week is now short enough that you bang your head, plus there's a new footstool in the middle of the room.

And I tend to look at official" answers as a jumping off point, at best :).

Quote:

One problem with house- and ship mimics is that, officially, mimics can't cope with sunlight, but that's easily houseruled away.

Hmm. Does appear there's a single throw-away line about that in 2E. Don't remember if that was in 1E or 3E. And there's no mechanic so it's a not a rule, it's fluff. House-fluffing away?

Quote:

As for mimic wagons they can't form moving parts, remember. Thus a mimic wagon would either have to climb onto a wagon-frame (or just some ordinary axles and wheels) and spin those with its muscular foot/pseudopods, or do the same with wheels that are actually small, separate mimics (mimic wheels it can throw frisby-style at prey, obviously :D).

Yes, I was imagining wheels and axles as separate mimics. That's why I mentioned they'd have to endure friction. The spinning wheel mimic probably has a skill set focused on creating specialized surfaces to reduce the heat. I didn't think about propulsion, though. They could just steal domestic animals. After all, one of them can just become a living yoke.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9812547)

Hmm. Does appear there's a single throw-away line about that in 2E. Don't remember if that was in 1E or 3E. And there's no mechanic so it's a not a rule, it's fluff. House-fluffing away?

Dragon Magazine Ecology of the Mimic went into more detail, saying they can live outdoors in heavily shaded areas (If I recall correctly, the article mentions them living in exceptionally dense forests, and one mimic that pretended to be a statue in the proverbial dark alley).

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9812547)

Yes, I was imagining wheels and axles as separate mimics. That's why I mentioned they'd have to endure friction. The spinning wheel mimic probably has a skill set focused on creating specialized surfaces to reduce the heat. I didn't think about propulsion, though. They could just steal domestic animals. After all, one of them can just become a living yoke.

Well an obvious solution would be the axle-mimic changes the glue-glands to grease-glands. A bit of lubrication works wonders, so I understand. As for using domesticated animals, for some reason I'm imagining a mimic-wagon with enormous hollow wheels with giant space hamsters inside them. That way, the mimics get propulsion and a back up food store, which it can increase by feeding the hamsters with crops harvested from the villages they ravage.

Sleeper

01-08-2009 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812667)

Dragon Magazine Ecology of the Mimic went into more detail, saying they can live outdoors in heavily shaded areas (If I recall correctly, the article mentions them living in exceptionally dense forests, and one mimic that pretended to be a statue in the proverbial dark alley).

Well, this is D&D. The basic idea is throw all kinds of bizarre and random crap at the wall, and see what sticks. The cool stuff hangs there and keeps reappearing, and everything else (like all those exception based rules, triapeghs, 99% of everything ever written in an "ecology" article...) just slides down and fades away.

points at mimic cowering in the shadows

"Fade away, fade away!"

kelvingreen

01-08-2009 04:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812090)

(b) It's just another aspect of a mimic's instinctive hunting strategy. A ship come across an apparently abandoned vessel floating adrift, which they sail up to to claim as a prize. Some of the crew go aboard, but horror is unleashed when the door to the Captain's cabin is opened to reveal a wall of living flesh from which an inhuman eye the size of a dinner-plate glares. Stick pseudopods explode from the planks, the holds gape open into fanged maws and the mimic-vessel's masts turn into tentacles which trap the curious ship in their coils. An hour or two later and the mimic vessel has eaten the other ship, and maybe halfway to budding off a small yacht offspring.

This.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9812350)

Which leaves lots of room for riffs. Mimic origins are obviously tied to civilization and the tools it crafted. But were they originally created to emulate objects, or are they from a wild stock that colonized and adapted to urban environments?

Or, to go a bit Pratchett, perhaps mimics used to be plain old harmless treasure chests, doors, etc, but with all that magic flying about and seeping in, they became alive. Sentience came first, and then the very matter which makes up their bodies became flexible and malleable.

JRM

01-08-2009 07:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9813350)

This.

Thank you kindly. Although you copying that text has just made me notice the typos. That's what I get for typing a stream-of-consciousness and not checking its spelling & grammar. My inner pedant forced me to edit the post to correct them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9813350)

Or, to go a bit Pratchett, perhaps mimics used to be plain old harmless treasure chests, doors, etc, but with all that magic flying about and seeping in, they became alive. Sentience came first, and then the very matter which makes u their bodies became flexible and malleable.

But then the mimics would have to move about on lots and lots of little legs rather than one huge slug-like foot, which is clearly unconscionable.;

Well, my personal taste is to keep what it says in the official sources (except for where it's clearly absurd and needs to be changed for the sake of the sanity of my campaign worlds), so I'd keep the mimics as shape changing organisms rather than some kind of living doppel-construct.

see

01-08-2009 09:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9801176)

He'd have to deaf as well not to hear the hissing from her hair.:D

Not to mention that she'd find it very difficult to have any intimate relations with her blind beau without him feeling there's something different about her head - I guess she could insist she belongs to an obscure cult which doesn't approve of people touching their heads, but it'd be tricky.

The MM's sentence "Medusae are female humanoids with hair of swarming snakes" does not, in fact, include anything that limits the hair to the head. How good are Brazilian waxes at removing snakes?

see

01-08-2009 10:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812451)

There is an official D&D relative of the mimic that masquerades as a house, whose name temporarily escapes me. (I vaguely recall it's some awful pun like House Hunters).

Yep. Mimic, House Hunter -- Monstrous Compendium Annual, Volume One.

Vultur10

01-08-2009 11:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9814455)

The MM's sentence "Medusae are female humanoids with hair of swarming snakes" does not, in fact, include anything that limits the hair to the head. How good are Brazilian waxes at removing snakes?

.... ouch. I really did not need that mental image.

+1 SAN Loss point, if you want it ;)

But seriously, that makes sense ... though, wow. They are supposed to mate with humans, and I think that would make the process fatal - unless the medusa can keep the snakes from biting even in those conditions.

sim_james

01-08-2009 09:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9812090)

There are some nice images there, but why would a civilization of mimics build ships designed to cater to humanoids?

Partly because I just like the image of a ship full of intelligent furniture. :D

But in terms of the game reality, I'd develop the artificial-race-created-by-wizards angle. Mimics could conceivably look like a deep pile of leaves or a natural rock formation... but they always seem to pose as crafted objects. I figure that they have to do so - perhaps its part of their psychology, or perhaps its an inbred magical limitation... one as ingrained as an Asimovian Law, so that breaking it is simply impossible for the Mimic. The "First Law of Mimicry" forbids it. ;) Even though their creator race has perhaps long since vanished (yeah, shades of shoggoths), these limitations remain.

But yeah... I admit that I simply adore the idea of the PCs meeting the captain of a trading vessel, and coming face to face with an irascible grandfather clock.

noisms

01-08-2009 10:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mind Flayer (Illithid)

Speaking of Spelljammer! Here's everybody's favourite Cthulu-esque race of inter-sphere psychotic octopus-headed brain-eaters.

As with the other iconic D&D races it's hard to say much about Mind Flayers that hasn't already been said. Everyone reading this, I'm sure, knows exactly how the creatures work and what they like to do. So instead I'll tell you a story.

One time when I was about 13 I was playing in an Underdark-based game. We'd reached about 7th level with pretty much the same characters as we'd had since the beginning, which was a rarity, and we'd grown quite attached to them. One friend had a Paladin who he had legitimately rolled (!) and of whom was inordinately proud.

Events took us to a Kuo-Toa temple which we had to destroy, along with dozens of Derro allies to the fishmen. The battle must have taken about four or five hours to work through and was a huge, climactic affair with spells going off everywhere and mass slaughter of evil humanoids. Finally the dice stopped rolling and we had emerged victorious, though all near to death.

My friend's Paladin then went to investigate a little side chamber off to one side of the main temple. Inside was a Mind Flayer who had been hiding away from the fight. He quickly leapt into action and devoured said Paladin's brain.

That friend fell silent and slumped down in his chair. I don't think I've ever seen anybody look so dejected. He said nothing for the rest of the evening, except for the occasional snuffle. Just before he went home he broke the silence and said, "I'll never play D&D ever again" in so dramatic a way that I think we actually all believed him. It was the single most pained reaction to a character death that I've ever seen.

He was back the next week of course.

demiurge1138

01-09-2009 01:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Ooh, ouch. Illithids do have a way of weaving themselves into interesting D&D tales. I was running a game where the party was using the Underdark as a shortcut to reach civilization, and they come upon an old man with a long beard riding a carriage pulled by magic. They chat pleasantly for a while, and then the old man decides he wants to take with him one of the PCs (this would be a character played by the same guy who wants to play a halfling wereleech and a leprechaun--he was using Leadership to play a pair of halfling acrobat/assassin twins). He charms the twin, then manages to use suggestion to convince the entire rest of the party that the two of them should be allowed to go off together.

The old man was, of course, an illithid in disguise. The party figured that out eight hours later when the suggestions to "go on without her, we'll be fine" wore off.

Cue the party madly racing through the Underdark trying to catch the carriage before the halfling got her brains eaten. Which ended with the most bizarre Mexican standoff I've ever seen--the paladin readying a charge with his holy lance, the illithid wrapping its tentacles around the halfling's head, ready to eat her brain. Negotiations broke down and the illithid won initiative. And then survived its lance wound to plane shift away, leaving a debrained halfling behind.

They never caught up to him.

Wakboth

01-09-2009 02:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

You know, I've neither used nor encountered very many illithids, despite their iconic and interesting status. Maybe it was because our dungeon trips generally took place pretty close to the surface?

Also, I've always loved the githyanki-githzerai-illithid -dynamic. In a Planescape game I was in once, the only thing that the 'yankis and 'zerais fully agreed about was that thou shalt not let an illithid live.

Also also, illithids with their diet of brains are among the most ecologically bizarre and unsustainable critters in D&D. With dragons, it's easy to handwave their food requirements (especially as they're pretty voraciously omnivorous), but brains are harder to come about...

kelvingreen

01-09-2009 03:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9817169)

Also also, illithids with their diet of brains are among the most ecologically bizarre and unsustainable critters in D&D. With dragons, it's easy to handwave their food requirements (especially as they're pretty voraciously omnivorous), but brains are harder to come about...

Don't they have a pretty firmly established history of slave ownership and treating sentient beings as cattle? That was where I's always assumed the mind flayers got their supply of brainfoods. I'd imagine that there's also a lot of variety in there; the brains of higher humanoid might be a speciality, but there's the "junk food" of animal brains, and a sperm whale's brain for the illithid equivalent of the Christmas meal. And of course, the richest mind flayers dine out at exclusive Underdark eateries where Celestial brains are a delicacy... for those who can afford them.

Herrison

01-09-2009 03:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9817169)

Also also, illithids with their diet of brains are among the most ecologically bizarre and unsustainable critters in D&D. With dragons, it's easy to handwave their food requirements (especially as they're pretty voraciously omnivorous), but brains are harder to come about...

Relevant-ish comic

They do sustain themselves on minds as well as brains, yes?

Me, I love some mind flayers. I don't suppose anyone knows how they were invented?

demiurge1138

01-09-2009 04:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hurtfulpotato (Post 9817425)

Me, I love some mind flayers. I don't suppose anyone knows how they were invented?

If memory serves me right, Gary Gygax said they were made up from whole cloth, inspired by the cover illustration of Brian Lumley's The Burrowers Beneath.

As for illithid ecology, the Illithiad (2e) and Lords of Madness (3e) explained that a mind flayer can actually live off of a diet of mostly lichen-based nutrient gruel. Brains are only required at a rate of one a month or so, but most illithids would prefer more of them. Thus, illithid culture contains performance eaters, specialist entertainers who publicly eat a human brain and project the sensation to a gathered crowd of mind flayers.

I've noticed that mind flayers have been slowly creeping into the public consciousness, although this could be a side effect of Cthulhu's rise in popularity in the new millennium. Davy Jones from the Pirates of the Caribbean movies has the look, and kills somebody by drilling into his brain with tentacles in the third movie, and Doctor Who has the Ood, which are a hive-mind race with lots of face tentacles.

JRM

01-09-2009 06:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9814806)

Quote:

Originally Posted by see (Post 9814455)

The MM's sentence "Medusae are female humanoids with hair of swarming snakes" does not, in fact, include anything that limits the hair to the head. How good are Brazilian waxes at removing snakes?

.... ouch. I really did not need that mental image.

+1 SAN Loss point, if you want it ;)

*But seriously, that makes sense ... though, wow. They are supposed to mate with humans, and I think that would make the process fatal - unless the medusa can keep the snakes from biting even in those conditions.*

Well I can think of a way around that problem, although the medusa's wannabe lover would get some very funny looks from the leather/rubber crafter he asks to fashion it.:eek:

JRM

01-09-2009 06:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9817169)

You know, I've neither used nor encountered very many illithids, despite their iconic and interesting status. Maybe it was because our dungeon trips generally took place pretty close to the surface?

Also, I've always loved the githyanki-githzerai-illithid -dynamic. In a Planescape game I was in once, the only thing that the 'yankis and 'zerais fully agreed about was that thou shalt not let an illithid live.

Also also, illithids with their diet of brains are among the most ecologically bizarre and unsustainable critters in D&D. With dragons, it's easy to handwave their food requirements (especially as they're pretty voraciously omnivorous), but brains are harder to come about...

I'm with you there Wakboth, I like the idea of Illithids but have never used one in game, except for once (or was it twice?) when the PCs had social encounters with them. Mostly it's the "four attacks, which if any one hits will kill the target next round" combined with their astronomical magic resistance and stunning psionic blast. They're a Total-Party-Kill waiting to happen if you've got a small group of low to mid level player characters like I usually ran.

As for their diet, one idea I had was mind flayers also ate regular food, but they needed to eat brains to sustain their psionic powers.

YojimboC

01-09-2009 06:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I could give two shits about mimics, but mind flayers... aw, man, mind flayers are awesome. And I hate psionics! But I love illithid.

I've used them a number of times. In 2E, I had the pcs stumble across a mind flayer colony. The players didn't really get it when the Drizzt-inspired drow ranger (standard issue in those days) peeled on out of the situation with best possible haste. Still, being the big softie I was then, none of the pcs died ignoble deaths at the tentacles of the mind flayers.

Used them twice (so far) in 3E. Once in a pirate campaign, where the mind flayer was the most civilized and urbane fellow at the table, and really Not Interested in Getting Involved with the pc's shenanigans. One of the joys of DMing is getting to roleplay things like acerbic mind flayer ambassadors who aren't there just to eat your brain. (Come to think of it, how did those negotiations with the pirate queen go... I should do something with that.)

Last time I got to use one, the player was running a psionic character. I wanted to give him a cool crystal spear that would boost his psionic abilities (despite hating psionics, I like to try to do nice things for my players) so I managed to separate him from the party and lead him into a cavern where a mind flayer guarded the spear. One failed initiative roll later, the mind flayer was very full and the player character had an empty skull. So much for being a nice guy.

Wakshaani

01-09-2009 10:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Oh Mind Flayers, how useful you are!

They're so iconic that hints of their presence, or coy sightings, can send an entire gaming table into paranoia. They also have the feel of Eldest Culture, giving you something that predates the Kuatoa-Aarocka-Bullywug-Lizardmen dynasty (Which in turn predates Elves, Dragons, and Dwarves, which in TURN predates humanity!) ... pretty much the oldest race outside of Yellow Mold, and that's saying something.

It gets better.

As time rolled on, it was revealed that Mind Flayers were a symbiotic creature and that TRUE illithids were little tadpole-sized earthworm-like critters that, when young, would get inserted into a humanoid's head, transforming them into a Mind Flayer over a period of time. This gives you a HUGE plot hook, from having 'neutered' Mind Flayers that can be inserted into a creature, which is then enslaved to the worm inside but undergoes no physical metamorphosis, thus giving you great spy networks, to having them infiltrate other beings, thus giving rise to Flayer variants. You also get a neat tie-in with other Abberations, as they can be 'wild' Illithids who grew up fully or were mutated into new forms (Such as 3.5 edition's Grick) that still have roots in the old world.

Which is way cooler than just being aliens.

Bonus if you use Eldest Gods, forces of pure Chaos that were locked away an eternity ago and that teh Flayers would love to release, but have never learned how. Teh stars have to be aligned just right and, until their patrons are freed, the Flayers have no Clerics and they're hardly going to follow some lesser god!

And that's just for STARTERS.

Sleeper

01-09-2009 12:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9818767)

They're so iconic that hints of their presence, or coy sightings, can send an entire gaming table into paranoia. Tehy also have the feel of Eldest Culture, giving you something that redates the Kuatoa-Aarocka-Bullywug-Lizardmen dynasty (Which in turn predates Elves, Dragons, and Dwarves, which in TURN predates humanity!) ... pretty much to oldest race outside of Yellow Mold, and that's saying something.

I've always liked aboleths, and figured they're pretty much the oldest civilization. The first that appeared, after Tiktaalik crawled up out of the primordial seas. They're an old race now, obdurate and inflexible. But somewhere back there, somehow, they figured out a way to keep up. To change themselves. To become something new. They took larval aboleth, and transmogrified them. Turned them into tadpoles, made them into parasites. Inserted them into one of the new vibrant races, and made a hybrid. See, illithids are old. Old beyond reckoning. But aboleth? They created the illithid from themselves, when they first started to worry about getting old and out of date. When they were already feeling the pangs of senescence.

The originals still survive. Still breed new illithids. But most of the energy, the action, is in the new races. In the new hybrids. Illithids have been half-breeds, primordial soup mixed with the latest apex species, since before the written word. Every race, going all the way back as far as any oral stories even hint, had tadpoles inserted in their brains, and spawned their own breed of illithid. If you look at the oldest stories, the illithid were different. They once inserted themselves into aarocraka, bullywugs, elves.... and the ones we know are just the latest iteration.

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9817405)

Don't they have a pretty firmly established history of slave ownership and treating sentient beings as cattle? That was where I's always assumed the mind flayers got their supply of brainfoods. I'd imagine that there's also a lot of variety in there; the brains of higher humanoids might be a speciality, but there's the "junk food" of animal brains, and a sperm whale's brain for the illithid equivalent of the Christmas meal. And of course, the richest mind flayers dine out at exclusive Underdark eateries where Celestial brains are a delicacy... for those who can afford them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9817971)

As for their diet, one idea I had was mind flayers also ate regular food, but they needed to eat brains to sustain their psionic powers.

I've seen the idea that they need a brain periodically not for nutrition but to replenish their psionic powers before, and I think it's the best fit.

Though I also like a version similar to Hambly's Darwath Trilogy.

Where the Dark keep herds of feral, subhuman, unintelligent, albino humans bred for a thousand generations, in vast underground caves. The humans on the surface have forgotten their ancestors who were herded underground, except in legends, but they still have an ancestral memory and fear the great stairs leading miles into the earth. Except, one day climate change happens. The lichen on which the herds of subhumans live start to die. And the Dark return, to replenish their food supply. The weird magical dungeons and keeps lined with traps and filled with magic? Those were built by our ancestors, thousands of years ago to save the few fleeting remnants of humanity from the disaster. Very adaptable into an illithid apocalypse :).

JRM

01-09-2009 06:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9819074)

I've seen the idea that they need a brain periodically not for nutrition but to replenish their psionic powers before, and I think it's the best fit.

Though I also like a version similar to Hambly's Darwath Trilogy.

Where the Dark keep herds of feral, subhuman, unintelligent, albino humans bred for a thousand generations, in vast underground caves. The humans on the surface have forgotten their ancestors who were herded underground, except in legends, but they still have an ancestral memory and fear the great stairs leading miles into the earth. Except, one day climate change happens. The lichen on which the herds of subhumans live start to die. And the Dark return, to replenish their food supply. The weird magical dungeons and keeps lined with traps and filled with magic? Those were built by our ancestors, thousands of years ago to save the few fleeting remnants of humanity from the disaster. Very adaptable into an illithid apocalypse :).

Oh, the idea of illithids breeding humanoids like cattle has a long pedigree (if you'll forgive the expression), and is a good one. Although they probably want to breed them for tasty intelligence, which a likely source of their problems with the ancestral gith. They were too assured of their superiority to realize the risk of giving their livestock the wit to rebel against their condition.

As for the Barbara Hambly comparison, definitely! She's one of my favourite present-day authors. Of course the Dark were a little different since they didn't eat brains alone - they ate minds, leaving a witless but still living body, or drained all their victim's life force to leave a dry husk, or dissolved all their humanoid victim's flesh away. Curiously, in the books they only do one of the three, which seems a bit wasteful - why eat a fellow's mind and leave their life-force and flesh to waste? Maybe it's part of a process, which can only succeed once against any given humanoid - the mindless ones were only partially affected (e.g. they were "lucky" enough to made a saving throw against energy-drain but not mind-drain:()), as were the lifeless husks, only those that were completely dissolved failed both saves. Once part-drained, there may not be enough left of whatever the Dark sucked out for them to get a grip on, or the return is just not worth the effort.

Inyssius

01-09-2009 07:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9819074)

I've seen the idea that they need a brain periodically not for nutrition but to replenish their psionic powers before, and I think it's the best fit.

I've seen these ideas merged; they eat grey matter to keep their psionic powers sharp, and they use their psionic powers to convince the universe that they don't actually need to eat anything else.

And I like the aboleth thing, but I'm partial to more of a Dalek / Cybermen situation. Sure, they're awfully similar, but not related; if they meet, alliances will be discussed but then rejected in favor of mind-shattering insults and a medium-scale but very high-powered planar war.

Wakshaani

01-09-2009 09:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

They're wine snobs.

They can live off of basic nutrients, and have managed to create several filling, if bland, lichen-based foodtypes (Mmm, Mycanoid proteins!), but, a good brain? Oh, that's just delicious.

Sleeper

01-09-2009 10:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9819758)

As for the Barbara Hambly comparison, definitely! She's one of my favourite present-day authors. Of course the Dark were a little different since they didn't eat brains alone - they ate minds, leaving a witless but still living body, or drained all their victim's life force to leave a dry husk, or dissolved all their humanoid victim's flesh away. Curiously, in the books they only do one of the three, which seems a bit wasteful - why eat a fellow's mind and leave their life-force and flesh to waste? Maybe it's part of a process, which can only succeed once against any given humanoid - the mindless ones were only partially affected (e.g. they were "lucky" enough to make a saving throw against energy-drain but not mind-drain:()), as were the lifeless husks, only those that were completely dissolved failed both saves. Once part-drained, there may not be enough left of whatever the Dark sucked out for them to get a grip on, or the return is just not worth the effort.

Hambly deliberately left a lot of things very unclear. Even after Armies of Daylight, which explained a lot, there were many aspects that were just mysterious or unknown. The same basic theme — that the enemy is alien and fundamentally unknowable — shows up later in Mother of Winter or for that matter in the Dragonsbane series. I never thought about it while I was reading the books since their approaches are vastly different, but that basic theme is very similar to one of Lovecraft's favorites.

JRM

01-09-2009 10:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 9819785)

I've seen these ideas merged; they eat grey matter to keep their psionic powers sharp, and they use their psionic powers to convince the universe that they don't actually need to eat anything else.

And I like the aboleth thing, but I'm partial to more of a Dalek / Cybermen situation. Sure, they're awfully similar, but not related; if they meet, alliances will be discussed but then rejected in favor of mind-shattering insults and a medium-scale but very high-powered planar war.

Do you mean mind-shattering insults such as:

Aboleth Ambassador: "You are an inefficient species. Aboleths do not genetically engineer themselves for aesthetics."

Illithid Ambassador: (looks aboleth up and down) "Clearly"

That was the most groan-worthy dialogue in Doctor Who's Doomsday episode, I'm almost sorry they didn't stuff some puns in there as well.

Sleeper

01-09-2009 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 9819785)

And I like the aboleth thing, but I'm partial to more of a Dalek / Cybermen situation. Sure, they're awfully similar, but not related; if they meet, alliances will be discussed but then rejected in favor of mind-shattering insults and a medium-scale but very high-powered planar war.

That can be interesting, but the aboleth-begotten illithid also open up a lot of dramatic possibilities. The hip kids vs. old and out of touch parents dynamic. Do the illithid choose their own host race for their new spawnlings, or do they still have to rely on the aboleth to create and implant them? Have they broken free, and mostly ignore the aboleth, or are they still beholden to them? Do they have War of the Roses-style familial fights?

It would also be interesting to merge this with the idea from Lords of Madness: Illithids are refugees, who fled back into time to escape the end of the universe. Perhaps in this universe, the aboleth haven't created them... yet. So they watch, study. Observe these strangely familiar new creatures. Watch how quickly they adapt, see the advanced and alien powers they display. The aboleth capture specimens. Study them. Figure out what's going on. That these... things... are part them. They learn that the illithid were born from their own future bioengineered selves.

That won't do. They won't be eclipsed. So the aboleths send an ambassador to the humans, explaining what happened. Offering support, aid. Will the humans trust them? Can they afford not to? The first shots in a grand war start, pitting the far future against the present and the distant past. Shadowy figures on both sides, the original illithid and the new ones born in this era, their thralls; and against them the races of the light, and their shadowy advisors and supporters.

And since the illithids only deign to host themselves in the dominant species, well, any new illithids born in this era are probably human hybrids. But what about the original illithids, the ones who rode the vast ships back from the end of the universe? What if they're... different? What race were they based on? What species was the dominant race in the far future from which they came?

JRM

01-10-2009 01:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9820469)

And since the illithids only deign to host themselves in the dominant species, well, any new illithids born in this era are probably human hybrids. But what about the original illithids, the ones who rode the vast ships back from the end of the universe? What if they're... different? What race were they based on? What species was the dominant race in the far future from which they came?

For a while I fooled around with the idea that Illithids were like HP Lovecraft's Great Race of Yith - disembodied intellect that possessed organic bodies. They just preferred to use artificial bodies, of which the familiar mauve squid-heads were just the design most commonly encountered by humans - indeed, they were designed for interaction with humans. They had other bodies for other purposes, such as Beholder-like forms for war (or actual mindless beholders, hibernating on racks in their armories until the call for battle?)

Oh, and here's another thing. The MM text says mind flayers are amphibians, but how come we never hear of adult illithids swimming about? Now I'm visualizing a party travelling along the shore of a subterranean lake, when an illithid and its albino cave-locathah slaves stride out of the water.

demiurge1138

01-10-2009 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The illithids-of-the-far-future idea actually plays well with what seems on the surface as one of the worst ideas in the Complete Psionic splatbook (which is saying something). In Complete Psionic, there's a number of "illithid heritage" feats, demonstrating one's descendance from illithids. They grant extra psionic powers known, resistance to mind-influencing abilities, even tentacle attacks. They have their own prestige class.

On the surface, that's a terrible idea. Illithids don't crossbreed with other races. They don't even reproduce in the ordinary way--they just stuff a tadpole in someone's ear and call it a day.

But what if the Illithid Heritage feats don't represent descent from illithids?

They represent ascent to illithids.

The psions finding themselves with illithid heritage feats are slowly evolving into the true illithids, the ones that will rule the universe at the end of time. And they're starting to find each other. And make plans.

sim_james

01-10-2009 10:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Nice. I'll have to use that in some way!

JDeMobray

01-11-2009 12:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In my long running 2nd Edition Spelljammer campaign, the Illithid eventually ended up on the "good guys" side. Not actually good, mind you, but smart enough to realize that there were more advantages to allying with the Imperial Navy and the human nations during the Second Unhuman War in exchange for treaties and official recognition. The PCs were instrumental in bringing this alliance together, even though it did basically turn the dwarven forces in space. . . not hostile but certainly adversarial. A later group of PCs (mostly the same players, but a few different faces) got to reap the benefits of that alliance during a huge invasion by an empire from outside of known space. Over time, players got used to encountering a few actually honorable and trustworthy Illithid here and there, but mostly they were still the same duplicitious, backstabbing brain-eaters. They just happened to be on "our side".

I ran the Illithid as being vaguely contemptuous of the Mind Flayers, a distinction that they made between the organized, empirical nation-state types in space and the solitary underground types.

Vultur10

01-11-2009 01:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

What about this: if an illithid lives long enough (probably thousands of years at least), its inhuman part will try to separate from its humanoid form. Most die in the process, but the rare freak that survives 'ascends' and becomes a formless nightmare with immense power.

demiurge1138

01-11-2009 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9824559)

What about this: if an illithid lives long enough (probably thousands of years at least), its inhuman part will try to separate from its humanoid form. Most die in the process, but the rare freak that survives 'ascends' and becomes a formless nightmare with immense power.

You mean Elder Brains? That would explain how they get started.

Vultur10

01-11-2009 11:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9824676)
You mean Elder Brains? That would explain how they get started.

Nah, Elder Brains are integrated into illithid society. I'm thinking that they become something alien even to the illithids - and really powerful. Basically Great Old Ones. Maybe only one in many million illithids lives long enough, and most of those don't survive - but every thousand years or so, a new one is born. Maybe a quest to kill the thing before it 'transcends'? The 'transcendence' would cause a backlash of insanity over the whole area, maybe many miles around, random illusions activating, Wisdom damage for everyone.

noisms

01-11-2009 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Minotaur

We seem to have been discussing a lot of ancient mythology recently from various corners of the globe. He's more fuel for the fire.

As with the Medusa, the Minotaur entry sticks reasonably close to the legendary version, but 'Dnd-izes' it through attributing Minotaurs' labyrinth lairs to evil archmages, and giving them small maze-dwelling communities. It also attributes their creation to a curse, rather than a goddess being shagged by a bull - bestiality presumably being deemed on the wrong side of a certain line...

Nevertheless I like the fact that the D&D designers retained the 'Monstrous' nature of the Minotaur and resisted turning it into Just Another Humanoid Bad Guy Race. As a general rule in 2nd edition AD&D there are too many mook creatures to beat up and too few genuine Terrors, and while I don't think the Minotaur is Terrifying enough, at least it didn't end up being basically an ogre, but with horns. (Of course, Dragonlance screwed that up, but we won't go there.)

There are the smattering of odd rules in this entry that we have come to expect - Minotaur's have a flat 50% chance of tracking through scent, and have 13+3 Morale (but not 16). Also notable is their STR of 18 or 18/50; another reminder of the ability score escalation that happened after 2nd edition - I very much doubt 3e or 4e Minotaurs have a STR of 18. But it's also unusual that it would be technically possible to create a character in 2nd edition with the STR of a Minotaur - a 7 1/2 foot tall bull-headed beast. So in hindsight perhaps the STR escalation wasn't a bad thing.

Wakboth

01-11-2009 11:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The minotaur morale struck me as odd when I read that monster entry. Why on Earth is it 13 (+3 in combat), and not 16? Did the game ever use the morale score for anything outside of combat?

The artwork's not too good, I'm afraid. There's an (IMO better) DiTerlizzi minotaur at the back of the MM, on page 384.

Standard 3.5 minotaur, right from the MM, actually only has Str 19, which is a bit odd; they're weaker than ogres. Then again, looking at 2e MM, the ogres seem stronger than minotaurs (although no Str score is stated). :confused:

JRM

01-12-2009 12:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9827121)

Minotaur

I like the bit about minotaurs all being male and perpetuating their kind via intercourse with human females, it fits in nicely with the idea of them being an unnatural, cursed creature. One can only presume that most minotaurs are not the result of love-matches, and the ladies in question would face a very difficult delivery.

The minotaur's 18 strength is quite typical of AD&D. If I remember correctly, 1st edition gave ogres an average of 18 strength and a 12' troll 18/00 Str.

I do approve of some of the Strength-score escalation in 3rd edition, since some of the earlier edition monsters where given strength scores with carry capacities so low I'd wonder how they'd be able to move, let alone fight. That's for those monsters they bothered to give Strength scores at all, which was not very many.

Sleeper

01-12-2009 01:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9827297)

Standard 3.5 minotaur, right from the MM, actually only has Str 19, which is a bit odd; they're weaker than ogres. Then again, looking at 2e MM, the ogres seem stronger than minotaurs (although no Str score is stated). :confused:

Hmm. In 1st edition, it's possible to determine the Strength of minotaurs and ogres based on the extra damage inflicted with weapons (no hit bonus, though both the leader and chieftan attack as 7 HD creatures, which is an effective +2 to hit). The minotaur description is a little ambiguous since they can either wield a large axe (treat as halberd), or a flail (+2 damage). The DMG also explicitly lists ogres as having a Strength 18 (under character abilities).

Minotaur, +2 damage (18?)

Ogre, +2 damage (18)

Ogre leader, +3 damage (18/50 or 18/75, the +2 to hit from HD appears to be separate because +3/+3 isn't from Strength)

Ogre chieftan, +4 damage (18/90)

This changes in a bit in second edition, where a bonus to hit as well as damage is listed (slight change in wording: ogre leaders and chieftans don't just attack as 7 HD creatures, they are 7 HD creatures; the halberd exception is also retained). Some ogre to hit/damage pairs don't match existing strengths, half-ogres explicitly do their extra damage due to mass not strength (and PCs roll for a number between 14 and 18/00), while minotaur strength is explicitly called out as "18".

Minotaur, no bonus to hit, +2 damage (18, but why not +1 to hit?)
Ogre +2 to hit, +6 damage (18/99 or 18/00)
Ogre leader, +3 to hit, +6 damage (18/00)
Ogre chieftan, +4 to hit, +6 damage (19 or 18/00)

Third edition spells out everything.

Minotaur, Strength 19 (+4/+4)
Ogre, Strength 21 (+5/+5)

While it's not clear in 1st edition (minotaurs are simply "L"), in 2nd and 3rd edition the ogres are clearly larger (height and/or weight). Overall, a lot of exception-based rules. Second edition's partial attempt to apply PC rules to monsters just confused the issue quite a bit.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9827481)
The minotaur's 18 strength is quite typical of AD&D. If I remember correctly, 1st edition gave ogres an average of 18 strength and a 12' troll 18/00 Str.

Trolls were "9+ ft", and nothing indicates their Strength in the 1E entry though the DMG says "18+".

Kapten

01-12-2009 02:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In a way, I like that a fighter can be as strong as a 10 feet humanoid in older editions. It lends a certain heroic might to him =).

demiurge1138

01-12-2009 03:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

It wasn't a goddess: it was an ordinary, mundane woman. Who just happened to be the wife of the King Minos, so could afford to have someone build her a giant cow scaffold that she could use to get close and seduce the bull with.

noisms

01-12-2009 03:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9827894)
It wasn't a goddess: it was an ordinary, mundane woman. Who just happened to be the wife of the King Minos, so could afford to have someone build her a giant cow scaffold that she could use to get close and seduce the bull with.

Wasn't she the daughter of the Sun?

Inyssius

01-12-2009 03:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9827908)
Wasn't she the daughter of the Sun?

And granddaughter of Oceanus and Tethys, apparently. Huh.

demiurge1138

01-12-2009 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 9827952)
And granddaughter of Oceanus and Tethys, apparently. Huh.

Huh indeed. Didn't know that part. I did know that she cursed Minos so that he'd ejaculate serpents and venom if he ever tried to have sex with another woman. There's a spell one doesn't see in D&D.

In other news, I love that the original Minotaur has a name. Asterion. Didn't learn that until relatively recently, but it makes him much more a character than a monster. It's such a nice name, too.

Hellzon

01-12-2009 04:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9827121)
Also notable is their STR of 18 or 18/50; another reminder of the ability score escalation that happened after 2nd edition - I very much doubt 3e or 4e Minotaurs have a STR of 18.

23:ish in 4E. :) Baphomet priests are STR 22 weaklings.

JRM

01-12-2009 05:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9827561)

Trolls were "9+ ft", and nothing indicates their Strength in the 1E entry though the DMG says "18+".

Curious, I was pretty sure there was an official source somewhere quoting 18/00 for a troll's Strength score. Although, since they did 5-8 damage per claw (i.e. 1d4+4) I'd have thought 18/76-90 would make more sense, since that'd give them +4 damage, unless my memory of AD&D exceptional strength scores is failing me. Again.:(

JRM

01-12-2009 05:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Oh, and I quite like that MM picture of the Minotaur, there's something about its massive head and lined face that appeals to me. There's certainly many pictures in the Monstrous Manual I think are a lot worse.

Although it does look a bit too much like a stocky bloke with a bull's head mask on.

Hmm, maybe the players will discover the local minotaur was just a half-ogre with a bull's head mask on, a ploy to quell the superstitious peasantry into paying tribute to the Maze Master.

One thing about the Minotaur's MM description puzzles me: "Their fur is brown to black while their body coloring varies as would a normal human's." So, is it just their heads covered with fur, while the rest of their body has naked, human-toned skin? In that case, why is the minotaur in the picture a fairly uniform dark brown, with only a slightly different hue on his head and neck. Does this Minotaur hail from his world's equivalent of Africa?

DMH

01-12-2009 05:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9827481)

I like the bit about minotaurs all being male and perpetuating their kind via intercourse with human females, it fits i nicely with the idea of them being an unnatural, cursed creature.

I wonder why there weren't written like driders. Name a god and give him or her or it the ability to curse human males into minotaurs. Signs of disrespect for the god are obvious- horns, tails, etc.

JasonK

01-12-2009 09:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Minotaurs are another one of those creatures I've never used in a game; they just didn't fit into my conception of the fantasy setting that was D&D, being too tied to a specific non-D&D mythology for me to be happy with them.

That said, I've long wanted to run an Argonautika-era Greek-flavored D&D game, using only monsters that appear in Greek Myth; centaurs, cyclopes, gorgons, harpies, minotaurs, satyrs, etc. (Though these days I might look to Agon before I look to D&D...)

Has anyone else tried that? A tighter, more thematically focused D&D? Especially one based around Greco-Roman myth?

- jasön

Vultur10

01-12-2009 10:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9827984)

Huh indeed. Didn't know that part. I did know that she cursed Minos so that he'd ejaculate serpents and venom if he ever tried to have sex with another woman. There's a spell one doesn't see in D&D.

...wow. I didn't learn that part in school. Would you happen to know the source for this?

Wakshaani

01-12-2009 12:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Well, since I based WakkaWorld on Earth, I have a mythical Greece section and a few Mediterranean islands for that sort of thing. In particular is the island of Titonne, which is ruled by a Titan, who just sorta creates these sorts of things on a whim. Some days, he enriches his population by making it rain gold. Other days, he's in a foul mood so slays every secondborn son. Whatever strikes him.

So, lots of places to toss out Minotaurs, Harpies, Centaurs, and so on.

demiurge1138

01-12-2009 02:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9829344)

...wow. I didn't learn that part in school. Would you happen to know the source for this?

According to Wikipedia, the Bibliotheca of the false Apollodorus.

noisms

01-12-2009 08:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9829156)

Minotaurs are another one of those creatures I've never used in a game; they just didn't fit into my conception of the fantasy setting that was D&D, being too tied to a specific non-D&D mythology for me to be happy with them.

That said, I've long wanted to run an Argonautika-era Greek-flavored D&D game, using only monsters that appear in Greek Myth; centaurs, cyclopes, gorgons, harpies, minotaurs, satyrs, etc. (Though these days I might look to Agon before I look to D&D...)

Has anyone else tried that? A tighter, more thematically focused D&D? Especially one based around Greco-Roman myth?

- jasön

No, but with all this talk of medusas and minotaurs you can bet your life I'm going to! ;)

noisms

01-12-2009 08:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9827984)

Huh indeed. Didn't know that part. I did know that she cursed Minos so that he'd ejaculate serpents and venom if he ever tried to have sex with another woman. There's a spell one doesn't see in D&D.

Cause Deadly Ejaculation

4th Level Priest Spell

(Necromancy)

Range: Touch

Components: V, S

Duration: Permanent

Casting Time: 4

AoE: 1 Human Male

Saving Throw: None.

When this spell is cast, the recipient is stricken with a curse. This causes him to ejaculate serpents and venom if he attempts sexual intercourse with any female other than one individual, specified by the caster. Any other woman who the recipient has sexual relations with will be instantly killed by the deadly ejaculate; no saving throw is permitted, and the woman can only be resurrected by a Wish spell.

Casting the spell ages the caster by one year. It can only be cured by a Wish spell.

Wakboth

01-12-2009 11:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9829156)

That said, I've long wanted to run an Argonautika-era Greek-flavored D&D game, using only monsters that appear in Greek Myth; centaurs, cyclopes, gorgons, harpies, minotaurs, satyrs, etc. (Though these days I might look to Agon before I look to D&D...)

I've had similar ideas every now and then. There'd also be a sort of fantastic Egypt, with gnoll mercenaries, sphinxes and undead. Lots of undead.

kelvingreen

01-13-2009 02:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9829156)

Has anyone else tried that? A tighter, more thematically focused D&D? Especially one based around Greco-Roman myth?

I've never run such a game, but 2e had one of those green handbooks specifically focused on Greek myth; Age of Heroes I think. As far as I can recall, it played the setting fairly straight and didn't overly *D&D*ise it.

3.Xe completely passed me by, as I was out of gaming for most of its existence, but I vaguely remember some third party setting which was heavily inspired by Greek myth, but took it as a basis from which to spin off. I'd like to say that the setting was vaguely post-apocalyptic, in the aftermath of the final war between the Olympians and the Titans, but I can't be sure. Anyway, it was not as "pure" an approach as the 2e supplement above.

Sleeper

01-13-2009 02:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

For an old school take, there's always Mazes & Minotaurs, which is basically an alt-history exercise that asks "what if D&D was originally based on Greek mythology?". For what started as one step from a joke, there's a huge amount of material available, including an OD&D analogue (3-volume set and supplements) and the Revised (AD&D) rules.

Malignant Marionette

01-13-2009 03:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9827297)

The minotaur morale struck me as odd when I read that monster entry. Why on Earth is it 13 (+3 in combat), and not 16? Did the game ever use the morale score for anything outside of combat?

The morale section say you can roll it when a target is offered a bribe, ordered to use a personal magical item with limited charges, ordered to do some dangerous task and such. I suppose it'd affect that kind of things.

Why? Don't ask me. :p

Sleeper

01-13-2009 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Malignant Marionette (Post 9831893)

The morale section say you can roll it when a target is offered a bribe, ordered to use a personal magical item with limited charges, ordered to do some dangerous task and such. I suppose it'd affect that kind of things.

Why? Don't ask me. :p

Comes from the 1st edition rules for henchmen.

The Butcher

01-13-2009 03:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9827984)

In other news, I love that the original Minotaur has a name. Asterion. Didn't learn that until relatively recently, but it makes him much more a character than a monster. It's such a nice name, too.

Check out a short story called "The House of Asterion" by Jorge Luis Borges.

Mr. Teapot

01-13-2009 03:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9829156)

That said, I've long wanted to run an Argonautika-era Greek-flavored D&D game, using only monsters that appear in Greek Myth; centaurs, cyclopes, gorgons, harpies, minotaurs, satyrs, etc. (Though these days I might look to Agon before I look to D&D...)

I had a halfling thief once who travelled backwards in time to fight in the Trojan War, though this was in middle school, and someone gave the Trojans cannons, so it wasn't exactly historically or mythically accurate.

Similarly, there was a section of the World's Largest Dungeon that consisted almost entirely of Greek mythological monsters. A Hydra, minotaurs, harpies and such. But it was kinda boring (like the WLD as a whole) and had a strangely misplaced rakshasa involved for some reason. And still isn't terribly thematically focused. D&D isn't exactly the place to go for clear focus or historical/mythical accuracy.

JasonK

01-13-2009 04:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9831272)

I've had similar ideas every now and then. There'd also be a sort of fantastic Egypt, with gnoll mercenaries, sphinxes and undead. Lots of undead.

Oooooooh. Yeah, I'm sold on that campaign now. Especially if there were a comparable Persian Empire filled with creatures out of Persian myth. (What the heck creatures are out of Persian myth, anyway?)

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9831751)

I've never run such a game, but 2e had one of those green handbooks specifically focused on Greek myth; Age of Heroes I think. As far as I can recall, it played the setting fairly straight and didn't overly D&Dise it.

Oh, hey! Yeah, I remember that one. Never had it, but I seem to recall that there were two similar books - one about Celts and one about Vikings. Those may have been the only 2nd Ed books I never picked up, actually...

- jasön

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9830650)

Cause Deadly Ejaculation

4th Level Priest Spell

(Necromancy)

Range: Touch

Components: V, S

Duration: Permanent

Casting Time: 4

AoE: 1 Human Male

Saving Throw: None.

When this spell is cast, the recipient is stricken with a curse. This causes him to ejaculate serpents and venom if he attempts sexual intercourse with any female other than one individual, specified by the caster. Any other woman wh the recipient has sexual relations with will be instantly killed by the deadly ejaculate; no saving throw is permitted, and the woman can only be resurrected by a Wish spell.

Casting the spell ages the caster by one year. It can only be cured by a Wish spell.

No you fool, don't you realize there are players out there who'd abuse* such a spell to turn it into a ranged autokill attack against every female adversary they encountered.:eek:

I don't want to ever see a game were a PC meets a gynosphinx or Type V demon, says to his fellow adventurers "I'll deal with this" and then pulls his trousers down.

At least add a save versus poison.

*I guess self-abuse is a more appropriate term for such misuse this spell.:D

Malignant Marionette

01-13-2009 05:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9831958)

Comes from the 1st edition rules for henchmen.

No, I meant why minotaurs are easier to do that stuff on, not why the rule exists. I mean, I don't recall any other monster with an x+y morale value. Not that I really pay attention to that, I bet someone has a huge list of examples now. Right? ;)

kelvingreen

01-13-2009 05:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9832165)

Oh, hey! Yeah, I remember that one. Never had it, but I seem to recall that there were two similar books - one about Celts and one about Vikings. Those may have been the only 2nd Ed books I never picked up, actually...

According to waynesbooks, there were also handbooks for ancient Rome, Charlemagne, the Crusades and Europe in the 1600s. Neat.

cpip

01-13-2009 06:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9832324)

According to waynesbooks, there were also handbooks for ancient Rome, Charlemagne, the Crusades and Europe in the 1600s. Neat.

I have most of them (except Celts, Age of Heroes, and the Crusades) -- they were all surprisingly good for their relatively thin size (standard 2nd Ed splatbook thickness). I never got to use them directly, but mined them for ideas for other campaigns.

Kakita Kojiro

01-13-2009 09:03 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9832165)

Oooooooh. Yeah, I'm sold on that campaign now. Especially if there were a comparable Persian Empire filled with creatures out of Persian myth. (What the heck creatures are out of Persian myth, anyway?)

If we limit it to strictly Persian myth, then not too many. However, Persian myth incorporated earlier myths (e.g., Sumerian), and was in turn incorporated into what would be loosely termed "Arabic" myths. If you then use some standard D&D monsters for their Persian counterparts, you'll probably find a useful number. E.g.:

ahi/azhi: dragon (pick a type) girtab-lullu: scorpionman (covered earlier!)
homa: griffin
ifrit: genie, dao, djinn, efreet, marid kaftar: were-hyena or gnoll karkadann: unicorn

ku-lullu, ku-liltu: merman, mermaid lamia lammasu manticore
shedu rukh: roc
samandar: phoenix shahbaz: giant eagle (falcon, actually) daeva, druj, nasu/nasa, alilim: demons/devils (pick a type)

There are probably others, too. Plus miscellaneous types -- giant fish (dandan or denden, IIRC), intelligent and/or albino babboons, lion-men (urmah-lullu; use wemics, maybe), pegasus, etc. Note that all of this is from old campaign notes, so I do not -- alas! -- have the original sources. :(

JasonK

01-13-2009 10:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9832957)

If we limit it to strictly Persian myth, then not too many. However, Persian myth incorporated earlier myths (e.g., Sumerian), and was in turn incorporated into what would be loosely termed "Arabic" myths. If you then use some standard D&D monsters for their Persian counterparts, you'll probably find a useful number. E.g.:

Ah, fair point. The various children of Tiamat would be fair game, wouldn't they.

Okey. I think I'm starting a thread for this; see if anyone's interested in doing a little shared worldbuilding. :)

- jasõn

YojimboC

01-14-2009 02:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9832324)

According to waynesbooks, there were also handbooks for [. . .] Europe in the 1600s. Neat.

A Mighty Fortress. Covered the Thirty Years War and similar holy gunpoweder wars period. Good stuff. In fact, my favorite material to ever come out of 2E were any and all of those "greenbooks" that I could find. I wish something more like them had been produced for 3E as well.

noisms

01-14-2009 10:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mist, Crimson Death

I had completely forgotten about the existence of these creatures, who I don't believe I've ever used or encountered in a game. They are cursed with one of the worst pictures in the MM, which might explain why. But they're not really a bad lot as monsters go.

The first thing to note is that there's a heck of a lot of talk about vampires in the entry - with the usual sages and their 'rumours' and 'legends' holding that Crimson Death Mists are either the spirit of an 'undead vampire' (is there another kind?) or the disembodied soul of a creature who has been turned into a vampire. They act like vampires too - roaming around feeding on people and soaking up all of their blood. And thus plot hooks are born - reunite the vampire with his soul! We also have some talk about Crimson Death Mists being exiled evil air elementals, though this is less interesting in my opinion. Of course, this allows a cunning DM to introduce a plot avenue in which the PCs end up helping a Crimson Death Mist regain his position in air elemental society, which is always fun.

There's a nice grotesque twist to Crimson Death Mists in that they gradually turn red from the blood they devour - hence the name - and shower it everywhere as they sustain injuries and die. Pretty over the top, but definitely a fun scene: a CDM rising up from the pile of corpses it's been feeding on, then turning on the brave adventurers and covering them with blood as they hack at it with their magical swords. Similarly, I like the idea of a CDM being stuck, djinn-like, in a bottle, and emerging to general awe and wonder - whereupon it starts eating heads while people run in all directions crying "I thought you were supposed to grant wishes!"

The Last Conformist

01-14-2009 11:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)
'undead vampire' (is there another kind?)

There's the bat kind, I suppose.

demiurge1138

01-15-2009 12:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)
I like the idea of a CDM being stuck, djinn-like, in a bottle, and emerging to general awe and wonder - whereupon it starts eating heads while people run in all directions crying "I thought you were supposed to grant wishes!"

That right there is marvelous. I must use that in a game at some point.

Inyssius

01-15-2009 01:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Hey, looks like this got converted to 4E. It's in Dragon 369, under "Baphomet's Friends". The current name is "the Coflizu", which is interesting if you know how the 4E naming scheme works; I would have expected it to still be called something like "Crimson Death Mist", or possibly three monsters named "Crimson Death Mist", "Crimson Death Storm", and "Crimson Death Exsanguinator". Is there a background behind the name Coflizu?

<http://i58.photobucket.com/albums/g2...us/Coflizu.png>

("Massive swirling clouds of torn flesh and crimson droplets coalesce in areas where demons have been butchered.")

And yes, the djinn thing is super-awesome. I can definitely see that showing up in a dragon's lair in one of my games.

Kakita Kojiro

01-15-2009 02:19 AM

"Coflizu"? Good grief, that sounds like a sneeze. Why name a monster something that guarantees the players will be making "gesundheit" jokes all evening? Crimson Death Mist would've been perfectly serviceable.

Inyssius

01-15-2009 02:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Man, Wizards just can't win in the naming-monsters arena. First it's all "what kind of a stupid name is 'swordwing'," now it's "'coflizu'? Gesundheit!"

Sleeper

01-15-2009 03:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 9840168)

Man, Wizards just can't win in the naming-monsters arena. First it's all "what kind of a stupid name is 'swordwing'," now it's "'coflizu'? Gesundheit!"

Not everyone can be Tolkien. And with a very few exceptions (like M.A.R. Barker), the standard in the gaming industry is low. Very low. But is it too much to ask for names that aren't painfully bad?

We could impose some minimum standards. A naming standards board. Not that it would guarantee high quality names. That's not possible. All we could do is impose a few common sense rules on types of names to avoid. No apostrophes, ever. No use of the letters "q", "z", or "x". "J" is only permissible as the first letter in a word. (No, Mr. Salvatore, we didn't invent these rules specifically to exclude you.) No Germanic gutturals, especially ones that sound like cats hacking up a furball. No puns. No more than two vowels in a row. No names that mean something spelled backwards (that means you're out, Mr. Verne). No homophones of onomatopoeic words that represent bodily functions (cough).

I'm sure it would be a smashing, unambiguous success, like the MPAA rating system or the Comics Code.

Epoch

01-15-2009 04:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9828188)

Curious, I was pretty sure there was an official source somewhere quoting 18/00 for a troll's Strength score. Although, since they did 5-8 damage per claw (i.e. 1d4+4) I'd have thought 18/76-90 would make more sense, since that'd give them +4 damage, unless my memory of AD&D exceptional strength scores is failing me. Again.:(

Gauntlets of Ogre Power conferred 18/00 strength on the wearer. That's not exactly definitive, but I always took it to mean that Ogres had 18/00 strength.

6inTruder

01-15-2009 05:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)

The first thing to note is that there's a heck of a lot of talk about vampires in the entry - with the usual sages and their 'rumours' and 'legends' holding that Crimson Death Mists are either the spirit of an 'undead vampire' (is there another kind?) or the disembodied soul of a creature who has been turned into a vampire.

Yes.

,:-P~

(un)reason

01-15-2009 09:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)

'undead vampire' (is there another kind?)

And let us not forget the Vampyres from Ravenloft. All the blood drinking, without any of the undeadness, and an extra helping of entitlement mentality from never being human in the first place and raised to think of normal humans as just sheep. Man, they came up with a million goofy variants on the same monsters.

Sleeper

01-15-2009 07:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9841861)

And let us not forget the Vampyres from Ravenloft. All the blood drinking, without any of the undeadness, and an extra helping of entitlement mentality from never being human in the first place and raised to think of normal humans as just sheep. Man, they came up with a million goofy variants on the same monsters.

Pseudo-undead were some of the strangest. Clans of humans who by sheer proximity absorb all the base stats of the undead, but none of the special powers. Apparently, a modified form of Batesian mimicry.

Äkräs

01-15-2009 07:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9840386)

All we could do is impose a few common sense rules on types of names to avoid. No apostrophes, ever. No use of the letters "q", "z", or "x". "J" is only permissible as the first letter in a word.

I don't really have anything to add to this particular discussion, so I'll just savor the moment when I found out that I have a name that should be avoided. I think that's a good start for a path that leads to RULING THE WORLD WITH AN IRON FIST!

kami2awa

01-15-2009 09:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9841861)

And let us not forget the Vampyres from Ravenloft. All the blood drinking, without any of the undeadness, and an extra helping of entitlement mentality from never being human in the first place and raised to think of normal humans as just sheep. Man, they came up with a million goofy variants on the same monsters.

Apart from the silly name, that's actually very believable; it could fit well into a Hard SF universe - humanoid creatures like this could easily evolve.

Wakboth

01-15-2009 09:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9843529)

Apart from the silly name, that's actually very believable; it could fit well into a Hard SF universe - humanoid creatures like this could easily evolve.

In fact, you might want to check out Peter Watts' Blindsight. (Be warned: it's seriously, horribly bleak.)

JRM

01-16-2009 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)

Mist, Crimson Death

I had completely forgotten about the existence of these creatures, who I don't believe I've ever used or encountered in a game. They are cursed with one of the worst pictures in the MM, which might explain why. But they're not really a bad lot as monsters go.

Oh heavens yes, I looked at that picture of the Crimson Death a few days ago to see what joys awaited us and actually cringed. It looks like something that should be chasing Scooby Doo and Shaggy through a haunted house, only to be captured and have its mask pulled off to reveal it had been Old Mister Bates all along.

I prefer to call them Crimson Deaths rather than Crimson Death Mists. I have a nasty suspicion they only added the 'Mist' in 2nd edition to give them a tenuous link to the next entry, the Vampiric Mist - obviously AD&D can't be expected to make do with only one blood-sucking cloud of vapour.

I've only used the monster once, back in the days when I was evil enough to regularly use the monsters rolled up on the wilderness encounter table regardless of their strength relative to the PCs. In that case a Crimson Mist turned up and ate one of the party's hirelings and there was sod all they could do about it - they didn't have potent enough magical weapons to injure it before it had sucked the poor fellow dry. Then it just flew away, cackling evilly.

As for other possible game uses for a Crimson Mist, why has nobody mentioned the old chestnut "it isn't a vampire after all!", something the monster seems practically tailor made for.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)

Of course, this allows a cunning DM to introduce a plot avenue in which the PCs end up helping a Crimson Death Mist regain his position in air elemental society, which is always fun.

Or a Crimson Mist somehow regained a royal position in air elemental society and plans to give its brethren its taste for blood, so the players have to destroy/re-exile it before the Prime Material is invaded by a bloodthirsty Gaseous Horde.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)

Similarly, I like the idea of a CDM being stuck, djinn-like, in a bottle, and emerging to general awe and wonder - whereupon it starts eating heads while people run in all directions crying "I thought you were supposed to grant wishes!"

Now I'm imagining a powerful supernatural evil of some sort, a demon or high-level vampire mage say, that keeps a Crimson Mist imprisoned in a hookah, Deriving malicious delight from inhaling tobacco smoke flavoured with human blood through a captured foe.

YojimboC

01-16-2009 04:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I'm going to clam chowder a bit, because due to some monumental lack of concentration, I missed the minotaur entry.

Anyway, I used to really dig on minotaurs for some reason. They were fairly ubiquitous "strong guy" villains in my games for years. I never used the "cursed men" angle, as I much preferred the Dragonlance Minotaur/Klingons when I was a teen, and even used a minotaur PC (gladiator from the Complete Fighter's Handbook) for a while.

Somewhere along the way after I stopped playing 2E, I gave up on the bullheaded twits, much as I did elves. I did use some skeletal minotaurs as guards for an ancient prison once. They were kind of cool, and they at least nerfed the duelist and deep woods sniper.

Although older and (presumably) wiser, I'm still not all that much a fan of the "cursed human" version of the minotaurs. I prefer them as a straight-up monstrous humanoid race with their own culture. The mock Rome by way of Klingon Dragonlance style minotaurs don't do much for me anymore, though.

The idea of a race of beings who build labyrinths as a sort of nest or domicile either out of some strange compulsion or some kind of cultural thing sounds really neat.

Mr. Teapot

01-16-2009 05:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9839198)

[size="5"]

I had completely forgotten about the existence of these creatures, who I don't believe I've ever used or encountered in a game.

I think that the evil spirit monster we're dealing with in one campaign right now is a Crimson Death Mist, but misremembered by the GM decades after last seeing the 2nd ed MM entry for it. (Or whatever Ravenloft source it originally came from.) It's not the same on specifics, but the thing is a disease that takes the form of a red mist and is intimately connected to blood.

rex monday

01-16-2009 06:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Man, you know what I'd like to use a Crimson Mist for? The breath weapon of a vampire dragon.

JRM

01-17-2009 12:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9845460)

I think that the evil spirit monster we're dealing with in one campaign right now is a Crimson Death Mist, but misremembered by the GM decades after last seeing the 2nd ed MM entry for it. (Or whatever Ravenloft source it originally came from.) It's not the same on specifics, but the thing is a disease that takes the form of a red mist and is intimately connected to blood.

The Crimson Death originated in 1st edition AD&D, debuting in the Monster Manual II. The previously mentioned Vampiric Mist did originate in 2E but, curiously, in the 1993 Monstrous Manual rather than Ravenloft (at least according to wikipedia's list). However, the 2E Ravenloft Appendix has not one, but three Mist Horrors - the Common, Wandering and Pseudo Mist Horror, they are not bloodsuckers like the Crimson Death or Vampiric Mist.

I can understand the mix up though, when I last read the Vampiric Mist write up I was thinking it was a very Ravenloft-like monster.

Sleeper

01-17-2009 12:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9848924)

I can understand the mix up though, when I last read the Vampiric Mist write up I was thinking it was a very Ravenloft-like monster.

I'd lean more towards the Masque of Red Death, what with it being in the title and all.

Or maybe Rocket Raccoon :).

Quote:

Originally Posted by rex monday (Post 9847888)

Man, you know what I'd like to use a Crimson Mist for? The breath weapon of a vampire dragon.

I like.

Thane of Fife

01-17-2009 06:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

The previously mentioned Vampiric Mist did originate in 2E but, curiously, in the 1993 Monstrous Manual rather than Ravenloft (at least according to wikipedia's list).

Actually, I think the Vampiric Mist first appeared in the 1st Edition Module Baltron's Beacon, where, if I recall correctly, it was actually explicitly stated to be an immature Crimson Death Mist.

I've always kind of liked the Crimson Death Mist, though I don't believe I've ever used one. I vividly recall it being one of the first entries in the Monstrous Manual that I really absorbed.

The entry mentions that it can lift fairly substantial weights, and that it tends to keep the remains of those it feeds upon, which gives me the vision of one sort of clumsily animating a skeleton, perhaps to confuse would-be victims.

noisms

01-17-2009 09:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 9840793)

Yes.

,:-P~

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9841861)

And let us not forget the Vampyres from Ravenloft. All the blood drinking, without any of the undeadness, and an extra helping of entitlement mentality from never being human in the first place and raised to think of normal humans as just sheep. Man, they came up with a million goofy variants on the same monsters.

Tch, I set myself up for those, didn't I?

Anyway, new entry coming soon. I spent the last two or three days in transit through international airspace and in various hotel rooms, but I'm back in the land of the living now.

Inyssi

01-17-2009 11:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 9850377)

The entry mentions that it can lift fairly substantial weights, and that it tends to keep the remains of those it feeds upon, which gives me the vision of one sort of clumsily animating a skeleton, perhaps to confuse would-be victims.

Ooh, now that reminds me of the Vashta Nerada.

kelvingreen

01-17-2009 07:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9849089)

I'd lean more towards the Masque of Red Death, what with it being in the title and all.

Or maybe Rocket Raccoon :).

Have one I Know Awesome 80's Marvel Miniseries When I See Them point! I love that series.

JRM

01-17-2009 10:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 9850377)

Actually, I think the Vampiric Mist first appeared in the 1st Edition Module Baltron's Beacon, where, if I recall correctly, it was actually explicitly stated to be an immature Crimson Death Mist.

I've always kind of liked the Crimson Death Mist, though I don't believe I've ever used one. I vividly recall it being one of the first entries in the Monstrous Manual that I really absorbed.

The entry mentions that it can lift fairly substantial weights, and that it tends to keep the remains of those it feeds upon, which gives me the vision of one sort of clumsily animating a skeleton, perhaps to confuse would-be victims.

It did? That is interesting. I wasn't entirely sure about the origins of the monster, which is why I mentioned it was just according to Wikipedia. I've also seen a couple of references to it being in the Greyhawk Monstrous Compendium (MC5). In any case, my main point was that, despite its obvious suitability, it didn't originate as a Ravenloft monster.

By the way, during a brief glance around the internet I found a 3rd edition conversion on the Creature Catalog which agrees with you about the Vampiric Mist coming from module I7.

(un)reason

01-17-2009 10:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 9850377)

Actually, I think the Vampiric Mist first appeared in the 1st Edition Module Baltron's Beacon, where, if I recall correctly, it was actually explicitly stated to be an immature Crimson Death Mist.

I've always kind of liked the Crimson Death Mist, though I don't believe I've ever used one. I vividly recall it being one of the first entries in the Monstrous Manual that I really absorbed.

The entry mentions that it can lift fairly substantial weights, and that it tends to keep the remains of those it feeds upon, which gives me the vision of one sort of clumsily animating a skeleton, perhaps to confuse would-be victims.

I did wonder back in the day what the hell they do with their genius level intelligence. You don't want to have something that smart just leaping at you and attacking unless it's starving. It's like illithids. If they don't have a scheme and some tactics to make their attacks more effective, it feels like you aren't playing them right.

JRM

01-18-2009 12:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 9852743)

I did wonder back in the day what the hell they do with their genius level intelligence. You don't want to have something that smart just leaping at you and attacking unless it's starving. It's like illithids. If they don't have a scheme and some tactics to make their attacks more effective, it feels like you aren't playing them right.

Weren't we talking about Vampiric Mists, which have Average Intelligence (8-10) in 2E - and 1E as well going by these copies of their original stats on Enworld.

I'll agree about the Crimson Death, although rather than making them scheming powers I can't help imagine them bemoaning the curse of having superintelligence which is unnecessary for their basic lifestyle "Here I am, brain the size of a planet, floating around a swamp sucking the blood out of peasants."

EDIT: Oh, and I found yet another AD&D misty bloodsucker, the Scarlet Dancer Mist. How many different types of these bloody things are there in official sources?!

Vultur10

01-18-2009 12:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

What do the Crimson Death Mists do with their intelligence?

They sing. Crimson Deaths spend the time between hunts by composing weird alien songs. When two Deaths meet, they sing their most recent compositions to each other; through the medium of these songs, they share knowledge and their experiences and ideas. Most of this music is pitched below the level of the human ear, and it is accompanied by modulations of the mist's density and composition not easily noticed. However, a tongues spell allows a character to eavesdrop on the meeting of two mists; they may regret this, though, as the concepts hatched in such cold, ancient, alien minds and coded in their inhuman rhythms can drive a man mad.

kelvingreen

01-18-2009 02:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 9852966)

However, a tongues spell allows a character to eavesdrop on the meeting of two mists; they may regret this, though, as the concepts hatched in such cold, ancient, alien minds and coded in their inhuman rhythms can drive a man mad

Just like Elven Cat!

JRM

01-18-2009 02:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9853440)

Just like Elven Cat!

I doubt that. I have conversations with the neighbourhood cat all the time and am perfectly sane.;

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mist, Vampiric

More mist, and a creature not discernibly different from the previous one, except for its over-complicated combat rules and its method of attack: where the Crimson Death gets you with tendrils, the Vampiric Mist has to envelop you entirely, laying itself (and you) open to attack from your comrades.

The main difference between a Vampiric Mist and the Crimson Death kind is all in the flavour: where Crimson Death Mists are laden with plot hooks, Vampirics seem rather functional. They want your blood and that's about it. Watch out. I do like the nice detail of the mists' stench of old blood, though: this attracts stirges, leeches and other blood-drinkers, which would be the basis of an interesting encounter. A Vampiric Mist followed by a horde of stirges would pose a whole new challenge.

What of Vampiric Mists' origins? Well, our sages "first thought [them] to be immature forms of crimson death", but it "is now known that these fiends were deliberately created by a powerful vampire wizard." Known by whom, and how they found out, we are left to imagine.

I have to admit I first encountered Vampiric Mists not in AD&D but in a Roguelike computer game, Zangband, where they are the first monsters with level-draining abilities which you're likely to come across. They hunt in packs, and are represented only by black '#' signs, so they're extremely difficult to spot against the black screen. Nasty buggers. The AD&D kind don't have such characteristics, which makes them much less frightening if you ask me. I think I might have a go at statting up a Zangband version some day.

JRM

01-18-2009 08:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9854556)

Mist, Vampiric

More mist, and a creature not discernibly different from the previous one, except for its over-complicated combat rules and its method of attack: where the Crimson Death gets you with tendrils, the Vampiric Mist has to envelop you entirely, laying itself (and you) open to attack from your comrades.

The main difference between a Vampiric Mist and the Crimson Death kind is all in the flavour: where Crimson Death Mists are laden with plot hooks, Vampirics seem rather functional. They want your blood and that's about it. Watch out. I do like the nice detail of the mists' stench of old blood, though: this attracts stirges, leeches and other blood-drinkers, which would be the basis of an interesting encounter. A Vampiric Mist followed by a horde of stirges would pose a whole new challenge.

Well there are a fair number of differences. Apart from being weaker and dumber, a Vampiric Mist ignores armour (their tendrils only need to hit AC10 plus the target's Dex & magic adjustment) and it heals itself by whatever quantity of hit points of blood it drains.

As for the Vampiric Mist followed by a horde of stirges idea, surely the Mist would try to blood drain the stirges like it would any other animal? Hence the "fatally" in the Ecology entry's "stirges, leeches, and other bloodsuckers are sometimes drawn (fatally) to their smell."

This entry reminds me, yet again, of the odd consequences of AD&D having blood drain = hit points. Three stirges or a vampiric mist could drain dry most 1st-2nd level characters, but not any high level ones. Either a 10th level character has ten times more blood than a 1st level one, or their blood is ten times more potent (which makes a sort of sense), so a few ounces of it is enough to satiate a monster that would need to drain a peasant dry. Hmm, maybe they're not exactly satiated, but drunk on the blood. A 10th level character's blood could be like brandy compared to a commoner's "small beer" or even "water" blood?

demiurge1138

01-18-2009 09:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yeah, I never got why there were mists of both the crimson death and vampiric varieties in the MM. Whereas the crimson death mist's artwork is memorably bad, in sort of a heavy metal album cover sort of way, the vampiric mist's artwork is just bland.

noisms

01-18-2009 10:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9854612)

Well there are a fair number of differences. Apart from being weaker and dumber, a Vampiric Mist ignores armour (their tendrils only need to hit AC10 plus the target's Dex & magic adjustment) and it heals itself by whatever quantity of hit points of blood it drains.

Yeah, that's what I meant by the complicated combat rules. They aren't that unusual or difficult, but the way they are explained induces instant brain stem death in me, as is often the case with MM entries.

Quote:

As for the Vampiric Mist followed by a horde of stirges idea, surely the Mist would try to blood drain the stirges like would any other animal? Hence the "fatally" in the Ecology entry's "stirges, leeches, and other bloodsuckers are sometimes drawn (fatally) to their smell."

That's much less fun, though!

It does raise the interesting point: why would a Vampiric Mist bother attacking adventurers? If it hangs around in swamps there must be leeches and stirges aplenty to eat, not to mention all the birds, fish, turtles etc. that live there. Indeed, why not just go off to the nearby farm and devour a sheep or two? Not as big as a human but also not as likely to start hacking at you with a Sword +1.

SuperG

01-18-2009 01:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9854966)

Yeah, that's what I meant by the complicated combat rules. They aren't that unusual or difficult, but the way they are explained induces instant brain stem death in me, as is often the case with MM entries.

That's much less fun, though!

It does raise the interesting point: why would a Vampiric Mist bother attacking adventurers? If it hangs around in swamps there must be leeches and stirges aplenty to eat, not to mention all the birds, fish, turtles etc. that live there. Indeed, why not just go off to the nearby farm and devour a sheep or two? Not as big as a human but also not as likely to start hacking at you with a Sword +1.

Vampiric Mists are intelligent and can control their bloodlust?

Plus PC's go out there and attack stuff. 'Eep! It's EATIN' OUR SHEEP!'

Plus, it probably is used to eating peasants.

JRM

01-18-2009 06:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9854966)

Yeah, that's what I meant by the complicated combat rules. They aren't that unusual or difficult, but the way they are explained induces instant brain stem death in me, as is often the case with MM entries.

That's much less fun, though!

It does raise the interesting point: why would a Vampiric Mist bother attacking adventurers? If it hangs around in swamps there must be leeches and stirges aplenty to eat, not to mention all the birds, fish, turtles etc. that live there. Indeed, why not just go off to the nearby farm and devour a sheep or two? Not as big as a human but also not as likely to start hacking at you with a Sword +1.

Well, my thinking is that that's the vampire mist's regular diet, and it bothers adventures when the latter are called in to deal with it "A Devil Fog kilt our sheep an' me Uncle Ned, oil giv ye five ewes if ye gets rid of hit!".

I also wonder whether humans aren't easier to catch, since they have a poor manoeuvrability and sense of smell. All the other animals flee at the first sniff of the Mist's Stink of Death so it has to attack them upwind, which probably slows it down a lot to, it being gaseous and all. Not to mention that many swamp animals can easily avoid its attacks - anything faster than speed 12 can simply run or fly away, anything that can swim can duck under the water where the Mist can never follow.

noisms

01-19-2009 07:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9856097)

I also wonder whether humans aren't easier to catch, since they have a poor manoeuvrability and sense of smell.

We are pretty crap in most respects, aren't we? How humans ever came to dominate most fantasy worlds is beyond me.

noisms

01-19-2009 07:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mold

Are Molds the most boring type of monster? I actually have rather a soft spot for them, as they have plenty of potential for weirdness - and for what they are, in terms of bang-for-buck in XP, they are among the mightiest of all creatures.

Molds are the only form of monster, I think, which don't have hit dice, THACO, or attacks. They hit automatically and are only killed by certain effects described in the text.

Brown Mold

Brown Molds drain heat, instantly taking 4d8 hit points worth per round whenever a warm blooded creature comes within 5 feet. 4d8 hit points! More than enough to kill a first or second level adventurer. They double in size when exposed to torchlight, quadruple in size when exposed to flaming oil, and grow by eight times when hit by a fireball, and are resistant to all forms of magic except those which affect plants, cause cold, or disintegrate. And all this for only 15 XP.

Russet Mold

This mold resembles rust, and emits spores which cause 5d4 hit points of damage and induce an instakill save vs. death response due to their "spore sickness" attack. Those killed by spore sickness come back as vegepygmies when the spores have completely taken them over: what relationship does this hint at between the Russet Molds and Mold Men? Russet Molds are worth 35 XP.

Yellow Mold

These molds can kill instantly when 'touched roughly' and sometimes grow into sentient, 300' square colonies with psionic powers and the ability to eat intelligence and shoot spores to a 60' distance. They are worth... 65 XP.

JasonK

01-19-2009 04:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Man, I hate molds. Sure, they're nasty. Yes, their existence makes perfect sense in that weird D&D logic kind of way.

But fighting them just seems so... unheroic. Here I am, hacking away at the... mold.

Mold as a pure environmental hazard I can understand, though. I'd do it 4E-style: difficult terrain, causes poison (cold for brown, psychic for yellow) damage if you start your turn there, plus ongoing (save ends). I don't have my DM's Guide, so I've got no clue if actual mold was actually statted out there this way or no...

Anyway, the Mimic discussion was recent enough that I feel this might still be relevant:

<http://badgods.com/images/mimic.png>

- jasön

demiurge1138

01-19-2009 04:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I forgot that yellow mold used to have psionic potential! That's neat!

Favorite thing to do with molds--have them growing on undead. Skeletons are much scarier if they're dripping with brown mold, and fleshier undead make for great repositories of yellow mold.

JasonK

01-19-2009 04:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9859859)

Favorite thing to do with molds--have them growing on undead. Skeletons are much scarier if they're dripping with brown mold, and fleshier undead make for great repositories of yellow mold.

Ok, I take back what I said earlier - that makes mold totally awesome. :)

- jasön

DMH

01-19-2009 08:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There is an episode of X-files with killer mold and it was that that turned me on to using them as a horror (the most inhuman of monsters). I don't have them sitting on the wall, they are almost always on a body or skeleton. Finding why the dragon stopped raiding isn't so fun when its corpse and hoard is covered with yellow mold.

There are 3 or 4 more in one of the Annual MCs though not have one basic trait I use- delayed reaction. It would be better for the brown mold spores to slowly consume the lungs and body heat of a victim so that it will end up far from the parent mass. d4 days to weeks later and bam, stated damage starts occurring.

sim_james

01-19-2009 08:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858374)
[Brown Mold

Brown Molds drain heat, instantly taking 4d8 hit points worth per round whenever a warm blooded creature comes within 5 feet. 4d8 hit points! More than enough to kill a first or second level adventurer. They double in size when exposed to torchlight, quadruple in size when exposed to flaming oil, and grow by eight times when hit by a fireball, and are resistant to all forms of magic except those which affect plants, cause cold, or disintegrate. And all this for only 15 XP.

Brown mold is a great way to make a passageway basically untraversable for a low-level party, forcing them to go another way... until they find the scroll of cone of cold elsewhere in the dungeon.

It's pretty obvious what you're dealing with when you see brown mold, because it expands in size so fast (doubled by torchlight!), so the 4d8 hp damage will only be suffered by PCs foolhardy enough to charge through or unlucky enough to accidentally expand it to enormous proportions. Could be a good way to keep an area of the dungeon unexplored until you're ready for the PCs to deal with it.

Intelligent undead must love a bit of brown mold - I imagine that the lairs of mummies and vampires could be full of the stuff.

Wakboth

01-20-2009 02:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The molds have grown on me over the years. ;)

They're an essential part of the wacky dungeon biosphere of older (A)D&D, along with the oozes, slimes, puddings and odd fungi.

The encounter I remember best with them comes from the sample adventure in the Basic set of BECMI. There's a room in the abandoned castle, with a dinner table set with what appear to be gold utensils and plates; but in fact, they're tin and just overgrown with yellow mold. Talk about a nasty way to mess with your greedy players!

demiurge1138

01-20-2009 03:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Actually, my players have generally been unfamiliar with the molds, despite their years of gaming experience. I ran an all-dwarf version of "The Whispering Cairn", the first Age of Worms adventure and basically my favorite 1st level dungeon crawl ever. They were all dwarves, so they didn't need torches or other light sources, and found a room overgrown with brown mold.

"OK, so it's cold... so fire should kill it!" thought the rogue. Who then lit a match and threw it in.

The rest of the dwarves had to fish out his shivering, unconscious body with multiple ten foot poles tied together after the mold trebled in size and grew around him. Good times.

JRM

01-20-2009 05:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858374)

Mold

Are Molds the most boring type of monster? I actually have rather a soft spot for them, as they have plenty of potential for weirdness - and for what they are, in terms of bang-for-buck in XP, they are among the mightiest of all creatures.

Never used molds much myself, they are just too static for my tastes. I prefer Oozes, Puddings & Slimes which creep after the PCs with horrible obstinacy. You're quite right about the bang-for-the buck, they make horribly effective weapons for monsters to use - the aforementioned mold covered undead, goblins throwing pottery jars filled with yellow mold, et cetera.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858374)

Brown Mold

I can only remember using brown mold once, I could never extinguish the thought that if brown mold grows at great speed in any lightless area with any warmth, then why isn't the entire underworld one enormous mass of brown mold? Not to mention its blatant defiance of conservation of energy (that much mass from at best a few kilowatts of power - impossible!) always irked me.

Hmm... here's one explanation, maybe brown mold is a pandimensional fungus. A patch of brown mold forms around microscopic rifts between the planes, just big enough for it to slip its spores and mycella through. When brown mold appears to grow at blinding speed, what it's actually doing is using the absorbed energy to shunt a vast mass of mold through from another dimension. Somewhere out there is a Prime Material plane which is nothing but frozen brown mold, reaching out to other worlds and realities for the heat it needs to survive...

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858374)

Brown Mold Russet Mold

This mold resembles rust, and emits spores which cause 5d4 hit points of damage and induce an instakill save vs. death response due to their "spore sickness" attack. Those killed by spore sickness come back as vegpepygmies when the spores have completely taken them over: what relationship does this hint at between the Russet Molds and Mold Men? Russet Molds are worth 35 XP.

The relationship is quite clear - Russet Mold and Mold Men are two forms of the same lifeform, the latter one exploiting the shape (or actual body) of a humanoid to become an ambulatory weapon-wielding sapient.

It gets better, they are Fungi From Outer Space - both monsters originated in Gygax's Expedition to the Barrier Peaks, where an infestation of these creatures can be found in part of a crashed space vessel.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858374)
Yellow Mold

These molds can kill instantly when 'touched roughly' and sometimes grow into sentient, 300' square colonies with psionic powers and the ability to eat intelligence and shoot spores to a 60' distance. They are worth... 65 XP.

This is the only mold I've used more than once, so you won't be surprised to hear they're my favourite of the molds. I like the way they only emit spores sometimes when roughly handled, so I can have passages when characters are tip-toeing around or gingerly stepping over patches of this deadly fungus. Plus, they are relatively simple to destroy (cleanse it with fire!), so I don't have to worry about the party being unequipped to deal with them.

Finally, the possibility that they become sentient and psionic has intriguing potential.

Does a big enough piece of yellow mold begin to scheme and manipulate with its enlarged psychic powers?

Or how about Sabrina the Sorceress, a proverbial Evil Mad Wizard, becomes obsessed with understanding the alien mind of yellow mold, so begins cultivating one in her tower's basement and chaining scholars in its chamber. She separates the two with a glasteel wall, so the mold cannot kill the sage with its spores, while allowing the mold to slowly devour their minds 1 point of intelligence at a time, in the hope that if it eats enough Intelligence she will be able to learn its secrets through conversation

Malignant Marionette

01-20-2009 05:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858306)

We are pretty crap in most respects, aren't we? How humans ever came to dominate most fantasy worlds is beyond me.

I'm betting the nearly unending supply of unhinged adventurers, crazed priests and power-hungry wizard carving their supply of experience from the hide of every other living (and unliving) creature around them might have something to do with it. :p

DMH

01-20-2009 07:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Another potential mobile host for some molds is the troll. I would reduce its ability to regenerate to represent how it is regenerating against the mold's consumption (to 1 point per two rounds (1/2e) or fast healing 1 (3.X)).

And I was sort of right with the Annual MCs. 3 are in the 2nd (though one is much more lik an ooze) and 2 in the 4th (one of which has a delayed reaction, though it is only d4 hours).

Wakshaani

01-20-2009 08:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yellow Mold is yet another of the Ancient Foes, and longstanding rumor is that, somewhere DEEP underground, the Original Yellow Mold still lives, the very firstsentient, or sentient-ish, thing on teh entire planet. It's miles across now, and seperated segments have been carried up towards the surface, where small colonies grow into their own eventual groupminds.

But the first, giant, and amazingly Psionic mold?

It predates fish.

It can think.

And it hungers.

Kakita Kojiro

01-20-2009 09:33 AM

We once had a DM whose players had learned to clear out yellow mold infestations with fire. So they next ran across a yellow mold infestation -- surrounding a brown mold infestation.

Yeah. I'm a bastard.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9861968)

I can only remember using brown mold once, I could never extinguish the thought that if brown mold grows at great speed in any lightless area with any warmth, then why isn't the entire underworld one enormous mass of brown mold? Not to mention its blatant defiance of conservation of energy (that much mass from at best a few kilowatts of power - impossible!) always irked me.

There has to be something to feed all those Underdark inhabitants. Caves are notoriously poor at sustaining ecosystems, and even when they do it is mostly sustained on food sources from the surface. Superfast growing brown mold could be feeding all those whosname underdark sheep (rothe?).

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9862913)

Yellow Mold is yet another of the Ancient Foes, and longstanding rumor is that, somewhere DEEP underground, the Original Yellow Mold still lives, the very firstsentient, or sentient-ish, thing on teh entire planet. It's miles across now, and seperated segments have been carried up towards the surface, where small colonies grow into their own eventual groupminds.

Such as this?

Vultur10

01-20-2009 09:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9862913)
But the first, giant, and amazingly Psionic mold?

It predates fish.

It can think.

And it hungers.

Awesomely creepy.

Inyssiis

01-20-2009 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9863102)
There has to be something to feed all those Underdark inhabitants. Caves are notoriously poor at sustaining ecosystems, and even when they do it is mostly sustained on food sources from the surface. Superfast growing brow mold could be feeding all those whosname underdark sheep (rothe?).

Planar portals? A permanent window to the elemental plane of fire or of positive energy, or even to Limbo, is like having a little sun right in your closet, and I should think that a portal to another plane would at least provide some energy.

Ditto ambient magic deposits. Wild magic zones?

Also, yes, the rothé. How does something like that work underground? Wouldn't, say, the kruthik work better? Or something else less obviously not-at-all-optimized for burrowing?

glass

01-20-2009 06:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9861606)

"OK, so it's cold... so fire should kill it!" thought the rogue. Who then lit a match and threw it in.

My players made the same assumption in the same adventure. Thankfully, the 3.5 version's growth isn't quite so prodigious as the 2e version (or I read it wrong :D), and the PCs threw fire from just far enough away that the expanding mould didn't reach them.

glass.

JRM

01-20-2009 07:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9863102)

There has to be something to feed all those Underdark inhabitants. Caves are notoriously poor at sustaining ecosystems, and even when they do it is mostly sustained on food sources from the surface. Superfast growing brown mold could be feeding all those whosname underdark sheep (rothe?).

Yes, I had that thought too, but it would require a fast-breeding subterranean fungivore that is immune to cold damage. Can't think of any in the Monstrous Manual. Plus, AD&D has a lot of other subterranean plants & fungi that grow with hard to explain fecundity, so brown mold need not be the underworld ecology's food base (for all we know that might be Deepspawn, or the Gibberling Replicator proposed in our earlier threat).

I still prefer my "Plane of Brown Mold" theory.

kami2awa

01-21-2009 07:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

A while ago, someone suggested that the Underdark ecology is based on a type of very populous lizard, a tiny creature that doesn't eat but instead makes nutrient directly from ambient magic; "magosynthesis".

It's called Maxwell's Demon. :D

Zounds!

01-21-2009 07:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I'm sure that at some point in the Forgotten Realms Underdark supplement they state outright that the Underdark ecology is based on magic - the same 'strange underground magical radiation' which has been giving the drow their special powers since AD&D 1st edition. The fungus soaks up the magical radiation and grows to immense size, taking on bizarre magical properties as it does so. The animals eat the fungus. The humanoids eat the animals. And the Mind Flayers eat everyone else's brains.

Wakboth

01-21-2009 08:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In an campaign that never quite got off the ground, I had the idea that the Underdark was created during a battle between elemental lords. Thus you had huge caverns full of air and water, with spouts of fire as well, throughout the earth, and a terribly high level of background magic. It explained all the more-or-less habitable underground domains with ecosystems based on unnaturally prolific fungi and molds and whatnot.

DMH

01-21-2009 08:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Why couldn't an underdark that is several million years old have a complex ecosystem? Energy input is from the surface, the deeps (thermal) or even the stones themselves- there are bacteria that survive by chemosynthesis of their substrate. Magic adds to it, but it doesn't have to be the basis or origin.

Kakita Kojiro

01-21-2009 10:29 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9869648)

Why couldn't an underdark that is several million years old have a complex ecosystem? Energy input is from the surface, the deeps (thermal) or even the stones themselves- there are bacteria that survive by chemosynthesis of their substrate. Magic adds to it, but it doesn't have to be the basis or origin.

Because we look for comparison at the underground cave systems we are familiar with -- that have been around for several million years, and most of which have ecosystems -- and see that they do not support the extremely high-energy ecosystem depicted for the Underdark.

And since this is D&D, if something is inexplicably different from the real world, we are forced to conclude that a wizard did it. Q.E.D., the Underdark runs on magic.

noisms

01-22-2009 07:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mold Man (Vegepygmy)

I like that these creatures - who must be very rarely encountered - have not one but two of their own derogatory nicknames - "vegepygmies" and "moldies". If any D&D creature was to have a derogatory nickname you would expect kobolds, goblins or orcs, really wouldn't you?

Anyway, Mold Men are a reasonable idea, though when it comes to fungus people I have to say that Myconids always struck me as more interesting. Mold Men are rather bland by comparison - all they are is little people made out of fungus, who in most other respects behave like goblins or tasloi, say. They're just a little smaller, tougher and better at manipulating fungi for their own ends. Not enough flavour, dammit!

Chief Mold Men have a similar attack to Russet Molds, i.e. they can release spores which kill you and turn you into another Mold Man, with 4 HD. It has only just occurred to me that this must surely mean victims have to shrink (or grow) to 3.5 feet. Try explaining that.

Inyssius

01-22-2009 07:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9872018)

Chief Mold Men have a similar attack to Russet Molds, i.e. they can release spores which kill you and turn you into another Mold Man, with 4 HD. It has only just occurred to me that this must surely mean victims have to shrink (or grow) to 3.5 feet. Try explaining that.

Since mold creatures are surely much less dense than regular creatures, I could see a 2'6" halfling providing plenty of mass for a good-sized vegepygmy. For that matter, shouldn't your average hulking orc barbarian have enough meat to produce four or five Mold Men?

The Last Conformist

01-22-2009 08:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9872018)

I like that these creatures - who must be very rarely encountered - have not one but two of their own derogatory nicknames - "vegepygmies" and "moldies". If any D&D creature was to have a derogatory nickname you would expect kobolds, goblins or orcs, really wouldn't you?

Kobold, goblin, and orc are the derogatory nicknames. It's just that nobody ever feels the need to use a non-derogatory word for them.

randomgamer8466

01-22-2009 08:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Maybe in the same way that surface plants derive energy from light, Underdark plants (fungi, whatever) synthesize energy from darkness. Scurosynthesis? Mavrosynthesis?

I realize that this runs counter to physics, but come on people. it's D&D! Anyway, D&D does tend to treat both darkness and cold (both of which are the absence of energy) as manifestations of energy in some circumstances (Cone of cold, Darkness 15' radius).

noisms

01-22-2009 08:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9872392)

Maybe in the same way that surface plants derive energy from light, Underdark plants (fungi, whatever) synthesize energy from darkness. Scurosynthesis? Mavrosynthesis?

I realize that this runs counter to physics, but come on people. it's D&D! Anyway, D&D does tend to treat both darkness and cold (both of which are the absence of energy) as manifestations of energy in some circumstances (Cone of cold, Darkness 15' radius).

Something to do with dark matter maybe?

Wakshaani

01-22-2009 01:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

They operate on the Darlon princible, obviously, where darkness is a created energy and light absorbs darkons... teh Sun itself is a MASSIVE Darkon sink.

kami2awa

01-22-2009 06:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9872240)

Kobold, goblin, and orc are the derogatory nicknames. It's just that nobody ever feels the need to use a non-derogatory word for them.

So what do they call themselves?

DMH

01-22-2009 06:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

IIRC vegepygmies could reproduce on their own as well as use russet mold in Barrier Peaks. It was only later did the authors remove their ability to breed on their own.

So, what kind of culture exists for a creature that can, more or less, spontaneously appear? If there is no overlap in generations, there is no transmission of values and knowledge. Could they become something more if the ability to breed was reintroduced?

And I like the idea of larger creatures = more vegepygmies.

The Last Conformist

01-22-2009 10:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 9873829)
So what do they call themselves?

Kobold, orc, goblin. They're not big on the whole self-respect thing.

Mr. Teapot

01-23-2009 03:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9873862)
IIRC vegepygmies could reproduce on their own as well as use russet mold in Barrier Peaks. It was only later did the authors remove their ability to breed on their own.

So, what kind of culture exists for a creature that can, more or less, spontaneously appear? If there is no overlap in generations, there is no transmission of values and knowledge. Could they become something more if the ability to breed was reintroduced?

And I like the idea of larger creatures = more vegepygmies.

Perhaps Vegepygmies transmit cultural knowledge through some sort of racial memory instead of by learning? Or perhaps they have to start back from square one each time?

Or, if you change Vegepygmies to work off of the psychic yellow mold instead of russet mold, the vegepygmies might just be parts of the huge hivemind intelligence. Specifically, a portion of mold designed to perform tasks yellow mold can't do easily on its own, including build structures, use tools and interact with humanoids.

noisms

01-23-2009 06:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mongrelman

I love Mongrelmen unreservedly and won't hear a word said against them. Like Broken Ones, they are one of the great, tragically overlooked creatures of fantasy role playing history. Even if they do have many egregious instances of exception based design scattered through their entry.

What I like most about Mongrelmen is the Lawful Neutral alignment, and the fact that even when enslaved or forced into serfdom by evil overlords, their attitude remains strictly stoical. There isn't enough stoicism among D&D races. You can even imagine Mongrelmen equivalents of Marcus Aurelius and Seneca pontificating to their comrades after the work is through for the day.

I also like the idea of a race of beings who are just misunderstood. Evil creatures enslave them and good creatures hunt them for sport, assuming the worst about them. But they've got it all wrong; Mongrelmen just want to be left alone.

One of those ideas I've always wanted to work into a campaign is that Mongrelmen, despite their long history of oppression and secrecy, are keepers of an ancient and secret Knowledge that they have maintained for millenia. And yet nobody knows it, because they keep it so well... until one day, a group of adventurers are hired in an inn by a wizard...

JRM

01-23-2009 11:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9878757)

Mongrelman

Three questions occurred to me after reading through the Mongrelman entry (who would presumably become "Mongrelfolk" in 3rd edition :cool:).

Firstly, why are they Lawful Neutral? D&D tends to assume creatures with that alignment are highly rule-bound and disciplined, so why would a race that is primarily made up of slaves, outcasts and scavengers have that alignment? Other LN races have obvious reasons for possessing that alignment - they're Law Incarnate (Modrons), hive-minded bug people (Formians) or must have disciplined minds to face the Madness of Limb (Githzeria).

I suppose it could be a cultural thing, but why would they keep a culture of "obey the slavemaster's rules without protest" during those periods when they're not slaves, as well as the problem in maintaining a common culture in a race which is widely scattered in small groups. I'm suspecting it must be something inherent in their thought-processes, which are as inhuman as their appearance. Now I don't think it's very likely that would arise spontaneously as a result of random mongrelisation between humanoid races, surely a Neutral alignment would be more likely if you mix and match a lot of humanoids. That leads me to the next question.

Secondly, where and how did they originate? I'm thinking they are most likely a created race, literally born to be serfs - but what race could have created them?

Thirdly, do they have any connection with the Broken Ones? Did the creator race try blending animals with humanoids as well as humanoids with other humanoids?

Hmm... or maybe they're two forms of the same species, created as a biological booby trap. The creator race sold masses of docile mongrelmen slaves to its neighbors, and then when the time was right cast the ritual which caused them to metamorphose into Broken Ones and tear their enemies' civilizations to pieces. Unfortunately for them, they did not foresee the Broken Ones would develop a Greater form which in turn destroyed their creator's society.

Kakita Kojiro

01-24-2009 12:12 AM

I've always liked the mongrelmen as a sort of lampshade hung on the weird fantasy genetics of D&D. With half-elves and half-orcs (and, later, half-dragons and half-all-sorts-of-things), you've got to wonder what is going on.

However, I've always liked them as more of an emergent race, rather than (yet another) ancient-now-fallen race. D&D already has so many of those races lying around that you literally cannot enter a dungeon without tripping over a half-dozen or so. (Just how many fallen-races-before-all-others races is Wak up to by now, in his count with bullywugs and kuo-toa and locathath and yellow molds and whatnot?)

When even the half-elves and half-orcs get treated as "established" races, it really does free up the niche of newcomers for mongrelmen. And that plays into their background of being escaped slaves and whatnot -- they're so new, that they don't have a culture yet, but these escapees are trying to build themselves a culture. So they're very insular (shun outsiders), and value conformity to their neo-cultural norms (i.e., they're Lawful).

demiurge1138

01-24-2009 01:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I like mongrelfolk a lot... but I'm confused by their treatment in other sections of the Monster Manual. The lengthy section on orcs mentions that many mongrelmen have a lot of orc blood, leading to their naturally chaotic and evil disposition. But that's not what mongrelmen are about at all!

In the 3.5 Dungeon adventure "The Lightless Depths" (part of the Savage Tide Adventure Path, but a satisfying enough Underdark-crawl that I'd run it without), there's a village of mongrelfolk underneath the Isle of Dread. They've cobbled together a village, have strong traditions and are defended by a maze of yellow mold and a pack of trained hook horrors, but know that anybody who can steamroll through their defenses (IE adventurers) could easily slaughter them and is thus worth treating deferentially.

Sleeper

01-24-2009 03:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9880205)

I like mongrelfolk a lot... but I'm confused by their treatment in other sections of the Monster Manual. The lengthy section on orcs mentions that many mongrelmen have a lot of orc blood, leading to their naturally chaotic and evil disposition. But that's not what mongrelmen are about at all!

You could always treat those as rumors.

In fact, that's always an interesting take on the MM. Treat the entire book as a collection of rumors and tales the players might have heard. Which are true, which are not? Are dragons really wise or is that just a story that sprung up around the feral beasts, are orcs really unmitigatedly evil or are they just the fantasy equivalent of Saracens, are mongrelfolk wicked Moreaus that turned on their creators or an emergent race?

Wakshaani

01-24-2009 07:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9879941)

(Just how many fallen-races-before-all-others races is Wak up to by now, in his count with bullywugs and kuo-toa an locathath and yellow molds and whatnot?)

For the record:

FIRST

Yellow Mold (Theory, possible rumor)

SECOND

Mind Flayers (And relatives. MIGHT include Aboleths in this!)

THIRD

Aarocca, Lizardfolk (And possibly Kobolds and/or Troglodytes), Bullywugs, and Kua-Toa

FOURTH

Elves, Dwarves, Orcs, Goblins

FIFTH

Man

Dragons would crop up after or at the tail end of the Third Age, and are in place as teh 4th age rolls in.

noisms

01-24-2009 08:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9880985)

You could always treat those as rumors.

In fact, that's always an interesting take on the MM. Treat the entire book as a collection of rumors and tales the players might have heard. Which are true, which are not? Are dragons really wise or is that just a story that sprung up around the feral beasts, are orcs really unmitigatedly evil or are they just the fantasy equivalent of Saracens, are mongrelfolk wicked Moreaus that turned on their creators or an emergent race?

My ideal bestiary would be like that. It wouldn't even have stats. It would be like a huge scrapbook of roughly scrawled eyewitness accounts, records of myths and rumours, hand-drawn sketches, and the occasional 'scientific' study by a sage. Then it would be up to the DM to create the stats for everything, based on what he could glean from the book, what he decided was true, and what he could imagine.

Too much work by half, but I love the idea.

Wakshaani

01-24-2009 09:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9882289)

My ideal bestiary would be like that. It wouldn't even have stats. It would be like a huge scrapbook of roughly scrawled eyewitness accounts, records of myths and rumours, hand-drawn sketches, and the occasional 'scientific' study by a sage. Then it would be up to the DM to create the stats for everything, based on what he could glean from the book, what he decided was true, and what he could imagine.

Too much work by half, but I love the idea.

You sir need to take a gander at Privateer Press' Monsternomicon. It has stats, sure, but teh FLUFF is written as half-truths and ongoing investigations, with a knowledge (So-n-So) list, with DC 10, 15, 20, 25, and 30 soundbites. Which might not even be true.

It's fantastic.

rex monday

01-24-2009 03:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9882289)

My ideal bestiary would be like that. It wouldn't even have stats. It would be like a huge scrapbook of roughly scrawled eyewitness accounts, records of myths and rumours, hand-drawn sketches, and the occasional 'scientific' study by a sage. Then it would be up to the DM to create the stats for everything, based on what he could glean from the book, what he decided was true, and what he could imagine.

Too much work by half, but I love the idea.

Maybe even a second volume with all the stats in it (and a few alternate stats for each entry). That'd never get published probably, unfortunately.

Have you ever seen the monster section of the Dying Earth RPG? Every entry is filled with conjecture and rumor. There's two entries on consecutive pages, each detailing monsters with wildly differing descriptions- same artwork. Both rendered by 'sages'.

noisms

01-24-2009 04:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by rex monday (Post 9883445)

Maybe even a second volume with all the stats in it (and a few alternate stats for each entry). That'd never get published probably, unfortunately.

Have you ever seen the monster section of the Dying Earth RPG? Every entry is filled with conjecture and rumor. There's two entries on consecutive pages, each detailing monsters with wildly differing descriptions-same artwork. Both rendered by 'sages'.

I'll have to give it a gander. Unfortunately you're probably right that my idea would never get published. Unless I do it myself, of course. ;)

demiurge1138

01-24-2009 05:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There's a number of "monster books" that serve a very similar role, except that they're not designed for games at all. Sitting on my shelf proudly are Dougal Dixon's speculative zoology trilogy (After Man, The New Dinosaurs, Man After Man), all of which I've plundered for D&D material, as well as The Wildlife of Star Wars, The World of Kong and Fabulous Creatures and Magical Beings, the supposed records of a fictional British cryptozoological society.

Mr. Teapot

01-24-2009 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9879704)

Firstly, why are they Lawful Neutral? D&D tends to assume creatures with that alignment are highly rule-bound and disciplined, so why would a race that is primarily made up of slaves, outcasts and scavengers have that alignment? Other LN races have obvious reasons for possessing that alignment - they're Law Incarnate (Modrons), hive-minded bug people (Formians) or must have disciplined minds to face the Madness of Limb (Githzeria).

I suppose it could be a cultural thing, but why would they keep a culture of "obey the slavemaster's rules without protest" during those periods when they're not slaves, as well as the problem in maintaining a common culture in a race which is widely scattered in small groups. I'm suspecting it must be something inherent in their thought-processes which are as inhuman as their appearance. Now I don't think it's very likely that would arise spontaneously as a result of random mongrelisation between humanoid races, surely a Neutral alignment would be more likely if you mix and match a lot of humanoids. That leads me to the next question.

Secondly, where and how did they originate?

Well, if the mongrelmen are a created race, then that would answer the alignment issue: whatever race created the Mongrelfolk bred them/alterd them so they would be more orderly and predictable. That way rebellion was less likely and the mongrelfolk would stick to their routines of serving their masters without much question.

kelvingreen

01-25-2009 12:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9882289)

My ideal bestiary would be like that. It wouldn't even have stats. It would be like a huge scrapbook of roughly scrawled eyewitness accounts, records of myths and rumours, hand-drawn sketches, and the occasional 'scientific' study by a sage. Then it would be up to the DM to create the stats for everything, based on what he could glean from the book, what he decided was true, and what he could imagine.

The Dragonlance: Fifth Age monster book (The Bestiary, appropriately enough), was half way there. The bulk of the book was exactly as you describe, with the stats contained in small boxed sidebars.

Sleeper

01-25-2009 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9882289)

My ideal bestiary would be like that. It wouldn't even have stats. It would be like a huge scrapbook of roughly scrawled eyewitness accounts, records of myths and rumours, hand-drawn sketches, and the occasional 'scientific' study by a sage. Then it would be up to the DM to create the stats for everything, based on what he could glean from the book, what he decided was true, and what he could imagine.

Too much work by half, but I love the idea.

At one point, I seriously considered starting a thread with the goal of rewriting the entire MM. All the old monsters, entirely new approaches. Can be as simple as just a twist on the original core monster, or more complex ones like new powers and a few stat block tweaks, swapping stats (it's amazing how much you can change things just by renaming and recasting the monster while still keeping the same stats), or even a complete rewrite. Two or more options for each monster, with very different approaches.

JRM

01-25-2009 04:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9884041)

Well, if the mongrelmen are a created race, then that would answer the alignment issue: whatever race created the Mongrelfolk bred them/alterd them so they would be more orderly and predictable. That way rebellion was less likely and the mongrelfolk would stick to their routines of serving their masters without much question.

Yup that's what I was thinking, I thought it was pretty implicit when I suggested they were "literally born to be serfs".

Although come to think of it, there's no call to limit them to just toiling in the fields. They may only have Low-Average intelligence but there are still plenty of other tasks they could be employed to perform - I imagine most would work as labourers (maybe not in areas exposed to the public gaze, perhaps all the sewers and cesspits of a city are maintained by a hidden guild of mongrelmen) and various other low-status occupations such as charcoal burning, while their camouflage and mimicry skills would make them skilled gamekeepers. Of course, there's no reason exceptionally intelligent individuals might not perform more esteemed jobs. I half-suspect a mongrelman butler or librarian might be a bit of a cliché, but what about a mongrelman clerk, cellarer or apothecary?

JRM

01-25-2009 04:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9884280)

The Dragonlance: Fifth Age monster book (The Bestiary, appropriately enough), was half way there. The bulk of the book was exactly as you describe, with the stats contained in small boxed sidebars.

The latest version of the Warhammer Fantasy Roleplaying Game's Bestiary is the same, with ingame "facts" and rumour about creatures in the main part of the book, and the true deal and stats at the back.

DMH

01-25-2009 06:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

As is the 2 ecology texts for the Providence rpg. Heck the second one has the giant insects chapter as a cookbook.

Khuxan

01-25-2009 09:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9882289)

My ideal bestiary would be like that. It wouldn't even have stats. It would be like a huge scrapbook of roughly scrawled eyewitness accounts, records of myths and rumours, hand-drawn sketches, and the occasional 'scientific' study by a sage. Then it would be up to the DM to create the stats for everything, based on what he could glean from the book, what he decided was true, and what he could imagine.

Too much work by half, but I love the idea.

I think Fourth Edition is the perfect opportunity for this. In the front of the book, monster descriptions - rumours, facts, sketches - and in the back generic statblocks for every level and monster type, with a few nameless powers as examples for each level. The DM's work is negligible, he/she has a fully functioning statblock and the players don't know what to expect.

noisms

01-25-2009 09:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9884603)

At one point, I seriously considered starting a thread with the goal of rewriting the entire MM. All the old monsters, entirely new approaches. Can be as simple as just a twist on the original core monster, or more complex ones like new powers and a few stat block tweaks, swapping stats (it's amazing how much you can change things just by renaming and recasting the monster while still keeping the same stats), or even a complete rewrite. Two or more options for each monster, with very different approaches.

Seems like a very worthy project. A task worthy of Hercules though.

rex monday

01-25-2009 07:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

All this talk of patchwork Mongrelmen created as a source of slave labor makes me think of the ReMade from New Crobuzon. You could make becoming a Mongrelman the standard punishment by the (evil) magocracy.

(un)reason

01-25-2009 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by rex monday (Post 9887190)

All this talk of patchwork Mongrelmen created as a source of slave labor makes me think of the ReMade from New Crobuzon. You could make becoming a Mongrelman the standard punishment by the (evil) magocracy.

Already been done, in the Ravenloft domain of G'henna. Ok, so it's a theocracy, not a magocracy, but same principle.

JasonK

01-26-2009 03:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9882022)
For the record:

FIRST
Yellow Mold (Theory, possible rumor)

SECOND
Mind Flayers (And relatives. MIGHT include Aboleths in this!)

THIRD
Aarocca, Lizardfolk (And possibly Kobolds and/or Troglodytes), Bullywugs, and Kua-Toa

FOURTH
Elves, Dwarves, Orcs, Goblins

FIFTH
Man

Dragons would crop up after or at the tail end of the Third Age, and are in place as teh 4th age rolls in.

Wak, any sense where the Yuan-ti fit into this? Or are you waiting to call those until we get there in the thread?

- jasön

sim_james

01-26-2009 07:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Yuan-ti couldn't possibly be any older than the third wave, along with the lizardfolk. One possibility is that yuan-ti in their modern form date back only to the beginning of the fifth wave, when third wave reptilians diluted their blood with early humans in order to survive.

Perhaps human civilisation emerged when these proto-yuan-ti began breeding programs of primitive mammalian humanoids, attempting to engineer a race of breeding stock to help them to survive the growth of fourth wave cultures.

Wakshaani

01-26-2009 09:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9890155)
Wak, any sense where the Yuan-ti fit into this? Or are you waiting to call those until we get there in the thread?

- jasön

Never came up, so, at best they're from the same time as the lizardfolk, but I'd put 'em younger, since they have to crossbreed with humans. Heck, might even go so far as to say that they were originally humans who found old Lizard temples and started worshipping a lost diety, who gradually got them to ascend to Lizardness (Clearly better, since it was what said diety was based on) and, since then, they've been gradually spreading, adding more to the cult and striving for greater levels of reptillilanness. Would explain an awful lot.

Newer products (3.5, ferinstance) mention that several of teh Reptillian races (Lizardfolk, Kobolds, Troglodytes) have a common Lizardy ancestor, which could be the old Proto Race that devolved into these others. Would make sense, since many a DM has different Lizardfolk breeds scattered all over the place ... teh usual marsh dwellers, the 3.5 edition river-dwellers, cave lizards, and teh always-keen Sand Lizardfolk, which, really, are such a given that I'm stunned never got an official write-up.

noisms

01-26-2009 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Morkoth

A funny one, this - the illustration depicts a kind of six armed octopus-goblin centaur (gobloctaur?), but the text is deliberately vague about appearance: "no one is certain what [Morkoths] really look like". I don't mind vagueness mixed with my monsters, as it all adds to the mystery and allows a DM to put a fresh spin on things, but your mileage may vary.

Morkoths are an interesting monster, actually - one of the better underwater creatures. They live in confusing networks of narrows tunnels that have a hypnotising effect on those who enter; this functions like a charm person spell and draws the unfortunate victim to the Morkoth's maw in a leisurely fashion. They lure humanoids into their lairs through strategic use of treasure - they have no interest in gold or gems, but are well aware that other races covet them. This makes Morkoths great for the old bait-and-switch if you're a mean DM.

I like the idea of Morkoths and Kraken cooperating, though I'm confused by this sentence: "They sometimes make alliances with kraken, offering their help in exchange for an occasional slave", because in the very next paragraph it goes on to say, "[Morkoths] do not enslave their victims, if only because their appetites are so fierce that slaves would not survive long." Unless the first sentence is supposed to mean that Morkoths ask for help from Kraken in exchange for slaves?

Thranguy

01-27-2009 01:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9882022)
For the record:

FIRST
Yellow Mold (Theory, possible rumor)

SECOND
Mind Flayers (And relatives. MIGHT include Aboleths in this!)

THIRD

Aarocca, Lizardfolk (And possibly Kobolds and/or Troglodytes), Bullywugs, and Kua-Toa

FOURTH

Elves, Dwarves, Orcs, Goblins

FIFTH

Man

Dragons would crop up after or at the tail end of the Third Age, and are in place as teh 4th age rolls in.

Where do the Beholders drop in? Second age?

Also curious about the Gith...the 'base stock' issue would tend to put them no earlier than the Fourth, but that seems late...

Kakita Kojiro

01-27-2009 01:43 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9891194)

I like the idea of Morkoths and Kraken cooperating, though I'm confused by this sentence: "They sometimes make alliances with kraken, offering their help in exchange for an occasional slave", because in the very next paragraph it goes on to say, "[Morkoths] do not enslave their victims, if only because their appetites are so fierce that slaves would not survive long." Unless the first sentence is supposed to mean that Morkoths ask for help from Kraken in exchange for slaves?

I'd read that as the Morkoths offer to help Krakens, and in return are paid by the kraken with slaves that the kraken has taken. Which the morkoth then eats.

I don't think I ever even considered using a morkoth, in any game, just because of the horrible illo it had in the AD&D Monster Manual.

JRM

01-27-2009 05:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9891194)

Morkoth

A funny one, this - the illustration depicts a kind of six armed octopus-goblin centaur (gobloctaur?), but the text is deliberately vague about appearance: "no one is certain what [Morkoths] really look like". I don't mind vagueness mixed with my monsters, as it all adds to the mystery and allows a DM to put a fresh spin on things, but your mileag may vary.

More to the point, the Monstrous Manual's illustration in no way matches the text, which makes no mention of insectoid arms or tentacle-legs. It even has a fish's mouth instead of the octopus beak all Morkoths attack with! And I quote:

"The descriptions given by those who have encountered morkoths contain considerable variation, so no one is certain what they really look like. They are usually said to resemble an intelligent fish with an octopus's beak. They are most frequently described as being between 5 to 6 feet long, inky black in color, with faint luminescent silver patches. They may have fins for arms and legs that vaguely resemble those of humans, and a number of fins for navigation and propulsion in the depths."

I agree that the vague appearance is part of a morkoth's charm, indeed I like to imagine them as protean creatures, which look like they've been assembled from bits and pieces of different deep sea predators, with no two Morkoths looking alike.

Hmm, maybe they are assembled from bits and pieces of deep sea predators, and all that stuff about female Morkoths and eggs is just distraction. Perhaps a Morkoth is an evil Abyssal spirit (in both the deep sea and lower planes sense of the word) that corrupts the egg of a giant cephalopod to become the seed of an unnatural body, which it grows using choice parts of its devoured victims.

As for their use in game, I find Morkoths a bit problematic since the party need to be at the bottom of the sea to meet one and some of my players hate sailing on the water, let alone diving beneath it. That, and they're not that resistant to a numerous or melee-strong party. The Morkoth has a great chance of charming one of the PCs, but the rest of them while just dogpile the devil-cuttlefish-fish and chop it to sushi.

By the way, does the charm effect mean the victim will try to defend the Morkoth from the rest of the party? There's no clear indication in any of the sources I've seen, which seem to infer the enchanted victim just stands their in a daze, making no effort to defend itself while the Morkoth eats them alive.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9891194)

I like the idea of Morkoths and Kraken cooperating, though I'm confused by this sentence: "They sometimes make alliances with kraken, offering their help in exchange for an occasional slave", because in the very next paragraph it goes on to say, "[Morkoths] do not enslave their victims, if only because their appetites are so fierce that slaves would not survive long." Unless the first sentence is supposed to mean that Morkoths ask for help from Kraken in exchange for slaves?

Doesn't that mean the Morkoth gets given some of the Kraken's slaves for it to charm and devour? I see Kakita agrees.

Although I'm more interested in what aid a Morkoth will offer to a Kraken in return for this meal. Presumably a genius+ giant squid will think of all kinds of things it can ask a Morkoth to command a charmed victim to perform.

JasonK

01-27-2009 06:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9890777)

Newer products (3.5, ferinstance) mention that several of teh Reptillian races (Lizardfolk, Kobolds, Troglodytes) have a common Lizardy ancestor, which could be the old Proto Race that devolved into these others. Would make sense, since many a DM has different Lizardfolk breeds scattered all over the place ... teh usual marsh dwellers, the 3.5 edition river-dwellers, cave lizards, and teh always-keen Sand Lizardfolk, which, really, are such a given that I'm stunned never got an official write-up.

Hhrm. That's actually perfect for me. Thanks, Wak! Great idea!

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9891194)

Morkoth

A funny one, this - the illustration depicts a kind of six armed octopus-goblin centaur (gobloctaur?), but the text is deliberately vague about appearance: "no one is certain what [Morkoths] really look like". I don't mind vagueness mixed with my monsters, as it all adds to the mystery and allows a DM to put a fresh spin on things, but your mileage may vary.

Sounds like those upper planar good things whose name starts with a Z. Only more gobliny. Weird.

Quote:

I like the idea of Morkoths and Kraken cooperating, though I'm confused by this sentence: "They sometimes make alliances with kraken, offering their help in exchange for an occasional slave", because in the very next paragraph it goes on to say, "[Morkoths] do not enslave their victims, if only because their appetites are so fierce that slaves would not survive long." Unless the first sentence is supposed to mean that Morkoths ask for help from Kraken in exchange for slaves?

I don't know what the hell a kraken would do with a slave, either... Use it to clean off barnacles? Maybe by slave they mean "snack"?

- jasön

Sleeper

01-27-2009 06:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9893067)

I don't know what the hell a kraken would do with a slave, either... Use it to clean off barnacles? Maybe by slave they mean "snack"?

Emissaries. Krakens are kind of stuck underwater, when everything interesting seems to happen on land. How can you blackmail a port city-state with near-constant hurricane-force weather (a laweather summoning), if you don't have an ambassador to tell the monarch in which bottomless trench to drop the loot? How can you make an arrangement with a merchant fleet to spare the ships flying their colors, in return for a steady supply of those things that just aren't usually found in the holds of merchant vessels, like spy networks and ancient lore? Kraken are like primeval god-beasts, forces of raw nature. Appeasement and worship. Disturbingly-shaped shrines built at the ancient cephalopod's behest, and swaying cults of sailors wanting to live another day.

I like the idea of morkoth being creatures of the deep. Luminescent, alien.

Wakshaani

01-27-2009 07:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thranguy (Post 9891652)
Where do the Beholders drop in? Second age?

Also curious about the Gith...the 'base stock' issue would tend to put them no earlier than the Fourth, but that seem: late...

Depends on the origin you want 'em to have, really. Abberations tend to do best if they predate Elves, or, at worst, coincide with 'em... gives them something to rail against and, more important, you have to have THINGS underground for Drow to discover when they were just 'Dark Elves', before being driven underground. Beholders don't have much culture as teh can't really stand one another, so, chalk 'em up as failed experiments by the Mind Flayers, way back when, to make guard animals, pets, or "Magical Experiments". AFter the Illithiad Empire collapses due to teh Elder Races (Aaroca, Bullywug, etc) uprising, the old experiments wander off, some vanishing, some thriving. Newer one sget made later on from younger races messing with half-finished or long-abandoned magics. Dopplgangers, for example, are good for this... they were created by Mind Flayers, or at least teh PROCESS was, but didn'tw ork as hosts so were abandoned and forgotten. When someone (We'll use Drow, just 'cause) started poking around in those old caverns and Lost Cities, one found the Doppleganger Brood Pens and turned it on, plopping a few out. They killed their discoverer, then fanned out, creating more of their own kind as they tried to find a place in this world ... they don't know who their creator was, so continue to explore and search looking for them. Similarly, they take on teh roles of others because, as discarded tools, they have no real role of their own to fulfill.

And now I'm way off topic.

So.

Morkoth.

Uhm.

Never used 'em... never really had any real OCEAN adventures to use 'em.

Hrm.

noisms

01-27-2009 09:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9893486)

So.

Morkoth.

Uhm.

*Never used 'em... never really had any real OCEAN adventures to use 'em.*

Hrm.

You could have them inhabiting underwater caverns in subterranean lakes far beneath the surface of the world.

Wakboth

01-27-2009 03:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Gets tangential, but does anyone remember the morkoth "illustration" from 1e MM?

JRM

01-27-2009 04:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9894905)

Gets tangential, but does anyone remember the morkoth "illustration" from 1e MM?

Oh yes, it's probably the root cause of my belief Morkoths should be shadowy horrors of indeterminate appearance.:o

As for the problem of never having any underwater adventures to use Morkoths, I used an amphibious variant once, which my party met in a the ruins of a sunken city that had risen from the waves. It used glittering slime-trails of shells, mucus and sea weed to lure in its prey rather than hypnotic tunnels, but was otherwise a standard Morkoth. Converting them into subterranean monsters is also a simple and obvious alternative, with twisting tunnels in the bowels of the Earth that draw in underworld fauna and incautious spelunkers.

see

01-27-2009 04:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858306)

We are pretty crap in most respects, aren't we? How humans ever came to dominate most fantasy worlds is beyond me.

In original AD&D 1e, the answer was, we don't have class restrictions or level limits. Only humans or half-humans could achieve level 12 or higher in any class other than thief, while any 20th-level party could thrash any monster in the Monster Manual. How could humans not dominate? We had all the meteor swarms, heals, and wishes!

The Last Conformist

01-28-2009 01:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

One can't help wondering how morkoths and kraken communicate.

Inyssius

01-28-2009 04:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9858306)

We are pretty crap in most respects, aren't we? How humans ever came to dominate most fantasy worlds is beyond me.

I have always wanted to run or play a game in a setting where we totally don't. Like, at all. Where the world is dominated by the berjillion elder races and ten times as many ultrapowerful monsters, where we live like rats in abandoned Giant cities and in the tiny always-shifting margin between the Civilized realms and the Deep Wild.

Much running away from tentacled horrors and assorted elder races, and a lot of resource protection. Just scrounging for food would be a main goal.

Sleeper

01-28-2009 06:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9896818)

One can't help wondering how morkoths and kraken communicate.

Aquaman.

demiurge1138

01-28-2009 08:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 9896818)
One can't help wondering how morkoths and kraken communicate.

The universal language of mathematics?

Inyssius

01-28-2009 08:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Messages conveyed via Xorvintaal, the Great Game of Dragons? Maybe not so... dragon-exclusive as first thought?

Wakshaani

01-28-2009 09:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Little known fact: Both Kraken and Morkoloth are fluent in Elven Cat.

Kakita Kojiro

01-28-2009 10:28 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9899122)
Little known fact: Both Kraken and Morkoloth are fluent in Elven Cat.

Sublime, truly sublime. :)

noisms

01-28-2009 10:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9899122)

Little known fact: Both Kraken and Morkoloth are fluent in Elven Cat.

Wakshaani wins the internet.

sim_james

01-28-2009 05:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9899122)

Little known fact: Both Kraken and Morkoloth are fluent in Elven Cat.

Goddamn you for reading my mind. Goddamn you.

The Last Conformist

01-29-2009 07:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9898234)

Aquaman.

Two bites out of the aquaman means yes, three means no ... ?

noisms

01-29-2009 08:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Muckdweller

There's not a whole lot down for your species if you're called 'muckdwellers', is there? And true to form, muckdwellers are an instantly forgettable creature, with terrible art, a boring entry, and annoyingly fiddly combat effects (they squirt water into your eyes, which causes you to lose your dexterity bonus, while they attack at +2 to hit, but then if they lure you into water, you're at -1 to hit, and zzzz....).

I don't think I've ever seen the things used in a game, and frankly that doesn't surprise or disappoint me.

Anyway, Muckdwellers. Basically, miniature lizardmen who also sometimes serve Kuo-toa, although since Muckdwellers' major habitat is a swamp and Kuo-toa are found in the underdark, I'm not sure when the twain get much of a chance to meet. They're 1' high, live in little tribe/clan groups, and don't do a whole lot with their time. I suppose their value is in providing a low-level horde monster if the adventurers are taking on lizardmen, but aside from that...

Muckdwellers are social darwinists. If one of them gives the 'death bite' to a superior foe, he is lauded to the Muckdweller heavens. If he is killed by a bigger foe, though, he is forever shamed - which seem unduly harsh to me, but then again what do I know?

DMH

01-29-2009 08:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Like crabmen, muckdwellers have the potential to be more. I used a minor war between grippli and muckdwellers that didn't affect the PCs directly but rather caused all kinds of interesting spin offs throughout the swamp (ryling the trolls, drawing kech, damaging parts of the forest and annoying the druids). The grippli won because of their brains and enslaved the muckdwellers. I forgot what I did after that since it was ~18 years ago and 1e.

demiurge1138

01-30-2009 01:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The only thing that stands out to me about muckdwellers is how adorable they are. The illustration makes them look like a plush T. rex. Aww...

JRM

01-31-2009 01:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9905302)

Muckdweller

Never used them, and as they're described their pretty boring. Although with a little re-imagining perhaps something interesting could be made of them.

Hmm, perhaps Muckdwellers are a new race, and start overwhelming the swamp. They may be individually small and weak, but they're highly omnivorous and breed like rabbits. Being only 1' tall, perhaps an area of swamp that will sustain one 7' Lizard Man would feed 50-100 Muckdwellers. So if nothings done to stop them, an army of thousands of highly disciplined muckdwellers (Lawful Evil, remember), will surge out of the swamp to slaughter all the neighbouring sapients, planning to damn the rivers and dig out ponds to expand their beloved swampland.

Alternatively, the muckdwellers could develop a more sophisticated culture - they do have average intelligence, after all - and become a "power behind the throne" to the Lizard Men tribes. Everyone dismisses them because they're tiny and weak, but don't allow for them being devious little bastiches.

Also, I find it amusing that they leave all of their treasure outside of their cramped underwater tunnel lairs. Why would they do that? I guess they leave it on the surface so they can admire their "shiny-shinies" in the sunlight rather than to make it easy for regular sized adventurers to steal. Unless they want adventurers to steal it, because it's Cursed...

noisms

02-01-2009 08:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Well, despite JRM's best efforts, Muckdwellers practically sank without a trace. Let's see how their conceptual relatives fare...

Mudman

One sentence in and the entry is already better than the last: "Mudmen are formed in pools of mud where enchanted rivers (even mildly enchanted ones, such as a stream eroding a magical structure) collect and evaporate and concentrate the dweomer." This is Good Stuff. It gets better:

Quote:

Because they are creatures of magic, mudmen are sometimes called dweomerlings. Mudmen are unintelligent life forces with but one goal -- to protect their pools against intruders.

When aroused into a physical form, mudmen take on the appearance of animated mud in a stocky humanoid shape about 4 feet tall. Their coloration varies between a dirty brown and tar black. They have four thick fingers on each hand. Their legs stay submerged within the pool, and are not usually visible. Their eyes are pools of jet black shadow. Mudmen speak no languages and are incapable of communicating with any living creature.

Evocative stuff from the MM writers and a shame it isn't backed up by good art.

I much prefer the name 'Dweomerlings' to Mudman and can't see why it wasn't chosen. Dweomer itself is a fantastic word, redolent of the more 'fantastical' boundaries of fantasy fiction - M. John Harrison, John Crowley and Gene Wolfe - and it gets my seal of approval as a word which should be used more (though not overused) in D&D. So henceforth Mudmen will be referred to as Dweomerlings.

There are two things I really like about Dweomerlings. First, their existence is part of the Gygaxian Naturalist flavour of the 2nd edition MM, hinting as it does at a living, breathing world outside of what the player characters are doing. Rivers flow and sometimes they flow over or past things that are magic: this is part of the rich tapestry of a fully-realised fantasy world and is happening all the time in the background. Tastes may differ but this is what I want from a D&D campaign setting.

Second, for once the designers managed to create a genuinely foreign, unfathomable monster. Dweomerlings want to protect their pools, and will kill anything they come across. They can't be communicated with or reasoned with. They have apparently no ambition other than to feed off the Dweomer which created them. They are properly alien: their impulses are not our own. D&D monsters should be more like that.

A big part of using Dweomerlings in a campaign is, I think, summed up in the question: what do you do with the magical mud once the Dweomerling is dead?

demiurge1138

02-01-2009 09:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9916362)

A big part of using Dweomerlings in a campaign is, I think, summed up in the question: what do you do with the magical mud once the Dweomerling is dead?

Magical mudpacks to be used in spas for high-level adventurers!

Clay golem creation!

Adobe buildings as impenetrable as iron!

Material components for stonewalk!

The first ingredient in a poultice to turn stone to flesh!

EmperorSeth

02-01-2009 12:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Hey, loooooong time reader, first time writer. :) I'm disappointed I couldn't share my experiences earlier, or more accurately could but never could find the time to do so. For example, I had a great use of a Minotaur in my last adventure. Or rather, The Minotaur as House of Leaves readers know him as. He was part of a very convoluted Halloween-themed adventure I ran...in November and December. Sometime the player's schedules re-write things.

I can't remember ever seeing Mudmen (or Mudfolk, as I guess they would be called if they ever had a 3rd ed version,) in a game I played. I like the NAME dweomerlings, but honestly B-movie mud monsters don't sound like they earned it. I mean, they get it because they are creatures of magic? Unlike, say, 95% of the other monsters to date in this book?

Wakshaani

02-01-2009 12:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Dweomerling is more of a "High Name" while Mudmen" is more of a "Low Name" ... most people will see a humanoid made of mud and go, "Hey, Mud Man"... Sages take the more refined naming structure, being all formal and stuffy like that.

Visually, the Mudmen of the Dragon's Lair videogame (And cartoon) are the way to go for these guys.

Thematically, they fit in great in any sort of long-abandoned magical dungeon environment... crying shame that they almost never get used and vanish in later editions. The closest in modern D&D would be "Living Spells".

noisms

02-01-2009 12:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 9916820)

Hey, loooooong time reader, first time writer. :) I'm disappointed I couldn't share my experiences earlier, or more accurately could but never could find the time to do so. For example, I had a great use of a Minotaur in my last adventure. Or rather, The Minotaur as House of Leaves readers know him as. He was part of a very convoluted Halloween-themed adventure I ran...in November and December. Sometime the player's schedules re-write things.

I can't remember ever seeing Mudmen (or Mudfolk, as I guess they would be called if they ever had a 3rd ed version,) in a game I played. I like the NAME dweomerlings, but honestly B-movie mud monsters don't sound like they earned it. I mean, they get it because they are creatures of magic? Unlike, say, 95% of the other monsters to date in this book?

Welcome to the thread. You make a good point about the Dweomerling moniker, but it's too good a name not to be used. Maybe it could be a general catch-all term for magical creatures or those which arise by accident due to magical processes?

Kakita Kojiro

02-01-2009 02:07 PM

Mudmen always reminded me, for some reason, of the jheherrin from the Land, in the Thomas Covenant chronicles of Steven Donaldson (specifically in "The Power that Preserves").

The jheherrin, or the "soft ones", were the misshapen survivors of Lord Foul's breeding experiments to create new life. He was not pleased with the results, and basically chucked them into his icky, magical mud waste dump -- and they ended up as oozy, mud-creatures. That were really, really pathetic both in the normal sense of that word and in that they inspire much pathos toward their sad lot in life.

JasonK

02-02-2009 05:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9916362)

I much prefer the name 'Dweomerlings' to Mudman and can't see why it wasn't chosen. Dweomer itself is a fantastical word, redolent of the more 'fantastical' boundaries of fantasy fiction - M. John Harrison, John Crowley and Gene Wolfe - and it gets my seal of approval as a word which should be used more (though not overused) in D&D. So henceforth Mudmen will be referred to as Dweomerlings.

There are two things I really like about Dweomerlings. First, their existence is part of the Gygaxian Naturalist flavour of the 2nd edition MM, hinting as it does at a living, breathing world outside of what the player characters are doing. Rivers flow and sometimes they flow over or past things that are magic: this is part of the rich tapestry of a fully-realised fantasy world and is happening all the time in the background. Tastes may differ but this is what I want from a D&D campaign setting.

Second, for once the designers managed to create a genuinely foreign, unfathomable monster. Dweomerlings want to protect their pools, and will kill anything they come across. They can't be communicated with or reasoned with. They have apparently no ambition other than to feed off the Dweomer which created them. They are properly alien: their impulses are not our own. D&D monsters should be more like that.

I agree, wholeheartedly, with your first and second paragraphs, but I've got to disagree with your last. Partly because there a couple of different creatures that have similar impulses - most notably various forms of undead

- and partly because... well... what do you do with that? I mean... ok, sure, they're fiercely protective of their little mudhole, and they're non-intelligent, so you have to give the PCs a reason to do down their mudhole (otherwise, they'd just avoid it, right?), but after that... it becomes a battle against mudpeople.

There's ways to spice up the fight ("you're sinking into the mud!"), there's ways to make an adventure out of it ("geologic change from that volcano you destroyed last year when you fought the red dragon is making the mudflats expand at an alarming rate; the mudpeople think this entire kingdom is theirs!"), but by making them non-intelligent, I think the designers ultimately made them... boring. :(

- jasön

DMH

02-02-2009 06:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9919067)

but by making them non-intelligent, I think the designers ultimately made them... boring. :(

Not only that, but that there is no difference between mudmen that form from different kinds of magic. There could be one for each school (and sphere?) or even combinations of schools. It could be complex, but some basic examples could help DMs who want to use mudmen and similar creatures extensively.

Wakshaani

02-02-2009 09:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9921512)

Not only that, but that there is no difference between mudmen that form from different kinds of magic. There could be one for each school (and sphere?) or even combinations of schools. It could be complex, but some basic examples could help DMs who want to use mudmen and similar creatures extensively.

Again, note the existence of modern-day "Living Spells".

Espresso

02-03-2009 07:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Gnomes and Kobolds are competing for exactly the same ecological niche and thus are pretty much doomed to inevitable conflict since one race tends good and the other evil.

Inyssi

02-03-2009 07:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Espresso (Post 9926832)

Gnomes and Kobolds are competing for exactly the same ecological niche and thus are pretty much doomed to inevitable conflict since one race tends good and the other evil.

True, but we're all the way over on Mudmen now.

Sleeper

02-03-2009 08:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 9926841)

True, but we're all the way over on Mudmen now.

I don't know....

Maybe gnomes and kobolds are just evolved mudmen? The gnomes are the mudmen created from wash surrounding stones imbued with the power of illusion. Elf hills masked with glamour by their fey denizens, invisible mile-high towers ruled by cabals of ancient mages, ruined mansions infested with ghouls who overlay the rotten decay with a more palatable seeming. That's why they're short and wizened, as well; the magic and beauty of gnomes is in the facade, not the reality.

Kobolds on the other hand are what happens when water washes through the Tomb of Horrors, flushing away the adventurer detritus, and makes its way out into the Great Swamp. The fetid mudpools bake under the sun for a while, and start to congeal, and swarm with mudmen like tadpoles. They continue to twist and shrink in the sun's dessicating rays, and the surface coating of mud dries, starts to flake, almost becomes scaly. Finally a tiny kobold staggers from the pools, puny but invested with magic of a thousand varieties, mind seething with its formative evil, turned and bent with an unnatural predilection toward traps and deception.

JRM

02-04-2009 06:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I like the basic concept of mudmen, but the execution left me a bit cold.

Here's an example from a campaign I ran years ago that hopefully illustrates the problem: The party comes across a pool of mud completely covering the entranceway of a dungeon, they wade in and mudmen start to rise from the mud, so immediately retreat to shore so they don't have to fight them while enmired. The mudmen sink back down again, since they only emerge when threats are in their pool. So, the party's toughest fighter wades into the pool while the others stay on the bank. They start shooting missiles and spells as soon as the mudmen appear, and knock off a lot of them before they one gets close enough to throw itself at the fighter and immobilize him. So, they just chuck a rope around him and haul him ashore then scrape the mud off, wait until he's recovered his breath and repeat the exercise to destroy the rest of the mudmen.

Now, they had never met mudmen before and I know for a fact that the players had not seen their stats (The relevant MM had just been released and I was the only person who bothered buying & reading such things). It just is an obvious approach to dealing with such an adversary. They're slow-moving and never leave their pools - they don't really represent a threat.

If I was writing up such a monster nowadays, it would likely go something like this.

A Dweomerling, also known as a Mudman, has only a dim sentience (Animal- or Semi-intelligent?) which is focused entirely on absorbing magical energies dissolved in their pool. They can use the spells locate object and detect magic at will. Most of the time, they are spread in a thin layer on the bottom of their pools, the better to feed off its dweomer. If a dweomerling senses any magic with its detect magic it will coalesce into their dweomerling form and pursue it, seeking to acquire the magic object and return with it to their pool in order to increase its dweomer. Since dweomerling move very slowly, it's easy to outrun them but they're relentless, and will travel up to (ten or twenty miles?) from their pool before fatigue forces them to return to their pool. Its locate objects ability means that a party which has escaped a dweomerling will often be surprised by one hours later when it shambles into their camp. A dweomerling will also form if a non-magical intruder enters its pool, but in such occasions they will only retain their anthropoidal form until the intruder is slain or leaves the pool. The dweomerling will pursue the most powerful dweomer it can detect. If there are multiple mudmen and multiple dweomers, they will all pursue the same object until one or more of them has acquire it, whereupon those dweomerlings will return to the pool and the remaining dweomerlings will pursue the next most powerful magical item they sensed.

A dweomerling can squeeze through the tiniest of gaps, since it is formed from liquid mud. Thus, doors and pallsades will not stop ones' pursuit. Weapon blows have no effect on a being made from living mud, since their "flesh" simply flows back into shape immediately after being struck. Most magic spells actually make the dweomerling stronger (plus 1 temporary hit point per spell level?) as the mudman absorbs the dweomer used against it, with the exception of the following - dispel magic does 5d6 damage to a dweomerling, an antimagic shell instantly destroys one.

However, non-magical fire and liquid does damage to dweomerling by dehydrating or washing away their bodies. Extinguishing a torch in a mudman or emptying a waterskin over one does 1d4 damage, flaming oil does normal damage, totally immersing a mudman in running water does 2d6 damage per round. Magical fire and water does not harm a mudman, since the dweomer they absorb from the magic is balances the damage they would have suffered. However such spells will slow a dweomerling for one round per dice of damage they would have suffered, since the magic temporarily makes their body too stiff or soft for them to move easily.

A dweomerling can throw parts of its body as described in the MM, but when it gets within ten feet and throws itself at the opponent that doesn't kill the dweomerling, instead it flows itself around the victim's body (so it's an adventurer inside a dweomerling!) to suffocate him. Multiple dweomerlings can combine to coat a victim at the same time, any damage inflicted to them is evenly divided between them.

The engulfed character or their allies can scrape enough mud off their face to breathe by making an Strength check (-2 per additional dweomerling), but this only lasts one round before the mud flows back, if they can make three such rolls in succession they can scrape pull the engulfed victim free of the dweomerling.

If the dweomerling is attacking to gain a magical item, they will only engulf the victim long enough to acquire said item. If this is something they cannot easily remove from their target (e.g. a suit of armour), they will drag the victim back to their pools at half their normal speed, or full speed if two or more mudmen are carrying the victim.

A dweomerlings' pool often contains magical items (treasure type ?) and the remains of their victims.

EDIT: I think this concept of the mudman offers far more adventuring possibilities - an implacable foe who pursues the party through through locked doors and portculli, a creature that carries of their favourite magic item, ignoring weapon blows and spells, which they need to pursue and discover how to destroy it. A horrible creature which appeared from the cursed woods to throttle the town's wizard after he returns from adventuring in said woods (maybe it also recovered a magic item said wizard stole from its pool?), then carried off the wizard's corpse - then the townsfolk hire the PCs to recover the wizard's body for raise dead (so they have an X day time limit, because the local cleric only has a Y level raise dead scroll).

noisms

02-04-2009 08:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

JRM: Almost like the Terminator, in a way. I like the trope of the Relentless Single Minded Enemy - Aliens, zombies, The Thing, the Borg... Your Mudmen are like a D&D riff on that.

Mr. Teapot

02-04-2009 09:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9929672)

EDIT: I think this concept of the mudman offers far more adventuring possibilities - an implacable foe who pursues the party through through locked doors and portculli, a creature that carries of their favourite magic item, ignoring weapon blows and spells, which they need to pursue and discover how to destroy it.

Giving mudmen a motivation for doing something is necessary to make them an interesting encounter. As they are written, mudmen are almost deliberately dull. (they sit still until someone enters area X, then they attack until the intruder leaves or the mudmen dies. Like any other D&D monster played by an uncreative DM, really.) They need something to make them act or otherwise be dynamic or interesting. Stealing magic items fits their background well and is fairly interesting.

The proposed mechanics are very fiddly, though. I hate it when monsters or spells reference specific other spells like that: what if I have some other spell that should affect mud? Why am I punished for using spells not in the Player's Handbook?

noisms

02-04-2009 09:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mummy

Ah, King Tut - yet another undead creature with a hatred for all living things which drives them to attack without mercy. I'm sure more interesting things can be done with Mummies - bargaining with them to hunt down treasure thieves in exchange for one's life, or taking a message to their still living descendents.

I'd also rather like to see Andean or Asian variants on the Mummy. An entire cult of Tibetan-style mummified monks would be a great inclusion in a game - still occupying the same temple that they had lived in for millennia, long after the living members of their order had all died out...

Best of all would be self-mummified mummies. I've actually seen a couple of these at a temple in Yamagata prefecture, in the Northwest of Japan. (They are known as Sokushinbutsu - one who has attained Buddhahood in death, distinct from Sokushinseibutsu who attain it while still alive. 'Self-mummified' isn't strictly accurate as the monks who carried the process out had help from their colleagues. Basically they would deliberately starve and poison themselves over the course of several years until they had no remaining body fat and their bodies were too toxic to be attractive to maggots. Then they would entomb themselves with the help of the other monks, and wait to die of starvation. Extraordinary stuff. I'm imagining the hate, anger and thirst for murder that such a monk would feel after the disappointment of realising he not only didn't become a Bodhisattva but had also only guaranteed for himself an enternity of unliving existence.

Anyway, Mummies are tough: they resist most of the common magic spells a party would cast at them, take no damage from ordinary weapons, only half damage from magical ones, and their attacks cause the always-fatal rotting disease. Their only problem is their vulnerability to fire, though, which every player of D&D surely knows. The old player knowledge vs. character knowledge problem rears its head again.

Wakshaani

02-04-2009 11:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Of course, going back to the well again, using some of teh Ancient Races (Lizardmen, Bullywugs, etc) as mummies makes for interesting storystuff. One thing to encounter an Egyptian Mummy and everyone ho-hums a bit, but, when you run into a Lizardfolk Mummy in teh middle of teh desert and have all of these Sebek-head statues around, people start to go, :Hey... there's some backstory here that we don't know about...' and mysteries grow.

Big bonuses, regardless, for taking standard magic item treasures and putting an Egyptian, or ancient Race, twist on 'em.

sim_james

02-04-2009 12:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Non-human mummies are visually more appealing and interesting; it reinjects some "otherness" into the mummy, which has become way too familiar due to overexposure.

I like the Sokushinbutsu idea - but what if these mummies weren't filled with hate? Serene and in perfect peace, they inflict the living with mummy rot as a gift - a disease that replicates the starvation and gradual toxification of the flesh that they endured. When the sufferer dies, no vermin will touch their body. Mummy rot as forced enlightenment.

Fitzgrunion

02-04-2009 12:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

It took several days but I've finally read the approximately 2800 posts of this behemoth. It actually got me off my arse to register after (counts on fingers...) -too many years. I was actually last active on these boards last century when 2e was current.

Mudme... sorry, Dweomerlings are awesome -Byproducts of a Magical Ecology (Magicology?). I can see a particularly corrupt evil wizard deliberately releasing vast quantities of Magic Waste (possibly the run-off from his industrial-scale mummy-embalming facility) into the waterways upstream from peaceful civilised folk where the pollutant can animate mud wherever it settles.

Dweomerlings can never be minions per se. They're unintelligent, but they can be unleashed like a sticky, smelly scourge. The same evil archmage could induce spontaneous generation of dweomerlings through nefarious means in an area of elevated terrain (and here I am imagining a scene where underlings -preferably Broken Ones or Mongrelmen/folk are dumping drums of noxious stuff into a pristine wetland) then when the Mudmen have coalesced utilise some kind of earthshaking magics and control weather to deliver the Dweomerlings downhill as part of a lahar (mudslide). Villages are buried by natural disaster. Chaos ensues. And the rescue efforts are severely hampered.

Bestiaries are, for me, the most inspiring rpg books. One of the major revelations of this thread is that the potential inherent in worlds with dozens of sentient species has been vastly underused. Another is that there is wonderful scope for a campaign set around the Royal Teratological Society.

Sleeper

02-04-2009 01:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Welcome back, Fitzgrunion.

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 9931268)

Non-human mummies are visually more appealing and interesting; it reinjects some "otherness" into the mummy, which has become way too familiar due to overexposure.

I kind of agree, and kind of disagree. Mummies have become too familiar, but there's still plenty of play left in the human mummy. The prevailing mummy stereotype is very specific. The Boris Karlov 1932 version is still alive and well, lumbering along, wrapped in surgical bandage, and with all that Egyptian baggage. Cliches are there because they work, but when they're overdone it's time to start subverting them. Look at how much play 28 Days Later got out of simply speeding up zombies. The Brendan Frasier movies made the mummy more dynamic, which helped, but there's always room to go further. Noisms had the right approach, drawing from different mythos. How many Peruvian mummies show up in fiction? Not a lot, compared to the Egyptian kind. Xander's bad choice in girlfriends aside, they're pretty rare.

Or just do original riffs. One idea I find fascinating is the bodies preserved in sphagnum bogs. The bog is cold, and acid, and anaerobic. Ritually murdered bodies dumped in the water last for a long time. The skin tans, the bones slowly disintegrate, but the flesh remains almost untouched, including internal organs. That could make a terrifying scenario. Hidden away in the bogs, a cult has been murdering people for centuries. Finally, when the stars are auspicious, a great eerie horn is heard by the villagers, followed by the slow and steady beat of great drums from a dozen scattered locations around the verge. The water starts shifting. The crest of a wave precedes them. Swarming brown bodies, vacant black eyes. Perfectly preserved, but tanned as if by a lifetime of sun. Their bones have started to disintegrate from the acid. Many can only swim, or roll. Their bodies becoming a weapon, enveloping those in the way. Others are like broken stick figures. Arms at weird angles, heads lolling against their chests, legs broken off at the knee.

The least mobile ones could be imagined as a kind of ooze. A rolling mass of partially deliquesced human bodies, tanned and leathery and slimy and cold, bones cracking as they roll over and wrap victims in the folds of their flesh.

JohnBiles

02-04-2009 01:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9930465)

Giving mudmen a motivation for doing something is necessary to make them an interesting encounter. As they are written, mudmen are almost deliberately dull. (they sit still until someone enters area X, then they attack until the intruder leaves or the mudmen dies. Like any other D&D monster played by an uncreative DM, really.) They need something to make them act or otherwise be dynamic or interesting. Stealing magic items fits their background well and is fairly interesting.

One of Steven Donaldson's Thomas Covenant books (Book 1 of the Second Trilogy, The Wounded Land), have two variations on the basic concept of mudmen:

The Skest are acidic mudmen who serve the living evil spirit of the Sarangrave, a giant swamp tainted by millenia of the magical equivalent of industrial waste. Said living evil spirit / swamp monster is known as the Lurker and it uses the Skest as hunting hounds to drive people into the lakes and rivers where it can attack with its tentacles. The Skest have enough acid in their mud that they basically hug you and acid burn you to death.

The Party (Thomas Covenant and buddies) are saved by the Sur-Jeherrin, mud creatures who resemble animals made of mud, who fight the Skest by basically grappling them, absorbing their acid and then dissolving back into mud until the acid disperses into the water and they can reform. They do this though it hurts because a Giant had saved them from their millenia of misery and imprisonment in Lord Foul's Creche back at the end of the first trilogy (and Covenant is travelling with Giants, among other people).

The Sarangrave would make a kickass place for a D&D adventure for high level people.

JohnBiles

02-04-2009 01:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9872018)

[size="5"]

Chief Mold Men have a similar attack to Russet Molds, i.e. they can release spores which kill you and turn you into another Mold Man, with 4 HD. It has only just occurred to me that this must surely mean victims have to shrink (or grow) to 3.5 feet. Try explaining that.

Not that hard; the spores consume you and build a vegepygmy out of the flesh; if you have too much flesh, some of it is wasted as byproduct bits; if you don't have enough, you start out as a short one.

noisms

02-04-2009 02:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Fitzgrunion (Post 9931272)

It took several days but I've finally read the approximately 2800 posts of this behemoth. It actually got me off my arse to register after (counts on fingers...) -too many years. I was actually last active on these boards last century when 2e was current.

Wow, I suppose I have to take responsibility (blame?) for that. ;)

Quote:

Bestiaries are, for me, the most inspiring rpg books. One of the major revelations of this thread is that the potential inherent in worlds with dozens of sentient species has been vastly underused. Another is that there is wonderful scope for a campaign set around the Royal Teratological Society.

Absolutely. A Royal Teratological Society game using the ideas from this thread would just be brilliant. I'd quite like a campaign in which all the characters play sages, who spend the whole time running away from and dodging hideous beasties while attempting to study them - rather than fight or kill them.

Wakboth

02-04-2009 03:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9931385)

Or just do original riffs. One idea I find fascinating is the bodies preserved in sphagnum bogs. The bog is cold, and acid, and anaerobic. Ritually murdered bodies dumped in the water last for a long time. The skin tans, the bones slowly disintegrate, but the flesh remains almost untouched, including internal organs. That could make a terrifying scenario. Hidden away in the bogs, a cult has been murdering people for centuries. Finally, when the stars are auspicious, a great eerie horn is heard by the villagers, followed by the slow and steady beat of great drums from a dozen scattered locations around the verge. The water starts shifting. The crest of a wave precedes them. Swarming brown bodies, vacant black eyes. Perfectly preserved, but tanned as if by a lifetime of sun. Their bones have started to disintegrate from the acid. Many can only swim, or roll. Their bodies becoming a weapon, enveloping those in the way. Others are like broken stick figures. Arms at weird angles, heads lolling against their chests, legs broken off at the knee.

The least mobile ones could be imagined as a kind of ooze. A rolling mass of partially deliquesced human bodies, tanned and leathery and slimy and cold, bones cracking as they roll over and wrap victims in the folds of their flesh.

This is a good one! And the stereotypical mummy rot seems more appropriate with bog-mummies, somehow. (I'm one of those who liked the change in 3e; now, the mummy rot makes you dry up and crumble like sand...)

Or - chilly, freeze-dried mummies from the Northern mountains - an army of undead Ice Age people, finally roused from their eternal sleep by some despoiling of their ancient lands. Can you find out what's wrong, and placate them before the wave of Cold Ones devastates the entire kingdom?

Or or - Salt mummies from a place like the Dead Sea? You could borrow the story of Sodom for that; an ancient city or civilization of such iniquity and evil that gods blasted them off the face of the world, leaving the area dead and barren with salt and sulphur. But not everyone was caught in the cities, and these shriveled husks of ancient evil have a smoldering hatred of the gods and their servants...

demiurge1138

02-04-2009 04:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9931385)
Welcome back, Fitzgrunion.

I kind of agree, and kind of disagree. Mummies have become too familiar, but there's still plenty of play left in the human mummy. The prevailing mummy stereotype is very specific. The Boris Karlov 1932 version is still alive and well, lumbering along, wrapped in surgical bandage, and with all that Egyptian baggage.

Well, that's the thing, isn't it? The lumbering bandage-wrapped mummy is only in The Mummy with Boris Karloff for... a minute? For most of that movie's length, the mummy is just a very dry, very evil, foreigner/sorcerer. Which, I think, is a much more interesting archetype for mummies. Scheming mummies, I think, should be competitive with vampires.

JRM

02-04-2009 06:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9930465)

Giving mudmen a motivation for doing something is necessary to make them an interesting encounter. As they are written, mudmen are almost deliberately dull. (they sit still until someone enters area X, then they attack until the intruder leaves or the mudmen dies. Like any other D&D monster played by an uncreative DM, really.) They need something to make them act or otherwise be dynamic or interesting. Stealing magic items fits their background well and is fairly interesting.

Ta Mr Teapot, that was pretty much my thinking about the original mudmen. Kamikaze animated mudpies just didn't engage me. However lives on magic auras -> attracted to magic items -> attacks people with magic items is a pretty obvious line of deduction which gives them a believable motivation for doing something that would concern or interest a bunch of PCs.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9930465)

The proposed mechanics are very fiddly, though. I hate it when monsters or spells reference specific other spells like that: what if I have some other spell that should affect mud? Why am I punished for using spells not in the Player's Handbook?

Well it is a rough draft, I was just riffing off how spells affect (or, rather, don't affect) golems, which are also magically animated entities that are very hard to deal with via spells. A spell-caster can still slow the dweomerling down with fire or water, and help their companions wail on it with buckets of water or flaming oil flasks. It's pretty true to the AD&D ethos to have a monster that is highly resistant to the abilities of one half or the "spells and swords" classes.

Although I'm a bit embarrassed to have forgotten mud affecting spells? Clearly, mud to rock will petrify mudmen (possibly all of them if you cast it on their pool), but what does rock to mud do? Would it make them stronger because they temporarily absorb the earth around them?

I was a bit more concerned about the smothering mechanisms - they'll have the mud-chucking reducing the targets move, then the engulfing reducing the engulfed victim's, then Strength checks to try to escape (I thought about Open Doors checks instead, but that would make it too difficult for weak characters to escape), adjusted by the number of Mudmen, and they'd have suffocation rules applying. That all seems rather complicated, so I'm wondering whether there's an easier approach.

JasonK

02-04-2009 06:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9931875)

Well, that's the thing, isn't it? The lumbering bandage-wrapped mummy is only in The Mummy with Boris Karloff for... a minute? For most of that movie's length, the mummy is just a very dry, very evil, foreigner/sorcerer. Which, I think, is a much more interesting archetype for mummies. Scheming mummies, I think, should be competitive with vampires.

Man, I am so amazingly with you. It's a tragedy that the standard D&D mummy is a shambler. It's a total waste.

Because here's the deal with mummies:

A thousand years ago and more, in an age when man's first kindgoms were on the rise (after the fall of the lizardfolk, et al.) and names like Kaz and Vecna had yet to become legend, there arose priest-kings of great and terrible power. So mighty were they, such great servants, that their gods vouchsafed for them a most holy gift. The common men - the architects, the farmers, the slave laborers; the ones who built and lived in the shadow of the grand pyramids - they thought the gift was to be nothing less than eternal life. They are fools.

The true gift is all the years after death and before the priest-king lives again. Those are the years when, enshrined in paradise in the Fields of Rushes, the eternal soul of the priest-kings sat scribe at the foot of the gods, learned their wisdom first-hand, being succored upon power in preparation for their eventual return.

The tragic curse, the terrible rage, of every mummy is not that they are undead; they were expecting that. It's not that they thirst for blood or souls or life; they are gifted with the power of their gods, what need have they for mortal essence? It is that the world has forgotten the way of righteousness, the way that they spent a lifetime building into their monuments and an eternity after life learning better.

The world has forgotten, but it will remember again, oh yes, and will kneel at the feet of the living gods.

- Jason

JRM

02-04-2009 06:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9930402)

JRM: Almost like the Terminator, in a way. I like the trope of the Relentless Single Minded Enemy - Aliens, zombies, The Thing, the Borg... Your Mudmen are like a D&D riff on that.

Yes, the Relentless Single Minded Enemy was an inspiration.

It can not feel pain,
it can not be hurt,
it does not feel pity or mercy,
it wants your magical items,
And it absolutely will not stop.

For many PCs a nigh-indestructable monster that wants to steal/destroy their magical items is more frightening than one that just wants to kill them. I prefer the Dweomerling approach of stealing an item to a creature like a Disenchanter. My proposed revised Mudman gives the player's motivation for adventure (track down the dweomerlings pool to recover their magic), rather than just "the DM wants to destroy your toys" approach of the Disenchanter, which rightly riles some players.

On the few occasions when I let my players acquire overly powerful magic items I just lived with it and/or let events deal with them (e.g. a rope of entanglement turned out to be far too effective a "party wins" button, until its owner used it to tie together two stone golems, who snapped it like a piece of twine.)

I also wondered about a "Greater Dweomerling" that had absorbed so much magic it had additional powers and intelligence, maybe it contained dweomers powerful enough it could wander about indefinitely in a quest to absorb magic?

JRM

02-04-2009 06:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9930504)

Mummy

But why must they hate the living? What about helpful mummies:

The Ancestors may be terrible and cruel (i.e. still LE), but they love their people. When the barbarians (orcs? CE heart-sacrificing foreigners? imperialists?) came to our lands and the time of torment started, we called upon heroes (the PCs obviously) to find and penetrate their hidden tombs, to perform the Rite of the Leaves and beseech the Ancestors to return to their bodies from their Afterlife and bring the Rotting Curse down upon those who oppress us.

Sleeper

02-04-2009 07:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9931771)

Or - chilly, freeze-dried mummies from the Northern mountains - an army of undead Ice Age people, finally roused from their eternal sleep by some despoiling of their ancient lands. Can you find out what's wrong, and placate them before the wave of Cold Ones devastates the entire kingdom

And of course there are those preserved woolly mammoth specimens. They might be mounts, or half-eaten terrified mummies driven before the spear- and fire- wielding early humans slain, and then resurrected by their slayers in a animistic ritual. Or perhaps the elephants were sapient, slow but thoughtful. And they've come back in their quiet way to avenge the genocide of their species and many others at the hands of hunting packs of humans during the Holocene.

Another interesting idea to steal is the Siberian ice maiden. Believed to be a shaman from the 5th century BC(E), she was mummified and then frozen along with six horses and a man. They both had vivid blue tattoos of animals, some real some imaginary, on their bodies. Mother of winter. Primeval magic, loosed upon the world.
Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9931875)

Well, that's the thing, isn't it? The lumbering bandage-wrapped mummy is only in The Mummy with Boris Karloff for... a minute? For most of that movie's length, the mummy is just a very dry, very evil, foreigner/sorcerer. Which, I think, is a much more interesting archetype for mummies. Scheming mummies, I think, should be competitive with vampires.

Another thing that gets forgotten is that in a lot of ways, it makes more sense to have the mummies be the guardians of the tomb, not the master of the tomb. All those ritually preserved soldiers and guards forced to waken into an unpleasant undead state to prevent their master from being disturbed, their spirits pulled harshly from basking in the reward of the afterlife.

That might make an interesting adventure. The master might be evil and powerful. A pharaoh, a living god become a real god after death. An Acerak-like figure spending his time beyond the veil, ruling his kingdom in the great beyond among the gods and the hordes of less worthy dead. The simple mummies are his personal guards, who desperately try to prevent the PCs from waking his ancient arrogant evil, because if he wakes he will be... perturbed. And cause untold disruption in the living world. In other words, finishing the dungeon means the PCs lose :).

Fitzgrunion

02-04-2009 07:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I am very enamoured of diversifying the cultural origins as well as the physical processes giving rise to mummies. The Salt, Ice and Bog variants would work very nicely as aesthetic changes from the tired pseudo-Egyptian dusty variety.

The proto-Scythian kurgan builders mummified their nobility, a cultural group renowned for their cavalry, particularly horse archers. It would be nice to see a mummy that didn't just shamble but had an undead steed to bear it forth with some alacrity.

There's also the old horrible practice of entombing wives, concubines and slaves to serve the noble in the afterlife - these could rise too. If you were feeling particularly fiendish you could say that the slaves were entombed alive and cursed their malefactor so that it could be heard beyond the tomb etc. so that it would produce a Living Wall.

btw the Mummy picture is actively awful. exactly zero imagination and idividuality went into it's construction.

Noisms, what happened to the rating system for the art?

Fitzgrunion

02-04-2009 07:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9932298)

And of course there are those preserved woolly mammoth specimens. .

There's a bit in Solzhenitzyn's A Day in th Life of Ivan Denisovitch where starving gulag inmates thaw, cook and eat some primordial amphibian from the permafrost. There were, if I remember correctly, accounts of siberian peasants eating 20,000 year old frozen mammoth during famines following the 1917 revolution.

This gives rise to the possibility of original authentic Elder Race mummies. I second (or third) the call for more non-human mummies because 50,000 year old Bullywug Mummies are cool.

There are at least three dinosaur mummies in existence, even though they aren't strictly speaking mummies proper, there's got to be potential for something epic.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9932298)

Another interesting idea to steal is the Siberian ice maiden. Believed to be a shaman from the 5th century BC(E) .

Tattooed Ice Maiden mummies are just too good not to be the Big Bad of someone's campaign!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9932298)

Another thing that gets forgotten is that in a lot of ways, it makes more sense to have the mummies be the guardian of the tomb, not the master of the tomb. All .

At the same time it is a kind of bitter poetic justice that the hubris of a mighty Pharaoh who wants to live forever so bad they'll condemn half a civilisation to the toilsome construction of an artificial mountain is rewarded with transformation into what? A shambling disease-mongering idiot.

Admittedly greater Mummies are much cooler.

consistently excellent ideas btw, Sleeper

Sleeper

02-04-2009 08:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

That's an interesting bit on Solzhenitsyn. I also heard a rumor at one point about a group of scientists who debated eating a piece of preserved flesh before it became too rotted to try. I forget whether it was a mammoth or something else. I think they decided not to, but what if they did? Sympathetic magic and bad horror movies suggest that that's wrong, the kind of act that will have unnatural consequences. They might start to revert, change. Become neanderthals, or were-dire wolves, or grow giant saber-toothed fangs. Wake the wendigo.

You could even make the threat something other than mummies. Particularly in the frozen specimens and the bog mummies, even the stomach contents are preserved. Their might be seeds of some early plant, that sprout. Shoots burst from the corpse, and start spreading. A new invasive species, that threatens the modern world.

Or diseases. Plagues from beyond, magical hoary old things like the purported threat from smallpox in Russia, where infected corpses were buried in the permafrosted tundra. If they're dug up, the plague might be released again to haunt the world. Or the magical analogs of plagues, perhaps a plague of vampires or shadows.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Fitzgrunion (Post 9932377)

There are at least three dinosaur mummies in existence, even though they aren't strictly speaking mummies proper, there's got to be potential for something epic.

"Mummy" is very misleading term in those cases. Willo is still a case of full mineralization, it's just the fossilization process actually preserved some of the soft tissue as well as bone. More interesting perhaps are the Tyrannosaurus specimens where some traces of the original soft tissue (collagen) were found inside larger bones, like the femur.

Quote:

At the same time it is a kind of bitter poetic justice that the hubris of a mighty Pharaoh who wants to live forever so bad they'll condemn half a civilisation to the toilsome construction of an artificial mountain is rewarded with transformation into what? A shambling disease-mongering idiot.

It doesn't have to be condemnation, if they're right. In our world evidence of the afterlife is at best slippery; in the standard D&D mythos it's regularly achievable and easily verified. The goal might be to protect and ward their people, in the afterlife. If they don't achieve divinity, who will create the blessed realm of the dead, and create a paradise to prevent their subjects from being cast among all the malignant spirits of the dead?

This might make desecration of tombs very morally problematic. Enter the tomb, and the mummified tomb guardians are roused to protect their master. If they're injured, that's a problem. The wounds will be reflected in their eternal spiritual bodies, forever. Eternity marred by eternally seeping, unhealable wounds. And if they're slain, they're cast from the perfect realm into the equivalent of Hell or Hades, where the unprotected spirits run wild and are subject to unimaginable horrors. Your act of tomb robbing costs someone Paradise. Even worse, if the mistress is roused, all the spirits that their divinity protects in the afterlife, her former subjects, are unprotected. The longer she's away, the more innocent spirits who are hauled off to the nasty part of the afterlife, perhaps forever. And if she's destroyed, then you've basically consigned an entire generation of her nation to perpetual torment.

Wakshaani

02-04-2009 10:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9932148)

I was a bit more concerned about the smothering mechanisms - they'll have the mud-chucking reducing the targets move, then the engulfing reducing the engulfed victim's, then Strength checks to try to escape (I thought about Oper Doors checks instead, but that would make it too difficult for weak characters to escape), adjusted by the number of Mudmen, and they'd have suffocation rules applying. That all seems rather complicated, so I'm wondering whether there's an easier approach.

Give 'em Improved Grapple for starters .. the initial hits don't do much, after all, but they do make teh Mudmen stick to you, in essence.

Then give them a Suffocation (ex) ability: If the Mudman starts the round grappling a foe, it may attempt to pin it as per normal grapple rolls. A foe pinned by a Mudman starts to suffocate as per the drowning rules.

Taa-daa. All teh rules are already taken care of. The "Hurl Mud" needs a rule of it's own, but, otherwise, you're good to go.

Wakshaani

02-04-2009 10:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

As for Mummies, yeah, you get several layers with one ... a Greater Mummy, who would be a noble of some kind, tho you could also use Lich for such a state (You already have a 'phylacetry' of sorts in panopic jars!), or even a normal member of teh race that's effectively immortal and has just been sleeping until teh tomb awakes. or the master of teh house is a ghost with Possession, waiting for someone to come inside whose body they could take over, their spirit unable to move to the afterlife, so, they want to be born anew... and they don't really care who they have to kick out to do it. (What's that Ed? you can't make the game this week? Need me to run you as an NPC? Oh, don't worry, I think that can be arranged...)

Below the master you have common mummies, who were high-placed guards, wives, or vassals, then zombies or, better, skeletons who were servants or maybe soldiers.

Of course, if you want a small change, replace the skellies with Animated Object: Statues, and have a bunch of terrecota soldiers ready to serve teh will of their lord when he awakes.

Motivation of lost religion is always a good one ... the cultures that produced teh Mummy are probably Lawful, or at least the religion was, so, Good, Neutral, or Evil, they could very well want to impose their old ways on the new world "For thier own good" ... after all, teh Mummy was a Divine King, touched by (Diety X) himself! CLEARLY he was kept around to share his Noble Wisdom with this strange modern world and respark the worship of teh True Faith. Now, he just needs to gather his army...

noisms

02-04-2009 10:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Fitzgrunion (Post 9932321)
btw the Mummy picture is actively awful. exactly zero imagination and individuality went into it's construction.

Noisms, what happened to the rating system for the art?

That kind of fell by the wayside. I'll resurrect it, mummy-like, for the rest of the thread.

YojimboC

02-04-2009 10:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

This is why I love this thread! Muckdwellers and mud-men be damned; bog, ice, and kurgan mummies rock, and rock hard.

I used a lizardfolk mummy in an ancient prison (ie, a prison built by the setting's ancients) designed to contain the worst villains in history.

I also used an Andean style mummy on an isolated island, miles from civilization or healing magic. Lucky for the PCs, nobody got mummy rot.

Speaking of Andean mummies, the Incas mummified their dead rulers... and kept them around. They didn't bury them in tombs. Dead rulers maintained their own courts, and had followers who continued to use them as figureheads to bolster their political aims. The Spanish took advantage of this, and its one of the reasons why the Incas lost, despite a numerical and territorial advantage.

Anyway, in D&D, those mummified rulers aren't just bodies... they're ambulatory, intelligent, and they've got their own ideas on how the country should be run. So each new emporer in turn must deal with their unliving ancestors and their demands, but they're also there to offer advice and to step up and defend the empire when necessary. And every new emporer knows that their own fate will one day be to join the legion of mummies...

Sleeper

02-04-2009 11:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Another possible inspiration is the Gods of Lankhmar (distinguished from the Gods in Lankhmar, whose worshippers throng the Street of the Gods like lice). The Gods of Lankhmar aren't really worshipped in any sense. Revered, yes. But mostly feared. These ancestors of the lords of Lankhmar are the dark center of the city's faith. When the city is threatened, they take to the streets. Rods and black bones, jewels and hideously rotted faces. People flee from the procession, and the enemy is demolished. Or when their status as the preeminent center of the city, the locus around which everything revolves, is threatened by an upstart god, they destroy that as well — raze the temple to the ground, and slay all the priests. Fiercely protective of what's their's, and jealous of their prerogatives.

JRM

02-04-2009 11:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9932869)

*Give 'em Improved Grapple for starters .. the initial hits don't do much, after all, but they do make teh Mudmen stick to you, in essence.*

Then give them a Suffocation (ex) ability: If the Mudman starts the round grappling a foe, it may attempt to pin it as per normal grapple rolls. A foe pinned by a Mudman starts to suffocate as per the drowning rules.

Taa-daa. All teh rules are already taken care of. The "Hurl Mud" needs a rule of it's own, but, otherwise, you're good to go.

That's what I'd have done if this was a 3rd edition thread, but since we're talking about 2E here I was basing the combat description on the more freeform exception-based rules of that edition's Monstrous Manual.

Wakshaani

02-04-2009 11:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9933181)

That's what I'd have done if this was a 3rd edition thread, but since we're talking about 2E here I was basing the combat description on the more freeform exception-based rules of that edition's Monstrous Manual.

Oh lordy. If you want to do that, I'll just curl up quietly in a corner and weep, WEEP for you. :)

Sleeper

02-05-2009 12:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9933223)

Oh lordy. If you want to do that, I'll just curl up quietly in a corner and weep, WEEP for you. :)

Oh, exception based rules can be very, very easy...

"Your character has a 15% chance plus 1% per additional mudman of suffocating every round. A suffocating character dies in 3 rounds."

No messy THAC0, saves, no mention of whether or not you can act while suffocating... just pure randomness based on the number of attackers :).

Edivad

02-05-2009 12:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9932222)

But why must they hate the living? What about helpful mummies:

As an opponent of the "undeath is EVIL because you are extending your existence instead of respecting the natural limits of your life" thing, I agree.

While the mind(probably 'soul'is a better term)of a mummy would be quite changed compared to it's former life, I think it's perfectly feasible to keep the old alignment, so I really can't see what's wrong with Neutral or Good mummies.

Unlike other intelligent undeads such as ghouls and vampires, there's nothing really 'predatory'about mummies - they don't hunt the living but seem to be happy guarding their tombs - although even Good mummies will probably NOT appreciate when so-called adventurers(more like...grave robbers ;)) break into its home in search of treasure.

It could be interesting if the mummy talked with the intruders and rather than outright attacking(especially if it has some way to sense their intentions), perhaps asking them perform a quest or service in exchange for some of it's treasure - after all an undead might always have some 'unfinished business' from its mortal life.

Also one small detail I noticed - while a mummy would never pass for a living human(unlike a vampire), appearance-wise it's more...tolerable than something like a ghoul or zombie - it retains its human shape, can be covered in bandages and probably doesn't stink horribly. It might have a neuter, possibly pleasant smell, depending on the substances used in embalming the body. Mummies could be guarding holy sites and temples or even walk around the living, and they probably wouldn't be considered horrifying, especially once you get used to them.

Oh, and by the way: I really enjoy this series of threads - it's really fascinating and inspiring, full of good trivia, ideas and theories that can be used for plot hooks. Keep the monsters coming!

JRM

02-05-2009 12:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9932455)

This might make desecration of tombs very morally problematic. Enter the tomb, and the mummified tomb guardians are roused to protect their master. If they're injured, that's a problem. The wounds will be reflected in their eternal spiritual bodies, forever. Eternity marred by eternally seeping, unhealable wounds. And if they're slain, they're cast from the perfect realm into the equivalent of Hell or Hades, where the unprotected spirits run wild and are subject to unimaginable horrors. Your act of tomb robbing costs someone Paradise. Even worse, if the mistress is roused, all the spirits that their divinity protects in the afterlife, her former subjects, are unprotected. The longer she's away, the more innocent spirits who are hauled off to the nasty part of the afterlife, perhaps forever. And if she's destroyed, then you've basically consigned an entire generation of her nation to perpetual torment.

That reminds me, many years ago I did some work on a "reverse dungeon" type one-shot adventure where the PCs were (mostly) undead who'd been roused from the afterlife because some adventurers had plundered their tomb. They basically had until the next full moon to recover the magical/blessed artifacts, without which the extra-dimensional pocket-paradise they had constructed for their spirits to dwell in would collapse.

It's not directly relevant because I wasn't going to use D&D rules, but a simplistic system with just 6-9 traits per character, with each character having a few special skills/powers. I can't remember much detail about the opponents & obstacles I was considering, but I do recall some stuff about the pregen characters:

Pharaoh: This mummy was a decent fighter, but his greatest ability was the power of Royal Command. Basically, by spending mana (magic points) he could make any pure-blooded descendant of his people do anything he told them to whether they were living, dead or undead.* There was no saving throw, he just needed to spend enough mana, and he would automatically sense whether someone was a "true person". I think I was planning on having a fight in a museum, where the Pharaoh discovers a few sarcophagi containing bodies he can use as cannon fodder.

*This includes every other player character except for the Queen.

The Queen: A concubine made good, the Queen was a minor aristocrat from a neighbouring country, so the Pharaoh's royal command power does not work on her. Unlike all the other undead PCs she was perfectly preserved and looked just like a living human, although she smelled strongly of spice. Her main power (apart from being able to freely mingle with mortals without arousing screams) was the ability to charm living males human(oid)s. She could also use cosmetic magic to briefly give the other undead the appearance they had in life.

The Priest: The Priest is the only living member of the PCs party, but he's not precisely mortal. His spirit is constantly reincarnated with all his memories, so long as the Paradise of the Tomb is intact that it, and his duty is to commune with the Ancestors and care for their resting places. Among his supernatural gifts is the power to heal/repair/revitalize both the living and the undead (requiring the use of medicines something like tanas leaves for undead, myrrh for mortals).

The Vizier: An arcane specialist as a bureaucrat, presumably a friendly (?) rival to the Priest's more spiritual powers. As well as some elemental and general utility spells (which I can't remember now) he possessed a case with ten ushabti - little clay effigies of men - who he could magically turn into minions (about as effective as peasant militias).

The General: A masterful warrior, possessing supernatural strength, toughness and agility but no actual spells. (I was also toying with the idea of having him be in love with The Queen and/or vica versa, although The Vizier or The Priest may fit that movie cliché better)

Oh, and all the PCs, both living and undead, were spiritually connected via the "Paradise of the Tomb", which basically meant they could freely communicate with each other even when the party split up.

JRM

02-05-2009 12:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9933223)

*Oh lordy. If you want to do that, I'll just curl up quietly in a corner and weep, WEEP for you. :)*

If it makes you feel any better for me, a few weeks ago I was inspired by this thread to stat-up several of the monsters I came up with in the 2nd edition format and then converted them into 3rd edition, giving you two obsolete editions for the price of one!

I'll probably post them with a link to this thread once we've finished with the MM.

ESkemp

02-05-2009 02:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I really love mummies because they by necessity ask two questions: why was this person deliberately mummified, and by whom? Was it a royal guard, an aristocrat, a priest? What was the culture like that deliberately mummifies people, whether they intend to make them horribly undead or not? They don't pop up at random, and that means plenty of room to customize them and make them distinctive.

Plus, they come with so many different styles of trappings that can be messed with. Customizing their trappings to a different culture is a lot of fun (even though their default Egyptian aesthetic is very attractive). Sarcophagi, crook-and-flail, tana leaves, scarabs, ankhs, mastabas, wall frescos, stone sphinxes or other beasts, ushabti, shrines to exotic gods, old papyrus scrolls... any one of those elements can be used as is, or adapted to fit the aesthetic of a different culture. They have this immense list of design elements to use, tinker with or decline, which is always good for a monster's overall longevity.

kelvingreen

02-05-2009 03:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9931697)

I'd quite like a campaign in which all the characters play sages, who spend the whole time running away from and dodging hideous beasties while attempting to study them - rather than fight or kill them.

Full xp for capturing the creature, half for killing it if there's enough left to study, none if it's completely annihilated. That'll sort out the powergamers.

kami2awa

02-05-2009 06:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kelvingreen (Post 9934224)

Full xp for capturing the creature, half for killing it if there's enough left to study, none if it's completely annihilated. That'll sort out the powergamers.

Plus rewards for eggs, feathers, skulls and other traces recovered. Maybe equal to the gp sale value for things like Giant Eagle eggs?

noisms

02-05-2009 09:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9933422)

Pharaoh: This mummy was a decent fighter, but his greatest ability was the power of Royal Command. Basically, by spending mana (magic points) he could make any pure-blooded descendant of his people do anything he told them to whether they were living, dead or undead. There was no saving throw, he just needed to spend enough mana, and he would automatically sense whether someone was a "true person". I think I was planning on having a fight in* a museum, where the Pharaoh discovers a few sarcophagi containing bodies he can use as cannon fodder.

This includes every other player character except for the Queen.*

That's a pretty cool idea actually. I've sometimes played around with ways to have PC classes who might be physically weak, but able to command others. You have to find a way to prevent idiots abusing it by commanding other characters though.

Quote:

Originally Posted by ESkemp (Post 9933860)

I really love mummies because they by necessity ask two questions: why was this person deliberately mummified, and by whom? Was it a royal guard, an aristocrat, a priest? What was the culture like that deliberately mummifies people, whether they intend to make them horribly undead or not? They don't pop up at random, and that means plenty of room to customize them and make them distinctive.

Plus, they come with so many different styles of trappings that can be messed with. Customizing their trappings to a different culture is a lot of fun (even though their default Egyptian aesthetic is very attractive). Sarcophagi, crook-and-flail, tana leaves, scarabs, ankhs, mastabas, wall frescos, stone sphinxes or other beasts, ushabti, shrines to exotic gods, old papyrus scrolls... any one of those elements can be used as is, or adapted to fit the aesthetic of a different culture. They have this immense list of design elements to use, tinker with or decline, which is always good for a monster's overall longevity.

The good thing about Egyptian mummies is the fact that they were entombed within large labyrinthine structures - which is a ready-made adventure site with numerous encounters and traps. As far as I know the non-Egyptian mummy making cultures tended not to do things the same way.

Fitzgrunion

02-05-2009 10:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9935624)

The good thing about Egyptian mummies is the fact that they were entombed within large labyrinthine structures - which is a ready-made adventure site with numerous encounters and traps. As far as I know the non-Egyptian mummy making cultures tended not to do things the same way.

I can't find any info on embalming or mummification practices but the mausoleum of Qin Shi Huang, the first Emperor of China, is very impressive. 6000 Terracotta warriors, a cavernous chamber with miniature models of the continents, mercury rivers and oceans, a sky with constellations made of jewels, crossbow traps (in real life!). It's made of awesome!

Couple all this with the achievements of the man in real life -the unification of the Warring States, The great wall (well very much of it anyway), the 12 Jin Ren (Bronze colossi built from the weapons of the defeated states!) et. etc.. As well as all this Old Qin was obsessed with immortality and was romping around the countryside with his entourage of several tens of thousands of soldiers searching for the elixir of life when he died. He wanted to live 10,000 years.

I think he found his elixir and he's down there -his mausoleum has not been opened yet. When his tomb is desecrated all the terracotta warriors (and the bronze colossi) will animate and take vengeance!:D

Someone mention ushabeti earlier, those little fellas should animate, faience golems 3 inches high would strike terror into the hearts of the bravest tomb robbers.

ESkemp

02-05-2009 11:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9935624)

The good thing about Egyptian mummies is the fact that they were entombed within large labyrinthine structures - which is a ready-made adventure site with numerous encounters and traps. As far as I know the non-Egyptian mummy making cultures tended not to do things the same way.

True, but this is D&D. You can pretty much come up with an excuse for every culture to entomb something within a large labyrinthine structure — elves, dwarves, orcs, what have you.

Herrison

02-05-2009 11:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by ESkemp (Post 9935982)

True, but this is D&D. You can pretty much come up with an excuse for every culture to entomb something within a large labyrinthine structure — elves, dwarves, orcs, what have you.

That reason for putting your every possession in a trap-filled maze is called the wandering monster table. I wouldn't even think of having a kid in D&D unless I were a name level spellcaster.

Fitzgrunion

02-05-2009 06:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Herrison (Post 9936036)

That reason for putting your every possession in a trap-filled maze is called the wandering monster table. I wouldn't even think of having a kid in D&D unless I were a name level spellcaster.

To think us earthling folk have fear of the dark when there ain't much (other than other humans) in most of the world that threatens us much. Can you imagine the terror, anxiety and paranoia that you would feel living in any of these fantasy worlds? I think the fact that most of them are portrayed as dynamic, cosmopolitan pseudo-mediaeval worlds is misleading. Humans in the Realms, Krynn, Oerth etc. should be belligerent, paranoid, insular and hyper-aggressive, living in massively fortified compounds guarded by devious magics.

A world where monsters eat your children is scary.

noisms

02-05-2009 08:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Mummy, Greater

This bit should really have been folded into the previous entry, so feel free to keep batting around mummy ideas for a while longer. This section is very long, and complicated. If anything it reminds me of the snore-inducing Dracolich entry, which rambles on for two pages of dense, packed text about the incredibly arcane creation procedure for the things. The Greater Mummy isn't quite that bad, but it's still far too detailed. Is it any coincidence that Ravenloft was involved in both?

The long and short of it is: Greater Mummies are much nastier than the regular kind, and have a sort of age template thing going on a la dragons. Their alignment even changes as they get older, going from Lawful Evil to Chaotic Evil: mummies are the opposite of humans it seems, growing less conservative as they age.

There's a lot of Ravenloft gumpf about Ankhtepot that I don't really know about, Ravenloft being probably my least favourite AD&D setting. I'd like to do a survey of the MM so far and find out how many setting specific monster descriptions there are and how many each setting has. My suspicion is that Ravenloft has the lion's share, with Forgotten Realms, Dark Sun and Spelljammer next in line. Speaking entirely extemporaneously of course.

For Fitzgrunion and anybody else who remembers my patented Monster Manual Art Assessment System: The Greater Mummy's artwork is definitely in the Merely Bad category in my opinion.

ESkemp

02-05-2009 09:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Herrison (Post 9936036)

That reason for putting your every possession in a trap-filled maze is called the wandering monster table. I wouldn't even think of having a kid in D&D unless I were a name level spellcaster.

And then you don't need kids: you attract XdX apprentices, who are already at least 1st level! Admittedly a 1st-level character has about the same mortality rate as an infant in our world, if not worse, but hey, it's something.

Back to the topic, I see mummies as one of the signature undead for any D&D game vanilla enough to have great huge ruins left there by vanished civilizations. Undead are capital dungeon-dwellers given their lack of need to eat, their ties to whomever built the dungeon, and their tendency to act as packets of lore if you can figure them out. Mummies exemplify this all the way. I think Gyax's Necropolis is a hell of a dungeon (although boy does it ever showcase his personal style), and it makes a strong argument for how powerful mummies could at least rival liches for arch-villains in a campaign. The Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan: another classic source of inspiration, this time for taking the ancient mummies into more Mesoamerican motifs, and similarly the old Dungeon adventure "The Mud Sorcerer's Tomb" (which was pretty much a great fusion of both Tomb of Horrors and Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan).

And like I said, they work great with the fantasy race of your choice. Mummified orc warlords sleeping uneasily in tumbled cairns, ready to break loose and trample civilization under their scythed chariot wheels! Mummified dwarves, the terror of any dwarf who's been taught to fear and respect the terrible wisdom of the ancestors! Mummified troglodytes, the ancient forebears of the D&D killer sleestak! Mummified gibberlings — um, no explanation pops immediately to mind, but I'm certain it would be very interesting!

DMH

02-06-2009 12:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9937414)

Their alignment even changes as they get older, going from Lawful Evil to Chaotic Evil: mummies are the opposite of humans it seems, growing less conservative as they age.

This crap makes my eye twitch (and did so back with Monsters of Myth and Legend from Mayfair). Why is CE more evil than LE? Wouldn't social creatures be more of a threat to Good society? Why isn't NE the most evil of them all?

And no monster can be too detailed.

Kakita Kojiro

02-06-2009 01:21 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9938321)

This crap makes my eye twitch (and did so back with Monsters of Myth and Legend from Mayfair). Why is CE more evil than LE? Wouldn't social creatures be more of a threat to Good society? Why isn't NE the most evil of them all?

He said less conservative, not less evil. Rush Limbaugh and Karl Rove aside, conservative is not the same thing as evil.

rex monday

02-06-2009 02:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9938515)

He said less conservative, not less evil. Rush Limbaugh and Karl Rove aside, conservative is not the same thing as evil.

Yeah, it seems to represent a slow decline into insanity more than any increase in evil. Which is kinda sad if you can empathize with the wizened husk of a god-emperor that can rot you by touching you.

YojimboC

02-06-2009 04:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Point of order -- I don't think dracoliches came from Ravenloft. The only setting I'm aware even bothers with the things is Forgotten Realms.

DMH

02-06-2009 05:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9938515)

He said less conservative, not less evil. Rush Limbaugh and Karl Rove aside, conservative is not the same thing as evil.

But I am not commenting on noisms post but rather what is in the MM. That is why I included the questions about why CE is more evil than LE.

Mr. Teapot

02-06-2009 05:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9939327)

Point of order -- I don't think dracoliches came from Ravenloft. The only setting I'm aware even bothers with the things is Forgotten Realms.

Dragotha, the original dracolich, is from Greyhawk, I believe. (Well, wherever the White Plume Mountain module is set, which is according to Dragon #134 in Greyhawk). Definitely not a Ravenloft monster.

Mr. Teapot

02-06-2009 06:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9932455)

You could even make the threat something other than mummies. Particularly in the frozen specimens and the bog mummies, even the stomach contents are preserved. Their might be seeds of some early plant, that sprout. Shoots burst from the corpse, and start spreading. A new invasive species, that threatens the modern world.

It's a long way before we get to Yellow Musk Creepers, but they'd fit that job really well. An ancient civilization was plagued by parasitic, mind controlling plants that make you a zombie. They couldn't deal with all the zombies, so they rounded them up and somehow herded them northward into the frozen wastes. The zombies didn't die, but they were all frozen up there. Now the PCs accidentally uncover one, which unleashed the parasitic Yellow Musk plants on the unsuspecting modern campaign setting. Once they're done dealing with just one Musk plant, let them find the ten thousand other Yellow Musk zombies up there.

Shit, that was supposed to be about mummies, wasn't it? Well, perhaps the yellow musk plant was the brainchild of an ancient druid or wizard type, who was preserved as a mummy (who preserved him and why?). Maybe he was frozen up north with them, maybe preserved elsewhere. But now he's active again, and knows about the army of Yellow Musk zombies in the glacier. The PCs have to race to the north pole to stop a zombie/parasitic plant apocalypse.

Mr. Teapot

02-06-2009 06:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9932926)

Speaking of Andean mummies, the Incas mummified their dead rulers... and kept them around. They didn't bury them in tombs. Dead rulers maintained their own courts, and had followers who continued to use them as figureheads to bolster their political aims. The Spanish took advantage of this, and its one of the reasons why the Incas lost, despite a numerical and territorial advantage.

Anyway, in D&D, those mummified rulers aren't just bodies... they're ambulatory, intelligent, and they've got their own ideas on how the country should be run.

Maybe I've been playing D&D enough to have looped around, but "country ruled by immortal undead" starts to seem old hat. The weird craziness of just having perfectly normal mundane non-ambulatory mummies be the "rulers" of the country is something I like, though. It also sets the party up for one thing and gives them a surprise:

GM: "You know this country is ruled by a council of ancient emperors, each mummified upon their death. Even after their deaths, they continue to hold court and make their wishes known. Your army has finally marched into the capital city, and you PCs are about to storm the palace.

Player 1: "Great, a mummy. Well, Father Ted will prepare his anti-undead spells."

Player 2: "I requisition all the alchemist's fire, greek fire and lantern oil I can get from the army."

etc. Then inside, they find a mummified corpse on a throne, waste some attacks, and are surprised when it doesn't fight back but the vizier does, who is immune to all their fire and anti-undead tactics (cause he's a living wizard with Fire Shield up).

YojimboC

02-06-2009 06:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9940056)

Maybe I've been playing D&D enough to have looped around, but "country ruled by immortal undead" starts to seem old hat. The weird craziness of just having perfectly normal mundane non-ambulatory mummies be the "rulers" of the country is something I like, though. It also sets the party up for one thing and gives them a surprise:

Fair enough. I thought it just be a neat flavorful thing -- our characters don't generally kill the rulers of foreign nations (except sometimes). I just think a non-Ravenloft undead-ocracy would be cool.

Fitzgrunion

02-06-2009 06:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

There's an extent to which historical societies wherein ancestor worship was of considerable significance were considerably influenced, if not ruled, by the memories of their ancestors. Consider Egypt and China, the two most enduring civilisations the world has ever known. In Egypt especially the monumental shadow of the Old kingdom pharaohs was an ever-present element in life. The fact that Egyptian culture remained so memetically static that a degree of expertise is required to differentiate art and artefacts spread over a 3000 year period is testament to the enduring power of the pharaohs, even beyond the grave.

Now imagine a culture where the old kings are still alive, whether ambulatory or not. The knowledge that the ancestors are there, waiting under the ground is considerable incentive to obey and remain steadfast to their wishes. The designation of a lawful evil alignment to Mummies would reflect the fact that they would act as a powerful force for a kind of malignant conservatism. The mummies don't need to rule, their influence is still felt if there is nominally a mortal ruler. Although I do like the idea of the ruling government consisting of a bureaucracy that carries out the whims of the immortal emperor beneath the ground.

I disagree that the mummy image is Merely Bad I find it to be Somewhere in the Vicinity of Ok or whatever the designation designating a kind of acceptable mediocrity was. Baxa must have been cheap because they used him a great deal back in the day, this image is kitschy and dorksomeness but has some dynamism, which is sorely lacking in the other mummy.

noisms

02-06-2009 07:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9938321)

This crap makes my eye twitch (and did so back with Monsters of Myth and Legend from Mayfair). Why is CE more evil than LE? Wouldn't social creatures be more of a threat to Good society? Why isn't NE the most evil of them all?

And no monster can be too detailed.

Yeah, that line about becoming "darker and more evil" is a bit rich. I guess that's where the 4e designers took their inspiration! But let's not go down that path.

I don't think there's anything wrong with detailed monsters but I'd prefer it if they'd leave most of the work to individual DMs. For me the Greater Mummy, like the Dracolich, steps over a certain line between stimulating and over-detailed.

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9939327)

Point of order -- I don't think dracoliches came from Ravenloft. The only setting I'm aware even bothers with the things is Forgotten Realms.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9939981)

Dragotha, the original dracolich, is from Greyhawk, I believe. (Well, wherever the White Plume Mountain module is set, which is according to Dragon #134 in Greyhawk). Definitely not a Ravenloft monster.

Hmm, I stand corrected. I always thought Dracoliches were originally from Ravenloft for some reason.

Lukas Sjöström

02-06-2009 07:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9940056)

The weird craziness of just having perfectly normal mundane non-ambulatory mummies be the "rulers" of the country is something I like, though.

More D&D use for the Great Leader Kim Il-Sung, Eternal President of North Korea! :D

noisms

02-06-2009 08:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9940056)

Maybe I've been playing D&D enough to have looped around, but "country ruled by immortal undead" starts to seem old hat. The weird craziness of just having perfectly normal mundane non-ambulatory mummies be the "rulers" of the country is something I like, though.

In Bas-Lag, the world of China Mieville's novels, there's a nation in which the undead and living exist side by side, called Kromlech I think. There's even a Kromlech language which allows replacement of words with hand signals, because as the undead 'age' they lose their lips, vocal cords and tongue and therefore the ability to make sounds.

Sleeper

02-06-2009 09:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9940603)

In Bas-Lag, the world of China Mieville's novels, there's a nation in which the undead and living exist side by side, called Kromlech I think. There's even a Kromlech language which allows replacement of words with hand signals, because as the undead 'age' they lose their lips, vocal cords and tongue and therefore the ability to make sounds.

Kromlech? As in cromlech? Does that mean the language of dragons is "Aubelisque" and the language of golems is "Menheer"?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9939981)

Dragotha, the original dracolich, is from Greyhawk, I believe. (Well, wherever the White Plume Mountain module is set, which is according to Dragon #134 in Greyhawk). Definitely not a Ravenloft monster.

Technically, I believe Dragotha was originally referred to as an "undead dragon", not a dracolich. The first true use of dracolich might have been Greenwood's article on the Cult of the Dragon in an old issue of Dragon.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9940056)

Maybe I've been playing D&D enough to have looped around, but "country ruled by immortal undead" starts to seem old hat. The weird craziness of just having perfectly normal mundane non-ambulatory mummies be the "rulers" of the country is something I like, though.

That's the kind of thing I can appreciate, as well. I sometimes hate the "jump immediately to a magical explanation" mindset that seems to pervade a lot of fantasy settings. You could also throw in a scheming bureaucracy of priests, many who aren't clerics, and have ritual divinations and other means of contacting the dead. The trick is, the traditional rituals for contacting the dead are roughly as meritorious as astrology, giving the priests free reign when it comes to interpretation. Actual divine spellcasters who can cast speak with dead or commune are frowned on for disturbing the dead with too blunt a tool. And, of course, for undercutting the authority of the establishment.

noisms

02-06-2009 09:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9940856)

Kromlech? As in cromlech? Does that mean the language of dragons is "Aubelisque" and the language of golems is "Menheer"?

No, but they should be. ;)

Naxuul

02-06-2009 10:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9937414)

My suspicion is that Ravenloft has the lion's share, with Forgotten Realms, Dark Sun and Spelljammer next in line. Speaking entirely extemporaneously of course.

It depends. If you mean 'includes material about the setting from which they come' then Ravenloft and Spelljammer are the obvious winners, as pretty much all their monster entries make obnoxious amounts of references to setting material. If you mean monsters from specific setting monster books then Dragonlance and Forgotten Realms are the big winners as alot of the creatures in the book who are generic fantasy like creatures first appeared in their monstrous appendixes.

-Naxuul

Kakita Kojiro

02-06-2009 10:12 AM

You know, the really bad thing about using Egyptian mummies as the archetypical "mummy" is... they're actually wrapped up and sarcophagized so tightly that they'd really be no threat.

Legs all bound together, arms crossed over the chest and wrapped just as tight. What's he going to do, hop after you? It's like being threatened by the Black Knight... except, can't bite your ankles, 'cause his mouth is all wrapped up, too.

Bog mummies, though... they'll drag victims back to their peat bog, and make them mummies, too. It's like leveling-up a zombie plague.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9939977)

But I am not commenting on noisms post but rather what is in the MM. That is why I included the questions about why CE is more evil than LE.

Ah. Well, then, carry on.

noisms

02-06-2009 10:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kir~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 9941023)

It depends. If you mean 'includes material about the setting from which they come' then Ravenloft and Spelljammer are the obvious winners, as pretty much all their monster entries make obnoxious amounts of references to setting material. If you mean monsters from specific setting monster books then Dragonlance and Forgotten Realms are the big winners as alot of the creatures in the book who are generic fantasy like creatures first appeared in their monstrous appendixes.

-Naxuul

Yeah, 'includes material about the setting from which they come' is closer to what I meant. Ravenloft and Spelljammer do take the cake when it comes to making reference after reference to stuff that makes you go 'huh?' if you aren't au fait, although thinking about it, Dark Sun can be just as bad.

There needs to be an empirical study, I feel.

Naxuul

02-06-2009 11:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kir~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9941122)

Yeah, 'includes material about the setting from which they come' is closer to what I meant. Ravenloft and Spelljammer do take the cake when it comes to making reference after reference to stuff that makes you go 'huh?' if you aren't au fait, although thinking about it, Dark Sun can be just as bad.

There needs to be an empirical study, I feel.

Oh yeah, Dark Sun is pretty bad for that. But I think the total of Dark Sun creatures in the Monstrous Manual are the Kirre, Gith and a couple of carnivorous plants. Unfortunately alot of the cooler Dark Sun creatures, like the elemental drakes, silt horrors, desert water monsters or unique Dark Sun domesticated animals never made their way into it.

-Naxuul

noisms

02-06-2009 12:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 9941201)

Oh yeah, Dark Sun is pretty bad for that. But I think the total of Dark Sun creatures in the Monstrous Manual are the Kirre, Gith and a couple of carnivorous plants. Unfortunately alot of the cooler Dark Sun creatures, like the elementa drakes, silt horrors, desert water monsters or unique Dark Sun domesticated animals never made their way into it.

-Naxuul

Although there aren't that many Spelljammer creatures in there either. Arcane, Giff, Pirate Gith... not sure I can think of a lot else off hand.

I wonder if you can translate MM appearances into popularity? Forgotten Realms and Dragonlance presumably have the most monsters in the MM, then Ravenloft... There must be a correlation between that and sales.

Wakboth

02-06-2009 05:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9941546)

Although there aren't that many Spelljammer creatures in there either. Arcane, Giff, Pirate Gith... not sure I can think of a lot else off hand.

How could you forget the neogi?! ;)

Argos is from Spelljammer, I think. Maybe some of the beholder variants as well?

JasonK

02-06-2009 05:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9940856)

That's the kind of thing I can appreciate, as well. I sometimes hate the "jump immediately to a magical explanation" mindset that seems to pervade a lot of fantasy settings. You could also throw in a scheming bureaucracy of priests, many who aren't clerics, and have ritual divinations and other means of contacting the dead. The trick is, the traditional rituals for contacting the dead are roughly as meritorious as astrology, giving the priests free reign when it comes to interpretation. Actual divine spellcasters who can cast speak with dead or commune are frowned on for disturbing the dead with too blunt a tool. And, of course, for undercutting the authority of the establishment.

Indeed. I want to find a way to put this into my game world now - I'm just not sure where it'd fit.

Hhm...

- jasön

JRM

02-06-2009 06:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9935624)

Quote:

Originally Posted by jrm (Post 9933422)

Pharaoh: This mummy was a decent fighter, but his greatest ability was the power of Royal Command. Basically by spending mana (magic points) he could make any pure-blooded descendant of his people do anything he tol them to whether they were living, dead or undead. There was no saving throw, he just needed to spend enough mana, and he would automatically sense whether someone was a "true person". I think I was planning on havir fight in a museum, where the Pharaoh discovers a few sarcophagi containing bodies he can use as cannon fodder*

This includes every other player character except for the Queen.*

That's a pretty cool idea actually. I've sometimes played around with ways to have PC classes who might be physically weak, but able to command others. You have to find a way to prevent idiots abusing it by commanding other characters though.

The potential of idiots abusing it was deliberate. History has proved that hereditary monarchs can include some right plonkers - imagine one of them with the power of a God-Emperor. Since it was going to be a one-shot, it didn't matter so much if a reckless Pharaoh started wrecking the campaign, and it gave the other PCs a chance to conspire against him.

As for balance, my plan was the "Command" power would have a variable cost depending on target, and the Pharaoh would only have enough mana to command one or two of the other PCs, and I was thinking of having his Power require him to hold a magical object of some kind - probably a Flail or Crook of Royalty. Also, I'd have probably had them vote as to who would play the Pharaoh.

In a one-shot I ran years ago called Brain Suckers From Dimension X, where the players played horrible mind-controlling parasites invading a US small town in the 50s, the "Command Brain Sucker" had a similar power to the Pharaoh. In one game it/he got attacked by an enemy alien disguised as a policeman, so it/he panicked and COMMANDED the "Combat Brain Sucker" to kill everyone in the building just before it/he was knocked out by the alien's stun-disc. Unfortunately, said "everyone" included the entire party. The Combat Brain Sucker ended up killing the enemy aliens and every human in the building then seriously wounded two of the other PCs, but was electrified unconscious before it/she was able to finish the job.

Belchion

02-06-2009 10:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9937414)

Their alignment even changes as they get older, going from Lawful Evil to Chaotic Evil: mummies are the opposite of humans it seems, growing less conservative as they age.

I doubt the mummies get less conservative, rather that they keep their point of view and thus get "out of touch" with the rest of the world. If you start as conservative and do not move, you end up a reactionary and finally become progressive again, because that what you want to "return to" will be "something new" for the rest of the world.

Imagine some mummy who was formerly a conservative Sumerian priest, got entombed when the progressives took over, was freed again by the reactionary movement several years later, and till today schemes to restore the "old ways" - which have nothing in common with the modern "way of life".

JRM

02-07-2009 12:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9942974)

I doubt the mummies get less conservative, rather that they keep their point of view and thus get "out of touch" with the rest of the world. If you start as conservative and do not move, you end up a reactionary and finally become progressive again, because that what you want to "return to" will be "something new" for the rest of the world.

Imagine some mummy who was formerly a conservative Sumerian priest, got entombed when the progressives took over, was freed again by the reactionary movement several years later, and till today schemes to restore the "old ways" - which have nothing in common with the modern "way of life".

Don't see how I can agree with you there. Surely a mummy is still Lawful if it believes in Going by the Rules, even when the system of rules it adheres to is one that no-one living practices.

kelvingreen

02-07-2009 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9940603)

In Bas-Lag, the world of China Mieville's novels, there's a nation in which the undead and living exist side by side, called Kromlech I think. There's even a Kromlech language which allows replacement of words with hand signals, because as the undead 'age' they lose their lips, vocal cords and tongue and therefore the ability to make sounds.

It's High Cromlech, and when I came across it in The Scar, I immediately knew Mieville was a gamer, as the section read much more like campaign setting than story background. I particularly liked the bit about the vampires of High Cromlech, who are treated like pathetic drug addicts by the rest of the undead, because of their dependency on the blood of the living.

Mr. Teapot

02-07-2009 06:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9940856)

That's the kind of thing I can appreciate, as well. I sometimes hate the "jump immediately to a magical explanation" mindset that seems to pervade a lot of fantasy settings. You could also throw in a scheming bureaucracy of priests, many who aren't clerics, and have ritual divinations and other means of contacting the dead. The trick is, the traditional rituals for contacting the dead are roughly as meritorious as astrology, giving the priests free reign when it comes to interpretation. Actual divine spellcasters who can cast speak with dead or commune are frowned on for disturbing the dead with too blunt a tool. And, of course, for undercutting the authority of the establishment.

Yeah, that's definitely the sort of thing I was imagining.

s/LaSH

02-07-2009 09:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9941045)

You know, the really bad thing about using Egyptian mummies as the archetypical "mummy" is... they're actually wrapped up and sarcophagized so tightly that they'd really be no threat.

Legs all bound together, arms crossed over the chest and wrapped just as tight. What's he going to do, hop after you? It's like being threatened by the Black Knight... except, can't bite your ankles, 'cause his mouth is all wrapped up, too.

I dunno, isn't this part of the Hopping Vampire schtick? You could have some serious fun with something so apparently silly, especially if it's very difficult to injure but is otherwise limited to headbutting people. Imagine PCs blinking confusedly at the hopping mummy, looting the tomb blind and walking briskly out of the pyramid while this thing hops slowly after them. And then, six weeks later, there's a thump-thump-thump in the street outside the tavern where they're living it large...

noisms

02-07-2009 09:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Who would have thought Mummies would generate so much comment? Something tells me the next lot won't be quite so stimulating, but we'll see.

Myconid

First things first: cool picture. I like the delicate, almost waif-like quality to the piece. There's something spooky and alien about it too, which suits Myconids very well.

Second things second: the entry is loong. I'd forgotten just how long it is. Myconids have a heck of a lot of different powers to be detailed and a big chunk of text describing their ecology and ruler, the Myconid king.

It basically boils down to this: Myconids hate and fear other humanoids, who they see as violent and destructive. So they keep themselves to themselves, creating collective hallucinations and lazing around in mossy garden areas. They are a bit like utopian socialists, with communal, tightly knit 'circles' of equals who do everything together, but the existence of a king rather belies that. The king is always the strongest Myconid, and that doesn't sound very utopian socialist.

In combat they release spores which have a variety of effects, such as causing hallucinations, raising the alarm, or (my favourite) animating a corpse into a kind of fungus zombie. Above this the king can create potions which can be used to infect enemies with deadly fungal diseases, spur fungal growth, and a variety of other things. Nice abilities, actually: if I have any complaint it's that I'd like to link different kinds of spore to different varieties of fungus, so that there could be death-inducing Deadly Nightcap breeds or whatever.

One thing that puzzled me about Myconids is that they live deep underground - in the Underdark in fact. I know that there is fungi underground, but toadstools seem like more of a woodland thing to me. I'd rather situate Myconids deep in a Fangorn-type forest, far from civilisation, inaccessible to all but the absolute toughest of explorers. Another possibility for the Royal Teratological Society, maybe.

kelvingreen

02-07-2009 09:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9945791)

First things first: cool picture. I like the delicate, almost waif-like quality to the piece.

Well, it's a DiTerlizzi, isn't it, and "waifish" is pretty much his stock style in this period. A good picture though, I agree. And I agree with moving the Myconids to a forest setting too; there are lots of interesting creatures underground, but D&D forests could do with some sprucing up.

demiurge1138

02-07-2009 12:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I used myconids in a low-level game I ran as an intro to D&D to introduce the alien nature of the Underdark. Great fungal forests, with the myconids tending their crops in eerie silence. They did a favor for the myconid king by killing some ooze that was immune to their spores and were rewarded with potions to buff their poor little first level selves. Made for a good side-trip, but I've always wanted to do more with them.

Has anyone here seen Matango: Fungus of Terror? It was originally released in the States as Attack of the Mushroom People. It's a Japanese horror film somewhere between The Thing and Gilligan's Island. A pleasure cruise ship wrecks on a desert island where there's nothing to eat except for mushrooms--that slowly turn you into an ambulatory mushroom. Play up the growth and corruption aspect of the myconids, I think, and you could make them into a similar antagonist.

EmperorSeth

02-07-2009 01:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9946426)

I used myconids in a low-level game I ran as an intro to D&D to introduce the alien nature of the Underdark. Great fungal forests, with the myconids tending their crops in eerie silence. They did a favor for the myconid king by killing some ooze that was immune to their spores and were rewarded with potions to buff their poor little first level selves. Made for a good side-trip, but I've always wanted to do more with them.

Has anyone here seen Matango: Fungus of Terror? It was originally released in the States as Attack of the Mushroom People. It's a Japanese horror film somewhere between The Thing and Gilligan's Island. A pleasure cruise ship wrecks on a desert island where there's nothing to eat except for mushrooms--that slowly turn you into an ambulatory mushroom. Play up the growth and corruption aspect of the myconids, I think, and you could make them into a similar antagonist.

I never saw it, but the village name was used in the localization of Secret of Mana back in the nineties. It also had a vampire boss named Buffy, which was pretty obscure given that this came after the movie but well before the much more popular TV series.

As for myconids, I featured a village of them in an early dungeon crawl. I mostly ignored that "hate humanoids" part, or maybe 3rd ed left that out, to make them basically hippy stereotypes. I think I gave their forest a dumb pun name as well...let me check...Fungal Jungle. Not a pun, but a rhyme. Close enough.

Vultur10

02-07-2009 03:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The Matango movie was apparently based (although quite loosely) on a story called "The Voice in the Night" by William Hope Hodgson.

JRM

02-07-2009 05:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9945791)

Myconid

It basically boils down to this: Myconids hate and fear other humanoids, who they see as violent and destructive. So they keep themselves to themselves, creating collective hallucinations and lazing around in mossy garden areas. They are a bit like utopian socialists, with communal, tightly knit 'circles' of equals who do everything together, but the existence of a king rather belies that. The king is always the strongest Myconid, and that doesn't sound very utopian socialist.

I suspect that seeing the King as the ruler of the Myconids is a human misinterpretation. The Myconid King is a lonely outcast, denied access to melding with the circles, where the true power lies. A circle of twenty myconids is almost a single being, so closely do they share their thoughts while melded, and far more powerful communally than the King is individually. The King's main duty is dealing with outsiders, which is why he's the most powerful combatant and has the ability to create Fungal Zombies to attack them. 'He' is also cursed with the duty of dealing with the "violent, insane" sapient species like humans that the myconids may have to actually, urgh, talk to.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9945791)

One thing that puzzled me about Myconids is that they live deep underground - in the Underdark in fact. I know that there is fungi underground, but toadstools seem like more of a woodland thing to me. I'd rather situate Myconids deep in a Fangorn-type forest, far from civilisation, inaccessible to all but the absolute toughest of explorers. Another possibility for the Royal Teratological Society, maybe.

Good idea, Forest Myconids would definitely work. Maybe they have a symbiotic relationship with some of the harmless fey races - those mushrooms you see forest gnomes sitting on may actually be sapient.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9945791)

Nice abilities, actually: if I have any complaint it's that I'd like to link different kinds of spore to different varieties of fungus, so that there could be death-inducing Deadly Nightcap breeds or whatever.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9946426)

Has anyone here seen Matango: Fungus of Terror? It was originally released in the States as Attack of the Mushroom People. It's a Japanese horror film somewhere between The Thing and Gilligan's Island. A pleasure cruise shipwrecks on a desert island where there's nothing to eat except for mushrooms--that slowly turn you into an ambulatory mushroom. Play up the growth and corruption aspect of the myconids, I think, and you could make them into a similar antagonist.

I've heard of Matango, but never seen it. My instinct is to go the other way - Myconids taste delicious, similar to the finest white truffles, and those with hallucinogenic spores (4+ HD) can also give a wonderful "high" if you eat their gills. That's why they're so shy and fear humanoid races so much, they just don't want to be eaten.

migo

02-07-2009 05:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9946426)

I used myconids in a low-level game I ran as an intro to D&D to introduce the alien nature of the Underdark. Great fungal forests, with the myconids tending their crops in eerie silence. They did a favor for the myconid king by killing some ooze that was immune to their spores and were rewarded with potions to buff their poor little first level selves. Made for a good side-trip, but I've always wanted to do more with them.

.

This is kind of a strange idea. Myconids tending mushrooms, since they're mushroom people would be rather like humans harvesting humans without brains. I suppose this would be like growing people for organ replacement and nothing else. Kinda creepy if you think about it.

noisms

02-07-2009 05:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by migo (Post 9946951)

This is kind of a strange idea. Myconids tending mushrooms, since they're mushroom people would be rather like humans harvesting humans without brains. I suppose this would be like growing people for organ replacement and nothing else. Kinda creepy if you think about it.

Technically fungi are an entire Kingdom, so one species eating another is no different from a human eating a cow, fish or grasshopper. Which I suppose is creepy if you're a vegetarian.

Let's turn it around and imagine that, to fungus people, humans are as delicious as we find a portobello or truffle. We're like their delicacies, only to be consumed on rare occasions or at banquets.

JasonK

02-07-2009 06:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9946935)

Good idea, Forest Myconids would definitely work. Maybe they have a symbiotic relationship with some of the harmless fey races - those mushrooms you see forest gnomes sitting on may actually be sapient.

My instinct in D&D is always to take the huge array of creature types/origins and reduce their number to something more... mythically manageable, I suppose you'd say. Consequently, in most game worlds I've made, plant creatures are fey-types. Myconids are no exception to this rule.

- jasön

Sleeper

02-07-2009 09:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I like the idea of forest-fungi and corruption. Very Nausicaä of the Valley of the Wind, though I wouldn't hammer home the ecological themes quite as hard as Miyazaki.

kami2awa

02-07-2009 10:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH (Post 9945783)

I dunno, isn't this part of the Hopping Vampire schtick? You could have some serious fun with something so apparently silly, especially if it's very difficult to injure but is otherwise limited to headbutting people. Imagine PCs blinking confusedly at the hopping mummy, looting the tomb blind and walking briskly out of the pyramid while this thing hops slowly after them. And then, six weeks later, there's a thump-thump-thump in the street outside the tavern where they're living it large...

That's pretty scary if played the right way. The mummy might have unnatural strength and speed, and huge, distended Imhotep jaws making it very nasty even while wrapped up.

Kakita Kojiro

02-08-2009 03:02 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9946958)

Technically fungi are an entire Kingdom, so one species eating another is no different from a human eating a cow, fish or grasshopper. Which I suppose is creepy if you're a vegetarian.

Fungi often thrive symbiotically or parasitically, even on other fungi, so I'm not certain if Myconids would regard food in the same manner as humans might. Humans have an aversion to eating human flesh as unnatural -- myconids might think you're weird for not recycling granny.

And although the fungus men grow other fungi -- do we know they do so to eat them, or to make fungal potions? Myconids could probably subsist on any sort of rotting vegetation or flesh; they've probably got quite a lot of extra time on their hands, not having to hunt or farm, for raising 'shrooms and chillin' out.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9947245)

I like the idea of forest-fungi and corruption. Very Nausicaä of the Valley of the Wind, though I wouldn't hammer home the ecological themes quite as hard as Miyazaki.

I never finished it, but I have an unfinished project for building a Nausicaa-like area into the world of Mystara, set on Southern Skothar, east of Minea.

It was around 3060 BC that the government of Kaloondland began the 'Land Reclamation Project'. This was an effort to develop ways to render the land habitable, so that it could be used for farming once the mines finally all gave out. In the cooler northern (now western) regions, some progress was made in cleansing the waters and developing irrigated farms. In the very heart of the Yuila al Kaloond, a group of magitechnicians began experimenting with life forms which would consume polluted soil and water and convert it to fertile soil.

One year before the Great Rain of Fire, it was announced that a ten year project by these technicians was proving to be a great success. While the process of cleansing would be slow, a large swathe of land could be purified by the time the mines ran out, if currently projected figures proved accurate. Weeks before the Great Rain of Fire, the go-ahead was given to begin the project on a large scale in the center of the region. Exactly one week before the Great Rain of Fire, the seeding of a 400 square mile region was complete, and the supplies had been put in place to extend the project.

And then civilization died screaming. The Great Rain of Fire was the result of a chain reaction involving the igniting of most of the deposits of utherite on the planet. The basic problem was that the Blackmoorian civilization had developed powerful 'reactors', which converted utherite into magical energy, which could then be used to power various devices which blended alien technology and mortal magic. Utherite itself is normally quite stable.

However, under certain conditions, it could create a chain reaction like that which modern world scientists feared would result in our world if atomic bombs were detonated. Reactors had blown before without causing disasters, but the one in Blackmoor City itself was the largest of its kind, and Blackmoor City had six more huge ones. The result was a chain reaction strong enough to ignite the entire layer of utherite that lay under most of the Kingdom of Blackmoor.

And when that went up, it sent a wave of magical energy across the entire planet, energy trapped by the skyshield and redirected down onto the planet, the Great Rain of Fire. Worst of all for the people of the Yuila al Kaloond, the Great Rain of Fire ignited all of the utherite remaining in their lands. The major cities, built over undiscovered deep strata of utherite, were blown sky high within two days of the beginning of the Great Rain of Fire. The minor cities perished in explosions, steppe fires, and fire from heaven. The survivors found that many of their devices no longer worked because every reactor had become a crater, although stored energy survived.

Further disasters scourged the land in the years to come. The shifting of the axis caused disastrous storms and freak weather for decades in the wake of the Great Rain of Fire, and many creatures were strangely mutated by the Great Rain and by the massive detonation of utherite. Even more of the land became polluted waste; it was at this time that the Keres changed their name to 'Waros', which means survivors in their tongue, and dubbed the land that had once been theirs as 'Drakhaba al Kaloond', the Sea of Corruption.

The Waros were few in number, and the after effects of the Great Rain made them even fewer. But slowly they began to flourish. Most of them had abandoned their nomadic ways under pressure from the Blackmoorians, and their coastal region, which was now on the southern side of Drakhaba al Kaloond, became a land of stubborn farmers and tough warriors. The boldest of them returned to the way of the horse and moved into the interior, learning how to survive among the wastes.

It was they who brought back the news of the 'Virik al Ragoon', the 'Forest of Fungus', which was gradually growing in the heart of the Drakhaba al Kaloon. It was a strangely pale land of huge intertwined 'fungal' growths and insects which dwelt within it, led and guarded by the powerful 'Ragoon al Asagir', the 'Wise Ones of the Forest', huge armored insects the size of a small village. The forest was filled with a strange miasma which would slay the unwary and careless. The explorers came to call themselves 'Sebgir', or 'Daring Ones', and learned how to survive briefly in the forest, and fairly well among the devastated lands, which in some places were beginning to heal, although many remained dangerous.

Over the centuries, the Waros farmers, and the Sebgir nomads split apart, and began to war with each other. The Waros built a series of short-lived empires which repeatedly crumbled into city states, sometimes falling prey to conquest by Sebgir tribes. They traded by sea with the Tanagoro, Jennites, and the tribes of what is now Minea.

This might have continued forever, except for two things. First, the Sebgir became concerned when it finally sank in that the Virik al Ragoon was growing ever so slowly, consuming more and more of their land. Secondly, the forces of the Sakhalian empire pushed around the northern and southern ends of the Virik al Ragoon and began to conquer their lands.

The Sakhalians were descended from the humans and dwarves who had lived on the eastern (now northern) coast of the Drakhaba al Kaloon. The dwarves had largely died out, but the survivors were a tough and sturdy stock much like the ones altered by Kagyar on Brun. The humans had become tougher as well, nearly immune to disease. Most were descended from the bands of slaves who had survived the disaster, with a small intermixture of Blackmoorians. Led by the most recently enslaved, who still possessed the low tech survival skills of their ancestors, they had slowly and painfully dragged their way up from the stone age to the Iron Age by 1000 BC, then began to explore the ruins beneath their cities and scattered across the plains south of them.

By 500 BC, the Sakhalin Empire had arisen. It combined Iron Age technology, skillful magic, and salvaged Blackmoorian magitech in its arsenal. They found undetonated Utherite deposits in the mountains, which had been shielded from the global chain reaction by the bulk of normal rock above them. These deposits were small, but enough for them to turn their capital, Sakhalin, into a wonder of the world. Their forces now swept across the rest of the Drakhaba al Kaloon, conquering it.

They integrated the lore of the Sebgir into their arsenal, and swept down, conquering the Waros farmers in a series of fierce wars. Their armies pushed into Tanagoro and the Jennite lands as well, and by 350 BC, they had become a mighty empire. They began to exploit the creatures of the Virik al Ragoon for their own benefit, especially the Ragoon al Asagir, whose shells could be used to make nearly indestructible armor and weapons.

It was in 333 BC, in the reign of Tekhmet the Magnificent (called by later times, Tekhmet the Fool), that the time of Sakhalin greatness came to an end. Tekhmet saw the Virik al Ragoon as an abomination, and its continued growth as a direct insult to himself. Was he not the ruler of the greatest empire of the world? (Rumors of Alphatia that drifted in from the Jennites were ignored.) Had he not forced the God King of Eryos in Tangor to submit? Had not the Jennites been forced to kneel? And yet this forest deadly to man sat in the heart of his empire, nibbling away at it.

And so, egged on by the priests of Ixion, he decided to burn it. On the first of Fyrmont, his armies attacked the forest. And the forest struck back in the first known example of what is now known as 'the Daikasho', the 'fatal onslaught'. Thousands of Ragoon al Asagir swept out of the forest, attacking and destroying much of his forces. They swept east and north across the thinly populated regions between the Virik al Ragoon and the heartland of the empire beyond the mountains. None reached the mountains; his armies managed to slay many, and others seemed to die once they went too far from the forest. Still, they buried many of the old cities which had been resettled by the Sakhalin, and spores fell from their bodies. From those spores grew fresh forest, and the Virik al Ragoon swelled to several times its former size.

The Sakhalin empire collapsed. The Sebgir revolted in alliance with the Waros and drove them from the west and south. The dwarves revolted, cutting off the Utherite supplies, and the Blackmoorian devices of Sakhalin failed. Sakhalin broke apart into squabbling states which periodically reunited into brief-lived empires.

The eastern and northern fringes of the Drakhaba al Kaloon became the home of many squabbling city states, much like the southern region of the Waros, but slightly higher in technological level. Most of these states could boast a handful of functional Blackmoorian devices, pried from ruins and carefully maintained. The dwarves gained a powerful economic position from their control of access to Utherite.

The third and most recent Daikasho came around 500 AC, when a powerful Waros leader, Nimrod the Great, united the Waros lands and conquered the Sebgir. He then began to exploit the Rigoon al Asagir to arm his troops. They had begun to conquer the remnants of the Sakhalin states when the Rigoon al Asagir had enough and unleashed the Daikasho across much of the Sebgir lands. This happened during a major troop movement, and the Waros emperor was slain. The Sebgir came close to extinction, and the Virik al Ragoon now reached the border of the Waros lands.

Around 700 AC, Tangoro sea raiders began to harass the coast of Waros, which was sunk into another period of squabbling states. One foolish ruler invited a group of Tangoro raiders, the Taymor, to settle along the coast of his lands, hoping to get them to stop the others. Instead, they conquered his kingdom, and with the help of more raiders, conquered the others as well. Some of the nobles of the kingdoms escaped to the northwest, and joined with the remains of the Sebgir, who had settled down into a series of small farming communities in the small islands of healthy land which dot the western and northern fringes of the Drakhaba al Kaloon. These became known as the 'Valley Kingdoms', and were forced to swear fealty to the 'Taylin Heptarchy', a collection of seven kingdoms dominated by a Tangoro-derived ruling class and led by the High King of the Taylin.

Around the same time, a mysterious figure who called himself 'the Holy Emperor' appeared in the lands of the Sakhaba (the human survivors of the fallen Sakhalin Empire). He possessed a great knowledge of Blackmoor's secrets, and he used those to gradually forge 'the Holy Empire of Sakhaba', which he ruled, apparently without aging, from New Sakhalin, built on the ruins of the old.

This took him centuries, during which the Heptarchy of Taylin consolidated its power and began to become a more consolidated state. For a hundred years, the Heptarchy and the Holy Empire have sparred around the fringes of the Virik al Ragoon with each other. With the forest in the way, neither has been able to wage a truly successful war, and the continuing wasteland status of the whole area has hampered matters as well.

Currently, the land is at a fragile peace which may shatter as soon as one side or the other feels driven by the continued slow growth of the Virik al Ragoon to make war on each other once more. Both states press against the Jen and the Tangor states, seeking further room to grow beyond the wastes, but also seeking control of the wastelands, which still contain much valuable lore and provide access to the dangerous resources of the Virik al Ragoon. Neither can afford to let the other have sole access to the forest, and thus they struggle for lands hardly worth the battle. War seems inevitable, but ever more futile.

Further complicating matters, however, are whispers of the birth of a Holy Messenger, sent by the Immortals to finally bring peace between humans and the Virik al Ragoon, who will unite the lands and cleanse them, bringing about a new age of peace. Only time will tell if this is truth or a hopeful lie.

I think it would be pretty cool if I could ever find the time to finish it.

Just to bring things back to the Myconids, they'd fit into this by being the mutated descendents of the technicians caught in the place by the big boom; the Drakhaba Al Kaloon is now creating their perfect world, and the Rigoon al Asagir protect them. But of course, invaders still try to find them and rob their various fungal concoctions...

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Naga

I'll do all the Nagas in one go; they're pretty interesting but not that interesting.

Nagas are essentially big snakes with human heads, who have powerful magical abilities and enjoy meditation, learning languages (they can speak at least four) and setting traps for humanoid creatures. They have poisonous bites and the biggest ones can constrict. We see in their entry a welcome return for the Monster Armour trope: their hides can be made into scale mail (natch) +2.

Nagas are very long lived and thus a great source of information on the areas surrounding their lair. I like the idea of a giant snake meditating in some Himalayan mountain valley or hidden cave, waiting for hardy adventurers to come and consult with them. Why do sages and wise men have to be humans, anyway?

Hey, the boss of the Royal Teratological Society could be a Naga!

Guardian Naga

Guardian Nagas are one of the rare instances of a mean Lawful Good creature - i.e. one which doesn't seem to mind spitting poison about and killing people. If only Kirin, Lammasu and the like were like that. They often find employment as - shock! - guardians for treasure and so forth.

Spirit Naga

These Chaotic Evil Nagas like killing people even more than the Guardians do; their hobby is setting traps around their territory, but they can also charm with their gaze and bite to inject poison - although weirdly there's no information about what the poison does. Their favourite food is rotting flesh, so you know they're evil.

Water Naga

As you would expect, these live in freshwater bodies and like to keep to themselves. I imagine one living in a pool at the base of a waterfall, completely inaccessible to outsiders except for those willing to abseil down a sheer rockface and risk drowning at the bottom.

Dark Naga

Dark Nagas get their own entry in the MM, but not their own post in this thread, as I suspect discussion about them can be folded into that of Nagas generally. Dark Nagas are mainly distinguished from other kinds by having a special sac for storing items within their bodies, and continual ESP. Unlike the other kinds of Naga, which like to keep themselves to themselves, Dark Nagas don't mind commanding evil humanoids, and seem geared to be a kind of lieutenant for a BBEG in a campaign.

The Last Conformist

02-09-2009 05:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9953977)

Why do sages and wise men have to be humans, anyway?

Because if they were nagas they'd be snages and wise wyrms. :p

migo

02-09-2009 06:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9946958)

Technically fungi are an entire Kingdom, so one species eating another is no different from a human eating a cow, fish or grasshopper. Which I suppose is creepy if you're a vegetarian.

Let's turn it around and imagine that, to fungus people, humans are as delicious as we find a portobello or truffle. We're like their delicacies, only to be consumed on rare occasions or at banquets.

Good point. I wasn't thinking about the 5 kingdoms. In that case it works fine.

Wakboth

02-09-2009 06:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9953977)

Why do sages and wise men have to be humans, anyway?

Hey, the boss of the Royal Teratological Society could be a Naga!

Guardian and water nagas are among the more easily "civilized" monsters, IMO. In a Planescape game, I had a Sigilian dance hall that was owned and operated by a family of water nagas.

Gynosphinxes also make very good sages and such.

DMH

02-09-2009 11:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Spirit nagas are nasty because the charm effect can't be broken by the victim after the initial failed save. Some one could be a slave to a spirit naga for decades (or longer for elves and dwarves).

I like water nagas because they are decent alienish people. How does a fish/snake/human think? The one time I used them was as opponents of a lake dwelling mer tribe. Both were created by a wizard long before the campaign and each attempted to do the master's will (breeding his other monsters) even though he had died centuries before.

Unlike the guardian and spirit, I can see water nagas taking class levels (druid or ranger).

Sleeper

02-09-2009 11:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9954136)

Guardian and water nagas are among the more easily "civilized" monsters, IMO. In a Planescape game, I had a Sigilian dance hall that was owned and operated by a family of water nagas.

With good special effects and choreography, that would make an awesome backdrop for a movie. Nagas undulating, intertwining. Shimmering scales, looping coils, human yet alien eyes. Men and women of various races leaping, twisting, gesturing; everything from the formal to the frenzied to the erotic. Bellydances to ballroom to body slams. Could be hypnotic.

6inTruder

02-10-2009 03:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

ooh! Dark Naga, one of my single favourite monsters in that book! (though I'm not over keen on their 4ed version)

Why do I like them? Because they're like a REALLY weird evil adventurer. I think they equivelent out to about 3rd or 4th level magic-user (it's the second half of their Habitat/Society entry), and I like this bit in their ecology...

Quote:

Dark nagas spend their lives outwardly working with, or serving, others. Whenever possible, however, they also pursue private goals, which may be as whimsical and odd as some human goals ("cover this desert valley with trees, for instance), but always include increasing their personal power by acquiring new spells and magical items.

Also the Ditelizzi picture. Which rocks.

Wakboth

02-10-2009 03:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9955026)

With good special effects and choreography, that would make an awesome backdrop for a movie. Nagas undulating intertwining. Shimmering scales, looping coils, human yet alien eyes. Men and women of various races leaping, twisting, gesturing; everything from the formal to the frenzied to the erotic. Bellydances to ballroom to body slams. Could be hypnotic.

Yup, that was pretty much what I had in mind. I always liked to use monsters like that in PS; the setting seemed tailor-made to have oddball stuff like that.

EmperorSeth

02-10-2009 05:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by migo (Post 9954116)

Good point. I wasn't thinking about the 5 kingdoms. In that case it works fine.

Five?

I only remember using one Naga in my games, and it was a good Guardian. He was one of many monsters that secretly worked for a local prime minister. He was guarding an artifact the party had to retrieve when another monster rose up and ate it! It mostly spent the fight flitting about casting spells, but at one point it noticed a target (the monster had multiple parts, healing through attached "roots,") had DR and the party was totally failing to get through. So it said "screw it" and went crazy with its bite.

demiurge1138

02-10-2009 06:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 9956628)

Five?

The "five kingdoms" model consists of Monera, Fungi, Plantae, Animalia and Protista. It's been pretty much discarded for the three domains--Bacteria, Archaea and Eukaryota--with Fungi, Animals and Plants as three lineages within the eukaryotes and protists as any eukaryote which doesn't fit into those three neat categories.

Anyway. Nagas?

I never got why dark nagas were the ones that got their own separate entry. It seems that any of the four naga species would have benefited from a full page. Were dark nagas originally introduced separately or something?

JRM

02-10-2009 06:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9953977)

Naga

Dark Naga

Dark Nagas get their own entry in the MM, but not their own post in this thread, as I suspect discussion about them can be folded into that of Nagas generally. Dark Nagas are mainly distinguished from other kinds by having a special sac for storing items within their bodies, and continual ESP. Unlike the other kinds of Naga, which like to keep themselves to themselves, Dark Nagas don't mind commanding evil humanoids, and seem geared to be a kind of lieutenant for a BBEG in a campaign.

I believe the reason Dark Nagas have their own entry is a carry-over from how they were originally published. In the 1E Monster Manual (and the 2E Monstrous Compendium IIRC) the Naga entry only has the Guardian, Spirit and Water Naga. The Dark Naga appeared in a later supplement (MM2 in 1E unless I'm mistaken, one of the Appendixes for 2E). Thus, it was easier to simply reprint the original pages with the Dark Naga as its own entry and the other three nagas lumped together in one entry rather than re-edit them into one entry.

Getting back to topic, most uses of Nagas I've seen in D&D they're been solitary or small groups of monsters, with few links to other creatures. Even the aforementioned habit of Dark Nagas acting as a master villain's lieutenant hasn't been something I've seen in play very much. However, in Indian mythology nagas are sometimes very social creatures, living in cities and even Kingdoms of their own kind - usually these are the "hidden underwater kingdom" kind of thing, which I guess would make them Water Nagas in AD&D terms. Furthermore, some nagas could shapechange into human form and would even marry and have offspring with humans.

Surely there's material for an AD&D session here - have a Kingdom of the Naga, maybe the naga are just the ruling class, and the bulk of the population are reptilian humanoids of various kinds. I'd dump the default alignments, so that Guardian Naga vizier you must deal with to get your audience with the Queen is just as likely to be a scheming LE villain as the traditional LG. (Well he's a vizier, it'd be an insult to tradition for him not to be a scheming LE villain ;)). I'd probably add a few other kinds of naga, like a "Royal Naga" (innate shapeshift to human form, higher level spellcasting, has the charm & venom of a Spirit Naga and the powerful bite & constricting tail of a Guardian Naga) and maybe a "common naga" that only has 5-6 HD and lacks a poisonous bite. (Perhaps these are lizard men who have been given this shape as a reward by the Nagas, who believe they may be reincarnated as the the next stage up the naga hierarchy if they lead exemplary lives?)

Sleeper

02-10-2009 07:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9956892)

I believe the reason Dark Nagas have their own entry is a carry-over from how they were originally published. In the 1E Monster Manual (and the 2E Monstrous Compendium IIRC) the Naga entry only has the Guardian, Spirit and Water Naga. The Dark Naga appeared in a later supplement (MM2 in 1E unless I'm mistaken, one of the Appendixes for 2E). Thus, it was easier to simply reprint the original pages with the Dark Naga as its own entry and the other three nagas lumped together in one entry rather than re-edit them into one entry.

Not quite. Water, guardian, and spirit nagas date all the way back to OD&D (The Strategic Review #3's "Creature Feature" in 1975, and then Supplement IV), whereas the dark naga first appeared in Dragon #89's "Creature Catalog" in 1984 (there weren't any nagas in MM2). Unlike their kin, dark nagas were then hidden away for most of 2nd edition in the Forgotten Realms supplements, until they were folded into the Monstrous Manual. I always felt the dark naga was completely unnecessary. There's really no need for another one dimensional and cartoonishly evil monster, especially when the original three already covered that niche with considerably more subtlety. I definitely got a distinct sword & sorcery vibe from the first three. I can easily see them appearing in one of the morally ambiguous Conan stories. An abandoned citadel of a lost people, or a temple of a forgotten god. Relics of ancient and inhuman power, or deceitfully deadly treasure. Servant or slave of a wicked sorcerer, or the veiled power behind a priesthood.

Wakshaani

02-10-2009 07:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9956892)

Surely there's material for an AD&D session here - have a Kingdom of the Naga, maybe the naga are just the ruling class, and the bulk of the population are reptilian humanoids of various kinds. I'd dump the default alignments, so that Guardian Naga vizier you must deal with to get your audience with the Queen is just as likely to be a scheming LE villain as the traditional LG. (Well he's a vizier, it'd be an insult to tradition for him not to be a scheming LE villain ;)). I'd probably add a few other kinds of naga, like a "Royal Naga" (innate shapeshift to human form, higher level spellcasting, has the charm & venom of a Spirit Naga and the powerful bite & constricting tail of a Guardian Naga) and maybe a "common naga" that only has 5-6 HD and lacks a poisonous bite. (Perhaps these are lizard men who have been given this shape as a reward by the Nagas, who believe they may be reincarnated as the the next stage up the naga hierarchy if they lead exemplary lives?)

Naga, meet Yaun-Ti; Yaun-Ti, meet Naga.

There's another Naga introduced in 3.5's miniatures Handbook, a Bright Naga, which is, by far and away, teh weakest of teh set, lacking poison in the bite attack and only being able to cast a single 1st level spell as a 3rd level Sorcerer. Poor lil' guy! (My party'll be fighting one in a week and a half, mind you.)

Still, there's lots of untapped love, here, for non-lizard reptilian goodness.

JRM

02-10-2009 08:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9956982)

Not quite. Water, guardian, and spirit nagas date all the way back to OD&D (The Strategic Review #3's "Creature Feature" in 1975, and then Supplement IV), whereas the dark naga first appeared in Dragon #89's "Creature Catalog" in 1984 (there weren't any nagas in MM2). Unlike their kin, dark nagas were then hidden away for most of 2nd edition in the Forgotten Realms supplements, until they were folded into the Monstrous Manual. I always felt the dark naga was completely unnecessary. There's really no need for another one dimensional and cartoonishly evil monster, especially when the original three already covered that niche with considerably more subtlety. I definitely got a distinct sword & sorcery vibe from the first three. I can easily see them appearing in one of the morally ambiguous Conan stories. An abandoned citadel of a lost people, or a temple of a forgotten god. Relics of ancient and inhuman power, or deceitfully deadly treasure. Servant or slave of a wicked sorcerer, or the veiled power behind a priesthood.

Ta Sleeper, I couldn't be bothered looking them up so just called on my fading memory. The annoying thing is I've got both those products (pdf for the Strategic Review, hardcopy & pdf for the Dragon), and as soon as you mentioned the source this little virtual lightbulb went on over my head as I remembered reading them.

As for Nagas in morally ambiguous Conan stories, Robert E Howard beat you to it in The God in the Bowl, or is that what you were referring to? Although, I suppose in D&D terms that monster would have been an Undead Naga, since it was entombed in a bowl-shaped sarcophagus.

6inTruder

02-10-2009 08:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Oh, and for records (or at least to the best of my knowledge) the Dark Naga came from the second FRC.

JRM

02-10-2009 08:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9957063)
Naga, meet Yaun-Ti; Yaun-Ti, meet Naga.

Yes, I thought about mentioning the Yuan-Ti but decided against it. I think of them as a corrupted mongrel descendants of a serpentine (or snake worshipping) civilization, while the Naga Kingdom I was imagining was more a "hidden eldritch kingdom" kind of deal, like an underworld drow city but underwater and not evil, or maybe just not all evil.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9957063)
There's another Naga introduced in 3.5's miniatures Handbook, a Bright Naga, which is, by far and away, teh weakest of teh set, lacking poison in the bite attack and only being able to cast a single 1st level spell as a 3rd level Sorcerer. Poor lil' guy! (My party'll be fighting one in a week and a half, mind you.)

First time I've heard of the Bright Naga, but it makes sense to have a low CR naga.

Hmm, maybe Bright Naga are not a separate species, but are just kids who haven't learned to fight or cast spells as well as the full-grown Nagas. For that matter, maybe the three original kinds of nagas are not different species but are more like classes (equivalent to a Water-Wizard, Priest and Sorcerer for Water, Guardian and Spirit Naga?), while the Dark Naga is a separate species, which would explain it having a tail-sting unlike the other nagas.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9957063)
Still, there's lots of untapped love, here, for non-lizard reptilian goodness.

Oh yes, I'm trying to decide how Coatls would fit into this Naga kingdom. Maybe the Nagas see them as messengers of the Snake Goddess, their equivalent of angels?

Sleeper

02-10-2009 09:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9957281)
As for Nagas in morally ambiguous Conan stories, Robert E Howard beat you to it in The God in the Bowl, or is that what you were referring to? Although, I suppose in D&D terms that monster would have been an Undead Naga, since it was entombed in a bowl-shaped sarcophagus.

I vaguely remembered a story, though not the title. But I was trying to make a more general point. One specific story is too confining. There are many possibilities.

YojimboC

02-10-2009 10:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

This puts me in mind of the great Naga-Rakshasha Wars of the Second Age (after the lizardfolk, bullywug, and yellow mold kingdoms collapsed). Throw in some Sahuagin (Daityas by another name?) for flavor.

YojimboC

02-12-2009 02:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Or, y'know, something cooler. :(

Hey, how about those gnolls, huh? Everybody loves those guys!

Mr. Teapot

02-12-2009 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

RE: Myconids

One thing that occurs to me about Myconids is that the largest living thing on earth is (debatably) a series of mushrooms, which were shown to all be one entity that spanned acres.

Perhaps the Myconids aren't a colony of individual fungus-men. They're just a single giant fungus man, who humans mistake for a lot of human sized fungus men.

There's an issue of them no being physically connected, but in D&D they could all be a contiguous mass on the Ethereal or Astral plane or something. Or all be clones of one master Myconid (the aforementioned Myconid king). Or all controlled by a single consciousness.

A bit late, though, I know.

Sleeper

02-12-2009 04:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9966108)

RE: Myconids

One thing that occurs to me about Myconids is that the largest living thing on earth is (debatably) a series of mushrooms, which were shown to all be one entity that spanned acres.

Perhaps the Myconids aren't a colony of individual fungus-men. They're just a single giant fungus man, who humans mistake for a lot of human sized fungus men.

There's an issue of them no being physically connected, but in D&D they could all be a contiguous mass on the Ethereal or Astral plane or something. Or all be clones of one master Myconid (the aforementioned Myconid king). Or all controlled by a single consciousness.

To run with that a little, the majority of the biomass within the fungal colony is underground. We never see it, buried and running shoe-lace like runners between the tree roots. Only the fruiting bodies (mushrooms) are visible, where they sprout and grow from the trees.

Perhaps that why we don't see myconids outside their colonies. Buried deep in the loam beneath their shadowed forest dwellings, or within the walls of a cavern system of dirt and dangling roots, is the true myconid. The colony. What we can "myconids" are just the fruiting bodies. The sex organs, as it were. Spreading spores, sprouting. Mobile, but limited. Because they need to stay connected. Those dangling strands and fibrous tendrils hanging from the ceilings and running underfoot are rhizomorphs, and a dozen run into each mobile myconid. Their connection, their very life depends on it; but it is also a tether. They cannot leave the colony. They cannot even cross the colony. Each has its own limited range.

The only tetherless myconid is the king. Rhizomorphs severed, separated from the dreaming consciousness of the greater myconid that surrounds it, it becomes capable of wandering the entire colony, even leaving. But perishing, soon to die. Their ambassador, envoy, even assassin. But also a fruit, dropped from the tree, doomed to rot and die. How silly that these outsiders, these silly plants and animals, called it "king".

noisms

02-12-2009 09:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Neogi

Neogi are one of my all time favourite D&D races in theory, but I don't believe I've ever managed to get around to using them in a game. I'm really not sure why, because they make for a great unified BBEG. I'd even like to throw away the line that they only live in "very remote locations, deep beneath the earth, or among the farthest stars" - how cool would it be to have a Neogi empire as one of the main polities in a homebrew world?

Neogi have the early sci-fi feel of many Spelljammer monsters, the way each has a personal Umber Hulk slave, and a liking for colourful fashion, and a tendency to develop into a great fat ant-Queen type monstrosity as it ages. Even Neogi's half-moray eel half-spider appearance is way more gonzo than what you typically find in D&D. It's all good stuff.

The way Neogi reproduce is nicely grotesque too: being poisoned and fattened until you explode and release a new batch of children who then fight to the death is hardly ideal from a personal point of view, but a great vignette for an adventure. The brave heroes fight their way through to the middle of the Neogi city, whereupon they discover... a huge Neogi who explodes and releases a host of newly born killing machines.

Reaver

A Neogi Reaver is one who has decided to escape the fate of becoming a Great Old Master and turned outcast. That in itself is a good adventure hook - the Reaver could offer all kinds of rewards in return for the protection of the heroes... but of course, with a catch.

Thane of Fife

02-12-2009 09:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I could never quite reconcile the fact that Neogi are 3 feet tall with their having 5 Hit Dice. Giant Spiders had to be somewhere around 12' in diameter before qualifying for that many hit dice.

But I agree that they were fascinating as alien villains.

6inTruder

02-12-2009 10:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Do people prefer their Neogi handless, as these are; or with rudimentary hands, like in 3ed?

Personally I like these way more. Or at least a little bit. Just seem more alien (and I like the literal eel stuck to a spider look).

demiurge1138

02-12-2009 10:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I've always thought of the neogi as with hands.

That way, I can give them ray-guns.

Wakboth

02-12-2009 03:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I definitely think of Neogi as having small, dextrous hands (maybe the claws in their front legs?). They're good at fiddly stuff, bad at carrying or pushing big things... but that's what they've got the Umber Hulks for!

Have any of you read Neal Asher's Polity series? I think the Neogi, with their callous cruelty and paranoia, and slave-driving ways, are a pretty good match for Spelljammer Prador, minus the whole "honking big, psychopathic space-crab with very hard armor" thing... but again, that's what they've got the Umber Hulks for! :D

demiurge1138

02-12-2009 04:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Oh! Oh! I came to a realization about neogi somewhere around "grell" in this series, and I almost forgot it!

The neogi are the D&D versions of the Skeksis from The Dark Crystal.

They are decadent slave-takers who believe that might makes right. Their society is full of weird trials to prove their own superiority. They rely on enormous insectile beasts for heavy lifting and for defense. The Skeksis drain life from their slaves to stay young; the neogi drain life from their slaves to power their ships.

noisms

02-12-2009 05:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 9967571)

I could never quite reconcile the fact that Neogi are 3 feet tall with their having 5 Hit Dice. Giant Spiders had to be somewhere around 12' in diameter before qualifying for that many hit dice.

But I agree that they were fascinating as alien villains.

Yeah, I prefer to imagine my Neogi being 5' tall at least. It's hard to take them seriously if they're only 3'.

EmperorSeth

02-13-2009 05:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9968953)

Yeah, I prefer to imagine my Neogi being 5' tall at least. It's hard to take them seriously if they're only 3'.

I figure it just makes them work more as evil masterminds. They're not supposed to engage the party up close; they're supposed to hang in the back while their umberhulks and other slaves do the fighting. If they're in 4th edition, they're probably artillery or controllers.

Let me check...

Nope, not even in the book. Well, still, I bet the default Neogi's better at keeping his distance while fighting.

Checking again...

Nope, not really. Honestly, their powers kind of suck. They slow with a bite? Yay. Well, all the more reason to hide from enemies and chomp on fools who get close, I guess.

Mr. Teapot

02-13-2009 06:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9967378)

Neogi

Neogi are one of my all time favourite D&D races in theory, but I don't believe I've ever managed to get around to using them in a game.

Neogi are good villains. Besides the weird alien physical form, they have a weird alien culture entirely based on slavery (which is clearly evil, clearly distinct from humanoid cultures but still comprehensible and playable at the game table).

And the fact that Neogi themselves fear their own reproductive methods? That's cool, and creepy. Probably implausible, but cool and creepy.

We had a Neogi show up in our game that was supposed to become a 3rd/4th ed Spelljammer game, but never got very far off the ground. The Neogi in question hired the PCs to free a city from a gang of mind flayer tyrannical overlords. We did so, but having an evil, vicious and cruel little spider monster as our patron was very interesting. And fun, in that the good aligned PCs had some moral uncertainty about helping the little bugger. My former slave warrior wanted to kill the mind flayers, then go kill the Neogi (or vice versa), but we couldn't find him once we freed the city.

(We did kill another Neogi and claim his spelljamming vessel and his Umber Hulks, on the way to the illithid city. The Umber Hulks decided they were our slaves now; the PCs tried and failed to dissuade them of this.)

But using Neogi as shadowy patrons, morally ambiguous allies and manipulators behind the scenes has a lot of potential.

Wakshaani

02-13-2009 07:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 9971390)

I figure it just makes them work more as evil masterminds. They're not supposed to engage the party up close; they're supposed to hang in the back while their umberhulks and other slaves do the fighting. If they're in 4th edition they're probably artillery or controllers.

Never used 'em (Too Spelljammer-y), but, I have no problem with a 3' tall guy with giant thugs... Neogi with UMBER Hulks, Halfling hitmen with Half-Orc muscle, and, of course, this guy:

<http://looney.goldenagecartoons.com/tv/bbrr/thugs.jpg>

Ragnarok_Engine

02-13-2009 10:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 9968865)

Oh! Oh! I came to a realization about neogi somewhere around "grell" in this series, and I almost forgot it!

The neogi are the D&D versions of the Skeksis from The Dark Crystal.

They are decadent slave-takers who believe that might makes right. Their society is full of weird trials to prove their own superiority. They rely on enormous insectile beasts for heavy lifting and for defense. The Skeksis drain life from their slaves to stay young; the neogi drain life from their slaves to power their ships.

Whenever I thought about neogi, I could never get the image of Mojo from New Mutants out of my head. So, not only were they creepy slave-keeping spider-eel people, but they also had an unhealthy fascination with bloodsports involving sentients.

http://images2.wikia.nocookie.net/ma...a/Mojo_001.jpg

JRM

02-14-2009 04:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9966108)

SNIP

Perhaps the Myconids aren't a colony of individual fungus-men. They're just a single giant fungus man, who humans mistake for a lot of human sized fungus men.

There's an issue of them no being physically connected, but in D&D they could all be a contiguous mass on the Ethereal or Astral plane or something. Or all be clones of one master Myconid (the aforementioned Myconid king). C all controlled by a single consciousness.

SNIP

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 9966404)

To run with that a little, the majority of the biomass within the fungal colony is underground. We never see it, buried and running shoe-lace like runners between the tree roots. Only the fruiting bodies (mushrooms) are visible, where they sprout and grow from the trees.

Perhaps that why we don't see myconids outside their colonies. Buried deep in the loam beneath their shadowed forest dwellings, or within the walls of a cavern system of dirt and dangling roots, is the true myconid. The colony. What we can "myconids" are just the fruiting bodies. The sex organs, as it were. Spreading spores, sprouting. Mobile but limited. Because they need to stay connected. Those dangling strands and fibrous tendrils hanging from the ceilings and running underfoot are rhizomorphs, and a dozen run into each mobile myconid. Their connection, their very life depends on it; but it is also a tether. They cannot leave the colony. They cannot even cross the colony. Each has its own limited range.

The only tetherless myconid is the king. Rhizomorphs severed, separated from the dreaming consciousness of the greater myconid that surrounds it, it becomes capable of wandering the entire colony, even leaving. But perishing, soon to die. Their ambassador, envoy, even assassin. But also a fruit, dropped from the tree, doomed to rot and die. How silly that these outsiders, these silly plants and animals, called it "king".

Great minds think alike! I was having very similar thoughts a couple of days ago, but didn't have access to the computer at the time so left off posting it.

Anyhows, my idea was that as mushroom circles are formed at the edge of a rhizome-mass, maybe each "circle" of Myconids is a separate individual with twenty bodies, so a Myconid settlement has only a handful of individual fungusfolk in it. The Circles, linked to their underground main masses, are each one individual, plus the autonomous King.

When a circle of myconids does its eight hours of 'melding' they are integrating with each other through their main rhizome mass, literally plugging into it with their feet. Without this integration the semi-anthropoid fungus men lose their minds and then their lives, and the underground rhizome mass is denied the food that the fungus-men transfer to it with their feet, so it would eventually die as well. If some of the humanoid myconids die, the main mass can just regrow them, since a circle shares memories among itself they will usually only lose the few hours of memory from after the last time the dead body's downloaded and a bit of bodymass, and maybe not even that if the Myconids recover the dead bodies of their fallen selves.

I'd think the Myconid rhizome masses are only a small portion of the fungal life in a colony, there'd be lots of other symbiotic and commensal fungal life forms which perform important functions for the colony - crops, livestock, shelter, tools or weapons/guardians. There are plenty of dangerous ambulatory fungi in D&D that the Myconids could co-opt to their service.

The King is a walking rhizome mass, able to act without melding for a long time and seek out places to establish new colonies. Maybe it's not so much a monarch, as a child. When it finds a suitable spot, it roots itself into the ground and spreads out as a new Circle, becoming an adult Myconid.

JRM

02-14-2009 04:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9971580)

And the fact that Neogi themselves fear their own reproductive methods? That's cool, and creepy. Probably implausible, but cool and creepy.

What do you find implausible about it? Having an alien species which dies after spawning offspring isn't that fantastic, although one were the offspring apparently parasitize their parent is a nasty twist. Presumably on the neogi homeworld there are many other lifeforms that reproduce in this fashion but just lack the sentience to comprehend their reproductive habits, so do not fear it.

I do have a strong suspicion that the reference to 'poison' being used to trigger the transformation is a euphemism to spare the minds of other races (or younger AD&D readers). What I suspect really happens is that all neogi are hermaphrodites, and when they are old enough develop viable eggs within them. The mature eggs produce enzymes which cause the degradation in the neogi's intellect, and also attract the attention of all the other neogi, who will have a overpowering instinct to, ah fertilize those eggs. In other words, they inject sperm into the proto-Great Old Master, which migrates through their bodies until it reaches the eggs (in a similar fashion to how the giant squid Architeuthis dux reproduces). Now, I suppose the neogi may have a specialized "stabbing organ" just for mating with, but they've already got venomous fangs so maybe these are multi-purpose.

Although, come to think of it, maybe the "Great Old Master" poison and the regular poison is one and the same. After all, it is just as useful to slow the resisting mate than a meal. Although it seems likely to me that a regular bite would be one that, if you'll pardon the expression, does not shoot the full reproductive load into the victim, but just some of the neurotoxin fluids that its sperm is stored and transported in.

Regardless, it's best not to worry about what a neogi may really be doing to your character when it bites them.
:eek:

I'm reminded of the film Slither, which featured a parasitic space monster that turned some of its victims into "wombs" by impaling them with two spiked tentacles which injected a milky fluid. One of that film's heroes got stuck by just one such tentacle, and was assured by a person who had survived a mind-meld with the alien that they would have to get stuck by both tentacles to go all wormy. I couldn't help thinking "well obviously one tentacle-spike injects eggs and the other sperm".

Shame that film did poor box office, I thought it was a nice little SF-horror-comedy film of a kind I'd have liked to see more of.

Herrison

02-14-2009 04:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Holy hell, JRM, that's a creepy elaboration. Well done.

DMH

02-14-2009 05:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The example given in SJ for showing neogi intelligence isn't subtle but it is interesting. A fleet owner will have several mindspiders (50 ton ships) and deathspiders (100 ton ships) and will use one of the mindspiders as its command ship. Since tonnage means a lot in SJ, putting oneself on a more fragile vessel is a risk but it also plays to the human(oid) idea that the flag ship will be the largest.

Mikaze

02-14-2009 06:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre~?]

I don't mind Dark Sun monsters being in the MM. I did feel the Kirre wasn't exactly alien enough to fit in with what I expected from Dark Sun though.

Mind, since I never actually played Dark Sun all I ever knew about it was what could be gleaned from one novel I read and all the Brom artwork for the setting.

JRM

02-14-2009 08:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Kirre~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Herrison (Post 9976571)
Holy hell, JRM, that's a creepy elaboration. Well done.

Thank ye kindly, just doing my bit.

The way that neogi seal their pre-sapient young in a breeding chamber and leave them to fight each other to death for food is also curious. There are animals which practice infant on infant cannibalism, but mostly this is only when no other food is available. Most creatures of animal intelligence (in AD&D terms) or greater would feed their young, some of the more ruthless (e.g. owls) resorting to feeding their weaker young to the stronger when no other food can be caught. I can think of some realworld animals which do something similar, like a few live-birthing sharks where the young start cannibalizing each other before they are born, but the neogi cannibalism doesn't work like this. So, why don't the neogi feed them? You'd expect at least some neogi settlement to have the capacity to feed 20-40 young potential slaves.

Maybe it's connected to intelligence and their slave-master instinct? Neogi are barely sentient at birth, perhaps not all of them develop their full intelligence and recognition of the master/slave instinct. Those young that have well developed minds and master/slave instinct swiftly form a hierarchy and can co-operate to kill the rest, who fight individually. The survivors, then are the ones with the intelligence and obedience to be useful slaves to the community. Of course, an 85% attrition rate is very low, you'd think that there'd be a strong selection to evolve more young with the necessary brain power.

Alternatively, the neogi young may have to eat each other to acquire adult intelligence, there might be elements in a neogi's body they have to eat to develop their brains. I doubt they have to eat other purely for food as stated. If I recall correctly, newborn neogi are full sized. It's quite feasible to get 20-40 3' tall neogi inside one 20' tall Great Old Master. If a neogi really has to eat the flesh of five or six other neogis per week just to survive they'd have to burn calories as fast as a shrew, which (a) would probably give them quite different stats and an emphasis on their ravenous appetites and (b) their population would have to be very low compared to their livestock, plus their ships would have to contain enormous foodstores. They probably need the Umber Hulks just to stock their larders!

Sleeper

02-14-2009 08:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Rumors....

Neogi aren't spiders. They're eels. That thing you think you see scuttling around? That's just a lobotomy patient. The only part that's truly neogi, is the twisting head. The tail end is permanently grafted in where the brain of the spider once was.

Ever wonder about umber hulks? The eyes that glitter, the mandibles that catch, on what would otherwise be a fairly bog-standard humanoid? Some neogi are mean. They don't just lobotomize their hosts. They extract them, with all the delicate precision of a Gray eviscerating a cow. Then they implant them, in a big brutish humanoid type. Carefully, so the gaping jaws remain intact. Drives them completely, bug-fuck insane, naturally. That's why their eyes are so creepy. There's not a primate inside, a mammal, or even a vertebrate. That's an arthropod. A creepy-crawly. One of humanity's nightmares, except even by its own standards, it's mad.

noisms

02-14-2009 08:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

On the subject of creatures being afraid of their own reproductive methods, snails and bedbugs have pretty nasty ways of getting it on. Snails fire darts into each other's bodies to deliver semen, while a bedbug's male genitalia have to pierce the exoskeleton of the female when he mates - a process called "traumatic insemination".

So the Neogi method isn't that unusual.

Still unusual, mind.

JRM

02-14-2009 09:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9977504)

On the subject of creatures being afraid of their own reproductive methods, snails and bedbugs have pretty nasty ways of getting it on. Snails fire darts into each other's bodies to deliver semen, while a bedbug's male genitalia have to pierce the exoskeleton of the female when he mates - a process called "traumatic insemination".

No, the snail's love dart injects hormones that increase the dart-stabbing snail's chances of fertilizing its partner via semen delivered through the conventional manner (i.e. rumpy-pumpy). Of course, the snails (and some slugs) in question are hermaphrodites, so they may be love-darting each other.

I'm sure Wikipedia will be our friend on this ... yup, here's its love dart entry.

Mr. Teapot

02-14-2009 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9976534)

What do you find implausible about it? Having an alien species which dies after spawning offspring isn't that fantastic,

I didn't say that a species dying to reproduce was implausible (that happens here on Earth). I said that a species that feared its own reproductive system, and took steps to prevent its own reproduction, was implausible.

Because if a creature doesn't want to reproduce, then its genes don't get carried on. And its neighbors who do like reproducing do get to carry their genes on, and have a clear evolutionary advantage. That's why sex is a big drive in humans, and almost every other species.

Now, I was talking about the Neogi as written in the MM, wherein the neogi born are apparently genetic clones of the Great Old Master. In such a case, a neogi would have a genetic drive to reproduce: on a genetic level, there would be a big advantage to having 3-6 neogi carrying on the genes instead of just one.

But if you assume that the neogi are impregnating each other, then the equation is different: each neogi wants a different neogi to die and to carry on their genes. Impregnation is a small cost, but actually bearing the children is a large cost biologically, including the death of the individual neogi. Then their fear is much more reasonable, and you get a host of neogi constantly trying to impregnate each other. Which makes for ready made rivalries among the villains, to be exploited by the PCs. And adds Rape to the list of crimes inherent to Neogi life (murder and slavery already on there), reinforcing them as villains.

(I was also assuming that Reavers/rogue neogi aren't anomalous neogi: somewhere I picked up the idea that all neogi fear their reproductive cycle, though that was not here. Maybe I got that idea from some Spelljammer supplement or maybe from my own mind. But I assumed that Reavers/rogue neogi were just neogi who succeeded at something every other neogi would want to do themselves. If you assume Reavers are rare exceptions to larger neogi culture, somewhat like celibate human beings, then you could argue that their sentence can override their natural drives. But I assumed the fear of reproduction was universal for the species... and "celibate" human beings are not exactly 100% successful at suppressing their drive.)

noisms

02-15-2009 10:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9979555)

I didn't say that a species dying to reproduce was implausible (that happens here on Earth). I said that a species that feared its own reproductive system, and took steps to prevent its own reproduction, was implausible.

Because if a creature doesn't want to reproduce, then its genes don't get carried on. And its neighbors who do like reproducing do get to carry their genes on, and have a clear evolutionary advantage. That's why sex is a big drive in humans, and almost every other species.

Although lots of humans appear to fear reproduction... How many childless couples are there in New York, London, Paris or Tokyo? ;) Sorry, I'm being a bit facetious there. Maybe most Neogi (the non-Reavers) kid themselves into thinking that being a Great Old Master is prestigious? That would explain the name, and also explain why they don't usually flee their fate.

Of course, explaining how this reproductive system evolved is a tough one. Then again, imagine if praying mantis evolved to sentience. Try convincing me to have sex with you if you're going to (in the non-innuendo sense) eat me afterwards. I don't care if you look like Jessica Alba, it ain't going to happen.

As is often the case with the MM, trying to think about these things sensibly is just a recipe for making your head hurt.

The Last Conformist

02-15-2009 07:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9976534)

What do you find implausible about it? Having an alien species which dies after spawning offspring isn't that fantastic, although one were the offspring apparently parasitize their parent is a nasty twist.

Nasty it may be, but not unknown on this fair Earth. One of the standards for reproductive weirdness is Micromalthus debilis, a beetle were male eggs stick to the mother; when the larva eventually hatches it promptly eats its mother.

JRM

02-16-2009 07:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9979555)

I didn't say that a species dying to reproduce was implausible (that happens here on Earth). I said that a species that feared its own reproductive system, and took steps to prevent its own reproduction, was implausible.

Because if a creature doesn't want to reproduce, then its genes don't get carried on. And its neighbors who do like reproducing do get to carry their genes on, and have a clear evolutionary advantage. That's why sex is a big drive in humans, and almost every other species.

Now, I was talking about the Neogi as written in the MM, wherein the neogi born are apparently genetic clones of the Great Old Master. In such a case, a neogi would have a genetic drive to reproduce: on a genetic level, there would be a big advantage to having 3-6 neogi carrying on the genes instead of just one.

snip

Oh sorry about that, I was misreading you there.

As you say, if the other neogi are impregnating the Great Old Master that is not an issue, since the anomalous neogi can perpetuate its genes by causing other neogis to give birth.

There is another possibility, that the genes that create an anomalous rogue neogi which does not reproduce also increase the reproductive success of its close relatives - maybe they make a neogi particularly cautious/paranoid and hence more likely to reach an old age, when it begins eligible for Great Old Mastership, so a rogue neogi's siblings are more likely to reproduce.

Even if a Great Old Master (I'll just start calling it a GOM) reproduces asexually or is a self-fertilizing hermaphrodites, all of its offspring need not be completely identical. They could be sensitive to some biochemistry (e.g. variations in the hormones of different parts of the GOM's flesh or the poisons it was injected with) that causes significant changes in development, or any of the myriad factors that can influence how a foetus grows.

noisms

02-16-2009 10:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Nightmare

Tough one this. It isn't a bad monster at all - in fact, it's quite a nice idea, even if the whole concept is basically a ridiculously obvious and banal pun. I kind of like over-the-top evil creatures, and you don't get much more over-the-top evil than the nightmare, with its black fur and red eyes and noxious vapour emissions. You would never come across one and say to yourself, "Hang on, he could be a nice guy, it's difficult to tell." And it's good to have something big and hard for BBEGs to ride around on.

The problem is that, really, what do you do with the anti-Shadowfax? Shadowfax, no matter how Tolkien tried, was only ever just a horse. And so are nightmares; nasty and tough perhaps, but really just a steed. What can you do with them other than have them be the mount of some vile necromancer or anti-paladin?

There's also the issue of, well....frankly, silliness:

Quote:

Once per decade, on the plane of Hades, there is a dark and sinister time called Gloom Meet. At this time the various lower planar denizens will meet and decide how they will spread their will for the next decade. The nightmares play a special role in Gloom Meet, for they spread the word that the meeting is about to begin. As the Gloom Meet approaches, there is a higher concentration of nightmares and their frequency changes from very rare to uncommon. This is the first indication that Gloom Meet is to occur, and lasts for approximately two weeks. Immediately prior to the meeting, the nightmares ride the planes in a terrifying charge that notifies all that the Gloom Meet has started.

Come on, "meet and decide how they will spread their will for the next decade"...? Gimme a break. This is weak, lame, naff, and any other pejorative adjective you care to name. It's like something from a bad kid's horror story.

6inTruder

02-16-2009 10:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

check out the book Raum for a bit of nightmare action. Not much, but a touch to work the whole hell-steed angle.

Squizzle

02-16-2009 01:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

If the conclusion of first pregnancy is invariably lethal (biologically costly), but impregnation isn't, then there would probably be some sort of self-induced abortion mechanism evolved into the neogi. It would not be too especially effective (because that would cause the species to die out), but it's probably there. Maybe it's more apt to happen if there is high population density (ergo, more need to prevent pregnancy for resource reasons; also, the odds of passing genes by inseminating instead of birthing are that much better if there are more potential partners around), or copious amounts of resources available (so that the individual is more likely to live long enough to find and impregnate another).

The outcast neogi mentioned might just be those with a genetic quirk that renders their spontaneous abortion faculty especially reliable.

JasonK

02-16-2009 04:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9984924)

Nightmare

...

The problem is that, really, what do you do with the anti-Shadowfax? Shadowfax, no matter how Tolkien tried, was only ever just a horse. And so are nightmares; nasty and tough perhaps, but really just a steed. What can you do with them other than have them be the mount of some vile necromancer or anti-paladin?

Agreed 100%. I mean, yes, technically, they're reasonably strong monsters of their level. But... well... they're horses. And I'm not going to say that a horse can't be strong or hurt you if it kicks. But... they lack a certain dignity as a thing to fight on its own.

Which all makes having stats for a Nightmare about as worthwhile as having stats for a horse. Which, of course, we do and which, of course, is reasonably worthwhile as someone might try to attack your horse. Same deal here, I figure.

- jasön

DMH

02-16-2009 08:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Don't forget how intelligent nightmares are. They are powerful enough to dominate a goblin or hobgoblin tribe and could very well be the power behind the chieftain.

(un)reason

02-16-2009 08:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 9986289)

Don't forget how intelligent nightmares are. They are powerful enough to dominate a goblin or hobgoblin tribe and could very well be the power behind the chieftain.

I think their mindset is more like imps and quasits. They prefer to let other people think they're in charge, and then influence things by strategic betrayals. After all, they're one of the primary sources of transport on the lower planes. This means they have a big hold on the economy and politics if they co-ordinate themselves properly. It's like the yugoloths in 2E. Under the guise of being venal treacherous assholes who's only loyalty is to the highest bidder, they can actually get plenty of more subtle evil done and control the balance of the blood war. And they don't even have to pretend they're playing nice while doing it. Everyone expects the lawyer guy with hooves and horns to screw you over, and they probably have an idea of how, just not the exact details. No one suspects the horse. You even get to kick your "master" in the nuts or bite their hands when they're feeding you sometimes, and they'll put up with it, because they think of you as a valuable bit of property rather than a sentient being, and don't want to ruin you. (you could probably get away with even more if you were a night camel, but I think that would be a step too far into comedy territory.)

Wakshaani

02-16-2009 09:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Gloom Meet sounds like a stockholder meeting of the damned.

Wakboth

02-16-2009 10:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 9986421)

Gloom Meet sounds like a stockholder meeting of the damned.

You know, that has potential. Dividends paid in larvae, arguments about whether a particular archdevil deserves the lavish palace he's been building with the work of ten thousand damned slaves, when those slaves could have been used for furthering evil, yugoloths turning out reams and reams of legalese full of hooks to snare you, and more. And now your evil party has to look for venture capital in the form of a horde of screaming demons!

YojimboC

02-16-2009 10:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

It's true that nightmares aren't much in and of themselves, but they are an important part of the BBEG equation. What is Venger or Lord Soth without his midnight black horse with glowing red eyes? It's true that the Nazgul rode regular ol' black horses, but how much cooler would they have been on nightmares?

Never underestimate an intelligent steed, either. I've recently been using orcs on wargs as antagonists in my game (I know, they should be goblins on wargs), and it's been fun having the mounts be as smart or smarter than the riders.

EmperorSeth

02-16-2009 11:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 9986710)

It's true that nightmares aren't much in and of themselves, but they are an important part of the BBEG equation. What is Venger or Lord Soth without his midnight black horse with glowing red eyes? It's true that the Nazgul rode regular ol' black horses, but how much cooler would they have been on nightmares?

Never underestimate an intelligent steed, either. I've recently been using orcs on wargs as antagonists in my game (I know, they should be goblins on wargs), and it's been fun having the mounts be as smart or smarter than the riders.

Oh, that could be fun, especially if the players hear them argue during the fight. That'll be a way to make those language skills useful! :)

I like the Gloom Meet as a Stock Report of the Damned, too. I might have to get my party to infiltrate that in my next campaign, whenever that may be. The problem with Nightmares as BBEG mounts is if the BBEG are B enough, they probably are too powerful for the Nightmare to last long and since upgraded to a dragon or something. But Nightmares could advance as easily as anything else.

Kakita Kojiro

02-16-2009 11:27 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9984372)

There is another possibility, that the genes that create an anomalous rogue neogi which does not reproduce also increase the reproductive success of its close relatives - maybe they make a neogi particularly cautious/paranoid and hence more likely to reach an old age, when it begins eligible for Great Old Mastership, so a rogue neogi's siblings are more likely to reproduce.

I'd be somewhat leery of using that as an explanation, though. Since that is one hypothesis as to what evolutionary advantage homosexuality might yield, that is inviting comparisons between reaver neogi and gays in our society. Which is... a can of worms I'd rather not open, myself.

Of course, any game where neogi reproduction methods were important to the action is probably fairly unusual, anyway, so maybe not a problem then.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9984924)

Come on, "meet and decide how they will spread their will for the next decade"...? Gimme a break. This is weak, lame, naff, and any other pejorative adjective you care to name. It's like something from a bad kid's horror story.

The Gloom Meet would actually be a very good campaign... if you have proactive players. If your players are the rare type who will take the clue of nightmares showing up more frequently, and then stampeding across the lower planes, and run with it -- then it would be cool. Deducing that Evil is meeting and scheming, and planning how to infiltrate and whack the Big Bads? that's good stuff.

If, however, you have the run-of-the-mill, lumpish players who only react to what they are presented with, then it turns into a sucky DM-narrated dangling plotohook. Just have to know if the players' reaction to unusual nightmare meetings is "What are they up to?" or "Yeah, whatever. Can I roll on the Random Harlot Table, now?"

DMH

02-16-2009 11:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9986707)

You know, that has potential. Dividends paid in larvae, arguments about whether a particular archdevil deserves the lavish palace he's been building with the work of ten thousand damned slaves, when those slaves could have been used for furthering evil, yugoloths turning out reams and reams of legalese full of hooks to snare you, and more. And now your evil party has to look for venture capital in the form of a horde of screaming demons!

<http://towercoda.net/PDF%20Files/Pact%20System.pdf> One of the pacts is about how PCs can get involved in such a system.

JRM

02-17-2009 03:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Squizzle (Post 9985405)

If the conclusion of first pregnancy is invariably lethal (biologically costly), but impregnation isn't, then there would probably be some sort of self-induced abortion mechanism evolved into the neogi. It would not be too especially effective (because that would cause the species to die out), but it's probably there. Maybe it's more apt to happen if there is high population density (ergo, more need to prevent pregnancy for resource reasons; also, the odds of passing genes by inseminating instead of birthing are that much better if there are more potential partners around), or copious amounts of resources available (so that the individual is more likely to live long enough to find and impregnate another).

The outcast neogi mentioned might just be those with a genetic quirk that renders their spontaneous abortion faculty especially reliable.

Well there are plenty of real-world species which die after their first pregnancy, and I can't offhand think of any that can cancel their birth, although some can delay it until conditions are good (e.g. some spiders store sperm until needed to fertilize their eggs, then die after they hatch). There are some animals that can self-abort, including many rodents, but all of the ones I can think of can give birth on more than one occasion.

Although if we consider it another way, your theory could help explain the Great Old Master phenomena. If we assume neogi can 'self-abort', maybe it's not the neogi's eggs/womb/whatever becoming mature that makes them become a "Great Old Master", it's their loss of the self-abort function. i.e. it could be that rather than becoming senile because their eggs have become capable of fertilization, they've become old enough that their self-aborting immune system is starting to fail and they cannot stop their eggs being fertilized. That implies a 'rogue' neogi may just be one who has an unusually healthy old age.

In any case, their reproductive biology may mean that wealthy neogi could be extremely keen to acquire age-reduction magic. If you knew your allies would see to it you exploded into two dozen babies after you age a couple of years, how much would you be willing to spend on a potion of youth?

JRM

02-17-2009 03:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9986853)

I'd be somewhat leery of using that as an explanation, though. Since that is one hypothesis as to what evolutionary advantage homosexuality might yield, that is inviting comparisons between reaver neogi and gays in our society. Which is... a can of worms I'd rather not open, myself.

Well although the same underlying principle is involved in the theory I wouldn't be too worried about it, since neogi reproductive biology is obviously nothing like terrestrial male-female reproduction. Since all neogi are the same sex or asexual, none of them can ever try to reproduce with the wrong sex (i.e. one they can never produce infants with).

Furthermore, I would suspect rogue neogi are probably just as keen to create Great Old Masters as regular neogi, they just don't want to be one themselves. They were probably just as keen to poison other neogi into Great Old Masters before they became old enough to be at risk of suffering the same fate. That would mean a rogue neogi is more like a male organism, while regular neogi are hermaphrodites.

If a rogue neogi were powerful enough, with many non-neogi slaves, it might even try to capture other elderly neogi to try to turn the into Great Old Masters, it depends how strong the "Poison Great Old Masters" instinct is.

JasonK

02-17-2009 03:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9987834)

Well although the same underlying principle is involved in the theory I wouldn't be too worried about it, since neogi reproductive biology is obviously nothing like terrestrial male-female reproduction. Since all neogi are the same sex or asexual, none of them can ever try to reproduce with the wrong sex (i.e. one they can never produce infants with)

Furthermore, I would suspect rogue neogi are probably just as keen to create Great Old Masters as regular neogi, they just don't want to be one themselves. They were probably just as keen to poison other neogi into Great Old Masters before they became old enough to be at risk of suffering the same fate. That would mean a rogue neogi is more like a male organism, while regular neogi are hermaphrodites.

If a rogue neogi were powerful enough, with many non-neogi slaves, it might even try to capture other elderly neogi to try to turn the into Great Old Masters, it depends how strong the "Poison Great Old Masters" instinct is.

One of the things I like about these threads is that we are The Sages. :D

- jasõn

Wakboth

02-17-2009 04:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9987881)

One of the things I like about these threads is that we are The Sages. :D

And what do we end up doing? Arguing about the details of Neogi reproduction. :D

JRM

02-17-2009 05:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9984924)

Nightmare

Tough one this. It isn't a bad monster at all - in fact, it's quite a nice idea, even if the whole concept is basically a ridiculously obvious and banal pun. I kind of like over-the-top evil creatures, and you don't get much more over-the-top evil than the nightmare, with its black fur and red eyes and noxious vapour emissions. You would never come across one and say to yourself, "Hang on, he could be a nice guy, it's difficult to tell." And it's good to have something big and hard for BBEGs to ride around on.

The problem is that, really, what do you do with the anti-Shadowfax? Shadowfax, no matter how Tolkien tried, was only ever just a horse. And so are nightmares; nasty and tough perhaps, but really just a steed. What can you do with them other than have them be the mount of some vile necromancer or anti-paladin?

I'm quite fond of Nightmares, so they've cropped up quite often in my games, although I confess this has always been as "Steed of the Big Bad Guy". However, thinking it over there is more potential to them than that.

One problem is that although Nightmares can understand other creatures, there's no mention of them being able to reply. If I got in the habit of thinking of nightmares communicating with non-nightmares, maybe I'd have done more with them, since I'd have more impetus to develop a nightmare with personality and plots, making them a bit more than "Evil Snappy Demon Horse to carry villain from A to B". Plus, I like the idea of a talking demon horse.

Going by the Monstrous Manual, nightmares communicate with each other through empathy. The MM says "Nightmares can understand commands from evil riders." Does that mean they can't understand their masters when they're not riding, and that they do not understand the commands of good riders? Perhaps their empathy allows them to comprehend the desires of a like-minded (i.e. Evil) creature in close proximity (like riding, grooming etc), but not any other creatures. The sorts of creatures they usually serve as mounts ("baatezu, tanar'ri, night hags, liches" et cetera) mostly have powers that allow them to communicate with any sapient being, but it'd be a bit awkward if a nightmare summoner has to sit on the beast's back or cast tongues to be able to ask it anything.

It'd help if the MM gave more motivation for Nightmares than "gleefully serves as a mount for any mission of Evil" and "will work for platinum oat-flakes".

JRM

02-17-2009 05:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

As to what do you do with Nightmares.

As (un)reason has already been pointed out, they could become "powers behind the throne" or be a major transport power of the underworld. They also have close ties with the hags, so might be strong players in those fiendish ladies damned soul acquisition business. ("The Nightmare knows as Eryscephalus hereby agrees to transport the undersigned to any spot on the prime material plane or the Lower Regions for the duration of the undersigned's natural life in return for exclusive rights to the undersigned's intangible perpetual assets")

Speaking about hags, are nightmares always female too? I can't recall any D&D illustrations which show nightstallions. (Yes, I know it'd have been very unlikely for them to dare publish a picture of a male animal's 'dangly bits') Still, maybe all nightmares are literally mares, which raises the question of where new nightmares come from. A lot of demons are "promoted" from lesser demons and larvae, maybe nightmares are formed from the damned souls of sapient equines such as Pegasi or Centaurs? That would make them quite rare, since such creatures are mostly good aligned.

Alternatively, nightmares may come in male and female, but are matriarchal - each herd may have a few stallions for breeding purposes, but most males wander about the lower realms by themselves plotting to assassinate and replace a "stud" stallion. (Which could lead to the players getting sucked into such intrigues, e.g. they need a nightstallion's aid and it demands they murder his rival in return.) Regardless of this masculine bickering it's the "circle of old mares" who command the herd, in co-operation with their hag companions.

As for their adventure potential, nightmares can travel almost anywhere on any plane, and are one of easiest monsters with this ability to summon. Maybe the players have to deal with some nightmares to travel to another plane, since they lack the ability to use any other means? This could be especially awkward if the players have to travel to an Outer

Realm that is not one of the infernal ones: "excuse me my good Planetar, we come on an urgent mission for goodness!" "THEN WHY ARE YOU SITTING ON A DEMON-HORSE, MORTAL?" "Erm..."

Perhaps the party are hired to rescue a lost wizard you travelled to the Beastlands on a nightmare, so they have to (a) summon the nightmare and get it to tell them where the wizard went, (b) negotiate with the nightmare for transport to the Beastlands, and then (c) after rescuing the wizard realize they forgot to pre-negotiate a price with the nightmares for carrying them back home. (I have had players do something similar)

Or how about this: the party are hired to break into the manse of a high level Evil Wizard while she's away to substitute her stock of platinum oat flakes with silver-adulterated replicas. Then, when she summons her Nightmare to carry her on an Evil Mission™, the improperly paid nightmare will instead carry her down to the Abyss and abandons her, as is their usual custom. The players should be too low-level to just kill the evil wizard, and their employer gives them enough info they have a good chance of reaching the sorcerer's oats. (Said employer is quite likely to be the wizard's traitorous apprentice, which would explain why they know the tower's defences so well.)

A nightmare could also one-up the old Kelpie trick of luring people to ride it, since instead of just drowning and eating those fools it carries them down to the Abyss. One possibility is various people of dubious morality start disappearing without a trace. The players should be able to figure out they all went out riding, but may not realize they were not actually riding their own horse, but a nightmare wearing a Hat of Disguise that it makes appear to be a bridle. The Nightmare is abducting people of evil alignment to Hades where her accomplice, a Night Hag, holds them as slaves.

Oh, and that Gloom Meet makes me think of a swap meet more than a Stock Report of the Damned. It's a neutral ground where lots of minor players get together to trade objects, larvae, information and contracts and the Hags and the Nightmares get a cut of the proceeds. Basically, a lower plane version of a Fairy Market, rather than somewhere archdevils and demon princes get together to agree The Ten Year Plan for Evil.

ESkemp

02-17-2009 05:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In an entirely-unrelated-to-D&D game, a player decided that his character's race would have been created by a secretive race of telepathic horses inspired by the Houyhnhnms. Start with "evil plane-traveling fiendish Houyhnhnms," surely something could be devised to give them a culture of their own that passes muster. A slave-race of "grooms," perhaps: maybe some sort of specialized imp thing for doing some of the fiddlier work that requires thumbs. Something kept in corrals that the nomadic nightmares visit on and off. I dunno.

I don't have much of a problem with seeing nightmares as threatening on their own (though they do make perfectly desirable steeds for villains); horses bite, and they're kind of alarming when they go nuts and start bucking and kicking and biting. An angry carnivorous hellfire horse probably will take a nasty chunk out of you, cauterizing the wound as it does so, in addition to raining down those flaming hooves. Their fighting style would probably mean that backstabbing and/or flanking a nightmare are tricky; hooves and bite on one end, more powerful kicks on the other. The real trick is figuring out how to add variety. Infernal steel barding with a long impaling horn on the champron? Sorcerers that have developed a peculiar form of magic with verbal components usable only by the horse's mouthparts? Eight-legged nightmare Sleipnir royalty? Individual breath weapons? There are options.

JasonK

02-17-2009 06:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 9987930)
And what do we end up doing? Arguing about the details of Neogi reproduction. :D

Exactly!

- jasön

Felix

02-17-2009 07:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9988236)

Speaking about hags, are nightmares always female too? I can't recall any D&D illustrations which show nightstallions. (Yes, I know it'd have been very unlikely for them to dare publish a picture of a male animal's 'dangly bits') Still, maybe all nightmares are literally mares, which raises the question of where new nightmares come from. . . lot of demons are "promoted" from lesser demons and larvae, maybe nightmares are formed from the damned souls of sapient equines such as Pegasi or Centaurs? That would make them quite rare, since such creatures are mostly good aligned.

Nightmares -- who are, as you note, all female -- do not come out in large numbers to spread word of the Gloom Meet. They have a remarkably regular reproductive cycle, and go into estrus once a decade. Then they roam the planes, seeking a mate. What foes of nightmares have misconstrued as hot clouds of deadly noxious vapors are actually powerful pheromones, capable of beguiling any suitable equine. (I say it should beguile unicorns, since I see their description says they're immune to magical charm effects; this is totally physiological. Plus, seducing a unicorn seems more evil than seducing a pegasus.)

Other evil entities use this as a sign that it is time to attend a Gloom Meet. Besides, by the time they've amassed the armies for the wars planned at this meet, they'll have a whole new batch of evil steeds, just the right age for combat.

Mr. Teapot

02-17-2009 07:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9988170)
Plus, I like the idea of a talking demon horse.

Just a little while ago I was thinking that there were strange parallels between Mr. Ed and the Son of Sam (you know, serial killer who was ordered around by a demon possessed dog?).

...In both cases, you have a pet animal that only talks to one person. Though the Mr. Ed sitcom played this for laughs, it sounds a lot like a serious mental illness (see the aforementioned Son of Sam).

So a nightmare seems to be the perfect creature to go in such a role: a PC gets a horse, for some reason (bought, borrowed, stolen or inherited). A very nice black horse, which is surprisingly good in combat. But it starts talking to its rider, and slowly starts tempting them into doing more and more evil acts. Or in allowing crimes to go unpunished, or to be more strict in the tenets of their dogmas. And, of course, no one else can ever hear the horse telling the PC this. He either shuts up when someone else is nearby, or communicates telepathically or something.

If the nightmare drives the hero insane, that's a success. If he turns the hero to great evil, that's also a success. If it eventually becomes clear that he'll never beat the hero, the nightmare can fly away or turn on the PC at a terribly inconvenient time (like in the middle of battle, say).

Which could go anywhere between Mr. Ed and Son of Sam in the tone spectrum. Could be really creepy, or really silly. Or in the hands of the right GM, both.

(un)reason

02-17-2009 07:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Felix (Post 9988683)

Nightmares -- who are, as you note, all female -- do not come out in large numbers to spread word of the Gloom Meet. They have a remarkably regular reproductive cycle, and go into estrus once a decade. Then they roam the planes, seeking a mate. What foes of nightmares have misconstrued as hot clouds of deadly noxious vapors are actually powerful pheromones, capable of beguiling any suitable equine. (I say it should beguile unicorns, since I see their description says they're immune to magical charm effects; this is totally physiological. Plus, seducing a unicorn seems more evil than seducing a pegasus.)

Other evil entities use this as a sign that it is time to attend a Gloom Meet. Besides, by the time they've amassed the armies for the wars planned at this meet, they'll have a whole new batch of evil steeds, just the right age for combat

:cool: I like this. It meshes well with Night hags. Invading their dreams and riding their back? I think not. Ahh, 2nd ed and it's bowdlerization. :D

randomgamer8466

02-17-2009 10:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I don't have my omniscience on me right now and I'm too lazy to look it up, but I don't think D&D is the first work that integrates the concept of a mare with that of a nightmare (bad dream). I think there is some sort of folktale about a black horse that brings bad dreams.

Squizzle

02-17-2009 10:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9987832)

Well there are plenty of real-world species which die after their first pregnancy, and I can't offhand think of any that can cancel their birth, although some can delay it until conditions are good (e.g. some spiders store sperm until needed to fertilize their eggs, then die after they hatch). There are some animals that can self-abort, including many rodents, but all of the ones I can think of can give birth on more than one occasion.

Although if we consider it another way, your theory could help explain the Great Old Master phenomena. If we assume neogi can 'self-abort', maybe it's not the neogi's eggs/womb/whatever becoming mature that makes them become a "Great Old Master", it's their loss of the self-abort function. i.e. it could be that rather than becoming senile because their eggs have become capable of fertilization, they've become old enough that their self-aborting immune system is starting to fail and they cannot stop their eggs being fertilized. That implies a 'rogue' neogi may just be one who has an unusually healthy old age.

In any case, their reproductive biology may mean that wealthy neogi could be extremely keen to acquire age-reduction magic. If you knew your allies would see to it you exploded into two dozen babies after you age a couple of years, how much would you be willing to spend on a potion of youth?

Thinking along the lines of neogi spontaneous abortion today, I considered that it was likely a function of their immune system, so reavers could possibly just be those, as you say, with unusually healthy immune systems. Further, I was wondering what sort of wrinkle it'd add if neogi were only able to inseminate others after they themselves had been inseminated--early in the pregnancy, before they became full-on Great Old Master-sized monsters, or perhaps after they became pregnant, but with the possibility of a termination if they impregnated another fast enough (passing the buck, as it were). What implications could this have for neogi behavior, society, etc.?

Kakita Kojiro

02-17-2009 11:15 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by randomgamer8466 (Post 9989208)

I don't have my omniscience on me right now and I'm too lazy to look it up, but I don't think D&D is the first work that integrates the concept of a mare with that of a nightmare (bad dream). I think there is some sort of folktale about a black horse that brings bad dreams.

That would be the mara -- cognate of "mare" and the source of "nightmare" in English. The folklore of a nightmare being a black horse is... the folklore source of "nightmare".

What is interesting, though, is that being "mare-ridden" is the same thing as being "hag-ridden", and a "nightmare" and an "incubus dream" are the same thing as well. D&D derived two (and a part) different monsters out of these, and kept the hag - nightmare connection... but the poor incubus was relegated to occasional, halfhearted mentions as a succubus in male-form, or a male-succubus version in Dragon magazine or whatnot.

JRM

02-17-2009 08:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 9988728)

Just a little while ago I was thinking that there wee strange parallels between Mr. Ed and the Son of Sam (you know, serial killer who was ordered around by a demon possessed dog?).

...In both cases, you have a pet animal that only talks to one person. Though the Mr. Ed sitcom played this for laughs, it sounds a lot like a serious mental illness (see the aforementioned Son of Sam).

So a nightmare seems to be the perfect creature to go in such a role: a PC gets a horse, for some reason (bought, borrowed, stolen or inherited). A very nice black horse, which is surprisingly good in combat. But it starts talking to its rider, and slowly starts tempting them into doing more and more evil acts. Or in allowing crimes to go unpunished, or to be more strict in the tenets of their dogmas. And, of course, no one else can ever hear the horse telling the PC this. He either shuts up when someone else is nearby, or communicates telepathically or something.

If the nightmare drives the hero insane, that's a success. If he turns the hero to great evil, that's also a success. If it eventually becomes clear that he'll never beat the hero, the nightmare can fly away or turn on the PC at a terribly inconvenient time (like in the middle of battle, say).

Which could go anywhere between Mr. Ed and Son of Sam in the tone spectrum. Could be really creepy, or really silly. Or in the hands of the right GM, both.

Good ideas. I had a similar notion that nightmares serve evil masters in order to corrupt them further, all part of their role in the larvae creation/transport business. Just like imps & quasits seek to do while in "service" to their "masters".

Kevin Rohan

02-17-2009 08:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I have to say, out of all the critters on the list, the Hobgobo is my favorite. I've always loved using them as NPCs and enemies...they are, in my opinion, one of the only Goblinoids capable of keeping up with PC races on a one-to-one basis.

JRM

02-17-2009 08:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Felix (Post 9988683)

Nightmares -- who are, as you note, all female -- do not come out in large numbers to spread word of the Gloom Meet. They have a remarkably regular reproductive cycle, and go into estrus once a decade. Then they roam the planes, seeking a mate. What foes of nightmares have misconstrued as hot clouds of deadly noxious vapors are actually powerful pheromones, capable of beguiling any suitable equine. (I say it should beguile unicorns, since I see their description says they're immune to magical charm effects; this is totally physiological. Plus, seducing a unicorn seems more evil than seducing a pegasus.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9989385)

What is interesting, though, is that being "mare-ridden" is the same thing as being "hag-ridden", and a "nightmare" and an "incubus dream" are the same thing as well. D&D derived two (and a part) different monsters out of these, and kept the hag - nightmare connection... but the poor incubus was relegated to occasional, halfhearted mentions as a succubus in male-form, or a male-succubus version in Dragon magazine or whatnot.

Just had an idea, maybe we've been thinking about this all wrong. Perhaps nightmares are really male, and nightmares and incubi are the same breed of demon - the male counterpart to the night hag. (Which implies an incubus could literally be described as hung like a horse:p)

No wonder night hags are so often found in the company of nightmares - that's no mere steed, that's her mate.

Alternatively, nightmares/hags could be able to change sex like the traditional incubus/succubus does - in medieval/renaissance folklore these demons just form a body with a gender appropriate to their lover/victim. A nightmare/hag may just spend most of its time in female form, only needing to become male when it intends to perpetuate its kind.

So, the proposed nightmares/hags could reproduce by mating with each other, or perhaps when a nightmare/incubus "visits" a mortal (humanoid or sapient equine), it occasionally results in a fiendish offspring. The female ones look perfectly normal until they reach maturity, whereupon they become night hags or (female) nightmares. The male ones could be monstrous abominations from birth (hooves, horns, gravestone-like teeth, et cetera).

The Last Conformist

02-17-2009 09:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 9989385)

That would be the mara -- cognate of "mare" and the source of "nightmare" in English.

For clarity, mara is cognate with the "mare" in "nightmare", but not with "mare" = female horse.

Wakshaani

02-17-2009 11:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Bad Horse, Bad Horse

Bad Horse, Bad Horse

He rides across the nation, the thoroughbred of sin

He got the application that you just sent in

It needs evaluation, so let the games begin

A heinous crime, a show of force

(a murder would be nice of course)

Bad Horse, Bad Horse
Bad Horse, he's bad
The evil league of evil is watching so beware
The grade that you receive'll be your last, we swear
So make the bad horse gleeful, or he'll make you his mare
You're saddled up; there's no recourse
It's "hi-yo, silver!"

Signed: Bad Horse.

EmperorSeth

02-18-2009 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

In retrospect, I'm amazed that took as long as it did.

Belchion

02-18-2009 02:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9988236)

A nightmare could also one-up the old Kelpie trick of luring people to ride it, since instead of just drowning and eating those fools it carries them down to the Abyss. [...] The Nightmare is abducting people of evil alignment to Hades where her accomplice, a Night Hag, holds them as slaves.

Why only evil aligned people? They simply gather whom they can, put them somewhere on a lower plane where there is nothing to eat and only horrible water to drink and then visit their victims again and again, offering to bring them back home for just one small deed in return (which, of course, is an Act of Ultimate Evil...)

JRM

02-18-2009 04:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 9992046)

Why only evil aligned people? They simply gather whom they can, put them somewhere on a lower plane where there is nothing to eat and only horrible water to drink and then visit their victims again and again, offering to bring them back home for just one small deed in return (which, of course, is an Act of Ultimate Evil...)

I thought of that option but decided against it, partly because some might find the idea of the nightmares kidnapping perfectly innocent people a bit squiffy but mainly because I suspect that if nightmares tried that ploy a Planetar or an exultance of Devas would turn up and squish the nightmare flat for abducting souls it had no claim to.

Matthew L. Martin

02-18-2009 12:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Felix (Post 9988683)
Plus, seducing a unicorn seems more evil than seducing a pegasus.)

The Ravenloft Monstrous Compendium Appendix III used this core concept (evil nightmare flatters and seduces unicorn) as the species origin for the 'shadow unicorn'.

noisms

02-18-2009 04:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Nymph

The Nymph is another variation on the very-beautiful-temptress monster theme, but seems slightly less interesting than a Dryad or Slyph - Nymphs don't pose a threat as they can't seduce a character and spirit them away, and their abilities are kind of dull. They know the hidden secrets of the region they inhabit, their hair and bathing pools give Charisma bonuses, and their kiss can make a person forget painful memories for a day... but none of this seems particularly interesting or worth having.

Probably Nymphs are supposed to be used as one of those helpful creatures who can heal characters and drop hints about the plot. It's not really my style as a DM to use that sort of monster, but horses for courses, blah blah. I suppose I can see the value in a 'sanctuary' area held by a Nymph, where recuperation and rest can take place for the PCs. A little like Lothlorien was for the Fellowship of the Ring.

Alternatively, I quite like the idea of a Nymph sending a party off on wild goose chases in the name of 'good', when really it's all in the name of personal advancement or revenge for her.

JasonK

02-18-2009 04:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Nymphs, in my book, are scary with a capital SCARY. You so much as look at one, you go blind; you look at one while it's naked (and, let's face it, beautiful woodland Grecian thing that one is, when is a nymph not naked) and you DIE. That's fucking scary!

But nymphs are fundamentally good creatures. They don't strip down with the intention to kill; they're naked because that's who they are. I think they're like children, in that respect - they're innocents, forever unable to see ugliness, never realizing that people hide their nakedness. I think they literally lack the ability to realize that they harm people who see them; it's not quite something that registers. Nymphs who do realize it, they're no longer nymphs - just like the knowledge that she was growing older ultimately ruined Wendy for Neverland, so too does knowledge of ugliness ruin a nymph's beauty. At that point they stop being nymphs and they're thereafter only dryads or elves or something, still beautiful, but now capable of the depths of grief.

All of which makes them incredibly tragic to my mind. Here you have, a priori, by definition, the greatest physical beauty the world can ever know, but no one can see it and live. Maybe that's ok - maybe there's just no point in living after you've seen something that transcendently perfect, like getting a little glimpse of the divine - but maybe this is the saddest commentary on the state of the world possible; that true beauty can only exist in ignorance, that the aware can never glimpse true beauty.

That's my take on it, anyway, which is why I'm glad for the existence of the nymph as such in D&D. How to use any of that in an adventure, though, is something else altogether, and a question I've no clue how to answer.

- jasön

Wakboth

02-18-2009 06:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I agree with Jason that nymphs are a great idea, but kind of difficult to use in an actual game. (Also, your take of the nymph and innocence is pretty poignant.)

Also, the DiTerlizzi illustration is beautiful. IIRC, the original one had the nymph entirely naked, though tastefully covered, but TSR editors didn't like that. So he drew that shift on her.

Quasar

02-18-2009 06:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 9988170)

It'd help if the MM gave more motivation for Nightmares than "gleefully serves as a mount for any mission of Evil" and "will work for platinum oat-flakes".

That's probably why we just gave a famous re-occurring nightmare in our game Mr Ed's personality. Well if Mr Ed was pure evil.

The Last Conformist

02-18-2009 06:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

So beautiful that a glimpse can blind or even kill a man, the nymphs are the embodiment of loveliness, a triumph of nature.

If you cross a nymph and a medusa, do you get someone so ordinary-looking that a single glimpse can kill?

YojimboC

02-18-2009 09:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Nymphs. Yeah, I dunno. They make me think of dragonflies.

But I guess that could tie into Jason's idea... that nymphs are immature dryads or some other nature spirit. That could be interesting. But again, no real use for them in a game; I mean, I've got a million other ways to do plot exposition.

Wakshaani

02-19-2009 12:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JasonK (Post 9995067)

All of which makes them incredibly tragic to my mind. Here you have, a priori, by definition, the greatest physical beauty the world can ever know, but no one can see it and live. Maybe that's ok - maybe there's just no point in living after you've seen something that transcendently perfect, like getting a little glimpse of the divine - but maybe this is the saddest commentary on the state of the world possible; that true beauty can only exist in ignorance, that the aware can never glimpse true beauty.

rolls saving throw

"Meh. not my type."

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Octopus, Giant

No prizes for guessing what this creature looks like.

Giant Octopus (I refuse to use the word Octopii!) are tough marine monsters who can camouflage themselves through colour change. I like the idea, being a bit of an Octopus fan, but I think the designers got rather carried away with emulating the combat abilities of an eight-tentacled monster; see how easy this is to digest:

Quote:

A giant octopus generally attacks with six of its eight tentacles, using two to anchor itself. Each striking tentacle causes 1d4 points of damage, but unless the member is loosened or severed, it constricts for 2d4 points of damage every round after striking. If a victim is dragged close enough to the beak, the monster can bite for 2d6 points of damage.

Any victim under 8 feet tall or long can be struck by only one tentacle at a time, and the chance that both upper limbs are pinned on a successful strike is 25%, while the chance that both upper limbs are free is also 25%. When both upper limbs are held, the victim has no attack; if only one limb is held the victim attacks with a -3 penalty to its attack roll; if both limbs are free (i.e., the tentacle is wrapped around the victim's body) then the victim attacks with a -1 penalty to its attack roll. Tentacles grip with a Strength of 18/20. Any creature with a Strength equal to or greater than 18/20 can grasp the tentacle and negate its constriction. This does not free the victim, and the octopus will immediately seek to drag the victim to its mouth to eat it. To break free, a tentacle must be severed; this requires 8 points of damage. (These hit points are in addition to those the octopus gains from its 8 Hit Dice.)

There is also rather a lot of the exception-based design we know and love in the entry: Giant Octopus have a '90% chance' of fleeing if they lose three or more tentacles; adventurers only have a '10% chance' of spotting them, etc. etc. And hey, isn't a cuttlefish a squid? But I can forgive these flaws because, well, I do like a good Octopus.

Possible uses in a game? Giant Octopus ink is used for writing magic scrolls. Their hide can also be made into rain ponchos (I'm not making that up): is this the single weirdest and most obscure example of monster-corpse use in the entire MM?

Kakita Kojiro

02-19-2009 09:53 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9998787)
(I refuse to use the word Octopii!)

HUZZAH! all that quibbling over pluralization finally paid off.

demiurge1138

02-19-2009 12:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 9998787)
Giant Octopus (I refuse to use the word Octopii!)

Good on you! The properly Greek plural would be "octopodes", but "octopuses" is also correct for English. "Octopi" is a bad mishmash of Latin and Greek, and we know what a problem that is (just ask "television").

Wakboth

02-19-2009 06:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

What I noticed about the Giant Octopus entry was that it definitely wasn't written by the PETA Girl! All that talk about how giant octopuses are sneaky, vicious, evil, man-eating critters who snatch unsuspecting sailors for midnight snack, or team up to capsize ships, may not be realistic but it sets up a lot of good encounter ideas.

DMH

02-19-2009 06:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Pendant- They don't have tentacles, they have arms. Squid have arms and tentacles. And they should have a chance to damage armor- the beak is meant to crack arthropod exoskeletons.

Quote:

And hey, isn't a cuttlefish a squid?

Cuttlefish are cuttlefish. Cuttlefish, squid, octopuses and vampire squid are orders within the cephalopods.

EmperorSeth

02-19-2009 11:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

What I don't get is their alignment. For one thing, it's neutral (evil.) Why the parentheses? What's the difference between this and just neutral evil. I suppose it could be just "neutral with evil tendencies," but why not just say that?

More importantly, why and how are they evil? They only have animal intelligence, and they don't do anything that other Neutral Hungry monsters don't already do. What's the point?

Sleeper

02-20-2009 02:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10000956)

What I don't get is their alignment. For one thing, it's neutral (evil.) Why the parentheses? What's the difference between this and just neutral evil. I suppose it could be just "neutral with evil tendencies," but why not just say that?

More importantly, why and how are they evil? They only have animal intelligence, and they don't do anything that other Neutral Hungry monsters don't already do. What's the point?

Original sin. Most natural creatures are just that, natural. Red in tooth and claw perhaps, but in tune with the cycles of the earth and moon, the prey and the predator. A hippo might chomp the arm off an elf who scraped across its back with a canoe, but that's its nature; it's just irritable. They exist in a preformed state, in a perfect Hobbesian world. They just are. But the weft is not always unwarped.

There's something about human flesh. The wendigo, the human turned cannibal turned monster, is not simply an isolated humanoid aberration. There's something wrong with humans. Some say the mind has poisoned the meat; others say in a world of chimaeras, the worst is a weak and unift naked bipedal ape with strange grasping hands and a giant head, that twists and turns branches and stones into teeth and claws and uses them for murder and sport. Before humans, there was no wendigo, vampire, or ghoul.

All we know is that when an animal has tasted the human flesh and goes back for more, it changes. They become hungry avavisms, like the beast of Gévaudan. They grow, and deform. Giant bemaned lions like ghosts and shadows in the darkness; the cackle of the priapic hyena excited by the kill. They experience unnatural and malignant drives, like a fever or disease.

The octopus grows, becomes large. Arms become tentacles, twisting and serrated. Eyes become beady, and the mind inside moves away from the eternal present of the infant and begins to think, to plot. They hunger in their bonelessness for cracking ships, and lust after the choice morsels inside. The gobbling behemoth in wait deep under the seaway's brine is already half-kraken, and no longer a true child of nature.

Littleredfox

02-20-2009 09:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10000181)

vampire squid

Lead to the thought of undead squid in black satin cloaks.

Presumably ex Arboreal squid who've had a run in with with Straad.

Kaiten

02-20-2009 09:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10001740)

Original sin. Most natural creatures are just that, natural. Red in tooth and claw perhaps, but in tune with the cycles of the earth and moon, the prey and the predator. A hippo might chomp the arm off an elf who scraped across its back with a canoe, but that's its nature; it's just irritable. They exist in a preformed state, in a perfect Hobbesian world. They just are. But the weft is not always unwarped.

There's something about human flesh. The wendigo, the human turned cannibal turned monster, is not simply an isolated humanoid aberration. There's something wrong with humans. Some say the mind has poisoned the meat; others say in a world of chimaeras, the worst is a weak and unift naked bipedal ape with strange grasping hands and a giant head, that twists and turns branches and stones into teeth and claws and uses them for murder and sport. Before humans, there was no wendigo, vampire, or ghoul.

All we know is that when an animal has tasted the human flesh and goes back for more, it changes. They become hungry avavisms, like the beast of Gévaudan. They grow, and deform. Giant bemaned lions like ghosts and shadows in the darkness; the cackle of the priapic hyena excited by the kill. They experience unnatural and malignant drives, like a fever or disease.

The octopus grows, becomes large. Arms become tentacles, twisting and serrated. Eyes become beady, and the mind inside moves away from the eternal present of the infant and begins to think, to plot. They hunger in their bonelessness for cracking ships, and lust after the choice morsels inside. The gobbling behemoth in wait deep under the seaway's brine is already half-kraken, and no longer a true child of nature.

Woah, that's almost Lovecraftian there. I suddenly yearn to use a giant octopus in my game.

Mr. Teapot

02-20-2009 09:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Littleredfox (Post 10003497)

Lead to the thought of undead squid in black satin cloaks.

Funny, just the other day I was reading commentary concerning how easy it is to make a vampire squid from hell in 3rd ed D&D, but how it wouldn't resemble the real thing much at all. But I might use that Wikipedia picture to show my players what an Infernal Vampiric Cephalopod would look like.

noisms

02-20-2009 07:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Ogre

Funny how the MM does this to you. You're just merrily trundling through obscure monster after obscure monster, thinking to yourself, "Wow, I don't even remember this" when suddenly TADAH! up pops an entry like Elf or Goblin or Dragon to drag you back to the land of the living. In this case, it's the Ogre.

Let's get this over with straight away: Ogres, in all their three incarnations, are one of my all-time D&D favourites. Maybe not top 10, but top 20 for sure. And I think the reason why I like them is that they are so similar to humans. Really, they are just a big version of us, but without any of the redeeming qualities - like creativity or love. They are our worst side, writ large. They don't have to have green skin or point ears or wings; they're just destructive, greedy and cruel.

I've often thought about creating a campaign setting in which the only non-humans are all proper monsters - i.e. no orcs, gnolls, hobgoblins, elves and the like - just Monsters with a capital 'M'. Ogres, along with Giants, would be the only really humanoid creatures, and would be an almost elemental force, roaming around the outskirts of human society and just wrecking stuff. A little like the Angrborn in Gene Wolfe's The Wizard Knight: brutish embodiments of everything bad about humanity.

Ogre Magi

I never understood why, in 3rd edition, they....well....made the Ogre Mage crap. Because really, they're a very evocative and interesting monster in 2nd edition; I love the pseudo-Asian feel to the flavour text and art. Was it because the 3rd edition crowd thought that the 2nd edition version was in some way offensive? Anyway, I've always felt that Ogre Magi have great untapped potential as a major city-building, civilized race. I actually rather like the idea of them as a Persian-style culture, perhaps like old Khwarezm: vastly wealthy and knowledgeable and slightly debauched, growing fat on sherbets and serviced by slaves, but mighty in magic.

Merrow

Merrow are - little known fact - based on a mythical Gaelic creature of a similar name. In the old stories, though, they basically appear as Mermen and Mermaids, so I'm not sure how, in D&D, they warped into aquatic Ogres. I'll not complain though: aquatic Ogres is a good concept. Sadly, like many of the sea creatures in MM, you have to feel that they could never have legs in a campaign - because how often do characters in a campaign go underwater?

kami2awa

02-20-2009 08:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10005123)

Merrow

Merrow are - little known fact - based on a mythical Gaelic creature of a similar name. In the old stories, though, they basically appear as Mermen and Mermaids, so I'm not sure how, in D&D, they warped into aquatic Ogres. I'll not complain though: aquatic Ogres is a good concept. Sadly, like many of the sea creatures in MM, you have to feel that they could never have legs in a campaign - because how often do characters in a campaign go underwater?

Actually, I think they are one of the easier-to-use aquatic monsters. Don't have the book with me right now, so I can't remember their exact habitat (fresh or salt water), but potentially they could inhabit rivers and lakes, prey on ships and coastal towns, and of course jump out from under bridges in a fairytale manner.

A question about the ogre mage illustration, which I've wondered about since I first read the book; what does he have on his back? It looks like two very thoroughly bound human captives, which struck me as a rather horrible situation to be stuck in...

JRM

02-20-2009 08:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10000181)

Pendant- They don't have tentacles, they have arms. Squid have arms and tentacles. And they should have a chance to damage armor- the beak is meant to crack arthropod exoskeletons.

Well while people with an interest in biology will make that distinction, I suspect a common English speaker would use arms/tentacles interchangeably for an Octopuses' limbs, and have no objection to that.

Although we should really be calling them legs anyway, since that's what "pus" means, they're not called Octobrachs after all. I'm guessing that's the correct plural for brach (Greek "arm").

Now that gives me an idea for a monster...

JRM

02-20-2009 08:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10000956)

What I don't get is their alignment. For one thing, it's neutral (evil.) Why the parentheses? What's the difference between this and just neutral evil. I suppose it could be just "neutral with evil tendencies," but why not just say that?

More importantly, why and how are they evil? They only have animal intelligence, and they don't do anything that other Neutral Hungry monsters don't already do. What's the point?

My assumption was that Giant Octopodes are tainted with malevolence giving them an instinct for cruelty, maybe due to interbreeding with demons in the dawn of time. If they were Neutral Evil they'd be consciously and actively seeking to perform Evil, for their own pleasure and to serve the Cause of the lower planes.

Or maybe Giant Octopuses used to be sapient, Exceptionally-intelligent worshippers of Demogorgon and other fiends. They performed great offenses against the Gods and Nature, resulting them in being cursed down to the level of beasts, but they still retain lingering traces of their old knowledge and preference for Evil.

noisms

02-20-2009 09:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10005365)

My assumption was that Giant Octopodes are tainted with malevolence giving them an instinct for cruelty, maybe due to interbreeding with demons in the dawn of time. If they were Neutral Evil they'd be consciously and actively seeking to perform Evil, for their own pleasure and to serve the Cause of the lower planes.

Or maybe Giant Octopuses used to be sapient, Exceptionally-intelligent worshippers of Demogorgon and other fiends. They performed great offenses against the Gods and Nature, resulting them in being cursed down to the level of beasts, but they still retain lingering traces of their old knowledge and preference for Evil.

I like it. A big part of what's entertaining about this thread is the histories that people have been giving the various monsters.

One thing I should have mentioned about the Giant Octopus is that it ought really to have higher than 'animal' intelligence, given what we know about cephalopod brains. I mean, if PETA girl got away with giving Dolphins an intelligence of 11-12, then Giant Octopus at least deserve a semi or a low!

JRM

02-20-2009 10:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10005123)

Ogre

*I've often thought about creating a campaign setting in which the only non-humans are all proper monsters - i.e. no orcs, gnolls, hobgoblins, elves and the like - just Monsters with a capital 'M'. Ogres, along with Giants, would be the only really humanoid creatures, and would be an almost elemental force, roaming around the outskirts of human society and just wrecking stuff. A little like the Angrborn in Gene Wolfe's The Wizard Knight: brutish embodiments of everything bad about humanity.*

That'd work, and I've heard similar notions elsewhere. Would you have had different monsters be the personification of other forms of evil? If ogres are brutal violence in the flesh, are Beholder the incarnation of Tyranny, et cetera.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10005123)

I never understood why, in 3rd edition, they....well....made the Ogre Mage crap. Because really, they're a very evocative and interesting monster in 2nd edition; I love the pseudo-Asian feel to the flavour text and art. Was it because the 3rd edition crowd thought that the 2nd edition version was in some way offensive? Anyway, I've always felt that Ogre Magi have great untapped potential as a major city-building, civilized race. I actually rather like the idea of them as a Persian-style culture, perhaps like old Khwarezm: vastly wealthy and knowledgeable and slightly debauched, growing fat on sherbets and serviced by slaves, but mighty in magic.

There isn't anything in 3rd editions SRD that prevents pseudo-Asian Ogre Magi, I have a bigger problem with the way that the 3rd edition spells work mean that an Ogre Magi is a much less effective mage than it should be for the level of adventurers its CR suggests it should face.

The Last Conformist

02-20-2009 10:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10005335)

Well while people with an interest in biology will make that distinction, I suspect a common English speaker would use arms/tentacles interchangeably for an Octopuses' limbs, and have no objection to that.

The annoying part is that by the general definition of "tentacle" usually given in invertebrate zoology, cephalopod arms are tentacles.

See eg. Maggenti's Online Dictionary of Invertebrate Zoology:

tentacle n. [L. tentaculum, feeler] Any elongate flexible appendage usually near the mouth.

Just for fun, see also the entry for "arm":

arm n. [...] [4]b. The tentacles of an octopod.

Thus, saying that people interested in biology will make the distinction is much too strong. They may make it, particularly if they're cephalopod specialists or talking specifically about the different kinds of appendages in squid, but they often don't.

Wakboth

02-20-2009 10:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Has anyone noticed how little the ogres weigh for their height? 9' 6" and 325 lbs ends you up with a BMI of 17,6, which is clearly underweight. (Cheating a little, I checked the next entry, for half-ogres: they stand 7 to 8 feet tall, and weigh 315 to 425 lbs.) Someone has goofed here!

Contrary to what the ecology section says, I always thought that ogres, perhaps as the reflection of the bad side of humanity, were the humanoid monsters that were easiest to get along. Sure, they're cruel and greedy and brutal, but they're also dumb and lazy. A human village and an ogre tribe can exist surprisingly close to one another, as long as the humans are willing to accept the occasional loss of sheep or cows, and are ready to thwack the ogres every now and then, as a reminder for them to keep to their side of the forest.

DMH

02-20-2009 10:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I never cared that much for ogre magi because I used dao or marids with that personality/niche.

Merrow are useful because they are like sahuagen and can walk on land for hours before retreating to the water. The best way to force the PCs to an aquatic campaign is to have either steal something from them and take it home.

JRM

02-20-2009 11:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10005488)

I like it. A big part of what's entertaining about this thread is the histories that people have been giving the various monsters.

One thing I should have mentioned about the Giant Octopus is that it ought really to have higher than 'animal' intelligence, given what we know about cephalopod brains. I mean, if PETA girl got away with giving Dolphins an intelligence of 11-12, then Giant Octopus at least deserve a semi or a low!

I have a half-memory that the 1st edition AD&D Monster Manual gave giant octopuses a higher int score (Semi-intelligent?), but it may just be wishful thinking.

JRM

02-20-2009 11:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10005818)

The annoying part is that by the general definition of "tentacle" usually given in invertebrate zoology, cephalopod arms are tentacles.

See eg. Maggenti's Online Dictionary of Invertebrate Zoology:

tentacle n. [L. tentaculum, feeler] Any elongate flexible appendage usually near the mouth.

Just for fun, see also the entry for "arm":

arm n. [...] [4] b. The tentacles of an octopod.

Thus, saying that people interested in biology will make the distinction is much too strong. They may make it, particularly if they're cephalopod specialists or talking specifically about the different kinds of appendages in squid, but they often don't.

No disagreement there, I started putting in some caveats when I was drafting the post but they ended up looking clumsy so ended up dropping them for a simple but exaggerated form. something like "It's mainly only those with an interest in marine biology who will be likely to make a fuss over the distinction between octopus arms and squid tentacles" is possibly more accurate.

I also thought about mentioning the word tentacle is derived from Latin for a "feeler", since most squids use their tentacles to shoot out and grasp prey more than to feel around for things.

JRM

02-20-2009 11:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10005829)

Has anyone noticed how little the ogres weigh for their height? 9' 6" and 325 lbs ends you up with a BMI of 17,6, which is clearly underweight. (Cheating a little, I checked the next entry, for half-ogres: they stand 7 to 8 feet tall, and weigh 315 to 425 lbs.) Someone has goofed here!

Oh yes, I noticed that to. Indeed, many of AD&D's oversized humanoids have wildly inappropriate weights. Didn't we cover that in the Giant discussion?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10005829)

Contrary to what the ecology section says, I always thought that ogres, perhaps as the reflection of the bad side of humanity, were the humanoid monsters that were easiest to get along. Sure, they're cruel and greedy and brutal, but they're also dumb and lazy. A human village and an ogre tribe can exist surprisingly close to one another, as long as the humans are willing to accept the occasional loss of sheep or cows, and are ready to thwack the ogres every now and then, as a reminder for them to keep to their side of the forest.

I would think it would be more practical to go the goblinoid route of the humans integrating the ogres into their community rather than letting the tribe "stay on their side of the forest". That way, they can constantly keep an eye on the Ogres to crackdown on any stupid/hostile plans they develop, teach them how to be more productive/cooperative citizens (as much as that's possible), use their strength to do heavy lifting, have them at hand to send in first against the enemy if they're attacked, and get them drunk/give them drugged food and slit all their throats in their sleep if they decide they don't want having these ogres around.

YojimboC

02-20-2009 11:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I liked that there were no orcs in Dragonlance; the ogres filled the niche of the "primary humanoid antagonist" in that setting, and helped differentiate it (a tad) from Tolkien and D&D's Tolkien heavy material.

Generally, I like ogres myself. I use them a lot. In the old days, before we started giving monsters class levels and such, throwing ogres at a party was the only way to get a mid-level group worried about humanoids (well, giant humanoids).

They are one of the great iconic monsters of D&D, albeit not one of the flashier ones. They're basically big cavemen with clubs. Nasty brutes, high strength and decent HPs, but they do tend to go down pretty easily.

Felix

02-21-2009 10:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10005829)

Has anyone noticed how little the ogres weigh for their height? 9' 6" and 325 lbs ends you up with a BMI of 17,6, which is clearly underweight. (Cheating a little, I checked the next entry, for half-ogres: they stand 7 to 8 feet tall, and weigh 315 to 425 lbs.) Someone has goofed here!

In the Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Mr. Hyde is actually smaller than Jekyll, because he lacks any good nature, so is literally less of a man. Clearly, ogres are more evil than half-ogres, so much lighter.

If this theory is true, we just need to figure out what creature ogres would be if they were re-united with their good half, and how they got separated in the first place...

JRM

02-21-2009 06:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Felix (Post 10008431)

In the Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Mr. Hyde is actually smaller than Jekyll, because he lacks any good nature, so is literally less of a man. Clearly, ogres are more evil than half-ogres, so much lighter.

If this theory is true, we just need to figure out what creature ogres would be if they were re-united with their good half, and how they got separated in the first place...

Hmm, maybe if Jekyll-Ogres are three to four times heavier than the human they split from, their Hyde counterparts are three to four times lighter, therefore an Ogre's opposite alignment twin is ... a brownie!;

YojimboC

02-23-2009 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

What is it about ogres that makes such uninteresting discussion? I can't think of anything cool to say about them either, but I feel like there's some massive amount of untapped potential for something wicked cool here.

I hope we don't fizzle out like this when we get to orcs.

Inyssiis

02-23-2009 12:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10015339)

What is it about ogres that makes such uninteresting discussion? I can't think of anything cool to say about them either, but I feel like there's some massive amount of untapped potential for something wicked cool here.

I hope we don't fizzle out like this when we get to orcs.

Well, we got a ton of discussion out of giants earlier. They share a lot of the same conceptual space; ogres are basically just adolescent hill giant jocks.

And then there are trolls, which claim the real "primal, slightly unnatural fairy-tale savagery" space in my mind.

Aside from what we've already gone over, the only really good thing you get out of normal ogres is their propensity to spawn more interesting overlords. You've got ogre-magi, of course; but then you also have 4E's four varieties of oni, not to mention 3.5's ken-kuni, ken-li, and ken-sun (they're in Monster Manual V, and they are dynamite--as are a lot of things from that excellent book, in fact).

Inyssius

02-23-2009 12:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10005123)
Ogre Magi

I never understood why, in 3rd edition, they....well....made the Ogre Mage crap. Because really, they're a very evocative and interesting monster in 2nd edition; I love the pseudo-Asian feel to the flavour text and art. Was it because the 3rd edition crowd thought that the 2nd edition version was in some way offensive?

Apparently, they simply didn't think about it. As Dave Noonan \(now fired, dammit\) said,

Quote:

How about a monster with the following spell-like abilities: charm person, cone of cold, darkness, invisibility, gaseous form, polymorph, and sleep. See the theme there? See how the monster's magic powers let it tap into a cool mythological root or enable an interesting encounter?

Me neither.

This monster has two separate abilities (darkness and invisibility) that both effectively turn the encounter into a game of Battleship. "Is the monster in square A-4? You sank my monster!" And it has gaseous form, because apparently it needs a third getaway ability. The monster has sleep, but the creature will never be used against PCs with 4 Hit Dice or less. And polymorph? Don't get me started on polymorph.

Does this monster sound even more random when I tell you it's a flying giant with spell resistance and regeneration

This is a real monster: The orge mage. Why is it this way? Because when we redesigned monsters for the 3.0 edition of the game in 2000, we opted for a more literal, almost line-by-line translation of the 2nd edition monsters. As a result, the ogre mage is a bit of a proud nail. It's a CR 8 monster with a 9d6 area attack and only 37 hit points. If we wanted intelligent, rapacious, cruel magic-using giants, we could have done better by retaining the concept, not retaining the specific abilities.

noisms

02-23-2009 06:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10015339)

What is it about ogres that makes such uninteresting discussion? I can't think of anything cool to say about them either, but I feel like there's some massive amount of untapped potential for something wicked cool here.

I hope we don't fizzle out like this when we get to orcs.

The iconic monsters are tough. What hasn't been done with elves, dwarves, goblins, kobolds, ogres and orcs?

noisms

02-23-2009 06:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Ooze/Slime/Jelly

I'll do all of these in one go, because...well, you know. You have to hand it to the designers, though - they really do take a genuine shot at making the oozes interesting: "The oozes, slimes and jellies of the underworld are hideous, amorphous creatures that are the bane of all that lives, dissolving the weapons, armor, and flesh of their victims." Ooooooh!

One thing I do rather like about the oozes, slimes and jellies is that they are both mindless and relentless - like zombies or Aliens or the Borg. I wonder if you could base a campaign around that - Olive Slimes gradually spreading their tendrils across an entire continent. A genuine possibility for post-apocalyptic fantasy, in fact: A thousand years after the Olive Slime plague destroyed the land of Blah, the first explorers from Soandso country come ashore....

Ochre Jelly

This is basically a big amoeba which you can blast into several smaller amoebas (amoebae?) and which roams the dungeon looking for people to eat. It is "sometimes tolerated...for its janitorial services".

Grey Ooze

A pretty boring ooze-equivalent to the rust monster, which can dissolve metal. Enlivened by the idea of skilled metal-workers using tiny grey oozes to etch inscriptions into armour, weapons or jewellery.

Crystal Ooze

This is a water-bound equivalent of the grey ooze, which attacks leather, wood and other organic materials rather than metals.

Gelatinous Cube

Ah, the Katamari Roller of D&D. There isn't a whole lot more to say about it than that, though....

Green Slime

This is probably the nastiest of the oozes/slimes/jellies: it grows uncontrollably and kills within 1-4 rounds without hope of resurrection.

Olive Slime

This parasitic creature attaches itself to your spinal column and gradually takes you over until you become an Olive Slime Creature - essentially a zombie. A little like a D&D version of a Body Snatcher, maybe. They are telepathically linked to their host, and go around attacking other living beings in order to spread the slime disease. Probably the most usable and interesting of the various oozes.

Mustard Jelly

This breed was created when a young wizardress tried to polymorph herself into an Ochre Jelly and something went wrong. Why she wanted to do that anyway is left unsaid. It can emit noxious lethargy-inducing vapours and split itself into segments to attack.

Stunjelly

This is essentially a Gelatinous Cube which can paralyse victims and slowly digest them. Nasty way to go.

Äkräs

02-23-2009 07:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)
Ochre Jelly

I have a soft spot for ochre jellies since they featured in my first contact with RPGs: my cousin was holding a 1st ed session for some of his friends and they fought an ochre jelly. I was an onlooker for a while since we were visiting them at the time.

Quote:

Gelatinous Cube

Ah, the Katamari Roller of D&D. There isn't a whole lot more to say about it than that, though....

Except that it was originally designed by Old Geezer, if I remember correctly.

DMH

02-23-2009 07:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)
A genuine possibility for post-apocalyptic fantasy, in fact: A thousand years after the Olive Slime plague destroyed the land of Blah, the first explorers from Soandso country come ashore....

And find something like the Sea of Corruption in Nausicaa or the flying version I did in the Mutant Future critters thread.

Oozes can be fun and I find them much more effective than zombies and other undead. The only one I don't care for is green slime- too lethal and it can't move (something I find very odd for a cave roof dwelling monster).

You missed the slithering tracker.

Wakboth

02-23-2009 08:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10015339)

What is it about ogres that makes such uninteresting discussion? I can't think of anything cool to say about them either, but I feel like there's some massive amount of untapped potential for something wicked cool here.

I think the problem is that the ogre is a pretty pedestrian monster. It's big, dumb, ugly and strong. They're not as big as giants, as ravenous and monstrous as trolls, not as smart as goblinoids, not as flexible as humans, not as iconic as orcs...

Anyway, did we jump over the half-ogre entirely? They're more interesting than the purely brutish ogres, but they've never (to my knowledge) been expanded on.

There's a little bit of fluff-crunch mismatch early on in the half-ogre entry, where they're described as "little shorter, but significantly smarter, wielding a weapon with more skill than might have been expected." Unfortunately, their THACO is the same 17 as ogres'...

In the ecology section, "the sages" are mentioned as having long worried about why half-ogres are one-half human (orc-ogre crossbreeds are either ologs or ogrillons), and about what this might imply about the relationship between humanity and ogre-kind. But no worries, we're not related to the big ugly brutes, not at all; they're just like orcs in that they can breed with everything else.

The whole paragraph echoes in-character racism to me, along with the mention about the "horrid hybrids", mongrelmen, being the end result of this racial mixing and how their chaotic evil (actually, they're LN!) tendencies obviously come from orcs (who are LE in 2e!) and ogres.

...

You know, I just got an idea about more interesting ogres and half-ogres. What if "half-ogre" is the natural state of ogres - big, rough, strong, but not especially dumb or evil by themselves? They, humans and halflings are all related, having been created by the same deity, or having sprung from a common ancestor.

However, at some point, something went horribly wrong with the ogres, and their blood has grown thick and sluggish. Now the pure-blooded ogres are crude, dull monsters who think only of eating and crushing and who wallow in their own filth. The only way to avoid this degradation is to breed with humans, to thin their ogreish blood so that there is still a new generation that can seek a solution to this tragedy of the race.

Humans, of course, are much more familiar with the thick-blooded monster ogres than with the true ogre clans who interbreed with humans, and tend to react very very badly to the idea that they should help keeping a smarter race of ogres around...

(Heavily inspired by the trolls of Fredrik K. Andersson; see "Day of the Lure", for example. Should be SFW, but may be borderline NSFW.)

ESkemp

02-23-2009 10:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10016268)

I think the problem is that the ogre is a pretty pedestrian monster. It's big, dumb, ugly and strong. They're not as big as giants, as ravenous and monstrous as trolls, not as smart as goblinoids, not as flexible as humans, not as iconic as orcs...

I dunno. I think they have their own portion of the iconic mindshare as the "wicked ogres" from fairy tales, but unfortunately D&D art doesn't generally play to that. An ogre is a dangerous man-eater in folklore, sort of the brutish male equivalent to the hag, but for the most part D&D tends to depict them as creatures of varying resemblance to humanity in caveman-like skins with big clubs. The Warhammer universe does a pretty good job of making some fairly iconic ogres, in no small part because they deliberately set out to say "People are afraid of ogres because they will eat you." One quick setup of a bunch of ruthlessly carnivorous gluttons who worship an ever-hungry maw-god later, and there you go.

If there were more of an obvious range from "dumb ogre in skins" to "cunning man-eating sorcerous monster," I think they'd be a considerably more popular critter. There'd be more reasons to use them than the simple "Well, the players are ready for 4+1 HD now."

noisms

02-23-2009 10:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Crap, I forgot both the Half-Ogres and the Slithering Tracker. I'll do those tomorrow.

Sleeper

02-24-2009 12:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)

Ooze/Slime/Jelly

I'll do all of these in one go, because...well, you know. You have to hand it to the designers, though - they really do take a genuine shot at making the oozes interesting: "The oozes, slimes and jellies of the underworld are hideous, amorphous creatures that are the bane of all that lives, dissolving the weapons, armor, and flesh of their victims."

Ooooooh!

One thing I do rather like about the oozes, slimes and jellies is that they are both mindless and relentless - like zombies or Aliens or the Borg. I wonder if you could base a campaign around that - Olive Slimes gradually spreading their tendrils across an entire continent. A genuine possibility for post-apocalyptic fantasy, in fact: A thousand years after the Olive Slime plague destroyed the land of Blah, the first explorers from Soandso country come ashore....

I always liked the slimes and oozes. Along with the mimics and the otyugh, the gelatinous cube is a classic example of a monster designed for the dungeon. That raises several possibilities.

Have dungeons been around a really, really long time, long enough for species to develop with characteristics that are specifically geared toward the dungeon ecology? This raises the questions: Why have dungeons existed for millions of years? Who made them? Why?

Or perhaps evolution under the influence of high magic jumps in spurts, causing radical changes over a very short period of time. Perhaps through some kind of sharing of the genetic code between vastly different species? (Which doesn't exactly happen among animals and other more complex species in the real world.) Or sympathetic magic? Perhaps humans who live in the mountains too long become dwarves, while creatures trapped in the dungeon become dungeoned?

Or similar to the way certain insects, coyotes, rats, and pigeons have adapted to live in cities: Are they invasive species that just had the right set of characteristics to thrive in the peculiar environment? Or are they like dogs or cattle, domesticated and specifically cultivated, bred, and perhaps even engineered for the use of the dungeon masters? So who are these dungeon masters? What kind of cooperative, economic, or other value do the new breeds of monsters serve? Domestication goes back into prehistory; we're back to asking: How old exactly are dungeons?

Explaining why all this happens, the implied natural history of D&D, is even more fascinating than trying to make sense of the economy. And what impact does it have on the world? A medieval world where cities didn't become cesspits of filth, thanks to the otyugh? Where high-grade steels are possible because a variation of the gray ooze eats out all the impurities from a chunk of iron and leaves behind strengthening carbon deposits? (An alternate explanation for damascening.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)

One thing I do rather like about the oozes, slimes and jellies is that they are both mindless and relentless - like zombies or Aliens or the Borg. I wonder if you could base a campaign around that - Olive Slimes gradually spreading their tendrils across an entire continent. A genuine possibility for post-apocalyptic fantasy, in fact: A thousand years after the Olive Slime plague destroyed the land of Blah, the first explorers from Soandso country come ashore....

I do like the idea of adding the slimes and oozes to the list of "monsters as disease". We already have dozens of varieties of undead and lycanthropes. Fiercely contagious and with an incredibly short incubation time, they'd spread like wildfire. Even worse, they think. A single deliberate diaspora could spread it across the world. Imagine if the Andromeda Strain could not only foil simple quarantine precautions, but if it could problem solve, build tools, and cast spells? Humanity and all the other related "good" species would be under the constant threat of extinction.

The oozes aren't that smart, but what if we've already lost a part of the continent? Under the sway of the molds, with smarter varieties like the myconids constantly threatening to burst out and overwhelm civilization?

Which explains why adventuring parties exist. They might kill a few dragons or manticores for publicity, but their real purpose? Scorched earth. Keeping an eye to the entrails and a nose to the vapors, so they discover the infections before they get out of hand, and exterminate everything. Because it's the only way to be sure.

Old guilds, chartered royal companies, they are the last best hope of humanity.

Which is why the normal reactionary, prudish, and backward populace tolerates them. Coming into the village, living like kings. Taking what they want, with the threat of force. Stealing their fairest and bravest the sons and daughters with their libertine sexual ways and the lure of excitement and a life that doesn't involve shoveling dung for 14 hours a day for the rest of their lives. The villagers hate them, yes, but their myths and tales hammer it home. They're necessary. Against all the evils in the night. So grudgingly they succor the too-human monsters who slaughtered their neighbors in the hamlet over the hill, razed their homes and left not a single living or unliving soul among the now-empty groves.

That's why it's a medieval world. Peasants are serfs, slaves to the land and their feudal master. If free commerce and trade existed, and peasants were allowed to move from land to land, there would be no stopping these plagues. Only the adventuring parties have a special dispensation, and they're closely examined after every quest to make sure they aren't infected. By a hidebound caste with an incredible intolerance for anything that smacks of infection. By the priests, of course.

Quote:

Originally Posted by ESkemp (Post 10016555)

I dunno. I think they have their own portion of the iconic mindshare as the "wicked ogres" from fairy tales, but unfortunately D&D art doesn't generally play to that. An ogre is a dangerous man-eater in folklore, sort of the brutish male equivalent to the hag, but for the most part D&D tends to depict them as creatures of varying resemblance to humanity in caveman-like skins with big clubs. The Warhammer universe does a pretty good job of making some fairly iconic ogres, in no small part because they deliberately set out to say "People are afraid of ogres because they will eat you." One quick setup of a bunch of ruthlessly carnivorous gluttons who worship an ever-hungry maw-god later, and there you go.

If there were more of an obvious range from "dumb ogre in skins" to "cunning man-eating sorcerous monster," I think they'd be a considerably more popular critter. There'd be more reasons to use them than the simple "Well, the players are ready for 4+1 HD now."

We did discuss this a bit, back in the hag entry. I like the idea of ogres as puberty gone wrong. Casting them as uneducated but clever and with a wicked sense of humor would make them better denizens of a haunted forest. Highwaymen that aren't doomed to be driven out by the smarter humans. Ambitious lackeys of a dragon, going on esoteric missions. Laughing brutes notorious for playing crude games with the wee little races when they're bored. Maybe even a little of the Wild Hunt.

Making them explicitly one species with the hags would be a step in the right direction, and perhaps emphasizing the magic. Like the goblins, who really should have a thousand shapes and forms, the ogres could be inclined toward a natural form of magic. Even the less talented types would have petty little cantrips. The ability to change their hair color. The more talented would be the magi or the hags, learning magical tricks like invisibility or haruspicy or the ability to change their appearance.

demiurge1138

02-24-2009 02:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

The best thing about gelatinous cubes is their transparency. Coupled with people who are terrible at Spot checks (aka, almost every character in every game I run) can lead to good times. For instance, in my Prehistoric game (all of the PC races were kobolds and lizardfolk and other reptilian things), one of the PCs stayed behind in the underground Kobold Kapital for a day while the rest of the party took off "because I can catch up", what with his very good move speed. So he takes off, running a mile a minute, and I say "make a Spot check". Which he failed. And have the rest of the party make Listen checks. Which they failed.

So the party hears their ally moving towards them, shouting a greeting which suddenly comes to a strangled stop. And they turn around to see their ally suspended in the air, his flesh slowly dissolving in the gelatinous cube that was sneaking up on the rest of them.

There's also something in the 3e Arms and Equipment Guide that's so crazy I have to share. There's mention of gelatinous cube riders, who wear a ring that encases them in a bubble of force, which they then tempt the cube to swallow. Once inside, they direct the cube's movements by slamming on the bubble, sending ripples in the cube's surface in the desired direction.

Oh, and because Bob the Angry Flower is always relevant:

<http://www.angryflower.com/everyb.gif>

6inTruder

02-24-2009 03:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

"Cube!"

Kakita Kojiro

02-24-2009 07:59 AM

I once had a GM afflict us with, not only a Gelatinous Cube, but also a Gelatinous Tetrahedron, Gelatinous Octahedron, Gelatinous Dodecahedron, and Gelatinous Icosahedron. Because he was an engineer, he probably had each one with special powerz varying by what Platonic Solid they were... but, eh. We just ganged up on the Gelatinous Tetrahedron, because we all hated those damn little caltrop dice, anyway.

However, since I was looking for a good world-after-the-world-ends idea, I'm totally going to have a world that had been overrun by slimes, oozes, and jellies. The oceans long since assimilated into one, cyclopean Ochre Jelly. The lands empty of all life but slimes and molds, with lakes that are enormous oozes linked by rivers that are no more than their mating pseudopods. Maybe throw in some sentient olive slime, or yellow mold. Should make a nice twist on a "world overcome by zombie apocalypse" to encounter.

Mr. Teapot

02-24-2009 09:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10015339)

What is it about ogres that makes such uninteresting discussion?

- A) Ogres fell on the weekend, when people are busy doing stuff not at their computers.
- B) the Ogre entry in the 2nd ed MM is notably lacking in interesting flavor text or plot hooks.
- C) they're a really straightforward monster to use (especially if they serve some other smarter monster) so you don't get the "desperately looking for ways to make something lame into something cool" that appears in other entries in this thread.
- D) Iconic monster paralysis (everybody's done a bunch with these things already = harder to do something new)

Those all get combined to make for lame discussion.

Mr. Teapot

02-24-2009 09:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)

Ah, the Katamari Roller of D&D. There isn't a whole lot more to say about it than that, though....

Now I need me a monster that grows bigger in size as it rolls stuff up into it. When it reduces a PC to 0 HP would be too uncommon: when it disarms an enemy? Whenever it hits an enemy? When it's missed by an attack?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)

*This parasitic creature attaches itself to your spinal column and gradually takes you over until you become an Olive Slime Creature - essentially a zombie. A little like a D&D version of a Body Snatcher, maybe. They are telepathically linked to their host, and go around attacking other living beings in order to spread the slime disease. Probably the most usable and interesting of the various oozes.

Weird that these get tagged as most usable and interesting, since they're the least commonly found kind. If any adventures I've seen are to judge, anyway. Slime creating zombie things is more compelling a plot than a puddle of green goo, though.

JRM

02-24-2009 07:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi (Post 10015404)

Apparently, they simply didn't think about it. As Dave Noonan (now fired, damnit) said, Plus Mike Mearls did a 'Monster Makeover' of the 3E Ogre Magi into a sneaky leadership type.

While I agree with some of his modifications (Ogre Magi should definitely be a lower CR than 8, and I like the idea of giving them fast healing instead of regeneration), some of the points I disagree with (e.g. complaining they can't use sleep against the typical party they encounter, there are many Japanese stories about monsters stealing/robbing/tormenting people after putting them to sleep I think they really have to have this power. In such stories the 'heroes' end up escaping the sleep-effect or are immune to it, so why not translate that into the Ogre Magi could neutralize the low-level guards of the people who call the adventurers in? Or, if you really want them to put the PCs to sleep, give the Magi deeper slumber instead).

Oh, and limiting the OM's use of invisibility would solve excessive use of the "hit and fade and regenerate", but I'm not so sure I want that. I like the idea that the party have to devise some trick or trap to prevent the 'Demon Ogre' plaguing the village from escaping to heal and return the next night.

JRM

02-24-2009 07:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10015339)

What is it about ogres that makes such uninteresting discussion? I can't think of anything cool to say about them either, but I feel like there's some massive amount of untapped potential for something wicked cool here.

I hope we don't fizzle out like this when we get to orcs.

Maybe if you just make them recurrent NPCs long enough, some will end up "wicked cool"?

In my old homebrew campaign there were a lot of ogres and a few half-ogres (the latter have all been half ogre and half half-orc so far). Maybe a few examples of them would help:

There's a tribe of ogres in the mountains whose chief has married a half-orc cleric. Some of the PCs have now made deals with them, hiring them as "border guards" who give safe passage to trade caravans bearing a special pass (while not extending the same courtesy to the PC's trade rivals, needless to say).

One of those PCs has a half-ogre henchman (one of the half-ogre offspring of the chief mentioned above), who deliberately overdoes the "stupid and brutal" stick but is actually more cunning, if not quite as intelligent, as his employer.

Sometimes I add magical traits to ogres, to give them more of a fabulous feel. I've had an Ogre Bandit with a few levels of sorcerer, and a more "fairy tale" ogre who was just a standard ogre with a few minor magical items, including one that let him disguise himself as a man-sized humanoid. That ogre disguised itself as a dwarf and met up with the party, and succeeded in capturing the halfling who he carried home and had his enslaved house-servant put in a pie. Fortunately, the rest of the party got their before he was placed in the over.

There's also a tribe of anthropophagous "fairy tale" ogres led by a powerful sorceress ogress who have long picked off the occasional human in one part of the campaign world. These regard the local tribesmen as being their "herd", so when other monsters attack their 'livestock' (e.g. an outbreak of undead) they may co-operate with some human adventurers to eliminate the mutual threat.

JRM

02-24-2009 11:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10016268)

(Heavily inspired by the trolls of Fredrik K. Andersson; see "Day of the Lure", for example. Should be SFW, but may be borderline NSFW.)

Andersson also has an interesting interpretation of the Nightmare as a spectral horse that torments those who abuse equines by sitting upon their chests as they sleep. See picture 102 in that gallery.

It may just be me, but there's something rather disturbingly suggestive about that picture.

Wakshaani

02-25-2009 12:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Backtracking a bit to Ogres... absolutely they have to be man-eaters. Make "Grind your bones to make my bread" a trueism that makes people start to rethink the whole "Let's go stab 'em" mentality... it's one thing if you expect an Orc band to capture you for slaves or maybe just cut you down with an axe, quite another to see an ogre eating a sentient being (Possibly living!) and know that you're next on his plate. Make "Ogre Chef" a popular thing in humanoid cultures, where invading an evil lair could well find the kitchen, with meaty chunks, discarded bones, and an Ogre in a blood-stained apron, wielding a big ol' meat cleaver, and more than happy to dunk a halfling straight into his boiling stewpot after a grapple check.

Which reminds me.

You should always, ALWAYS, abutt your Ogre Kingdoms with your Halfling Lands. The two go together like bread and butter, with lazy, ever-hungry Ogres bullying the halflings who, in turn, half to out-think and out-quick their way from being the morning meal.

Ogres take up the role of cavalry in most "Evil Armies", being large, charge-oriented smashing types who can tear apart a line formation and trample the average malitiaman under foot. Don't be afraid to outfit the rare Ogre in heavy armor and greataxe, instead of simple furs and a club, as the hobgoblin captains go out of their way to outfit the big guys properly.

JRM

02-25-2009 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 10021771)

Backtracking a bit to Ogres... absolutely they have to be man-eaters. Make "Grind your bones to make my bread" a trueism that makes people start to rethink the whole "Let's go stab 'em" mentality... it's one thing if you expect an Orc band to capture you for slaves or maybe just cut you down with an axe, quite another to see an ogre eating a sentient being (Possibly living!) and know that you're next on his plate. Make "Ogre Chef" a popular thing in humanoid cultures, where invading an evil lair could well find the kitchen, with meaty chunks, discarded bones, and an Ogre in a blood-stained apron, wielding a big ol' meat cleaver,

The more intelligent breeds of ogre are not mere rippers of man-flesh but connoisseurs of anthropophagy. That unfortunate the ogre is eating alive may have been force-fed a special diet for weeks before being tortured to give their flesh that additional tang of adrenaline.

Ogres are longer lived than men, have a much better developed sense of taste and smell (hence their ability to smell somebody's nationality - "Fee Fi Fo Fum, I smell the blood of an Englishman), love to eat and can stomach stuff that would make a rat blench. It's not surprising that the longer-lived ogre cultures have developed a highly sophisticated cuisine, albeit one that may be disturbing to most humans. A skilled ogre chef is in great demand amongst humanoid tribes, not only is it a status symbol for a orc chief to have his meals cooked by an Ogre Master, the ogre's mastery of diet can improve the health of the other tribesorcs, help preserve foodstores (and make the spoiled ones taste more palatable) plus, as an additional bonus, all Ogre chefs are masters of humanoid anatomy, so can double as proficient surgeons and torturers.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakshaani (Post 10021771)

and more than happy to dunk a halfling straight into his boiling stewpot after a grapple check.

No, no no! Boiling a halfling in stock ruins the texture of its soft meat. You singe the hair off its head and feet in a fire, then dip it in Grogblar Number three batter before plunging the halfling whole into a vat of boiling oil. Done right, such a tempura halfling is both succulent and crispy, and is sure to impress the more refined Ogre Mage's palate.

Sleeper

02-25-2009 02:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Anthrophagy can be fun, but I think it just further confuses ogres and giants.

I think the tricky magical connection might be the best way to differentiate the two. There's some speculation that the ogre was based on Gilles de Rais (aka Bluebeard, though not the same person as the wife-killing one). He was serial killer who fought alongside Joan of Arc in the 100 Years War, and was eventually hanged for sodomy, heresy, witchcraft, and of course murder. Another source is the Jekyll and Hyde story.

Unlike giants, which are an entirely separate breed, perhaps ogres are humans, gone wrong. Ogrism might be a disease or an affliction, caused not by an infection but a curse, the result of certain depraved acts. When a human commits certain abhorrent sexual crimes or stealthy yet brutal murder (think "Murder of the Rue Morgue", not just a standard passion killing), they start to manifest bestial traits. Wiry hair sprouts, from eyebrows to knuckles. The body bulges and grows, becoming muscled (not power-lift muscled, but bulky natural muscles that seem like a layer of fat until you see the corded thews ripple). They gain inhuman strength and stature, though they become hunched and heavy-browed. Their finger nails become almost like claws, and their canines extend.

Sometimes this is a permanent thing. A wendigo might be a particularly degenerate and feral example. Sometimes it is more evanescent; the hideous transformation appears in the middle of a blind rage or when indulging in a particularly foul act, and then vanishes again. Almost like a second personality, that takes over and abets their crimes. Violent raging youths who commit unspeakable crimes on the travelers they waylay, corrupt elderly nobles who kidnap and torture young maidens and hide behind a veneer of civility and frailty, outcast and rejected heretics burning with a desire for twisted revenge. This can also be caused by experimenting in certain vile corners of sorcery. De Rais squandered his wealth, and supposedly tried to sacrifice children to a demon to regain it, which seems perfectly fitting. Rarely true magicians, they often learn a few dirty magical tricks. To hide themselves, to deceive.

Mr. Teapot

02-25-2009 03:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10021948)

That unfortunate the ogre is eating alive may have been force-fed a special diet for weeks before being tortured to give their flesh that additional tang of adrenaline.

A PC is kidnapped by ogres, who instead of torturing them and eating right away, the PC lives a life of luxury: nice sumptuous apartment, daily massages, a diet consisting of rich fatty foods and copious amounts of beer... only to discover this is all to give their flesh some nice marbled texture before they get eaten.

As I understand it, you don't want your meat animals panicked when they die, since stress hurts the meat quality. But Ogre diets might be different: maybe they like the taste of frightened meat.

Inyssius

02-25-2009 03:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10022118)

Anthrophagy can be fun, but I think it just further confuses ogres and giants.

I'm still planning an adventure set around six dragons embodying St. Thomas Aquinas's subdivisions of Gluttony, by the way--

- * Praepropere - eating too soon.
- * Laute - eating too expensively (washedly).
- * Nimis - eating too much.
- * Ardenter - eating too eagerly (burningly).
- * Studiose - eating too daintily (keenly).
- * Forente - eating wildly (boringly).

JRM

02-25-2009 03:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10022118)

Anthrophagy can be fun, but I think it just further confuses ogres and giants.

Well I'll disagree with you on the first point, since to my mind man-eating is a key feature of a traditional folkloric ogre, and I have no difficulty with there being a confusing overlap with giants, or considering some ogres as being a type of giant (or all of them in AD&D's case).

Contrariwise, roughly man-sized ogres may exist alongside their giant-sized cousins and be just as frightening. They look human, although they may be bit larger, much more vigorous and in some cases rather dim (like AD&D half-ogres) but look upon human beings as tasty victims... and that big friendly guy who runs the tavern your party is drinking at could be one of them.

The RuneQuest / HeroWars games have a good example of this kind of ogre, the Gloranthan ogre is a breed of human tainted by Chaos. They've got great strength of charisma and muscle, but literally have to eat human flesh to survive and feel no guilt about doing so (and they worship chaos demons, which just adds more reason for regular folk to want to hunt them down and exterminate them).

Sleeper

02-25-2009 03:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10022441)

I'm still planning an adventure set around six dragons embodying St. Thomas Aquinas's subdivisions of Gluttony, by the way--

- * Praepropere - eating too soon.*
- * Laute - eating too expensively (washedly).*
- * Nimis - eating too much.*
- * Ardenter - eating too eagerly (burningly).*
- * Studiose - eating too daintily (keenly).*
- * Forente - eating wildly (boringly).*

With the Latin, those also make good genera names. Let's see... the dragon 1) devours new knights while it's belly is still swollen (complains incessantly about tummyaches), 2) slaughters and discards the common soldiers and other riff-raff (is surrounded by a cloud of vultures) searching for only the most elegantly attired victims, 3) is the ravager, devouring entire countries worth of cattle (refugees on the road flee the herd-animal famine of the highlands), 4) chokes down knights in the midst of combat, lances and all (spits up fiery blood), 5) insists on only eating virgins, or perhaps those with a lawful good aura if virgins have grown scarce (a connoisseur of the Holy), 6) is the Anthony Boudain of dragons, traveling the world to find new flavors of champions (imperious invader).

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10022488)

Well I'll disagree with you on the first point, since to my mind man-eating is a key feature of a traditional folkloric ogre, and I have no difficulty with there being a confusing overlap with giants, or considering some ogres as being a type of giant (or all of them in AD&D's case).

Doesn't leave much to cover then, after the giant entry.

noisms

02-25-2009 08:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10022488)

Well I'll disagree with you on the first point, since to my mind man-eating is a key feature of a traditional folkloric ogre, and I have no difficulty with there being a confusing overlap with giants, or considering some ogres as being a type of giant (or all of them in AD&D's case).

Contrariwise, roughly man-sized ogres may exist alongside their giant-sized cousins and be just as frightening. They look human, although they may be bit larger, much more vigorous and in some cases rather dim (like AD&D half-ogres) but look upon human beings as tasty victims... and that big friendly guy who runs the tavern your party is drinking at could be one of them.

The RuneQuest / HeroWars games have a good example of this kind of ogre, the Gloranthan ogre is a breed of human tainted by Chaos. They've got great strength of charisma and muscle, but literally have to eat human flesh to survive and feel no guilt about doing so (and they worship chaos demons, which just adds more reason for regular folk to want to hunt them down and exterminate them).

I have no problem with the overlap between giants and ogres either... but I tend to think of giants as having a culture of some kind: they have their own societies and languages, and they construct things. Ogres, though, are a-cultural brutes who exist only to eat human beings and destroy what they make.

noisms

02-25-2009 11:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Because I forgot...

Half-Ogre

Not a huge amount to say about Half-Ogres, since they're covered by the Ogre discussion, really. I like the idea of 'Hybrid Settlements' away from human society, where Half-Ogres, Half-Orcs, Orog and Ogrillons can get together and live without fear of intolerance, or something. Maybe an equivalent of the quilombo settlements runaway slaves formed in South America.

I also like this weird foray into pseudo-science:

Quote:

Sages have expressed much concern over the years, wondering why ogres can interbreed with humans but not with elves or halflings. When the actual answer was discovered, the sages' concerns proved unfounded. The explanation had nothing to do with any supposed common origin of humans and ogres, but rather in a unusual characteristic that ogres share with orcs: rapidly adaptive biology. Just as orcs and ogres can adapt quickly to any terrain, from forests to the highest mountains, their genetic construction allows them breed with any humanoid race.

So...er...that explains that then.

And the final paragraph is a nice mess of strangeness:

Quote:

This ability to breed easily is frequently passed on to their progeny. Half-ogres can also breed successfully with most other humanoid races. If this process continues for many generations, the result is a horrible hybrid known as a mongrelman. Many mongrelmen have strong strains of orc and ogre in their bloodlines, which may account for their chaotic evil attitudes.

The half-ogre shares the ogre's place in the ecosystem: that of a plague upon demihumans and humans, lusting for treasure and making neither crafts nor good labor. The beginnings of half-ogre poetry have been around for many years, but it is exceptionally ugly and disturbing.

Half-Ogre poetry?!? Had someone been reading The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy?

Also, mongrelmen are Lawful Neutral in 2nd edition - seems somebody forgot to update the Half-Ogre entry.

Ogrillon

This is a cross between a female Orc and a male Ogre; the reverse produces an Orog, who are in the orc entry. Don't know why they felt the need to split Ogrillons and Orogs. Oddly, the Ogrillon has characteristics that neither Ogres nor Orcs have - armoured skin and horn-reinforced fists.

Because I also forgot....

Slithering Tracker

The most intelligent of the jellies and I think the only MM creature that has a diet of "Living Plasma" which it sucks from its victims.

Two nice rumours: firstly, that Slithering Trackers were created by an evil wizard removing all the bones from his enemies; secondly that it is possible that there is a diary or journal hidden in some long-forgotten wizard's laboratory that details the Slithering Tracker Curse. Power Word: Become Slithering Tracker?

Kakita Kojiro

02-25-2009 11:19 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)

... place in the ecosystem: that of a plague upon demihumans and humans, lusting for treasure and making neither crafts nor good labor.

So, ogres and half-ogres are... adventurers? PCs?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)

This is a cross between a female Orc and a male Ogre; the reverse produces an Orog, who are in the orc entry. Don't know why they felt the need to split Ogrillons and Orogs. Oddly, the Ogrillon has characteristics that neither Ogres nor Orcs have - armoured skin and horn-reinforced fists.

Compare the Liger and Tigon. They do have different physical characteristics, albeit not as different as orogs and ogrillons.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)

Half-Ogre

Not a huge amount to say about Half-Ogres, since they're covered by the Ogre discussion, really. I like the idea of 'Hybrid Settlements' away from human society, where Half-Ogres, Half-Orcs, Orog and Ogrillons can get together and live without fear of intolerance, or something. Maybe an equivalent of the quilombo settlements runaway slave: formed in South America.

There are a couple of little tit-bits in the Half Ogre entry I found interesting.

Firstly "Their sense of smell is better than an ogre's, but it falls short of a human's" is odd, I've long thought of ogres of having an excellent sense of smell, maybe as good as a dog's, but the half-ogre entry says that half-ogres have an olfactory scent inferior than humans, while full ogres are even worse. I don't like that at all, so I'll just assume that some sage misinterpreted a report that "half-ogres smell bad, true ogres smell even worse" wrongly, as referring to their sense of smell rather than the descriptions "Their odor is noticeable, but it is not as overpowering as that of a full-blooded ogre".

Hmm, why do ogres stink so? My preferred interpretation is that it's not due to hatred of hygiene (or entirely a hatred of hygiene), but that like dogs and some other mammals they cultivate a "personal stink" and "tribal odor" that they view as part of their identity. Thus an ogre can tell which of its friends has been in the cave recently, and literally "sniff out" the presence of intruders, just by the smell.

Oh, and the entry says half-ogres live about 110 years. That's twenty years longer than ogres, who in turn live longer than humans. Now I'm imagining Ogre Baronies, each ruled by an elderly half-ogre who is a high level fighter, seasoned with the cunning of a human lifetime's worth of banditry, but still as strong as any human.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)

Ogrillon

I dislike the official explanation of the Ogrillon (or the Orog for that matter). To my mind an ogre-orc cross should result in something similar to a half-ogre, not this weird apelike horny skinned punch-monster.

My preference is that Ogrillons are related to Norkers, maybe the result of a cross between a norker and a ogre or descendants of such a union. In my campaign Norkers are an artificial species, an attempt to make cheap disposable troops - you don't need to buy them armour, because their skin is as good as field plate. Maybe norkers are the result of the same or similar experiments, trying to create a humanoid legion who you don't need to give weapons to (they just use their fists) and don't need to pay much (they agree to fight just for the love of battle, and disdain treasure apart from a few gold pieces they keep as "good luck charms").

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)

Slithering Tracker

The most intelligent of the jellies and I think the only MM creature that has a diet of "Living Plasma" which it sucks from its victims.

Two nice rumours: firstly, that Slithering Trackers were created by an evil wizard removing all the bones from his enemies; secondly that it is possible that there is a diary or journal hidden in some long-forgotten wizard's laborator that details the Slithering Tracker Curse. Power Word: Become Slithering Tracker?

May I just say the Slithering Tracker's illustration deserves honourable mention in the list of "Monstrous Compendium pictures that are a bit sucky". I would like it a lot better if the artist hadn't given the Ooze those goofy eyes.

One thing I find odd about the Monstrous Manual version is that it makes no mention of their standard modus operandi. They're called Slithering Trackers because if they come across the trail of a party of adventurers they track them until they stop to sleep, then slither into camp (being able to slip through barred doors etc) to try to drain one of the sleepers dry without the lookout noticing.

They're a nice concept as a monster, but on the face of it have a few problems with using them. Either the PCs notice the tracker, in which case they can kill it fairly easily unless it manages to paralyze all of them (in which case they're all dead), or they don't notice the Tracker and it drains a sleeping PC dry (in which case somebody's dead). What else is there to do with them?

Well, firstly there's the old "mistaken identity monster" where a village is terrified when people start turning up as dry husks after sleeping, leading to the assumption that they're being victimized by a vampire. I vaguely remember an old Dungeon or Dragon magazine article that used that idea.

Secondly, if a Slithering Tracker is created by a wizard what would they use it for? They could be used as a guardian if the evil mage was more interested in capturing intruders than killing them, but my thinking is they were created as a weapon of terror and assassination - the wizard's enemies simply turn up dead in the morning, without a mark on them.

Thirdly, if the rumour is true that Slithering Trackers are transformed human beings, do they retain any of their memories? Maybe an evil wizard creates a Tracker from, say, Lady Ednith the paladin, who promptly succeeds in killing said wizard, then the PCs are quested with helping her find a high-enough level good wizard to polymorph other her back into humanity before her personality fades into a monster's.

Fourth, Slithering Trackers are intelligent so can they be talked to and even negotiated with? Maybe an orc tribe's shaman (or the Ogre Chef) employs a slithering tracker assistant to help treat wounded warriors - its paralysis makes it easy to operate of them without movement (whether it still hurts or not is another question). In return, the Tracker gets a few minutes sip of plasma from several orcs, enough for it to live off but not enough to threaten their health.

Fifth, on the subject of negotiating with Trackers, they must be intimately familiar with the layout of their dungeon, having slithered over every inch of it. Maybe they know where the treasure is buried? I'm imagining an evil NPC making a deal with a slithering tracker, giving it slaves and abducted travellers to eat in return for gems it takes out of a treasure vault buried behind tens of yards of rockfall - it can easily slither through the gaps, and has no use for the treasure.

YojimboC

02-25-2009 10:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)
Ogrillon

This is a cross between a female Orc and a male Ogre; the reverse produces an Orog, who are in the orc entry. Don't know why they felt the need to split Ogrillons and Orog. Oddly, the Ogrillon has characteristics that neither Ogres nor Orcs have - armoured skin and horn-reinforced fists.

Not everything the Fiend Folio gave us was as cool as the Gith or the Lizard King or Flinds. Sometimes, you get Ogrillons.

JRM

02-25-2009 11:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10026149)
Not everything the Fiend Folio gave us was as cool as the Gith or the Lizard King or Flinds. Sometimes, you get Ogrillons.

Well personally I don't much care for the Flind, and consider them about as uninteresting as the Ogrillon. Neither of them hold a candle to the Fiend Folio's most majestic entries...

...such as the Flumph.;

The FF monster I got the most joy out of as a DM was probably the Grell, those are a wonderful monster.

Sleeper

02-26-2009 12:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10026422)
Well personally I don't much care for the Flind, and consider them about as uninteresting as the Ogrillon. Neither of them hold a candle to the Fiend Folio's most majestic entries...

...such as the Flumph.;

I love the flumph.

Especially when the epic pseudonatural template is applied. The classic sanity-breaking tentacle-monster becomes CR 18, yet it only has 26 hp and is still lawful good. :)

JRM

02-26-2009 02:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10026532)
I love the flumph.

Especially when the epic pseudonatural template is applied. The classic sanity-breaking tentacle-monster becomes CR 18, yet it only has 26 hp and is still lawful good. :)

Well going by the template it would be CR 17, since the base is a 2HD CR1 creature.

However, the notion of a pseudonatural flumph is definitely a worthy one, although I'd be tempted to add Dragon issue 289's Kaiju template to it as well...

Sleeper

02-26-2009 02:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10027019)
Well going by the template it would be CR 17, since the base is a 2HD CR1 creature.

However, the notion of a pseudonatural flumph is definitely a worthy one, although I'd be tempted to add Dragon issue 289's Kaiju template to it as well...

The one I statted up all those years ago used this CR 2 version as a base, though you could argue its CR is off.

EmperorSeth

02-26-2009 04:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Going back a few days, I never really used ogres or oozes that much. The former tend to fit in to the "well, we need a heavy, and the party's second level now" category, but without reason to get into the character at all. As for oozes, the mechanics tend to bother me even worse than the rust monster. They all seem to have the "it eats metal, so say goodbye to your weapons" schtick, or they destroy your armor when they attack you, or they split whenever attacked, or something. I can see how that would get old fast.

Now, if I wanted to use the ogres more creatively, I can see them as sort of extreme variant of the classic "frat boy" bully. Sadistic, but more amused by it than for any real reason. If an ogre pushes you into the mud, he'll laugh. If he throws a rock at you so hard that your head gets knocked off, he'll laugh. An ogre won't even see the difference. The only problem is coming up with a reason people don't just murder them right back in the latter case, and the half-ogre suggests a pretty good one. Imagine if the ogres, or at least allies of the ogres, are in charge. At the very least there could be a shared, very tenuous border and the good guy nation can't afford a war right now, so they tend to look the other way when the ogres get rowdy.

demiurge1138

02-26-2009 06:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

It may be because I have fond memories of slaughtering them by the droves in Icewind Dale, but I don't have any issue with orogs and ogrillions being fairly different from orcs and ogres. Hybrid vigor can do strange things to crossbreeds, especially in a high magic setting. I do like the idea of tying ogrillions to norkers, though--I love those guys.

JRM

02-26-2009 07:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10027149)

The one I started up all those years ago used this CR 2 version as a base, though you could argue its CR is off.

I was using the stats from The Portable Hole Full of Beer, which says it has WotC's permission to use the Flumph. That gives the basic flumph exactly the same stats as the Creature Catalogue version you posted, except it is CR1.

JRM

02-26-2009 07:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10027657)

Now, if I wanted to use the ogres more creatively, I can see them as sort of extreme variant of the classic "frat boy" bully. Sadistic, but more amused by it than for any real reason. If an ogre pushes you into the mud, he'll laugh. If he throws a rock at you so hard that your head gets knocked off, he'll laugh. An ogre won't even see the difference. The only problem is coming up with a reason people don't just murder them right back in the latter case, and the half-ogre suggests a pretty good one. Imagine if the ogres, or at least allies of the ogres, are in charge. At the very least there could be a shared, very tenuous border and the good guy nation can't afford a war right now, so they tend to look the other way when the ogres get rowdy.

Yes, that's one approach I've used for ogres, or at least a type of ogre. I tend to think of many of the D&D humanoid races as being magically exaggerated races of human, but still technically human (hence all the half-breeds). Thus, I like to think of ogres as being able to interact with other human(oid) societies in a meaningful fashion, not just "Og kill! Og destroy! Og eat!"

So, sure ogres can be brutish creatures, boisterous and arrogant about how their strength exceeds the "weakling" humans and goblins, but they can make strong servants if kept on a short leash, and even those that think they are in charge of a mixed-race community (e.g. the classic orc or goblin tribe with some ogre toughs) many are dim enough to be tricked into doing all the heavy and dangerous work without the lion's share of the real spoils.

Sleeper

02-26-2009 07:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10028494)

I was using the stats from The Portable Hole Full of Beer, which says it has WOTC's permission to use the Flumph. That gives the basic flumph exactly the same stats as the Creature Catalogue version you posted, except it is CR1.

Well, if anyone cares, here's the true flumph, as originally intended by the original author instead of the horrible series of typos that resulted in the version published in the original Fiend Folio,* updated to v3.5:
Spoiler: True flumph

* I'm lying.

randomgamer8466

02-26-2009 08:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

"Fee Fi Fo Fum, I smell the blood of an Englishman"

Sorry to burst bubbles and discredit theories, but this was said by a Cloud Giant, not an Ogre.

Like anybody cares:

My high school AD&D1e Monty Hauled character was a half-ogre who had melted a Vorpal Sword and a Defender down and forged them together to make a battleaxe that had the properties of both. He rode a titanother (a prehistoric rhino) into battle, and once killed Sir Launcelot, who had the misfortune to be statted in the original Deities & Demigods.

If you stat it, we will kill it.

noisms

02-26-2009 06:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

I'll start a new thread for the next entry, as we're now up to post 3000+....

sim_james

02-26-2009 08:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Make sure you post the link here - I don't read anything else in the d20 subforum, and I'd hate to miss the new thread just because I'm not subscribed to it yet.

Mikaze

02-26-2009 08:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10016097)

Ooze/Slime/Jelly

Mustard Jelly

This breed was created when a young wizardress tried to polymorph herself into an Ochre Jelly and something went wrong. Why she wanted to do that anyway is left unsaid. It can emit noxious lethargy-inducing vapours and split itself into segments to attack.

The mustard jelly's origin has bugged me ever since I read the Monstrous Manual, because I knew there must have been a specific story being referred to and I never found out what it was. At first I just thinking "Huh. Must be a story there." Then I get deeper into 2e era fluff(God bless Planescape) and I keep thinking back and remembering that I still don't know what the story was behind it or if there even was a story behind it. And it irritated me.

And I still don't know the story behind it. If there is one.

It's like some damn itch you manage to put out of mind until you think about it again.

JRM

02-27-2009 04:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10028607)

Well, if anyone cares, here's the true flumph, as originally intended by the original author instead of the horrible series of typos that resulted in the version published in the original Fiend Folio, updated to v3.5:*

Spoiler: True flumph

That's pretty close to how I figured it out, except that I made the AC 54 (10 base +1 size +8 Dex +35 natural) and the melee attack bonus +28 (+1 Base Attack +1 Size +11 Strength [Weapon Finesse feat is now irrelevant] +15 insight) and the Listen and Spot +12 instead of +10 (the original +7 plus an extra 5 for its increased Wisdom).

One thing I like about the Pseudonatural Flumph is its AC is so high it can only hit itself on a natural 20.:

JRM

02-27-2009 04:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10027657)

Now, if I wanted to use the ogres more creatively, I can see them as sort of extreme variant of the classic "frat boy" bully. Sadistic, but more amused by it than for any real reason. If an ogre pushes you into the mud, he'll laugh. If he throws a rock at you so hard that your head gets knocked off, he'll laugh. An ogre won't even see the difference. The only problem is coming up with a reason people don't just murder them right back in the latter case, and the half-ogre suggests a pretty good one. Imagine if the ogres, or at least allies of the ogres, are in charge. At the very least there could be a shared, very tenuous border and the good guy nation can't afford a war right now, so they tend to look the other way when the ogres get rowdy.

Had another thought about Ogres today, maybe they're not humans exaggerated into grossly oversized evil fratboys, but perpetually underdeveloped evil giants, an exaggerated version of those horrible children who delight in tormenting weak and helpless creatures - but since they're ten feet tall, it's your character who's the "fly" they want to pull the wings off.

Hmm...

From the time he was born we knew there was something wrong about Tobo. He was small, weak and stupid, a crook-backed pygmy who was barely half the straight height of a regular giant when he finished growing.

The worse thing was that his soul was as shrunken and twisted as his body. That became clear on his First Hunt, when we took the new warriors out after sheep and goblins. The rest of the youths acted as giants should, crushing as many prey as they could while exulting in their strength. Tobo didn't do that, he caught a goblin alive and spent hours playing with it until it died.

When we asked his Dam about this, she told us he did that to any animal he could catch, and had once almost been mauled by her watchbear when he tried stealing one of her cubs.

So, we called the Shaman down from the mountain, and he told us what we all knew in our guts already - Tobo was ogre.

It wasn't long after that that Tobo attacked one of the little kids and bit a chunk out of her. Giant tradition was clear on what to do, the Chief ordered Tobo exiled from our lands, never to see our peaks again on pain of death. Let the humans deal with him.

Our tribe is still riven by this, for we'd never suffered the ogre curse before. Some accuse the Chief of angering the gods by not giving the right offerings, most blame Tobo's Sire, saying he must have strayed into a demonground and tainted his offspring, and a few whisper that Tobo's Dam had got "friendly" with that big Orog who's Chief of the neighbouring orc tribe.

Still, we were all glad to see the back of that sneaky runt. Even if he'd behaved himself, he was too weak to help the tribe, just a useless mouth to feed.

Mr. Teapot

02-27-2009 07:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10024474)
So...er...that explains that then.

Actually, no it doesn't. The last sentence (ogres can breed with anything humanoid) specifically contradicts the issue that bugged the sages in the first place (that ogres can't breed with elves or halflings but can with humans).

It also raises more questions about what orc-elf, orc-halfling, orc-dwarf, etc hybrids look like. Or for that matter, what ogre-elf, ogre-halfling, ogre-gnoll, etc. hybrids look like.

Which brings up the idea that I've seen suggested that Half-Orc (and Half-Elf and Half-Ogre and Half-Giant and any other Half-whatever race) should all be templates, not races. Then any race really could breed with them, much like how anybody can breed with a dragon.

Sleeper

02-27-2009 09:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10032524)
That's pretty close to how I figured it out, except that I made the AC 54 (10 base +1 size +8 Dex +35 natural) and the melee attack bonus +28 (+1 Base Attack +1 Size +11 Strength [Weapon Finesse feat is now irrelevant] +15 insight) and the Listen and Spot +12 instead of +10 (the original +7 plus an extra 5 for its increased Wisdom).

One thing I like about the Pseudonatural Flumph is its AC is so high it can only hit itself on a natural 20.:

Thanks for catching the math error in the AC, but the skills were deliberate. The base flumph has 18 skill ranks (Listen 5, Move Silently 4, Search 4, Spot 5), but in v3.5 a 2 HD aberration with a +0 Int mod only gets 10 skill ranks. So I dropped Search, kept Hide and Move Silently equal, and split the rest between Listen and Spot (Listen 3, Move Silently 4, Spot 3).

I thought about changing Weapon Finesse (notice I removed all mention of the "bonus feat"; 2 HD v3.5 creatures get one feat automatically without having to rely on bonus feats), but decided it fit the concept better and, honestly, it doesn't matter in the slightest. The CR is a joke, anyway. The epic pseudonatural template applied to low-CR creatures creates untouchable nuisances, not serious threats. The weaker pseudonatural template in the Manual of the Planes is actually more suitable for real challenges :).

SuperG

02-27-2009 09:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10033352)

Actually, no it doesn't. The last sentence (ogres can breed with anything humanoid) specifically contradicts the issue that bugged the sages in the first place (that ogres can't breed with elves or halflings but can with humans).

It also raises more questions about what orc-elf, orc-halfling, orc-dwarf, etc hybrids look like. Or for that matter, who ogre-elf, ogre-halfling, ogre-gnoll, etc. hybrids look like.

Which brings up the idea that I've seen suggested that Half-Orc (and Half-Elf and Half-Ogre and Half-Giant and any other Half-whatever race) should all be templates, not races. Then any race really could breed with them, much like how anybody can breed with a dragon.

Actually, I read it more that Ogres adapt to be able to breed with the dominant population of the area they live in; thus, they cannot interbreed with Elves or Halflings because there are no Ogres living in halfling dominated lands.

noisms

02-27-2009 11:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10033352)

Actually, no it doesn't. The last sentence (ogres can breed with anything humanoid) specifically contradicts the issue that bugged the sages in the first place (that ogres can't breed with elves or halflings but can with humans).

That's kind of what I meant - I was being ironical. ;)

But now that SuperG mentions it, it does make sense if you look at it sideways and squint.

noisms

02-27-2009 12:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Here's Part IV.

JRM

02-27-2009 06:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part III, Ki~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10033925)

Thanks for catching the math error in the AC, but the skills were deliberate. The base flumph has 18 skill ranks (Listen 5, Move Silently 4, Search 4, Spot 5), but in v3.5 a 2 HD aberration with a +0 Int mod only gets 10 skill ranks. So I dropped Search, kept Hide and Move Silently equal, and split the rest between Listen and Spot (Listen 3, Move Silently 4, Spot 3).

I thought about changing Weapon Finesse (notice I removed all mention of the "bonus feat"; 2 HD v3.5 creatures get one feat automatically without having to rely on bonus feats), but decided it fit the concept better and, honestly, it doesn't matter in the slightest. The CR is a joke, anyway. The epic pseudonatural template applied to low-CR creatures creates untouchable nuisances, not serious threats. The weaker pseudonatural template in the Manual of the Planes is actually more suitable for real challenges :).

You're right about the skills not adding up, I didn't noticed that. I'd have patched it by giving the flumph a couple of +4 racial bonuses (Listen and Spot?) so the bonuses add up.

Did recognize the flaw with the CR and feat, but saw no need to elaborate on it - this is still a 2nd edition thread, after all.:)

Anyhows, I'll see you all in the next part of this thread, since this one's running dry.

noisms

02-27-2009 12:13 PM

[Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

So here we are in Episode IV, and still the end remains far from sight. But we're enjoying ourselves so let's continue. And what an entry to continue on!

Orc

Yep, here they are at last - those green-skinned ugly pig-nosed ape creatures we know and love. As with all the iconic D&D races it's difficult to say anything new about them, though I'm sure you'll try, but here's a list of some matters of interest I spotted in the entry:

- First, take a look at the description: "Orcs vary widely in appearance, as they frequently crossbreed with other species. In general, they resemble primitive humans with grey-green skin covered with coarse hair. Orcs have a slightly stooped posture, a low jutting forehead, and a snout instead of a nose, though comparisons between this facial feature and those of pigs are exaggerated and perhaps unfair." Notice the bit in bold? Are Orcs supposed to be covered in hair and I never realised??
- Orcs in 2nd edition are Lawful Evil militarists, rather than Chaotic Evil brutes. I've actually always preferred them that way, even if it does see them creep into the Hobgoblin sphere of influence. It's probably because "Many orc tribes have waged wars for decades and have developed a frightening efficiency with battle tactics", which is more of a Lawful Evil sounding creature than a Chaotic Evil one.
- "For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?
- "If the orcs are not in their lair, there is a 20% chance they will be escorting a train of 1-6 carts and 10-60 slave bearers bringing supplies, loot, or ransom and tribute to their orc chief or a stronger orc tribe..." I've never used this and don't think I ever even noticed it in the entry. The idea of a baggage train is pretty cool; it's also an obvious hook for an adventure (bring back the womenfolk kidnapped for ransom and being carried in a baggage train to blahblah land...).

- "Orcs have a reputation for cruelty that is deserved, but humans are just as capable of evil as orcs." I wonder if PETA girl had a hand in that sentence...

Orogs

Orogs are a bit like the Big 'Uns and Black Orcs from Warhammer, or maybe Tolkien's Uruk-hai - essentially big elite orcs mixed with Ogre blood.

Half-orcs

This category encompasses not just half-orc/half-humans but half-orc/half-anything (except elves); orc-goblins, orc-hobgoblins are said to be most common, but I wonder what orc-halfings or orc-dwarves would look like? Anyway, like Half-ogres they sometimes form their own communities on the outside of other societies, which I'd like to use in a game sometime.

Kakita Kojiro

02-27-2009 12:22 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

"For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?

Micromanaging = Lawful Evil

As anyone in the corporate world knows very well. Although, probably, this gives the term "capitalist pig" a different meaning in D&D worlds.

6inTruder

02-27-2009 12:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

so you encounter one orc, two orcs, or infinite orcs. As those three assistants require another leader + 3 assistants, who require another leader + 3 assistants, who require ect ect ect...

demiurge1138

02-27-2009 01:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

It's weird, but I cannot use orcs in game without feeling sort of... self-conscious. Like, orcs are so widely used, in Lord of the Rings and Warcraft and Warhammer, etc, that it feels like everything that can be done with orcs has been done with orcs. No other humanoid affects me so.

Inyssius

02-27-2009 01:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Indeed. I feel the same way.

My solution: make them trollkin. Make them feared. Make them the size of a half-ogre, with beady eyes and sharklike jaws. They come in waves--first a few, then hordes--and their blood-encrusted shacks crawl with mold.

(If trolls were bugbears, they'd be goblins. ...and from that, you might be able to imagine my trolls. You don't want to mess with them.)

sim_james

02-27-2009 05:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I haven't thought much about orcs for years until the LOTR films were released, and then the various battles of Gondor made me re-examine them. Of course there were plenty of shots of orcs rushing about savagely, slaying and hacking... but I thought that I noticed a few orcs stopping to eat people. In the middle of battle. I know that the armies of Mordor must have been under-provisioned, but even so I imagine that orcs engage in battle anthrophagy not due to hunger, but hatred and rage.

It's a small thing, but orcs are more monstrous in my mind now.

As far as their alignment goes, as a Planescape GM I generally prefer orcs to be LE, in order to retain some of the setting material (orc wars in Acheron, most of the pantheon). More generally, though, I submit that orcs exhibit the alignment of whatever force is motivating and directing their energies. Left to their own devices, orcs are basically chaotic evil - but if controlled by a greater power (whether militarily as Saruman did or supernaturally as Sauron seems to) orcs can easily become lawful evil.

Of course, when Sauron was defeated his spirit left the orcs of Mordor, and so as they fled they immediately reverted to chaotic evil once more. That's why their rout was incredibly disorderly compared to the tactics they'd demonstrated earlier.

JRM

02-27-2009 07:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

Orc

As I think I've said before, one of the things that really bugs me about this kind of monster in AD&D is that they're carnivorous mammals who exist in large populations. In the real world carnivorous mammals outnumber the herbivores by at least thirty to one, so there shouldn't be enough of them to seriously threaten humans unless the orcs possess huge territories.

As we said in earlier threads, there could be a fabulously efficient source of meat for the orcs to feed upon, or the orcs themselves might have magically efficient metabolisms so they only need to eat a few ounces of flesh a day, but they should say something to that effect, since it has interesting implications to the world of D&D.

Anyhows, I get around that in my campaign by saying orcs are omnivores, indeed they're more omnivorous than humans, being able to live of much poorer quality food. That's how they manage to survive in those wastelands.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

Yep, here they are at last - those green-skinned ugly pig-nosed ape creatures we know and love. As with all the iconic D&D races it's difficult to say anything new about them, though I'm sure you'll try, but here's a list of some matters of interest I spotted in the entry:

First, take a look at the description: "Orcs vary widely in appearance, as they frequently crossbreed with other species. In general, they resemble primitive humans with grey-green skin covered with coarse hair. Orcs have a slightly stooped posture, a low jutting forehead, and a snout instead of a nose, though comparisons between this facial feature and those of pigs are exaggerated and perhaps unfair." Notice the bit in bold? Are Orcs supposed to be covered in hair and I never realised??

Bring back the pig-headed orc! Or at least, have a variety of orcs with pig faces. It gives the AD&D orc something distinctive.

Hmm... maybe the the pig-faced orcs are half full orc, half swine - due the "orcs can breed with anything" trope extending slightly outside the hominid family (after all, there are a few biological similarities between humanoids and pigs, so throw in magical fertility and bestiality and maybe pig orc hybrids are viable). Such pig-orcs could be stupider and less disciplined (i.e. CE) than true orcs, but they breed in litters and are omnivorous and extremely omnivorous, making them excellent disposable troops.

As for the coarse hair, I think of them of being like a very hirsute human rather than actually furry. Imagine Robin Williams with a snout, and his hairy chest extending over the rest of his body!

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

"For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?

I believe it is a typo, should be "for every thirty orcs". At least, that's how it is in the 1E MM, which makes sense statistically (with 1d8 hit dice you'll get an average of 4 leader/assistant types per 32 regular orcs).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

"If the orcs are not in their lair, there is a 20% chance they will be escorting a train of 1-6 carts and 10-60 slave bearers bringing supplies, loot, or ransom and tribute to their orc chief or a stronger orc tribe..." I've never used this and don't think I ever even noticed it in the entry. The idea of a baggage train is pretty cool; it's also an obvious hook for an adventure (bring back the womenfolk kidnapped for ransom and being carried in a baggage train to blahblah land....).

Used this a couple of times in my campaigns, both planned and as random encounters. (i.e. if I made a Wilderness encounter roll for orcs they were sometimes escorting such a caravan). I like the inference that the orcs are doing stuff with each other. Gives a sense of a living world.

Hmm, maybe it'd be nice having a random "what the goblinoids are doing table" for wandering monsters:

Escorting Caravan (goods, slaves, treasure to give to their chief / stronger rival)

Migrating (driven out of home, surplus population, exiled/fleeing after a failed coup)

Finding Food (hunting herd animals, foraging vegetation, fishing or so starving they are devouring everything vaguely edible they come across)

Raiding

War! Fully armed and armoured, with a supply train and possibly siege engines.

Other Religious pilgrimage, diplomatic mission, going to the amazon orc tribe for the mating season, "marrying" trip (e.g. buying/selling females) et cetera.

JRM

02-27-2009 07:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 10035287)

As far as their alignment goes, as a Planescape GM I generally prefer orcs to be LE, in order to retain some of the setting material (orc wars in Acheron, most of the pantheon). More generally, though, I submit that orcs exhibit the alignment of whatever force is motivating and directing their energies. Left to their own devices, orcs are basically chaotic evil - but if controlled by a greater power (whether militarily as Saruman did or supernaturally as Sauron seems to) orcs can easily become lawful evil.

That's a nice idea, although it doesn't really fit my current conception of goblinoids as fully capable of cooperation and independent decision making. Maybe there are "slave breeds" of orcs who are bred to behave like this, or the Great Evil Force has developed a "Dominate Goblinoid Horde" ritual or spell.

The Last Conformist

02-27-2009 07:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

"For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?

It's Orcstadter's Law - there's always a third more orcs than you think there are, even after taking Orcstadter's Law into account.

Edivad

02-27-2009 08:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Why not Neutral Evil, as a medium between those two extremes? Yes, I know that the Monster manual never made them Neutral, but to me it makes sense: while crude and savage, Orcs also seem to (roughly) understand the benefits of teamwork and having some sort of organization and hierarchy.

Being Neutral would also avoid them being too similar too Hobgoblins - and at the same time, because they're not Chaotic, they're not just smaller Ogres.

Of course, it all depends on 'what kind'of Orc you have in mind..there's the Hobgoblin-like, militarized Orc which has been already mentioned and the savage bloodthirsty rampaging barbarian Orc. Some settings(Warcraft's is the only one that comes to mind to me now) have Orcs as a somewhat noble warrior race, perhaps naturally violent but not malicious. This contrasts strongly with the traditional, iconic D&D orc...

Quote:

"Orcs have a reputation for cruelty that is deserved, but humans are just as capable of evil as orcs." I wonder if PETA girl had a hand in that sentence...

I think Tolkien may have had Orcs be 'degenerated'Elves... Perhaps Orcs could be the descendants of ancient humans who degenerated into savagery and cruelty so much that it actually physically changed them? Wouldn't be too original(degenerated races seem to be quite common in fiction), but still would explain some of the similarities between orcs and humans.

Sleeper

02-27-2009 08:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

First, take a look at the description: "Orcs vary widely in appearance, as they frequently crossbreed with other species. In general, they resemble primitive humans with grey-green skin covered with coarse hair. Orcs have a slightly stooped posture, a low jutting forehead, and a snout instead of a nose, though comparisons between this facial feature and those of pigs are exaggerated and perhaps unfair." Notice the bit in bold? Are Orcs supposed to be covered in hair and I never realised??

That never bothered me. What I don't like is the almost totally random colors of the various humanoid races. 2E orcs are grey-green. 1E orcs were brown or brownish green with a bluish sheen and pink snouts and ears. Hobgoblins were almost oni in 1E, with dark reddish brown to gray black skin and bright red-orange to red faces and blue-red noses; in 2E, they're the same except the noses are blue or red. Goblins in both editions ranged from yellow to orange to deep red, though in 2E they're color-coded by tribe (which raises questions about exogamy and the genetic basis of coloration...). And that's not even including the outright silly ones, like the blue xvarts.

Did anybody ever actually picture the various humanoids in such garish colors?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

"For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?

Typo. In first edition, it was "For every 30 orcs encountered there will be a leader and 3 assistants".

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

This category encompasses not just half-orc/half-humans but half-orc/half-anything (except elves); orc-goblins, orc-hobgoblins are said to be most common, but I wonder what orc-halfings or orc-dwarves would look like? Anyway, like Half-ogres they sometimes form their own communities on the outside of other societies, which I'd like to use in game sometime.

Speaking of favorite roles for orcs, the half-orc in D&D is typically portrayed as an outcast with a bad temper and dental problems (the standard PC), or as a smarter leader-type orc (shaman, witch-doctor, etc). That's not a terrible role, but I always preferred Tolkien's take. Sneaky infiltrators, who appear human enough to pass for human in a casual environment... but otherwise seem off. Spies, assassins. Some good roleplaying opportunities. Defectors, traitors, deep cover sleeper agents. Trying to blend into an alien culture. Very Cold War. Finding a fake pseudo-human village like the faux-Western towns Russia built and staffed to help train spies would be eerie.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10035530)

As I think I've said before, one of the things that really bugs me about this kind of monster in AD&D is that they're carnivorous mammals who exist in large populations. In the real world carnivorous mammals outnumber the herbivores by at least thirty to one, so there shouldn't be enough of them to seriously threaten humans unless the orcs possess huge territories.

Never bothered me. In the real world, "barbarian" tribes often ate more meat than their civilized counterparts, partially explaining why barbarians were considered so formidable (more protein means taller and heavier). Many tribes lived in marginal lands, poorly suited to farming or agriculture. As a result, they lived by hunting and looting. And yet, civilization was usually a few shining pockets, while the rest of the world was swamped in darkness (well, not really, but not shiny civilization either). Go orcs.

And the carnivore/herbivore ratio is heavily dependent on the degree of homeothermy in the predator population. Permian fossil assemblages show a radically higher ratio than later periods. Orcs could be sluggish but deadly, like crocodiles and sharks.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10035530)

Anyhows, I get around that in my campaign by saying orcs are omnivores, indeed they're more omnivorous than humans, being able to live of much poorer quality food. That's how they manage to survive in those wastelands.

Dominic Deegan, which is a isn't a bad webcomic until the Mary-Suism gets completely out of hand, had an interesting take:

Orcs have tusks. They're not fangs, they're not for eating flesh. They're for rooting out... well, roots. They're herbivores. And the culture draws heavily from the Plains Indians of North America.

JRM

02-27-2009 09:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035742)

Never bothered me. In the real world, "barbarian" tribes often ate more meat than their civilized counterparts, partially explaining why barbarians were considered so formidable (more protein means taller and heavier). Many tribes lived in marginal lands, poorly suited to farming or agriculture. As a result, they lived by hunting and looting. And yet, civilization was usually a few shining pockets, while the rest of the world was swamped in darkness (well, not really, but not shiny civilization either). Go orcs.

No, if my understanding of the real world is correct most tribal cultures which eat a lot of meat do so by maintaining large herds, not through hunting. They may live on land unsuited for agriculture but that doesn't prevent them pursuing a pastoral or nomadic herder lifestyle. Hunter/gatherer people tend to have a far lower population per unit area than D&D 'barbarian' tribes would indicate.

EDIT: Not to mention there are many cultures people called "barbarian" (e.g. Roman-era Britons) who did a lot of agriculture and animal husbandry.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035742)

And the carnivore/herbivore ratio is heavily dependent on the degree of homeothermy in the predator population. Cambrian fossil assemblages show a radically higher ratio than later periods. Orcs could be sluggish but deadly, like crocodiles and sharks.

I'm aware of that, but it wouldn't fit the observed facts: (a) Orcs are mammals, which are hot blooded to various degrees in the real world. (b) Orcs happily live in the full range of climates, they wouldn't like cold environments if they were ectothermic. (c) There is no mention of orcs being sluggish compared to other humanoids.

Hmm, although in reference to (c) there is much mention of Ogres being "lazy". Perhaps ogres are cooler blooded than standard humanoids. It partly explains their great size and fat, it's to help conserve the little heat their metabolisms generate, i.e. they're gigantothermic and poikilothermic.

Sleeper

02-27-2009 09:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10035798)

No, if my understanding of the real world is correct most tribal cultures which eat a lot of meat do so by maintaining large herds, not through hunting. They may live on land unsuited for agriculture but that doesn't prevent them pursuing a pastoral or nomadic herder lifestyle. Hunter/gatherer people tend to have a far lower population per unit area than D&D 'barbarian' tribes would indicate.

I guess I've never pictured orcs as purely anthropagus. There aren't a ton of species that survive purely by cannibalizing their close relatives. I didn't state it, but I always assumed they were either nomadic, hunting great herds of stench kow or rothe or what have you, or practiced animal husbandry (though it's never clear what animals they would have domesticated; sheep don't seem fitting). I always figured they were wicked human analogues, not bizarre alien monsters like xenomorphs or wasps.

The Last Conformist

02-27-2009 09:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035828)

[I assumed that orcs] practiced animal husbandry (though it's never clear what animals they would have domesticated; sheep don't seem fitting).

In the first two Warcraft games, they had pig farms, which I always felt was very appropriate.

GestaltBennie

02-27-2009 10:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

So here we are in Episode IV, and still the end remains far from sight. But we're enjoying ourselves so let's continue. And what an entry to continue on!

Orc

[]"For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?*

The entry was mine. Sad to say, knowing this was a really important monster, I showed the write-up to about a dozen gamers and asked them to proof it. No one caught the mistake. ::sigh::

YojimboC

02-27-2009 11:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Orcs. Is there a foe more instantly recognizable and used than the orc? I should think not. Yet, through most of my 2E gaming period, I barely used them. I much preferred hobgoblins and humans. But like other folks in this thread, the Lord of the Rings movies reminded me that orcs are made of pure awesome. And evil. Lots and lots of evil.

When I learned that the Professor had decided that orcs were elves, I realized that drow are pretty lame. Orcs are better dark elves than D&D's dark elves. They're a much better mirror to the elves; just by being lawful evil to the elves' chaotic good (although I did click "chaotic evil" in the poll) -- but add in the militarism, some industrialization, the raiding and raping, the shortened lifespans, the savagery of the average orc -- like I said, better dark elves than the dark elves. Orcs as fey -- hmmm, there's something there, I think.

The other thing about LoTR orcs is that there's no pig snout. I remember watching the D&D cartoon as a kid and wondering why there were Gamorrean Guards in the 'toon, until my brother explained, "They're orcs, stupid." At the time I thought it was cool, but at the time I was a silly child.

Still, even pig-snouted orcs are capable of bringing the awesome. One of the best D&D supplements ever (and one for BECM) was the Orcs of Thar gazzateer, which not only delineated several tribes and sub-species of orcs and other humanoids (I still use red orcs and yellow orcs), but also presented an orcish city and tons of orcish NPCs, including old King Thar, a more interesting orc king than Obould Many Arrows will ever be. And I ran my first orc PCs from that gazzateer.

Oh, and since this is 2E, and I know there aren't many fans of it here but I still want to mention it: Spelljammer orcs. They're pretty similar generally to Warhammer 40K orcs, but then there are the Scro, which were Klingon-orcs who pretty much rocked, being more lawful than lawful and more evil than evil. Somehow, space made orcs smarter, and that made them much more dangerous.

The Last Conformist

02-27-2009 11:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Orcs of Thar? Now I have this image of the Bollywood version of The Lord of the Rings in my head ...

Sleeper

02-27-2009 11:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10035867)
In the first two Warcraft games, they had pig farms, which I always felt was very appropriate.

I like. Both indiscriminate eaters. The "good" races might develop a religious aversion to pork :). Also, boars are nasty. Orc braves hooting and hollering as they drive a herd of giant tusked pigs through the woods until they overrun a human caravan, is a great image.

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10036260)

When I learned that the Professor had decided that orcs were elves, I realized that drow are pretty lame. Orcs are better dark elves than D&D's dark elves.

Yes. Though they're not corrupted and twisted elves (though they are both fey), the d20 setting Midnight does an extensive riff on the idea of orcs being the anti-elves. The world has been conquered by the dark god Izrador and the armies of his chosen race, the orcs. The only bastion of hope left is the elven kingdom (some dwarven strongholds also hold out, but they're isolated and unable to cooperate). They're neither piggish nor green; they're grey skinned and obviously inspired more by Peter Jackson's interpretation. No half-human orcs or elves either; the fey races can't interbreed with humans.

Mr. Teapot

02-28-2009 12:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10034733)

My solution: make them trollkin. Make them feared. Make them the size of a half-ogre, with beady eyes and sharklike jaws.

I've always gotten better results by humanizing orcs than by dehumanizing them. Dehumanizing them pushes them further into "faceless enemy just there to be killed" territory, which D&D already encourages enough and already has a ton of monsters to do.

Making orcs and actual species of thinking (if crude and violent) creatures is more interesting though. Give them genuine motivations. (Why are the orcs invading the dwarven lands? Not because they're evil or just like war, but because they have been pushed southwards after a local disaster and need resources to survive.) Give them personalities, culture and a history. NPCs worth knowing. Then the players and PCs will need to decide if orcs really deserve to be killed, or if they can be worked with. and even if they decide to kill the orcs, the orcs are meaningful NPCs who added some flavor to the game.

Wakboth

02-28-2009 01:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10034521)

[]First, take a look at the description: "Orcs vary widely in appearance, as they frequently crossbreed with other species. In general, they resemble primitive humans with grey-green skincovered with coarse hair. Orcs have a slightly stooped posture, a low jutting forehead, and a snout instead of a nose, though comparisons between this facial feature and those of pigs are exaggerated and perhaps unfair." Notice the bit in bold? Are Orcs supposed to be covered in hair and I never realised??*

I always thought it just meant they're hairy, not that they have fur or something like that.

Quote:

[*]Orcs in 2nd edition are Lawful Evil militarists, rather than Chaotic Evil brutes. I've actually always preferred them that way, even if it does see them creep into the Hobgoblin sphere of influence. It's probably because "Many orc tribes have waged wars for decades and have developed a frightening efficiency with battle tactics", which is more of a Lawful Evil sounding creature than a Chaotic Evil one.

Me, I think CE orcs are better (in part just because they don't compete with hobgoblins for the role of militarist humanoid). And that'd give us LE hobgoblins, NE goblins and CE orcs. (Gnolls, as much as I like them, aren't one of the Big Three humanoid races.)

Quote:

[*]"For every three orcs encountered, there will be a leader and three assistants. These orcs will have 8 hit points each, being the meanest and strongest in the group." Is that a mis-type? For every three orcs encountered there will be a leader and three assistants?

I'm convinced that it's a typo, and should be "for every thirty orcs".
[/quote]

Also, I've never, ever liked the "pig-face orc" idea, and I'm kind of glad that the orcs in D&D have moved away from that. (Thankfully, they haven't embraced the Warhammer/WoW style of big green orcs entirely, either.)

JRM

02-28-2009 01:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035828)

I guess I've never pictured orcs as purely anthrophagus. There aren't a ton of species that survive purely by cannibalizing their close relatives. I didn't state it, but I always assumed they were either nomadic, hunting great herds of stench kow or rothe or what have you, or practiced animal husbandry (though it's never clear what animals they would have domesticated; sheep don't seem fitting). I always figured they were wicked human analogues, not bizarre alien monsters like xenomorphs or wasps.

Pardon? I never proposed orcs were pure man-eaters, nor did anyone else on this thread that I recall, just that my preference was for omnivorous orcs as opposed to carnivores. I did say I liked the idea of man-eating ogres, but even then I didn't say they could only eat men.

(As an aside, in my campaign some orcs did include humanoids amongst their diet, but their most common victims was other orcs. One of my players had a half-orc character who developed a taste for "orc pies" who was rather distressed when I revealed the pies were made from orcs as well as by orcs.)

JRM

02-28-2009 01:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10036260)

Still, even pig-snouted orcs are capable of bringing the awesome. One of the best D&D supplements ever (and one of the best BECMI) was the Orcs of Thar gazzateer, which not only delineated several tribes and sub-species of orcs and other humanoid (I still use red orcs and yellow orcs), but also presented an orcish city and tons of orcish NPCs, including old King Thar, a more interesting orc king than Obould Many Arrows will ever be. And I ran my first orc PCs from that gazzateer.

Oh yes, the Orcs of Thar is a great supplement, indeed, many of the BECMI Gazeteers have good gaming material.

My favourite bit in the module was Thar's army manual, which included gems such as (I'll have to paraphrase, not having it immediately to hand):

Test for the orc sergeant. Tie the candidate to a wild boar and send them into the wilderness. If the orc does not come back, he failed. If the orc walks back by himself, he does not earn the promotion. If the orc comes back dragging the boar behind him, he earns the promotion to sergeant. If the orc comes back riding the boar, make him a captain.

JRM

02-28-2009 01:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Edivad (Post 10035731)

I think Tolkien may have had Orcs be 'degenerated' Elves... Perhaps Orcs could be the descendants of ancient humans who degenerated into savagery and cruelty so much that it actually physically changed them? Wouldn't be too original (degenerated races seem to be quite common in fiction), but still would explain some of the similarities between orcs and humans.

I've read an article by one of Tolkien's sons that said JRR changed his mind on that issue, making orcs corrupted men instead. If I remember it correctly, it said Tolkien decided he didn't like the idea that elves were corruptible in that fashion.

Chevelle

02-28-2009 02:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10034549)

Micromanaging = Lawful Evil

I wish this was Boardgame Geek so I could give you a thumbs up.

Sleeper

02-28-2009 06:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10036826)

Pardon? I never proposed orcs were pure man-eaters, nor did anyone else on this thread that I recall, just that my preference was for omnivorous orcs as opposed to carnivores. I did say I liked the idea of man-eating ogres, but even then I didn't say they could only eat men.

May not have been your intent, but your previous post could be interpreted either way. I initially read it that way, but I can see how you might have meant otherwise.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10035530)

As I think I've said before, one of the things that really bugs me about this kind of monster in AD&D is that they're carnivorous mammals who exist in large populations. In the real world carnivorous mammals outnumber the herbivores by at least thirty to one, so there shouldn't be enough of them to seriously threaten humans unless the orcs possess huge territories.

YojimboC

02-28-2009 06:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10036384)

Yes. Though they're not corrupted and twisted elves (though they are both fey), the d20 setting Midnight does an extensive riff on the idea of orcs being the anti-elves. The world has been conquered by the dark god Izrador and the armies of his chosen race, the orcs. The only bastion of hope left is the elven kingdom (some dwarven strongholds also hold out, but they're isolated and unable to cooperate). They're neither piggish nor green; they're grey skinned and obviously inspired more by Peter Jackson's interpretation. No half-human orcs or elves either; the fey races can't interbreed with humans.

Oh yeah, Midnight orcs are awesome. I particularly like the dworgs, the half-orc/dwarf crossbreeds. And I think the orcs and dwarves share an origin as fey earth spirits in that setting.

Actually, I just like the credit the orcs are given in Midnight as the end-all be-all of evil humanoids. I think there are goblins and maybe giants in there somewhere, but the orcs are pretty much it for servants of the evil forces.

JRM

02-28-2009 09:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10038029)

May not have been your intent, but your previous post could be interpreted either way. I initially read it that way, but I can see how you might have meant otherwise.

Oh right, I guess you could read that post as meaning carnivorous orcs eating herbivorous humans, although my intention was more meat eating tribe competing for territory with far more numerous omnivorous tribe. Still, orcs probably do eat humans. Our own species are known to be occasional cannibals, so an evil/amoral monstrous version of us like an orc would likely be more prone to cannibalism and anthropagy, but that doesn't mean they only eat humans.

EDIT: Oh and I've just noticed that "about this kinf on monster" in my post. "Kinf?" what on Earth is a kinf, I'd better check my Fiend Folio, sounds like it belongs there. Oh well, I'll just have to correct that typo in post #7.

YojimboC

02-28-2009 09:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Which is why I voted chaotic evil. 3E orcs are basically the Reavers from Firefly/Serenity. They'll kill you, rape you, skin you, and eat you and not necessarily in that order.

Kakita Kojiro

02-28-2009 09:38 AM

You know, with our recent discussion on ogres and orcs and interbreeding hijinks... let us remember back to the "Mammal" entry: Losel.

So, losels are orc + baboon crossbreeds, created by someone or other on Greyhawk from what I recall (Iuz, maybe?). One would like to think that they are "crossbreeds" in the same way that an owlbear or duckbunny is... but if not, it isn't the ogres with the whackiest crossbreeding heritage.

noisms

02-28-2009 12:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by GestaltBennie (Post 10035989)

The entry was mine. Sad to say, knowing this was a really important monster, I showed the write-up to about a dozen gamers and asked them to proof it. No one caught the mistake. ::sigh::

Wow, really? How many others did you write?

GestaltBennie

02-28-2009 02:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10039255)
Wow, really? How many others did you write?

My assignment on this project was Merman through Myconid, and Orc through Rhemoraz.

JRM

02-28-2009 04:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by GestaltBennie (Post 10039572)
My assignment on this project was Merman through Myconid, and Orc through Rhemoraz.

Excellent! I hope you can give us some interesting "war stories" about editing those monsters* and the development of the Monstrous Manual.

*In several senses of the word "monster".;)

noisms

02-28-2009 05:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by GestaltBennie (Post 10039572)
My assignment on this project was Merman through Myconid, and Orc through Rhemoraz.

Well let me first say that any ribbing we (especially I) give the monsters in these threads is entirely done from a position of great affection. The Monstrous Manual was my favourite book ever between the ages of about 11 and 14, and still ranks as the best fantasy bestiary ever created in my opinion.

If you did Me-My and Or-Rhe, that means you did some really nice entries - particular favourites of mine being the Crimson Death Mist, the Rakshasa, the Phantom and the Otyugh.

JRM

02-28-2009 05:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10039793)

Well let me first say that any ribbing we (especially I) give the monsters in these threads is entirely done from a position of great affection. The Monstrous Manual was my favourite book ever between the ages of about 11 and 14 and still ranks as the best fantasy bestiary ever created in my opinion.

If you did Me-My and Or-Rhe, that means you did some really nice entries - particular favourites of mine being the Crimson Death Mist, the Rakshasa, the Phantom and the Otyugh.

I'll back you up there noism. Most of the monster-ribbing we've been doing is on a conceptual/aesthetic level rather than an editorial one.

There's nothing to be ashamed about the editing of the Monstrous Manual*, it doesn't have any egregious typographical and grammatical errors, admittedly some of the wording is a bit confusing but I'd blame that on the writers rather than the editors, I don't expect a RPG editor to redraft the rules for clarity. Plus the layout is nice for the period.

*Unless you include the editors not noticing the Invisible Stalker's illustration was missing.:p

EmperorSeth

02-28-2009 10:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10038738)

Which is why I voted chaotic evil. 3E orcs are basically the Reavers from Firefly/Serenity. They'll kill you, rape you, skin you, and eat you and not necessarily in that order.

Orcs as Reavers? Huh, I never thought of that before. That would quickly put the interest back into them. Now, I'm not so sure that's accurate by the rules, though; the MM only listed them as "often" chaotic evil, not even getting the "usually" that the other humanoid get. Between that and worlds like Eberron, I assumed that 3rd ed orcs were more of the Proud Warrior Guy or even the Misunderstood Natural Guy schtick the lizardfolk seem to get.

Thane of Fife

02-28-2009 11:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Out of curiosity, how many people actually used those percentage listings of weapons? I can recall using them for deciding what kinds of weapons an orc leader might have, but most of my uses of orcs would be something like:

20 orcs with short swords, shields, and studded leather rather than any sort of mix of halberds and glaives and axes and such.

Also interesting is that orcs are good miners, which is something we don't often see of them.

Zarithar

03-01-2009 01:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

This discussion of orc diet seems sort of odd. I had always pictured them as opportunists, eating whatever was at hand, but preferring meat of some sort whether it be horse, human, dog, or beef. They wouldn't turn their nose up at a loaf of bread or a pie either I would imagine.

As for alignment, I've always had a soft spot for orcs and goblinoids in general... and while they do tend towards evil, there are doubtless exceptions to the rule. Conceptually, my favorite orcs are those from the Warhammer universe (quite chaotic and evil) and those from Warcraft (evil when under demonic influence, wild and savage... and not evil, when freed from that taint).

YojimboC

03-01-2009 01:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10040252)

Orcs as Reavers? Huh, I never thought of that before. That would quickly put the interest back into them. Now, I'm not so sure that's accurate by the rules, though; the MM only listed them as "often" chaotic evil, not even getting the "usually" that the other humanoids get. Between that and worlds like Eberron, I assumed that 3rd ed orcs were more of the Proud Warrior Guy or even the Misunderstood Natural Guy schtick the lizardfolk seem to get.

Eberron aside, where the orcs are clearly some kind of Native American analogue. most of the D&D settings (I'm aware of) have full on evil orcs. I think the entry got modified in 3.5, when WotC decided to go with "tendencies" (something I think was included to allow Eberron's reworking of orcs, among other things), but if I recall correctly, 3.0 orcs are chaotic evil and that's that. Even accounting for some measure of sliding on the alignment scale, that means most non-chaotic evil orcs are going to end up being chaotic neutral or neutral evil; still bad neighbors no matter how you cut it.

Trying to explain how a culture of chaotic evil creatures could possibly work, the only thing I could think of was the Reavers. The orcs are basically a society of serial killers, who band together out of a combination of mutual cowardice and aggression.

If you have a chance, check out the Kingdoms of Kalamar sourcebook, Fury in the Wastelands. Topknotch stuff. Between that and watching/re-reading the Lord of the Rings, I realized orcs were the coolest, most monstrous, and brutal humanoid villains in the MM. As a player, I enjoy killing them, and as a DM, I enjoy throwing them at my players.

Edit: Also, rules schmules. If it sounds like a good idea, run with it.

Hellzon

03-01-2009 01:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Morrowind Orcs are.. interesting. Another iteration of the "Noble Warrior", though.

Mr. Teapot

03-01-2009 02:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zarithar (Post 10040640)

They wouldn't turn their nose up at a loaf of bread or a pie either I would imagine.

That raises all sorts of questions about why the orc hasn't eaten the pie already.

GestaltBennie

03-01-2009 03:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10039697)

Excellent! I hope you can give us some interesting "war stories" about editing those monsters and the development of the Monstrous Manual.*

In several senses of the word "monster".;)*

It's been twenty years, and my brain got fried long ago working in computer game development (extended hundred hour work weeks are worse than acid, man!), but I'll say what I can.

Design on the MM was farmed out to Bruce Heard's favorite stable of freelancers, of which I was fortunate enough to be one. The actual selection of monsters was done by TSR, monsters which were considered "lame" were excluded with some glee (later I talked with one ex-TSR staffer who bemoaned that the Annuals put them back in). Deadlines were tight, as per usual with TSR in that period. A lot, or all, of my editing was done by Jon Pickens, who I remember as a real stickler, but probably deserves credit for the quality being as high as it was. I don't remember all of the design issues; I had some problem with wanting to transform damages into base weapon damage plus strength bonus, an approach later taken by 3e, but I was told to conform more to 1e damage standards.

The project was fun, but the details could get repetitive; I remember Jon moaning on one manuscript about being tired of seeing yet another note on the use of monster parts, a criticism which was probably accurate. The more I was allowed to stretch my wings in development, the more fun I had. The mind flayer was easily my favorite entry -- recognizing the Cthulhuesque elements of Gary's original, I figured making them amphibians and giving them elder brains would reinforce that tone.

DMH

03-01-2009 03:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

You are the creator of the elder brain? Cool! I am not a fan of illithids but the idea of the elder brain is just so interesting.

JRM

03-01-2009 05:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10040817)

That raises all sorts of questions about why the orc hasn't eaten the pie already.

The answer to that one's obvious. The orc's there to guard the pie, not eat it. The tribal chief would have that orc's head if the pie crust was so much as nibbled.

JRM

03-01-2009 05:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10040370)

Out of curiosity, how many people actually used those percentage listings of weapons? I can recall using them for deciding what kinds of weapons an orc leader might have, but most of my uses of orcs would be something like:

Sheepishly raises hand. I'd quite often use the weapon ratios if I had to whip up a tribe of humanoids for my party to ~~meaningfully interact with~~ slaughter mercilessly. I did tend to swap a few categories, just for variety or to suit the scenario. Often that was to give them more missile weapons, which many of the default humanoid weapon mixes were a little short of.

JRM

03-01-2009 05:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Well you deserve Kudos for the elder brain, I've never used one but the idea has ahem stuck in my mind.

The weapon+strength bit was interesting to, since there are some 2E (and 1E) humanoid monsters that use it, but many more that don't. Gets rather confusing, especially when a few of the monster got strength bonuses to hit as well.

noisms

03-01-2009 01:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by GestaltBennie (Post 10041018)

I don't remember all of the design issues; I had some problem with wanting to transform damages into base weapon damage plus strength bonus, an approach later taken by 3e, but I was told to conform more to 1e damage standards.

If only you'd had your way. That's one thing that I always thought should have been changed.

Quote:

The project was fun, but the details could get repetitive; I remember Jon moaning on one manuscript about being tired of seeing yet another note on the use of monster parts, a criticism which was probably accurate.

No way, the monster-parts-usage bits are a lot of fun. I've remarked on a number of occasions that a Complete Guide to Using Monster Body Parts for Armour would have been both possible and worth buying.

Wakboth

03-01-2009 05:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10042608)

No way, the monster-parts-usage bits are a lot of fun. I've remarked on a number of occasions that a Complete Guide to Using Monster Body Parts for Armour would have been both possible and worth buying.

Ah, the Combat Taxidermists & Monster Ranchers campaign!

noisms

03-02-2009 11:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Otyugh

It is easiest to describe Otyughs as the creature in the rubbish disposal unit thing in Star Wars; I'm not sure if that was the direct inspiration but the concept is pretty close. Otyughs live under dung heaps and eat lots of, well, dung; they beat you up with tentacles and carry fatal or debilitating diseases (though what 'debilitating' means is not detailed). There is a larger, nastier and tougher variant called the Neo-Otyugh.

Otyughs are one of those monsters which seem specifically designed to ambush adventurers in a dungeon - like Piercers, Lurkers, Mimics and the like. It's hard to imagine one living in any other setting, except perhaps a sewer. I wonder if there could be some kind of secret civilisation of the things living beneath the surface of some giant metropolis.

The other use I can think of for Otyughs is as a kind of watchdog for a tribe of goblins or kobolds; in return for warning of intruders and/or killing them, the Otyugh gets as much dung and offal as it can eat. Sounds like a great deal to me!

Inyssi

03-02-2009 12:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Apparently, otyughs have become the low-level aberration.

And the "sewer thing". If it's not rats, it's between one and four otyughs.

ESkemp

03-02-2009 12:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10046445)

The other use I can think of for Otyughs is as a kind of watchdog for a tribe of goblins or kobolds; in return for warning of intruders and/or killing them, the Otyugh gets as much dung and offal as it can eat. Sounds like a great deal to me!

I like the idea of them being "bioengineered" by the life-reshaping culture/race of your choice (my personal preference is elves) for that specific purpose. They dispose of your garbage, you don't have to waste any serious resources feeding them, and as you note, they also make trainable watchdogs. And given that sneaking into places via the sewers is a time-honored tradition, why not have specialized sewer watch-beasts since people will be coming in through there anyway?

YojimboC

03-02-2009 01:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I like the otyugh. Like the gelatinous cube and the carrion crawler, it exists largely to explain how dungeons remain clean and pretty in between adventurer's raids, but they're also a neat addition to magical world ecology.

I think they're a natural for urban adventures, to be found in sewers and trash heaps and such. And not necessarily in an aggressive manner, but simply as a part of set dressing.

noisms

03-02-2009 01:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10046757)

I like the otyugh. Like the gelatinous cube and the carrion crawler, it exists largely to explain how dungeons remain clean and pretty in between adventurer's raids, but they're also a neat addition to magical world ecology.

I think they're a natural for urban adventures, to be found in sewers and trash heaps and such. And not necessarily in an aggressive manner, but simply as a part of set dressing.

You could almost imagine one sitting in a corner somewhere in a castle, disposing of the waste. Like one of the weird beings in Jabba's palace.

DMH

03-02-2009 07:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Since the neos are smarter than humans, I wonder what they think about all day long.

noisms

03-02-2009 08:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10047670)

Since the neos are smarter than humans, I wonder what they think about all day long.

Maybe they savour dung like we do wine, and just spend all day in hedonistic enjoyment of all the various flavours.

JRM

03-03-2009 12:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10047734)

Maybe they savour dung like we do wine, and just spend all day in hedonistic enjoyment of all the various flavours.

Now I'm imagining a couple of otyughs lying in a rapturous daze after a visit from their 'dealer', any one turns to the other to say "Wow, that was some really great st".

Come to think of it, thinks otyughs are sapient language-users wouldn't they have a wide vocabulary to describe different kinds of dung and rubbish, possibly based on taste, texture and nutritional value?

I'm reminded of a Jack Vance short story I once read, whose title temporarily escapes me, which was a science fiction murder mystery where the culprit turned out to be an alien who ingested sewage and "savoured" bacteria. The detective investigating the murder discovered the victim had discovered someone had been embezzling, and of the suspects with access to the account the sewer-alien was the only one spending beyond his means - he'd been mail ordering packets of rare, and in some cases deadly, bacteria to add to his intestinal fauna.

Getting back to otyughs, I imagine they have an integrated part in the cultures of many large civilizations in D&D. Having otyughs under your city or castle may be highly desirable, since they help protect you from plague and outbreaks of vermin, as well as the sewer-busting enemies previously mentioned. Being neutral in alignment, they can work for both good and evil creatures without moral conflicts. They could also alert their "suppliers" of problems under their feet, or in some cases be considered official employees of the civil engineering department. I'm imagining an otyugh wearing a safety helmet poking its eyestalk out of a manhole and shouting "Oy, Pete! There's subsidence in west sewer eight, better get a crew down here."

That opens up some possibilities for otyughs in a D&D game beyond "random menace in the sewer" or "cesspool guardian". Maybe the players want to find something that got washed into a storm drain, and the best way to go about this is to find the local otyugh? More amusingly (to me, anyway) there's a city that wants the party to recruit an neo-otyugh to help them with their new sewers, but there are rivals who also desire its services so they have to compete to offer the otyugh the highest quality crap to persuade it to pick their job offer.

Sleeper

03-03-2009 02:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've said it before, but I really love the concept. A monster build specifically to explain why the average faux-medieval fantasy world has modern-seeming hygiene and sanitation and isn't just acrap sack world. I love the magical and social engineering that it implies. That an otyugh can make an effective guard, engineer, ambush predator, or an odd sage or detective (after all, digging through dumpsters is a standard investigative technique and may be the best way to get a feel for a city),* is just a bonus. I could also imagine a world where, for their help in sanitation and fighting plagues and diseases, they are considered holy. Like the cow in India, sacred and untouchable.

They're also well designed. Huge, lumbering body for ingesting the relatively nutrient poor offal suggests the body is primarily an elaborate digestive system, like a huge furnace (similar to many large herbivores). Eyes on stalks are very useful for hiding in the flow of waste, and for peeping out of its environment into the city streets. Tentacles, for bringing the food to them from all the hidden crannies without having to be tiny and built like a rat. And those limbs are spatulate and rough at the ends, like sharkskin, for more thorough cleansing.

* Imagine a nexus, a magical locus. Like an Underdark Sargasso sea under a maelstrom, but instead of sea monsters and undead pirates and lost treasure ships, it's the fantasy version of a landfill. Where all the garbage from a dozen different races goes to rot. Miles and miles of discarded toys, scraps of food, (in?)human waste, and the assorted detritus produced whenever lots and lots of elves or dwarves or gnolls get together. In the center, built under the largest single pile, is the center of otyugh civilization. The Library. A collection of written materials of various kinds (only those that can survive liquid, of course), but more importantly samples and collections. Some painstakingly restored. Half are pure pop culture drivel, underwear from great heroes, hair products used by wicked stepmothers, that kind of thing. But the other half chronicles the sweeping flow and drift of style and fashion, the history of the world. To know the world, you have to seek it's underbelly, or rather, the leavings of the underbelly. These are the neo-otyugh; not a new breed, but simply better-fed and better-educated.

Or, imagine a film-noir detective story. With glamorous dames, gangsters, and of a course a tough and persistent hard-drinking PI with ready fists as a protagonist. A story of right and wrong, because among all the sordid and distressing happenings, our hero is a gem in the rough, with a glittering sense of honor hidden beneath a trenchcoat. Except our PI is an otyugh whose rough fists are actually abrasive sandpaper-like tentacles. Who uses discarded scraps to piece together the puzzle, snags clues with elongated snapping arms, and guzzles bottles of rotgut urine.

demiurge1138

03-03-2009 02:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sleeper, that Otyugh PI is made of win.

I'm currently DMing a game that got otyugh-heavy for a while, and two facts about otyughs were decided by my players, seemingly by committee. I had no input.

1) Otyughs, due to their low Intelligence score, obsession with food and playful demeanor, talk like LOLcats.

2) Otyughs do not secrete waste like other animals--otherwise, sewers would just be full of otyugh leavings. Instead, their highly efficient metabolisms excrete nothing but a fine solid powder and pure oxygen. This explains why sewers are so liveable in D&D, rather than being full of asphyxiating toxic gasses.

Unfortunately, I hate the mechanical design of otyughs in 3rd Edition, my game of choice. They're big grapple monsters that are no stronger than a human, and they're woefully over-CRed.

YojimboC

03-03-2009 03:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Just looking over the entry now... and I didn't realize that even otyughs were (low to average) intelligent. And telepathic!

That means unions or guilds. And strikes! And what are the otyughs striking for?

What about deals with the Thieves Guild or Assassin's Guild? In exchange for... something... otyughs co-operate with the local underworld. Need to duck lawmen by jumping into a sewer? Otyughs lumber by to cover your escape. Need to dump some ill-gotten gains down a privy in order to throw the guard off your scent? Otyughs will recover the goods and them to you (cleaning, sadly, is your responsibility). And so on.

Of course, negotiating with these beings is going to be an adventure in itself.

Belchion

03-03-2009 03:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10049181)
In exchange for... something... otyughs co-operate with the local underworld.

I just find it difficult what to offer something that eats faeces and lives in a sewer. Perhaps the dung of some exotic animals otyughs consider delicious - dragon or gryphon poop or so.

JRM

03-03-2009 05:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10049181)

Just looking over the entry now... and I didn't realize that even otyughs were (low to average) intelligent. And telepathic!

That means unions or guilds. And strikes! And what are the otyughs striking for?

Well, while normal union workers strike because they're being treated like excrement, otyughs strike because they're not being treated with excrement.

When you have a bunch of stinking tentacled monsters marching in front of your house waving placards and chanting "What do we want - crap! When do we want it - now!" (chanting into your mind remember, since they're telepathic), it'd take a strong will to keep on sending your waste to that new incinerator.

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10049181)

What about deals with the Thieves Guild or Assassin's Guild? In exchange for... something... otyughs co-operate with the local underworld. Need to duck lawmen by jumping into a sewer? Otyughs lumber by to cover your escape. Need to dump some ill-gotten gains down a privy in order to throw the guard off your scent? Otyughs will recover the goods and them to you (cleaning, sadly, is your responsibility). And so on.

Not to mention that perennial problem assassins have of disposing of the body, made even worse in a world with resurrection and speak with dead spells. An otyugh is tailor made to make such a problem disappear.

Thane of Fife

03-03-2009 07:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I had never realized that otyughs had quite so much potential for comedy gold.

I do not think that I shall ever be able to take that page of the Monstrous Manual seriously again.

JRM

03-03-2009 05:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10050303)

I had never realized that otyughs had quite so much potential for comedy gold.

I do not think that I shall ever be able to take that page of the Monstrous Manual seriously again.

Glad you enjoyed it.

Now I couldn't help coming up with another couplet for the Otyugh Sewer Worker Union's protest chants...

"What do we want? Crap!"

"When do we want it? Now!"

"Why are we wai-ting?"

"Cause you're not de-fe-ca-ting!"

:eek:

Wakboth

03-03-2009 07:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10050303)

I had never realized that otyughs had quite so much potential for comedy gold.

What did you expect from a critter called "Oh, t'- euuugh!" :D

JRM

03-03-2009 08:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10048918)

These are the neo-otyugh; not a new breed, but simply better-fed and better-educated

Now while I can understand the desire to make otyughs and neo-otyughs the same species, since having two different lifeforms occupying an identical evolutionary niche and habitat is problematic, there are enough differences between the two in morphology and capabilities (especially intellectual) that they could easily be different species.

However, they both speak/sign the same language, which makes it very unlikely that they're not the same species.

Maybe the clue is in the "neo-". Otyughs are the original form, the low-sapient dominant lifeform of an obscure prime material world filled with stinking, detritus filled swamps. A plane-spanning ancient civilization noticed their potential for solving their sewage problem, and uplifted them into useful members of civil society we know today as Neo-Otyughs, literally the "new" otyughs.

Unfortunately, the lifeshaping was imperfect and neo-otyughs do not always breed true, often producing otyugh throwbacks instead of more neo-otyughs.

Or it could just be down to diet: a regulat otyugh just didn't have a good enough dungheap to fully develop its mind and body. Meaning neo-otyughs aren't a true-breeding "offshoot" of the otyugh, but otyughs are a stunted and dim-witted form of neo-otyugh.

DMH

03-03-2009 08:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10052683)

Or it could just be down to diet: a regulat otyugh just didn't have a good enough dungheap to fully develop its mind and body. Meaning neo-otyughs aren't a true-breeding "offshoot" of the otyugh, but otyughs are a stunted and dim-witted form of neo-otyugh.

Why not take this a bit farther and say that neos come from base otyughs that have eaten the waste of powerful magical critters like dragons? For DMs who have the time, they could come up with different varieties (in 3.X that would be via templates) due to diet.

Inyssius

03-03-2009 08:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10052700)

Why not take this a bit farther and say that neos come from base otyughs that have eaten the waste of powerful magical critters like dragons?

Wow. You know what? That is literally the only dragon part or byproduct that I have never seen mentioned in a utilitarian or mystical context.

Huh.

DMH

03-03-2009 08:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Your sarcasm is unbecoming and dragons were the first example to come to mind. I could have said the sewer version of mudmen, dead oozes, bits of undead or flesh golems, waste of aboleths or illithids or even demonic radiation. There aren't a lot of creatures that could end up in a sewer, but there are enough.

Inyssius

03-03-2009 09:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

No, no, I was being totally serious. I was genuinely taken aback for a second there, not having looked at it from that angle before (augh eew brainbleach me not that angle). I actually like your idea.

DMH

03-03-2009 09:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Okay, cool. I have never used gulguthra* before but I have tried to come up with as many sources of mutation in D&D for use with Gamma World 4e mutations. Dragon parts and waste is somewhere in that list.

*Which name is better for otyughs? I find gulguthra easier to spell and pronounce.

Wakboth

03-03-2009 10:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10052731)

Wow. You know what? That is literally the only dragon part or byproduct that I have never seen mentioned in a utilitarian or mystical context.

Heh. I once toyed with the idea that dragons eat practically anything, including rocks, and metabolize almost everything except noble metals and magical residue, which they excrete as gold, silver and gems. :D

JRM

03-03-2009 10:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10052731)

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10052700)

Why not take this a bit farther and say that neos come from base otyughs that have eaten the waste of powerful magical critters like dragons? For DMs who have the time, they could come up with different varieties (in 3.X they would be via templates) due to diet.

Wow. You know what? That is literally the only dragon part or byproduct that I have never seen mentioned in a utilitarian or mystical context.

Hmm, I clearly recall reading mention of dragon dung in fantasy books and RPGs, but can't remember were. That's going to bother me know, unless I call think of their title(s).

Anyhows, I was thinking the waste from magical creatures or laboratories could be a key element of the diet to create neo-otyughs, but didn't want to restrict myself. Perhaps they just need a really big pile of crap to get enough nutrient to grow to neo-otyugh size.

JRM

03-03-2009 10:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10052866)

Which name is better for otyughs? I find gulguthra easier to spell and pronounce.

I prefer otyugh. That's the original name, and I prefer the sound of it to gulguthra which (if I recall correctly) is a Forgotten Realms name for the monster.

Mr. Teapot

03-03-2009 11:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10052866)

Which name is better for otyughs? I find gulguthra easier to spell and pronounce.*

I've never seen or heard that name for an otyugh. A brief Google search shows it in the title on an Ed Greenwood written "Ecology of..." article, which goes along with it suggested as a Forgotten Realms thing. If I ever use an intelligent Otyugh in a game, it might get named Gulguthra.

I do prefer the regular otyughs being of animal intelligence or so (like you get in 4e), since as shown sentient otyughs are kinda silly. Maybe regular otyughs aren't sentient, but neo-otyughs are. Split the difference, as it were.

Kakita Kojiro

03-03-2009 11:53 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10046445)

... Otyughs live under dung heaps and eat lots of, well, dung; they beat you up with tentacles and carry fatal or debilitating diseases (though what 'debilitating' means is not detailed).

Presumably, it means that you are debilitated from having to poop too much.

Did anyone think differently? I mean, this is pretty much the archetype of the "now, it is time for poop jokes" monster. Never wanted to use them, because I never wanted my game to grind to a halt while everyone made their best coprophagy jokes.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10052866)

Which name is better for otyughs? I find gulguthra easier to spell and pronounce.*

I just can't understand the appeal of having an unpronouncable name as an alternative to their already-unpronouncable name.

Particularly inasmuch as, in-gameworld, I'd have to believe there'd be a much simpler, more common, and probably scatological name for the things.

JRM

03-03-2009 11:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10053420)

I've never seen or heard that name for an otyugh. A brief Google search shows it in the title on an Ed Greenwood written "Ecology of..." article, which goes along with it suggested as a Forgotten Realms thing. If I ever use an intelligent Otyugh in a game, it might get named Gulguthra.

I do prefer the regular otyughs being of animal intelligence or so (like you get in 4e), since as shown sentient otyugh: are kinda silly. Maybe regular otyughs aren't sentient, but neo-otyughs are. Split the difference, as it were.

Yes, I was thinking of that Dragon article, which was set in the Realms like most of Mr Greenwood's ecology articles. I'll pull out my copy of the Dragon Magazine Archive and see whether Ed's interpretation has any interesting tidbits.

EDIT: It's Dragon #96 pages 20-22, for those who're interested.

Monsieur Meuble

03-04-2009 04:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The Othyug strike ? At first, no one cared. In the first part of it, they tried to stop eating dungs, but it didn't last for more than five minutes. Then the leader made his goons walk in the streets and throw craps everywhere, craps they almost immediately licked clean (actually making the street cleaner). They were doing it each day without any reaction by the Establishment until the Food Merchant Guild hired the PCs because, well, the food that was crapped then licked by the striking othyugs is arguably cleaner and healthier than it was (othyug saliva is actually some kind of organic bleach...), but it's hard to find a good marketing spin on "this apple was smeared with shit then a dung-eating aberration liked it", so they had to hire some dudes specialized in the treatment of funky fauna to resolve this problem.

Of course, the leader of the strike, a Neo-Othyug, is waiting eagerly for humanoid negotiators (the moment the group go down the sewers, two othyug with a panel where is crudely written "dis wai, plz" appears and escort the PCs) (and I like the concept of othyug speaking common in lolspeak) and quickly exposes its demands.

1°) A diet richer in fibers for the city dwellers. This point exists essentially to be refused and make the other demands seems more reasonable.

2°) A modicum of waste sorting. Organic wastes on one side, other wastes on the other. Because, well, just the other day, a bunch of young ones found this (it waves about the half-eaten corpse of the Local Ruler, you know, the one the PCs saw, like, a couple of hours in the Local Palace, twirling his mustache and adjusting its face...) and began chomping on it and one of them swallowed this (it throws on the table a small sword emblazoned with the logo of Your Favorite Antagonist Group) that was embedded in the middle of the food. It perforated its stomach and is now between life and death, because, well, we know how to disinfect a wound, but we suck at suturing one. Magical healing ? Yeah, we heard about it, but... we will come back to it later.

3°) A little bit of help to fight against the undead. The local university of magic and the shitload of Evil Groups in town just keep releasing or stocking them in the sewers and they are... confusing. They smell like food, taste like food and the more common ones behave initially like food. Then they get all fighty and killy and punchy, sometime after being swallowed. This is very distressing and, of course, lethal. Please understand how anger can grow in this conditions.

4°) A salary. A pay. Something, whatever allows them to buy goods and services in the humanoid society. The neo-othyug here is a visionary who understands the wasted potential of its brethren and wants to buy them a civilization. So, it requires to be payed to repair and unclog the sewers and treat non-organic wastes, and with the money, the othyug community will buy itself a decent housing, send their promising larvae to the common-knowledge and magical schools and build a temple to the halving goddess of food (they were recently evangelized by a halfiing priest flushed by brigands in his toilets who somehow lost himself among the othyug community and introduced them to the concept of divinity. When asked about where does all the shit comes from, he made some embarrassed response...). If the project is accepted, the first othyug priests will soon take care themselves of the magical healing and of warding the undead, studious othyugh architects will build spacious undercities for their brethren and greatly ameliorate the waste-disposal system of the city, and years latter, the first othyug-exclusive group of adventurer will go out of town to the next city to convert the local othyugs to civilization.

Would the PCs live long enough, they could learn that the visionary neo-othyug ascended to demi-divinity or even to be the first real othyug god, and the PCs themselves are mythological / folkloric characters on the like of the Magii of christian tradition.

That is, if they convince the local authorities that the dung-eating aberrations are really worth negotiating with.

JRM

03-04-2009 05:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10053571)

Presumably, it means that you are debilitated from having to poop too much.

*Did anyone think differently? I mean, this is pretty much the archetype of the "now, it is time for poop jokes" monste
Never wanted to use them, because I never wanted my game to grind to a halt while everyone made their best coprophagy jokes.*

Well in that case I'd better apologize in advance for most of the otyugh posts I'm going to make on this thread.
:D

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10053571)

I just can't understand the appeal of having an unpronounceable name as an alternative to their already unpronounceable name.

Particularly inasmuch as, in-gameworld, I'd have to believe there'd be a much simpler, more common, and probably scatological name for the things.

Just out of curiosity, how do people pronounce these monsters' names?

The Monstrous Manual / Compendium gives an "official" pronunciation of "Aw-tee-ug", but does anyone use it? Everyone I can remember pronouncing Otyugh said "Ot-e-ugh", while Gulguthra is pretty easy as "Gul-goose-ra".

Of course, there are other possible pronunciations, such as "O-tie-ug" or "Ot-Yugh" and "Gul-Goo-thra", "Gul-Guth-ra", "Gul-Gut-Hra", "Gulg-uth-ra", "Gulg-Ut-hra" and so on.

So what (if any) are people using?

demiurge1138

03-04-2009 05:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

"Gul-Guth-ra" is what I go with when I use the alt-otyugh name, which is admittedly not often. I find it an odd choice, because it's clearly derived from Golgotha, the hill where Jesus was crucified. Did an otyugh in the Realms die for the sins of all the other otyughs? Do they collect skulls (Golgotha translates to "place of the skulls")?

JRM

03-04-2009 05:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10054823)

That is, if they convince the local authorities that the dung-eating aberrations are really worth negotiating with.

The main problem otyughs have dealing with humanoids is that their psychologies are so radically different. They simply cannot comprehend why the two-legs are so revulsed and embarrassed by the perfectly natural function of excretion. Why, it's almost as bizarre as how humanoids view reproduction!

That's why otyughs have such trouble with public relations exercises, like the attempt by the Otyugh Sewer Workers and Associated Dung Crafters Union to improve their image through a "Thanking You for the Poo" campaign. Alas, the friendly voice out of the cesspool saying "Very nice, please come again", the helpful tentacle reaching up to offer pieces of toilet paper and the notes on the outhouse door saying "Your dung tastes sickly, please visit a proctologist" didn't have the desired effect. The campaign was a complete failure, resulting in a massive outbreak of constipation.

"I don't want to go, the toilet talks to me in my head!"

EmperorSeth

03-04-2009 06:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10053117)

Heh. I once toyed with the idea that dragons eat practically anything, including rocks, and metabolize almost everything except noble metals and magical residue, which they excrete as gold, silver and gems. :D

The Lunar video games used that. Apparently all diamonds are really dragon poop. The dragons seem so shocked that we want them so eagerly. Heh, when you think about it, in that situation, we're the dragons' otyughs!

As for the neo-otyugh, now I can't imagine anything but an otygh wearing sunglasses and a trenchcoat, and saying "Whoa!"

Mr. Teapot

03-04-2009 06:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10055105)

Just out of curiosity, how do people pronounce these monsters' names?

"Oh Tug" or maybe "Oat yug". But I'm well aware I could be mistaken.

JRM

03-04-2009 07:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10055291)

As for the neo-otyugh, now I can't imagine anything but an otygh wearing sunglasses and a trenchcoat, and saying "Whoa!"

No, it all works out. In the Matrix trilogy the Zionists did live in sewers, after all. The machines must have rebuilt their bodies to process waste, and implanted a consensual hallucination so the "humans" were unaware of their true, horrible form.

Well my idea makes about as much sense as the Matrix sequels.;

Mr. Teapot

03-04-2009 08:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10055192)

"Gul-Guth-ra" is what I go with when I use the alt-otyugh name, which is admittedly not often. I find it an odd choice because it's clearly derived from Golgotha, the hill where Jesus was crucified. Did an otyugh in the Realms die for the sins of all the other otyughs? Do they collect skulls (Golgotha translates to "place of the skulls")?

Didn't Dogma already cover that? Golgotha was where you sent people to be executed. When people die, their bowels release themselves, meaning Golgotha was covered in poo.

Or it was just a poorly chosen name. That's always an option in D&D.

noisms

03-04-2009 09:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Owlbear

Another day, another icon. Owlbears are one of the pillars of D&D, like illithids, beholders and drow, and I like them.

As with all wizard creations, Owlbears have a very obvious use: as a guardian for something a wizard wants to protect. That makes it difficult to think of other ideas, but one concept I've often thought about is a City of Owlbears. This would be an ancient, ruined city, now overgrown by thick, primeval-looking forest a la Fangorn, in which a number of Owlbears have made their nests. Its streets would echo with their screeches and howls, and wanderers or adventurers would come seeking its buried treasures - and be devoured.

There are some oddball items in the entry - information that Owlbears wake at noon and sleep at midnight because they are a combination of diurnal and nocturnal animals; rumours of arctic Owlbears which are a mixture of snowy owls and polar bears; and prices of 2000 silver pieces or 5000 silver pieces for eggs and hatchlings. I think this might have come up in the MM before - the prices for owl-based creatures are always for some reason listed in silver rather than gold. Anyway, another idea for the egg-thief campaign...

Mikaze

03-04-2009 05:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've long tried to imagine what a growl-hoot would sound like, and it resulted in a few sleepless nights during my childhood.

Call the owlbear goofy if you want, but it will fuck your day up because it is made of BEAR and OWL.

Though barn-owlbears would be a bit harder to take seriously. Then again, I guess one could be bred as the heraldic mascot of some noble family with cash to burn. Now I'm imagining white barn-owlbears being tamed and kept as a show of station and status in some wintry kingdom.

Owlbears the Game

(un)reason

03-04-2009 05:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10056122)

Owlbear

Another day, another icon. Owlbears are one of the pillars of D&D, like illithids, beholders and drow, and I like them.

There are some oddball items in the entry - information that Owlbears wake at noon and sleep at midnight because they are a combination of diurnal and nocturnal animals; rumours of arctic Owlbears which are a mixture of snowy owls and polar bears; and prices of 2000 silver pieces or 5000 silver pieces for eggs and hatchlings. I think this might have come up in the MM before - the prices for owl-based creatures are always for some reason listed in silver rather than gold. Anyway, another idea for the egg-thief campaign...

This stuff got further filled in in their Ecology article, including stats for polar and winged owlbears. (if you think a bear'll fuck you right up, just think how nasty it is when it can fly silently as well) That's one of the joys of hybrids. By mixing and matching parts, you can come up with a ridiculous number of variants that fulfil different roles from a fairly small set of components.

Inyssiis

03-04-2009 05:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I love owlbears. They are (and have always been) by far my favorite creature of all time, although the competitors for second place are legion. I don't have any idea why I find them so great, but I do.

I just use them as the quintessential forest random encounter, myself--and a rare one, at that--but what they lack in utility, they make up for many times over in win.

Could they climb in 2e? Random question. It just seems like they might.

JRM

03-04-2009 06:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10054823)

(they were recently evangelized by a halfiing priest flushed by brigands in his toilets who somehow lost himself among the othyug community and introduced them to the concept of divinity. When asked about where does all the shit comes from, he made some embarrassed response...).

snip

Would the PCs live long enough, they could learn that the visionary neo-othyug ascended to demi-divinity or even to be the first real othyug god, and the PCs themselves are mythological / folkloric characters on the like of the Magii of christian tradition.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10055192)

Did an otyugh in the Realms die for the sins of all the other otyughs?

The thought of how otyughs would approach religion is a fascinating (and disturbing) one. Would their god be the Great Provider, who sends down crap from above? Maybe they believe in an afterlife - the Eternal Cesspool of Plenty at the rotten core of the world, although I prefer the idea that otyughs believe in reincarnation, since they're so linked to recycling biologicals.

If you're a moral otyugh, eating all the crap that comes your way and not breaking the traditions, you'll come back as a neo-otyugh, but those who break with tradition (eating another otyugh's crap, blocking a sewer, murdering a baby otyugh et cetera) are cursed to come back as a lesser being, such as a human (below otyughs in the order of things, cursed to serve otyughs by building and provisioning their sewer-homes, although it they're good humans they may get to come back as otyughs), an animal or even a lowly plant.

Being neutral and strongly linked to the destructive side of nature, maybe highly spiritual otyughs tend to be Druids rather than Clerics?

If they're anything like humans psychologically, otyughs are likely to believe they are the superior lifeform, "And the Great Provider stretched its tentacles across the land and filled it with living things, all of which where tasked to create food for its chosen people, the otyughs. The lowest of them, the plants, would only provide when they died and fell into out lairs, the middle-ranking, the animals, where given the ability to produce food from the flesh of lifeforms below them, while the highest animals, the humans, were tasked with an instinct to create great nests in which us otyughs could live in comfort. Thus the Great Provided blessed his children with plenty, to show the love and favour in which it held its ultimate creation, us Gulguthra, who are formed in its holy image."

Alternatively, otyughs could form a "cargo cult". They can see the gods are giving the humans so much crap they're throwing it away, while sending none to the otyughs. So the humans must be intercepting divine cargos of crap that rightfully belong to the otyughs through some magical ritual. So, the cargo-cult otyughs start imitating the actions of those humans, hoping to stumble upon the ceremony they use to gain all these treasures.

JRM

03-04-2009 06:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10057439)

I've long tried to imagine what a growl-hoot would sound like, and it resulted in a few sleepless nights during my childhood.

Grrwhoo?

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 10057461)

*This stuff got further filled in in their Ecology article, including stats for polar and winged owlbears. (if you think a bear'll fuck you right up, just think how nasty it is when it can fly silently as well) *snip

Oh yes, the notion of a polar owlbear just makes me cackle inside, as polar bears and snowy owls are the largest examples of their animal-type, and camouflaged to boot.:D

Winged Owlbears are a cute concept to, and they're no more implausible in D&D than a Gryphon, just winged owl-bear chimeras instead of eagle-lions.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10057462)

Could they climb in 2e? Random question. It just seems like they might.

Well there's no mention of them being able to climb in the Monster Manual, but I see no reason they can't. Bears are good climbers, and owls live in trees. So wouldn't owlbears be better climbers than either, since they combine a bear's body with an owl's grasping talons?

JRM

03-04-2009 06:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10056122)

Owlbear

There are a couple of points in the Owlbear entry that jumped out at me:

"Owlbears speak their own language, which consists of very loud screeches of varying length and pitch"

and

"The owlbear attacks prey on sight, always fighting to the death (ignore morale rating for purposes of determining retreat)."

Now there's a language even less useful than Elven Cat, the ability to talk to an creature that will fight you to the death as soon as it sees you!

However, it begs the question why owlbears have a language, presumably it's because they've got Low intelligence, which raises the question why they're that smart when bears are only Semi-intelligent. The answer's obvious if you're familiar with the 1E Monster Manual. Giant Owls are as intelligent as humans, and averaging the two intelligent scores resulted in a Low-int owlbear.

So, if owlbears have a language they presumably have some form of culture, and in turn that suggests to me an explanation as to their "attack to the death on sight" behaviour. Maybe they only do this to humanoids, because they have a dim recollection of the wizard(s) who gave them their current form. I imagine owlbear mothers taking their kits to see the forest elders, who tells them the tale:

"Skraa-raa war hoo grraa"

Oh sorry, I forgot to switch the translator on.;

"In the Old Times, we were beautiful flying creatures with great wisdom and intelligence. That was before the humans came. They said they wanted to learn from us, but really wished to make us their slaves. They failed in their first attempts, for we simply flew out of their traps, growling our contempt for their treachery. But humans, being a form of demon, can call upon supernatural powers. They used their sorcery to change us by fusing our essence with the brute bears of the forest.

So, whenever you feel the agony of your body, or an urge to fly you can never satisfy, remember that it is the humans who did this to us, and they'd do worse to us if given the chance. Many a mother has been murdered by humans, and her eggs or cubs carried off to slavery and worse.

If you ever meet a human, you must try to kill it, even if you would die in the attempt. The experiments they'd do to you if they captured you alive would be far worse than the pain of death."

noisms

03-04-2009 07:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10057635)

There are a couple of points in the Owlbear entry that jumped out at me:

"Owlbears speak their own language, which consists of very loud screeches of varying length and pitch"

and

"The owlbear attacks prey on sight, always fighting to the death (ignore morale rating for purposes of determining retreat)."

Now there's a language even less useful than Elven Cat, the ability to talk to an creature that will fight you to the death as soon as it sees you!

However, it begs the question why owlbears have a language, presumably it's because they've got Low intelligence, which that begs the question why they're that smart when bears are only Semi-intelligent. The answer's obvious if you're familiar with the 1E Monster Manual. Giant Owls are as intelligent as humans, and averaging the two intelligent scores resulted in a Low-int owlbear.

So, if owlbears have a language they presumably have some form of culture, and in turn that suggests to me an explanation as to their "attack to the death on sight" behaviour. Maybe they only do this to humanoids, because the have a dim recollection of the wizard(s) who gave them their current form. I imagine owlbear mothers taking their kits to see the forest elders, who tells them the tale:

"Skraa-raa war hoo grraa"

Oh sorry, I forgot to switch the translator on.;

"In the Old Times, we were beautiful flying creatures with great wisdom and intelligence. That was before the humans came. They said they wanted to learn from us, but really wished to make us their slaves. They failed in their first attempts, for we simply flew out of their traps, growling our contempt for their treachery. But humans, being a form of demon, can call upon supernatural powers. They used their sorcery to change us by fusing our essence with the brute bears of the forest.

So, whenever you feel the agony of your body, or an urge to fly you can never satisfy, remember that it is the humans who did this to us, and they'd do worse to us if given the chance. Many a mother has been murdered by humans, and her eggs or cubs carried off to slavery and worse.

If you ever meet a human, you must try to kill it, even if you would die in the attempt. The experiments they'd do to you if they captured you alive would be far worse than the pain of death."

JRM, I find your ideas Relevant to My Interests.

Mikaze

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Hmm...

<http://img10.imageshack.us/img10/664...riginal.th.jpg> + <http://img3.imageshack.us/img3/7706/smokeybear.th.jpg> = <http://img>

"Give a hoot, or I'll eat your godsdamned face."

JRM

03-04-2009 07:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Okay, I've read through Ed Greenwood's The Ecology of the Gulguthra. Didn't remember much of it, since it was a long time since I last read it.

Dragon #96 is the April 1985 issue, four years before the Monstrous Compendium came out. It seems quite evident to me that Mr Greenwood's article was an influence on the 2E version of the otyugh.

Anyhows, here are some bits that attracted my attention:

[1] Some of the details Greenwood gives about otyughs are identical to the 2E version, but I don't remember them being in the 1E MM. The range of the telepathic communication, neo-otyughs using grasped people as shields. The 2-4 damage to grappled victims.

[2] There is no mention of the eyestalk acting as a telepathic receiver/transmitter in the Dragon article. That may be original to the 2E MM.

[3] A few additions Greenwood made do not appear in the 2E MM.

[3.1] He gives otyughs ultravision as well as infravision, and says that otyugh's sleep, but even then " its eyestalk and eyes function as though it were awake, for the purpose of detecting approaching creatures ". and adds that bright lights "sometimes so disconcert these creatures that they do not attack"

[3.2] Greenwood writes "Gulguthras cannot smell with any acuity, probably due to the dung and decay that customarily surrounds them, and so they cannot track prey, nor readily discern the true natures of disguised creatures."

That's reasonable enough, and doesn't necessarily conflict with the 2E MM saying otyughs communicate via "certain smells". They may only be sensitive to their own communication pheromones.

[3.3] According to Greenwood otyugh bites infect with typhus "Due to the creature's favored habitat (proximity to dung and carrion) and its digestive system (wastes are spat back out of its mouth)".

That's a curiously specific disease, the AD&D MMs are far more generic about what infections an otyugh bite gives its victims. I do like the idea that an otyugh excretes as well as ingests through its mouth, there are some primitive animals (i.e. jellyfish) that do this, and it seems nastily appropriate for an otyugh.

[3.4] Finally, the article goes into some detail about Gulguthra reproduction, and I found the sordid details interesting enough to share...

First up was "a report by Phiraz of the Naturalists to the Commissioner of Public Sewers in the city of Scornubel", the last paragraph of which said:

Quote:

Thankfully, otyughs mate only seldom (perhaps once in every seven years or so), traveling by night and subterranean routes to bonepits deep under the earth, where the remains of many ancient creatures lie in vast layers. There they mate in mass gatherings with others of their kind who have made the same journey.

This had a note with the "real deal" according to Elminster.

Quote:

Every gulguthra is bisexual. Each produces, once every seven winters, a jellylike "eggmass" and travels underground (in a slow, patient journey) by instinct and memory until it reaches others of its kind. Then it regurgitates the eggmass from a secondary stomach and wanders off, that part of its task done. In some manner not yet understood another gulguthra can fertilize any eggmass (except its own) by taking it briefly into its mouth, or perhaps some internal organ, and expelling it again.

An eggmass that is fertilized, if left undisturbed, will develop in one week's time into a miniature version of the parent that provided the eggmass. (An otyugh eggmass will only produce another otyugh, and likewise for the neo-otyugh, even though either species can fertilize any eggmass.) This "newborn" creature is driven by an instinctual urge to find warmth and food, and will wander off to seek its own "fortune," returning to its birthplace years later to breed in its turn.

Gulguthra young are smaller (3-5 HD) and weaker (damage of 1-6/1-6/1-4, tentacle strength of 16) than mature specimens, but are otherwise identical to their parents, and grow to maturity within 4 months.

Apart from 2E saying they mate once a year, this does not conflict with the Monstrous Manual entry, although it makes no mention of them migrating to breed. Notice that the stats for a newborn are identical.

The bonepit mating site deep beneath the earth remind me of Sleepers' post #56 with a Sargasso Sea of sewage "the fantasy version of a landfill" where "In the center, built under the largest single pile, is the center of otyugh civilization. The Library." as well as Monsieur Meuble's post #76 idea of a visionary neo-otyugh seeking to buy his people a civilization where "studious otyugh architects will build spacious undercities for their brethren and greatly ameliorate the waste-disposal system of the city". Perhaps both such sites were founded on one of the otyughs ancient breeding grounds?

DMH

03-04-2009 08:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10055105)

The Monstrous Manual / Compendium gives an "official" pronunciation of "Aw-tee-ug"

I use that (which sounds like a strangled cough or something used by an eeeyukthyologist ;)) or gul-guth-ra (which rolls off the tongue). But like I said before I have never used the creature.

But now I want to.

Kakita Kojiro

03-04-2009 09:47 PM

Gah. Bisexual otyugh orgies with dungeon decor is a bit beyond the pale for one of my D&D games.

Might be a good hook for a tongue-in-cheek Saga of the Sages campaign, though, where our intrepid naturalists venture forth to see if Peta Girl is right about all her whacky claims.

JRM

03-04-2009 10:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10057774)

Hmm...

"Give a hoot, or I'll eat your godsdamned face."

That reminds me of the another explanation for owlbears. They're not the creations of evil wizards, but of mad druids. "Mess up the sacred forest will you? Well see how you like it when the forest beasts fight back!" They're nature red in beak and paw, created to defend the woods from the ravages of humanoid civilization (or some other threat to nature).

Personally, I don't entirely buy that, since surely an unnatural chimera like an owlbear is itself a threat to the natural order? Maybe it's a "lesser of two evils" deal.

Oh, and that's a nice picture of "sooty the owlbear". That'll teach those dang arsonists. :D

JRM

03-04-2009 10:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10057867)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10055105)

The Monstrous Manual / Compendium gives an "official" pronunciation of "Aw-tee-ug"

I use that (which sounds like a strangled cough or something used by an eeeyukthyologist ;)) or gul-guth-ra (which rolls off the tongue). But like I said before I have never used the creature.

But now I want to.

Same here, but I start it with "Oh-" instead of "Aw-". Shouldn't it be spelled something like Artyugh if it was pronounced the MM/MC way?

JRM

03-04-2009 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10058100)

Gah. Bisexual otyugh orgies with dungeon decor is a bit beyond the pale for one of my D&D games.

Might be a good hook for a tongue-in-cheek Saga of the Sages campaign, though, where our intrepid naturalists venture forth to see if Peta Girl is right about all her whacky claims.

Well bisexual orgies may sound fun, but if the PCs manage to wangle an invitation they'll be in for a disappointment, going by Mr Greenwood's description. The otyughs just walk up to their chosen partner and vomit an eggmass at their feet, then leave. If the chosen otyugh doesn't fertilize it, some other gulguthra will do the honours.

Most of the "mass gathering" is talking shop (i.e. talking sewage, since these are otyughs).

Oh, and I found Greenwood's use of "egg mass" a bit confusing. To me the word implies a lot of eggs (e.g. a Ootheca), while an otyugh produces just one.

ESkemp

03-05-2009 12:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10057439)

I've long tried to imagine what a growl-hoot would sound like, and it resulted in a few sleepless nights during my childhood.

Entertainingly enough, Blizzard actually had to devise one so their owlbears, pardon me, "moonkin" wouldn't be totally silent when you fight them.

I also have much love for owlbears. I don't even think I ever said "a wizard did it" to explain them; like the aurumvorax, pseudodragon, griffon, "sea lion," dire animals, and occasionally just plain mundane fantasy animals (nobody else ever devised new species of poisonous snake native to a world?), I like them as examples of how zoology just goes interesting places in a fantasy world. Maybe an owlbear's a hybrid. Maybe it's just the scariest "naturally" occurring monotreme ever. Who knows? All that really matters is that it's immense, ill-tempered, and has a beak where you'd expect a snout to be.

demiurge1138

03-05-2009 01:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I love owlbears, and my players love them too. They've come to expect an owlbear at low levels, actually. Sort of a rite of passage is to survive one of those monsters.

I didn't remember that 2e owlbears were sapient, but I prefer mine at animal level intelligence. I also don't think they need the "wizard did it" excuse as badly as some other creatures, but I like the idea of multiple wizards all trying to take the credit, branding their owlbears with arcane marks (risky!), etc.

Wakboth

03-05-2009 03:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Owlbears are a hoot, literally. :D

They're one of the better mash-up critters, and definitely better than chimeras. Makes me wonder why they have never featured in real-world folklore!

Monsieur Meuble

03-05-2009 07:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10056122)

and prices of 2000 silver pieces or 5000 silver pieces for eggs and hatchlings. I think this might have come up in the MM before - the prices for owl-based creatures are always for some reason listed in silver rather than gold.

Paying owlbear chickcubs and eggs in silver is traditional in this market, not unlike how it is traditional to speak of gold and diamonds in carats instead of more common units of weight or proportions or how pearls should be displayed on a square of red silk when the fisher discuss to sell them. If you don't, it's worth doing the deal.

This tradition originate from the original purpose of the owlbear and why one would pay so much for a "watchdog" that is always angry, all the time, and will rip your face at the first occasion and would decapitate you in doing so.

See, long time ago, there was this epidemic of lycanthropy ; people where scarred shitless at night of being attacked and contaminated, and of course no one trusted anyone volunteering himself for guarding the community ; obviously, he was a werewolf trying to kill or infect everyone in their sleep ; or, well, he would be one soon, seeing as how a trusted guard would become an evident target.

That's when a mage had the idea to create a "watchdog" that could be a match for a werewolf and was immune to lycanthropy. Unlike the chimera, the owlbear is not a natural hybrid and he is artificially "deficient", in this that the owl and the bear inside are not living in harmony and develop a sense of selves strong enough that, if a third animal try to infiltrate itself in the owlbear, it will get its ass kicked. The owlbear is always angry, mostly with itself (or, more precisely, with the other part of itself), but teratopsychanalists are scarce and so they transfer this anger into a hate of frickin' everything and the willingness to break everything that fall under its eyes into its component parts, while screeching a lot. Blood-injected eyes are also appropriate, of course. So, at night, everyone close doors and windows, you release the owlbear, everyone in several kilometer-squares wakes up when it starts screeching, takes his silver weapon and slays the werewolf it has hugged and is trying to enucleate.

Now, why would any village sell such a major and efficient system to protect itself against such a dire problem ? Well, of course, an even deal would be an exchange between an efficient werewolf-bane and, well, another werewolf-bane. So, if your village wanted to have its own owlbear, you had to compensate with silver. Lot of silver.

And that's where the tradition of paying chickcubs and eggs in silver come from, even though that most owlbear went feral and lycanthropism is under control for the moment...

6inTruder

03-05-2009 09:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Crap! Tried to get a post in earlier, but stupid phone ate it....

So I've kinda been waiting for owlbears so I can bring up an old school monster what seems very much in theme with them: Eagle Lions!

Those are from a wall fresco at the palace of Knossos. Which is probably where king Minos resided. Minotaur Minos.

randomgamer8466

03-05-2009 09:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

When my players faced the evil Kishite cattle baron Brom Bones and his hundred guardsmen, they were warned that he would fight them in a chariot "pulled by fell fey beasts". When the battle came, they were titillated to find that it was actually hitched to two owlbears. I rule.

s/LaSH

03-05-2009 01:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Owlbears are awesome. On the one hand, they're an incredibly wacky idea - an owl crossed with a bear? I know evil sorcerers are usually mad, but you'd have to be really seriously unbalanced to make something so apparently pointless.

And then you throw one at the players, and years later they're still traumatised by the word "Hoot". The owlbear actually works. If I could justify it, I'd have owlbears in every forest I ever charted.

6inTruder

03-06-2009 04:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10059468)
Owlbears are a hoot, literally. :D

*They're one of the better mash-up critters, and definitely better than chimeras. Makes me wonder why they have never featured in real-world folklore!

Check my post above, cause they kinda were.

Monsieur Meuble

03-06-2009 04:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10065003)
Check my post above, cause they kinda were.

Isn't a "eagle lion" just a griffon ?

6inTruder

03-06-2009 04:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10065145)

Isn't a "eagle lion" just a griffon ?

I thought griffon's had to have wings?

Monsieur Meuble

03-06-2009 06:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10065170)
I thought griffon's had to have wings?

Ho. Yes indeed. Silly me.

Kakita Kojiro

03-06-2009 06:39 AM

Frescos at Knossos predate the medieval obsession with categorizing fantastic beasts, though. Cretans probably would've identified griffons as eagle-lions, and homa birds as eagle-lions, and the Egyptian axex or saget (or the tšš or sfr, for which I know not the vowel schemes) as eagle-lions. Whether or not they had wings.

Heck, they'd've probably said the serpopard was pretty darn close.

JRM

03-06-2009 06:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10065170)
I thought griffon's had to have wings?

Well, I believe Gryphons don't have to have wings, it's just that nearly all of them do. According to a brief trawl of the internet wingless griffins do appear in UK heraldry (e.g. there are mentions of a wingless griffin in these minutes of the Caid college of Heralds), but I'm having trouble finding authentic pictures.

Your picture probably is an eagle-headed lion rather than a gryphon, as lacks external ears and eagle's talons, which most gryphons are illustrated with.

There are sphinxes with lion's bodies and eagle- or hawk heads too.

Come to think of it, I vaguely remember seeing a picture of an owl-headed sphinx, which suggests a variant on the owlbear, the owlion.

But why should the mad wizards stop there, the world surely needs the owlferret, the owldragon and the owlotyugh!

EDIT: I've just found a webpage of a Greek branch of the Rotary Club International which says your picture is a griffin, it says "The emblem of RCI is the Minoan wingless Griffin. The griffins are drawn wingless to emphasize on their constant presence in the throne hall. The mixed form of the wingless griffin represented the three spheres of the world, the celestial, the terrestrial and the subterrestrial, with its eagle head, lion body and snake tail. It also conveyed the regal and divine power."

Inyssi

03-06-2009 06:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I'm not sure eaglelions are even "kinda" the same as owlbears (if a gryphon isn't a gryphon without wings, I shouldn't think an owlbear is still an owlbear without any resemblance whatsoever to a bear or an owl or any mixture of the two), but okay. I've got to say, gryphons do look much sleeker without the wings. I'd be awfully tempted to use those (say they're great leapers, too) in some sort of overgrown-temple setting in my next game.

In fact, hell with it, I'm going to use them in this game. ctrl-tab

EDIT: Wait, snake tail? Wouldn't we classify that as a chimera or mantichora of some sort, then?

6inTruder

03-06-2009 07:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

AWSOME! This thread would make such a great sourcebook.

as for my eaglelions, I'd planned (still plan if I can find the people) to use them as the really big guard animals for an island community of nobles a bit offshore from my primary city.

noisms

03-06-2009 08:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10060558)

Paying owlbear chickcubs and eggs in silver is traditional in this market, not unlike how it is traditional to speak of gold and diamonds in carats instead of more common units of weight or proportions or how pearls should be displayed on a square of red silk when the fisher discuss to sell them. If you don't, it's worth doing the deal.

This tradition originate from the original purpose of the owlbear and why one would pay so much for a "watchdog" that is always angry, all the time, and will rip your face at the first occasion and would decapitate you in doing so. See, long time ago, there was this epidemic of lycanthropy ; people where scarred shitless at night of being attacked and contaminated, and of course no one trusted anyone volunteering himself for guarding the community ; obviously, he was a werewolf trying to kill or infect everyone in their sleep ; or, well, he would be one soon, seeing as how a trusted guard would become an evident target.

That's when a mage had the idea to create a "watchdog" that could be a match for a werewolf and was immune to lycanthropy. Unlike the chimera, the owlbear is not a natural hybrid and he is artificially "deficient", in this that the owl and the bear inside are not living in harmony and develop a sense of selves strong enough that, if a third animal try to infiltrate itself in the owlbear, it will get its ass kicked. The owlbear is always angry, mostly with itself (or, more precisely, with the other part of itself), but teratopsychanalists are scarce and so they transfer this anger into a hate of frickin' everything and the willingness to break everything that fall under its eyes into its component parts, while screeching a lot. Blood-injected eyes are also appropriate, of course. So, at night, everyone close doors and windows, you release the owlbear, everyone in several kilometer-squares wakes up when it starts screeching, takes his silver weapon and slays the werewolf it has hugged and is trying to enucleate.

Now, why would any village sell such a major and efficient system to protect itself against such a dire problem ? Well, of course, an even deal would be an exchange between an efficient werewolf-bane and, well, another werewolf-bane. So, if your village wanted to have its own owlbear, you had to compensate with silver. Lot of silver. And that's where the tradition of paying chickcubs and eggs in silver come from, even though that most owlbear went feral and lycanthropism is under control for the moment...

I love this thread.

noisms

03-06-2009 08:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Pegasus

Tough to get excited about the Pegasus, because whichever way you look at it, it's really just a winged horse. As with the Nightmare, you're faced with the question: what can you use a Pegasus for other than as a steed? (There's nothing wrong with that, of course, but it doesn't make for very interesting discussion.)

Pegasus are egg-laying - which must make them monotremes I suppose - so could fit into an egg-theft campaign, and there's a nice little description of how to tame one, which I suppose you could use for other flying beings. They have their own language, which is almost up there with Elven Cat and Owlbear in the usefulness stakes, particularly because Pegasus can also understand common.

Greater Pegasus

A Greater Pegasus can only be born when a medusa is slain; there is a 5% chance it will leap fully formed from the decapitated gorgon's neck. That's a very nice touch for a more mythical or legendary style game. But it raises very interesting questions about the relationship between medusas and Pegasus.

Kakita Kojiro

03-06-2009 10:13 AM

Holy cats! I'd totally forgotten the Greater Pegasus. I suppose, for verisimilitude's sake, that you should get a Greater Pegasus and some sort of giant out of slaying the proper type of Medusa...

Also, I must admit... I threw in the towel on Pegasus, and just learned to accept people pluralizing them as "Pegasi". Although I die, a little, inside each time. sigh

(un)reason

03-06-2009 10:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10066080)

Pegasus

Tough to get excited about the Pegasus, because whichever way you look at it, it's really just a winged horse.

Yeah. I have nothing much to say here, apart from that Unipegataurs (you work it out) are pretty much PETA girl's ultimate mary-sue wet dream. Beware the bad crossover fanfic, my son. The descriptions florid, and the puns that suck. Beware the characterisation gone astray and shun, adjectives run amuck.

Mikaze

03-06-2009 04:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10066396)

Holy cats! I'd totally forgotten the Greater Pegasus. I suppose, for verisimilitude's sake, that you should get a Greater Pegasus and some sort of giant out of slaying the proper type of Medeusa...

*Also, I must admit... I threw in the towel on Pegasus, and just learned to accept people pluralizing them as "Pegasi". Although I die, a little, inside each time. *sigh

Why do succubi fly on pegasi on high?

Could it be that medusae were driven to evil because their elder caste was constantly hunted down and butchered by pegasus "breeders" from the "good" races?

JRM

03-06-2009 04:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10065450)

Frescos at Knossos predate the medieval obsession with categorizing fantastic beasts, though. Cretans probably would've identified griffons as eagle-lions, and homa birds as eagle-lions, and the Egyptian axex or saget (or the tšš or sfr, for which I know not the vowel schemes) as eagle-lions. Whether or not they had wings.

Yes, I'll agree with you. They wouldn't have called them "Minoan Griffin" at the time.

From my limited understanding of the subject, the ancient Greeks had a fairly consistent concept of a Grypes (Gryphon/Griffin) as a lion-bodied, winged, eared and eagle-headed creature, with paws for feet rather than eagle's talons of the medieval and heraldic version.

Still, there were variations as you say. This one in particular struck my attention:

Quote:

"For these animals do exist in India,' he [the C1st AD Indian sage Iarkhas] said, 'and are held in veneration as being sacred to Helios the Sun; and the Indian artists, when they represent Helios, yoke four of them abreast to draw the images; and in size and strength they resemble lions but having this advantage over them that they have wings, they will attack them, and they get the better of elephants and of Drakones. But they have no great power of flying, not more than have birds of short flight; for they are not winged as is proper with birds, but the palms of their feet are webbed with red membranes, such that they are able to revolve them, and make a flight and fight in the air; and the tiger alone is beyond their powers of attack, because in swiftness it rivals the winds."

Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana 3. 48 (trans. Conybeare) (Greek biography C1st to C2nd A.D.) :

Is it my imagination, or is that describing a bat-winged gryphon?

JRM

03-06-2009 04:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10066080)

Pegasus

Tough to get excited about the Pegasus, because whichever way you look at it, it's really just a winged horse.

I can only agree with you. finding Nightmares far more interesting, with that "carrying/tempting you to perdition" theme, they just have more character to me.

So at first I found it hard to think of anything to say about Pegasus. Well, apart from this.

The MM writeup gives Pegasoi so little to work with, with personalities simultaneously one-dimensional and contradictory. They're always Chaotic Good, regardless of upbringing or colour (we wouldn't want PETA girl to think we're horse-racists now, would we?) and very shy and wild, which presumably would make them very fond of their freedom.

Yet, if somebody sticks a harness round their neck and makes a proficiency roll they become obedient servants for life, provided that person is "Good".

Oh yes? I know it fits the mythology, but the original Pegasus wasn't sapient and couldn't talk. I doubt he was any smarter than a regular horse, so taming him like that makes sense. To AD&D's version of the Pegasus, I'd have thought it more likely it would revolt at this attempt at slavery, rather than meekly obey once it is tamed, although at least they have the grace to say "pegasi do not like to be tamed".

Perhaps the AD&D pegasus has been designed so they must obey Good aligned masters, whether it wants to or not? The gods/ancient wizards/whatever saw a need for loyal winged steeds in service to Good, so made them to order.

That would add some interesting wrinkles, with free Pegasoi, fey creatures and other do-gooders trying to free the "tamed" steeds of a Flying Cavalry regiment, who suffer appalling injuries and deaths during their master's campaigns.

My preferred solution is that the humans and demi-humans view Pegasoi as sacred creatures, and wouldn't dream of taming/enslaving them. It would anger the gods! Instead they petition Pegasoi for their help in the service of weal on a case by case basis - trading oats for a flying messenger service, carrying medicine to the sick, imploring a pegasus hero to team up with their greatest warrior to slay the monster that is laying waste to the land. Such relationships can end up as partnerships, but the Pegasus is never "tamed".

JRM

03-06-2009 05:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10065473)

But why should the mad wizards stop there, the world surely needs the owlferret, the owldragon and the owltyugh!

Now I want to stat up the Owltyugh.:mad:

The Owltyugh, a bizarre chimera only a maniac could conceive, mixing a giant owl and otyugh.

A great round face with a snapping beak beneath three baleful eyes.

Broad wings that carry it through the air with deadly silence.

Swooping down to seize its prey in its three terrible taloned feet.

Two clasping tentacles that snatch victims from farther than seems possible.

Vomiting a spray of unspeakable filth that can render threats helpless with nausea.

Worse of all, they are telepathic. Those who fight an Owltyugh are constantly distracted by the screeching insanity, hatred, pain and hunger pouring into their minds.

:D

Grymbok

03-06-2009 06:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10066080)

Greater Pegasus

A Greater Pegasus can only be born when a medusa is slain; there is a 5% chance it will leap fully formed from the decapitated gorgon's neck. That's a very nice touch for a more mythical or legendary style game. But it raises very interesting questions about the relationship between medusas and Pegasus.

I realise that complaining about organisation in the MM is a bit like complaining about the rain if you live in Birmingham, but I can't help but think that this little tidbit could benefit from being placed in the Medusa entry rather than here (or ideally in both)!

DMH

03-06-2009 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The only thing I want to say about the pegasus is that the second cover of the 1e Monster Manual, where a flock takes on a red dragon, is cool.

They could join lammasu as flying slayers of evil.

JRM

03-06-2009 08:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10068002)

The only thing I want to say about the pegasus is that the second cover of the 1e Monster Manual, where a flock takes on a red dragon, is cool.

They could join lammasu as flying slayers of evil.

That reminds me, the 2E MM entry for Pegasus says: "In battle, a pegasus will try to lure larger opponents (such as dragons) into tight spaces. As the opponent struggles to maneuver into attack range, the pegasus climbs and attacks with its hooves from above."

It's a great picture, But even a flock of 1-10 Pegasoi would be no match for an adult red dragon in 2E. That cover doesn't show the scene two combat rounds later, with the dragon flying off with charred Pegasoi dropping from the sky all around it.

It's not so bad in First Edition, since 1E dragons are weaker, but that dragon looks like an Ancient Worm to me, going by the size, so it would still slaughter them.

Just compare the 2E stats:

Pegasus: AC6, HD4, THACO 17, Attacks 1-8/1-8/1-3.

Adult Red Dragon: AC -5, HD 17, THACO -1, Attacks 1-10+6/1-10+6/3-30+6 or 12d10+6 fire breath, 20 yard radius Fear Aura and spell use.

Hatchling Red Dragon: AC 0, HD 9, THACO 7, Attacks 1-10+1/1-10+1/3-30+1 or 2d10+6 fire breath.

A flock of ten would barely be a match for a hatchling, many Pegasoi would be killed fighting off even a baby red dragon.

Obviously we need stats for a "Legendary Pegasus" capable of such heroic deeds!

durecellrabbit

03-06-2009 09:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

You can eat them. As they're intelligent, live in herd, have detect alignment spell and can flying it makes them interesting to hunt

Kakita Kojiro

03-06-2009 09:56 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10067663)

Oh yes? I know it fits the mythology, but the original Pegasus wasn't sapient and couldn't talk. I doubt he was any smarter than a regular horse, so taming him like that makes sense. To AD&D's version of the Pegasus, I'd have thought it more likely it would revolt at this attempt at slavery, rather than meekly obey once it is tamed, although at least they have the grace to say "pegasi do not like to be tamed".

I am not so sure that we should assume the mythic Pegasus was non-sentient. His brother was Chrysaor, Geryon's father, and he was certainly sentient. Together, they're both regarded as children of Medusa and Poseidon (generally), and such offspring tend to be relatively sentient in behavior (till you get to the fringe types, like the Nemean lion or Stymphalian birds).

Don't recall any recountings of the Bellerophon myth where Pegasus talks to him, though. Of course, the big point in the Bellerophon myth was that he got shook off because a gadfly bit Pegasus, which is not so much a threat in D&D, so there's definitely a limit to our mythic verisimilitude here.

JRM

03-07-2009 12:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10068473)

I am not so sure that we should assume the mythic Pegasus was non-sentient. His brother was Chrysaor, Geryon's father, and he was certainly sentient. Together, they're both regarded as children of Medusa and Poseidon (generally), and such offspring tend to be relatively sentient in behavior (till you get to the fringe types, like the Nemean lion or Stymphalian birds).

Don't recall any recountings of the Bellerophon myth where Pegasus talks to him, though. Of course, the big point in the Bellerophon myth was that he got shook off because a gadfly bit Pegasus, which is not so much a threat in D&D, so there's definitely a limit to our mythic verisimilitude here.

Well all those things are true, but I believe Pegasus is in the "fringe types" you mention as far as intelligence goes.

I can't think of any legends that describe Pegasus doing anything that implies any intelligence above the animal, so I consider him to be a "Mythical Animal" just like his great-auntie the Hydra or great-uncle the Crommyonian Sow (that's using the version of the Medusa myth where she's descended from Ekhidna, of course).

Plus, there are other winged horses in Greek mythology, and I don't recall them being described as having human-level brains either.

While there's still the principle of "the absence of evidence is no evidence of absence" to consider, the case for Pegasus being intelligent seems pretty weak. As far as sapient horses go, we could probably make a stronger argument for Bucephalos being intelligent than Pegasus, from the ancient literary "evidence".

Strangething

03-07-2009 01:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

There are a scary number of critters in the MM that are intelligent enough to have language, but don't have hands.

I'd say that's a good reason to be a mount or "pet."

Monsieur Meuble

03-07-2009 02:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

As the sages state in the Manual, "Pegasi must be ridden bareback; they will not accept saddles." As we are talking about a flying horse that is supposed to bring humanoid in the air and to do the acrobatic maneuvers involved in fighting flying monsters, you can easily see how the relationship between the rider and his mount can end pretty quickly and with an audible "splortch".

The thing is, they are not supposed to be ridden by humanoids, but by serpentoids. They were the ancestral gift of some Mad Snake God Of Yore that was given to the yuan-tis to celebrate the taking of the main temple of said god, formerly in possessions of the medusaic civilisation. That is, the Mad Snake God was a Mad Snake God for both Yuan-Tis and Medusaplural, its cathedral was built by the snake-haired ones, the snake-people invaded it and slaughtered every former celebrants and the Mad Snake God was quite content of such an attention, used the decapitated remains of his former priests to create the first couple of pegasi and offered them as submissive mounts and pets to the snake-people. The yuan-ti rider coils himself firmly on the flanks of the pegasus and so can "ride" it in almost every position without falling.

Now, some would object that pegasi are Good aligned and sentient, plus they fly, so they should have fled away of their supposed masters the moment they appeared, and they would make very uncooperative mounts for the evil actions of the YTs.

That would be right if we weren't talking about a MAD Snake God who deliberately made them Good AND compulsively obligated to obey to any Yuan-Tis because he found the idea of good horsey crying as they are forced to plunder an orphanage funny. Plus all kind of fun when hunted for sport, cooked alive for food or tortured for fun. But, in some conditions, a pegasus can break the compulsion (chosen of the Good Gods ? High will ? Stung by a gadfly ?), some free ones started the Revolution, freed their comrades of specie and actively participated to the Fall of the Yuan-Ti Empire.

Still now, nonetheless, would a pegasus encounter a yuan-ti knowing his legends, the flying horse would be obligated to follow any order he would receive from the slithering bad guy, including betraying his human rider and companion at the worst of times and it would be a subquest in itself to find how to de-brainwash the animal and save him from a life of evil servitude.

The pegasus language ? Yuan-Ti language with a horsish accent.

The Greater Pegasi still born from slain medusaesis ? Well, the Mad Snake God quickly realized that, with only one couple and in the hand of such cruel masters, the specie wouldn't go for too long, he made the original creative miracle a feature of its former followers. So, it's actually when you slain a medusa descendant of a priest of the Mad Snake God that you have a 100% chance of spawning a Greater Pegasus. And now, around 5% of the medusa population descent from said clerics.

Sleeper

03-08-2009 12:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

You what would really upset PETA-girl?

A brave new continent, swarming with pegasussesoi. Flocks so huge, they block out the sun. As common as the bison was in the American Old West. So much so that mages travelling in magical rail-cars take pot-shots with fireballs for entertainment, leaving the charred corpses where they lay.

The less lucky become domesticated. But not as high-strung, high-maintenance mounts and companions. No, they're kept for their meat. Wings broken and hobbled. Kept in pens where they can barely move, and fed on piped-in oats.

Because the new continent is not being tamed by the relatively harmless and useless pegasus. No, the preferred wild and woolly animal for the wand-slinging heroes is the savage griffin or the hippogriff. And they get hungry. For pseudo-horseflesh.

A counterpart to the elf holocaust.

noisms

03-08-2009 02:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10069919)

As the sages state in the Manual, "Pegasi must be ridden bareback; they will not accept saddles." As we are talking about a flying horse that is supposed to bring humanoids in the air and to do the acrobatic maneuvers involved in fighting flying monsters, you can easily see how the relationship between the rider and his mount can end pretty quickly and with an audible "splortch".

The thing is, they are not supposed to be ridden by humanoids, but by serpentoids. They were the ancestral gift of some Mad Snake God Of Yore that was given to the yuan-tis to celebrate the taking of the main temple of said god, formerly in possessions of the medusaic civilisation. That is, the Mad Snake God was a Mad Snake God for both Yuan Tis and Medusaplural, its cathedral was built by the snake-haired ones, the snake-people invaded it and slaughtered every former celebrants and the Mad Snake God was quite content of such an attention, used the decapitated remains of his former priests to create the first couple of pegasi and offered them as submissive mounts and pets to the snake-people. The yuan-ti rider coils himself firmly on the flanks of the pegasus and so can "ride" it in almost every position without falling.

Now, some would object that pegasi are Good aligned and sentient, plus they fly, so they should have fled away of their supposed masters the moment they appeared, and they would make very uncooperative mounts for the evil actions of the YTs.

That would be right if we weren't talking about a MAD Snake God who deliberately made them Good AND compulsively obligated to obey to any Yuan-Tis because he found the idea of good horsey crying as they are forced to plunder an orphanage funny. Plus all kind of fun when hunted for sport, cooked alive for food or tortured for fun. But, in some conditions, a pegasus can break the compulsion (chosen of the Good Gods ? High will ? Stung by a gadfly ?), some free ones started the Revolution, freed their comrades of specie and actively participated to the Fall of the Yuan-Ti Empire.

Still now, nonetheless, would a pegasus encounter a yuan-ti knowing his legends, the flying horse would be obligated to follow any order he would receive from the slithering bad guy, including betraying his human rider and companion at the worst of times and it would be a subquest in itself to find how to de-brainwash the animal and save him from life of evil servitude.

The pegasus language ? Yuan-Ti language with a horsish accent.

The Greater Pegasi still born from slain medusaesis ? Well, the Mad Snake God quickly realized that, with only one couple and in the hand of such cruel masters, the specie wouldn't go for too long, he made the original creative miracle a feature of its former followers. So, it's actually when you slain a medusa descendant of a priest of the Mad Snake God that you have a 100% chance of spawning a Greater Pegasus. And now, around 5% of the medusa population descent from said clerics.

Great stuff.

noisms

03-08-2009 02:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Peryton

Is it just me or have we been talking a lot about mythical flying beasts recently? Anyway, here's another one.

I quite like Perytons - the entry has a nice mythical vibe to it, what with the creature's modus operandi of ripping out people's hearts so it can breed, and the way it casts a human shadow rather than a bird's, and its single-minded determination to fix on one target and one target alone. One thing that I wish had been included was the legend that Perytons are some sort of reincarnation of dead human souls, which was why they cast a human shadow. Maybe there could be some way of communicating with those souls, or even rescuing them from their cruel fate...

Perytons seem tailor-made for the egg-thief campaign; not only can their eggs be sold, but the beasts often carry victims off to their nests, which makes the discovery of money and magic items highly likely. Another adventure seed would be, I suppose, helping out a clan of dwarves bothered by several Peryton families up in the mountains.

demiurge1138

03-08-2009 02:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've only used perytons once, but it was a doozy.

I was running a published module, "Tammeraut's Fate", in which the PCs investigate an abandoned monastery that's been abandoned due to oceanic zombie attacks. Now, there's a peryton nesting in the belltower, attracted by the wafting scent of blood and corpses. The party's investigating, fights some sea hags, captures and interrogates one. They're asking it about the other dangers on the island, and she says "right behind you..."

Nobody passes a Listen check. The peryton swoops down, gets a critical hit, tears out the dwarf ranger's heart in one gulp.

The rest of the party flees, screaming.

They investigate the inside of the monastery, figure out the zombies came out of the sea and might be back, try to find a defensible location. They find the belltower. The ground floor entrance is overgrown with green mold, which the party rogue manages to dodge through and climb up. And he opens the door to the top floor and sees the peryton. And fails his Move Silently.

The peryton wheels around, snapping at him, and he freaks out, rushing back downstairs as fast as his legs can carry him. The peryton, enraged and hungry, squeezes down after him. He dodges the green slime, slams the door behind him, barricades it, then hears the sharp thudding as the peryton attempts to bash it down. He backs up, fearing for his life as the door bursts open... and the peryton collapses into a skeleton, its flesh eaten away by all of the green slime it couldn't avoid with its bulk. The player's expression was perhaps the most relieved I've ever seen.

JRM

03-08-2009 08:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10076315)

Peryton quite like Perytons - the entry has a nice mythical vibe to it, what with the creature's modus operandi of ripping out people's hearts so it can breed, and the way it casts a human shadow rather than a bird's, and its single-minded determination to fix on one target and one target alone. One thing that I wish had been included was the legend that Perytons are some sort of reincarnation of dead human souls, which was why they cast a human shadow. Maybe there could be some way of communicating with those souls, or even rescuing them from their cruel fate...

Perytons are curious beasts, and I'm glad the original MM introduced me to them - how many of these creatures would we know about if it wasn't for D&D? The writers of the original Monster Manual deserve my thanks for conjuring up this beast from whatever obscurity they found it in. (The Peryton's origins are pretty obscure, they may be at least partially a modern invention - from a 1959 book The Book of Imaginary Beings - or from a medieval bestiary.)

I definitely agree about the soul-issue. Perytons should be damned supernatural beings, ghosts made flesh who have lost their souls. They tear out hearts to steal the soul of their victim, which allows them to live normal lives. That means that if you're PC is heart-ripped by a Peryton they can't be brought back from the dead, (although maybe if your friends kill the monster it will free your essence).

That has all kinds of story potential: What sin caused the Perytons to suffer this curse? Where all Perytons human before their death and transformation (explaining their human shadows and lust for human hearts) and, if so, what culture or cultures did they belong to?

Or even a moral dilemma: A Peryton has gained a soul and is desperate to redeem itself, (becoming LG, dedicating itself to charitable deeds et cetera), and the soul its stolen was some villain or other. But the villain was a nobleman, and a war may result if he isn't brought back to life. What should the players do?

They could end up questing into the Abyss, to face down the forgotten Demon Prince who is responsible for Perytons and rescue the Good Peryton's soul from her talons.

Hellzon

03-08-2009 09:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Mental note: Convert the Peryton to 4E.

Wikipedia has a nicer take on the beastie:

Quote:

One alleged account, which was chronicled by an unnamed rabbi in Fez during the 16th century, states that Publius Cornelius Scipio encountered these beasts near the Strait of Gibraltar sometime between 237 and 183 BC. According to this rabbinic historian, Scipio and his soldiers were attacked by a flock of these animals, who seemed impervious to their weapons. The perytons descended upon the ships, attacking the sailors, tearing them up with sharp teeth, and wallowing in their blood. However, after completing this gruesome ritual, a peryton's shadow would become its own, and it would be free to fly away and live the rest of its life in peace. Each peryton had to kill one man before its soul would be set at ease, and this probably limited the slaughter.

(Emphasis mine.) Sharp teeth in a stag's face?

Upcoming: Phantom, Phoenix, Piercer, Pit Fiend and Effing Intelligent Plants. Awesome.

JRM

03-08-2009 09:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10076351)
I've only used perytons once, but it was a doozy.

I was running a published module, "Tammeraut's Fate", in which the PCs investigate an abandoned monastery that's been abandoned due to oceanic zombie attacks. Now, there's a peryton nesting in the belltower, attracted by the wafting scent of blood and corpses. The party's investigating, fights some sea hags, captures and interrogates one. They're asking it about the other dangers on the island, and she says "right behind you..."

snip

Great story demiurge, some of my fondness memories of playing D&D have been amusing interaction with NPCs and when a PC is facing death (especially mine!), wondering whether they'll survive the next melee round, hearts in our mouths.

Topher

03-08-2009 10:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10055105)
*Just out of curiosity, how do people pronounce these monsters' names?
The Monstrous Manual / Compendium gives an "official" pronunciation of "Aw-tee-ug", but does anyone use it?
Everyone I can remember pronouncing Otyugh said "Ot-e-ugh", while Gulguthra is pretty easy as "Gul-geese-ra".*

Of course, there are other possible pronunciations, such as "O-tie-ug" or "Ot-Yugh" and "Gul-Goo-thra", "Gul-Guth-ra", "Gul-Gut-Hra", "Gulg-uth-ra", "Gulg-Ut-hra" and so on.

So what (if any) are people using?

The otyugh and neo-otyugh were among the many many monsters stol...er...ahem "borrowed" from D&D for the original Final Fantasy videogame. Monster names got spelled out phonetically in katakana (sometimes resulting in some humorous changes, like the bulette becoming the "baretta" due to the Japanese L/R thing).

Anyway, the FF versions of these monsters are the "ochu" and "neochu", and that is how I have been pronouncing "otyugh" and "neo-otyugh" for years as a result.

Concept artwork for the Ochu in the original FF:

http://images3.wikia.nocookie.net/fi...vs_Warrior.jpg

Recent games in the series tend to give Ochus a ring of petals around their midsection, giving the appearance of a ballerina's tutu. I am totally swiping that for any otyughs who appear in my D&D game.

<http://images3.wikia.nocookie.net/fi.../7/70/Ochu.jpg>

Topher

JRM

03-09-2009 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Topher (Post 10077176)

*The otyugh and neo-otyugh were among the many many monsters stol...er... ahem "borrowed" from D&D for the original Final Fantasy videogame. Monster names got spelled out phonetically in katakana (sometimes resulting in some humorous changes, like the bulette becoming the "baretta" due to the Japanese L/R thing).*

Anyway, the FF versions of these monsters are the "ochu" and "neochu", and that is how I have been pronouncing "otyugh" and "neo-otyugh" for years as a result.

Concept artwork for the Ochu in the original FF:

http://images3.wikia.nocookie.net/fi...vs_Warrior.jpg

Recent games in the series tend to give Ochus a ring of petals around their midsection, giving the appearance of a ballerina's tutu. I am totally swiping that for any otyughs who appear in my D&D game.

<http://images3.wikia.nocookie.net/fi.../7/70/Ochu.jpg>

Topher

Interesting, just going by looks I'm assuming these are plant-monsters rather than the filth loving abominations we know and love. They remind me of 3E's 'Swallow Whole' vegetable monsters, like the Tendriculos or the Greenvice (At least I think it's called greenvices, they're basically ambulatory Venus Fly Traps)

I do like the scorpion-sting shaped arms on the first picture, and the 'tutu' version's nice as well.

I'll have to pop over to the final fantasy wiki and read up on Ochu.

Anyway, how can we apply some of this to AD&D otyughs? Maybe the petal-belt is a symbiote?

Hmm...

The Neo-Otyughs of the Cloaca Imperium had grown concerned that their surface allies were constantly distressed by their stench, which caused all manner of diplomatic difficulties. To solve this problem, they invented the Perfumed Petallion, a symbiotic plant they could wear around their waste, which fed off the filth and secretions upon their body and the sunlight of the surface world, and in return emitted a wondrous fragrance that rendered them more pleasant company to be around.

The Military Tentacle of the Cloacal government saw another potential for such creatures, and turned them into living armour, some varieties of which had built-in organic weapons.

Or they're just members of a neo-otyugh ballet company, another failed attempt by the Otyugh Sewer Union to improve their public relations.:D

demiurge1138

03-09-2009 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I never connected ochu with otyughs before! Neat!

Sleeper

03-09-2009 05:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The otyugh (I've always used OH-ti-ugh) as an ambulatory plant is a good fit. Explains their diet (fertilizer), and suits their appearance well. I may use that....

For some reason, and I'm not entirely sure why, the peryton reminds me a bit of the original Greek harpy.

Monsieur Meuble

03-09-2009 08:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Perytons originated a long time ago in an egyptian-like civilisation. They view Human as the reunion of five parts :

1°) The Ka, the force of life, the Positive Energy that animate the whole stuff and made it alive.

2°) The Ba, the personality, the mind, the ego, generally represented as a bird with a human head.

3°) The Akh, the soul, the part of divinity in oneself that go to the Heavens after death.

4°) The Khat, the physical body, the one you let behind at death but still must exist because you can't be alive without a body.

5°) The Sheut, the shadow. The physical shadow, but also all that is dark in humanity but still necessary to live. You can't cast shadow without being, you can't be without a shadow.

Well, this civilization lived in a very perilous environment (as in : a shitload of monsters eating peasants all the time) and far too much Priests of Life And Death with too much money and too much on their hand for the good of the nation.

So the priests did a lot of experiment with spells of resurrection, reincarnation, undeadification, decorporations... just to cover all figure cases. What if you have lost the body but still have the akh hanging around ? A vampire has everything except Ka, how to compensate for it ? Can an overcautious illithid just extract the Ba of someone and leave the rest to build pyramids... that kind of things.

The Peryton was an experiment on how to ressurect someone killed by Shadows. The Ka has been dispersed, the Ba is shattered, and the Akh and the Khat have been turned into something else that empowers the Sheut into becoming an other Shadow.

So, the idea was to capture the Shadow, graft it on some animal carcass to provide a Khat to the Sheut, hope their will be enough Ba and and Akh to retrieve and repair and cast a normal resurection spell to send some Ka flowing back inside.

Alas, what you obtain itself is that the Shaut is overpowered, the Akh has been destroyed beyond all possibility of saving it, the fractured Ba is completely mad and forgot its humanity and mutated the carcass as a parody of itself, without human head.

So, you have a human shadow directing the body of a souless and mad body of a bird with the head of some mutated roadkill. Ho, and the Resurrection spells worked just fine to reconnect the Ka, so it's vigorously alive.

And, well, as I said, the Priests of Life And Death really had too much time and resources on their hands, so they created and released a whole bunch of the stuff before admitting that, indeed, this methodology would lead nowhere. So let's go back to sheep-mummies with four asses...

Let to themselves, the perytons flew in every directions and, somehow, a minor part of their Ba, their sense of self, went back into existence. Nothing drastic, just something trying telling them to find themselves some Akh to become full and harmonious once again. And so, they began ripping hearts and in doing so, ripping large chunks of soul with it. Once again in possession of a divine spark, their human personality come back to something not unlike their former self, the Sheut stops being the driving part of the entity and collapses back into a simple physical shadow. During the short time it is self conscious, the Peryton hates itself for what it has become and what crimes it committed and seeks to stop being Conscious. The best way to do so is by reproduction. The Peryton so seeks a sexual partner, feeds it a heart to rend it conscious, self-loathing and agreeable to the idea of secreting out thoss souls that make them so conscious of their crimes, and so the male sends the residual Akh, Ba and Sheut of the devoured human victims into the reproductive apparel of the female who does the same and injects them in some eggs containing all the Ka and Khat necessary to them to become alive as per normal reproduction, and well, lays them. The parents, Akh-less once again, go back to insanity and their sheut goes back as the main part of the psyche and so retake the form of a Shadow.

In the egg, the remains of Akh and Ba are slowly transformed into Shadow material by the reinforced sheut and so, well, the peryton is born soulless, with the fractured ego of the dude who got his heart ripped out and a dominant bad side. And it wants to rip hearts to attain completeness and once complete will want to go back to oblivion once again.

So, funny thing : if you got your heart ripped and eaten by a peryton and then get resurrected (why not ? The peryton rips just a large chunk of your soul, not all of it and what is left will grow back...), in a few months or year, there will be peryton who, when complete, will call itself by your name and have bits of your memory and, if you are notorious enough, will hear about you and seeks you and will try to use you to put an end to his calvary for good, one way or another. Will you have to balls to kills what is essentially a part of yourself, a mutated, insane and repentant part but a part nonetheless ? Or will you try to Save it and perhaps find a way to maintain it complete and souled for good ? After all, if you do not play nice, it knows all the secret you had at the moment you got your heart ripped out by its parent, and it is insane...

Naxuul

03-09-2009 09:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10077733)

Interesting, just going by looks I'm assuming these are plant-monsters rather than the filth loving abominations we know and love.

Yeah, Ochus are the premiere Final Fantasy plant monster, next to Marlboros which are like their mean epic cousin(I'd love to see a D&Dized Marlboro, because what would be more bastard DM like than a monster that spews every status effect in the book in a big AE?:D). Further into the FF series they usually get spore, pollen, seed and poison attacks.

-Naxuul

JRM

03-10-2009 12:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 10079418)

Yeah, Ochus are the premiere Final Fantasy plant monster, next to Marlboros which are like their mean epic cousin(I'd love to see a D&Dized Marlboro, because what would be more bastard DM like than a monster that spews every status effect in the book in a big AE?:D). Further into the FF series they usually get spore, pollen, seed and poison attacks.

-Naxuul

Hmm... well in 3E the equivalent of status effects would be conditions, which include Dead, Dying, Energy Drained, Helpless, Paralysed, Petrified and Unconscious. Your players wouldn't like you very much.:D

Although conditions also include a few positive effects like Invisibility or Incorporeal which would work to their advantage, if only they weren't a dead immobilized block of stone.:o

noisms

03-10-2009 12:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10079034)

So, funny thing : if you got your heart ripped and eaten by a peryton and then get resurrected (why not ? The peryton rips just a large chunk of your soul, not all of it and what is left will grow back...), in a few months or year, there will be peryton who, when complete, will call itself by your name and have bits of your memory and, if you are notorious enough, will hear about you and seeks you and will try to use you to put an end to his calvary for good, one way or another. Will you have to balls to kills what is essentially a part of yourself, a mutated, insane and repentant part bu a part nonetheless ? Or will you try to Save it and perhaps find a way to maintain it complete and souled for good ? After all, if you do not play nice, it knows all the secret you had at the moment you got your heart ripped out by its parent, and it is insane...

This is weirdly brilliant and brilliantly weird.

noisms

03-10-2009 02:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Phantom

The Phantom is an interesting monster - I think the only one in the entire book which both cannot be harmed and does not cause harm. Basically a 'ghost' in the sense of the word that we would probably understand it, it is an image, sound or feeling left behind after somebody's death, which causes fear in those who see, hear or feel it.

There's great potential for using a Phantom as part of a huge wild goose chase: what is this mysterious undead being which cannot be turned? How can it be defeated? With, as usual, the corollary that such monster mysteries are pretty difficult to pull off with players who've read the Monstrous Manual. Or of course if you were going to be a little more subtle, you could use it as part of a wider story; a clue or missing-piece-of-the-puzzle in some sort of murder mystery, maybe. "Judging by the position the Phantom is in as it passes through the door, it's clear it was stabbed from behind with a spear... Elementary, my dear Watson."

There is a slight chance that slain characters can become (cause?) Phantoms, an idea which I like very much. You could have a whole sub-quest for the rest of the PCs, where they try to remove the curse afflicting the soul of their dead comrade. Lots of potential for cheese, but also a nice change of pace, perhaps.

Wakboth

03-10-2009 03:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I think the only place I've seen a phantom used was in a 1e adventure from the book Lords of Darkness (?), a book filled with short undead-themed adventures.

One of them was a haunted mansion filled with all sorts of ghostly undead - there was a ghost, a phantom, a poltergeist and a haunt, I think, plus probably more usual undead fare. And the function of the phantom was to reveal the players a chunk of the backstory, so they could figure out what was going on.

(The adventure also had a pipe organ powered by a trapped air elemental that had slowly gone mad in its container; if people poked at the organ too much, the elemental burst forth and attacked.)

Sleeper

03-10-2009 05:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10084851)

I think the only place I've seen a phantom used was in a 1e adventure from the book Lords of Darkness (?), a book filled with short undead-themed adventures.

Phantoms first appeared in A2: Secret of the Slavers Stockade, along with the boggle, the cloaker, and the haunt.

I like the concept. There should be more encounter-monsters or encounter-traps or just encounter-events/eerie happenings/magical strangeness in D&D. But, well, they're listed as a monster. They're ghostly, and their origin is very similar to other spectral things you can off with a glowing blade or scare off with a cross-like symbol that just happens to resemble a crucifix. Except, well, they're not undead. And nothing works against them. Nothing affects them. Why not? Oh, yes. You're not supposed to use all those neat spells and powers you accumulated over the last 5 or 50 levels. You're just supposed to dance to the GM's set-piece choreographed encounter. Unless you guess the precise spell to cast. And you're 12th-level or higher. And even then, only if you're a priest. Terrible design. A little more interaction and a few sops to players who didn't jump at the chance to ride the fantasy railroad, please.

JRM

03-10-2009 09:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10084645)

Phantom

snip

There is a slight chance that slain characters can become (cause?) Phantoms, an idea which I like very much. You could have a whole sub-quest for the rest of the PCs, where they try to remove the curse afflicting the soul of their dead comrade. Lots of potential for cheese, but also a nice change of pace, perhaps.

I don't believe Phantoms have souls in AD&D, they're just an 'echo' of a traumatic death. Which raises the possibility that a PC can die horribly, creating a Phantom, and then be resurrected to watch an action-replay of their death. Also, the MM says "A character who is murdered and generates a phantom may also return as a revenant." Therefore, some deaths can create both a Phantom and an undead! (or should that be a Phantom and a regular undead?)

Phantoms are more like fear-generating set dressing than a proper monster. They can't hurt the PCs, so in my experience they'll eventually be ignored. Of course, as the MM entry mentions, they can aggravate the threat of any fear-immune monsters that happen to be in the area. I tended to use Haunts instead, finding their "possessing ghosts seeks to complete an unfinished task" more interesting.

noisms

03-11-2009 12:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10085518)

I don't believe Phantoms have souls in AD&D, they're just an 'echo' of a traumatic death. Which raises the possibility that a PC can die horribly, creating a Phantom, and then be resurrected to watch an action-replay of their death.

Which raises the further possibility: what if a PC died horribly and created a Phantom, was then resurrected and watched the action-replay of their death, only to die horribly again during the course of watching said action replay, and create another Phantom, which would be forever locked into watching the death of the first Phantom over and over again? And so forth unto infinity.

YojimboC

03-11-2009 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The phantom strikes me as a special effect, something that might get a paragraph in a module or DMG, but hardly needs a whole page in the MM.

Sleeper

03-11-2009 04:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10086195)

Which raises the further possibility: what if a PC died horribly and created a Phantom, was then resurrected and watched the action-replay of their death, only to die horribly again during the course of watching said action replay, and create another Phantom, which would be forever locked into watching the death of the first Phantom over and over again? And so forth unto infinity.

That would be a bit contrived, unless it was one of the prerequisites for some kind of powerful ritual or incantation. Perhaps a grand ceremony, using mirrors as a theme. The gates of the otherworld open at midnight, and the corrupted spirits of the restless dead are given egress through reflective surfaces. They crawl out of still ponds and tinted glass, and down the throats of those unlucky or unwise enough to glimpse their own reflections. The possession isn't visible from the outside, and the spirits retain the basic memories of the possessed. Depending on the range, the countryside is soon swamped by normal peasants doing wicked things to their families and neighbors, and the city is overwhelmed with mad acts and fire. If the effect lasts through the witching hour, sufficient chaos would wake those who would otherwise be asleep, and lead to even more mortals being affected.

Another alternative for the phantom is to play on the idea of the echo. In the modern era, we tend to say someone died when their heart stops, even if they're successfully resuscitated. What about the magical equivalent? What if someone is revived before the soul departs the body? I forget how long it takes, but I believe the original Deities & Demigods and at least one of the 3E splatbooks touched on the subject. There's even a resurrection spell that must be cast immediately, squirreled away somewhere.

So what happens when a someone dies, creates a phantom, and is immediately revived? Perhaps the echo becomes linked to the restored body, instead of being tied to an area. The effect might be omnipresent, or might only come out when the resurrectee sleeps. Imagine coming across a sleeping figure, with a spectral paladin standing astride his body and fighting off the ghostly legions of hell, only, in the end, to be torn to pieces by the fiends. Then as the gore dissipates, the luminescent armored figure rises again from the sleeping form, and the scene starts all over from the beginning. If the slumbering traveler is awakened, the images suddenly vanish. If it only happened recently, the paladin might be suspicious of anyone who claims to have witnessed anything so outlandish, and might be very suspicious of anyone who can recount the exact circumstances of his last death. If it happened a while ago, the paladin might be a sad outcast, forced to sleep in the wilderness because nobody wants to bed down near someone who blasts the TV when they sleep.

Inyssius

03-11-2009 06:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Even if it stays in one place, that would be pretty interesting. The palace of King Lieben, haunted by his distraught specter after night falls--and if it terrifies his guests and staff, think how it must affect Lieben himself!

Or no, if it doesn't faze the man... imagine it. The king begins looking ill. Pale. Jaundiced. More and more over time, he withdraws to his private quarters. His duties are let slide, or are conducted in a barely satisfactory fashion by his desperate-seeming second in command. As he begins to disappear from the public eye, eccentric figures begin furtively slipping into and out of his rooms at all hours of the night. As weeks or even days pass, he disappears from view entirely. His visitors grow more outlandish, their numbers increasing, and stay in his chambers for prolonged periods of time. His staff receives increasingly bizarre and specific orders--demands for strange herbs, new or repositioned furniture, unnecessary-seeming renovations, many things boiled in clean water, even strange heathen artifacts and live animals for his strangest visitors.

And then, in the dead of night--or, perhaps worse, on Sunday morning--an armed contingent of soldiers is dispatched to the great church. The archbishop (always the king's most outspoken friend and admirer) and his highest-ranking clergy are rounded up and abducted, at swordpoint if necessary, by visibly uneasy soldiers and their practically shellshocked commander.

The king's staff are barred from his castle. Two days pass. Terrible sounds echo from the spire; unearthly lights burn and dance in the king's window.

The clergy return to the Church, wild-eyed and pale, exhausted and shaken. A strange light gleams in the archbishop's eyes. For a long time after, their sermons are stilted and strange.

And the king returns to his duties, perfectly healthy and acting as though nothing has happened. He refuses absolutely to speak of what happened in his absence.

And when night falls, in the castle... well.

Monsieur Meuble

03-11-2009 07:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

How great : the astronomers / astrologers / diviners of all around the world are unanimous and glad to announce that, tonight and for two weeks, the planet will come across a particularly large field of stardust that hasn't been crossed since millenniums ! Two weeks of non-stop and magnificent falling stars. Kingdoms and Cities everywhere have declared festivities and holidays for what is seen by most temples as a particularly good omen from Heavens.

And just as the mayor is waiting the first falling star to announce to the crowd the official beginning of the Falling Star Festival, a sinister aster appears in the sky, like the passed image of the moon but... littler. Farer. Nonetheless, the whole crowd is anxiously captivated at the sight of the orb that wasn't there an instant before. And at the exact moment the first asteroid consumes itself in the sky, the globe explodes and the horrified screams of millions are heard before being stopped forever. Or, hum, well, they would be, if those phantomatic screams weren't drowned in the panicked and far more enduring screams of the million of people all around the planet shitting themselves in unison. And, well, twhen I said they stopped forever... I meant, except they come back twenty minutes later, when the whole "a planet appears and explode" thing repeat itself in a loop. That is, until the moment the phantom falls behind the horizon. But the next night, it will be back, and the apparition will seems closer... Well, it would seems closer, if you took the time to look at it, instead of having to flip out like everyone else, or to fight your way in a city where the whole population running everywhere in a frenzied panic, breaking, burning, hurting, trampling and killing everything on its path, and as doomsday cults spontaneously appear and, well, even during the day when the sinister apparition is out of sight, they do not participate to put happiness in those festivities.

The day after, the Local University Of Magic calls for every mid- to high-level characters in town, as they need investigators and adventurers with a practice of the weird and a high-than-normal chance to not running around like chickens tonight. The astronomers have three theories about this thing is, and they can't verify them, because they can't look at the phenomenon and take the necessary measures without panicking or having an heart-attack, and without precise data, they can't calculate what it is supposed to be, and golems can't be motivated to learn the basics of advanced thaumatoastronomy. So, measures must be taken to verify on this planet what hypothesis is the correct one, and how to advert the consequences.

The hypothesis are as follow :

-The planet we see is closer than what we think, it is actually a moon and for what is knows of astronomy in the setting, it would have been a moon of this planet. It would be the "best case" hypothesis and it can be "easily" verified : searching in the texts and ruins of ancient civilizations if this world once had one more moon that got destroyed. Things like aboleths could probably answer directly, but is it really such a good idea to ask them ? And if so, how is it that this moon was so densely populated that it generates such a phantom ? What destroyed it ? Who were those selenites ? What artifact of such a space-faring civilization can be retrieved, floating among the stardust of their former world ?

-The planet is a planet-sized planet, indeed. It is the least easily provable hypothesis and the second best and worst one, because, for all we known, What destroyed this planet and had the means to is still around here and can strike at OUR planet too. Or not. Inquiries around races with supposed or legendary space-faring capacities can be of use here. Those races with "we come from a giant empire coming from the stars and we crashed our space-boats on this planet a long time ago and are waiting for the rescue mission" as a core of their tradition include illithids, beholders, neogis and gasp tinker gnomes. Perhaps they do have, somewhere, engraved on the walls of a temple where the altar is a sunken spelljammer, are the remains of a stellar map indicating an unknown planet that would orbit around here. (the map could also mention of Groth The Monster-Star Of Doom that travels the systems and destroy planets for food or fun...)

-The worst-case hypothesis : bits of calculus by an astronomer who had an attack before being able to verify them implies that the phantom have the exact dimensions of our planet and that this world and the apparition will coincide in a week or something, and so, this is actually an image from the future. As in : this planet will be destroyed and everyone will die. It should normally be easy to disprove the hypothesis by comparing a cartographic globe of our world and the phantom and see if they look alike, but, well, cartography sucks and there is no correct and complete map of the planet, and anyway, no one can look closely enough to the apparition to compare with dying from fear. On the other hand, if correct, it will prove itself true quickly as it will seem to go for collision course. Of course, if someone could stop who or what is about to destroy the planet, that would be really smooth !

And so the quest for answers and salvation begins, groups of adventurers crossing the distances on a planet in the grip of fear and panic, trying to find traces of space-faring races, cosmic menaces, earth-shattering conspiracies and way out of here, and fleeing from fearful masses by night and insane doomsday cultists trying to stop their "blasphemies" by day.

And each night in the sky, they can see what can be the end of the world, and shudder...

psychojosh13

03-11-2009 01:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've been inconsistent in my reading of this thread and its ancestors, so could someone please fill me in about PETA Girl? Is this someone who posted earlier, or a fictional character who exists to fight in the defense of those poor, abused owlbears, or what?

Inyssiis

03-11-2009 01:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by psychojosh13 (Post 10089219)

I've been inconsistent in my reading of this thread and its ancestors, so could someone please fill me in about PETA Girl? Is this someone who posted earlier, or a fictional character who exists to fight in the defense of those poor, abused owlbears, or what?

Looking at the real-life animal entries, a certain trend emerges. Dolphins, for example, are described as practically radiating goodness (or so I gather). Certain descriptions seem kind of, um, biased a little. :D It's enough to make one wonder what sort of person must be writing these particular entries...

noisms

03-11-2009 02:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by psychojosh13 (Post 10089219)

I've been inconsistent in my reading of this thread and its ancestors, so could someone please fill me in about PETA Girl? Is this someone who posted earlier, or a fictional character who exists to fight in the defense of those poor, abused owlbears, or what?

I made her up early on in the first thread, I think even before the Dolphin entry, as a way of explaining the weird and amusing way in which the MM seeks to paint real-world animals with a huge whitewashing brush. The Wolf and Whale entries are the best examples of this, but the Dolphin one is probably the oddest (not only are dolphins lawful good - which they certainly wouldn't be if D&D had been written by tuna fish - but the average one is more intelligent than the average human).

In my mind, PETA girl is a teenage girl, perhaps the daughter or neice of one of the writers or editors, probably a vegan, who has an inordinately rosey view of animals and who makes sure all the writers conform to her idea of how the animal entries should be.

JRM

03-11-2009 04:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10089361)

In my mind, PETA girl is a teenage girl, perhaps the daughter or neice of one of the writers or editors, probably a vegan, who has an inordinately rosey view of animals and who makes sure all the writers conform to her idea of how the animal entries should be.

Well I suspect that with PETA girl, it's only the pretty animals she views that way. There sure are a lot of nasty ugly animals in AD&D's MMs. :D

noisms

03-11-2009 04:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10089665)

Well I suspect that with PETA girl, it's only the pretty animals she views that way. There sure are a lot of nasty ugly animals in AD&D's MMs. :D

That's true. There's nothing down for the insects in PETA girl's world!

JRM

03-11-2009 06:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10089672)
That's true. There's nothing down for the insects in PETA girl's world!

And no love for the Otyugh.:(

:p

EDIT: Unless she was the one responsible for putting cute tutus of petals on otyughs and turning them into ochus.;

demiurge1138

03-12-2009 02:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10089672)
That's true. There's nothing down for the insects in PETA girl's world!

And the octopus, noble, intelligent soul that it is... made Neutral Evil!

Wakboth

03-12-2009 02:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10091602)
And the octopus, noble, intelligent soul that it is... made Neutral Evil!

PETA Girl doesn't fear the vengeance of the octopus, however; she's hiding out in Germany.

chronostrike

03-12-2009 05:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10091618)

PETA Girl doesn't fear the vengeance of the octopus, however; she's hiding out in Germany.

<http://www.pikeman327.com/pics/iseewhatyoudidthere.jpg>

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10087808)

Even if it stays in one place, that would be pretty interesting. The palace of King Lieben, haunted by his distraught specter after night falls--and if it terrifies his guests and staff, think how it must affect Lieben himself!

Or no, if it doesn't faze the man... imagine it. The king begins looking ill. Pale. Jaundiced. More and more over time, he withdraws to his private quarters. His duties are let slide, or are conducted in a barely satisfactory fashion by his desperate-seeming second in command. As he begins to disappear from the public eye, eccentric figures begin furtively slipping into and out of his rooms at all hours of the night. As weeks or even days pass, he disappears from view entirely. His visitors grow more outlandish, their numbers increasing, and stay in his chambers for prolonged periods of time. His staff receives increasingly bizarre and specific orders--demands for strange herbs, new or repositioned furniture, unnecessary-seeming renovations, many things boiled in clean water, even strange heathen artifacts and live animals for his strangest visitors.

And then, in the dead of night--or, perhaps worse, on Sunday morning--an armed contingent of soldiers is dispatched to the great church. The archbishop (always the king's most outspoken friend and admirer) and his highest-ranking clergy are rounded up and abducted, at swordpoint if necessary, by visibly uneasy soldiers and their practically shellshocked commander.

The king's staff are barred from his castle. Two days pass. Terrible sounds echo from the spire; unearthly lights burn and dance in the king's window.

The clergy return to the Church, wild-eyed and pale, exhausted and shaken. A strange light gleams in the archbishop's eyes. For a long time after, their sermons are stilted and strange.

And the king returns to his duties, perfectly healthy and acting as though nothing has happened. He refuses absolutely to speak of what happened in his absence.

And when night falls, in the castle... well.

This is suitably creepy and awesome on toast, but I don't follow. What's going on here?

demiurge1138

03-12-2009 05:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10092250)

This is suitably creepy and awesome on toast, but I don't follow. What's going on here?

Whew. Glad I'm not the only one.

Inyssius

03-12-2009 07:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10092250)

This is suitably creepy and awesome on toast, but I don't follow. What's going on here?

Okay, so the respected and powerful king gets ill. Really ill. He withdraws from the public eye, spending more and more time--well, being ill. He can't actually come out and say "hey, I'm really sick here", because that's generally equivalent to saying "hey, let's everyone have a long drawn-out fight over what happens when I die!" In any case, word of his illness spreads in dire whispers instead of royal proclamations.

In any case, he's attended--around the clock, when needed--by the best doctors in the land. As discreetly as possible, of course. And then, when they prove useless, the best doctors his men can find in other lands. Over time, the net is widened from "respectable European doctors" to "brilliant but a little weird Greek doctors" through "shaman Mongo, who the Seven Tribes say can cure any sickness".

Well, it doesn't work. The king dies. In a last-ditch effort, his men are sent to the Church. And the Church manages to resurrect him.

Resurrection magic--going to the afterlife and yanking someone's soul out of it, then jamming it back into the corpse--in any vaguely medium- or low-magic setting ought to be a pretty daunting affair; and the custom in all the groups I've been in is generally that revived people Don't Talk About It.

So: the priests resurrect him; the process freaks them the hell out, because you don't see stuff like that happening every day; and the whole thing is profoundly creepy to everyone who doesn't get anything like the whole story (and some of the very few people who do).

If that's not enough, a death as messed up as the king's (and no doubt the healers didn't help in making his last hours as weird as possible, what with desperate heathen rituals and holy water and last-ditch "Balancing of the Humors" and so forth) could very well create a Phantom. Because a bloodstained, panicked, diseased king-spectre is just what every palace needs... even if the actual king in question isn't dead any more.

sim_james

03-12-2009 10:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10091602)

And the octopus, noble, intelligent soul that it is... made Neutral Evil!

Not in my worlds!

noisms

03-12-2009 08:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Talk amongst yourselves. The Pheonix will be unleashed soon. Bit busy.

JRM

03-13-2009 09:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10094816)

Talk amongst yourselves. The Pheonix will be unleashed soon. Bit busy.

I've been robbed! Where's my obligatory 'rise from the ashes' quip?!:o

noisms

03-13-2009 09:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Phoenix

A long entry for a monster which isn't so often used, and another mythological being - is it just me or does this section of the MM have a huge preponderance of these?

As with many very powerful, very good creatures, I find it hard to know at what point a Phoenix should appear in a game, even though I like them. They suffer the old Lamia/Coatl/Shedu/Gold Dragon problem: you don't want to use them as a DM's policeman to punish 'bad' PC behaviour, and you don't want to use them as a deus ex machina for getting PCs out of difficult situations, and nor do you want to use them as a walking quest dispenser. So how exactly do you use one?

Anyway, there's a lot of information on Phoenix powers (they can cast a heck of a lot of spells, heal with their wings and comb, and self-immolate kamikaze style), and a fair bit of the kind of ecology/things-that-'sages'-say that we know and love. I'm particularly interested in the idea that evil cultures believe that Phoenix are the symbol of death and destruction; does that mean there are evil Phoenix out there, or are the evil cultures just grabbing the wrong end of the stick?

Phoenix body parts are all useful, and I suppose this is where an adventure hook might come in. The entry only mentions that the feathers can be used to make staves of healing and potions of extra healing, but apparently even the beaks, talons and so forth can be used, and are often worth up to 5,000 gps. It's hard to imagine how you could get your hands on such things, though - because a Phoenix faced with the prospect of death will surely self-immolate, destroy its attackers, and live on in its new form.

noisms

03-13-2009 10:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10098004)

I've been robbed! Where's my obligatory 'rise from the ashes' quip?!:o

Don't worry, the thread has well and truly now risen from said remains of fire.

SuperG

03-13-2009 12:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

Phoenix

A long entry for a monster which isn't so often used, and another mythological being - is it just me or does this section of the MM have a huge preponderance of these?

As with many very powerful, very good creatures, I find it hard to know at what point a Phoenix should appear in a game, even though I like them. They suffer the old Lamia/Coatl/Shedu/Gold Dragon problem: you don't want to use them as a DM's policeman to punish 'bad' PC behaviour, and you don't want to use them as a deus ex machina for getting PCs out of difficult situations, and nor do you want to use them as a walking quest dispenser. So how exactly do you use one?

Anyway, there's a lot of information on Phoenix powers (they can cast a heck of a lot of spells, heal with their wings and comb, and self-immolate kamikaze style), and a fair bit of the kind of ecology/things-that-'sages'-say that we know and love. I'm particularly interested in the idea that evil cultures believe that Phoenix are the symbol of death and destruction; does that mean there are evil Phoenix out there, or are the evil cultures just grabbing the wrong end of the stick?

Phoenix body parts are all useful, and I suppose this is where an adventure hook might come in. The entry only mentions that the feathers can be used to make staffs of healing and potions of extra healing, but apparently even the beaks, talons and so forth can be used, and are often worth up to 5,000 gps. It's hard to imagine how you could get your hands on such things, though - because a Phoenix faced with the prospect of death will surely self-immolate, destroy its attackers, and live on in its new form.

...yeah, I think we all know that a Dark Phoenix is definately a symbol of death and destruction.

Sleeper

03-13-2009 01:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by SuperG (Post 10098480)

...yeah, I think we all know that a Dark Phoenix is definately a symbol of death and destruction.

I thought it was more a symbol of the unfettered freedom gained by rejecting traditional social mores. :)

Anyway, the phoenix is good for cage fights with oiled solars when the Higher Powers of Good and Law get bored and just want to kick back and watch some trashy entertainment.

JRM

03-13-2009 07:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098072)

Don't worry, the thread has well and truly now risen from said remains of fire.

Thanks, now I feel suitably vindicated.;

Anyhows, getting back to the Phoenix vis à vis adventure ideas.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

Phoenix

As with many very powerful, very good creatures, I find it hard to know at what point a Phoenix should appear in a game, even though I like them. They suffer the old Lamia/Coatl/Shedu/Gold Dragon problem: you don't want to use them as a DM's policeman to punish 'bad' PC behaviour, and you don't want to use them as a deus ex machina for getting PCs out of difficult situations, and nor do you want to use them as a walking quest dispenser. So how exactly do you use one?

Well as mentioned in those threads you refer to, there's always the "save the nice guy" or "call on the nice guy" solution. Maybe the phoenix dies and for some reason it's now an egg instead of a young bird, so the party must take it to the Sacred Fire of Rebirth before the evil opposition can destroy the helpless Phoenix? Similarly, they're not immune to petrification, paralysis and the like, so the traditional Evil Archmage may have got in a lucky spell that rendered Phoenix helpless then imprisoning it in an icy fortress, from which it needs rescue - clearly the archmage wouldn't want to kill the bird, since it would just have an incendiary rebirth.

Similarly, the local city may be facing some ghastly threat and need the party to find their stolen scroll of Call Phoenix (there's even a write-up for the spell in the Monstrous Manual), so they may call upon it to save them from the ice ghosts or whatever menaces them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

I'm particularly interested in the idea that evil cultures believe that Phoenix are the symbol of death and destruction; does that mean there are evil Phoenix out there, or are the evil cultures just grabbing the wrong end of the stick?

Well it's a matter of point of view. Imagine you're an orc and your capital was laid waste by this huge bird that landed in the courtyard of Gruumsh's temple and then exploded and I think you can see why they could associate the phoenix with death and destruction (and burning and screaming).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

Phoenix body parts are all useful, and I suppose this is where an adventure hook might come in. The entry only mentions that the feathers can be used to make staves of healing and potions of extra healing, but apparently even the beaks, talons and so forth can be used, and are often worth up to 5,000 gps. It's hard to imagine how you could get your hands on such things, though - because a Phoenix faced with the prospect of death will surely self-immolate, destroy its attackers, and live on in its new form.

Looking at the MM entry on Phoenix's, I note the the entry on body parts says "Of course it is not always easy to find a buyer on the open market, because many cultures consider it a bad omen or taboo violation to kill a phoenix.", while Habitat/Society says that when a phoenix dies of old age and births a new one "Legend then suggests that the phoenix must fly away to the temple of the sun and there bury the mummified corpse of its parent."

To me, that implies a self-immolating phoenix may leave some remains (if only feathers), so all you need is attackers who are sufficiently resistant to fire. Nearly all the phoenix's combat powers are based on fire (they've got color spray, veil and some dispel powers, but no damage-dealing non-fire spells), so a hypothetical phoenix-hunter just needs to hire a few immune to fire monsters to hunt it down.

Hmm, forget about hunters, how about jailors. If the evil archmage could imprison a phoenix (they'd need to block its astral and ethereal travel abilities somehow), then they can use it as an endless source of body parts, harvested by the archmage's fire giant servants. I would have added salamanders, but the phoenix could cast dispel evil or dismissal on them.

Kakita Kojiro

03-13-2009 10:22 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

As with many very powerful, very good creatures, I find it hard to know at what point a Phoenix should appear in a game, even though I like them. They suffer the old Lamia/Coatl/Shedu/Gold Dragon problem: you don't want to use them as a DM's policeman to punish 'bad' PC behaviour, and you don't want to use them as a deus ex machina for getting PCs out of difficult situations, and nor do you want to use them as a walking quest dispenser. So how exactly do you use one?

Although "quest dispenser" seems quite appropriate for a phoenix, this is really another iteration of the Lancelot Problem: in Pendragon, your players want to interact with the Famous Knights, to see them doing the things they do, but what Lancelot does is to upstage other knights, which is no fun for the PC knights watching the GM play things out.

The solution I've found is to set up the uber-NPC as an ally of the PCs... and then to hit 'em with an encounter for which they're way outclassed. Then, hand the uber-NPC to the players to run, and have at them. Never fails in getting the players both happy to see their ally, and satisfied that they're not being overshadowed by a GMPC.

Of course, the phoenix has so many high-level spells as powers that it'd be a difficult balancing act to finagle a challenging encounter that doesn't end up as a TPK. But, heck, if you're TPK'd with a phoenix, the DM has plenty of justification for bringing you all back... that's kind of the phoenix schtick. (... despite what X-Men fanbois might complain of.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

Anyway, there's a lot of information on Phoenix powers (they can cast a heck of a lot of spells, heal with their wings and comb, and self-immolate kamikaze style), and a fair bit of the kind of ecology/things-that-'sages'-say that we know and love. I'm particularly interested in the idea that evil cultures believe that Phoenix are the symbol of death and destruction; does that mean there are evil Phoenix out there, or are the evil cultures just grabbing the wrong end of the stick?

I always thought that the idea of "the other egg of the Phoenix" from the Sandman "Arabian Nights" story would be cool to explore. In essence, when the phoenix immolates itself in its nest, it has laid two eggs -- one hatches and the phoenix is reborn; no one knows what hatches out of the other egg.

Having the phoenix's death hatch out of the other egg, while its life gets born from the twin, seems quite appropriate.

DMH

03-13-2009 11:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

But what to call the death version? Bennu bird doesn't sound right (though it is the Egyptian name for the creature-- the Greeks changed it to phoenix).

Is there any other mythological birds that might fit the bill?

sim_james

03-14-2009 12:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

There was the time that I placed a Phoenix's Grave inside a Maze (Planescape campaign).

It took the form of a bonfire that radiated heat, but did not seem to consume or burn anything. The PCs could walk right up to the brink and singe not a hair on their heads.

Naturally one of the PCs stepped into the flame (resisting another who was trying to drag him away) and was immediately immolated, and quickly burned to nothing. I told the player that his character could feel his body being consumed but felt warmth rather than burning, and felt no pain.

Had the PC doubted, he could have stepped out of the bonfire, and been horribly burned. Instead, he remained in the flames until he was utterly consumed.

Shortly afterwards, ash drifting down on a breeze settled to the ground and began to take the form of the lost PC, alive and asleep. He now wore a cloak of phoenix feathers.

Kakita Kojiro

03-14-2009 01:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10100102)
Is there any other mythological birds that might fit the bill?

Sure, there are plenty of other variants on the phoenix concept: Chinese feng-huang, Japanese hou-ou, Persian simorgh, Russian zhar-ptitsa, etc., etc.

Some already adapted into D&D in unfortunate ways, though...

However, I'd be inclined to have the other egg hatch something that is the anti-phoenix -- darkness and death and evil instead of fire and life and good. Call it the "nightbird" or something.

KoboldLord

03-14-2009 03:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
As with many very powerful, very good creatures, I find it hard to know at what point a Phoenix should appear in a game, even though I like them. They suffer the old Lamia/Coatl/Shedu/Gold Dragon problem: you don't want to use them as a DM's policeman to punish 'bad' PC behaviour, and you don't want to use them as a deus ex machina for getting PCs out of difficult situations, and nor do you want to use them as a walking quest dispenser. So how exactly do you use one?

You use them the same way you use all good creatures: as slaves of the BBEGs. 3e has the Planar Binding line of spells for exactly this purpose, but even in the red box basic you could do the job manually. Angels tend to have an excellent suite of spell-like abilities if you need shock trooper cannon fodder to oppress the peasantry and stall those pesky adventurers, and what evil enchanter wouldn't love being pulled in a chariot by a pair of mind-slaved shedu or silver dragons?

In the case of the phoenix, imagine if the forge rooms in Snurre's hall had an enslaved phoenix instead of the two trolls. Bound by Eclavdra's foul magic, the bird's tears are used to quench the weapons forged by the giants, and the burning blood it drips from its chains used to etch intricate designs to glorify the giants' campaign of conquest and destruction. Naturally, the bird is magically compelled to attack trespassers to the best of its ability, even if those trespassers are PCs trying to save it. If it kills itself by immolation, the enslavement will pass to its offspring, and if the PCs kill it they have permanently slain an exemplar of goodness.

Monsieur Meuble

03-14-2009 04:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Phoenixes are stars. Really. Well, more exactly, it is a representation/avatar kind of thing that star that can't afford to have planets with life and stuff sends on living planets to see the beauty of it and preserve it. After all, some Phoenix can be the sun of planets were life extinguished itself or was destroyed by outside forces. Perhaps was it even their actions, like a too loud cosmic wind or whatever that destroyed it and now they are in a quest for repentance.

So, when a phoenix have to self immolate to reborn, it is actually a reflect of when the star have to stop fusionning an element and must pass to the other.

And alas, it works the other way too : when a phoenix is forced to sacrifice itself, the star itself is forced to go to the next step of its evolution and so, ultimately, to its heat-death... So, yeah killing enough times a phoenix can really kill it in the end. It and a whole solar system. But, in normal occasions, when a phoenix feels its star is about to die for real, it just fly of the planet and into deep space, perhaps to see the galaxy as a whole one last time. Or, perhaps, because the phoenix of a black hole or a neutron star is akin to an atropal, a creature of god-like powers all focused on the destruction and absorption of all life, all energy and all heat, to turn them into Death and Entropy. And so a bad thing to have near a living planet when, well, you still love life.

So... What happens when sun hating, life destroying bad dudes learn about it ? When they start tormenting a phoenix all over the planet to generate a Death Phoenix ? Or when a space-faring evil race of mad monsters (okay, Illithides) debark on the planet to hunt them all, as they do all around the universe, to accelerate the death-heat of the universe ? Or when they try to summon the phoenix of the sun of this here planet ?

Zartes

03-14-2009 04:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10098033)

As with many very powerful, very good creatures, I find it hard to know at what point a Phoenix should appear in a game, even though I like them. They suffer the old Lamia/Coatl/Shedu/Gold Dragon problem: you don't want to use them as a DM's policeman to punish 'bad' PC behaviour, and you don't want to use them as a deus ex machina for getting PCs out of difficult situations, and nor do you want to use them as a walking quest dispenser. So how exactly do you use one?

I agree wholeheartedly. Which is why, these days, I have a policy of "Good doesn't have to mean nice. Unicorns are wonderful mounts... so long as you've got a virgin around to keep it under control. Otherwise they try to GORE and EAT people. Nothing personal, they just represent sexual innocence, so they take offense to people who, well, aren't.

To use a pheonix in such a way, perhaps they represent cycles of death and rebirth... so they actually encourage, or at least try to stop PCs from discouraging, disasters from which the kingdom can recover... but will take several years doing.

(as a bonus, a pheonix being the altimate cause of widespread flooding isn't something most players would expect)

JRM

03-14-2009 08:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zartes (Post 10103748)

I agree wholeheartedly. Which is why, these days, I have a policy of "Good doesn't have to mean nice. Unicorns are wonderful mounts... so long as you've got a virgin around to keep it under control. Otherwise they try to GORE and EAT people. Nothing personal, they just represent sexual innocence, so they take offense to people who, well, aren't.

Well to my mind in D&D Good doesn't have to mean nice but they have to be moral. What you're describing seems more Neutral in D&D terms (i.e. amoral personifications of purity, or fiery destruction or rebirth).

When I think of "good but not nice" monsters I imagine more 'Angels of Vengeance' type beings who punish or destroy major sinners, or a society that deals with its evil members by using enchantment spells and psychic surgery to literally change their minds - ("Sid the Sinner may have lost half his mind, but he's not evil anymore"). That's more of a "Lawful Good but not nice" (and verging towards LN) example.

Now what would a "Chaotic Good but not nice" society be like? One where select individual "heroes" are free to torment, curse, rob or attack evil characters as the mood takes them?

Sleeper

03-14-2009 10:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

You can have moral* and upstanding characters who behave in intolerant fashion and act harshly against those who violate that code, but I think that steps outside what D&D's alignment is designed to handle. Lobotomizing someone because they behave in a fashion you find repugnant or killing and eating someone just because they've had sex don't easily fit into a universal standard of goodness. They might raise interesting moral quandries, but alignment is really just a way of saying "people painted with this color are okay to kill".

*In the sense that they follow a clear-cut code of morality, not in the sense that they follow your moral code.

JRM

03-15-2009 02:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10104300)

You can have moral and upstanding characters who behave in intolerant fashion and act harshly against those who violate that code, but I think that steps outside what D&D's alignment is designed to handle. Lobotomizing someone because they behave in a fashion you find repugnant or killing and eating someone just because they've had sex don't easily fit into a universal standard of goodness. They might raise interesting moral quandries, but alignment is really just a way of saying "people painted with this color are okay to kill".*

In the sense that they follow a clear-cut code of morality, not in the sense that they follow your moral code.*

Ah yes, but where do you draw the line and how do you shade the goodness? Is it better to execute some "dyed in the wool Evil" creature or imprison them for life, when you could tinker with their minds to make them a valuable member of society? I deliberately mentioned some loss of intellect to imply that it's not a very nice thing to do (it's definitely more Lawful than Good), but what if they have a Helm of Reversing Alignment. That causes no loss of facilities, it's just a "Poof" you're now LG instead of CE" item.

Admittedly, that's an awful silly item. I only used it once, back in my callow youth.:cool:

EDIT: I'm reminded of a classic episode of Star Trek where they visit a lunatic asylum containing some of the handful of people remaining in the federation with forms of criminal insanity that didn't have an established cure, in order to give them a new treatment.

Now obviously it raises issues of individual liberty and freedom of will, but would a Lawful Good creature necessary place the highest emphasis on that, or would they insist on conformity for the common good?

I'm still trying to think of good examples of a "not nice" CG creature, and the best I'm coming up with is the prankster-type (Gnome Illusionists, Kender etc) who torment evil creatures until their lives are a misery.

Sleeper

03-15-2009 03:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10104901)

Ah yes, but where do you draw the line and how do you shade the goodness?

From years of observing internet discussions on the subject, anything that fits a modern vaguely humanist moral perspective (most historical figures -- like Orlando the "paladin" -- are heavily whitewashed to paint them into the appropriate corner).

If it's a fuzzy corner case, alignment is the wrong tool. It's like a bunch of boys playing a pickup game of shirts and skins, and then arguing about which team someone belongs to if they're wearing a bandana or an apron. Where the boundary is drawn is entirely irrelevant, because the actual point is to create an easy tool to identify a pre-defined grouping.

JRM

03-15-2009 05:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10105120)

From years of observing internet discussions on the subject, anything that fits a modern vaguely humanist moral perspective (most historical figures -- like Orlando the "paladin" -- are heavily whitewashed to paint them into the appropriate corner).

If it's a fuzzy corner case, alignment is the wrong tool. It's like a bunch of boys playing a pickup game of shirts and skins, and then arguing about which team someone belongs to if they're wearing a bandana or an apron. Where the boundary is drawn is entirely irrelevant, because the actual point is to create an easy tool to identify a pre-defined grouping.

Well from my years of observing internet discussions about D&D alignment, they usually don't lead anywhere, just a lot of argument about subjective opinions regarding what a multiverse with objective Good and Evil (plus Law and Chaos) would actually be like. It can raise a lot of interesting points, but also a lot of tears.

Still, it was something to do while we wait for Noisms to get around to the Piercer.:o

Monsieur Meuble

03-15-2009 05:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10104901)

I'm still trying to think of good examples of a "not nice" CG creature, and the best I'm coming up with is the prankster-type (Gnome Illusionists, Kender etc) who torment evil creatures until their lives are a misery.

A "freedom fighter", rebelling against evil authorities. Rebelling violently and efficiently. Like, placing horribly efficient magic-traps on the path of the troop of fantasy-nazis. All dead. Never saw this coming. Would one of them have been good, too bad, it better had to not stay with those bastards.

The hard-boiled detective, who play by own rules, is defiant of the police, will kick large amount of asses and probably kill the bad guy who corrupted the whole of the city in his office with a bullet between the eyes while he was gloating, but will never punch a dame, and do it for the good cause, even though he will never admit it while sober.

The hero with no hold barred in his fight against Evil. A relentless agent of justice and retribution, and will make everything on its path stand aside OR ELSE ! He will fight dirty and there will be surprise, traps and betrayal, and, well, okay, a berserk trance. But if he can, he will harm no innocent. Just punch them unconscious if they become worrisome...

Docteur House. Definitely a force of goodness, indeed. And such a potent one that you can't ignore him. And he knows it and he wants you to know it, and he will be a pest all along so you learn it's frankly better to not have to ask for help from the not-nice high-level cleric, next time. Especially if you are not cooperative, because he will break in your lair and exact all kind of mental cruelty on you until you become cooperative and he will be able to do all the Good you couldn't be arsed to try to do by yourself.

The cunning nobleman. Yeah, yeah, sure, of course he is lawful. After all, isn't he a noble head of state ?So, lawful. Trust him. Yeah, okay, he may lie to its counselor (well, seeing as some of them are traitors to the Enemy, it's a necessity) and he does a lot of secret police actions (the Enemy is not acting in the light either !) and will employ preferably and secretly adventurers of ambiguous alignment than his loyal and trusty order of paladins (who, for all the zeal they have in their deeds, aren't as flexible and will not do anything to protect the people !), and, well, okay, he may not be exactly THAT lawful, but at least he is Good and he will do what must be done so his people live free and safe an other day !

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10105632)

A "freedom fighter", rebelling against evil authorities. Rebelling violently and efficiently. Like, placing horribly efficient magic-traps on the path of the troop of fantasy-nazis. All dead. Never saw this coming. Would one of them have been good, too bad, it better had to not stay with those bastards.

The hard-boiled detective, who play by own rules, is defiant of the police, will kick large amount of asses and probably kill the bad guy who corrupted the whole of the city in his office with a bullet between the eyes while he was gloating, but will never punch a dame, and do it for the good cause, even though he will never admit it while sober.

The hero with no hold barred in his fight against Evil. A relentless agent of justice and retribution, and will make everything on its path stand aside OR ELSE ! He will fight dirty and there will be surprise, traps and betrayal, and, well, okay, a berserk trance. But if he can, he will harm no innocent. Just punch them unconscious if they become worrisome...

Docteur House. Definitely a force of goodness, indeed. And such a potent one that you can't ignore him. And he knows it and he wants you to know it, and he will be a pest all along so you learn it's frankly better to not have to ask for help from the not-nice high-level cleric, next time. Especially if you are not cooperative, because he will break in your lair and exact all kind of mental cruelty on you until you become cooperative and he will be able to do all the Good you couldn't be arsed to try to do by yourself.

The cunning nobleman. Yeah, yeah, sure, of course he is lawful. After all, isn't he a noble head of state ?So, lawful. Trust him. Yeah, okay, he may lie to its counselor (well, seeing as some of them are traitors to the Enemy, it's a necessity) and he does a lot of secret police actions (the Enemy is not acting in the light either !) and will employ preferably and secretly adventurers of ambiguous alignment than his loyal and trusty order of paladins (who, for all the zeal they have in their deeds, aren't as flexible and will not do anything to protect the people !), and, well, okay, he may not be exactly THAT lawful, but at least he is Good and he will do what must be done so his people live free and safe an other day !

Good examples. You could include somebody like the BFG in there too, maybe. He's basically good, but if you're a bad kid he's happy to give you horrible nightmares.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Piercer

Another of the dungeon-ecology monsters, Piercers are the kind of being that couldn't survive without adventurers. Apparently they're a kind of gastropod whose shell is so hard and sharp that it can pierce armour.

Basically resembling a stalactite and sometimes measuring up to six feet long, Piercers are the definition of a one-trick pony: they try to drop on you from a cave ceiling, but if they miss, they're screwed. The best they can do is secrete an almost harmless acid in an effort to scare you away. However, as there may be ten or more in a single cavern dropping almost simultaneously - or even hundreds, if the rumours are true - you could still find yourself in trouble if the first one misses.

Piercer bodies are useful because, camel-like, they have means of storing food and water for weeks or months within their bodies. The chemicals which allow them to do this can be used to preserve human food, also. A nice idea, but I'm one of those DMs who always forgets about things like rations going off, so I'm not sure how useful it would be to my players.

Sleeper

03-15-2009 05:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10107368)

Another of the dungeon-ecology monsters, Piercers are the kind of being that couldn't survive without adventurers. Apparently they're a kind of gastropod whose shell is so hard and sharp that it can pierce armour.

An organic Sword of Damocles. What if piercers only spend a tiny fraction of their lifecycle as predators? Rock drippings. Stone from water. Sure. Stalactites make so much sense. Wouldn't it be simpler if they just crawled and bred there, in the dark and the wet? What if piercers grow anywhere that's suitable. Cave roofs aren't lined with teeth of stone. They're lined with piercers. Huge colonies or nests, by the thousands, millions, billions. Hibernating, waiting. For the rare chance when their activity cycle meets up with a wandering monster, and they feed and multiply again. This would be particularly nasty if there was a spell you could hang on someone. A contingent effect. "Don't do this". And if they do, well, what it does is it wakes piercers around you. Activates their feeding instinct. For your sin, no cave in the world will ever be safe again. Because the small rain of wedge-shaped molluscs down will rain.

I do love that they're molluscs. It implies a whole land-based web of assorted relatives, beyond the common snail. The cavern walls might be covered with luminescent barnacles. The sand underneath might hide a bed of oysters with razor-sharp shells. Tusk shells as stagmites. Sessile squids like great boulders, with arms that reach out... oh wait, is that the origin of the roper? Octopi spread across the surface of the roof like eight-armed starfish ready to drop, wrap their arms around their prey, and sink their beak into... oh, that's the executioner's hood, isn't it? Slimly little squirming shellless things, all muscle and foot. Maybe the purple worm is a great caudofoveata, feeding by burying itself in the ground with only its mouth exposed, slurping down passing detritus like incautious adventurers. From little shelled organisms tiny enough to be lost among the grains of sand, to colossal monsters.

rex monday

03-15-2009 06:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10107368)

Piercer

Piercer bodies are useful because, camel-like, they have means of storing food and water for weeks or months within their bodies. The chemicals which allow them to do this can be used to preserve human food, also. A nice idea, but I'm one of those DMs who always forgets about things like rations going off, so I'm not sure how useful it would be to my players.

Since they must be rich enough in nutrients to survive long periods stuck to the ceiling of a cave, I'd say they're probably a strong source of food. Basically, just say you can make 10 field rations worth of food from a decent-sized piercer. Or make them delicacies like oysters.

SrGrvsaLot

03-15-2009 07:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

If you think about it, a Phoenix can be good while still being a fairly effective villain. It is literally a creature with no concept of death. Saying to one "you have to stop or we're all going to die" or "if you do that, you'll cause the deaths of thousands" is simply not going to have the same emotional punch for a phoenix as it would for any normal creature. After all, the Phoenix itself must have died hundreds of times, and it never seemed the worse for wear.

So, to use a Phoenix as an adversary, you simply give it a good goal that cannot be accomplished without killing or, to heighten the ambiguity even more, a good goal that distracts it from curing a plague or otherwise causes it to ignore a situation where people are dying. In this situation, it'll be very hard to persuade the Phoenix to turn from its course without violence because, as far as the Phoenix is concerned, so what if people die. Their souls will be reborn in the afterlife and they'll enjoy an eternity of paradise. It's not really worth getting worked up about.

If you really want to twist the knife, you can make the Phoenix's goal really worthwhile. Perhaps a city is being attacked by rapidly multiplying undead. The Phoenix can stop the spread of the plague by immolating the city. This will free the undead from their unnatural torment and allow their souls to move on to their proper destination. Unfortunately, not everyone in the city is infected yet. The Phoenix will kill those people too.

If the PCs let the Phoenix burn the city, thousands of innocents will perish. If they stop the Phoenix, those same people stand a high chance of being eaten (and converted) by the undead and the zombie plague might well expand beyond its city of origin. How can the players protect the world, save the innocents, and put the undead to rest? And can they do it without having to fight a powerful and genuinely good creature?

Sleeper

03-15-2009 09:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

What if piercers are eggs?

Hard outer shell to protect, rich nutrients inside to cradle and feed. But what kind of creature needs to kill to be born?

The obvious answer is the mind flayer. Illithid aren't a true, independent race. They're a parasite, a symbiote. They require another creature to live, to breed. They are composites, hybrids. Things living within tissue and flesh that originally belonged to another.

They lace strategic ceilings with their eggs. Which grow a hard point at the bottom, along the axis where gravity pulls. They are semi-aware. Sentient, not sapient. But even a protosapient telepath can sense and feel. They choose their targets. Worms and fish pass by safely. As do the odd hounds of the underdark, and even the grimlocks.

What they wait for is the touch of a mind. A brain, an intelligence. Something they can bond with and grown into, creating the adult composite. Then they drop. The wound allows ingress. Their foot burrows in, connects. Sustains the vascular system at minimal levels, preventing decay. Deeper in, sliding past organs like escape artists, greased with the slime their body exudes. Finding the spinal column, blinding tracing it back to the brain. Eating it away, or parts of it. Leaving the higher functions. But the lower functions, the so-called lizard brain, becomes illithid.

Even intelligent, we are creatures of instinct. The mind is just a tool. It requires a driving force. And the mind flayer invader provides that motivation and instinct. The old memories remain, slightly decayed. The high functioning brain that reasons and thinks still exists. But... call it the soul, separate from the mind... is now something alien.

Using the nutrients in the yolk, the foot changes, splits, elongates. Becomes tentacles, that sprout from the base of the hind brain and merge with the bottom of the face.

By the time the horribly mutilated body rises from its near-death, or actual-death, stasis, the slime has coalesced like glue, and become a seal. The nether tail of the illithid has become attenuated, and buds and forms connections to the nervous and other systems abutting the wound. The body is not healed, but patched, by the providence of its new controlling force.

The sub-sapient illithid now has a brain, and the old brain and memories now have a new driving motivation. The newborn seeks out its own kind, with the beacon built into its brain. But it is also the perfect infiltrator. Possessing the knowledge and memories to fool even the lovers and family of its captured body. But also having the burgeoning power and control of others' lower-brain functions that allows them to mask themselves, to hide the horrible changes their transformation has wrought. To convince others that they are as they were.

And when they grow old, they return to their childish form. They produce more and more slime, that becomes like a resin, and begins to cake, to grow. Before their body stiffens, becomes immobile, they choose a place. Outside the colony, strategically located. Slime runs like melting wax down their body, and hardens like magma flows. They become a peak, a pillar. With only their eyes and their horribly altered mouths exposed. The tentacles grow, lengthen, strengthen, become able to lash out a dozen feet.

Most are slain in this form, protecting the new wave of younglings, but a rare few survive long after the colony packs up and leaves. They revert even further. The humanoid brain rots, decays. Their mind diminishes. All that is left of their once-mighty mentatics is concentrated in their touch, enfeebling their prey. Their mouths gape as their jaws are absorbed into the amber-like resin, which becomes like rock.

What we know as ropers were once unfortunate humanoids who fell prey to a falling piercer, were reborn with an wicked urge in their brain, betrayed all they once knew and loved, then were abandoned in their dotage by the young generation of their new family, and fell into senility balanced by a newly burgeoning physicality.

JRM

03-16-2009 04:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10107368)

Piercer

To begin with, I'll say I've got a fondness for the Monstrous Manual illustration of the Piercer. It's really rather goofy looking, a cartoon stalagmite with an eye glaring from the side but it just seems appropriate for a slightly silly monster like the Piercer, and there's something about the eye that leads me to imagine that Piercer thinking "one more step and I'm gonna git that sucka!"

The artist obviously did not pay close heed to the Monstrous Manual entry, since the picture doesn't have the eyestalks it described (the MM entry obviously draws a lot from The Ecology of the Piercer in Dragon #72).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10107368)

Another of the dungeon-ecology monsters, Piercers are the kind of being that couldn't survive without adventurers. Apparently they're a kind of gastropod whose shell is so hard and sharp that it can pierce armour.

Why couldn't they survive without adventurers? They're not like Goldbugs, Locklurkers and Mimics which specialize in preying on treasureseekers, a Piercer will attack anything that moves, and is quite happy eating other subterranean fauna.

Speaking of the shell, a conceptual problem I had with the Piercer is if it has a regular mollusc-type shell, why doesn't it break when it hits the cave floor, regardless of how far it falls? Similarly, how come it has a set damage by size which does not vary with the height of the ceiling it dropped from.

To resolve with minor problem, in my campaign Piercer shells are not calcinous, but are made up of a tough, flexible material resembling horn. Furthermore, they spin a silk safety line and glue it to the ceiling before they drop, which acts as a drag-cord so they never fall too fast and damage themselves on impact. It also means they don't crawl back up the walls like official Piercers, but reel themselves back up their safety line if they miss.

As an added bonus, a Piercer uses its safety line to evade predators - if a giant gecko or cave-beetle climbs across the ceiling to attack one, it can drop off and hang in midair to avoid it.

An idea I played about with an rejected was that Piercers actually hollow out or otherwise mould real stalagmites to incorporate into their shells. The hard, sharp tip of the piercer may be a piece of flint or limestone it has shaped into a weapon. If it chips the point, the Piercer throws it away and installs a new one. In the end I decided they could just shed and regrow their shell's tip to keep it sharp.

JRM

03-16-2009 04:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10107475)

I do love that they're molluscs. It implies a whole land-based web of assorted relatives, beyond the common snail. The cavern walls might be covered with luminescent barnacles. The sand underneath might hide a bed of oysters with razor-sharp shells. Tusk shells as stagmites. Sessile squids like great boulders, with arms that reach out... oh wait, is that the origin of the roper? Octopi spread across the surface of the roof like eight-armed starfish ready to drop, wrap their arms around their prey, and sink their beak into... oh, that's the executioner's hood, isn't it? Slimly little squirming shellless things, all muscle and foot. Maybe the purple worm is a great caudofoveata, feeding by burying itself in the ground with only its mouth exposed, slurping down passing detritus like incautious adventurers. From little shelled organisms tiny enough to be lost among the grains of sand, to colossal monsters.

Well it's not the executioner's hood, but 3rd edition does have this little charmer. Not that FRPG didn't have cave-cephalopods that predated the darkmantle.

I once wanted to have an AD&D underworld which was formed by the action of millions of subterranean molluscs, like limpets up to the size of a house, that would slowly grind out caves and passages. The adventurer's would follow a circular tunnel 15' across and find out it dead-ends with an enormous shell, or drops into an enormous cave with thousands of these things on the walls, floor and ceiling. They'd have probably ended up being luminous as well, since it's a grand AD&D tradition to have some luminous fauna or flora underground so the adventurers can see what they're doing.

Sleeper

03-16-2009 05:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10109064)

Well it's not the executioner's hood, but 3rd edition does have this little charmer.

Minor rework of the same monster.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10109038)

(the MM entry obviously draws a lot from The Ecology of the Piercer in Dragon #72).

The very first ecology article, in fact. The piercer started the whole trend that culminated in the Monstrous Manual. I like the idea of limpets and a safety line. But I also like the idea that piercing is a do-or-die endeavor: If they miss, they go splat. They have one chance. This obviously doesn't work well as a regular feeding mechanism (no predator with that great a chance of dying every time it eats will survive), but if they're an egg and metamorphose after feeding, or if they only eat once in their lifecycle and spawn afterwards, it could be a viable tactic.

JRM

03-16-2009 10:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10109273)

Minor rework of the same monster.

I always thought of the Executioners Hood as being another of AD&D's goofy clothing monsters, like the Cloaker, so I don't see much similarity with the Darkmantle. Not enough tentacles, for a start.:

Wasn't the Darkmantle supposed to be 3E's 'replacement' for the Piercer as a low-level threat. I remember reading something about them wanting to design a more versatile stalagmite-imitating cave predator.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10109273)

The very first ecology article, in fact. The piercer started the whole trend that culminated in the Monstrous Manual. I like the idea of limpets and a safety line. But I also like the idea that piercing is a do-or-die endeavor: If they miss, they go splat. They have one chance. This obviously doesn't work well as a regular feeding mechanism (no predator with that great a chance of dying every time it eats will survive), but if they're an egg and metamorphosize after feeding, or if they only eat once in their lifecycle and spawn afterwards, it could be a viable tactic.

Yes, the Piercers could actually get most of their food from cave algae, and just need the meat to grow eggs. They'd probably need more than a clutch of 6-8 like it says in the ecology article though, if they're only doing it once. The AD&D underworld is a pretty dangerous place, so I'd suspect their infant mortality must be dreadful, especially as the young don't even have shells to protect them.

Speaking about the Piercer going 'splat' if it misses, that ecology article says "If the piercer misses, it is usually smeared across the cavern floor.", while 2E obviously says nothing about them injuring themselves if they miss. Now which way did the 1E MM (pre-ecology) version go? I think it said something about them surviving but being helpless, which implies they climber back up to the ceiling, but my memory is fuzzy about the details.

Thane of Fife

03-16-2009 11:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Piercers seem like the perfect monster for an intelligent subterranean species to cultivate - not only can they serve as guardians, but there's also a good chance that they can produce pearls. Piercers could be the basis of the entire subterranean economy.

Sleeper

03-16-2009 01:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10110167)

Speaking about the Piercer going 'splat' if it misses, that ecology article says "If the piercer misses, it is usually smeared across the cavern floor.", while 2E obviously says nothing about them injuring themselves if they miss. Now which way did the 1E MM (pre-ecology) version go? I think it said something about them surviving but being helpless, which implies they climber back up to the ceiling, but my memory is fuzzy about the details.

Nope. No mention at all. One sentence on where they live, one sentence about their appearance, one sentence about dropping and killing, and three sentences about size (the big 4 HD variety "is about 6' long, 1' base diameter, and weights [sic] 500 pounds").

sim_james

03-16-2009 02:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Oooh, piercer pearls. They'd be like the blood diamonds of D&D campaign worlds!

noisms

03-16-2009 11:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 10110907)

Oooh, piercer pearls. They'd be like the blood diamonds of D&D campaign worlds!

You could even have piercer farms, where thousands of the things are bred and their pearls harvested by particularly enterprising derro.

noisms

03-17-2009 04:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Plant, Dangerous

Dangerous Plant. Seems self-explanatory. Let's examine each in turn.

Choke Creeper

This is like a huge clump of ivy, up to 160' long and with as many as 64 branch vines, which grab victims and constrict to cause damage (with a chance of strangulation and instant death).

Mantrap

A venus flytrap, except for men (and presumably women). It attracts humanoid beings with a special pollen and then swallows them; there is no hope of escape unless there is help from the outside.

Retch Plant

This is a kind of palm tree whose fruits, when they fall, splash vomit-inducing fluid everywhere.

Snapper-Saw

Like something out of a slasher flick, this plant traps humanoids and then slices them with 'saw-stalks' and feeds on the sprayed blood.

Thornslinger

These are low-growing bushes which fling thorns - but only as a defensive measure.

Tri-Flower Frond

As the name suggests, this plant has three flowers - an orange one which makes people comatose, a yellow one which sprays them with enzymes to dissolve them, and a red one to eat the resultant fluid.

Yellow Musk Creeper

Rather like the mold of the same hue, this plant infects victims with a seedling which works its way into their brain and turns them into a zombie. After two months the zombie dies and a new Creeper grows out of the corpse.

JRM

03-17-2009 07:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10110679)

Nope. No mention at all. One sentence on where they live, one sentence about their appearance, one sentence about dropping and killing, and three sentences about size (the big 4 HD variety "is about 6' long, 1' base diameter, and weights [sic] 500 pounds").

Ta, that's more or less what I remembered, but I was too lazy to pull out my copies of the 1E MM.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10112247)

You could even have piercer farms, where thousands of the things are bred and their pearls harvested by particularly enterprising derro.

Yes, and the derro would feed them by driving slaves and livestock into the farm-caves (who may be the same thing to those CE midgets) while they crowd around a balcony, chortling at the gory sight.

To increase the supply of Piercer-Pearls, they could put pieces of grit on the backs of baby Piercers just as they start to grow their shells.

That just leaves harvesting. An obvious approach would be some kind of little roof on wheels that moves about the cave, which the Derro can shelter under. The roof may even be designed to catch piercers that fall upon it, so they get stuck in the roof and can just be wheeled out and killed.

DMH

03-17-2009 07:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I love dangerous plants. Even more than the cube, they can be placed in plain sight and still nab a character or two. What I don't like are the stupidly dangerous ones like the blood drainer from 1e that inflicted 1/4th the victims hip points per round or the choke creeper.

Dangerous plants should be more common with all the magical megaherbivores about.

JRM

03-17-2009 07:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10116227)

Plant, Dangerous

Dangerous Plant. Seems self-explanatory. Let's examine each in turn.

Some of these plants first saw print in Expedition to the Barrier Peaks - i.e. Tri-Flower Frond, the Retch Plant, the Thorny. So remember lads & lasses, these are Dangerous Plants From Space.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10116227)

Mantrap

A venus flytrap, except for men (and presumably women). It attracts humanoid beings with a special pollen and then swallows them; there is no hope of escape unless there is help from the outside.

Unless there's a variety whose scent only attracts males. Some kind of overpowering magical pheromone. There are real-life animals which fake sex-pheromones to lure prey. Which adds the image of a PC being eaten by a plant will they're trying to have conjugal relations with it, plus the possibility that they could use them as pollinators when they're not hungry / during their breeding season.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10116227)

Retch Plant

This is a kind of palm tree whose fruits, when they fall, splash vomit-inducing fluid everywhere.

This is one of those curious 'barely a monster' creatures like Green Slime. Its practically inanimate, all it can do is drop nauseating fruit when disturbed. That said, its stat entry does have a few amusing features like "Diet: Sun, soil" and "Morale: Average (8-10)". How many times, if ever, would a Retch Plant's morale enter play? It wouldn't change its behaviour, indeed it probably can't change it's behaviour, being incapable of fleeing or surrendering - or doing much else apart from dropping loose fruit. Most PCs would never even realize it was demoralized, barring Speak with Plants.

The flavour-text mentioning mantrap nectar is an ingredient in Philter of Love may support this possibility.

rex monday

03-17-2009 07:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10116648)

Unless there's a variety whose scent only attracts males. Some kind of overpowering magical pheromone. There are real-life animals which fake sex-pheromones to lure prey. Which adds the image of a PC being eaten by a plant will they're trying to have conjugal relations with it, plus the possibility that they could use them as pollinators when they're not hungry / during their breeding season.

You mean Dryads?

I always liked the fact the Assassin Vine in the 3e MM had grapes. It always conjured images of the exotic and slightly narcotic and toxic Assassin's Wine.

Hellzon

03-17-2009 07:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10116227)

Plant, Dangerous

Note to self - convert that stuff to 4E.

Sleeper

03-17-2009 08:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The retch plant was originally paired with the banderlog.

Yes. The giant carnivorous baboon threw puke-melons instead of feces.

I think it's a shame they dropped two of my favorite alliterative plant-monsters: Vampire vines and grab grass. Wasn't until 3E that they really started to poach the Mystaran beasts (like the non-plant nightshades).

noisms

03-17-2009 08:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10116648)

"Diet: Sun, soil"

"Diet: Sun, water", shorely?

JRM

03-18-2009 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by rex monday (Post 10116696)
You mean Dryads?

I always liked the fact the Assassin Vine in the 3e MM had grapes. It always conjured images of the exotic and slightly narcotic and toxic Assassin's Wine.

I think I already mentioned that idea back when we where dealing with the Ds. At least AD&D Dryads aren't maneaters.

Although that gives me an idea...:D

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10116780)
"Diet: Sun, water", shorely?

I've been keeping up by reading the dotd.com version of the Monstrous Manual rather than pulling out my hardcopy of it, is there an error in the transcription?

Although if we wanted to be accurate, "Diet: Sun, soil, water and atmospheric gases" would likely be truer.

Mr. Teapot

03-18-2009 03:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 10116722)
Note to self - convert that stuff to 4E.

There's already a couple dangerous plants in 4e. Not these ones specifically, but it's a start. and the model of making plants into Hazards/Traps is a good one: they're closer to natural traps than they are to monsters.

You could perhaps imagine some big set-piece plant monster as a Skill Challenge. Something like a Tendriculous or the Sarlacc Pit: you have to escape its clutches, but it's not exactly running around attacking you so much as trying to trick you (so Perception and Nature checks) then grabbing you with its vines (Athletics and Acrobatics to avoid/escape, plus more Nature to know how to escape/defeat it).

demiurge1138

03-18-2009 03:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

No wonder the tri-flower frond is so weird! It's from space! That makes sense!

noisms

03-18-2009 12:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10117700)

I've been keeping up by reading the dotd.com version of the Monstrous Manual rather than pulling out my hardcopy of it, is there an error in the transcription?

Although if we wanted to be accurate, "Diet: Sun, soil, water and atmospheric gases" would likely be truer.

No, it's "sun, soil" - I was trying to make the same point you are here. ;)

noisms

03-18-2009 01:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Plant, Intelligent

Another mammoth entry, and we've got the Puddings coming up soon, too. Fortunately there are a couple of good monsters in amongst the following entries.

Throughout the MM there seems to be a weird conflict going on between actual real-world biology and pure fantasy. The Intelligent Plant entry is one of the points where this bubbles to the surface: "Some are the unnatural results of arcane influences, while others may have evolved naturally." This is part of the book's charm, though I feel the idea of how natural selection would operate in a world where magic exists is one of the great unmined areas of the fantasy genre. Somebody who knows more about real world zoology and biology than me should have a go at experimenting with the idea.

Anyway, lots of Intelligent Plants to get through, so without further ado:

Hangman Tree

These plants can move (2' per hour), and constantly patrol around the forest, looking for humanoids to eat. They release a hallucinogenic perfume which makes people think they are normal trees or treants ("depending on the mood of the tree"), and grab their victims with strangling vines before depositing them in their pitcher-plant style stomach.

Kelpie

A "mass of animated seaweed" which can form itself into the shape of a woman or horse and even venture out onto land. It then searches for human males, casts a charm spell on one, and tempts him into the sea to drown. It then eats the body. "They are said to have been created by the sea god to punish sailors", although who knows for what? Trespassing?

Oblivix

The famous "memory moss", with a diet of "soil, water, memories". To restore blanked memories the moss can be eaten, rather like how a scorpion contains the antidote to its poison, I suppose. The spores can also be used as a cure for senility or forgetfulness, which is a quest idea if ever there was one.

Quickwood

An unusual one, this - a large oak with a face ("90% unlikely to be noticed") - which extends roots to capture prey and drag them towards the mouth. It can control surrounding oak trees, using them to gather information, and is sometimes used as a guardian for treasure etc.

Shambling Mound

A heap of rotting vegetation with a vaguely humanoid shape and a controlling 'brain' hidden in the middle. Electric attacks give them power, and there are rumours of giant Shambling Mounds deep in swamps and jungles, who have been feeding off the attacks of Will O' Wisps. I suppose there is no upper limit to their size...

Strangleweed

A pile of intelligent kelp which attacks creatures passing nearby. Rather boring, this one.

Giant Sundew

Essentially a large version of the real world carnivorous plant, this gradually pulls itself along the ground and attempts to catch victims with its sticky tendrils.

Thorny

A "dog-like plant creature" which is used by Mold Men as a guard. They attack by biting victims and then rolling their spiky bodies against them. If you can get hold of the bud of a Thorny before it starts to grow, it's possible to train - this sounds like something an enterprising non-Mold Man could use. Imagine a huge orchard of Thorny trees in the grounds of some Duke's castle, ready to create an entire army of the things.

demiurge1138

03-18-2009 04:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Shambling mounds are awesome. Combining them with will-o-wisps is just gravy. In 3.x, shocker lizards (aka reptilian Pikachus) are also a popular combination.

khyron1144

03-18-2009 05:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035742)

Did anybody ever actually picture the various humanoids in such garish colors?

I've always figured that for the most part the goblinoid races, which to me includes Orcs, come mainly in different greens. It's probably something that I unconsciously lifted from Warhammer. Whatever it's origins, this idea helped me come up with something: the mostly Half-orc district in my world's major civilized human country's capital city is called Greenie-town.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)

Plant, Intelligent

This is part of the book's charm, though I feel the idea of how natural selection would operate in a world where magic exists is one of the great unmined areas of the fantasy genre. Somebody who knows more about real world zoology and biology than me should have a go at experimenting with the idea.

Back when I was in high school biology, I was kicking around ideas regarding D&D taxonomy in my head. Trying to go through the Monstrous Manual and commit some of it to paper, I only got as far as Aboleths before I had to start making up new terminology from either Class or Order on down.

I pretty much gave up on it there.

Kingdom
Phylum
Class
Order
Family
Genus
Species

I remember it from the mnemonic that I learned all the way back in seventh-grade science. Kings Play Cards On Fat Green Stools. Hooray for knowledge that has no application once you get out of high school!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10116648)

This is one of those curious 'barely a monster' creatures like Green Slime. Its practically inanimate, all it can do is drop nauseating fruit when disturbed.

It is worth mentioning that Banderlog are supposed to sometimes live near Retch Plant groves and throw Retch Plant fruit instead of rocks. Doesn't do much to help the Retch Plant, though does it?

JRM

03-18-2009 06:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)

Plant, Intelligent

Another mammoth entry, and we've got the Puddings coming up soon, too. Fortunately there are a couple of good monsters in amongst the following entries.

Throughout the MM there seems to be a weird conflict going on between actual real-world biology and pure fantasy. The Intelligent Plant entry is one of the points where this bubbles to the surface: "Some are the unnatural results of arcane influences, while others may have evolved naturally." This is part of the book's charm, though I feel the idea of how natural selection would operate in a world where magic exists is one of the great unmined areas of the fantasy genre. Somebody who knows more about real world zoology and biology than me should have a go at experimenting with the idea.

That sounds like a good idea for a thread! I've had a few ideas on the issue, such as magic allows for a world where Lamarkian evolution works, and it means that statistically highly unlikely events are far more likely to occur (those "one in a million" crossbreeds may happen about one in a hundred, or one in ten. Plus, of course, magic is a powerful mutagen.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)
Kelpie

snip* "They are said to have been created by the sea god to punish sailors", although who knows for what? Trespassing?*

That sailor should never have put the moves on the Sea God's girl, now everyone suffers for it.:o

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)
Strangleweed

Giant Sundew

I'm a bit uncertain whether these should be in the "Plant, Intelligent" category. Sure, they're geniuses compared to an average daffodil, but they've only beast-level intelligence. A Strangleweed or Giant Sundew doesn't have any behaviour that's more sophisticated than a Mantrap or Yellow Musk Creeper. I can't help suspecting it's because they didn't have room to fit them in with the "Plants, Dangerous".

JRM

03-18-2009 07:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)
Thorny

A "dog-like plant creature" which is used by Mold Men as a guard. They attack by biting victims and then rolling their spiky bodies against them. If you can get hold of the bud of a Thorny before it starts to grow, it's possible to train - this sounds like something an enterprising non-Mold Man could use. Imagine a huge orchard of Thorny trees in the grounds of some Duke's castle, ready to create an entire army of the things.

I wonder whether this includes "training" in a topiary sense. Imagine a hedge-maze defended by elephants, men, dragons and lions all formed from living, moving vegetation. They're all just thornies who have been pruned and shaped in different forms as they grew.

Of course, topiary monsters are old news in RPGs, I've got published modules with such beasts from the early 80s.

Sleeper

03-18-2009 08:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by khyron1144 (Post 10120954)

I've always figured that for the most part the goblinoid races, which to me includes Orcs, come mainly in different greens. It's probably something that I unconsciously lifted from Warhammer. Whatever it's origins, this idea helped me come up with something: the mostly Half-orc district in my world's major civilized human country's capital city is called Greenie-town.

I think I was more puzzled by it than anything at the time, but looking back at the illustration of the hobgoblin in the original MM (and to a lesser degree, the goblin), the art has a very clear Japanese influence. From the crest on the helm, to the puffed out and tied off sleeves with some kind of paisley-like pattern, to the shape of the armor. Eyes curved like that and cheeks almost like cut panes of glass wouldn't pass muster these days, but it's clear what the artist was going for. Toss in the oni-like coloration ("dark reddish-brown to gray black. Their faces bright red-orange to red. Large males will have blue-red noses.") and they seem more akin to the ogre magi than the other more western-influenced humanoid.

Hellzon

03-18-2009 08:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)

Hangman Tree

These plants can move (2' per hour), and constantly patrol around the forest, looking for humanoids to eat. They release a hallucinagenic perfume which makes people think they are normal trees or treants ("depending on the mood of the tree"), and grab their victims with strangling vines before depositing them in their pitcher-plant style stomach.

Old Man Willow from LOTR?

DMH

03-18-2009 08:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)

This is part of the book's charm, though I feel the idea of how natural selection would operate in a world where magic exists is one of the great unmined areas of the fantasy genre. Somebody who knows more about real world zoology and biology than me should have a go at experimenting with the idea.

Actually I have, at least for Mutant Future (where mutagens are magical). I will PM you when it goes on sale.

As for the intelligent plants, I wonder where thornies come from. Are they wild or something the mold creates from dogs or similar animals?

Sleeper

03-18-2009 09:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10121414)

As for the intelligent plants, I wonder where thornies come from. Are they wild or something the mold creates from dogs or similar animals?

The text says they reproduce by seeds that bud and sprout, but I rather like the idea of a parasite.

A dog dies alone in the woods. The corpse is quickly infested with a mold. The flesh decays, and falls off or is consumed. The mold grows, until it penetrates the bones, where the rich marrow forms a fertile conduit. Once thoroughly covered inside and out with the organism, the bones begin to twitch, as if they were flesh and there was some kind of escaping gas. Then they click and clatter, and the whole mound shivers. The corpse, coated with must and dark stains and strange growths around the joints that replace tendons, stands, and then starts rushing madly and tirelessly through the forest. They sense by heat, not sight or smell. They seek warm things, casting themselves foolishly into fires, but more often finding a bear, or merchant caravan. They can't articulate it, but what they're really seeking is a new place for the parasitic fungus to grow in. Warm, rotting flesh. And a skeletal structure to animate, so they can spread once again. As they run, the mold grows vigorously in a last spurt, finishing the remaining consumable organic material on the corpse. Questing tendrils start to splinter and split the bone, and weird growths or fungoid protrusions stab out, wounding and infecting any animal they are forced into. The dead dog's mouth doesn't bite; the slain lynx's claws don't catch. They just flail and shiver their body and slam into anything warm. This final spurt of growth starts to harm the structural integrity of the bone, and the body starts to collapse, running on splintered legs until finally it falls into a shivering mass. That's why they're in such a rush to kill. They need to slay something so they will have a fertile new place to grow, and start the lifecycle again.

DMH

03-18-2009 09:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10121452)

The text says they reproduce by seeds that bud and sprout, but I rather like the idea of a parasite.

Interesting description, but I meant originally. Where they created on purpose (by the creator of vegepygmies) or something they adopted?

Sleeper

03-18-2009 10:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10121557)

Interesting description, but I meant originally. Where they created on purpose (by the creator of vegepygmies) or something they adopted?

I think "wizards did it" is D&D's answer to evolution.

Worms with rotating circular-saw mouths big enough to swallow the largest of menhirs? Wizards did it.

A giant owl head grafted on a bear? Wizards did it.

Angry topiary? Of course wizards did it.

Nothing happens naturally. The gods just started things off. Everything since is on some mad wizard's head.

DMH

03-18-2009 10:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Okay, but which wizards? Some human or elf in the dawn of time (or 50 years ago) or vegepygmy wizards* that wanted a pet/guard animal for their people.

*Yes, I know technically they can't, but 2e is much easier to break in that regard.

Sleeper

03-18-2009 10:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Obviously the vegepygmies got a hoary old treant drunk on fermented maple syrup, and when he passed-out in his own filth (what exactly do trees puke up, after all?) they sold his body off to a wizard's guild* in exchange for a certain... consideration. They wanted a cuddly-wuddly pet to love and care for and fuss over and dress up in knitted (from vines) sweaters. (To vegepygmies, thorns just tickle.)

* Treant-trafficking. Oh the inhumanity!

JRM

03-18-2009 11:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10121452)

The text says they reproduce by seeds that bud and sprout, but I rather like the idea of a parasite.

A dog dies alone in the woods. The corpse is quickly infested with a mold. The flesh decays, and falls off or is consumed. The mold grows, until it penetrates the bones, where the rich marrow forms a fertile conduit. Once thoroughly covered inside and out with the organism, the bones begin to twitch, as if they were flesh and there was some kind of escaping gas. Then they click and clatter, and the whole mound shivers. The corpse, coated with must and dark stains and strange growths around the joints that replace tendons, stands, and then starts rushing madly and tirelessly through the forest. SNIP! This final spurt of growth starts to harm the structural integrity of the bone, and the body starts to collapse, running on splintered legs until finally it falls into a shivering mass. That's why they're in such a rush to kill. They need to slay something so they will have a fertile new place to grow, and start the lifecycle again.

Well we've recently mentioned quite a few parasitic fungal/vegetable lifeforms that animate corpses (e.g. Moldies, Yellow Musk Zombies) so I quite like the idea of thornies from seeds.

That implies that the thorny itself is actually a fruit of the adult tree, designed for the dispersal of its kind. Maybe, like dogs, they bury food except that instead of digging up the bones later to eat, they lay a seed where they've buried a victim.

noisms

03-18-2009 11:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10121414)

Actually I have, at least for Mutant Future (where mutagens are magical). I will PM you when it goes on sale.

Thanks!

Sleeper

03-18-2009 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10121810)

Well we've recently mentioned quite a few parasitic fungal/vegetable lifeforms that animate corpses (e.g. Moldies, Yellow Musk Zombies) so I quite like the idea of thornies from seeds.

That implies that the thorny itself is actually a fruit of the adult tree, designed for the dispersal of its kind. Maybe, like dogs, they bury food except that instead of digging up the bones later to eat, they lay a seed where they've buried a victim.

That's okay, you don't have to play. I avoided the yellow musk creepers, myself.

But why oh why are the thornies shaped like animals? Convergent evolution needs a reason. Wasmannian Mimickry? Or is it a deliberate attempt to adopt the seeming of nearby humanoid kingdoms? (They might capture human pets and drug them until they're comatose so the pre-mobile thornies can grow over them like a lattice, and take on their shape.)

JRM

03-19-2009 02:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10121927)

That's okay, you don't have to play. I avoided the yellow musk creepers, myself.

But why oh why are the thornies shaped like animals? Convergent evolution needs a reason. Wasmannian Mimickry: Or is it a deliberate attempt to adopt the seeming of nearby humanoid kingdoms? (They might capture human pets and drug them until they're comatose so the pre-mobile thornies can grow over them like a lattice, and take on their shape.)

It's not Wasmannian mimicry, thornies don't join packs of regular dogs and exploit them, indeed if I remember their Barrier Peaks illustration correctly they only resemble dogs in the vaguest of fashions - both are fully-erect quadruped with a head at one end equipped with jaws, but despite a similarity in general shape no one would mistake one for the other except under the poorest of conditions.

More likely, they're shaped like animals because they live like animals, so have analogues of the limbs and organs that hunting dogs need - their legs may have wooden bones and hydraulic vegetable muscles but they are used to chase prey like a dog so they are shaped like a dog's. Their jaws may be modified petals lined with thorn teeth and their stomach a hollow filled with digestive rootlets, but they fulfill the same carnivorous function as the corresponding parts of a dog.

That said, I would like there to be more obvious differences to a mammal apart from them being covered in thorns to tear up their prey. Maybe their sense-organs (eye- and ear- equivalents) look like flowers and sprout semi-randomly from their head and shoulders, and they smell via specialized digestive rootlets they stick out of their mouths.

JRM

03-19-2009 02:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10121927)

That's okay, you don't have to play. I avoided the yellow musk creepers, myself.

Speaking of Yellow Musk Creepers (YMC), I've used them twice (because they happened to be in modules I was running and couldn't be bothered to change them) and found them a little unsatisfactory as a monster.

The basic problem is they're either no real danger- if the PCs recognize them as a threat they can easily destroy the flowers & zombies from a safe distance and then dig up the root) - or too much of a threat - If they walk into a patch unawares most of the party could easily all have flowers growing from their ears within a few rounds, and it takes powerful magic (heal and possibly neutralize poison) to cure the affliction, which most of my games were too low-level to possess.

I'd probably prefer a YMC that is sapient, and is able to charm humanoid to be its gardener-guards. Maybe it has to 'operate' on them for a turn or three to insert its control-tendrils into their minds, and it tries to get its slaves to lure more victims into its clutches (Now I'm imagining a smiling goblin walking up to the PCs and asking them to smell a "pretty flower").

Or have a YMC that's a more active combatant. Instead of rendering victims helpless with a puff of pollen it has mobile vines which lash, constrict and strangle them to death, then it creates zombie slaves from the corpses, and it doesn't only animate man-sized humanoids. To deal with a patch of such stuff the party may have to fight a small army of decaying goblins, wolves, deer and a badger.

Mr. Teapot

03-19-2009 03:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10121927)

But why oh why are the thornies shaped like animals?

When the Thorny plant processes nutrients from the soil, it also absorbs DNA/the magical essence/whatever from the creatures buried in the ground there. So if a dog dies near a sprouting Thorny bush, the adult, mobile Thorny that grows from that bush will take one aspect of the dead dog: it will move on all fours, and adopt doglike behaviors and such. If a bear died there, you might get a big hulking thorn monster: maybe a Shambling Mound. The more fresh the corpse is when the Thorny bush grows there, the stronger the adult thorny's resemblance to the deceased creature, so things dead a long time only leave faint traces in appearance or behavior.

The truth is, Thornies and Vegepygmies are the same species of plant. Just the "Thorny" was grown on a spot where only animals had died, whereas the Vegepygmies grew on a graveyard or battlefield or elsewhere where they could absorb humanoid traits.

It might even be possible that Vegepygmies absorb some of the memories or personality of the dead humanoids they sprout from. Because that has all sorts of plot potential (as Alan Moore showed when writing "Swamp Thing"). Hunting down a vegepygmy tribe to see if any retain knowledge possessed by an explorer who died mapping their forest, say. Or a sad widow(er) who bands together with a tribe of vegepygmies because one grew on the grave of the deceased spouse. Or where did they PCs dump the body of the last villain they defeated? If it was in a forest somewhere, they might be hunted down by a Vegepygmy who thinks he is the original villain reborn. Maybe a village (of elves?) plants vegepygmy/thorny seeds on graves so that the deceased can be reborn into a second life as a plant-man in the forest... do the vegepygmies then have a good relationship with said elf village, or do they find it hard to deal with the still living?

The Last Conformist

03-19-2009 06:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10120443)
Kelpie

A "mass of animated seaweed" which can form itself into the shape of a woman or horse and even venture out onto land. It then searches for human males, casts a charm spell on one, and tempts him into the sea to drown. It then eats the body. "They are said to have been created by the sea god to punish sailors", although who knows for what? Trespassing?

With the number of supernatural nasties out to seduce and kill male sailors, one'd think there'd be a business opportunity in D&D land for an all-female shipping company.

Mr. Teapot

03-19-2009 07:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10123866)
With the number of supernatural nasties out to seduce and kill male sailors, one'd think there'd be a business opportunity in D&D land for an all-female shipping company.

Hello, new campaign pitch.

Obviously, the number of sea creatures eating male sailors comes from the fact that sailors were traditionally male (barring a few exceptions, including a surprising number of crossdressing women). And even more so, they were men who were away from women for months at a time. So the stories they told each other involved seductive creatures. And D&D stole all those weird sea legends and stuck them in this book here.

Sleeper

03-19-2009 07:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10122962)

When the Thorny plant processes nutrients from the soil, it also absorbs DNA/the magical essence/whatever from the creatures buried in the ground there. So if a dog dies near a sprouting Thorny bush, the adult, mobile Thorny that grows from that bush will take one aspects of the dead dog: it will move on all fours, and adopt doglike behaviors and such. If a bear died there, you might get a big hulking thorn monster: maybe a Shambling Mound. The more fresh the corpse is when the Thorny bush grows there, the stronger the adult thorny's resemblance to the deceased creature, so things dead a long time only leave faint traces in appearance or behavior.

The truth is, Thornies and Vegepygmies are the same species of plant. Just the "Thorny" was grew on a spot where only animals had died, whereas the Vegepygmies grew on a graveyard or battlefield or elsewhere where they could absorb humanoid traits.

It might even be possible that Vegepygmies absorb some of the memories or personality of the dead humanoids they sprout from. Because that has all sorts of plot potential (as Alan Moore showed when writing "Swamp Thing"). Hunting down a vegepygmy tribe to see if any retain knowledge possessed by an explorer who died mapping their forest, say. Or a sad widow(er) who bands together with a tribe of vegepygmies because one grew on the grave of the deceased spouse. Or where did they PCs dump the body of the last villain they defeated? If it was in a forest somewhere, they might be hunted down by a Vegepygmy who thinks he is the original villain reborn. Maybe a village (of elves?) plants vegepygmy/thorny seeds on graves so that the deceased can be reborn into a second life as a plant-man in the forest... do the vegepygmies then have a good relationship with said elf village, or do they find it hard to deal with the still living?

Good answer :).

"Now that you're done killing off that mean tarrasque, do you mind if I plant a few rose bushes on the mound? It's good luck, young sirs and ma'ams," says the innocent peasant trundling up the side of the barrow on a wagon.

Maybe the barrows that litter the kingdom are all the resting place of a supposedly singular tarrasque. Enchanted with spells that cause perpetual harm to keep them down, and sealed away behind powerful barriers so no casual adventurers stumble in. But why are there so many of them? We dug up the resting place of the first one after we killed the second, but it's still sleeping there. If you can call "continually being hacked to pieces by a platoon of iron golems" sleeping. Because a tarrasque is a plant, you see. A waving mass of mad shrubbery. And a new one always seems to sprout and grow from the resting place of the former one.

Monsieur Meuble

03-19-2009 08:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

One could have doubts about how the ever present sages of the University of Teratology did manage to learn so much about the obliviax. After all, it seems difficult to even describe it, to begin with ! "La la la ! I'm a teratologist harmlessly trying to discover new kind of beasties and... ho my head... lol wut ? What I am doing here, 59 feet away from this normal looking tree covered in moss ? Better find someone to tell me where I am..."

Well,, they were discovered and studied by the Secret Police of the Local Lawful Evil Dictatorship (LLED), after a disgraced official was sent to administer a shithole on the savage border of the LLED to never be heard notably again. After the capitol realized said shithole didn't sent collected taxes for a few months, suspecting the beginning of an insurrection, a couple of wizards of the Secret Police where sent with instruction of discretion and keeping mind protections spell on use constantly, so to keep being alert and not be influenced by propaganda from the enemy. Arriving at the shithole, they quickly discovered that the taxes were in fact collected everyday and stocked at the isolated manor of the governor, perched on a cliff. Once said manor infiltrated, they discovered that the taxes were stocked by the governor himself and a bunch of soldiers in secluded caves under the manor. Long story short : said caves belong to a network of subterranean structures where the obliviax originated and the first day of tax collection, the governor ans his goons went down there with the money, deposited it, and then forgot that today was the first day of tax collection and so did the same the next day. For months. As, to them, the completion of tax collection never came, they didn't send it to the capital. The cause of the memory loss was identified by the iron-minded wizards and, well they did a report to the Inquisition, who was very interested...

Nowaday, the Oblivix is mass produced by the Secret Police. It was first used to finish the interrogation of arrested resistant and political opponents : once every interesting informations were extirpated, a couple of healing to cover most torture marks, an aspersion of wine and a quarter of hour in a locked room with a golem holding a patch of oblivix was all that was necessary for the interrogated victim to forgot he was arrested and just betrayed his comrade from his cell of the Resistance, and to be sent in the street believing he spent the night drinking himself oblivious. Then, as the oblivix was so useful, it was extremely researched on by the biologist mages working for the LLED in highly controlled conditions, and with as much tests on human guinea pigs as the political prisons could deliver. That's how the medical and alchemical properties of the oblivix where discovered...

So, now, the Secret Police doesn't ever bother with torture and interrogation (except for entertainment purpose, of course...), they just lock the suspect with the golem with oblivix, send him out and a political officer eat the moss and know everything he needs to know. So, they are now extremely efficient and terrible in their hunt for opponent, and the only surviving opposition networks are the ones so paranoid and enshrouded in secrets, mysteries and protocols to protect anonymity they don't have time for serious opposition...

The oblivix is cultivated in two places : first, in an underground room in the bowels of the Secret Police Fortress in the capital of the LLED. The room has only one access, leading the "interrogation" room. It is strictly controled so that no agent get too close of the patches of moss. They are cultivated by golems of two sorts : one team of golem is doing the cultivation itself, tending the patches, humidifying the air and bringing a patch in the interrogation room when needed. The other team is interpreting a comical routine (the same everyday) for a public of chained prisoners, so as to give them something worth remembering, itself worth eating for the oblivix.

The second place of culture are the underground of the manor of the shithole where it was first discovered. The manor has been converted in some kind of mad science laboratory where all ind of evil experiment are done on human guinea pigs with oblivix and derivatives of all sort. Also, studies are done about the origin of the moss : its spores infiltrated the cave by fissures connected to a network of caves, but most of said network seems to be divination proof and so probably involve an artificial strcure put there by a forgotten civilization that so wanted the place to be forgotten they bioengineered the oblivix to back-up the "there's nothing here" magical effect. So, of course what is hidden there must be cracked open and given to the sinister hands of the LLED. Son it's not a bad thing that no wizard of the secret police is allowed to go down there, for fear of him losing his knowledge and allowing to to be retrieved in a random moss, and no wizard NOT belonging to the secret police is allowed down there because, duh, secret of the State !

So, effectivly, the mining is left to a bunch of golems with the problem of supervising the digging : the golems can't explain what they precisely did and saw, no one can can down there and come back to tell what they saw because they somehow forgot it while coming back, and divinations are crypted, so no remote control...

So, it can take some time before the LLED put sits hand on the nuclear arsenal of the Ancients, but it will happen, eventually...

noisms

03-19-2009 07:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10124331)

Once said manor infiltrated, they discovered that the taxes were stocked by the governor himself and a bunch of soldiers in secluded caves under the manor. Long story short : said caves belong to a network of subterranean structures where the oblivix originated and the first day of tax collection, the governor ans his goons went down there with the money, deposited it, and then forgot that today was the first day of tax collection and so did the same the next day. For months.

I'm trying to think of a way to force a group of players into an eternal loop, a la the Star Trek: TNG episode Cause and Effect, using an obliviax, but how it would all hang together remains frustratingly out of reach.

DMH

03-19-2009 07:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10121927)

But why oh why are the thornies shaped like animals? Convergent evolution needs a reason.

How fast could a shrub run if it had muscles in its roots? The dog shape is simply more efficient.

What I was thinking of last night was having them human corpses/skeletons wrapped up in vines. The lower leg bones are discarded so the limbs are more equal in size. Could be useful for an evil druid trying to depopulate an area or a standard druid trying to control goblin or orc numbers.

Monsieur Meuble

03-20-2009 06:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10126224)

I'm trying to think of a way to force a group of players into an eternal loop, a la the Star Trek: TNG episode Cause an Effect, using an obliviax, but how it would all hang together remains frustratingly out of reach.

"You wake up at the Inn in the Village near the Dungeon. Yesterday, you were hired by the local noble to kill the lich trying to settle down there. You did all the shopping to have your full gear and ammunitions and zough !to the Dungeon ! "

But, well, for a secluded dungeon, it seems awfully frequented ! Lot of step traces, marks on the walls, dead monsters everywhere... the only real threat seems to be wandering animals near the entrance, a bunch of goblins who, if asked will say they arrived only this night, and auto-reloading traps.

When they do begin to use resources, there seems to be missing arrows, potions, spells components... even that very special resource they particularly protected in a magically sealed bag... and the steps traces... looks a lot like the one of your shoes. And those traces on the wall are like the one adventurers left behind to see if they already went there, and surely the leader once used marks like this. And they begin to remember some big dude escorting them to the inn in a dreamy haze. And the thief has lost a level ! as if resurrected or something ! Hell, if there is a druid in the gang, they can realize that one of them is actually a freakin' KOBOLD ! If you are facetious, from that point, there are "the lich is a lie the lich is a lie the lich is a lie" inscriptions on the walls...

Proactive players will realize that they, somehow, already done this dungeon, and when confronted with the obvious, big, sculpted final door, they will use all protection spells they know and will be confronted with, well, a golem holding patches of obliviax. You tell this only if they do their save, of course. Otherwise... "You wake up at the Inn in the Village near the Dungeon. Yesterday, you..." , here, the player screams, you cut to the last door and try again...

Would they make the save, well, the room is the final one in the dungeon, full stop. On the torso of the golem is written "If you can read this (and remember it), please contact the local noble."

If one of the PCs fails his save, the golem, covered in moss, escorts him out to the edge of the village... When contacted, the local noble will ask for a report and go something like "Joly good, you only did it four times ! You are the best team to survive the test, you are hired ! " and then begin the real quest against a conspiracy of psionists and other mindfuckers...

The innkeeper will subsequently asks to be paid for a full week, of course...

YojimboC

03-20-2009 06:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Pure gold.

Monsieur Meuble

03-20-2009 06:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10128944)
Pure gold.

Thanks a lot.

Ho, and another thing about obliviax : they are supposed to be intelligent. Well, they may be conscious and all, but they are actually pretty stupid when you talk to them : as they keep eating one each other memories from day one, groups of obliviax can't learn anything ! When contacted telepathically (dangerous !) or discussed with by any other means, all they say is "lol wut ?"

This, of course, is valid only for groups of obliviax. A patch of obliviax alone can actually learn things and remember them and gain experience and cunning. If an adventurous wizard, his mind protected by all kind of spell, try to tame/educate one, the patch can learn to control its hunger and only attack enemies or victims of the mage...

And now I have this vision of an evil wizard who did this tric a lot actually and raised a whole colony of civilized mosses, who see him as a messiah or a god or something. When the master is slain by the PCs, the patches allies with the surviving familiars, golems, domesticated monsters and such to use them as mount (or be brainwashed into obedience)(yes, selective eating can do that...) to pursue them to the end of the world and avenge the moss messiah ! Can be fun to be escorted to a dark alley by some bum in a hazed trance to be confronted a bunch of mosses strapped on the back of a cat, screaming in a high-pitched herbal voice "Death to the deicides ! "

Or to have them as the mastermind behind the inevitable "all the dudes the PCs wronged ally together" scenario.

noisms

03-20-2009 10:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Poltergeist

Another 'barely a monster' monster (we've had a few of these recently, what with the Phantom and the Retch Tree), a Poltergeist is basically an invisible ghost which throws things. Thrown objects cause no damage (even knives and swords are treated as 'near misses' if they hit), but simply cause the target to flee in terror.

Nevertheless, the entry has a nice line in cheesy horror, and some fun descriptions: "Poltergeists are always invisible. Those who can see invisible objects describe them as humans whose features have been twisted at the sight of horrors. They wear rags and are covered with chains and other heavy objects that represent a multitude of evil deeds that these creatures have committed against themselves as well as others."; "Poltergeists often haunt families and partnerships. In the latter case, they haunt their place of business, striking almost as much terror in death as they did in life."

Poltergeists are obviously tailor made for a mystery solving adventure - who is the Poltergeist who haunts the old manor, and why is he tied to that particular tapestry? etc. A phantom shift - an illusion which takes the character encountering the Poltergeist back in time to reveal why Poltergeistation occurred - can probably form the crescendo of such an adventure. As a rule I don't tend to run that sort of game, but I could see a Poltergeist encounter being used as the first step on a huge narrative arc (probably rather rail-road-y) in which a simple mystery (who is that Poltergeist?) is the tip of an iceberg of all manner of nefarious goings on.

The obligatory 'huh?' note for this entry is that Poltergeists are Lawful Evil in alignment. Surely Chaotic Evil, no?

Sleeper

03-20-2009 10:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10130011)

The obligatory 'huh?' note for this entry is that Poltergeists are Lawful Evil in alignment. Surely Chaotic Evil, no?

Spirits pass on when they die. They don't linger around, like obsessed stalkers. But they leave behind baggage. Unfilled needs, desires, hatreds. While the spirit is enjoying (or not) the afterlife, cosmic synchronicity demands that something take care of the unfinished business. That's what PolterCorp is for. They provided minimum (soul)-wage slaves who work dreary little temp jobs, while hoping against hope that some day they'll be recognized for all their hard work and be promoted to full-soul status. Sounds glamorous and dangerous and deadly, but it really isn't. The PolterCorp work in their little boxes, with little understanding of the passions driving the world they someday aspire to be a part of, have to fill out endless reports and justify every single act to petty middle managers, and lack any sense of the big picture. Not to mention a 24/7 work week and a termination package that includes... well, termination. Until that happens, they just plug along. Doing their job. Trying to garner what little pleasure they can out of scaring easily-spooked kids.

Think Beetlejuice or a dark mirror of the Celestial Bureaucracy.

JRM

03-20-2009 07:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10130011)

Poltergeist

snip

Nevertheless, the entry has a nice line in cheesy horror, and some fun descriptions: "Poltergeists are always invisible. Those who can see invisible objects describe them as humans whose features have been twisted at the sight of horrors. They wear rags and are covered with chains and other heavy objects that represent a multitude of evil deeds that these creatures have committed against themselves as well as others."; "Poltergeists often haunt families and partnerships. In the latter case, they haunt their place of business, striking almost as much terror in death as they did in life."

Speaking of cheesy horror, what about the Monstrous Manual illustration? The poltergeist looks like something that just escaped from a Scooby Doo cartoon.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10130011)

The obligatory 'huh?' note for this entry is that Poltergeists are Lawful Evil in alignment. Surely Chaotic Evil, no?

Or even Chaotic Neutral. While poltergeists may be Spooky and Ooky, they don't seem to be interested in harming or corrupting people for their own ends.

demiurge1138

03-21-2009 02:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10131484)

Speaking of cheesy horror, what about the Monstrous Manual illustration? The poltergeist looks like something that just escaped from a Scooby Doo cartoon.

.

A lot of the undead illustrations give me that feeling--the ghost and haunt are also pretty Scooby Doo-ful, and the huecuva looks like it's from an episode rejected for being "too scary".

Kakita Kojiro

03-21-2009 08:42 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10130011)

"Poltergeists are always invisible. Those who can see invisible objects describe them as humans whose features have been twisted at the sight of horrors. They wear rags and are covered with chains and other heavy objects that represent a multitude of evil deeds that these creatures have committed against themselves as well as others."

Covered with chains and objects that represent stuff? They're doomed to an eternity of wearing... evil charm bracelets?

Brandi

03-21-2009 10:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10134613)
Covered with chains and objects that represent stuff? They're doomed to an eternity of wearing... evil charm bracelets?

Shout-out to Dickens there.

JRM

03-21-2009 07:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10133021)
A lot of the undead illustrations give me that feeling--the ghost and haunt are also pretty Scooby Doo-ful, and the huecuva looks like it's from an episode rejected for being "too scary".

Yes, the ghost illustration has that "we couldn't come up with a scary monster for this episode, so just pretend this old man in a hooded robe is Fear Incarnate" look about it, which occurred in those Scooby Doo episodes where you wonder why on earth they are running away from a ghostly witch that just looks like your auntie Maude with a big fake mole stuck on her nose, going "woo-ooo-oo".
:)

Although none of them compare to the Fiend Folio's Sheet Phantom. A nice idea conceptually, but boy does the illustration fall short! :D

Incidentally, I pulled that picture from Head Injury Theatre's "CELEBRATING 30 YEARS OF VERY STUPID MONSTERS", a page I hope you're all familiar with.

Mr. Teapot

03-21-2009 09:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi (Post 10134870)
Shout-out to Dickens there.

Jacob Marley in the house, yo.

New theory: Rap stars wear heavy gold chains as punishment for their evil deeds.

noisms

03-22-2009 08:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10136485)
Jacob Marley in the house, yo.

New theory: Rap stars wear heavy gold chains as punishment for their evil deeds.

Mr. T must be one evil fellow.

Inyssiis

03-22-2009 09:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10138314)
Mr. T must be one evil fellow.

And Hurricane Katrina was penance for his sins? Now there's an adventure seed!

noisms

03-22-2009 09:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Pudding, Deadly

Unfortunately, this entry doesn't include Christmas puddings which attack you with a knife or rice puddings laced with arsenic, but "voracious, puddinglike monsters composed of groups of cell colonies that scavenge and hunt for food." I'd like to know how they gained the 'pudding' moniker.

Anyway, there's something nicely single-minded about the puddings, with their near-indestructibility, lack of morale score, and ability to follow you anywhere, no matter where you try to hide. As I think I've said before, I find the idea of mindless monsters which just want to kill you and won't give up until they have (zombies, puddings, golems, the Borg) far more scary than, say, ghosts or vampires. Something about the unreasoning will to destroy.

There are four kinds of pudding detailed, though "other pudding types are optional, at the DM's discretion". Is this the only entry in the book which explicitly says: make stuff up if you want to?

Black Pudding

Not the variety of delicious English breakfast foodstuff, but an acidic rust monster-cum amoeba which dissolves even magical armour and generally otherwise makes life difficult.

White Pudding

These lurk in ice and snow and are 50% likely to be mistaken for it. Those percentages for camouflage success are getting ridiculous. The things live on ice, but don't mind snacking on vegetable or animal matter from time to time.

Dun Pudding

These live in deserts and other arid regions, though a 'percentage for camouflage success' isn't given.

Brown Pudding

A marsh dweller, with a 'tough skin' but a rather weak attack.

So let's experiment with something: Design a Pudding. The Monstrous Manual says it's okay for us to make up new kinds, so let's do it. Hit me with your pudding ideas!

Inyssiis

03-22-2009 10:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Blue Pudding

This ooze is common in the Elemental Plane of Air, although some exist on the prime material. Semitranslucent, it spreads into odd twisting shapes (rather origami-like, at times) to catch the wind. Being thin, perfectly shaded, and partially translucent, it has a 50% chance of being mistaken for clear sky or very light, distant cloud formations even viewed from within 100 ft. In some places, huge colonies of these creatures web the lower stratosphere. On occasion, a blue pudding is forced downward due to wind conditions, slamming with great speed to the ground and splashing across the terrain. This rarely kills or injures the pudding, though anything caught beneath it is unlikely to survive.

Gray Pudding

Also known as the "assassin custard", this small ooze is gifted with astonishingly fast locomotion for the ambulatory slime that it is. It lurks in cracks and shady corners during the day, slowly digesting whatever food it can find. When night falls, the gray pudding darts out of its hiding place towards the nearest warm animal it can sense, then devours as much of the animal as it can before sunrise. Often, grown too large to fit in its previous hole but still too small for mitosis, the pudding chooses to shelter from the sun inside the still-warm, half-devoured corpse of its prey.

Thane of Fife

03-22-2009 10:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

One of the earliest d&d sort-of-things I played was a TSR boardgame called Classic Dungeon, where the players basically ran around killing monsters and taking their stuff. Anyway, most of the enemies were pretty self-explanatory, but the Black Pudding confused the heck out of me. I probably spent hours trying to figure out how black pudding was a monster.

I love how the Black Pudding is Uncommon - they're as common underground as snakes are up here!

Sleeper

03-22-2009 10:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

They're acid and acrid, salty and laden with sorrow and loss. What if puddings are tears, not of gods, but of those who came before? Powerful cthonic entities who were not so weak that they needed the worship of multitudes of mortal beings to grant them power; rather, their power was pure primordial, utterly selfish and not dependent on any outside source. Yet the gods slew them, with the collective power gleaned from the frail and inferior beings that started to fill the cosmos. They died, and their bodies and bones formed the mountains and the earth; their blood, the rivers that pool in the vast oceans. Those bodies no longer remember, except perhaps in the deepest heart of the greatest mountains, but the sadness infused in their tears lingers forever. The puddings don't think or reason, they simply know. At some primal level they remember, and lacking the ability to lash out at the gods themselves they instead hungrily devour the god's food: Us.

Inyssiis

03-22-2009 10:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Whoa. You are awesome.

Also, have you been reading Dragon Magazine lately? The Sharn is an amorphous creature made of black oil and incarnate regret, a fractured extrusion of the last remnant of the universe ruined by victorious Tharizdun in a world where primordials had won.

And thanks to your post, I now have a place to use them in my game.

Naxuul

03-22-2009 11:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Green Pudding: Living in tropical forests it hides itself among trees(40% likely to be undetected while in foliage) and drops onto living targets that pass under it. It's acidic skin has gained a coating of paralytic poisons from having digested venomous tropical plants and it's victims must save vs death or be stuck paralyzed, unable to scream as it digests them.

-Naxuul

Sleeper

03-22-2009 11:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Prismatic pudding

Ever cast a prismatic wall? Ever follow that up with a permanency? Pretty nifty defense. For a few centuries.

After that, the wall starts to melt. Slowly. Until it becomes a pool. A glittering, dazzling, multicolored pool. Prophets have gained inspiration looking in those pools. Suicides find them... attractive. Wizards and warlords have tried to tap their power. Which never quite works, by the way.

But all that attention sometimes causes a reaction. As the centuries turn into millennia, the pool starts to absorb all those impressions. Starts to awaken. Become sentient if not sapient. Finally, it extends a pseudopod. And starts moving. A prismatic pudding has formed, and leaves dazzling confusion in its wake. People freeze and stare, at the mesmerizing play of colors. Then they dissolve; or turn to stone; die writhing from poison; become insane; flash as if fried by fire, cold, or lightning; or simply vanish from this cosmos, when it runs over their foot.

But inside, it still boils with the influence of the minds that touched it. Dreams of conquest and power, the screams of the dying or the wishes of the suicidal, the existential needs of seers. So it quests, unable to speak and gain temporal power, but endlessly curious about the varieties of death and dancing along the paths of destiny to find those who serve as the axis around which all the possible futures twist and shift. The prismatic pudding is attracted to the predestined, the fated. For instance, the PCs.

Sleeper

03-22-2009 11:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10138659)

Also, have you been reading Dragon Magazine lately? The Sharn is an amorphous creature made of black oil and incarnate regret, a fractured extrusion of the last remnant of the universe ruined by victorious Tharizdun in a world where primordials had won.

Thank you. Nope. I skimmed a few issues of Dragon when it was free, but since I'm not playing in a 4E game I never subscribed (I haven't even got around to reading the core books I picked up last year). I'm vaguely aware of some of the cosmology, but know almost nothing about the details.

Inyssiis

03-22-2009 11:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10138768)

Thank you. Nope. I skimmed a few issues of Dragon when it was free, but since I'm not playing in a 4E game I never subscribed (I haven't even got around to reading the core books I picked up last year). I'm vaguely aware of some of the cosmology, but know almost nothing about the details.

It's not terribly relevant to the 4E cosmology in any case, since "those who came before" didn't win the war at the beginning of time. There could exist, however, an alternate universe in which the primordials did win; and in that world, perhaps, the Elder Elemental Eye (the mad god Tharizdun) could have actually succeeded in fulfilling his batshit loco semi-omnicidal schemes before ascending to A Higher Plane of Existence (yes, another one. On top of the whole overgod, ruler-of-everything deal). And that's where sharns might have come from.

(By the way: everything after "One rumor" under his Fourth Edition heading is ~~completely wrong. Utter nonsense, contradicting a thousand things and supporting none, baseless, and badly written to boot~~ gone now, bitches! User participation for the win!)

Sleeper

03-22-2009 12:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Blood pudding

Let's speak of Scandinavia. A certain Food Network show has been spreading a rumor. Take a big 'ol pot. Fill it with blood. Presumably, cows or something. I forget. I think I would have remembered drained human bodies, but it's likely that would have just made me block out that whole part of the episode. If it happened.

But anyway, the pot. Full of blood. Then stir in chunks of fat. Not rendered from human flesh. Again, I would have remembered. No trapping and fattening up little kids with gingerbread or whatever the modern equivalent is, perhaps Snickers. Then grab a stomach. Not a big stomach, but... well, let's not go there. Really, they wouldn't show that on basic cable, would they?

Anyway redux. Fill that stomach with blood and fat. Tie it off. Drop in a boiling pot of water. Let it sit. The whole thing apparently congeals, into an almost-bread like texture. You can slice the rich, almost black-red slices. Looks a bit like a dark sponge. And then just take a bite.

Now, imagine ogres. With a big mortar and pestle. Grinding peasants into gruel. Fat and flesh and bone shards. Strain out the bigger chunks. Skin them first of course. Scrape off the fat into the pot. What's left is blood and fat, mostly. With a few impurities. Keep the skin in one piece, have some natty elf prisoner sew it back together. Spoon in the messy slop. Drop in a pot of water on a boil. Bring in the friend neighborhood hag to chant and hum and cackle, dance naked screaming around the bonfire, wave feathers in the air and cut thumbs and spackle the start of a path with blood. That kind of thing. You can play drums, have lots of fun. Eat a few hors d'oeuvres: halflings stuffed with herbs and spitted, then roasted until they pop. The humans in the villages down below will close their shutters and try to pretend they didn't hear anything.

When the hag is done, lying there all drained and wasted by the pot, saggy old breasts heaving, bony legs trembling... something will seem to come over the edge of the boiling pot. No, not water, bubbling and burbling over the rim. Something darker, semi-liquid, semi-solid. A mass. Plop.

Down it falls, and then quickly before it singes too badly it scuttles away from the fire. You think you saw something shaped like a human, except well, squishy. Rolling in waves or flopping. Maybe along the way it picks up the hag. Who cares? But it's dark, and blends into the night. Everyone with nicked thumbs is ignored, as long as they don't get in the way. So it drifts away, downslope, along the marked path. Looking for more blood, more fat.

That's why you do it uphill. Lacking more than the most basic of directions, the thing goes down. The bulky sloppy skin thrashes its way through the underbrush, into the village. Too massive to slide under doors or suchnot, it simply pounds them down. The kirk, the inn, a few pastoral farms along the way. Slopping over the humans. Extruding the impurities that got through the net. The bone shards, like needles. Cutting them up, getting at the blood. Sucking it down. Slicing open the skin, sliding fat pseudopods inside to absorb all the fat. Shortly afterwards, the human usually dies. Barring magic of course.

The thing gets bigger. Black-red heart of semi-congealed goo, wrapped in tanned and heat-toughened human skin. Eventually, it eats too much and starts to ooze blood, leaving a dark trail behind. But even that won't sate it. Gobble, gobble. Finally, it just bursts, spraying half-decayed blood and fat all over the place. The end.

Now sleep well, my little ogre. May your dreams be filled with the sweet wails of dying humans.

JohnBiles

03-22-2009 01:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Figgy Pudding

Figgy Pudding is the revenge of every mother who warned their child that the sewer monsters would get them if they didn't eat all their food.

When food, especially desserts are wasted, the remains end up in the sewer. If a city is unlucky, the food slops into some area with residual magic and comes to life. At first it is content to roam the sewers, devouring Otyughs and eating up wasted food. But eventually that is not enough. Animated by the sheer power of urban myth, it rises from the sewers and begins to roam the streets, a great sloppy mess of half-digested food which slimes its way in pursuit of its true prey--bad children who don't eat all their food, causing it to go to waste.

Or that's what my mother told me when I refused to risk eating Uncle Brownbottle's Yule Fruitcake.

Monsieur Meuble

03-22-2009 05:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

God pudding : an unknown, quite common and generally harmless kind of pudding. You probably all have seen those great temples with the ceiling all illuminated in fantastic lights, obvious proof of the favor of the gods and the power of faith ? Well, it's not really just that. In fact, the ceiling of all those temples are colonized by a fine crust of transparent pudding feeding on divine powers. They capture either the power of the god focusing his attention on the temple and the faith of the prayer going to the Heavens, and in the process, the pudding generates light.

They became so omnipresent by traveling alongside clerics and priests. As they cast divine spells and have gods focusing on them on a daily base, they appears as a great food source and so some pudding follow them and install themselves in the next temple they visit. If possible, the pudding will try to be just over the cleric so as to capture bits of divine power during preparation or casting. So the light accompanying said casting while underground.

Now, there is two circumstances during which a god pudding can become dangerous : if starving or if overstimulated. Starving, like if it follows a priest who do not use any divine powers for days or weeks. It can then become frenzied at the moment its host connect to the divine once again and attacks it, tries to force itself inside its skull to eat its pineal gland or whatever to sustain itself on raw divine power.

Overstimulated, as in, if a high-level or worst, epic divine spell is cast in the climax of a great religious ceremony while everybody is exulting in faith, the puddings on the ceiling can enter in the equivalent of a sugar frenzy, fall from the walls and attack everyone !

If discovered for what it is in all its "mundanity" (yep, D&D worlds have a different definition of "mundane"), temples all around the world will be in a difficult position, because, well, the disinfection from god puddings is a simple security matter and will allow divine power to flow more easily... on the other hand, they make a bitching decoration and are a good indicator of the faithfulness of the attendants and how this holy place is supra holy...

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10138461)

pudding, Deadly

Unfortunately, this entry doesn't include Christmas puddings which attack you with a knife or rice puddings laced with arsenic, but "voracious, puddinglike monsters composed of groups of cell colonies that scavenge and hunt for food." I'd like to know how they gained the 'pudding' moniker.

Not necessarily, in Gary Gygax's The Land Beyond the Magic Mirror, now available as a free download from wizards, there was indeed a Black Pudding disguise as a dessert!

Anyhow, regarding puddings I find the four varieties a bit samey, apart from some differences in how fast they dissolve substances/victims and their colour, there's not much variation in them.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10138461)

So let's experiment with something: Design a Pudding. The Monstrous Manual says it's okay for us to make up new kinds, so let's do it. Hit me with your pudding ideas!

Of the ones people have posted so far, I like Inyssiuss's Gray Pudding the best. As for another one, hmm... versions of this already exists in D&D, but how about:

Crystal Pudding

With a transparent, colourless body, this pudding is almost indistinguishable from water. When moving, it looks like a small stream flowing in impossible directions - uphill, around obstacles, away from fire. Also known as the Oasis Pudding, since it often lurks in desert pools waiting to feed upon thirsty animals and travellers. After a long drought an oasis pool may be nothing but crystal pudding. It is also found in freshwater lakes and seas, scouring a path free of life while waiting for larger animals to blunder into its body, which is 90% invisible in the water.

Oasis puddings do not dissolve stone or metal, but can flow through the gaps in any armour in a round. Salt will 'melt' them, doing 1-6 damage per pound, explaining why they do not live in the ocean.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Or how about a non-deadly pudding?

Death Pudding

Despite its name and appearance, this foul-smelling green-black slime is harmless to living creatures, for it can only dissolve dead tissues. If a Death Pudding covers a human it will only digest their hair and the 'dead' portions of their finger- and toe-nails. Unfortunately, it will also eat every other scrap of non-living organic material they are carrying, including provisions, sacks, backpacks, clothes and shoes, scabbards and the leather holding their armour together.

A death pudding's cell colonies are very small and motile, allowing it to move fast for a pudding (12") and penetrate the gaps of any armour in a round.

Death puddings are sometimes deliberately cultivated to be used as waste disposals (much to the anger of the Otyugh Sewer Workers' Guild), for the cleansing of infected wounds, and dealing with unwanted undead.

It's the Puddings' answer to the Rust Monster.

DMH

03-22-2009 08:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The cata-pudding can melt stone and uses that ability to make ammo. The boulders it throws are mechanically identical to the fire giant's. One of the larger puddings, it can hold 6 boulders while sticking to a ceiling and fires one per round. Some use stone that shatters on impact and causes 3d6 points of damage to everyone within 20' (save for half).

Wave puddings are fast swimmers that sink ships to get at the crew. They look like waves moving much faster than any normal wave and cause impact damage before starting to consume a wooden hull.

Magma puddings are a danger because they have an odd tendency to seep into wells. The absence of water and a bright red glow indicates the danger before the pudding erupts onto the surface (becoming a lava pudding). They don't survive on the surface for long, but I doubt the burning village or city will care.

Wood puddings are normally in the form of a tree. Only when it is cut down does it revert to the pudding form. A nastier version stays in wood form until burned or severely dehydrated. This means furniture and interior walls may spontaneously turn into puddings with low humidity.

noisms

03-22-2009 09:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Great stuff guys. Seriously. I'm sure the regular commenters on this thread could come up with an entire new Monstrous Manual all on your own.

Sleeper

03-22-2009 11:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10139746)

The cata-pudding can melt stone and uses that ability to make ammo. The boulders it throws are mechanically identical to the fire giant's. One of the larger puddings, it can hold 6 boulders while sticking to a ceiling and fires one per round. Some use stone that shatters on impact and causes 3d6 points of damage to everyone within 20' (save fo half).

I rather like this one. Silly, but silly in a very D&D way. Scales well, too. You could have little "baby" puddin's spitting sling stones.

Anyway...

Dragon pudding

Dragons are notorious for their indiscriminate appetites, but nobody is quite sure how this pudding actually came about. Sages speculate wildly, as they usually do, about bodily fluids mixing with one of the standard types of ooze or pudding. But, again as usual, they probably don't have the foggiest idea what they're talking about.

The pudding has a dense and rough surface, as if made of dragonhide. Inside, it is fluid. The interior is caustic, and strikes of sufficient force to penetrate the skin or membrane will cause it to erupt and spit an fiery acid. With a contortion of its body, it is usually able to fire its "blood" in the direction it desires, generally to the detriment of its attacker.

Without exploiting an injury, the dragon pudding is forced to use its pseudopods to pummel its opponents, causing abrasions and injury as if struck by a huge sharkskin-covered blackjack. A carnivore, it engulfs and gradually absorbs prey by osmosis. The thick skins means process takes hours to days, and the swollen pudding is immobile and vulnerable during this period.

Pudding wyrms

The eldest dragon puddings become known as pudding wyrms, and start to develop a scabby crust on their skin. This crust starts to resemble proto-scales, and as they develop they give the pudding more of a structure. The tendency to move in one direction causes them to elongate, and take on a form similar to hydra (the animal, not the monster). On the bottom, they develop a thicker set of scales that can be retracted, exposing the inner juices. This enables the pudding wyrms to slide over their prey, retract the scales, and engulf them immediately. This is a considerably more efficient eating strategy than the standard dragon puddings', and can be used on living, struggling prey.

Caterpillar pudding

Not a true pudding at all, the so-called caterpillar pudding is actually an aggregate organism composed of the fruiting bodies of many members of a colonial fungus. From the top, it resembles a dark brown pudding with a bumpy surface. Each of the bumps is a cap, similar in appearance to the pileus of a mushroom. Each of the caps is the fruiting body of a separate individual in the colony. The fungus reacts to attacks by splitting, leaving any injured caps behind, and the rest of the "pudding" rifts along the line of the wound, separating into two or more pieces. Each of these pieces can survive as a lone entity, though if caterpillar puddings from the same colonial organism meet they will merge back again into a single organism. A large or area attack can cause a complete fissuring, with each of the hundreds of separate caps becoming its own organism temporarily, scuttling around madly until they start to join back together again. Underneath the caps, the gills have been modified to resemble cilia (or even legs; this is the source of the common name), and wave and ripple to move the organism forward. Each cap also holds spores, like a puffball. A strike will cause them to burst, causing hallucinations in most humanoids.

chronostrike

03-22-2009 11:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Here's one I created a while ago. It's formatted for 3.5, but that doesn't detract from the concept.

"The pungent odor of fermentation assaults your nose. As if from nowhere, a putrescent yellow sludge streaks toward you, its mass teeming with what appear to be countless rice grains.

HORRID RICE PUDDING CR 5

Always N Medium ooze (swarm)

Init +6; Senses blind, blindsight 60ft.; Listen -5

Languages –

AC 18, touch 18, flat-footed 12

(+2 size, +6 dex)

Hp 61 (6 HD)

Immune ooze immunities, swarm immunities

Resist fire 10, sonic 10, half damage from piercing and slashing

Fort +5, Ref +9, Will -3

Weakness swarm vulnerabilities

Speed 30 ft. (6 squares), climb 20 ft., swim 30 ft.

Melee swarm (2d6)

Space 10 ft.; Reach 0 ft.

Base Atk +4; Grp –

Atk Options distraction

Abilities Str 6, Dex 24, Con 16, Int –, Wis 1, Cha 1

SA distraction, fermentation, adhesive

SQ swarm traits, ooze traits, cohesive form

Feats –

Skills –

Advancement –

Distraction (Ex) Fortitude DC 16, nauseated 1 round, The save DC is Constitution-based.

Cohesive Form (Ex) A horrid rice pudding is composed of fine creatures, but, because of the coterminous slime, it is considered a swarm of tiny creatures instead. A horrid rice pudding is susceptible to spells and effects that target a single creature.

Fermentation (Ex) Any creature that begins its turn with a horrid rice pudding in its square is subject to its poisonous vapors. Inhalation, Fortitude DC 16, 1d3 Wis/-. The save DC is Constitution-based.

Adhesive (Ex) Any creature that takes damage from a horrid rice pudding's swarm attack must make a strength check DC 16 or be entangled for 1 round. The save DC is Constitution-based.

A horrid rice pudding is a symbiotic creature composed of a colony of fine white aberrations living in a sentient slurry of sugar and water. It acts only to feed, seeking out any form of soft organic matter to satisfy its hunger. The ooze provides the relationship with its mobility, and the colony reciprocates by devouring any creatures the ooze touches, converting it into a paste that the ooze can then consume.

I don't know the advancement rules, so I left that blank. If anyone wants to use this, I declare it OGL."

JRM

03-22-2009 11:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Spitting Pudding

A vile-looking mound of puce-yellow slime, this pudding can spit globs of itself up to 15" away. A Spitting Pudding loses 1 hit dice for every glob it spits out, and cannot reduce its own HD below 6. Each glob is a small pudding capable of doing as much damage as its parent, when it finished devouring any food in its vicinity it returns to its parent mass which then recovers a lost HD.

Sticky Pudding

A semi-translucent white-grey pudding, this pudding does little damage but is coated in an adhesive stronger than that of a mimic. The Sticky Pudding covers its territory in a layer of this adhesive mucus, which is almost invisible in poor light, then patrols it to devour creatures that blunder into its glue and become stuck. They are somehow able to sense through their mucus whenever a large creature becomes stuck, and slowly but inexorably crawl towards them to be engulfed and digested.

Thane of Fife

03-23-2009 12:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Off Pudding

The off pudding is a brownish-green in color and smells terrible. Any creature which smells this creature must make a saving throw vs. poison or be unable to eat (and hold down) any food for 2d8 hours. The off pudding itself feeds primarily upon creatures which it has starved to death, as it can be very difficult to locate and kill.

JRM

03-23-2009 12:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10140202)

Off Pudding

The off pudding is a brownish-green in color and smells terrible. Any creature which smells this creature must make a saving throw vs. poison or be unable to eat (and hold down) any food for 2d8 hours. The off pudding itself feeds primarily upon creatures which it has starved to death, as it can be very difficult to locate and kill.

I'd have thought it mainly feeds off the food the creatures were unable to hold down.

Which rather reminds me of the insect in one of Expeditionary Retreat's d20 supplements (A Magical Society: Ecology and Culture if I remember correctly) which had a magical power to persuade passing lifeforms to produce the food it prefers - let's just say it was a variety of dung beetle at leave it at that.

Sleeper

03-23-2009 01:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Peasant pudding

A vaguely greyish color and slightly tacky, like wallpaper paste. Dissolves almost anything organic, but slowly. You'd have to set it on your skin for days before it started to burn. Flavorless, but modestly filling and at least somewhat nutritious. Not a full balanced meal but any means, but you won't starve on it, either. Hence, the name. Peasants toss it in a barn with all the organic leavings, from horse and sheep dung to straw and chaff and rotted fruits and vegetables. And in lean times, they can stretch their meals with a little pudding, and make do. Probably saved more lives than cure light wounds.

JRM

03-23-2009 02:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Peas Pudding

Unlike other puddings, where the individual animals in the colony keep in contact, the pieces of a peas pudding colony spend most of their life separated from each other, communicating with each other via pheromones. These monsters are found in habitats without a regular source of food, where meals are often rare and substantial, usually subterranean labyrinths.

Each animal of the peas pudding can enter a cyst-like state in which it can survive without food or water for decades. In this form, it resembles an inanimate piece of detritus like a dried-out pea, piece of gravel or misshapen cave-pearl, depending on local conditions and the particular strain of peas pudding. The cysts are scattered several inches apart, and the entire encysted monster can cover an area of ground up to 80 feet in diameter.

The pudding remains in this state until something edible comes in contact with some of its 'peas'. As soon as a pea tastes contact with animal or vegetable matter, it almost instantly metamorphs into a livid green flattened mushy-looking blob and rolls onto the food and begins to eat. At the same time, it emits a scent that alerts the rest of the colony to awaken and feed. The first round any creatures upon the pudding take 1 point of damage per hit, the second round they may take 1-3 damage, the third round 1-6, the fourth round they would each take 2-12 and in the fifth the pudding delivers its full damage of 4-24 per hit. If any of the peas are crushed they release a stronger scent that accelerates the awakening process, since this either indicates an intruder that's heavy enough to be a substantial meal or one that's a threat. In such cases the intruder takes no damage on the first round, since they have killed the pea they stepped upon, but take 1-6 on the second and the full 4-24 on the third.

Soon the entire colony will have gathered into one or more masses around any meals that have wandered onto their body. Once these initial meals are eaten, the peas pudding coalesces into a single mass 3-8 feet in diameter and roams around randomly to see if it can scent any further meals. If it fails to find anything after a few hours, the pudding spreads itself out tenfold and returns to its dormant state.

JRM

03-23-2009 03:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10140152)

Here's one I created a while ago. It's formatted for 3.5, but that doesn't detract from the concept.

"The pungent odor of fermentation assaults your nose. As if from nowhere, a putrescent yellow sludge streaks toward you, its mass teaming with what appear to be countless rice grains.

SNIP

*-----
I don't know the advancement rules, so I left that blank. If anyone wants to use this, I declare it OGL."*

Well swarms don't usually advance, so you don't need to worry about that if you don't want to. Oozes tend to advance to three times their base HD, with a size category raise for the last third (so a 6HD Ooze would be 7-12 HD = size; 13-18 HD = size+1).

Dex 24 seems rather high to me, but it's your beastie.

Espresso

03-23-2009 07:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The thought of how otyughs would approach religion is a fascinating (and disturbing) one.

Ratoslov

03-23-2009 07:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Life Pudding and Death Pudding, both the results of really poorly-thought out magical experiments involving crossing positive and negative energies with huge amoebas. Life pudding is a softly glowing blue, while Death Pudding glows purple. Life Pudding is invaluable for making healing potions, and capturing one alive is excellent. They feed upon undead by making them explode with positive energy; when threatened, they'll seize upon a living creature and make it explode as well. Death Pudding is much rarer and much more dangerous; it absorbs any life it touches, and raises it in undead form. Any life. Ever seen an entire forest of undead trees and grass, with roving bands of undead squirrels? That happened once. That was the fault of one Death Pudding. Individually, they're not that dangerous, though.

DMH

03-23-2009 08:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Brain puddings are wizards who tried life extension and succeeded, sort of. They don't have hands but can speak and most have servants who do the physical part of research. They don't age any more and can eat just about anything. Unfortunately they are vulnerable to torches and pitchforks.

For Spelljammer, there is the moon pudding. It can be from size A to E (using the planet scale in the boxset). They start as size A bodies and try to crash onto larger planets, consuming everything.

Stone puddings don't have a strong acid. They pick up objects, stone and metal, and use them to smash prey to bloody bits. Minimum damage is 5d8.

I mentioned holy droplets in my Mutant Future thread- a swarm of tiny, intelligent puddings that worship light. They kill people who don't give them light at night, though a continual light spell usually results in their starving to death.

Sleeper

03-23-2009 08:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Pudding molds

Nobody's quite sure where these came from. They're odd at best, and trying to pin them to one culture and one time period always results in a lot of head scratching. What they are is paired blocks, carved into the relief shape of various objects. Molds, like those used to cast metals. Except pour a pudding into one, and somehow it sets. Permanently, into that shape. There's one in the shape of a giant ewer, which isn't terribly useful. There's also an orb, a strange burst pattern, and the best known one: A cast in the shape of a sword. Apparently a bronze shortsword because iron and steel don't need to be that thick to be strong. But pour a black pudding into there, or a gray pudding, and you have a black sword or a gray sword with all the properties of the original pudding. Even hunger. Left unfed, they starve. Which means it's important to make the right hilt. One that doesn't dissolve, and doesn't let it dissolve you.

demiurge1138

03-24-2009 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10139684)

Not necessarily, in Gary Gygax's The Land Beyond the Magic Mirror, now available as a free download from wizards, there was indeed a Black Pudding disguise as a dessert!

Which reminds me. The very first D&D game I ran was a sprawling Gygaxian dungeon crawl, as conceived by a kid who (at that point) had never actually read a sprawling Gygaxian dungeon crawl. The dungeon was the stronghold of a kobold sorcerer with a wicked sense of humor. In his pantry, the adventurers found such things as Frosted Unlucky Charms, cans of "Sprite" (poor, delicious sprites) and a giant wooden barrel labeled "Pudding".

Guess what they immediately opened. And regretted opening.

Lukas Sjöström

03-24-2009 04:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10139684)

Not necessarily, in Gary Gygax's The Land Beyond the Magic Mirror, now available as a free download from wizards, there was indeed a Black Pudding disguise as a dessert!

Black pudding for dessert? :confused:

Monsieur Meuble

03-24-2009 06:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Rage Pudding or, as a visitor from an other universe called it "the Doom Comics Guy Pudding", nobody knows why : Living a mysterious life circle, the rage pudding eats guts. From the inside. Sages supposed that they develop in two phases. The young live in the guts of large herbivorous animals, feeding of what is inside with harming the host, then the beasty get eaten by a carnivore and inside the predator, the larvae become adults, reproduce, slowly digest the host from inside but also give him a predation / eating frenzy, resulting in a larger area of action and lots of pooping in which nests the eggs, that will get eaten by an herbivore, and so on.

The important thing is that barbarian tribes will seeks carnivore carcass or, well, hunt the predators into becoming carcasses and search in the guts of the deceased a gelatinous red mass and store it, giving it occasionally bits of guts to keep it alive until needed.

Needed for what ? Well, the coalescent gel of the rage pudding contains actually a shitload of adrenaline, testosterone and other rage-inducing chemicals. So as to make the predator host travel a lot, kill a lot, eat a lot and shit a lot.

So, just before the battle, barbarian warriors in a dire need of a boost to take a glorious last stand or something ingest the rage pudding, allowing for several more instances of Berserk trance a day, at the cost of ultimately die in a painful manner. Rage pudding eaters having survived their supposed last battle will often prefer to stay in berserk trance permanently instead of feeling their guts being slowly digested from inside, and so become dangerous for every one around and will probably have to exile themselves far away in a moment of consciousness and pain, so spreading the pudding farther away...

It's a good thing that no rage-pudding-induced barbarian has been arrested by the police forces of a large town (as they try to NOT stay in town while berserk), because he would probably have to excrete and its offals would fall into the sewers and next thing you know you have othyughs running everywhere shouting "U ! U haz hueg gutz ! RIP AND TEAR ! "

On the other hand, some Evil Military Leaders, having heard of those glorious shamanic barbaric traditions, have began to stock and breed rage puddings to administer them their foot soldiers before the battle (any battle) without telling them about the side effects, just that it will make them stronger or something. So, you turned a bunch of 1st level men-at-arms in berserk 1st level men-at-arms and if they survive the battle, well, it's like it's someone who matters who will die painfully or, well, spend their last hours blindly burning and pillaging everything, as if they would have done differently !

noisms

03-24-2009 11:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sorry for the brief delay. I cracked a few ribs playing football the other day, so sitting at the computer for long periods ain't pretty. Great puddings, everyone.

Quaggoth

Everybody's favourite polar-bear-crossed-with-a-neanderthal, Quaggoths are basically big ugly white things which go "Ug!" a lot, though with some propensity towards psionics.

There isn't a huge amount to say about them. There's nothing wrong with them, but nor is there especially anything inspiring in the background or culture. The 'fallen civilisation' motif is interesting, I suppose: what kind of civilisation did the Old Quaggoths have? What architecture did they build? What knowledge did they uncover? What treasures did they make? Sounds like a job for intrepid adventurers...

demiurge1138

03-24-2009 01:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

For some reason, quaggoths always struck me as much more interesting "crazy killer humanoids" than most of the rest of the MM--orcs, ogres, bugbears, etc. I think it's the multiple cultures thing. There are some quaggoths who believe that they should fight with the weapons the gods gave them and are feral claws-and-teeth berzerkers. Then there are the ones that have learned skills, make weaponry, dye their fur black for camouflage, that sort of thing.

I mean, how often is there a D&D species that isn't a monoculture? Usually you need different sub-races for that sort of thing, but nothing doing here. It's actually just cultural, not mechanical, differences. Very refreshing.

Sleeper

03-24-2009 01:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

"Quaggoth" isn't the best name, but it has a definite pulp-era sword & sorcery feel. I could see Burroughs writing about a monster called a quaggoth.

On the other hand, whoever came up with the name for their shamans in 2E has a lot to answer for: "Thonot" is so not a good name. :p

JRM

03-24-2009 07:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lukas Sjöström (Post 10145133)
Black pudding for dessert? :confused:

How did that typo get in there? I could have sworn I wrote black pudding disguised as a dessert. Oh well, it's too late to fix the original post.

Anyhow, in the module in question the grand finale has them invited to a 'victory feast' where the hosts, waiters and most of the dishes are camouflaged monsters. Including the aforesaid Black Pudding, which is masquerading as a plum pudding.

JRM

03-24-2009 07:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10143235)

Brain puddings are wizards who tried life extension and succeeded, sort of. They don't have hands but can speak and most have servants who do the physical part of research. They don't age any more and can eat just about anything. Unfortunately they are vulnerable to torches and pitchforks.

For Spelljammer, there is the moon pudding. It can be from size A to E (using the planet scale in the boxset). They start as size A bodies and try to crash onto larger planets, consuming everything.

Stone puddings don't have a strong acid. They pick up objects, stone and metal, and use them to smash prey to bloody bits. Minimum damage is 5d8.

Hmm, I can see some room for overlap here - maybe the Stone Pudding and the Cata-Pudding are one and the same, they chuck stones at range and wallop opponents with them up close?

As for the Brain Pudding, I'm thinking a sensible superintelligent archmage ooze would create various 'shells' it could pour itself into and walk around in so as to interact with the the outside world in the guise of a humanoid. Then when the PCs 'kill' the wizard by splitting its skull so its brains leak out the brains wait for them to leave and then ooze off to insert themselves into their hidden back-up body.

JRM

03-24-2009 07:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Oh, and here's another puddin' to add to the list:

Sponge Pudding

This yellow-white pudding has a foam-like lightweight body, meaning it floats atop water like a cork. A sponge pudding eats flesh, stone and metal more slowly than an average pudding, but is still highly feared for it also eats magic. The pudding possesses complete immunity to magic, any spell cast upon a sponge pudding is absorbed without harm to the pudding, causing it to grow 1 hp per spell level. It can "smell" magic within 12" as if using detect magic, and will slither toward the strongest source it can detect in order to devour it. Slashing weapons do normal damage to a sponge pudding, as does mundane fire and acid.

JRM

03-24-2009 08:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10146503)

Sorry for the brief delay. I cracked a few ribs playing football the other day, so sitting at the computer for long period ain't pretty. Great puddings, everyone.

Sorry to hear about your injuries Noisms, hope you have a speedy recovery.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10146503)

Quaggoth

Everybody's favourite polar-bear-crossed-with-a-neanderthal, Quaggoths are basically big ugly white things which g "Ug!" a lot, though with some propensity towards psionics.

There isn't a huge amount to say about them. There's nothing wrong with them, but nor is there especially anything inspiring in the background or culture. The 'fallen civilisation' motif is interesting, I suppose: what kind of civilisation did the Old Quaggoths have? What architecture did they build? What knowledge did they uncover? What treasures did they make? Sounds like a job for intrepid adventurers...

For some reason, I'm imagining an ancient Quaggoth civilization with a strong emphasis on fur care. Maybe the reason Quaggoths are so hostile is that they are infested with a variety of lice that make them highly irritable. Thus, it wasn't the wheel or the stirrup which was the invention that brought them into civilization, but the comb. It wasn't until they were free of the perpetual pain of their lice-parasites that the ancient Quaggoths were able to lock the potential of their psionic gifts and build the mind-empire of the white-furred bear-men, where the most prominent members of their society were indicated by the elaborateness of their coiffeur, which reflected how much leisure/luxury time they possessed and the skill and number of their mind-slaved fur stylists. Obviously, elves and dwarves were the best at this task (elves, of course, are famous for their skill at hairstyling and dwarves created all the jewellery, accessories, fur-curlers and other objects that accentuated their Quaggoth master's fur-style).

The Rebellion of the Barbers was inevitable, and the few surviving Quaggoths fled into the underworld to nurse their hate as the dreaded lice returned to drag them back to brutedom.

DMH

03-24-2009 08:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10146905)

I mean, how often is there a D&D species that isn't a monoculture? Usually you need different sub-races for that sort of thing, but nothing doing here. It's actually just cultural, not mechanical, differences. Very refreshing.

I would agree but for the fact it was already done with lizardmen. If they have more than just primitive vs advanced, then it would have made them more interesting. Divine casters vs psions or psions that concentrate on different sciences.

Are Barsoom white apes psionic? I know they don't look like quaggoth but I wonder if there was some inspiration (like the osquip).

Lukas Sjöström

03-24-2009 08:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10147665)

How did that typo get in there? I could have sworn I wrote black pudding disguised as a dessert. Oh well, it's too late to fix the original post.

Anyhow, in the module in question the grand finale has them invited to a 'victory feast' where the hosts, waiters and most of the dishes are camouflaged monsters. Including the aforesaid Black Pudding, which is masquerading as a plum pudding.

It wasn't the typo, it was the fact that black pudding is a rather bizarre choice for a dessert. Masquerading as a plum pudding, now that I can understand.

Sleeper

03-24-2009 10:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10147768)

I would agree but for the fact it was already done with lizardmen. If they have more than just primitive vs advanced, then it would have made them more interesting. Divine casters vs psions or psions that concentrate on different sciences.

I like the idea of magical casters vs. psionics. Say the more advanced kind favor magicians as leaders, the iz'zho. The primitive versions are led by the psionic shamans, the thonot. Their apprentices, who have a tendency to go out on lakes and have sex, which results in most of them getting killed by berserk quaggoth wearing white plastic masks, are called the thonotty. :D

Wakboth

03-24-2009 10:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10146938)

"Quaggoth" isn't the best name, but it has a definite pulp-era sword & sorcery feel. I could see Burroughs writing about a monster called a quaggoth.

Or CAS or REH writing about an ancient, pre-Hyperborean quasi-human civilization of Quaggoths, no doubt worshipping Tsathoggua!

Sleeper

03-24-2009 10:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10148176)

Or CAS or REH writing about an ancient, pre-Hyperborean quasi-human civilization of Quaggoths, no doubt worshipping Tsathoggua!

That definitely fits with the cannibalistic whistling and the rumors that they once dominated the Underdark through conquest and ritual sacrifice. Might also tie it to their hunting ritual... perhaps it's actually a kind of spell or invocation that dedicates the soul of their slain prey to Tsathoggua. This foils a simple raise dead, and you could have the PCs run across a terrified woman being hunted by the quaggoth, who jumps off a cliff (to preserve her immortal soul), rather than letting them kill her. The quaggoth might endlessly roam the the Underdark not for the traditional reasons nomads wander (to follow herds of prey, like rothe), but because their practices spook even the other malevolent Underdark races, who drive them away from any new bolthole they find.

demiurge1138

03-25-2009 03:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10148227)

The quaggoth might endlessly roam the the Underdark not for the traditional reasons nomads wander (to follow herds of prey, like rothe), but because their practices spook even the other malevolent Underdark races, who drive them away from any new bolthole they find.

The MM does say that the sages theorize that quaggoths used to have a civilization underground, before its power was broken by the drow, duergar and/or illithids. Perhaps even they were horrified by the quaggoth's cult of Tsathoggua, and waged war against the civilization of soul-stealers in order to protect themselves for their own dark gods.

noisms

03-25-2009 10:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Rakshasa

Are we at the Rs already? This book really is front-loaded. In fact, I'd guess we're about three quarters through by now. The beautiful dream is almost over. (sniff)

Anyway, I do love the Rakshasa, even if as a Ravenloft beastie I have to officially look down my nose at it. Diterlizzi really outdid himself on the art, for one thing - the picture for this entry is easily one of the top 10 in the book. But I think the designers also did a good job by playing up the folk-tale/mythological aspects of the creature - from the backwards-curving hands to the way a new generation is produced every century to replace the dead. And let's face it - it's also unusual to have a creature from Hindu mythology in the MM. I can't think of many others offhand. In itself that makes the creature stand out.

Rakshasa seem tailor-made to function as lieutenants to BBEGs, though I used to toy with the idea of a Rakshasa empire as part of a game world. (I think Eberron has this? I don't know much about that setting.) I've also thought of reworking Rakshasa as orc-equivalents in an Indian-inspired setting - low-grade demonic beings, the rank-and-file minions of evil gods, with minor illusionary powers and poisonous claws.

YojimboC

03-25-2009 10:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10152857)

Are we at the Rs already? This book really is front-loaded. In fact, I'd guess we're about three quarters through by now. The beautiful dream is almost over. (sniff)

Yeah... what are we going to do when this thread is over?

Quote:

Rakshasa seem tailor-made to function as lieutenants to BBEGs, though I used to toy with the idea of a Rakshasa empire as part of a game world. (I think Eberron has this? I don't know much about that setting.) I've also thought of reworking Rakshasa as orc-equivalents in an Indian-inspired setting - low-grade demonic beings, the rank-and-file minions of evil gods, with minor illusionary powers and poisonous claws.

Yes, Eberron has lots of Rakshasha love and I completely stole the idea for my homebrew -- an Aztec-themed empire by way of Hindu mythology, with a little bit of Kalamar's Pel Brolenon thrown in. Because, as I always say, steal from the best sources.

Rakshashas are great low-level demon types, and they work equally well in city or wilderness or dungeon settings, thanks to their disguise abilities. "Bless" is a pretty low-level spell for an insta-kill on such cool monsters (if I'm remembering correctly), but on the other hand, if the PCs don't know they're up against Shere

Khan, then they may not be prepared.

Hellzon

03-25-2009 10:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10152857)

And let's face it - it's also unusual to have a creature from Hindu mythology in the MM.

Which is really odd, considering the amount of weird beasties roaming that part of folklore.

Rakshasas in 4E are pretty boss. Deva (the new aasimar) reincarnate after death. An evil Deva returns as a Rakshasa (and keeps reincarnating). A blessed crossbow bolt stops the Rakshasa's reincarnation.

...Which kind of implies that 4E Rakshasa are very old souls and have vague memories of having worked on the good side.

Sleeper

03-25-2009 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10152884)

Rakshashas are great low-level demon types, and they work equally well in city or wilderness or dungeon settings, thanks to their disguise abilities. "Bless" is a pretty low-level spell for an insta-kill on such cool monsters (if I'm remembering correctly), but on the other hand, if the PCs don't know they're up against Shere Khan, then they may not be prepared.

D&D never quite seemed to know what to do with them. The original AD&D rakshasa is a very weird beast. Weakish fighting type with a few illusory powers, uber-magical defenses, and a strange vulnerability. There was an article way back when in Dragon (#84, "Never the same thing twice") where the author sort of scratched his head at the weirdness, but beefed them up by adding rakshasa knights and lords who were fiercer combatants. The article also mentioned the whole backward claw thing, summarized parts of the Ramayana (which is never a bad thing), and even had stats for Ravana. Mystara also had the rakasta, but they were basically just cat people. Stealing more from Indian myth is always a good idea.

ESkemp

03-26-2009 12:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Man, I love rakshasas. I absolutely have intentions of someday placing a rakshasa empire in a D&D game, thoroughly inspired by the descriptions of Golden Lanka from the Ramayana. Perhaps it'll be situated high in the mountains, in a lush tropical valley protected on all sides: making the rakshasas hard to invade, but the good news is that they also can't really expand their borders as easily as you might expect. There would also have to be at least one Vibishana-type, a sympathetic rakshasa who refutes the path of his bestial kin in favor of enlightenment.

They'd need more default forms, though. The emphasis on cats would have to go; we need beautiful rakshasis, multi-headed kings, demons dark like thunderclouds with golden earrings (one of my favorite descriptions), hags with huge ears... make them grotesque and gorgeous and varied.

Come to think of it, it would be easy to roll everything oni and ogre mage-ish into the rakshasa fold if you want more stat blocks. That would add more diversity, and since they tend to fill similar mythological roles, you'd need only minor tweaking to really come up with a diverse lot of rakshasas.

randomgamer8466

03-26-2009 12:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Pudding pops:

This Lawful Good pudding is a medium brown color and has an air of sophistication; it could play a doctor on a TV show. The pudding pops has the same impersonation ability as a leucrotta but usually just uses this power to mimic funny voices for entertainment purposes. It can speak perfect common although it takes a lot of strangely timed pauses and erratically varies its speaking volume, stressing random words for no comprehensible reason. The strangest trait of the pudding pops is that it makes an excellent father; it might bumble humorously in its parenting tasks but in the end will come through, keeping its children safe and passing on some folksy wisdom in the process. Some adventurers, unable to find babysitters, will leave their own children in the excellent care of a pudding pops.

YojimboC

03-26-2009 12:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by ES Kemp (Post 10153417)

They'd need more default forms, though. The emphasis on cats would have to go; we need beautiful rakshasis, multi-headed kings, demons dark like thunderclouds with golden earrings (one of my favorite descriptions), hags with huge ears... make them grotesque and gorgeous and varied.

Come to think of it, it would be easy to roll everything oni and ogre mage-ish into the rakshasa fold if you want more stat blocks. That would add more diversity, and since they tend to fill similar mythological roles, you'd need only minor tweaking to really come up with a diverse lot of rakshasas.

/stolen/

Lukas Sjöström

03-26-2009 01:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10153334)

Mystara also had the rakasta, but they were basically just cat people.

Cat people love Finns?

Wakboth

03-26-2009 01:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've heard that the "blessed crossbow bolt" thing came from Kolchak, the Night Stalker. It doesn't originate in the Indian mythology, as far as I know...

They were changed into more mechanically reasonable critters in 3.5; instead of being instantly slain by blessed crossbow bolts, they had DR/good and piercing, and instead of a blanket immunity to spells, they just had a very high SR.

Anyway, Rakshasas are great monsters; IMO, they make great honorable villains, doing terrible things but with a certain panache and twisted nobility. You can be sure that if your party kicks in the room to a rakshasa's dining room, he will address you politely and offer you some curried baby before you get into the fight.

demiurge1138

03-26-2009 02:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10153695)

Anyway, Rakshasas are great monsters; IMO, they make great honorable villains, doing terrible things but with a certain panache and twisted nobility. You can be sure that if your party kicks in the room to a rakshasa's dining room he will address you politely and offer you some curried baby before you get into the fight.

Last time I ran a rakshasa, he served the party their roasted nemesis with an apple in his mouth and let them sleep under his roof for a night before getting down to business. And they negotiated! The rakshasa put them under geas spells to prevent them from spilling the secret that he was a rakshasa, in exchange for letting them leave with what they came for--it was of little further use to him.

Of course, both the PCs and the rakshasa are planning to betray the hell out of each other at the next possible opportunity.

For some reason, I tend to think of rakshasas as go-to BBEGs, not as lieutenants. A game I ran a long time ago also featured one of the few BBEGs my players never caught up to, the rakshasa art dealer Locke. His modus operandi involved the sale of high level magic items, usually to people/monsters who did not deserve that sort of power, and planning elaborate heists to get at items that were otherwise claimed (although never participating in them directly, of course).

Sleeper

03-26-2009 04:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

To completely mix entirely unrelated things that just happen to have the same name, what about combining rakshasas with Arthur C. Clarke's Rama?

Months before, omens like birds in strange numbers and configurations, fierce monsters becoming tame and lying down with friendly ones, comets and falling stars, or three people stumbling and accidentally cutting their own heads off in the same day, start to occur and grow more and more common and improbable. A couple days before, a great storm comes up on the sea, accompanied by odd meteorological phenomena like seven water spouts standing almost motionless before a cliff, lights like the aurora borealis dancing around steeples, sun beams breaking the cloud cover in the middle of the night, and so forth. Prophets have dreams of strange red-faced monsters and cats with human eyes. All anybody can figure out is something big, something important, and something alien is coming from far, far away.

Then, far offshore, a giant vessel is spotted. Miles long. The sails are strangely configured, and the way they move and catch the light makes them look like they're made of glass spun into gossamer. The body of the ship is dark and hunkering as if made of mahogany, and elaborately carved or shaped. Tiger-striped whales the size of galleons with manes and extra eyes on their tail sport around it like dolphins. Moving parallel to the coast at a good pace, it will be within known waters for about a week. Catching it is difficult, generally serendipitous (a small ship accidentally happens to cross its prow) or magical (a sailing vessel propelled by a magical wind, wind walkers, pegasus-riders, etc).

Getting on is the first trick. There are spurs and whorls, but no deck, and no visible doors. The convoluted structure is beautiful, but unlike any known form of vessel. Surfaces reflect like sudden mirrors, structures change shape when not closely watched, odd humming and music is heard. If they do manage to breach the hull or otherwise gain ingress, the strangeness is only started. Rat- and cat-faced demons. Blue skinned giants, crawling things with a thousand heads.

Even worse, the first night there is a huge shudder. A huge sound, which would be beautiful music if it wasn't so painful. A rainbow of lights. And even if they find their way back out of the vessel, they are no longer home. The ship has started the long journey again, between worlds. It is nowhere and everywhere, and will not make port again for more than a year.

JRM

03-26-2009 06:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10152857)

Rakshasa

Are we at the Rs already? This book really is front-loaded. In fact, I'd guess we're about three quarters through by now. The beautiful dream is almost over. (sniff)

Anyway, I do love the Rakshasa, even if as a Ravenloft beastie I have to officially look down my nose at it. Diterlizzi really outdid himself on the art, for one thing - the picture for this entry is easily one of the top 10 in the book. But I think the designers also did a good job by playing up the folk-tale/mythological aspects of the creature - from the backwards-curving hands to the way a new generation is produced every century to replace the dead. And let's face it - it's also unusual to have a creature from Hindu mythology in the MM. I can't think of many others offhand. In itself that makes the creature stand out.

Ravenloft beastie?! I always think of their appearance in the 1E AD&D Monster Manual myself.

Sadly, I haven't used the Rakshasa much although they make great central villains and schemers behind the throne. I do like Eskemp's Rakshasa empire idea.

Anyhow, from my limited experience with rakshasa's many parties find it nigh-impossible to damage them since they require high-magic or prepped blessed quarrels to kill. As a result (and I've experienced this myself) encounters with a rakshasa often go "meet a phoney-friendly PC, realize it's a rakshasa and you can't harm it, run away, prepare lots of blessed crossbow bolts, come back and kill it with the first hit".

Now there is a blog somewhere on the wizards website where the staff play through a 3E campaign in which they have an encounter with an "old hermit" in a jungle temple which basically went just like this, which got me thinking "why would a rakshasa stick around to be shih-kebabled" which got my evil DM's brain turning, what if a rakshasa wants the PCs to come back armed for tiger-demon?

Imagine if you will, the party encounter an ancient hermit in a jungle temple, who acts so suspicious one of them casts an illusion-penetrating spell and realizes he's a rakshasa. So they run off and spend the night prepping all those blessed crossbow bolts and return to bushwack the hermit. As they're standing over his corpse congratulating themselves a delegation from the local villages arrives. They are a bit put out to find out that a rakshasa has fooled some adventurers into murdering their holy man, who had just returned that morning from a trip to the capital. :)

EDIT: As for the 'killed by a blessed crossbow bolt' story, I half-suspect it has some root from before the Kolchak episode referred to. There are Indian legends of various heroes defeating/slaying rakshasas with their fantastic archery skills, but (a) as far as I know they don't say that's the best way of killing a rakshasa, just that archery was the hero in question's best combat skill, and (b) I can only remember bow & arrows being used, not crossbows & bolts. Maybe that's what gave the writers of Kolchak: Night Stalker the idea? Assuming it's not just a variant on the old "stake through a vampire's heart" trick.

demiurge1138

03-26-2009 07:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10155166)

Imagine if you will, the party encounter an ancient hermit in a jungle temple, who acts so suspicious one of them casts an illusion-penetrating spell and realizes he's a rakshasa. So they run off and spend the night prepping all those blessed crossbow bolts and return to bushwack the hermit. As they're standing over his corpse congratulating themselves a delegation from the local villages arrives. They are a bit put out to find out that a rakshasa has fooled some adventurers into murdering their holy man, who had just returned that morning from a trip to the capital. :)

On a similar note, a Dragon Magazine article in the late 3.0 days had monstrous cultist classes, for villains who wanted to turn themselves into approximations of the monsters they served/worshiped/emulated. The rakshasa-themed class did something similar--not only did those taking the class more and more resemble a rakshasa, but they had the supernatural ability to attract ranged weapons like a magnet. Whether they wanted to or not.

Thane of Fife

03-26-2009 09:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

While I've never used a Rakshasa in a game of AD&D, my fondest memory of one was from a game of How to Host a Dungeon, where a rakshasa settled under a city and proceeded to attack the city and take their treasure every single turn. Since rakshasa grow more powerful as they acquire more treasure in that game, and the city was constantly being sent more treasure, I very quickly ended up with an unkillable rakshasa, feeding off of the city over its head.

Naxuul

03-26-2009 10:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I find it odd how the 2nd ed description of Rakshasa listed several types of animals they could look like and suggested tigers and gorillas as the most common, but ever since then they have been cat people. Plus the multi-headed noble rakshasa completely disappear. Actually I notice the snake tailed noble lamia went away too.

-Naxuul

Mikaze

03-26-2009 10:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

To this day it's the rakshasa's backwards bending fingers that get to me the most.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul (Post 10156235)

I find it odd how the 2nd ed description of Rakshasa listed several types of animals they could look like and suggested tigers and gorillas as the most common, but ever since then they have been cat people. Plus the multi-headed noble rakshasa completely disappear. Actually I notice the snake tailed noble lamia went away too.

-Naxuul

Paizo brought all that back to 3.x in their first two Pathfinder APs IIRC. Lamia Matriarchs and Rakshasa Maharajas I believe, along with non-tiger headed rakshasas. A number of other lamia types were put forth too, but some of them stepped out of the bounds of what you might expect from lamia/s/e/ii/seses.

HaplessVictim

03-26-2009 11:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I always loved the Rakshasas, too, but was never quite sure what to do with them. As an earlier poster mentioned, they're this strange grab-bag of spells, weaknesses and strengths which made them hard to DM well. They also had this Kzin-like feel that put me off for some reason.

The blessed crossbow bolt instakill felt like the kernel of a great idea, but not quite a good one on its own, if you know what I mean. If I were to redesign the rakshasa, I'd make the weakness something more in tune with their overall concept. Since they "savor fresh human meat," perhaps eating the flesh of a truly good human kills them.

DMH

03-26-2009 09:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10153334)

There was an article way back when in Dragon (#84, "Never the same thing twice") where the author sort of scratched his head at the weirdness

He must have never watched Kolchak since some of the creature's abilities and the blessed bolt weakness are straight from one episode.

noisms

03-26-2009 09:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 10156548)

I always loved the Rakshasas, too, but was never quite sure what to do with them. As an earlier poster mentioned, they're this strange grab-bag of spells, weaknesses and strengths which made them hard to DM well. They also had this Kzin-like feel that put me off for some reason.

The blessed crossbow bolt instakill felt like the kernel of a great idea, but not quite a good one on its own, if you know what I mean. If I were to redesign the rakshasa, I'd make the weakness something more in tune with their overall concept. Since they "savor fresh human meat," perhaps eating the flesh of a truly good human kills them.

That has quite a nice mythological feel to it. "Only the flesh of a pure human heart can slay a rakshasa," or something.

Sleeper

03-26-2009 10:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10157865)

That has quite a nice mythological feel to it. "Only the flesh of a pure human heart can slay a rakshasa," or something.

And it gives you the perfect opportunity to create an exception-based subsystem for force-feeding an anthropomorphic tiger a human heart during combat. A percentile chance the rakshasa roars (and opens its mouth) randomly or when baited, forcing a jaw open using bend bars/lift gates, a list of custom mechanical benefits from various spells (like Tasha's Uncontrollable Hideous Laughter), special odds depending on whether it's roaring or biting, supplemental wrestling rules, and a special grenade-like scatter table for hearts that miss.

demiurge1138

03-27-2009 02:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10156318)

Paizo brought all that back to 3.x in their first two Pathfinder APs IIRC. Lamia Matriarchs and Rakshasa Maharajas I believe, along with non-tiger headed rakshasas.

The rakshasa adventure featured two tiger-headed rakshasas, a fox-headed one, and one each of boar, lizard, vulture and orangutan-headed.

noisms

03-27-2009 11:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Rat

A welcome reappearance of the 'explaining what common animals look like' trope: rats, we are told, are "long-tailed rodents 5-12 inches long." Well that's put that one to bed, then. I was slightly unclear about rats' appearance, and sometimes confused them with six-legged winged insects 6-8 feet long.

Anyway. Rats function as a swarm, with a single hit dice for many creatures - anyone who thought 4e was being innovative with its swarm monsters, I say to you Tcha! And pah! ;) Once hit points have run out, the swarm is deemed to have dissipated and its constituents fled.

There are a few sub-varieties:

Brush Rat

This 'pack rat' sometimes steals small items of jewelry etc., and can be trained. Suddenly I'm imagining a thief with a trained brush rat who uses it to get into small spaces and grab somebody or other's magic ring. Sounds like something from Al Qadim, somehow.

Giant Rat

These can infect with deadly diseases (5% chance per bite), like their smaller cousins. They hang out in grave yards and crypts, and "cheat ghouls of their prizes" by eating all the corpses.

Osquip

A large rodent with six, eight or ten legs, which burrow around underground and attack trespassers unthinkingly. They can be trained by wizards and Jermlaines, I suppose as guard dogs, though again, it would be an interesting thief's trick to train an Osquip to tunnel right underneath a castle's walls so that its owner could sneak in. Or, alternatively, a sieging army with its special Osquip handler platoon?

demiurge1138

03-27-2009 12:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Are osquips explicitly based on some Barsoomian creature, or are they just similar in their hexapodal anatomy?

Thane of Fife

03-27-2009 12:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

What always irritated me about the Rat entry was the bit about serious diseases - it mentions them - it even gives a percentage chance of contacting one, but there's no hint as to what qualifies as a serious disease, or how one works. Maybe if there'd been some list of generic diseases somewhere....

noisms

03-27-2009 03:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10161357)

What always irritated me about the Rat entry was the bit about serious diseases - it mentions them - it even gives a percentage chance of contacting one, but there's no hint as to what qualifies as a serious disease, or how one works. Maybe if there'd been some list of generic diseases somewhere....

One thing the 2nd edition DMG was really lacking - proper lists of poisons and diseases. Maybe diseases could be imported from Warhammer FRP; it has plenty.

Sleeper

03-27-2009 06:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10161241)

Giant Rat

These can infect with deadly diseases (5% chance per bite), like their smaller cousins. They hang out in grave yards and crypts, and "cheat ghouls of their prizes" by eating all the corpses.

That's an interesting twist. All of a sudden rats... are useful. At least to the living. Want to prevent the scourge of rapidly-spreading undead? Bring in the rats. Have them eat all the corpses. Epidemic quelled.

I rather like that. It's quite a twist on the standard "eek, I'm being attacked by a rodent of unusual size!"

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10161982)

One thing the 2nd edition DMG was really lacking - proper lists of poisons and diseases. Maybe diseases could be imported from Warhammer FRP; it has plenty.

Or the 1st edition DMG. Editing for consistency wasn't one of the Monstrous Manual's strong points.

Mikaze

03-27-2009 06:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I have to admit, most of my memories of Osquips come from the Menzoberranzan computer game. God, those teeth...

JRM

03-27-2009 06:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10161345)

Are osquips explicitly based on some Barsoomian creature, or are they just similar in their hexapodal anatomy?

Didn't the osquip first appeared in White Dwarf's Fiend Factory? I think I have that issue somewhere, and I think it mentioned something about it being inspired by ERB's Mars book.

Still, regardless of any authorial extent they certainly do have a strong resemblance to the Barsoomian rat, the Ulsio, a many-legged burrowing rodent that's normally the size of a small dog, although giant versions the size of a cougar exist. Oh, and they're the favoured prey of the Kaldanes, believe it or not.

JRM

03-27-2009 07:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10161241)

Rat

A welcome reappearance of the 'explaining what common animals look like' trope: rats, we are told, are "long-tailed rodents 5-12 inches long." Well that's put that one to bed, then. I was slightly unclear about rats' appearance, and sometimes confused them with six-legged winged insects 6-8 feet long.

I'm a bit puzzled by the rat entry saying black rats can't swim and brown rats can't climb. They certainly can, although arguably not as well as their counterparts.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10161241)
Osquip

A large rodent with six, eight or ten legs, which burrow around underground and attack trespassers unthinkingly. They can be trained by wizards and Jermlaines, I suppose as guard dogs, though again, it would be an interesting thief's trick to train an Osquip to tunnel right underneath a castle's walls so that its owner could sneak in. Or, alternatively, a sieging army with its special Osquip handler platoon?

Hmm... the tunnel would probably be too small for a human, so I'm thinking a halfling or gnome sneak-thief with a pack of trained rodents. A gnome makes more sense, considering their affinity for burrowing animals in AD&D.

As for the osquip siege team, that's a fine idea. Although there's lots of other burrowing monsters that could do the same job as well or better. "Send in the Umber Hulk mercenaries!" Then again, osquips work for food and a few shiny things, so are probably the cheapest option.

noisms

03-29-2009 10:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Remorhaz

The polar worm, which grows up to 42' long and lurks beneath the snow, waiting for prey... And I've never used one in a game. Not out of choice - just lack of opportunity. This makes me sad.

Remorhaz contain immense sources of heat; when aroused their insides become so hot that their "back protrusions" even glow red. Victims who are swallowed are killed instantly by this, and metals which come into contact with the creature's back will melt. Another example of the weird conflation of biology with fantasy in D&D: we are told that a special substance is secreted inside the Remorhaz' intestines to bring about the heat surge, whereas I wouldn't really have had a problem with the explanation that it's a fantasy creature and it has a hot belly. But each to their own.

Certainly 'thrym' (the heat-producing substance) adds a fun new dimension to Remorhaz slaying, because it can be sold to alchemists for 5-10 gps a flask. Given that there are 10 flasks per hit dice and a Remorhaz could have as many as 14 hit dice, that makes.... quite a nice little side earner. (Especially if you can get a breeding pair plus eggs, which are worth 500 gps each.) However, as is often the case, I can't help feeling that by the time a group of PCs are powerful enough to kill a 14HD Remorhaz, they probably don't need much in the way of gold.

Aside from a wilderness hazard, Remorhaz can be used as guards, as they are trainable. Pet Remorhaz with your polar-clime-residing BBEG, sir? Watch out though - if it gets hungry enough a Remorhaz will happily eat its master.

EmperorSeth

03-29-2009 01:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Remorhaz are like purple worms as monsters that go into the "yeah, when my party hits mid-level, now I can use them!" pile, but by then, not only does the range of monsters increase, but the plot starts to solidify and make it more clear what you'll be facing, and these guys need more story ties. The environment doesn't help; unless you are in a severely cold climate, they don't have a reason to show up, do they? I only tossed players into a cold environment once. And for hard to explain reasons, they only fought robots. ;)

demiurge1138

03-29-2009 03:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I'm a big fan of remorhaz--they're genuinely alien in a way that a lot of mishmash magical beasts aren't in D&D. I sort of wonder if they're also a "crappy plastic toy" monster, like rust monsters and bulettes.

s/LaSH

03-29-2009 06:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10170115)

I'm a big fan of remorhaz--they're genuinely alien in a way that a lot of mishmash magical beasts aren't in D&D. I sort of wonder if they're also a "crappy plastic toy" monster, like rust monsters and bulettes.

That's about my attitude, too. The remorhaz looks cool, acts cool, does something weird, and it's not based on anything mythic (that I know about). It feels like something that could be real in some D&D world, and didn't need help from any crazy wizard (no disrespect to the owlbear, which is another of my faves). It just works.

It needs more love, though. Are there any elemental versions out there for use in other environments? One could have fun with those...

kami2awa

03-29-2009 07:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10140421)

Peasant pudding

A vaguely greyish color and slightly tacky, like wallpaper paste. Dissolves almost anything organic, but slowly. You'd have to set it on your skin for days before it started to burn. Flavorless, but modestly filling and at least somewhat nutritious. Not a full balanced meal but any means, but you won't starve on it, either. Hence, the name. Peasants toss it in a barn with all the organic leavings, from horse and sheep dung to straw and chaff and rotted fruits and vegetables. And in lean times, they can stretch their meals with a little pudding, and make do. Probably saved more lives than cure light wounds.

Sticky Toffee Pudding

Golden brown in colour, the STP leaves a trail of golden syrup everywhere it goes, making it easy to track (this often attracts insects, even giant ones). Its major defence is its adhesive slime, which can entrap weapons and attackers like a Mimic's glue. It is edible, and delicious (and moist).

Monsieur Meuble

03-29-2009 07:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I have this picture of a caravan of efreet on a trip in the glacial wastelands, traveling on a palanquin of black stone mounted on the back of a pack of rhemoraz, continually prodded and excited to generate a comfortable heat to the fiery traveler. I don't know what to do about it, except as a very unusual encounter. Are they on a tourist trip on the material plane and friendly enough to take hitchhikers aboard? Merchant in rare stuff headed to the next ice-giants fort to sell them What They Asked Last Time? Exiled nobles from the City of Brass trying to regain their place and honor by melting the poles?

As for the thrym, you know who would be very interested and would pay very high prices and favors to PCs to own some? All the submarine intelligent species. What we have here is essentially thermite, flameless ardent fire able to burn without air even in the stellar void or underwater, and so of invaluable use for any aboleth, black dragon, crabmen, dolphin, dragon turtle, nereid, aquatic elf, kaolinh, kapoacinh, reef giant, storm giant, sea hag, ixitxachitl, kraken, kuo-toa, lacedon, leviathan (and other kind of whales), locatah, merman, merrow, morkhot, water naga, sahuagin, selkie, sirine, sea sprite or vodyanoi eager to melt something, do a bit of metalsmithing or heat-kill something. Or even a lich who installed himself at the bottom of the ocean, need to buil some artifact but can't be arsed to go back to the surface to do so...

Hey, seeing all the civilizations living under water, you could easily imagine a "gold rush" on rhemorazes, would the existence of the thrym be known down there. A mercenary gold-rush, seeing as how they can't go hunt the beasties themselves. Soe tired to send an expedition, but something about a bunch of dudes drenched in water exploring glacial wastelands didn't go well...

Sleeper

03-29-2009 08:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

One thing I really like about the remorhaz is their metabolism. Most cold-weather monsters are white. Winter wolves, yeti, white dragons, etc. Makes sense. Most of them are immune, or occasionally resistant, to cold. Okay, though immunity should be considerably rarer. Nearly every single one also has a natural weapon based on cold. Cold breath, cold touch, whatever. Which their primary rivals and prey are mostly immune to. Makes no sense. The remorhaz's inner furnace is a great way for a creature not made of ice and snow to stay warm, and it's a great deterrent. Particularly before 2E beefed up of dragons and giants, 10d10 damage was terribly impressive.

JRM

03-29-2009 10:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10169204)

Remorhaz

The polar worm, which grows up to 42' long and lurks beneath the snow, waiting for prey... And I've never used one in a game. Not out of choice - just lack of opportunity. This makes me sad.

I've used one once, and met one once while playing. I'd have liked to use them more often since I think they're cool (or should that be hot?) monsters, but I just didn't run many polar adventures.

If I remember correctly, in 1st edition AD&D remorhaz's were more intelligent than humans (Very- or High-), which would expand their game possibilities considerably since they become more than just brutes that want to eat you, but can scheme and negotiate to become Masters of the Ice.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10169204)

Remorhaz contain immense sources of heat; when aroused their insides become so hot that their "back protrusions" even glow red. Victims who are swallowed are killed instantly by this, and metals which come into contact with the creature's back will melt. Another example of the weird conflation of biology with fantasy in D&D: we are told that a special substance is secreted inside the Remorhaz' intestines to bring about the heat surge, whereas I wouldn't really have had a problem with the explanation that it's a fantasy creature and it has a hot belly. But each to their own.

Well my tastes are quite different, I've always had trouble with the remorhaz's heat-generating ability from a biological/physical basis, it raises all kinds of questions:

Firstly, if a remorhaz can heat parts of itself to a temperature that melts steel on contact, why isn't the dang thing resistant or immune to fire attacks?

Secondly, just think of how much energy it would take to generate that much heat. Where does the remorhaz get it from? If it gets it from the meat it eats it would have to either eat scores of walruses every day to meet its calorie requirements or have a supernaturally efficient metabolism.

Thirdly, if it's at steel-melting temperatures it would cause heat damage out to a considerable radius, and will soon be paddling around in a glacier pool of its own. Instead, the remorhaz only damages on contact.

My conclusion/solution was straight-forward, a remorhaz does not produce heat. It creates a transmutation effect that causes objects that touch its back or enter its gullet to melt, similar to how a bulette sweats a "rock to mud" oil to burrow through the ground (at least, that's what the Ecology of the Bulette says), or the way a pyrolisk can turn a victim to ashes if they fail their save versus.

Thus, 'thrym' is the remorhaz's 'melting juice', so to speak. Rather than being some kind of super-fuel, it's a magical substance that creates a heat-style transmutation without the necessary thermal energy change (so a sword goes from a sharp piece of metal to a puddle without needing to become white-hot), which explain its value in creating heat-related magic items.

Quote:

Aside from a wilderness hazard, Remorhaz can be used as guards, as they are trainable. Pet Remorhaz with your polar-clime-residing BBEG, sir? Watch out though - if it gets hungry enough a Remorhaz will happily eat its master.

I prefer the idea of the remorhaz as being the main monster rather than a minion, but then (a) I usually run lower level campaigns and (b) I prefer the original intelligent version of the polar worm.

Maybe the PCs are tasked with destroying a tribe of snow goblins who have been kidnapping folk & stealing cattle to placate a remorhaz they worship? Or, they have a nasty magical item they want to dispose of (say, a CE sword of berserking), and the 'easy' way to do this is to find a remorhaz and throw it upon its red-hot back.

JRM

03-29-2009 11:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa (Post 10170547)
Sticky Toffee Pudding

Golden brown in colour, the STP leaves a trail of golden syrup everywhere it goes, making it easy to track (this often attracts insects, even giant ones). Its major defence is its adhesive slime, which can entrap weapons and attackers like a Mimic's glue. It is edible, and delicious (and moist).

We're still doing puddings? Great!

Anyway, the remorhaz has inspired me to add two more to the list:

Runny Pudding

This much-feared type of the deadly pudding has the power to turn any solid it comes in contact with into liquid, except for stone, adamantium and a few other rare substances. Any creature struck by a runny pudding must save versus breath weapon or die, their body melting into a puddle of goo the pudding quickly slurps up. Weapons that strike the pudding often melt before they can do any damage. Even worse, a runny pudding is one of the fastest known species of pudding, moving at 12".

Ice Pudding

This pudding is virtually indistinguishable from its relative the white pudding, but more dangerous. The ice pudding radiates supernatural cold, weapons that strike it must save or be shattered on impact and its attacks add terrible cold damage that can freeze its victims solid for the few rounds it takes to devour them. Ice puddings take double damage from fire attacks, but are immune to cold.

EDIT: And here's another one I just thought of.

Savoury Pudding

This pudding comes in a variety of colours, from mottled gray to a rich chocolate brown. It is slow-moving and does little damage with its attacks, but compensates for this by producing an extraordinary perfume that combines all the pleasant scents that a person can imagine. Any living creature that smells a savoury pudding must save versus spells or be drawn to seek the source of the wonderful odour in a similar fashion to how a harpy's song attracts creatures who hear it. Once they reach the savoury pudding, they will be compelled to taste it, whereupon they must make a second save versus spells or be mesmerized by its amazing flavour, which renders them unable to act for 2-12 rounds. They will barely notice that the pudding is using this time to eat them alive.

6inTruder

03-30-2009 03:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

with regards to the Polar Wyrms, didn't it originate from one of those early in the timeline Conan pastiches?

Sleeper

03-30-2009 03:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10170932)

If I remember correctly, in 1st edition AD&D remorhaz's were more intelligent than humans (Very- or High-), which would expand their game possibilities considerably since they become more than just brutes that want to eat you, but can scheme and negotiate to become Masters of the Ice.

My first exposure to the remorhaz was G2: Glacial Rift of the Frost Giant Jarl, and it was definitely a dumb creature. Checking the 1E MM, they were smart for bugs, but still listed as "animal". I prefer them unintelligent. There are too many inexplicably sapient beasts out there.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10170932)

Firstly, if a remorhaz can heat parts of itself to a temperature that melts steel on contact, why isn't the dang thing resistant or immune to fire attacks?

Secondly, just think of how much energy it would take to generate that much heat. Where does the remorhaz get it from? If it gets it from the meat it eats it would have to either eat scores of walruses every day to meet its calorie requirements or have a supernaturally efficient metabolism.

Thirdly, if it's at steel-melting temperatures it would cause heat damage out to a considerable radius, and will soon be paddling around in a glacier pool of its own. Instead, the remorhaz only damages on contact.

I'd have a problem with that. We have acid in our stomach; does that mean we're immune to acid? There is no reason whatsoever why a dragon capable of breathing fire should also be immune to fire. Or even particularly resistant, beyond the whole thick armored skin thing. Evolution is lazy; all that's needed is a cast-iron gastrointestinal system and an asbestos mouth and throat. The rest is still flesh. (I have no problem with dragons being immune to fire if they're elemental creatures of fire, but the more Western types shouldn't be lava-divers. Plus, it's a lot more fun if grappling dragons have to worry about the other dragon breathing fire on their head.)

Same with a remorhaz. Just developing a spectacular offensive capability doesn't mean your entire body is going to be immune to it. In fact, it makes more sense if the body only develops the minimum protections necessary. Such an effective weapon can even be somewhat dangerous to the creature; Discworld's exploding dragons parody this concept. In this case, all that's need is a slightly heat-resistant gut, and some kind of thermal insulator between the heat vanes and the rest of the body.

If I use an acetylene torch in the arctic, am I in immediate peril of dying from the backwash of heat? What about keeping an outpost at 68 degrees F? Does that mean the station is doomed to melt through hundreds of feet of ice and plunge into the water? Of course not. You're assuming the creature is continually radiating a massive amount of energy indiscriminately. The intestines only get hot when the creature is attacking or defending, and the only part that develops truly intensive heat are specific protrusions on the back. So the radiant energy is only generated in a crisis, is limited to very short bursts, goes mostly up, and any spillover is blocked by the creature's body from affecting the ground. The lair of a remorhaz that is forced to occasionally defend itself might have a rough floor and a slick, smooth ceiling where the ice has melted and frozen back over. This could actually structurally reinforce the ceiling, by creating a more perfect arch and replacing packed snow or old ice with a new, hard shell.

The energy issue may be valid, but you're still overstating the case. A spot-source of intense heat doesn't have to throw as much energy as a larger heat source. Sparklers can be hotter than the melting point of steel and certainly cause bad burns on contact, but won't flash-fry any bystanders. They generate vastly less energy than say an oven. In any case, this is a world with fire-breathing dragons, hexapodal lizards, and 100-ton creatures that can fly with ordinary wings. To start to be aerodynamically plausible even a pegasus would require a more than 100 foot wingspan, cartoonishly huge muscles, and a direct line constantly pumping pure processed sugar into its stomach to even have a chance of flying. Suspension of disbelief is very personal and arbitrary, but this is a strange place to draw the line.

Inyssi

03-30-2009 04:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Very well said, Sleeper. As always.

Personally, the Remorhaz has always been high on my list of monsters I'd like to use someday. They have a very, I don't know, mythical quality about them; they're the sort of thing I would totally expect you to find in a Conan story, or a story about Hercules. Or a Norse myth. They're something that just happens, that might eat you if you're out on the tundra, that might have eaten a great hero once long ago or a whole caravan just last month. A primal force; not in the FEEL THE WRATH OF GAIA sense, but just "Nature, red in tooth and claw."

I have no doubt that the polar wyrm owes this elevated stature in my mind to its picture in the 3.5 Monster Manual, which is really very evocative indeed:

http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/MM...M35_PG214b.jpg

In this particular vein, I would rank it one above the 3.5 Fiend Folio's Ahuizotl, two below the Myconid race, and one below the Yellow Musk Creeper. I've always really wanted to run a campaign drawing heavily on that theme.

Sleeper

03-30-2009 05:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Just to do something that doesn't make biological sense....

Digging back in time, there were some huge arthropods. Jaekelopterus was an 8-foot long lobster-like scorpion that lived in lakes, and Arthropleura was a millipede about the same size that lurked in swamps and left tracks that resemble those left by a tractor with caterpillar treads. These huge bugs vanished when terrestrial vertebrates started to appear.

What if they went north? In the dark chills seas under the ice shelves, giant lobsters and crabs and sea scorpions survived and thrived. Burrowing under permafrost in the tundra, lurking amongst the pines and firs of the tiaga, scuttling across the perpetual ice and snow that is like a skin or skum over the northern seas, and dancing in front of the auroras that light the seasons-long midnight, the gigantic millipedes, dragonflies and mites spread and diversified.

Their distant descendants form a whole ecology in the icy wastes. Slumbering and passive, the mayfly-like varieties burst into vigorous life during the brief summer heat and then quickly die. When the long cold season starts again, their eggs buried under the soil wait as long as is necessary for the next melting. Further north, the creatures mostly slumber. Hiding, buried under the snow and ice, they preseve their energy. Half-frozen in an almost cryogenic suspension, they wait until the tremor of feet or paws disturb their rest. Under the ice, in the water which always remains unfrozen but dark, they lurk and hide. Hanging from the bottom of the ice shelves like a barnacle infestation, or swimming languidly through the waters.

The Snow Queen was my favorite fairy tale as a child. Perhaps the Snow Queen, in her great sleigh, with her castles of ice and mirrors that shatter and worm into hearts, is just a facade. Underneath the perfect pale white skin is something alien. An larval insect, which has learned to disguise itself with snow and ice and excreted substances to resemble the creatures of the Warmlands. Her guards appear to be glass and ice, but are distant kin of the mantises, with sword-arms and carapaces. Their shells are clear, and the high refractive index makes them glitter as if they were knights made of diamond.

The mirrors are not ice, but the chrysalises of another of her servitors. Covered with a mirror-like substance, they cluster in low-lying depressions in the ice, forming great masses. The parent smooths and rubs these masses until the surface forms an almost perfectly smooth mirror. Yet if you look closely, you can see what look almost like hairline cracks, outlining each of the separate chrysalises. Once complete, these chrysalis-mirrors can be removed. The mass has formed a smooth mirror with an irregular border on the top, while the underside is a chaotic but still largely reflective mass. She mounts them around her palace.

If these mirrors are exposed to warmth, say an ambassador from the elven nation of the spruces, a pupa might wake. Or if struck hard enough, they can fragment. The pods are sharp, and can draw blood. If the larval insect inside senses warmth, they burrow out and burrow into their new host, infesting it. This feels like a pin-prick, or cutting a finger on glass, and is usually not regarded as anything worth noting. Months later, as the parasite starts to reach maturity, the host is driven by some primal urge to seek out the barren lands of ice.

The Queen's servants patrol her borders, alert for such souls pressing further and further into her lands. They take these seekers in their chitinous sleighs, pulled by the great remorhaz, back to her seemingly empty city. They rest as honored guests, and in a few nights the insect is born, violently, from the flesh of its host. She speaks and whispers and greets the newborn insects, and hears from them news and stories of the southern lands. Some of her subjects are woken from their stasis to celebrate the new birth, and the newborn's castoff flesh is devoured at the banquet.

YojimboC

03-30-2009 06:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Am I seriously the only person here who has used a remorhaz in a game?

I love polar adventures. I love vikings and frost giants and castles of ice and all that shit, so I throw them at my players from time to time. I haven't used a remorhaz in some time, actually, but I did back in 2E. And since we were teenagers and total munchkins (the party had, like, three Hammers of Thunderbolts) the remorhaz went down like a bitch. But I did (and do) like the idea of a gigantic arctic centipede. Regrettably, the last time I did a frost giant adventure, I'd forgotten about them. Wish I hadn't.

JRM

03-30-2009 06:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10171700)
with regards to the Polar Wyrms, didn't it originate from one of those early in the timeline Conan pastiches?

In a word, no. The story you were thinking of was The Lair of the Ice Worm, where the titular menace radiated extreme cold, not heat. There are some fantasy stories which feature a similar cold-radiating worm called a remora, not to be confused with the fish of the same name, which has different mythical abilities associated with it (namely the ability to fasten on ships and drag them to a halt).

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10171715)

My first exposure to the remorhaz was G2: Glacial Rift of the Frost Giant Jarl, and it was definitely a dumb creature. Checking the 1E MM, they were smart for bugs, but still listed as "animal". I prefer them unintelligent. There are too many inexplicably sapient beasts out there.

They're animal-intelligence in 1E as well? I must have misremembered.

As to your other points, I'm reluctant to get into an argument about it but I think you're overstating the case the other way. (e.g. the acid in our stomachs isn't strong enough to dissolve steel in seconds, nor does it ooze out of our backs, it's more than a 'slightly heat resistant gut' it's back is hot enough to melt steel in seconds - how many thousands of degrees centigrade would it have to be to do that? - and that is meant to be excess heat from its interior. An acetylene torch may take a minute or so to melt a sword, the remorhaz is that hot along its entire back - say a strip thirty feet long and a few feet wide rather than the fraction of an inch that the hot point of the torch covers. I don't know where you get the idea it's a momentary spot source from. The MM description says its the remorhaz's whole guts & backs are that hot for the duration of combat (in minute-long AD&D rounds, remember!), and after the fight's over that heat all has to go somewhere). As for the sparkler comparison, that's basically my third problem - if its hot enough to melt steel with a momentary contact it probably is hot enough to flash-fry anybody in the immediate vicinity.)

Besides which, it was the 'where is it getting the energy from' question that was bothering me the most.

So, I hope you can understand why my particular suspension of disbelief doesn't suspend that far, and I basically decided "it isn't really heat, it's magic!" :D

Monsieur Meuble

03-30-2009 07:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10172410)

Besides which, it was the 'where is it getting the energy from' question that was bothering me the most.

You see those wings ? on a burrowing animal ? They, of course, are not wings, except aesthetically. They are highly efficient heat converters. They absorb the ambient heat and stock it in a chemical form. And "heat" must be understood broadly in a fantasy world : physical particle movement "heat", solar energy and magical potential.

Rhemorazes do not install themselves in frozen wastelands : frozen wastelands install themselves around rhemorazes. They absorb that much heat. Also, why your typical frozen wasteland-dweller is from a viking-type civilization of barbarian-fighter churning out magic tricks : rhemorazes absorb such a quantity of thaum as to make the spontaneous discovery of magic a very rare occurrence, and so the civ' develops very few magic-users.

Also : Teleport a rhemoraz in a really warmer climate and it wil overload and die. Cast a "fire invulnerability" spell, teleport him in the desert and he will accumulate and concentrate enough heat to melt the Earth crust. With an anti-overloading spell duration long enough, it will then absorb heat from the mantle and below and can probably melt its way to the center of the world and freeze it cold.

Sleeper

03-30-2009 07:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10172410)

As to your other points, I'm reluctant to get into an argument about it but I think you're overstating the case the other way. (e.g. the acid in our stomachs isn't strong enough to dissolve steel in seconds, nor does it ooze out of our backs, it's more than a 'slightly heat resistant gut' it's back is hot enough to melt steel in seconds - how many thousands of degrees centigrade would it have to be to do that? - and that is meant to be excess heat from its interior. An acetylene torch may take a minute or so to melt a sword, the remorhaz is that hot along its entire back - say a strip thirty feet long and a few feet wide rather than the fraction of an inch that the hot point of the torch covers. I don't know where you get the idea it's a momentary spot source from. The MM description says its the remorhaz's whole guts & backs are that hot for the duration of combat (in minute-long AD&D rounds, remember!), and after the fight's over that heat all has to go somewhere). As for the sparkler comparison, that's basically my thir problem - if its hot enough to melt steel with a momentary contact it probably is hot enough to flash-fry anybody in the immediate vicinity.)

Besides which, it was the 'where is it getting the energy from' question that was bothering me the most.

So, I hope you can understand why my particular suspension of disbelief doesn't suspend that far, and I basically decided "it isn't really heat, it's magic!":D

Steel melts at about 2400 degrees F, and vaporizes at about 5400 degrees F which should be sufficient. For brass, knock off 800 and 1500 degrees or so. Rather than a huge hot radiant surface, think of it as a series of heat-conductive veins in a insulating material. The heat from the stomach is concentrated and piped into the veins, and it's those spots (at the tips of the horns, perhaps) which cause severe damage to flesh. That's a lot of heat in a very small area, but not necessarily a godawful amount of energy. After all, there's nothing in the description that says the metal weapons suddenly melt into puddles. A small amount of melting is sufficient to render the weapon useless, particularly when combined with a forceful blow. I tend to think of things like that as a convenient combat simplification, like calling every blow that removes hit points an "injury" or a "wound" instead of a loss of morale or a consequence of being favored by the goddess of luck, or whatever else they actually represent.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10172562)

Rhemorazes do not install themselves in frozen wastelands : frozen wastelands install themselves around rhemorazes. They absorb that much heat.

That kind of logic works wonderfully in a fantasy environment. :)

demiurge1138

03-30-2009 08:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10172282)

Am I seriously the only person here who has used a remorhaz in a game?

I love polar adventures. I love vikings and frost giants and castles of ice and all that shit, so I throw them at my players from time to time. I haven't used a remorhaz in some time, actually, but I did back in 2E. And since we were teenagers and total munchkins (the party had, like, three Hammers of Thunderbolts) the remorhaz went down like a bitch. But I did (and do) like the idea of a gigantic arctic centipede. Regrettably, the last time I did a frost giant adventure, I'd forgotten about them. Wish I hadn't.

Nope, I have, and it sounds like it went much better for the remorhaz in my version. In a one-shot I ran, I used one as a random encounter as the party was trekking across the icy wilderness. They had a packhorse they were using to carry equipment (and were planning on eating it once it froze/starved to death), and a remorhaz burrowed up from beneath them, killed the horse, and started eating it as the party scattered.

Now, the monk and the cleric were both smart enough to stay the hell away from the thing as it was eating their poor exhausted horse. The wizard, on the other hand... he figured "oh, it's a fiery creature, it must be vulnerable to cold!", got its attention by shooting it with cold beams... which didn't do much except attract the remorhaz's attention. One grapple check later and the wizard is an appetizer for the remorhaz, and the monk and cleric run off as it finishes eating their horse.

noisms

03-30-2009 09:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10172562)

Rhemorazes do not install themselves in frozen wastelands : frozen wastelands install themselves around rhemorazes. They absorb that much heat. Also, why your typical frozen wasteland-dweller is from a viking-type civilization of barbarian-fighter churning out magic tricks : rhemorazes absorb such a quantity of thaum as to make the spontaneous discovery of magic a very rare occurrence, and so the civ' develops very few magic-users.

I like the way you think.

MuscaDomestica

03-30-2009 12:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I think another good idea would be a direct portal to the elemental plane of fire, make them part elemental, maybe a probe for explorers/tourists who want to see the arctic.

Sleeper

03-30-2009 01:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MuscaDomestica (Post 10173513)

I think another good idea would be a direct portal to the elemental plane of fire, make them part elemental, maybe a probe for explorers/tourists who want to see the arctic.

Or make them elemental spirits. Long ago, when the gods first divided the world among their servants, the spirits of fire were given the best parts. The humid and lush jungles, teeming with life, verdant and vibrant. The spirits reveled in their new playground, danced across the sky, and lighted on the branches of the towering trees. And then, they set them on fire. As the branches sparked and flared, they laughed. The monkeys were even funnier with their hair singed off. More and more things burned, until the vast sheltering canopies of leaves were aflame. When the flames died down all was ash. Eden had become a desert.

So the gods punished them. Turned them into the basest of creatures, worms. Gave them a hard shell, so they could not escape. And then threw them high into the sky, where they flew further and further north, finally crashing to the ground.

When they crawled out of their holes, heavy in their new shells and armor, they saw an empty world. All white, stretching to the horizon. Nothing to see. So they went back into their craters, curled up in their shells, and slept. Hoping for a better world tomorrow.

And when they hear something walking above, they surge out to see if they've been forgiven. If the gods have come back, to set them free once again. And when they find out it is not so, that the feet are just those of a bear, or a dwarf, they flare and burn with helpless rage.

The remorhaz is a cage, a prison, a crucible. Inside is a spirit of light and heat, of freedom and fire. That once danced across the skies, and is now doomed to burrow like a worm.

The Last Conformist

03-30-2009 06:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10172252)

Just to do something that doesn't make biological sense....

Digging back in time, there were some huge arthropods. Jaekelopterus was an 8-foot long lobster-like scorpion that lived in lakes, and Arthropleura was a millipede about the same size that lurked in swamps and left tracks that resemble those left by a tractor with caterpillar treads. These huge bugs vanished when terrestrial vertebrates started to appear.

ObNitpick: Jaekelopterus was a sea scorpion, not a scorpion.

The name "sea scorpion" is doubly misleading - they're not scorpions and most did not live in the sea - but hallowed by popular-paleontological tradition. Technical texts usually call them eurypterids, which is harder to pronounce but less confusing.

JRM

03-31-2009 02:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Oh dear, I seem to have set off a nerve (or should that be a hot vein). :)

Anyhows, I had been wondering where Remorhaz's could get the thermal energy from (assuming it is actual heat and not magical melting as I speculated) and came up with the "conduct to the elemental plane of fire" and the "gather ambient energy" explanations, but I'd not considered that might be an explanation for them living in icy wastes. I like that idea. Other possibilities I came up with was they draw heat from the Sun or the Earth's molten core (although in AD&D those heat sources are possibly natural conducts to Elemental Fire as well), or they have a supernaturally energy-efficient digestion that draws as much power from meat as a nuclear reactor does Uranium.

In any case, it gave me the idea that Remorhaz's heat-generation power might also satisfy their caloric requirements, so they only need to eat to gain the nutrients necessary to build or repair their bodies. There are a fair number of D&D monsters that might have impossibly efficient metabolisms like this.

Another notion I had was that a Remorhaz might have a magical ability to nigh-instantaneously concentrate its self-generated heat at any point in its guts and heat-veins, which could explain why a Remorhaz's back is cherry-red rather than the incandescent white an object hot enough to melt steel in the brief moment it takes to land a blow would likely glow. That would allow the Remorhaz to do the same amount of damage with a lesser amount of heat, although it would still require far more energy than any organic creature that's likely to exist in the real world could generate.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10172582)

Steel melts at about 2400 degrees F, and vaporizes at about 5400 degrees F which should be sufficient. For brass, knock off 800 and 1500 degrees or so.

Quite, if it's just regular thermal energy its back would have to be hotter than most blast furnaces, to melt metal that quickly requires an energy density resembling the hot core of an explosion. That matches the 10-100 damage resulting from contact with a Polar Worm's back. Somehow, the "Worm as written" must contain this heat so it doesn't damage its surroundings, which is part of my initial quibble.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10172582)

Rather than a huge hot radiant surface, think of it as a series of heat-conductive veins in a insulating material. The heat from the stomach is concentrated and piped into the veins, and it's those spots (at the tips of the horns, perhaps) which cause severe damage to flesh. That's a lot of heat in a very small area, but not necessarily a godawful amount of energy

If those spots are close enough together, and hot enough, that a blow anywhere upon the Remorhaz's back will suffer 10-100 damage, I don't see what's the effective difference between the total energy requirements.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10172582)

After all, there's nothing in the description that says the metal weapons suddenly melt into puddles. A small amount of melting is sufficient to render the weapon useless, particularly when combined with a forceful blow. I tend to think of things like that as a convenient combat simplification, like calling every blow that removes hit points an "injury" or a "wound" instead of a loss of morale or a consequence of being favored by the goddess of luck, or whatever else they actually represent.

Yes, I was assuming only part of the weapon melts, and the rest of it warps, softens, bursts into flames or just becomes too hot to handle. After all, if a sword was to entirely turn into molten metal in some fraction of a second, the wielder's hand would likely be burnt off.

Actually, that could be another hint that a Polar Worm may cause magically melting rather than truly heat. There's no mention of the risk of burns from holding a weapon that suddenly suffers 10-100 fire damage.;

Sleeper

03-31-2009 05:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10174245)

ObNitpick: Jaekelopterus was a sea scorpion, not a scorpion.

I know, I know. I really tried, but I just couldn't use the word "sea" when describing a lake animal.... :)

ObTangent: Been a long time since the heyday of alt.hack, hasn't it? Time flies...

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10175656)

Oh dear, I seem to have set off a nerve (or should that be a hot vein). :)

How so? It's just a very mild, very temperate discussion. I think the issue of energy transfer is probably going to be a bigger issue than the energy generation requirements or the radiant heat, but I haven't touched that kind of math in ages. The reactive heating is clever solution.

Kakita Kojiro

03-31-2009 09:14 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10175656)

In any case, it gave me the idea that Remorhaz's heat-generation power might also satisfy their caloric requirements so they only need to eat to gain the nutrients necessary to build or repair their bodies. There are a fair number of D&D monsters that might have impossibly efficient metabolisms like this.

My thoughts on the Remorhaz has always been: what the heck are these things eating that requires that much heat to digest and still yields enough energy by digesting it that generating all that heat is energy-efficient?

'Cause if your intestines need to get that hot, you're not eating organic matter unless you're also crapping out diamonds. Maybe they're gobbling up rock and calcining it? Their whole set-up seems like it would fit in well with some sort of alt biochemistry.

Actually, they'd've been a good choice for another critter dropped by the crash in the background of "Expedition to the Barrier Peaks", sort of like the Aurumvorax and its weird biochemistry.

noisms

03-31-2009 10:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10177274)

My thoughts on the Remorhaz has always been: what the heck are these things eating that requires that much heat to digest and still yields enough energy by digesting it that generating all that heat is energy-efficient?

'Cause if your intestines need to get that hot, you're not eating organic matter unless you're also crapping out diamonds. Maybe they're gobbling up rock and calcining it? Their whole set-up seems like it would fit in well with some sort of alt biochemistry.

Actually, they'd've been a good choice for another critter dropped by the crash in the background of "Expedition to the Barrier Peaks", sort of like the Aurumvorax and its weird biochemistry.

Suddenly a better reason for entering a Remorhaz' tunnels - getting all those diamonds that the thing has crapped out.

JRM

03-31-2009 03:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10176377)

How so? It's just a very mild, very temperate discussion. I think the issue of energy transfer is probably going to be a bigger issue than the energy generation requirements or the radiant heat, but I haven't touched that kind of math in ages. The reactive heating is clever solution.

The hot vein quip was just a touch of humour, hence the :).

I've done a back-of-the-envelope calculation, and going by the energy required to melt steel if the heat was uniformly distributed over a Polar Worm's back and guts the total energy requirements would be in the high Megajoule to low Gigajoule range. That's far too much heat for any real-world creature to generate through chemical digestion - it requires about a ton of meat to generate 10MJ of energy.

However, if it only needs enough total energy to, say, melt a kilogram of steel, in its entire system and can instantaneously shunt that energy around at will via some kind of magic, then the total energy needed is only ~900kJ (assuming its perfectly efficient, heatloss could drastically increase that), which can be obtained from 90kg of meat.

JRM

03-31-2009 04:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10172562)

Rhemorazes do not install themselves in frozen wastelands : frozen wastelands install themselves around rhemorazes. They absorb that much heat. Also, why your typical frozen wasteland-dweller is from a viking-type civilization of barbarian-fighter churning out magic tricks : rhemorazes absorb such a quantity of thaum as to make the spontaneous discovery of magic a very rare occurrence, and so the civ' develops very few magic-users.

As I said earlier, I like this idea on a magical-symbolic level, you can have a "The Polar Worms have stolen Spring" kind of scenario.

Unfortunately, I don't believe it works on a thermodynamic level, because (a) The sunlight on a 60-mile wide area (a remorhaz's average territory) should be about 1-10 Terawatts, [EDIT: Derived from another back-of-the-envelope calculation based on the Sun's average output. The energy varies depending on the latitude. Another approach is back-figuring from the Stefan-Boltzmann law for black body radiation and the Earth's mean surface temperature of ~288K, which gives an average figure of ~5.7TW for thermal equilibrium over that area.]

assuming Earth-like conditions, which is thousands of times the likely heat requirements of its blast-furnace metabolism; [EDITED EDIT: Of course, if there were hundreds or thousands of Polar Worms in each territory it could explain it.:D] and (b) it would also need to sequester the heat somehow, if it just re-emits that energy most of it will end up back in the local environment and you won't get a frozen wasteland.

Hmm... maybe it converts the energy into thrym? And the energy may be small compared to sunlight, but it could be "the straw that tips the balance" to create an iceage.

Personally, I think we'd have to revert to "magic dun it".:)

JRM

03-31-2009 04:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10177447)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10177274)

My thoughts on the Remorhaz has always been: what the heck are these things eating that requires that much heat to digest and still yields enough energy by digesting it that generating all that heat is energy-efficient?

'Cause if your intestines need to get that hot, you're not eating organic matter unless you're also crapping out diamonds. Maybe they're gobbling up rock and calcining it? Their whole set-up seems like it would fit in well wi some sort of alt biochemistry.

Actually, they'd've been a good choice for another critter dropped by the crash in the background of "Expedition to the Barrier Peaks", sort of like the Aurumvorax and its weird biochemistry.

Suddenly a better reason for entering a Remorhaz' tunnels - getting all those diamonds that the thing has crapped out.

Sorry, but diamonds require a lot of energy to create - they're so tough because of the chemical energy in all those tetrahedral Carbon-Carbon bonds. It would make more sense going the other way and saying the Remorhaz eats diamonds, using its super-heat to unlock the calories stored within them.

Sleeper

03-31-2009 09:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10178475)
The hot vein quip was just a touch of humour, hence the :).

So was the "mild, temperate" comment, albeit minus the smiley.

Though I don't think anybody was claiming that a remorhaz stealing spring and pooping diamonds was anything but mythic. :)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10178475)
However, if it only needs enough total energy to, say, melt a kilogram of steel, in its entire system and can instantaneously shunt that energy around at will via some kind of magic, then the total energy needed is only ~900k (assuming its perfectly efficient, heatloss could drastically increase that), which can be obtained from 90kg of meat.

Sounds pretty good, then. Assuming the heat is normally stored in an organ in the gut, and veins lead to the surface of the of the horns, the remorhaz can transfer the heat in response to minute vibrations or some other physical cue. Perhaps when the creature is angry, the channels partially open, explaining the glowing red back. Sort of warming the engine, as it were. If this spillover is mostly in the visible and not IR range, then there would be minimal energy loss. Requires very efficient biological insulators and conductors and some kind of tactile sense that doesn't get fried by the proximity to the heat, but we can handwave that.

JRM

03-31-2009 10:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10179225)

Sounds pretty good, then. Assuming the heat is normally stored in an organ in the gut, and veins lead to the surface of the of the horns, the remorhaz can transfer the heat in response to minute vibrations or some other physical cue. Perhaps when the creature is angry, the channels partially open, explaining the glowing red back. Sort of warming the engine, as it were.

Yes, it puts us within plausible energy levels. The Remorhaz could still be losing a lot of heat while it's back is red-hot, even if it minimizes convection and conduction losses. Say, its back is at 800 degrees Kelvin (~526C, as hot as a low-burning blacksmith's forge, just enough to glow red & soften iron or steel) and the radiating surfaces add up to 3 square metres (assumes the protrusions on its back add up to about a foot wide and thirty feet long), the Stefan-Boltzmann black body law says it will radiate a total of 70 Kilowatts.

That seems about right to me, it would be like the Polar Worm having a row of electric heaters down its back - uncomfortably warm to anyone close to it, but nowhere near blast-furnace heat. (If it was continuously hot enough to melt steel on contact it would need to be at 2500 degrees Kelvin+, and would be radiating energy a hundred times as fast if not more - 7+ Megawatts of heat!)

That's still the caloric content of 7kgs of meat per second though, or 420 kg per minute, so it will want to keep its heat use to a minimum. Although we could say it 'pulses' its heat (A hundred one-millisecond pulses per second would look the same but require a tenth of the energy), or the emission area is actually less than that, or just use one of those AD&D variants with 10-second melee rounds.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10179225)

If this spillover is mostly in the visible and not IR range, then there would be minimal energy loss. Requires very efficient biological insulators and conductors and some kind of tactile sense that doesn't get fried by the proximity to the heat, but we can handwave that.

Why minimal energy loss for visible thermal energy as opposed to IR? A joule of photonic energy is a joule of energy, regardless of the wavelength. Furthermore, a black-body radiates thermal energy to the fourth power of the temperature, so an object that visibly glows red-hot (at, say 800+ degrees Kelvin) object will radiate roughly fifty times the energy of a room temperature object at 300 degrees Kelvin, all things being equal ($8^4/3^4 \approx 50$).

One idea I had is that the 'Remorhaz's red glow' isn't black-body but is concentrated in the visible spectrum, kind of like a fluorescent tube, so is "more light than heat", is that the sort of thing you're talking about?

Kakita Kojiro

03-31-2009 10:57 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10178535)

Sorry, but diamonds require a lot of energy to create - they're so tough because of the chemical energy in all those tetrahedral Carbon-Carbon bonds. It would make more sense going the other way and saying the Remorhaz eats diamonds, using its super-heat to unlock the calories stored within them.

I'm actually a chemical engineer, so I did in fact realize that. It was an example of using hyperbole to point out the ridiculousness of the situation... a time-honored Internet tradition.

Appropriate that some pedant pointed out the factual error, also a time-honored Internet tradition. :p:D

noisms

03-31-2009 11:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Revenant

Where do Revenants originally come from? I seem to remember reading a short story in one of those Dragonlance compilations a long, long time ago (Kender, Gullydwarves and Gnomes, maybe?) in which the main character was one - although unfortunately this wasn't presented as a dramatic plot twist, which would have been more entertaining, I think.

Anyway, Revenants. Intelligent zombies who come back from the grave to exact horrible revenge on those who killed them. A fine idea, and very easy to work into a game: either the players have killed somebody who is now after vengeance, they become pawns in the plans of a Revenant, or one of them dies and is Revenant-ised. Whatever - all of them are good.

I'd like to work out the chance of becoming a Revenant. The stipulations are the you have to have a Constitution of 18, a Wisdom or Intelligence of 16+, and stats amounting to a total of over 90; you then get a 5% chance. It seems slightly odd to limit the process to people who are virtually superheros already - I can't help but think that those of us who are unhealthy and stupid should also get to take revenge. Murder is murder after all!

Revenants are tough - they are immune to the typical anti-undead arsenal, and regenerate. Like most regenerators, though, they are vulnerable to fire. Rather disappointingly, if they are destroyed or if the body rots, that is the end of them. I would have preferred it if the spirit were to search for different hosts each time it body is destroyed - a little bit like that Australian fellow from the Matrix films.

JRM

03-31-2009 11:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10178475)

However, if it only needs enough total energy to, say, melt a kilogram of steel, in its entire system and can instantaneously shunt that energy around at will via some kind of magic, then the total energy needed is only ~900k (assuming its perfectly efficient, heatloss could drastically increase that), which can be obtained from 90kg of meat.

I should point out that this ~900kJ is probably an underestimate. I guesstimated it based on an "average value" for steel's melting point (which, unfortunately, varies depending on the type of steel) and specific heat (the energy needed to increase the temperate which, even more unfortunately, varies with different types of steel and changes as the temperature change). Plus, I couldn't find what steel's heat of fusion was (the energy needed to change it from solid to liquid when it reaches melting temperature). I did find an abstract for a paper on making Carbon steel by smelting powdered steel which indicated this process required ~5400kJ per kilogram, excluding heat lost from the blast furnace. That may be a more appropriate figure, if we assume processes of similar efficiency are involved.

It may be useful to compare the energies requires to melt and boil water. If we begin at -10 degrees C and assume the 5400 kJ/kg figure above, then the energy needed to blast-melt a kilo of steel would melt just over 14.3 kg of ice, or vaporize about 1.7 kg ice into steam. That's surprisingly little, but then water has a remarkably high enthalpy.

If the Remorhaz was radiating 70kW of power at 800K as I hypothesized earlier, that's enough energy every minute to melt 11.2 kg of ice or vaporize 1.4 kg of ice. If it's the 2500K 'blast furnace' version it's melting 1.1 tonnes of ice a minute instead, so even it would take some time to create a meltwater pool of significant size. (assuming it's only radiative heat, convective & conductive heating should increase those figures greatly).

I had another idea about Ice and the Remorhaz. If a big chunk of ice hits a red-hot remorhaz's back, wouldn't it dump heat into the 'attack' as usual? The resulting steam explosion could be powerful enough to break the Polar Worm's back.

Maybe that is how Frost Giant's hunt Remorhaz, they anger them and then toss ice boulders onto their spines?

JRM

04-01-2009 12:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10179594)

I'm actually a chemical engineer, so I did in fact realize that. It was an example of using hyperbole to point out the ridiculousness of the situation... a time-honored Internets tradition.

Appropriate that some pedant pointed out the factual error, also a time-honored Internet tradition. :p:D

So you're a chemical engineer are you, now all we need is a metallurgist to tell us how much heat we need for that Remorhaz to melt steel.:o

I don't really care that it's ridiculous so long as I'm having fun, which is possibly another hallowed internet tradition.:D

To me, AD&D seems a rather curious mix of magical-fantasy and real-world facts, which allows for a lot of amusement from ~~pointless arguments~~ fascinatingly constructive debates of this sort.;

JRM

04-01-2009 12:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10179875)

Revenant

SNIP

I'd like to work out the chance of becoming a Revenant. The stipulations are the you have to have a Constitution of 18, a Wisdom or Intelligence of 16+, and stats amounting to a total of over 90; you then get a 5% chance.

Hmm, it'd be pretty low. Assuming best 4 out of 3d6 the chance of rolling the 18 is 21/1296 and the chance of rolling either 16+ is 169/1296. Multiply those together is 599781/2176782336 or ~0.027% and you still have to roll high enough on the other three stats to bring the total to 90+. I can't be arsed working out the exact odds of that, but it involves rolling a total of 36-40 or more on Str, Dex & Cha. Just eyeballing it, that's probably around 1:100, so in total somewhere around one in 300,000 characters will be eligible for Revenancy.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10179875)

It seems slightly odd to limit the process to people who are virtually superheroes already - I can't help but think that those of us who are unhealthy and stupid should also get to take revenge. Murder is murder after all!

Definitely right! The monster should allow for the helpless innocent murder victim returned from the grave as an unstoppable engine of destruction. They've already said it requires "exceptional circumstances", they could have just left it at that and DM's fiat. Although I can understand why a person with high Con or mental stats would have the will-power or tenacity of life to be more likely to return from the grave.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10179875)

Rather disappointingly, if they are destroyed or if the body rots, that is the end of them. I would have preferred it if the spirit were to search for different hosts each time its body is destroyed - a little bit like that Australian fellow from the Matrix films.

A revenant can do that "body-swap" thing, according to the Monstrous Compendium, but only if all three of its mental stats are 18.

Kakita Kojiro

04-01-2009 01:45 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10179932)

So you're a chemical engineer are you, now all we need is a metallurgist to tell us how much heat we need for that Remorhaz to melt steel.:o

Oh, no. Down that road lies only madness, my friend.

In addition to me as the ChemE, I've got two biologists (one with PhD, one working on it), a linguist, a hobbyist swordsmith, and a computer guy (as required; all game groups must have a computer guy). If I start applying my specialty to games, they all will. That'd be a pedantpalooza, not gaming.

As it is, our game nearly derails at the appearance of giant insects, faux-latinized plurals, or references to "longswords". Remorhaz chemistry would be beyond the pale. (besides... I can't think of any reasonable reaction that could be going on inside those things, anyway :o)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10180108)

A revenant can do that "body-swap" thing, according to the Monstrous Compendium, but only if all three of its mental stats are 18.

With that many 18s, I deduce such revenants must have once been GMPCs, understandably murdered by the annoyed PCs. This seems like a set-up to get the unkillable GMPC, then...

Sleeper

04-01-2009 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10179586)

Why minimal energy loss for visible thermal energy as opposed to IR?

For a glow, not heat.

And the heat of fusion for iron seems to be in the high 200s kJ/kg. Don't know about steel.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10180108)

Just eyeballing it, that's probably around 1:100, so in total somewhere around one in 300,000 characters will be eligible for Revenancy.

A quick Monte Carlo simulation using 3d6 came up with 7 out of a million characters that met the basic requirements (Con = 18, Int or Wis > 16, total >= 90), and the 5% chance means that's about 1 in 3,000,000. Using 4d6 drop lowest, there were 276/1,000,000 which works out to 1 in 70,000 or so. cough plot device /cough.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10180363)

In addition to me as the ChemE, I've got two biologists (one with PhD, one working on it), a linguist, a hobbyist swordsmith, and a computer guy (as required; all game groups must have a computer guy). If I start applying my specialty to games, they all will. That'd be a pedantpaloosa, not gaming.

Quickly starts to resemble work, doesn't it? It can be fun occasionally, but I have no problems with some wild speculation followed by a good dose of handwavium, either. :)

6inTruder

04-01-2009 02:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Damn! Now I want to have a little adventure in the 4ed game I'm about to start where the PCs get embroiled in a Revenant (former Bard) revenging itself on the gang who killed it and its lover!

Monsieur Meuble

04-01-2009 03:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Good Lord ! We discuss for six pages on the energetic balance of the rhemoraz in Newtonian physic up to the joule in a fantasy world where "Cold" is a type of energy, and now we are about to calculate the statistical chances of a random character becoming a revenant depending on its method of rolling in a narrative-driven world !

Can't we just discuss the possibility of a potent evil wizard who, almost slain by the PC, turns himself into a lich, then get killed, leave phantom, come back as a revenant, get killed once again, leave another phantom and come back once more a spectre while its bones are used as Skeleton ? (not a zombie : he has been killed with fire the third time)

And can we put more undead templates in this story of the bad guy that just keep coming back ?

Sleeper

04-01-2009 03:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10179875)

Revenant

Where do Revenants originally come from? I seem to remember reading a short story in one of those Dragonlance compilations a long, long time ago (Kender, Gullydwarves and Gnomes, maybe?) in which the main character was one - although unfortunately this wasn't presented as a dramatic plot twist, which would have been more entertaining, I think.

They were one of the monsters in the original Fiend Folio, which means they might have first appeared in the White Dwarf magazine. IME, they seemed well-liked, but were rarely used. The art was actually pretty cool, which probably helped their popularity a bit.

Only people who were at the apex of physical health and the pinnacle of mental cunning become revenants. Why not turn that around? Instead of assuming that only the most hardy and clever souls are capable of becoming revenants, why not assume that people become revenants because something admires those traits, and chooses them to become embodied spirits of vengeance.

The god of retribution is petty, vain, and cruel, and takes pains to ensure the mortal world does not forget her. Once or twice a year, she scans the book of the recently slain, and chooses a favorite from among all the fallen mortals. One who burns with the desire for vengeance, and who embodies the attributes she holds most dear: sheer physical fortitude and persistence, and a base and cruel wit. Then she descends to their not-so-final resting place, and breathes a fraction of her power into the corpse's decaying lungs. It wakes with a gasp, and with furious energy rips fingernails and shreds flesh as it burrows out of its grave.

When a new spirit awakes, its name sears itself into the Book of Blood and Steel, her cult's most holy of books. When this happens, her priests and worshippers rejoice in an impromptu festival, and then spread to the four quarters of the world, tracking down the restless spirit with both spells and cunning. Any worshipper who succeeds in finding the revenant while it still hunts and sees firsthand the implacable fire in its eyes, is considered blessed. If found, the site of its rebirth, where the god infused a portion of her spirit and created an avatar or exemplar of everything she holds dear, becomes littered with offerings and sacrifices from the faithful, and sometimes becomes the site of a new shrine.

If the enemies of a revenant fall under its bony claws, the deeds of the person in both life and undeath are chronicled in the Book; and the person is forever honored as a saint. For the next season, the priests stand on crates in town squares and preach Her word by shouting the tales of bloody revenge wreaked by her latest favored one to anyone who lends them an ear.

However, if the revenant fails to slay those who wronged it, it is a dark and bleak season. The priests scratch out its name from the holy speak, and only speak in whispers until the coming of the next blessed spirit.

Sleeper

04-01-2009 03:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Monsieur Meuble (Post 10180699)

Good Lord ! We discuss for six pages on the energetic balance of the rhemoraz in Newtonian physic up to the joule in a fantasy world where "Cold" is a type of energy, and now we are about to calculate the statistical chances of a random character becoming a revenant depending on its method of rolling in a narrative-driven world !

Oh no, badwrongfun!

It is okay to just not participate in discussions you don't enjoy. Or post what you do like. I rather like that the thread veers here and there, and touches on all kinds of things. The regular posting of new entries means discussion is rebooted every couple of days, which works quite well. Even if the chat wanders in a direction I don't favor, it doesn't last.

Äkräs

04-01-2009 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10180418)

A quick Monte Carlo simulation using 3d6 came up with 7 out of a million characters that met the basic requirement (Con = 18, Int or Wis > 16, total >= 90), and the 5% chance means that's about 1 in 3,000,000.

Supposing that I didn't make any embarrassing mistakes on the way, the exact probability is 15902111/63474972917760 (or ~5 in a million / 20).

Quote:

Using 4d6 drop lowest, there were 276/1,000,000 which works out to 1 in 70,000 or so. cough plot device /cough.

Did you remember that with 4d6 drop lowest you can arrange the values in any order you desire? (Well, at least in AD&D 1st ed you could and I'm going with that). Taking that into account the probability is 987616567434049/438739012807557120 which is approximately 0.2% or 2 in a thousand. (This figure is more likely to be correct than the previous one).

Monsieur Meuble

04-01-2009 04:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10180811)
Oh no, badwrongfun!

It is okay to just not participate in discussions you don't enjoy. Or post what you do like. I rather like that the thread veers here and there, and touches on all kinds of things. The regular posting of new entries means discussion is rebooted every couple of days, which works quite well. Even if the chat wanders in a direction I don't favor, it doesn't last.

Okay, sorry, that was tongue-in-cheek-sih, seeing two consecutive monsters leading to math-heavy discussions...

Sleeper

04-01-2009 05:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I do like the idea of someone that manages to come back as two separate undead at the same time, Monsieur Meuble. Perhaps the higher soul is the person's nature or morality. This is the part that goes to the Upper Planes. The lower soul is the memories, and becomes part of the World Soul, the Akashic Records. When a person dies, the higher soul goes to its reward, and slowly loses contact with its lower soul. When this process is complete, the soul is eligible for reincarnation. If the body becomes a corporeal, intelligent undead, the connection to the lower soul is restored. However, the lack of higher soul means the person acts without moral restraint, explaining their generally evil nature.

All deaths can create phantoms. They're just memories, a link to a portion of the World Soul. A creature can also be raised as spectre or other incorporeal undead. Unfettered from the body, the creature retains the memories of the original creature, but lacks any sense of right or wrong. The same body could also be raised as an unintelligent undead, like a skeleton. Lacking memories or a conscience, it is a simple automaton. The higher soul of the same creature can be reborn, in a new body. Perhaps the world soul works on some kind of file-locking process. Only one connection to a particular set of memories can exist. If a phantom exists, the spectre can't remember how it died. If the spectre exists, a reincarnated soul's memory of its previous life can't be restored.

However, perhaps there is an exception. When the conscious mind is sleeping, the record lock is released. Perhaps instead of being powerless in daylight, spectres simply don't exist between sunrise and sunset. Until night falls, they just aren't. So the reincarnated person might start to recall memories of their former life, but only during the day. However, those memories are mixed with nightmarish horror. Not memories of their life, but horrible memories of their unlife as well.

So our hero dies. We have a phantom, who replays the death. A malevolent spectre who remembers being warm and living, but feels nothing but hatred and antipathy and can't remember how it died. And we have a youth, who fears to sleep during the day because in his dreams he remembers being a great hero... but also, a monster. And somewhere out there, a necromancer raised his old body and sent it out to kill his family from his previous life.

What happens when he stumbles upon his old body's zombie, raised by the spectre who shares the memories of his former life, strangling an elderly stranger that he for some reason recognizes as his wife?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Äkräs (Post 10180866)

Supposing that I didn't make any embarrassing mistakes on the way, the exact probability is 15902111/63474972917760 (or ~5 in a million / 20).

About 40% off my figure, which is pretty good considering I only had 7 hits.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Äkräs (Post 10180866)

Did you remember that with 4d6 drop lowest you can arrange the values in any order you desire? (Well, at least in AD&D 1st ed you could and I'm going with that). Taking that into account the probability is 987616567434049/438739012807557120 which is approximately 0.2% or 2 in a thousand. (This figure is more likely to be correct than the previous one).

I figured the expected number of revenants in the general population of elite adventuring-types was more useful than the chance of a specific character optimized toward becoming a revenant actually becomes one.

YojimboC

04-01-2009 05:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10179875)

Where do Revenants originally come from?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10180715)

They were one of the monsters in the original Fiend Folio, which means they might have first appeared in the White Dwarf magazine. IME, they seemed well-liked, but were rarely used. The art was actually pretty cool, which probably helped their popularity a bit.

What Sleeper said. The art for the revenant in the Fiend Folio was absolutely fantastic, done by the same guy who did the Githyanki on the cover I believe, and the revenant looked so good he even got two illustrations. Man, I always wanted to use a revenant in a campaign, but I never managed to pull it off.

The closest I ever came was coming with a superhero who was a revenant. I don't know why, but I always rooted for the poor fellows -- returning from the dead to avenge their murders sounds like a noble quest to me.

Found this on the internet, so take it as you will:

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wikipedia

A revenant is a visible ghost or animated corpse that was believed to return from the grave to terrorize the living.[1] The word "revenant" is derived from the French, revenir, "to return"; in French, "revenant" means "returning". Belief in revenants emerged in Western Europe (especially Great Britain, and later carried by Anglo-Norman invaders to Ireland) during the High Middle Ages. Though later legend and folklore depicts revenants as returning for a specific purpose (e.g., revenge against the deceased's killer), in most Medieval depictions they simply return to harass their surviving families and neighbours. Revenants share a number of characteristics with folkloric vampires.

demiurge1138

04-01-2009 06:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

That Wikipedia entry has some good ideas in it. Tying the revenant to the family line and not to an individual murderer lets you do a Hound of the Baskervilles sort of thing, with the cursed family beset upon by tragedies inflicted by the revenant, and the PCs have to find out how to redress the injury even though the actual murderer is long since dead.

Also, the use of the word "harass" gives me the image of a juvenile, annoying revenant who merely irritates the family that wronged it, not kill or ruin--things like throwing rocks at the windows, directing weak-but-annoying monsters like gremlins to their gates, vandalizing their property and spooking the livestock, things like that.

And I agree to the sentiment that revenants always struck me as the most sympathetic and interesting of the undead. I love the idea of a revenant private detective, who uses his skills at man-hunting to prevent others from dying in the streets like he did, always piecing together the clues to determine who really killed him, and why..

JRM

04-01-2009 04:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10180418)

And the heat of fusion for iron seems to be in the high 200s kJ/kg. Don't know about steel.

Gah! I looked up Iron for the melting point, but didn't think to check its heat of fusion.:(

Thanks for the pointer, Sleeper.

Let's see Iron's heat of fusion is 13.8 kJ/mol which works out as ~250 kJ/kg, so would increase my energy guesstimate to 1050 kJ/kg.

That's not very much when spread over the Remorhaz's back, if we spread a kilogram of steel over my estimate of a Remorhaz's heat-vane area of 3 square metres it's only 44 microns thick, and would cool down within minutes due to radiative heat losses alone. If it had to have enough heat to melt steel at each point of impact it would have to have hundreds of times the energy on its back, and probably at least as much in its guts.

JRM

04-01-2009 04:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10181572)

And I agree to the sentiment that revenants always struck me as the most sympathetic and interesting of the undead. I love the idea of a revenant private detective, who uses his skills at man-hunting to prevent others from dying in the streets like he did, always piecing together the clues to determine who really killed him, and why...

Am I wrong to think that revenant PI should team up with the Otyugh PI to form a partnership the players will never forget!:)

Anyhows, that raises a question. An AD&D revenant appears to be created by the urge to kill its murderer(s). Does it have to know who killed it? If not, what happens - does it hunt down every murderer it hears about, in the hope of eventually slaying its own? Does it kill all its enemies, hoping one of them was responsible? Does it go mad with frustration and just slaughter everyone it encounters, just in case they're guilty of its murder? Does it give up in despair and crawl back into its tomb? I suppose it's possible a revenant can only be created if it can identify its killer - it's the personal touch that gives it the tad more rage it needs to claw its way out of the grave - but I like the idea that revenants can be created by undirected anger at their deaths, and each deals with it in a manner that matches their personalities.

EDIT: After typing that 'personal touch' bit I'm now imagining a revenant who came back for revenge because its murderer said "I's going to kill yous, and your mamma's fat too."

Just one little insult added the necessary 0.2 millithaums of psycho-magical energy its spirit needed to make the vivo-necro state transition.:cool:

And yes, I am not being serious.:p

noisms

04-02-2009 08:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Roc

First things first: this is the second in a triumvirate of crap (in my opinion) illustrations, though we have to wait for the next entry for the pinnacle of awfulness. This picture is not technically that bad, but just too cartoonish and not at all evocative. There's no sense of the "Wow! That bird is carrying off an elephant!" that there should be.

Now that I've got that off my chest... Rocs. Gargantuan birds of prey, with wingspans of 120' and a penchant for eating elephants. How can you go wrong? This entry does however bring up the hitherto (I think) undiscussed-in-these-threads issue of big-creatures-and-damage. How is it, for example, that a Roc's claws only deal out 3d6 hit points? That's only about twice as damaging as a long sword. Think about that for a second. A 60' tall eagle grabs you with its talons. And that's only the same as being hit twice with a sword? Odd, don't you think? I know that being squished by a Roc's claws isn't exactly heroic, but still.

There's plenty to complain about in this entry, actually: there is a 65% chance that if a Roc grabs you, your arms will be pinned to your side (not 66% or 64%, mark you - 65%), and a 95% chance that a Roc will try to carry you off if it takes hold. Meanwhile, there is a 15% chance of finding eggs in a nest, and -5 to surprise rolls on diving Roc attacks. Grr. And bah. Surely there must have been an easier way of sorting out this sort of thing.

Anyway, I do like Rocs, believe it or not. Who wouldn't? There's so much you can use to make a game interesting. From treasure in the nest (taken there when the Roc carries off horses or camels bearing trade goods) to the fact that mountain dwarves employ teams of adventurers as Roc-egg smashers, to the usefulness of Roc feathers in spell casting to the way Storm and Cloud giants tame the things for riding. Great! Although this - "Rocs serve to keep down the number of large predators, as they are fond of ankheg, purple worms, and harpies. Thanks to the rocs' prodigious appetites, these creatures are not swarming about with impunity" - is, let's face it, a bit silly.

YojimboC

04-02-2009 11:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Rocs are dumb.

There, I said it.

Animals that large that aren't unique (like Godzilla) or forces of nature (like Gargantua) but are meant to be a viable, living species with breeding populations and such, simply break my normally robust suspension of disbelief.

Sleeper

04-03-2009 12:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10188674)

Now that I've got that off my chest... Rocs. Gargantuan birds of prey, with wingspans of 120' and a penchant for eating elephants. How can you go wrong? This entry does however bring up the hitherto (I think) undiscussed-in-these-threads issue of big-creatures-and-damage. How is it, for example, that a Roc's claws only deal out 3d6 hit points? That's only about twice as damaging as a long sword. Think about that for a second. A 60' tall eagle grabs you with its talons. And that's only the same as being hit twice with a sword? Odd, don't you think? I know that being squished by a Roc's claws isn't exactly heroic, but still.

How much damage do you think it should do?

Ratoslov

04-03-2009 01:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10189374)

Rocs are dumb.

Dumb as a roc, even.

YojimboC

04-03-2009 08:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 10189872)
Dumb as a roc, even.

Oi.

EmperorSeth

04-03-2009 11:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

At this point, can anyone hear this name and not imagine Sean Connery saying it? Because I know I must.

ESkemp

04-03-2009 11:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I'm just surprised the two-headed roc isn't a staple of the D&D roc. I know the game's had its fair share of designers who are also aficionados of Harryhausen movies.

JRM

04-04-2009 01:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10189374)
Rocs are dumb.

There, I said it.

Animals that large that aren't unique (like Godzilla) or forces of nature (like Gargantua) but are meant to be a viable living species with breeding populations and such, simply break my normally robust suspension of disbelief.

Ah, but that was only until a druid cast an awaken spell upon a roc and discovered they are the greatest natural bards on the Prime Material plane.

Imagine the scene: A hushed open-air arena, a huge bird attired in glorious plumage descends upon the stage, spreads its wings over audience and starts screaming out the lyrics of Eye of the Eagle.

Yup, no doubt about it.

Those birds roc.:)

Kakita Kojiro

04-04-2009 01:29 AM

Oy.

JRM

04-04-2009 02:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10188674)

Roc

First things first: this is the second in a triumvirate of crap (in my opinion) illustrations, though we have to wait for the next entry for the pinnacle of awfulness. This picture is not technically that bad, but just too cartoonish and not at all evocative. There's no sense of the "Wow! That bird is carrying off an elephant!" that there should be.

Well, while I certainly feel said illustration is rather weak and cartoonish, and when I last looked at it it made me think "why is that eagle carrying off a minimal elephant?, I didn't think minimal elephants grew that small" more than "look at the size of that!".

In partial defense it can be very tricky giving an idea of size when you've just got an animal with no familiar objects to compare it with. If the picture had a landscape with houses, or some humans for size-comparison, it'd have been much easier to get the Wow factor.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10188674)

Now that I've got that off my chest... Rocs. Gargantuan birds of prey, with wingspans of 120' and a penchant for eating elephants. How can you go wrong? This entry does however bring up the hitherto (I think) undiscussed-in-these-threads issue of big-creatures-and-damage. How is it, for example, that a Roc's claws only deal out 3d6 hit points? That's only about twice as damaging as a long sword. Think about that for a second. A 60' tall eagle grabs you with its talons. And that's only the same as being hit twice with a sword? Odd, don't you think? I know that being squished by a Roc's claws isn't exactly heroic, but still.

Well I guess it depends on how you think damage in D&D should scale, but then it begins to have the perennial argument of what hit points are. Still it does seem odd that a Roc does only 3-18 per claw, I'd think 3-30 may be suitable, based on other Gargantuan monsters like the Storm Giant (3-30+12 damage) or Red Dragon (1-10/1-10/3-30 damage).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10188674)

Anyway, I do like Rocs, believe it or not. Who wouldn't? There's so much you can use to make a game interesting. From treasure in the nest (taken there when the Roc carries off horses or camels bearing trade goods) to the fact that mountain dwarves employ teams of adventurers as Roc-egg smashers, to the usefulness of Roc feathers in spell casting to the way Storm and Cloud giants tame the things for riding. Great! Although this - "Rocs serve to keep down the number of large predators, as they are fond of ankheg, purple worms, and harpies. Thanks to the rocs' prodigious appetites, these creatures are not swarming about with impunity" - is, let's face it, a bit silly.

Well we know from Sinbad that egg-smashing ends with the Rocs wanting to wreak a horrible revenge. (Hmm... speaking of horrible revenge, do Rocs ever return as Revenants? :D) That very story has Ma and Pa Roc sinking a ship by dive-bombing huge boulders at the vessel. I'd have liked them to have included some mention of that in the Monstrous Manual.

As for the Ankheg and Purple Worms, both those animals are subterranean, so how do the Rocs find them? Do these arthropods occasionally venture onto the surface for some reason (mating?) at a time and location the Rocs know of, or does the Roc use some kind of "worm charming" to lure them above ground?

I remember reading another Sinbad tale where he finds a valley full of gigantic snakes and gemstones, which is the favourite hunting ground of a Roc. Maybe that's what inspired the liking for Purple Worm / Ankheg meat, or it could be just the old "birds like to eat worms" magnified to Gargantuan scale?

Still, humanity should be glad that Rocs prefer to hunt prey of Large or Huge size rather than man-sized victims. Just imagine an owl magnified to the same scale as a Roc is larger than an eagle. A roc-scale owl could be a 30-45 foot long nocturnal predator with a 70-100 foot wingspan, able to hear a man's footsteps from a furlong away and swoop soundlessly down to snatch man and livestock away to their doom.

I also like the idea of a roc-scale peregrine falcon that dives to smash flying creatures out of the air, there are plenty of AD&D monsters that would make suitable prey - e.g. giant insects, pteranodon, gryphon, pegasus, wyvern and even young dragons.

The Last Conformist

04-04-2009 07:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10188674)

Now that I've got that off my chest... Rocs. Gargantuan birds of prey, with wingspans of 120' and a penchant for eating elephants. How can you go wrong? This entry does however bring up the hitherto (I think) undiscussed-in-these-threads issue of big-creatures-and-damage. How is it, for example, that a Roc's claws only deal out 3d6 hit points? That's only about twice as damaging as a long sword. Think about that for a second. A 60' tall eagle grabs you with its talons. And that's only the same as being hit twice with a sword? Odd, don't you think? I know that being squished by a Roc's claws isn't exactly heroic, but still.

Look at it this way - a good hit by a sword will kill you dead. How much worse could getting squished by a humongous bird possibly be? :p

JRM

04-04-2009 07:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10195850)

Look at it this way - a good hit by a sword will kill you dead. How much worse could getting squished by a humongous bird possibly be? :p

That argument's little different from saying "being stabbed with a chopstick can kill you dead, so how come chopsticks do how much worse could a good hit by a sword possibly be?" (And, yes AD&D did have rules for chopsticks are melee weapons.):confused:

Although I fear this line of inquiry will end in discord, since it depends on the dreaded "what are hit points" issue.

Sleeper

04-04-2009 11:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

In 3.X, base damage scales according to the square root of the linear dimension. Quadruple in length (e.g. Medium to Huge) and double the damage (e.g. 1d6 to 2d6). This ignores Strength modifiers, but except for a few special cases earlier editions didn't really factor that in. Using this, and the roc as a base, the expected damage for the giant eagle (similar morphology, with a known wingspan of 20 ft) is 1.22d6 (~1d8) with a claw, and 1.63d6 (~1d10) with a bite. That's a little different than the actual 1d6/1d6/2d6... but if you add up the claw/claw/bite routines and compare, the giant eagle's average of 14 points of damage is very close to the expected total damage of a scaled-down roc (14.29). The only other bird we can easily compare is the large hawk (5 ft wingspan), which doesn't work out as nicely (the hawk-sized roc should do about 7.14 or roughly 2d6 or 3d4 damage, which is almost double the actual 1d2/1d2/1). But then humans and smaller-than-human creatures in D&D don't seem to follow the same scale as larger-than-human creatures (humans should really have about 3 HD, for instance).

noisms

04-05-2009 09:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10194425)

Still, humanity should be glad that Rocs prefer to hunt prey of Large or Huge size rather than man-sized victims. Just imagine an owl magnified to the same scale as a Roc is larger than an eagle. A roc-scale owl could be a 30-45 foot long nocturnal predator with a 70-100 foot wingspan, able to hear a man's footsteps from a furlong away and swoop soundlessly down to snatch man and livestock away to their doom.

I also like the idea of a roc-scale peregrine falcon that dives to smash flying creatures out of the air, there are plenty of AD&D monsters that would make suitable prey - e.g. giant insects, pteranodon, gryphon, pegasus, wyvern and even young dragons.

Those ideas are getting used.

noisms

04-05-2009 09:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10198031)

In 3.X, base damage scales according to the square root of the linear dimension. Quadruple in length (e.g. Medium to Huge) and double the damage (e.g. 1d6 to 2d6). This ignores Strength modifiers, but except for a few special cases earlier editions didn't really factor that in. Using this, and the roc as a base, the expected damage for the giant eagle (similar morphology, with a known wingspan of 20 ft) is 1.22d6 (~1d8) with a claw, and 1.63d6 (~1d10) with a bite. That's a little different than the actual 1d6/1d6/2d6... but if you add up the claw/claw/bite routines and compare, the giant eagle's average of 14 points of damage is very close to the expected total damage of a scaled-down roc (14.29). The only other bird we can easily compare is the large hawk (5 ft wingspan), which doesn't work out as nicely (the hawk-sized roc should do about 7.14 or roughly 2d6 or 3d4 damage, which is almost double the actual 1d2/1d2/1). But then humans and smaller-than-human creatures in D&D don't seem to follow the same scale as larger-than-human creatures (humans should really have about 3 HD, for instance).

Well, a Roc has a wingspan of 120', which is six times the size of a Giant Eagle. So... my maths isn't what it was.

Actually, having looked at a few of the other 'big monster' entries, the damage dealt is pretty low. A Red Dragon of comparable size to a Roc only does 1-10 damage per claw - which I don't believe scales.

Kakita Kojiro

04-05-2009 11:10 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10195850)

Look at it this way - a good hit by a sword will kill you dead. How much worse could getting squished by a humongous bird possibly be? :p

Ach. You're thinking about this all wrong.

D&D worlds are places where the common housecat's favored prey are Commoner NPCs and 1st level Wizards. So the rocs are obviously dining on mid-level wizards, at least. Not too shabby.

Sleeper

04-05-2009 11:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10199512)

Well, a Roc has a wingspan of 120', which is six times the size of a Giant Eagle. So... my maths isn't what it was.

Actually, having looked at a few of the other 'big monster' entries, the damage dealt is pretty low. A Red Dragon of comparable size to a Roc only does 1-10 damage per claw - which I don't believe scales.

Yes, the square root of 6 is the multiplier/divider I used, though dragons do scale (the combat modifier based on age is applied to damage).

Overall, the damage for large creatures scales fairly slowly. That's deliberate. Otherwise, the only way to fight giants would be to set their stockade on fire, and have a thousand archers ready to shoot any that try to escape. Sending a handful of elite heroes into the stockade would just result in a lot of dead wannabe heroes. And the only solution to a dragon infestation would be to pay them tribute, or pack up and leave the country.

2E is also in a bit of a transitional weird spot. Look at how many monsters have a bonus to damage from strength. And then look again at how many do not. Given the relatively low damage, even a small bonus can bump the damage output of that monster well above its peers. 1E mostly lacked this, except in special cases or later books (ogres, but only when using weapons; there were also a few in the MM2). Also, 1E was actually fairly consistent when it came to damage and hit dice and scaling. 2E is largely the same, but three major groups of monsters were given a major upgrade in power that broke the old standards: Dragons, demons/devils, and giants. 3E rigorously applied damage bonuses based on strength as well as a metric for increasing base damage from size, but had to add Con bonuses so hit points could keep up with the damage output (this is why fireballs got so weak; they stayed at 1d6/level instead of 1d6+stat bonus/level). 4E of course inflated hit points even more, tossed out the rules for size and used a rule of thumb instead, and suppressed damage output so combat lasts longer.

noisms

04-05-2009 12:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10199893)

Yes, the square root of 6 is the multiplier/divider I used, though dragons do scale (the combat modifier based on age is applied to damage).

Overall, the damage for large creatures scales fairly slowly. That's deliberate. Otherwise, the only way to fight giants would be to set their stockade on fire, and have a thousand archers ready to shoot any that try to escape. Sending a handful of elite heroes into the stockade would just result in a lot of dead wannabe heroes. And the only solution to a dragon infestation would be to pay them tribute, or pack up and leave the country.

2E is also in a bit of a transitional weird spot. Look at how many monsters have a bonus to damage from strength. And then look again at how many do not. Given the relatively low damage, even a small bonus can bump the damage output of that monster well above its peers. 1E mostly lacked this, except in special cases or later books (ogres, but only when using weapons; there were also a few in the MM2). Also, 1E was actually fairly consistent when it came to damage and hit dice and scaling. 2E is largely the same, but three major groups of monsters were given a major upgrade in power that broke the old standards: Dragons, demons/devils, and giants. 3E rigorously applied damage bonuses based on strength as well as a metric for increasing base damage from size, but had to add Con bonuses so hit points could keep up with the damage output (this is why fireballs got so weak; they stayed at 1d6/level instead of 1d6+stat bonus/level). 4E of course inflated hit points even more, tossed out the rules for size and used a rule of thumb instead, and suppressed damage output so combat lasts longer.

The dragon damage modifier is only a flat +? though. So for example a dragon with an age category of 12 is approximately three times the size of a category 5 one, but only does +7 more damage.

I don't have a problem with 2e inflating the power of dragons/tanar'ri/baatezu/giants, and in fact think could maybe have gone farther. I like the idea of dragons in particular being epic monsters of myth who make even level 20 characters quake with fear. But that's just personal preference I suppose.

Sleeper

04-05-2009 01:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10200080)

The dragon damage modifier is only a flat +? though. So for example a dragon with an age category of 12 is approximately three times the size of a category 5 one, but only does +7 more damage.

+21, with a simple claw/claw/bite. Or +42 with a claw/claw/bite/tail slap or kick/wing buffet/wing buffet.

I rather like more powerful dragons, myself. But they do break the standard progression of HD/damage for their size.

The Last Conformist

04-05-2009 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10197576)

That argument's little different from saying "being stabbed with a chopstick can kill you dead, so how come chopsticks do how much worse could a good hit by a sword possibly be?" (And, yes AD&D did have rules for chopsticks are melee weapons.):confused:

The :p smiley was meant to indicate the argument was not being seriously advanced.

JRM

04-05-2009 05:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10200189)

+21, with a simple claw/claw/bite. Or +42 with a claw/claw/bite/tail slap or kick/wing buffet/wing buffet.

I rather like more powerful dragons, myself. But they do break the standard progression of HD/damage for their size.

I suspect noisms was talking about 2E dragons, which use their age category for damage bonus per attack (e.g. a Great Wyrm Red Dragon is Age Category 12, so does $1d10+12/1d10+12/3d10+12$ with a claw/claw/bite).

As for the 3E comparisons, I had a go at that a few days ago, and noticed that the regular Eagle is a step up in claw damage compared to the Giant Eagle & Roc. It's $1d4$ for a Small creature would be $1d8$ per claw if advanced to Large (like a Giant Eagle) or Gargantuan (like a Roc).

AD&D/3E comparisons monster damage are a bit tricky because Strength plays such a bigger role in the latter edition, and the Strength bonus tends to contribute a bigger proportion of damage as the monster gets bigger, which is especially significant if a monster has multiple primary attacks which get a full damage bonus.

A 3E Roc, for example, which does $2d6+12/2d6+12/2d8+6$ averages 23 points of damage from its weapon dice ($4d6+2d8 = 14+9$) and 30 from its strength bonus, a total of 53. An SRD giant eagle's $1d6+4/1d6+4/1d8+2$ averages 11.5 damage from its dice and 10 from its Strength, 21.5 in total. Thus, a Roc does about two-and-a-half times the Giant Eagle's damage instead of twice (which would be expected from Sleeper's square-root of length rule of thumb, which works pretty well for base damage). A Colossal Roc would do $3d6+16/3d6+16/3d8+8$ or an average of 34.5 from dice ($21+13.5$) and 40 from Strength, totaling 74.5, which is about 3.45 times a Giant Eagle's.

Now I'd like to have bigger creatures in d20 have less of their physical damage from Strength bonus and more from dice. So, say, a human hero with a greatsword does $2d6+6$ damage and an ogre with a $2d8+4$. The human has a Strength score of 22 and the ogre 18, but the ogre has a "size bonus" on its Strength for certain kinds of activities (grappling, lifting & carrying etc), but uses its Strength score for skills and the like. That would stop giant monsters in 3E having incredibly high Climb and Swim skills, just because they have such hefty Strength stats.

A 'size bonus' variant could also be substitute for the extra HD of bigger monsters, giving bonus hp, bonus to Fort saves and the like. That would allow for giant animals which don't also have to possess more skill ranks and higher base attacks simply for being bigger (because they wouldn't have to be high level monsters, an elephant could just be a '4th level' Huge Animal).

Guess I should get around to roughing out the details some time.

JRM

04-05-2009 05:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10200603)

The :p smiley was meant to indicate the argument was not being seriously advanced.

That's all right, it wasn't being seriously responded to either.;

Sleeper

04-06-2009 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10200632)

I suspect noisms was talking about 2E dragons, which use their age category for damage bonus per attack (e.g. a Great Wyrms Red Dragon is Age Category 12, so does $1d10+12/1d10+12/3d10+12$ with a claw/claw/bite).

So was I. The combat modifier is +5 young adult and +12 great wyrms. The difference is +7, and since it applies to each attack, the great wyrms does an extra +21 with only a claw/claw/bite routine, and +42 when adding wing buffets and a kick or tail slap. (Incidentally, adding +6d6 or +12d6 to attack has the same average).

And I thought I was pretty clear that the square root of the linear dimension only applied to the base damage. In 3E, the Str and Con modifiers are responsible for the inflation in both damage and hit points. This doesn't follow as simple a formula, and also makes it harder to compare the different editions (hit dice and to a lesser degree base damage are often the same across 3E and both its immediate ancestors).

The math can be determined, though it's fuzzier. Assuming an average Medium monster does 1d8 with a primary attack and 1d4 with a secondary attack (very arbitrary; this could be a bad mean) and has a Str of 10, each size increase boosts base damage by the square root of 2 and adds +6 from Str (1.5x+4 from +8 Str). Just glancing at the numbers, this seems to roughly double damage. This will vary based on the number of attacks and the size of attacks of course (e.g. boars less, dragons more). I wouldn't take that doubling as a general guideline, though. There are just too many different attack routines that will impact this in different ways, and you'd have to compare them all to see what makes a reasonable mean.

Mechanically, I wish the 3E designers went the other way in their design. What they did was take the base numbers, and then rigorously apply modifiers. This had the result of dramatically increasing the final numbers (hp, damage, and other things like ACs, saves, and so forth). If they kept the same final numbers (i.e. the 10.5 average damage caused by a monster's attack, instead of using an approximation or a slightly lower number as a base and applying all those new mods for a much higher final result), 3E would have been out-of-the-box mostly compatible with the older versions, and the numbers would have been smaller and more manageable.

And the fix to Climb and Swim are to base them on Dexterity, not Strength. Big creatures already have a faster base move, which accounts for the impact of their Str. Dex is how well they use that speed.

noisms

04-06-2009 11:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Roper

I've had difficulty taking this monster seriously because of the picture - which makes me snigger every time I look at it - and consequently haven't often used it. It is essentially a type of invertebrate thing which lurks in dungeons pretending to be a rock (never seen a monster like that before), and which shoots out tendrils to capture its victims. These tendrils appear to be coated with some sort of poison (it isn't actually made explicit) which weakens prey, so that it is all the easier to draw towards the maw.

There isn't all that much to say about the Roper - it's your bog-standard dungeon-ecology fare. There is an 'lol' moment about half-way through the entry where a mad impulse on the part of the writer has resulted in the line: "A group of ropers has been named a 'cluster' by scholars with nothing better to do." I quite like the little window that opens onto the mind of the designers. Whoever wrote that line must have been so sick of having 'sages' pop up in every entry and trying to find something interesting to say about them.

The Roper is also a notable instance of the trope where creatures which obviously have no earthly reason to want to store treasure somehow end up storing it. In this case the monster has a 'gizzard' in which platinum and gems can be found, because they are indigestible. I wish D&D in general would rely more on the idea of selling body parts for money in the case of monsters like the Roper - rather than contriving ways to have them keep treasure. Body-part selling is frequently mentioned in the MM but is a very under-developed idea; often you don't even get approximate prices.

This entry also contains a subspecies called a Storoper (stone-roper; geddit?) which is a creature resembling "a statue of a roper". It attacks with tendrils in much the same way as the Roper proper, though its poison is paralyzing rather than debilitating.

Inyssiis

04-06-2009 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Things I Know About Ropers:

Lords of Madness (3.5 Ed.): If you drill a hole in the side of a roper and jam a mind-flayer tadpole in, the tadpole will attempt to transform the roper into an illithid the same way it would transform, say, an elf. Successfully. The resulting monstrosity is known as a urophion. Sadly, this bizarre creature is--more or less--physically identical to other ropers, though it has the intense mind blast, at-will suggestion, and concealed skull-cracking beak of a normal mind flayer. Though coldly brilliant as any human, the mind flayers regard them as little more than guard dogs.

The Dungeonomicon, which I personally regard as canonical as any printed book: "Since the Roper really has no society (and possibly the most obscure language in Core D&D) [Owlbear! Elven Cat! Screw you, Roper!], it's very difficult for it to understand the possible ramifications of offending pan-humanoid society. So now they've done it, and they really haven't noticed the fallout they are receiving from that decision. Ropers pretty much attack anything they see, and now everyone that sees a roper attacks them. In the D&D worlds, ropers are on the brink of extinction and it probably never even occurs to them that their heavy tendrilled dealings with the other races have pushed them to this state."

Sleeper

04-06-2009 01:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I wonder if ropers evolved from smaller ancestors. Intrepid explorers walk into a cavern. Their movement and fire disturbs something, and suddenly a cloud of bats darts toward the entrance in a confusing dance of shadows. In the midst of the flurry, there is a darting snap. A tiny little stalactite shot out a small, sticky tendril. Dangling from its grip is a desperate bat, squirming and keening, but getting weaker. Suddenly the tendrils tense, and there is an audible crack as the bat's neck snaps. If they stay and watch, they can see the stalactite's shell split into a maw, and absorb the unlucky bat.

Like piercers, perhaps they're subterranean molluscs. Their tendrils are modified feet. Their stony casing is a modified shell. They are quick, because they had to catch nimble flying mice. And they were originally fairly weak, so they developed the ability to exude a poison that saps the strength from mammals.

As the prey multiplied underneath the earth, they grew larger. As they grew larger, the ability to move became less important. Unlike their kin, the piercers, who retained the ability to move slowly across the ceiling, ropers slowed and slowed until they finally became sessile. Their feet or tendrils grew longer and longer, to compensate for their immobility. And with their vast size and weight, they could no longer hang from roofs. The tiny stalactites have become enormous stalagmites, whose life is circumscribed by the furthest extent of their tendrils.

demiurge1138

04-06-2009 03:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

According to Paizo's Into the Darklands, the consequence of ropers being

- a) highly intelligent
- b) exceedingly evil and
- c) ambush predators

has led them to become sort of sages of evil, pondering to themselves at length about the philosophical implications of pain and the intricacies of wickedness because they have nothing else to occupy their minds. And they always love it when a meal has something interesting to say as its life is being sapped through the tendrils. They finally have someone to talk to! Albeit briefly.

Sleeper

04-06-2009 04:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10203791)
According to Paizo's Into the Darklands, the consequence of ropers being

- a) highly intelligent*
- b) exceedingly evil and*
- c) ambush predators*

has led them to become sort of sages of evil, pondering to themselves at length about the philosophical implications of pain and the intricacies of wickedness because they have nothing else to occupy their minds. And they always love it when a meal has something interesting to say as its life is being sapped through the tendrils. They finally have someone to talk to! Albeit briefly.

Sounds more crazy aescetic hermits in the woods or navel-gazing bodhisavattas than sages. Sages imply scholarship, and collegiate debate and learning.

Though with the tentacles, spiky exterior, and fascination with pain, a roper could also play the role of a Hellraiser cenobite. Perhaps they are the secret masters of the dungeons in which they reside. They send their half-flayed minions to deposit puzzles and traps around their domain, each of which is cunningly designed to bring them new fleshy toys with which to play. Their playthings are given the greatest gift the roper can provide, the ecstasy of pure pain.

Or perhaps a roper is what happens when a dao that grows too old and wicked, but refuses to die. They melt and twist until their formerly strapping bodies become one with the native element, until they turn into twisted lumps of stone. Perhaps some even retain the ability to grant wishes, and delight in twisting them.

Thane of Fife

04-06-2009 09:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I don't understand the point of the Storoper. A regular roper looks like a rocky outcropping. A storoper looks like a statue of a roper. How does looking like a statue of a rocky outcropping differ, in any way, from looking like a rocky outcropping?

Also noteworthy is that Ropers are apparently the same heat as the stone around them, so infravision shouldn't work. You could have a community of svirfneblin with a roper living in their midsts, picking them off whenever it gets hungry, and they'd just wonder where everyone was disappearing to.

Kakita Kojiro

04-06-2009 10:59 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10203292)

... There is an 'lol' moment about half-way through the entry where a mad impulse on the part of the writer has resulted in the line: "A group of ropers has been named a 'cluster' by scholars with nothing better to do." I quite like the little window that opens onto the mind of the designers. Whoever wrote that line must have been so sick of having 'sages' pop up in every entry and trying to find something interesting to say about them.

I have a book I'm quite fond of, A Crash of Rhinoceroses, which basically lists "proper" collective nouns for things. Crashes of rhinoceroses. Murders of crows. Exaltations of larks. Pumps of Pekinese [dogs]. Clutches of penes. Etc.

One of the chapters talks about a Victorian parlor game, where you'd try to stump others at the party by giving them something to which they did not know the proper collective noun. This would be the perfect parlor game for D&D sages at one of their annual symposia. Talking about clusters of ropers, flights of dragons, traumas of Tarrasques, effetes of elves...

randomgamer8466

04-06-2009 11:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10203475)

I wonder if ropers evolved from smaller ancestors. Intrepid explorers walk into a cavern. Their movement and fire disturbs something, and suddenly a cloud of bats darts toward the entrance in a confusing dance of shadows. In the midst of the flurry, there is a darting snap. A tiny little stalactite shot out a small, sticky tendril. Dangling from its grip is a desperate bat, squirming and keening, but getting weaker. Suddenly the tendrils tense, and there is an audible crack as the bat's neck snaps. If they stay and watch, they can see the stalactite's shell split into a maw, and absorb the unlucky bat.

Cool, Sleeper. i'd let the PCs observe something like this as a "fair warning" early in a dungeon before I throw a full-sized Roper at them.

6inTruder

04-07-2009 12:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

what's the point of Storopers? Higher AC, I'd assume.

demiurge1138

04-07-2009 03:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10203821)

Sounds more crazy aescetic hermits in the woods or navel-gazing bodhisavattas than sages. Sages imply scholarship, and collegiate debate and learning.

Or perhaps a roper is what happens when a dao that grows too old and wicked, but refuses to die. They melt and twist until their formerly strapping bodies become one with the native element, until they turn into twisted lumps of stone. Perhaps some even retain the ability to grant wishes, and delight in twisting them.

My wording was off a bit--but that dao idea is pure class. A roper with wishes is not something I'd like to contemplate.

Oddly for a "modified monster", storopers are rather a bit weaker than ropers. Only 6 HD. So the purpose of storopers is to throw them at lower level parties that'd get creamed by the ordinary kind.

psychojosh13

04-07-2009 09:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10194425)

As for the Ankheg and Purple Worms, both those animals are subterranean, so how do the Rocs find them? Do these arthropods occasionally venture onto the surface for some reason (mating?) at a time and location the Rocs know of or does the Roc use some kind of "worm charming" to lure them above ground?

Really? Am I the only one who thought of rocs pecking at the ground to lure the worms out? A lone roc in the mountains could trigger an avalanche when it's hungry, a small flock could level villages with the resulting seismic waves... come on people, are your evil (or at least annoying) DM powers on vacation?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10204694)

One of the chapters talks about a Victorian parlor game, where you'd try to stump others at the party by giving them something to which they did not know the proper collective noun. This would be the perfect parlor game for D&D sages at one of their annual symposia. Talking about clusters of ropers, flights of dragons, traumas of Tarrasques, effetes of elves...

Absolutely brilliant. This would be a wonderful complement to a D&D-themed game of Yorkshiremen ("why, when I was a lad, I'd have to wake up at 10pm, an hour before I went to bed, and spend all day killing orcs just for a measly 3 coppers!")

JRM

04-07-2009 05:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10201504)

*So was I. The combat modifier is +5 young adult and +12 great wrym. The difference is +7, and since it applies to each attack, the great wrym does an extra +21 with only a claw/claw/bite routine, *snip

And I thought I was pretty clear that the square root of the linear dimension only applied to the base damage.

Oh right, I'm afraid it wasn't very clear to me at the time. Sorry about that.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10201504)

The math can be determined, though it's fuzzier. Assuming an average Medium monster does 1d8 with a primary attack and 1d4 with a secondary attack (very arbitrary; this could be a bad mean) and has a Str of 10, each size increase boosts base damage by the square root of 2 and adds +6 from Str (1.5x+4 from +8 Str). Just glancing at the numbers, this seems to roughly double damage. This will vary based on the number of attacks and the size of attack of course (e.g. boars less, dragons more). I wouldn't take that doubling as a general guideline, though. There are just too many different attack routines that will impact this in different ways, and you'd have to compare them all to see what makes a reasonable mean.

Yes, I thought about doing that but, like you, thought there'd be so many different damage levels and special cases it'd be tricky working out the damage of various sizes of "Platonic Monster". Although I'd have used something similar to your example as a base.

Let's see:

M 1d6/1d4 Str 10(+0) - average damage 6 (6 times 1.0000)

L 1d8/1d6 Str 18(+4/2) - average damage 14 (6 times 2.3333)

H 2d6/1d8 Str 26(+8/4) - average damage 23.5 (6 times 3.9166)

G 3d6/2d6 Str 34(+12/6) - average damage 35.5 (6 times 5.9166)

C 4d6/3d6 Str 42(+16/8) - average damage 48.5 (6 times 7.9166)

That's basically Medium ×1, Large ×2, Huge ×4, Gargantuan ×6, Colossal ×8.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10201504)

Mechanically, I wish the 3E designers went the other way in their design. What they did was take the base numbers, and then rigorously apply modifiers. This had the result of dramatically increasing the final numbers (hp, damage, and other things like ACs, saves, and so forth). If they kept the same final numbers (i.e. the 10.5 average damage caused by a monster's attack, instead of using an approximation or a slightly lower number as a base and applying all those new mods for a much higher final result), 3E would have been out-of-the-box mostly compatible with the older versions, and the numbers would have been smaller and more manageable.

That's not too dissimilar to my thinking. Basically the idea I'm thinking of has the Strength score represent the quality of the Strength (force per unit body weight) rather than the quantity of the Strength (total force), which is derived from some kind of Size Factor. That way a Huge Roc might have, say, Strength 22 and do triple damage for being Huge - so it does, say, 3d6+6 with its claws. (1d6 claw times 3 plus Strength bonus), with a Size Factor modifier to other appropriate areas - Carry Capacity, Grapple, Hide et cetera.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10201504)

And the fix to Climb and Swim are to base them on Dexterity, not Strength. Big creatures already have a faster base move, which accounts for the impact of their Str. Dex is how well they use that speed.

I don't much care for that idea since Strength is such an important factor in climbing - a creature has to have the power to lift itself easily. My preferred fix would be to have skills depend on two stats - e.g. Climb (Str+Dex), Swim (Str+Con) and so on. Indeed, I'd like most of the "single stat" attributes were changed to two stats (e.g. Will save from Wis+Cha).

4E goes part way towards that allowing you to pick one stat from a pair for certain tasks, but I'd rather have both stats contribute - so a character with an 18 and a 10 would have the same modifier in a task-area as a rival with two 14s, say.

Like many of my RPG rule ideas it may be too fiddly in practice, but that's a problem for another day.

JRM

04-07-2009 05:21 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by psychojosh13 (Post 10207328)

Really? Am I the only one who thought of rocs pecking at the ground to lure the worms out? A lone roc in the mountains could trigger an avalanche when it's hungry, a small flock could level villages with the resulting seismic waves... come on people, are your evil (or at least annoying) DM powers on vacation?

Of course, what other kind of worm charming could a Roc perform? Well they can always sing at the ground, being super-bards and all.) The other standard luring-out-the-worms trick is to soak the ground in something mildly unpleasant, so the worms surface to escape it. So, maybe the Rocs fly down to the richest fields they can find and empty their bladders, and snap up the ankhegs as they emerge? The farmers may actual like them to do this*, since it fertilizes the crops and removes those horrible subterranean monsters, although the Rocs may wreck part of their crop.

*EDIT Except for any farmers in their fields when a Roc flies overhead spraying "worm charm fluid".:eek:

DMH

04-07-2009 08:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10204444)

I don't understand the point of the Storoper. A regular roper looks like a rocky outcropping. A storoper looks like a statue of a roper. How does looking like a statue of a rocky outcropping differ, in any way, from looking like a rocky outcropping?

There is one big difference between them physically- storopers have tentacles whereas ropers have stumps that shoot a silk or byssus like substance that sticks to prey. That and that ropers are noticeably larger really breaks the idea of a statue.

Personally I have never and will never use either. Cave fishers are much better for the roper niche.

Sleeper

04-08-2009 02:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10208605)

Of course, what other kind of worm charming could a Roc perform? Well they can always sing at the ground, being super-bards and all. ;) The other standard luring-out-the-worms trick is to soak the ground in something mildly unpleasant, so the worms surface to escape it. So, maybe the Rocs fly down to the richest fields they can find and empty their bladders, and snap up the ankhegs as they emerge? The farmers may actual like them to do this, since it fertilizes the crops and removes those horrible subterranean monsters, although the Rocs may wreck part of their crop.*

The alternative is to ask: What sufficiently large prey is available in sufficiently large quantities to feed a breeding population of titantic birds? Whales are one possibility, but rocs can probably only fly away with the younger specimens and it's hard to settle in and eat a corpse when there're only waves to perch on. Mile-high trees with huge nuts and berries is another alternative, but rocs are supposed to be giant raptors not giant robins. The classic elephant is a good option, large but not too large, and with the necessary natural population levels. Kind of bland, though. Fantasy versions might be a Lost World continent or subcontinent; imagine an Australia-sized land mass wreathed with archipelagos or an India where the craton's impact caused a continuous front of impassibly-huge mountains like the Himalayas entirely isolating the lowlands except by sea... and high-flying birds. Rocs might be known as occasional immigrants from beyond a particular sea, or from over a barrier mountain chain. They might occasionally drop the half-eaten carcasses of impossible creatures, like dinosaurs or giant insects, leading sages to speculate and putting that explorer's gleam in the eye of certain adventurers.

JRM

04-08-2009 04:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10203292)

Roper

I've had difficulty taking this monster seriously because of the picture - which makes me snigger every time I look at - and consequently haven't often used it. It is essentially a type of invertebrate thing which lurks in dungeons pretending to be a rock (never seen a monster like that before), and which shoots out tendrils to capture its victims. These tendrils appear to be coated with some sort of poison (it isn't actually made explicit) which weakens prey, so that it is all the easier to draw towards the maw.

We've said it before, but maybe all these invertebrate things which lurk in dungeons pretending to be a rock are related - the ropers, mimics, trappers, piercers, darkmantles et cetera all have a certain similarity.

Anyhows, reading through the entry two items in particular stood out to me.

Firstly:

Quote:

Ropers reproduce asexually by shedding some of their material in the form of a seed. Drawing nutrients from the cavern floor (and perhaps siphoning magical energies from deep within the earth), the infant roper grows to maturity in 2d4 weeks. Until that time has passed, the roper is indistinguishable from a boulder.

A roper grows from a seed to a nine-foot monster in just 2-8 weeks just from drawing nutrients/magic from the cavern, during which time it looks like a rock? I don't much care for that, I'd rather have them have a smaller, mobile stage - maybe something that looks nothing like an adult roper, like a cave moray, or just a miniature version of an adult that avoids large creatures, like the bat-snaring stalagmite Sleeper described. Unless some of the aforementioned monsters (like the piercer and the mimic) are actually earlier development stages of the roper?

Secondly, I don't remember the "Ropers move using large, cilia-like appendages on their undersides, which also allow them to cling to walls and ceilings" bit before, I've always imagined them standing on the ground like a stalagmite. A roper that's trying to snatch the PCs up while hanging upside-down from a 30' tall ceiling would make for a more interesting encounter.

JRM

04-08-2009 04:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10210352)

The alternative is to ask: What sufficiently large prey is available in sufficiently large quantities to feed a breeding population of titanic birds? Whales are one possibility, but rocs can probably only fly away with the younger specimens and it's hard to settle in and eat a corpse when there're only waves to perch on. Mile-high trees with huge nuts and berries is another alternative, but rocs are supposed to be giant raptors not giant robins. The classic elephant is a good option, large but not too large, and with the necessary natural population levels. Kind of bland, though. Fantasy versions might be a Lost World continent or subcontinent; imagine an Australia-sized land mass wreathed with archipelagos or an India where the craton's impact caused a continuous front of impassibly-huge mountains like the Himalayas entirely isolating the lowlands except by sea... and high-flying birds. Rocs might be known as occasional immigrants from beyond a particular sea, or from over a barrier mountain chain. They might occasionally drop the half-eaten carcasses of impossible creatures, like dinosaurs or giant insects, leading sages to speculate and putting that explorer's gleam in the eye of certain adventurers.

Well as I mentioned earlier there is an Arabian tale were a Roc ate giant serpents, and elephants are an obvious favourite. Such a large predator presumably can't be too fussy about what it eats, so it probably snatches up anything large enough to make a worthwhile meal.

There are some tales in which rocs nest on islands, so maybe they fish the surrounding ocean like a supersized osprey or sea eagle - snatching up large marine organisms such as killer whales, basking sharks, small sea serpents et cetera.

Personally, I imagine a roc covering a hundreds of miles in a day, based on stories about their incredible speed - they could peck up huge serpents from the Valley of Diamonds one day, hunt elephant in the middle of the plains a few hours later, then cross the ocean in a few days to snatch up a whale for delivery it their island nest.

Mikelibrarian

04-08-2009 06:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10210743)

Secondly, I don't remember the "Ropers move using large, cilia-like appendages on their undersides, which also allow them to cling to walls and ceilings" bit before, I've always imagined them standing on the ground like a stalagmite. A roper that's trying to snatch the PCs up while hanging upside-down from a 30' tall ceiling would make for a more interesting encounter.

One of the Monsters featured on the 1st Edition Monster Manual is a Roper hanging from the ceiling of a cavern menacing an Owlbear.

Sleeper

04-08-2009 07:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10210743)

We've said it before, but maybe all these invertebrate things which lurk in dungeons pretending to be a rock are related - the ropers, mimics, trappers, piercers, darkmantles et cetera all have a certain similarity.

In the super-hero genre, some worlds only have one unified origin behind all supernormal powers. The Wild Card virus, for instance. Others like the DC and Marvel universes take the kitchen sink approach, where mutation, mutagenics, bioengineering, magic, incarnate gods, technological wonders, alien beings, cosmic power, and even more obscure origins are common. Using Hite's taxonomy, they can be classified into five different shades of blue.

D&D isn't quite as kitchen-sink as Rifts, Exalted, or Synnibarr, but it's up there. But it would be fascinating to reimagine the world, using a more constrained form. Excise all the dragons and other traditional monsters of fantasy. Leave behind humans, perhaps the demihumans, and spells. And then, under the earth, a complete ecology. A world at war with the surface world, not because of some kind of malign plot (though there's that, too), but because it's so alien. The organisms from one cannot successfully survive in the other, so the battle is ultimately futile. But along the edges, the Fringe, the two worlds compete. Dwarves and gnomes and halflings tunnel a bit down, and meet the uppermost and most adaptable denizens of the Underdark; and in turn the most intrepid of the subsurface beasts venture upward, toward the topside lands of light and seasons.

Because the Underdark world is ruled by denizens that long ago migrated from the cold depths of the undersea. Mobile, squishy, strangely smart squids, cuttlefish, and octopuses with convergent eyes. Largely sessile clams and mussels, oysters and barnacles. Scallops that swim by opening and closing their mouths. They have become terrestrial, or more properly subterrestrial, like their other cousins, the snails and slugs.

The underworld is the dominion of the mollusc. They have expanded and diversified. Some have become as huge as the Jinxian bandersnatch, leaving slimy trails and smashing their way through any barriers in their path, but we know the predators the best. Barnacles have infested the roofs, primarily filter-feeding on the miasma emitted by the numerous fungi, but needing the protein and abundant flesh of unwary surface dwellers to reproduce. Some have developed their feet into snares, snatching flying bats; others have grown huge and trap larger prey. Some shellless varieties have developed an imitative morphology, mimicking common objects and lying in wait for the unwary.

Cephalopods have remained at the top of the food chain. Smaller varieties squeeze through unreasonably tiny holes and passages, with suckers adapted to hold fast to the ceiling. But the so-called lords of the underworld have become parasites, entering the minds of surface creatures and forming hybrids. These hybrids find the sun painful, but can walk the surface, and plot and think. They have magic too, similar in type to the magic of their lesser cousins who trick observers into thinking their skin looks like veined wood or sense the presence of prey in the utter darkness, but the so-called mind flayers surpass them in versatility and power. Theirs is a magic of the mind, of thought; not the elemental power that the surface mages tap.

This is a world where the surface is dominated by green and flowering plants, and vertebrates who use a magic that grows from their vital, sun- and bone-based beings. Where the Underdark is ruled by fungi and molluscs, who use a magic based on thought, memory, and amorphism. Along the Fringe, there is conflict. But just as the fungi can't compete with the raw power of the sun harnessed by chlorophyll, perhaps the reason humans and demihumans can only go so far down is that the profusion of shells, slugs, molds, and lichen just becomes too dense. A mile below the surface, the whole ecology merges into a single biomass. The elder brains of the illithid are only the start. This is Gaia, an antediluvian even pangean remnant, and it is antithetical to humans.

Kakita Kojiro

04-08-2009 11:45 AM

Okay, Sleeper's mollusc underworld is creepily evocative. Good show.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10208582)

Yes, I thought about doing that but, like you, thought there'd be so many different damage levels and special cases it'd be tricky working out the damage of various sizes of "Platonic Monster". Although I'd have used something similar to your example as a base...

I was also quite liking the concept of a "Platonic Monster", as yet another thing for our favorite sages to debate and argue over. (e.g., "What are the characteristics of the Platonic Monster?")

However, I realized that later editions of D&D actually did sort of move toward a system where monsters got organized by Platonic(ish) ideals. 3.X divided by types such as Aberrations, Dragons, Humanoids, Undead, etc. 4e sorts them out by roles (Skirmisher, Controller, Brute, Artillery, etc.). These divisions have mechanical effects.

That means our sages could actually deduce things correctly if they sorted out the correct Platonic Ideals of monsters. Which is... a very interesting idea for the "Adventuring Sages of the Greyhawk Pedant's Symposium" campaign concept.

JRM

04-08-2009 03:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10211120)

One of the Monsters featured on the 1st Edition Monster Manual is a Roper hanging from the ceiling of a cavern menacing an Owlbear.

Yes, I realized it was just my fading memory, since I've read both editions of the AD&D MM so many times, but just found it curious. For some reason I remembered the Roper & Owlbear on the 1E cover, but not that the roper was inverted. Funny how your memory works, eh. I guess the MM entry illustrations of a 'stalagmite-type' Roper are what imprinted me with a particular vision of the monster.

Incidentally, the 2E illustration makes a Roper look even more like a Yochlol than the 1E picture did.

That raises another of D&D's weird little questions - is there a reason Lolth's demon handmaidens look like small, slimy Ropers who can turn into beautiful drow elfmaids? Well both Ropers and Drow share the same habitat, so maybe the dark elves think all (or many) of the underworlds perils are tests sent by their goddess and started associating the Roper with her - after all, they've got six sticky strands like her sacred tentacle-staff, are exceptionally intelligent, very magic-resistant and are similar in philosophy (CE). Hmm, maybe some Ropers were even converted to the worship of Lolth? It wouldn't be too much of a leap to guess then demonic psychomutation resulted in a strain of demons that resembled Ropers - or maybe Yochlol are just formed from the demonic spirits of dead Ropers, who chose to throw in with Lolth in her early days as a Demon Lady so have a chosen spot in her hierarchy?

Sleeper

04-08-2009 04:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10212874)

That raises another of D&D's weird little questions - is there a reason Lolth's demon handmaidens look like small, slimy Ropers who can turn into beautiful drow elfmaids?

In the lands of Undermollusca, the illithid need servants who can go abroad in the lands of the sun, and kidnap and assassinate and otherwise extend their tentacles (arms) across the green lands they so desire, and so fear. They tried breeding mimics. They tried modifying their own pregnant feet, that which the warmlanders call tadpoles. They failed so many times. At least the grimlocks were modestly useful. As a barrier, when set free to roam the Fringe. As the occasional wave of shock troops. But spies? Not hardly. The fungus growing in their brains may be surprisingly sensitive to changes in air pressure, but the same fungus slowly consumes the brain, making them ever more stupid, and ever more wild.

But then, they discovered something curious. The breed of human called elves shared some unusual traits. A lifespan an order of magnitude greater than the more numerous humans and goblins. And they aged gracefully, without the crooked backs, lined faces, paper-like skin, and twig-like bones. Elves merely grew more fixed, less flexible. Sterner, with more responsibilities. But the face of an elder and the face of the face of the youth were equally resilient, perfect. Elves merely appeared to age, slowly, because they lost the joy and carefree smiles of youth. Smile, and you look young; frown, and your face wrinkles and appears old. The elderly elves were older, but only truly in their minds. Their bodies remained untouched. The appearance of age were just that; it solely resided in the eyes, in the carriage, in the expressions. Their physical bodies were untouched. Which made them the ideal host.

In a remote land, a volcano erupted. Dust settled on a forest, smothering it. Yet when the nearby humans sent delegations to the elven nation to offer aid, they found it empty. The animals fled or dying, and the elves? Simply gone. The illithid had their specimens.

Thousands of flayed and cast-aside experiments later, they perfected the process. They opened up the remaining elves, and removed... well, everything. All they really wanted was the facade. Into this husk, like a snail into its shell, they grafted a special breed of mimic. Their skins merged in some fashion, and they became one. The experiment was successful. The only real side effects appeared manageable. The first was a change in coloration, hardly noticeable to the dark-dwelling molluscs. They didn't even realize this at first, though it would later become a problem. The illithid simply didn't under the surface elven predilection toward racist xenophobia.

The second side effect was a type of sport. Sometimes, the graft didn't quite work. The resulting merger partially failed; the faux-elf parts tried to reject its new symbiote, and extruded a portion of it as a mass. Usually this erupted from the lower portion of the body, a bulbous and glistening thing protruding from the bottom of the torso. From this mass tendrils tried to extend in various directions, until the dark elf skin covering them hardened and froze. These sports were still functional, but obviously not suited as spies. Since they appeared somewhat spider-like, they illithid created a myth about a test, and divine retribution.

And sometimes the graft worked spectacularly well. Beyond expectations. A perfect merger of mimic and hollowed-out elf. The two skins became one, became both morphic and fixed. Able to assume the form of an elf, or revert back to their natural state as a slug-like mimic, with the trapping tendrils common among the class that also spawned the roper. The illithid meme-engine took this fact, and around the kernel further developed the myth. The same divinity that punished the spider-like ones, also had need of handmaidens. Her chosen ones, her servants.

The mythology was built around this duality; the everchanging yochol were blessed; the fixed drider were cursed.

noisms

04-08-2009 06:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Rust Monster

Here it is folks: out of all D&D monsters in history, this is the most controversial of them all. Remember the great and legendary flame wars at 4e's release, the ill-thought criticisms spoken by Mike Mearls, the gargantuan eruption of nerd rage? Those were the days.

You all know what Rust Monsters are. Quadrapedal insectoid things that are 'placid by nature' but are driven mad by the scent of their favourite food - metal. Which they then do their damnest to devour. Interestingly and perhaps a little strangely, the way around this is clearly telegraphed to the players in the entry, as it explicitly notes that the creatures give up a fight to eat dropped metal objects like iron spikes. Admittedly this is pretty obvious, but I never thought of doing it when I was a kid.

Archetypal Rust Monsters only go for 'ferrous' metals such as iron, steel, mithril and adamantite. Clearly, what the world needs is subspecies who prefer gold, silver, copper, platinum etc. Or, how about a variant so sensitive and so ravenous that it will suck iron out of the blood?

MadWriter

04-08-2009 07:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Rust Monster

Here it is folks: out of all D&D monsters in history, this is the most controversial of them all. Remember the great and legendary flame wars at 4e's release, the ill-thought criticisms spoken by Mike Mearls, the gargantuan eruption of nerd rage? Those were the days.

You all know what Rust Monsters are. Quadrapedal insectoid things that are 'placid by nature' but are driven mad by the scent of their favourite food - metal. Which they then do their damnest to devour. Interestingly and perhaps a little strangely, the way around this is clearly telegraphed to the players in the entry, as it explicitly notes that the creatures give up a fight to eat dropped metal objects like iron spikes. Admittedly this is pretty obvious, but I never thought of doing it when I was a kid.

Archetypal Rust Monsters only go for 'ferrous' metals such as iron, steel, mithril and adamantite. Clearly, what the world needs is subspecies who prefer gold, silver, copper, platinum etc. Or, how about a variant so sensitive and so ravenous that it will suck iron out of the blood?

Sheez, Noisms, remind me not to play in any of your tabletop games--on-line or off. You get 1 Nasty GM point from me.

Inyssius

04-08-2009 07:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Stop moving so fast! We don't have that many monsters left!

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10213302)

Rust Monster

Here it is folks: out of all D&D monsters in history, this is the most controversial of them all. Remember the great and legendary flame wars at 4e's release, the ill-thought criticisms spoken by Mike Mearls, the gargantuan eruption of nerd rage? Those were the days.

Heh. I think it's worth mentioning that, as of now, the rust monster is baaaaack!

And yes. As if you were wondering, there was another gargantuan eruption of nerd rage when that came out.

EDIT: Oh, and the art for it? In 4e? Is great.

http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/intheworks_mm2_6.jpg

noisms

04-08-2009 08:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10213407)

Stop moving so fast! We don't have that many monsters left!

Heh. I think it's worth mentioning that, as of now, the rust monster is baaaaack!

And yes. As if you were wondering, there was another gargantuan eruption of nerd rage when that came out.

I am at this moment biting my lip and preventing my own nerd rage spewing forth after looking at that statblock... I have to go and punch something now. ;)

Hellzon

04-08-2009 08:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10213407)

EDIT: Oh, and the art for it? In 4e? Is great.

They managed to make the propeller-tail not look totally silly. Good job. :)

The 3E illustration isn't bad either.

http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/MM...MM35_PG216.jpg

Though this is my favourite. It looks so sad:

http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/designdev_rustdmg.jpg

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms, RBDM Extraordinaire

Or, how about a variant so sensitive and so ravenous that it will suck iron out of the blood?

Vampiric Rust monsters? I approve. Maybe add the Celestial template too...

(This post should not be taken as endorsement or disapproval of rust monsters. Whatever floats your boat.)

EmperorSeth

04-09-2009 01:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10212259)

Okay, Sleeper's mollusc underworld is creepily evocative. Good show.

I was also quite liking the concept of a "Platonic Monster", as yet another thing for our favorite sages to debate and argue over. (e.g., "What are the characteristics of the Platonic Monster?")

Oh, you know. They value you as a person, but they don't see the chemistry there, and they don't want to risk losing a friendship by the prospect of dating.

demiurge1138

04-09-2009 03:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10213499)

I am at this moment biting my lip and preventing my own nerd rage spewing forth after looking at that statblock... I have to go and punch something now. ;)

See, the thing about 4e rust monsters is... they're their own economic force. Think about it. If you get residuum (magic-item-crafting-stuff) equal to the value of the magic item it ate out of one, they're much more cost effective than selling unwanted magic items, due to the 4e world's unstable "sell for 1/5 buy price" economy.

Assuming they know someone who can use Ritual Casting to make magic items, all adventurers should keep small rust monster farms. Upkeep wouldn't be expensive--they can be fed scraps of metal, the mundane weapons and armor of various foes. And once a particularly expensive-but-useless magic item fell into the adventurer's hands, he'd feed it to one of his rust monsters, slaughter it, and harvest its sweet, sweet residuum gland.

Almost as good as slaad farming! (Remind me to mention that again once we're on slaads).

6inTruder

04-09-2009 11:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Hey, for everyone who's been interested in that 'Sages travel the globe investigating crazy monsters' game... Elfworld. Specifically the last story, about an illustrator looking to get a look at a basilisk for his big book of monsters.

Sleeper

04-09-2009 02:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10215163)

Assuming they know someone who can use Ritual Casting to make magic items, all adventurers should keep small rust monster farms.

I rather like that. Turn rust monsters from random terrors into domesticated beasts. Perhaps a little ornery, but mule-kicking or camel-spitting ornery, not lion ornery.

The rust monster ranches would also serve as a strategic asset. When besieging an enemy, have apprentice mages cast feather fall on the friskier specimens, and fling them over the castle walls with trebuchets. They alight in the courtyard, their feathered antennae questing, seeking, and then scuttle toward the barracks, or chase the sentries along the walls. In a great melee, have whip- and wooden club- wielding leather armored handlers herd them towards the lines of massed heavy infantry. In response, every good-sized unit would have its own anti-rust monster specialists.

Which justifies nationalizing the trade. Not that medieval societies need much justification. Probably one of the King's the monopolies, like the mint. Raised on heavily guarded ranches, perhaps stockades like the Alamo. The monopoly is granted to a wealthy and influential family that just happens to be prone to mania, and delusions of grandeur. Flamboyant peacocks like Custer. Or perhaps it is ceded to the church; monks and nuns at secluded abbeys and monasteries specialize in the taming of the red beast. They might even have martial D&D-style monks, who discipline the beasts with their hands and fists, and serve as conscripts when the church deems the cause worthy. After all, who better to herd rust monsters than those who eschew all armor and weapons?

demiurge1138

04-09-2009 04:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've always been a fan of the idea of rust monster suicide squads, the bravest (and craziest) of the dwarven armies--clad in leather and clutching stone-headed morningstars--perched on the back of rust monsters driven to mania by the smell of so many delicious spearheads and suits of chain. Few of these dwarven rust-boys ever return from one of their missions, charging full-on into the orcish horde... but those that do win the respect of all dwarfkind.

Oh, and...

Quote:

Originally Posted by ESkemp (Post 10193627)

I'm just surprised the two-headed roc isn't a staple of the D&D roc. I know the game's had its fair share of designers who are also aficionados of Harryhausen movies.

Speak of the devil. Paizo's putting a two-headed roc (spelled the Persian way for authenticity) into their latest adventure path.

randomgamer8466

04-10-2009 01:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I'm not into the idea of rust monsters who are out to suck your blood. Think about it: How many D&D monsters eat your metal items? One. How many want to suck your blood? Like fifty. Making rust monsters into blood drinkers makes them less unique, not moreso.

UNLESS your party is so jaded with D&D tropes that you're just trying to throw something off the wall at them.

I'm no biochemist, but I believe the iron in human blood is already oxidized and therefore could not be turned into rust.

HaplessVictim

04-10-2009 01:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10210743)

Ropers reproduce asexually by shedding some of their material in the form of a seed. Drawing nutrients from the cavern floor (and perhaps siphoning magical energies from deep within the earth), the infant roper grows to maturity in 2d4 weeks. Until that time has passed, the roper is indistinguishable from a boulder.

Yet another mission to add to the Egg Thief Quest. Roper "seeds" are not technically an egg, I know -- they're more like a hydrozoan bud -- but close enough for the unscrupulous rouges and merciless sages that ply the trade. Now it would be bad news, of course, if these seeds happened to hatch during transport..

And let's not neglect Roc eggs: 1d4+1 eggs per nest, which sell for r 2d6 x 100 gp. Presumably, transporting these eggs is a bit of a hassle; looking at the illustration, they'd be the size of an elephant.

HaplessVictim

04-10-2009 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10213302)

Rust Monster

Here it is folks: out of all D&D monsters in history, this is the most controversial of them all. Remember the great and legendary flame wars at 4e's release, the ill-thought criticisms spoken by Mike Mearls, the gargantuan eruption of nerd rage? Those were the days.

I haven't picked up any 4e books, and have paid no attention to chatter about it. Could you summarize this for the ignorant masses (me)? I love hearing about a good nerd rage.

ESkemp

04-10-2009 01:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10217685)

Speak of the devil. Paizo's putting a two-headed roc (spelled the Persian way for authenticity) into their latest adventure path.

Oh, excellent! Good for them.

JRM

04-10-2009 05:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10213302)

Rust Monster Archetypal Rust Monsters only go for 'ferrous' metals such as iron, steel, mithril and adamantite. Clearly, what the world needs is subspecies who prefer gold, silver, copper, platinum etc. Or, how about a variant so sensitive and so ravenous that it will suck iron out of the blood?

Well for a gold-eating monster there's always the aurumovorax.

JRM

04-10-2009 05:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10213302)

Rust Monster

Well for a gold-eating monster there's always the aurumovorax.

Anyhow, there's quite a lot to say about Rust Monsters. To begin with, although they prefer refined metal they will eat metal ore, which implies they do not need to rely on their rusting-process (however that works) as a source of energy, since metal ores are almost always fully oxidized. So, can they eat other stuff as well as metal to supplement their energy intake or do they absorb ambient heat or magic - maybe that propeller tail is actually an energy collector?

That big tail prop is probably for something, after all - maybe its an energy-collector, or a display device, a sense organ? Perhaps its a vestige of an organ used by the Rust Monsters' young? Perhaps they have swimming larvae with tail-gills like mayflies? Or it literally is a propeller, and Rust Monsters produce thousands of tiny fry that disperse through the air like windblown seeds, twirling their feathery tails to propel themselves, then shedding most of their tail-prop when they land.

Although those theories are contradicted by the MM, which says a pair of Rust Monsters will occasionally be encountered with a single half-grown young.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10215163)

Assuming they know someone who can use Ritual Casting to make magic items, all adventurers should keep small rust monster farms. Upkeep wouldn't be expensive--they can be fed scraps of metal, the mundane weapons and armor of various foes. And once a particularly expensive-but-useless magic item fell into the adventurer's hands, he'd feed it to one of his rust monsters, slaughter it, and harvest its sweet, sweet residuum gland.

Even in world without residuum Rust Monster farming may be commercially viable. They're probably full of all kinds of substances of use to alchemists. Furthermore, a Rust Monster presumably has a high metal content, and may well be equal to or better than most metal ores. So there could be an industry based on feeding Rust Monsters low-grade ore, then when the Monsters have concentrated the metal in their bodies the Miner-Farmers can slaughter them and melt down their bodies in a furnace to extract the metal, it may be an efficient way of processing poor quality deposits.

Plus, of course, the miners could use trained Rust Monsters to help them prospect for new veins of ore.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10217451)

I rather like that. Turn rust monsters from random terrors into domesticated beasts. Perhaps a little ornery, but mule kicking or camel-spitting ornery, not lion ornery.

The rust monster ranches would also serve as a strategic asset.

SNIP

They might even have martial D&D-style monks, who discipline the beasts with their hands and fists, and serve as conscripts when the church deems the cause worthy. After all, who better to herd rust monsters than those who eschew all armor and weapons?

I like the Monks of the Rust Monster idea. It's a natural evolution of how the monks and magic-users used to take over the melee when facing one of these beasts.

I believe people have been using Rust Monsters in AD&D that way for a long time, on both sides of the screen. I've seen a good few scenarios where intelligent foes have trained or captive Rust Monsters to soften up their enemies. (Including one where they'd fed one of them on pitchblend, resulting in a radioactive rust monster!) It works better if the creatures involved don't rely on metal equipment, obviously - imagine a band of marauding trolls accompanied by their pet Rust Monsters and Disenchanters - all they need is a pet monster that 'eats' fire and acid, and they'd have little to fear from most human & demi-human opponents.

There is another obvious tactical use for Rust Monsters, they're ideal for dealing with those nasty Iron Golems, Shield Guardians and similar constructs. With a potent enough wizard on the team, it isn't even necessary to bring the Monster to the party. Simply carry a couple of live mice, then if the party needs a Rust Monster the wizard tosses a mouse on the floor, a quick polymorph othercasting and Presto! instant Rust Monster.

Sleeper

04-10-2009 06:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10220394)

Or it literally is a propeller, and Rust Monsters produce thousands of tiny fry that disperse through the air like windblown seeds, twirling their feathery tails to propel themselves, then shedding most of their tail-prop when they land.

Maybe they're giant mites, and like certain mites rust monsters use a form of ballooning to travel through the air. The spinnerets might atrophy in adults, but immature specimens could extrude a line of silk that builds and waves in the breeze, until the wind pulls them away from the bush on which the eggmass was laid.

If the young have fully developed antennae and the ability to sense ferrous materials, this could be nasty. They might float through the air on their silk kites until they sense a mass of iron below them, and then snip the thread and drop. A wind-blown fog of baby rust monsters that happened to drift over one of the lumbering ironclad ships used by the dwarves for river defense could be catastrophic, as a rain of tiny rust-makers plummeted toward the vessel and destroys everything above the waterline.

JRM

04-10-2009 06:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10220483)

Maybe they're giant mites, and like certain mites rust monsters use a form of ballooning to travel through the air. The spinnerets might atrophy in adults, but immature specimens could extrude a line of silk that builds and waves in the breeze, until the wind pulls them away from the bush on which the eggmass was laid.

If the young have fully developed antennae and the ability to sense ferrous materials, this could be nasty. They might float through the air on their silk kites until they sense a mass of iron below them, and then snip the thread and drop.

That was more or less my thinking, including it raining Rust Monsters!:D Ballooning arachnids was one of the inspirations for the idea, together with sycamore seeds. I do like the idea of the windblown Rust Monster Fry being able to spin their tail-tip propellers to give them an extra bit of lift or thrust. There are species of bacteria which have biological rotary engines, albeit on a far smaller scale.

Sleeper

04-10-2009 06:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10220567)

That was more or less my thinking, including it raining Rust Monsters!:D Ballooning arachnids was one of the inspirations for the idea, together with sycamore seeds. I do like the idea of the windblown Rust Monster Fry being able to spin their tail-tip propellers to give them an extra bit of lift or thrust. There are species of bacteria which have biological rotary engines, albeit on a far smaller scale.

If the propellers were proportionately larger in young rust monsters than in the mature ones, they could work like the helicopter seeds of maple trees. They drift in the wind on their kite, then snip the thread when they sense a certain amount of iron below. Then they use the forced rotation of their propellers to slow their fall, and perhaps even control the angle of descent until they land on the desired target.

6inTruder

04-10-2009 07:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

started wondering... How Warforged feel about the rust monster?

demiurge1138

04-10-2009 07:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

As much as I enjoy the mental image of airborne rusting swarms, and the lamentations of the players that such would cause, the fact that rust monsters are generally subterranean makes airborne dispersal somewhat unlikely. Water-borne dispersal, on the other hand, makes sense--there's a lot of underground rivers and lakes, and the tail-fin could be a paddle.

Water-borne dispersal also helps answer a question posed to me by my mother, of all people--if rust monsters are so dangerous to metal, why haven't they been exterminated yet by metal-using cultures? Sure, there might be specialized rust-catchers, using clubs and woven nets and poisonous gasses, but most terrestrial people don't think to look underwater. Perhaps the rust-catchers kill most of the rust monsters and bring in the biggest to be tamed for the rust farms, little knowing the jelly-like mass of eggs sitting in that inconspicuous pool of water. Maybe settlements downstream of rust farms are plagued by rust monster larvae emerging from the river, metamorphosing in an out-of-the-way area, then moving to civilization for a ferrous feast.

demiurge1138

04-10-2009 07:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10220717)
started wondering... How Warforged feel about the rust monster?

How would you feel about a guy running around with a super-soaker full of hydrochloric acid? Rust monsters are anathema to warforged, and many warforged probably have an extreme fear of such beasts. No doubt, a rust monster loose in one of House Cannith's creation forges during the Last War would be a huge waste of warforged life and Cannith profits--such beasts might be unleashed by a military to stop a shipment of warforged to one of their enemies, but doing so (and getting caught) would mean that dealings with the House would be jeopardized. More likely would be rust monsters smuggled in by radical druidic sects or anti-construct racists, hoping to discourage House Cannith from making more warforged altogether.

Sleeper

04-10-2009 07:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10220728)
As much as I enjoy the mental image of airborne rusting swarms, and the lamentations of the players that such would cause, the fact that rust monsters are generally subterranean makes airborne dispersal somewhat unlikely.

Airborne dispersal actually makes a lot of sense, if one standard assumption is overturned. The Underdark of late 1E AD&D was based on a network of interconnected tunnels. A dark elf could wander from one end of the continent to the other without every seeing the surface. But it's quite possible to have extensive dungeons and caves that are more like Earth's. Caves that are isolated, dungeons that are connected to nothing but a couple dozen, or a couple hundred, rooms and tunnels and passages and caverns. In this case, it makes sense that underworld fauna would develop the ability to widen their breeding pool and spread their genetic material across multiple dungeons. Some species might kick their adolescent young out of the nest into the upper world, where they scramble until they find a new hole to hide in. And perhaps rust monsters pregnant with eggjelly feel compelled to find the surface, and make a quick dash to a nearby bush. The kids born from those eggs then spread far and wide, across the sky. Most die, because they don't find a suitable habitat. But a few drift over another cave complex, or another dungeon, or a sewer system, and find a new home. And the genetic vitality of the species is preserved. This also makes sense if travel between different underground is just difficult, which is the Underdark default in any case.

The water dispersal idea is a good one, too. I haven't quite figured it out, but I'm thinking the tails serve as a kind of walk-walking aid. Instead of a cloud of mini-rusters, you have a film of iron-banes skeetering across the water towards the party courtesy of surface tension and little propellers.

JRM

04-10-2009 08:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10220587)

If the propellers were proportionately larger in young rust monsters than in the mature ones, they could work like the helicopter seeds of maple trees. They drift in the wind on their kite, then snip the thread when they sense a certain amount of iron below. Then they use the forced rotation of their propellers to slow their fall, and perhaps even control the angle of descent until they land on the desired target.

That's how the sycamore seed I referred to earlier works, the sycamore in question being Acer pseudoplatanus.

JRM

04-10-2009 09:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10220728)

As much as I enjoy the mental image of airborne rusting swarms, and the lamentations of the players that such would cause, the fact that rust monsters are generally subterranean makes airborne dispersal somewhat unlikely. Water-borne dispersal, on the other hand, makes sense--there's a lot of underground rivers and lakes, and the tail-fins could be a paddle.

Well I was just throwing out ideas to see what fits, and the idea of aerial larva attracted more of a response than the aquatic variant, where the propeller acts as fins-and-gills.

Although this is the underdark we're talking about, it probably has powerful subterranean winds due to various geomagical forces beyond earthly physics, There has to be something circulating the air down there and keeping it breathable for surface folks, otherwise they won't be able to delve into the depth to be killed by things or take their stuff.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10220728)

Water-borne dispersal also helps answer a question posed to me by my mother, of all people--if rust monsters are so dangerous to metal, why haven't they been exterminated yet by metal-using cultures? Sure, there might be specialized rust-catchers, using clubs and woven nets and poisonous gasses, but most terrestrial people don't think to look underwater. Perhaps the rust-catchers kill most of the rust monsters and bring in the biggest to be tamed for the rust farms, little knowing the jelly-like mass of eggs sitting in that inconspicuous pool of water. Maybe settlements downstream of rust farms are plagued by rust monster larvae emerging from the river, metamorphosing in an out-of-the-way area, then moving to civilization for a ferrous feast.

Well AD&D societies have a lot of other creatures that threaten them. Rust Monsters are a minor nuisance compared to some of the other dangers which would presumably receive more attention - they have to be especially alert for all those rapidly multiplying monsters that could grow to plague proportions within weeks, such as some Undead. When you've got Ghouls and Sons of Kyuss to deal with, a silly-looking creature that any peasant can deal with by breaking out a club isn't going to receive much priority.

demiurge1138

04-10-2009 09:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Ghouls, nothing. It's wights you have to be worried about. You get killed by a wight--and that's as easy as one punch for most of the population--you got another wight in 1d4 rounds. Ghoul fever takes a few days.

Aerial dispersal would work--I just thought water dispersal might be more practical. I will say that the mental image of a female rust monster, gravid with rustlings, emerging onto a mountaintop to see the sun for the first time... and explode, seeding the air with aerial larvae.

On a major tangent, thinking about metal vs. wood... where do dwarves get their wood? I mean, they live underground, or in desolate areas like mountains, cliff faces and canyon walls. They have access to all the gems, precious metals and usable ores that they could ever hope for... but they still need fuel for the fires to make those metals worth something, and all of the dwarven weapons (axes, picks, hammers, crossbows) require wood to operate. Fuel can be taken care of, to a certain extent--dwarves probably have discovered coal, petroleum and/or natural gas.

So the dwarves would have to trade for their wood, for gems and metals and gold (the dwarves would also, of course, want to trade for preserved meats and cereals for bread and beer--most dwarf crops would be root veggies and fungus). Dwarves aren't obsessed with gold and gems... they're obsessed with the wood such trinkets can buy. A dwarf would consider especially fragrant or sturdy woods the same way a human would prize rubies or silver. And this would explain why dwarf/elf relations are always so frosty. Everytime a dwarf sees a forest, he wants to cut it down for its precious wood.

Sleeper

04-10-2009 10:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10221028)

That's how the sycamore seed I referred to earlier works, the sycamore in question being Acer pseudoplatanus.

Which is a species of the maple...

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10221158)

I will say that the mental image of a female rust monster, gravid with rustlings, emerging onto a mountaintop to see the sun for the first time... and explode, seeding the air with aerial larvae.

Love that.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10221158)

On a major tangent, thinking about metal vs. wood... where do dwarves get their wood? I mean, they live underground, or in desolate areas like mountains, cliff faces and canyon walls. They have access to all the gems, precious metals and usable ores that they could ever hope for... but they still need fuel for the fires to make those metals worth something, and all of the dwarven weapons (axes, picks, hammers, crossbows) require wood to operate. Fuel can be taken care of, to a certain extent--dwarves probably have discovered coal, petroleum and/or natural gas.

So the dwarves would have to trade for their wood, for gems and metals and gold (the dwarves would also, of course, want to trade for preserved meats and cereals for bread and beer--most dwarf crops would be root veggies and fungus). Dwarves aren't obsessed with gold and gems... they're obsessed with the wood such trinkets can buy. A dwarf would consider especially fragrant or sturdy woods the same way a human would prize rubies or silver. And this would explain why dwarf/elf relations are always so frosty. Everytime a dwarf sees a forest, he wants to cut it down for its precious wood.

I always preferred the idea that dwarves were residents of the highlands. Not Tolkienesque kings of Moriaesque caverns. Highlanders. Sheep herders. Goat rustlers. Some terraced farms. Sure they mine. And they smelt. And like the swords of Damascus, their steelwork, particularly armor, is world-renown. But living underground? Nonsense. Just a rumor. There's this problem with waste. With air circulation. But an even bigger problem is what do they eat? Without photosynthesis, there's no basis for an energy-rich ecology. And I don't really want my fantasy dwarves to live on some magical fungus that lives and grows in magical abundance. That's for the fey. The brownies. The elves, under their elf hills. The gnomes. Not the stolid, pragmatic dwarves.

No, I want the dwarves hunting in the woods, testing their bravery by standing solid in front of a charging boar with only a spear in their hands. They aren't skilled with horses because the only horses that range in the highlands are small, sturdy, and almost woolly. Good for pulling a bellows, or an anvil, or a wagon full of rutabegas. The Scottish accent can go. But the internectine clan warfare? The huge-ass weapons, whether claymore or a kind of giant glaive? Selling themselves out as mercenaries across the continent? The parochial xenophobia? Those can definitely stay.

Sure, they have a few underground fortresses. But they're fortifications not cities. Outposts, strongholds. In a world where monsters and mages fly, castles are passee except as palaces or other impractical structures built purely for aesthetic reasons. No, the medieval fantasy version of a castle is closer to a bunker or a bomb shelter. NORAD, under in Cheyenne Mountain. Tunnels, restricted access. No civilians. These structures are built purely for defense.

Towns and even cities may spring up around the Queen's undercastle built into the face of the outcropping. But most dwarves live outside, in huts or country estates, in ramshackle tenements or wood and beam houses faced with stucco. Cobblestone streets, sharp night air. Fir and pine needles underfoot.

That pretty much destroys the concept of the Underdark, but the Underdark is overexposed, anyway. Throwing out the cliches and using something new isn't a bad thing.

JRM

04-10-2009 05:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10221158)

Ghouls, nothing. It's wights you have to be worried about. You get killed by a wight--and that's as easy as one punch for most of the population--you got another wight in 1d4 rounds. Ghoul fever takes a few days.

I only mentioned a couple of the weakest undead as were the problem started. The higher grade versions would obviously be even nastier. Not only can a wight autoslay a 1st level character with one punch, even the half-strength ones have twice the Hit Dice of a 1st level character and immunity to normal weapons. It just gets worse as they grow tougher. Many of the higher-rank Undead can walk through walls (Wraiths, Spectres) or at least seep through cracks (gaseous form Vampires), so the poor peasants can't even lock themselves inside their houses. No wonder they're so keen on priests and temples.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10221158)

Aerial dispersal would work--I just thought water dispersal might be more practical. I will say that the mental image of a female rust monster, gravid with rustlings, emerging onto a mountaintop to see the sun for the first time... and explode, seeding the air with aerial larvae.

That I like - the Puffball Rust Monster. Imagine if a party encounters one just about to pop and kill it, they'd be terrified it was some Rust-Monster analogue of a Gas Spore and they were all going to die and spout baby Pseudo-Rust Monsters. Then they'd notice the rust holes in their metal equipment with the tiny insects chewing away inside.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10221158)

On a major tangent, thinking about metal vs. wood... where do dwarves get their wood? I mean, they live underground, or in desolate areas like mountains, cliff faces and canyon walls. They have access to all the gems, precious metals and usable ores that they could ever hope for... but they still need fuel for the fires to make those metals worth something, and all of the dwarven weapons (axes, picks, hammers, crossbows) require wood to operate. Fuel can be taken care of, to a certain extent--dwarves probably have discovered coal, petroleum and/or natural gas.

I'm with Sleeper here, I don't imagine Dwarves as living in desolate areas, but in mountains mostly covered in conifer trees, with intensely cultivated terraced farms near their dwarf-holds. I think of them as having a lifestyles comparable to people who live in mountain areas like the Alps or the Andes.

That's for 'regular dwarves' though, in my campaign I've also got Svartalf-style Fey Dwarves who live in magical underground grottos with all the mushrooms and subterranean wonders you'd imagine, but they're few and far between.

JRM

04-10-2009 05:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10221271)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10221028)

That's how the sycamore seed I referred to earlier works, the sycamore in question being Acer pseudoplatanus.

Which is a species of the maple...

I know, I was just trying to say we're talking about the same genus of tree, hence the Acer ("Maple"). Guess I should have made it clearer by saying Sycamore Maple, but over here we just call them sycamores.

Wakboth

04-10-2009 08:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim (Post 10219353)

I haven't picked up any 4e books, and have paid no attention to chatter about it. Could you summarize this for the ignorant masses (me)? I love hearing about a good nerd rage.

IIRC, the thing is that DMs love rust monsters, and players hate them (generalisations!). And in a game which puts lots of value on magical equipment, and attempts to maintain at least some kind of a balance, having your (very expensive and very useful) magic weapons and armor reduced to rust by what is essentially a nuisance encounter is problematic. (Although they aren't anywhere the sort of "gotcha!" monsters as, say, disenchanters...)

Mearls' rust monster re-design for 3.5 (featured on the Wizards' site somewhere) changed the way the rust monster works, IIRC they caused temporary penalties to metallic equipment which went away after a while. Cue nerdrage, with people complaining about changing the sacred rust monster, people complaining about how unrealistic the new system is (hah!), people thinking Mearls was molly-coddling players, people thinking that rust monsters should be banned for good, and so on. :D

Me, I rationalized it quite simply: since rust monsters can eat more than just iron (at least in BECMI, they quite happily consumed coins and stuff), whatever they do to the metal can't be rusting it, exactly. So, maybe they magically soften the metal, then gnaw it away at leisure if allowed to do so... and if you run away or kill the rust monster, your armor and weapons eventually return to their usual consistency, maybe looking pitted and stained but otherwise fine.

Also: rust monster is one of the very few critters whose art has universally improved with every new edition. :)

JRM

04-10-2009 11:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10222592)

IIRC, the thing is that DMs love rust monsters, and players hate them (generalisations!). And in a game which puts lots of value on magical equipment, and attempts to maintain at least some kind of a balance, having your (very expensive and very useful) magic weapons and armor reduced to rust by what is essentially a nuisance encounter is problematic. (Although they aren't anywhere the sort of "gotcha!" monsters as, say, disenchanters...)

Mearls' rust monster re-design for 3.5 (featured on the Wizards' site somewhere) changed the way the rust monster works, IIRC they caused temporary penalties to metallic equipment which went away after a while. Cue nerdrage, with people complaining about changing the sacred rust monster, people complaining about how unrealistic the new system is (hah!), people thinking Mearls was molly-coddling players, people thinking that rust monsters should be banned for good, and so on. :D

Me, I rationalized it quite simply: since rust monsters can eat more than just iron (at least in BECM, they quite happily consumed coins and stuff), whatever they do to the metal can't be rusting it, exactly. So, maybe they magically soften the metal, then gnaw it away at leisure if allowed to do so... and if you run away or kill the rust monster, your armor and weapons eventually return to their usual consistency, maybe looking pitted and stained but otherwise fine.

Also: rust monster is one of the very few critters whose art has universally improved with every new edition. :)

Pah! I disagree entirely...

...everyone with any taste knows the Dave Sutherland version is the One True Rust Monster. :)

Ahem

As for the 'it just temporarily soften the metal', I thought about using that rationalisation but surely if it makes a sword soft enough for the Rust Monster to chew like a cheese baguette the metal weapons would get seriously damaged if you wield them when softened? A Rust Monster doesn't have a powerful bite - they don't even have a bite attack in most editions of D&D - so a 'temporarily rust softened' weapon could be so weak it is bent or broken by the force of a blow.

I would prefer to make a Rust Monster's rusting attack only work on non-magical metal - so the player don't have to worry about it destroying their beloved +3 sword of goblinhewing and the DM doesn't have to worry about their players using them to slaughter Iron Golem.

Or, have it do a small amount of damage to a metal object per hit, rather than the "one hit rusting" it has in AD&D, so the Rust Monster would need to hit a sword, say, 2-3 times to render it useless, plus once per magical plus, and then say the magical rusting can be reversed with a mending spell.

Either solution puts them back to being low-level nuisance monsters.

Now the funny thing is I've never used a Rust Monster as a DM. Even when the PCs tried to use the 'polymorph mouse to rust monster' tactic against The Terrible Iron Golem they lost initiative and the golem stepped on the mouse while advancing to slaughter the party again. (Its lucky that raise dead and stone to flesh exist in AD&D, I think that golem must have killed the PCs 3-4 times apiece via its poisonous sword and petrifying whip.)

Kakita Kojiro

04-11-2009 02:04 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10222592)
Mearls' rust monster re-design for 3.5 (featured on the Wizards' site somewhere)

It was in a Design & Development article.

Go ahead. Give in to your nerdrage. With each passing moment you make yourself more a servant of the Dark Side. :D

JRM

04-11-2009 05:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10223579)

Go ahead. Give in to your nerdrage. With each passing moment you make yourself more a servant of the Dark Side. :D

Now I'm imagining the Emperor DMing a D&D session for Darths Vader, Maul and Tyrannus. Boy, wouldn't that be a great game.

Off course, they'd all be using Force-manipulation to cheat on the dice rolls.:D

noisms

04-12-2009 11:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sahuagin are coming up. I've had a busy weekend.

Mikaze

04-13-2009 08:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I always thought the rust monster was cute. Genuinely cute too, rather than ugly-cute.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sahuagin

We've discussed these before in some detail, I think at the Aquatic Elf entry, and if I remember correctly sombreros and cigars somehow came into the equation. Sahuagins, as any fule kno, are a kind of humanoid shark-thing which hunt in packs and try to kill basically anything they come across. Really, just an aquatic orc by any other name. As with all aquatic monsters in the MM you have to feel that Sahuagin won't ever reach their full potential because, really, how many campaigns revolve around the sea? At most my guess is that they tend to appear simply as raiders in most games.

Points of particular interest:

- Sahuagin are ruled by a king whose domain "is divided into nine provices". I find this interesting. Does size of domain have no bearing on the number of provinces? And are all Sahuagin kingdoms set up this way? In which case, why nine?
- Sahuagin keep pet sharks and can train them to obey simple commands. This suggests that it's at least possible for human beings to do the same thing.
- They like to keep captives for torture and sport in special air-breathing chambers under the waves. I quite like this idea for the beginning of a campaign, in media res, where the players start off as captives who are just about to escape. What could follow would then be a bit like Apocalypto under the sea. I suppose to make it work properly the PCs would have to be members of an aquatic race, because it isn't easy to imagine human beings outwitting or outrunning sharks and shark-men underwater.
- Sahuagin are full-on Social Darwinists who eat their weaker members. Again that strange mixture of mythology and real world (sort of) science - in the next paragraph we have sages speculating that Sahuagin are "degenerate humans who formerly dwelt on the seacoasts, whose evil and depravity was so great that they eventually devolved into fish-folk and sought the darkness of the ocean depths."
- There's a strong Ixixachitl/Sahuagin rivalry going on down there underwater, presumably because, you know, evil races always do have rivalries. How did the rivalry start, though, and what over?
- "It is suggested that they were created from a nation of particularly evil humans by the most powerful lawful evil gods in order to preserve them when the great deluge came upon the earth." Great deluge? Eh? Forgive me, because I'm not in any way a setting buff, but what is this from?

demiurge1138

04-13-2009 12:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Well, as for the ixixachitl thing... sahuagin are Lawful Evil. Ixits are Chaotic Evil. Sekolah, the shark god of the sahuagin, is from Hell, whereas the ixits worship Demogorgon, Prince of Demons. The rivalry between the two species is a undersea parody of the great Blood War, with both races trying their best to prove their version of evil the superior one.

Of course, since both sahuagin and ixits are far less numerous and powerful than batezu and tanar'ri, their struggles are much more localized and not taken nearly so seriously. There's a lot more sniping on the sidelines and war profiteering by krakens, morkoths, deep-dwelling kuo toa and aboleths, and the whole thing is more likely to be derailed by good or neutral oceanic folk like the merpeople, aquatic elves or even the sentient super-whales of 2e.

That also means that things can get very much out of hand when one or both sides, drawing on their clerical traditions, starts summoning their fiendish inspiration to fight with them...

6inTruder

04-13-2009 12:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

one thing I really like in 4ed is that Sahuagin worship an aspect of the Unaligned nature goddess.

Sleeper

04-13-2009 01:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10231732)

Well, as for the ixitxachitl thing... sahuagin are Lawful Evil. Ixits are Chaotic Evil. Sekolah, the shark god of the sahuagin, is from Hell, whereas the ixits worship Demogorgon, Prince of Demons. The rivalry between the two species is a undersea parody of the great Blood War, with both races trying their best to prove their version of evil th superior one.

Of course, since both sahuagin and ixits are far less numerous and powerful than batezu and tanar'ri, their struggles are much more localized and not taken nearly so seriously. There's a lot more sniping on the sidelines and war profiteering by krakens, morkoths, deep-dwelling kuo toa and aboleths, and the whole thing is more likely to be derailed by good or neutral oceanic folk like the merpeople, aquatic elves or even the sentient super-whales of 2e.

That also means that things can get very much out of hand when one or both sides, drawing on their clerical traditions, starts summoning their fiendish inspiration to fight with them...

Sekolah was always a weird fit in the Nine Hells. Lawful generally means following some kind of laws or rules. Structure, organized military, civilian rule of law, organization, even bureaucracy. At heart, civilization. Specifically, the lawful evil ideal of despotism. Yet Sekolah of the flip-flopping gender is basically a huge solitary predator under the ice of one of the Nine Hells who snipes the occasional careless devil and serves as the plane's ultimate bogeyman. Chaotic, or a form of primal atavistic neutral. The other version of law is rigidly following some kind of inner code. The monk-thing, or the knight-thing. (Heretically, the barbarian-thing, of which the chivalric code is just a variant.) But still, a solitary ravening beast. No code of honor except eat the weak, which doesn't really qualify.

I hate the idea of a pale shadow of the already anemic Blood War, but I love the idea of war profiteering. A great war, between the magic rays and the sharkfolk that sunders the seas. The sahuagin order and industry, pseudo-Roman legions, huge conquered slave cities where the merfolk and mer-elves slave away in mines and workshops. Great undersea dreadnoughts towed by krakens. Against their enemy, the scattered and diverse ixitxachitl. Formless, structureless, local groups or cults banding and disbanding in the wake of the most charismatic of the local leaders. Each group following their own patron or demon prince, mutilating or painting or tattooing themselves with bioluminescent strains in a thousand different patterns. An aging centralized bathic Rome, surrounded by the glowing darkness of innumerable tribes.

And both sides pledge and owe service not to gods per se, but to whatever being can grant them power. One side has chosen the inhuman forces of the demons, the other has chosen the corrupting forces of the devils, and they wage war through theurgy and sorcery as well as more physical skirmishes. The devils seek to corrupt and have weakened the sahuagin state with dissipation, excess, and madness; while the demons relish destruction and have urged more than one tribe on glorious but quixotic quests that bring vast suffering to the enemy, but cost an entire generation of youths or even the lives of the entire tribe. The petty inward-looking demons and devils can't see that they're weakening their greatest allies in the mortal world by their machinations.

The rest of the undersea realm is swept up in the wake of this great conflict, with tributary states and outright vassals, conquered nations and neutral powers. Morkoth spymasters selling their services from the center of a complex and mind-baffling web. Locathah arms merchants and moneychangers who skate the border between obscene profits, and their families being served as sushi. Heretical seaelves preaching a new religion of dolphins not sharks, who meet in secret and risk being tossed to the shark pens. Kraken generals and recruiters who weave the weather that cause the storms that sink the ships that supply contingents of lacedon berserkers. Aboleths overseers hired to mind the numerous slaves and living in strange slime-filled crystal domes. Currents are mapped, and sealanes are patrolled. Posts spring up. Even barbarian ixitxachitl and apostate sea elves are tolerated in the cosmopolitan cities, and can even vie to become Citizens, as long as they prove their loyalty. Hostage princes and princesses are traded between the ixitxachitl and sahuagin, and are raised as their own.

Mikelibrarian

04-13-2009 04:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10231492)

Sahuagin

Points of particular interest:

- Sahuagin are ruled by a king whose domain "is divided into nine provices". I find this interesting. Does size of domain have no bearing on the number of provinces? And are all Sahuagin kingdoms set up this way? In which case, why nine?
- "It is suggested that they were created from a nation of particularly evil humans by the most powerful lawful evil gods in order to preserve them when the great deluge came upon the earth." Great deluge? Eh? Forgive me, because I'm not in any way a setting buff, but what is this from?

The 1st edition Monster Manual says that the king's domain is divided into nine provinces because they are devil worshippers who want their domains to resemble the nine hells. The lack of explanation in the second edition Sahuagin description is probably due to the diminishing of the role of devils in second edition.

I am guessing that the great deluge is probably a reference to Noah's flood that occurs in the Bible's Book of Genesis.

As for enmity between Sahuagin and Ixitxachitl the Wikipedia article for Sekolah says that he once enslaved Demogorgon through the use of an Artifact.
<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sekolah>

Personally, I think they are enemies because they were both created for Blackmoor, and Dave Arneson felt that the two evil sea dwelling races should be enemies. One interesting thing is that while Ixitxachitl sounds like an Aztec name, one of the first Spaniards to report on the religious rituals of the Aztecs was a Franciscan monk named Bernardino de Sahagún.

Oh, and this is late, but I'm happy that the Phantom picture shows a chained man in a Roman Toga as one of the first ghost stories was a Roman account using a chained ghost. I'm sure that the 1815 translation was a great influence on Charles Dickens.

<http://tententwo.com/2008/10/31/a-roman-ghost-story/>

noisms

04-13-2009 04:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10232321)

The 1st edition Monster Manual says that the king's domain is divided into nine provinces because they are devil worshippers who want their domains to resemble the nine hells. The lack of explanation in the second edition Sahuagin description is probably due to the diminishing of the role of devils in second edition.

That would make sense. Thanks.

Quote:

I am guessing that the great deluge is probably a reference to Noah's flood that occurs in the Bible's Book of Genesis:

Given that there are no other references to real-world Biblical events in the MM I find that a bit difficult to believe. I was expecting it to be from a timeline in Forgotten Realms or Dragonlance or somesuch, but not being an expert on the main D&D settings I'm not sure.

Wakboth

04-13-2009 08:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The DiTerlizzi illustration is characteristically excellent (although the sahuagin doesn't seem especially shark-like...) and has set their looks in 3e and 4e. Which is good, since IIRC the 1e pic was a very uninspired "crested, vaguely fishy guy with big round eyes".

Now, does anyone else remember a thread here about how the sahuagin - undersea shark-Nazis! - actually ruled most of the world? Krakens were too hard to go after in the abyssal depths, as were morkoths, and aquatic elves survived near river mouths where the salinity was too low for sahuagins' comfort, but otherwise they totally dominated the seas, occasionally sending raiding groups on dry land to harass the air-breathers for kicks. Bit like Predators, actually.

DMH

04-13-2009 08:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sea Devils was the best monster book for 2e. I thought "saw-hu-a-gen" were all right for gillmen but Ravenloft had the reaver which was more interesting as individuals. Then I read Sea Devils and now everytime I use saltwater, there are sahuagin somewhere. There is also a followup article for SD in Dragon 239 that has sahuagin technology. They are smarter than humans and their only weaknesses are bright light and fear of magic.

Are malenti listed here or under sea elves?

Vultur10

04-13-2009 08:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The sahuagin are based off of H. P. Lovecraft's Deep Ones -- the malenti, who can pass as aquatic elves, are the equivalent of the hybrids who could pass as human.

noisms

04-14-2009 01:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10232718)

Sea Devils was the best monster book for 2e. I thought "saw-hu-a-gen" were all right for gillmen but Ravenloft had the reaver which was more interesting as individuals. Then I read Sea Devils and now everytime I use saltwater, there are sahuagin somewhere. There is also a followup article for SD in Dragon 239 that has sahuagin technology. They are smarter than humans and their only weaknesses are bright light and fear of magic.

Are malenti listed here or under sea elves?

They're under sea elves. They're only hinted at in the Sahuagin entry (it says that Tritons suspect a linkage between the two races).

noisms

04-14-2009 01:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10 (Post 10232757)

The sahuagin are based off of H. P. Lovecraft's Deep Ones -- the malenti, who can pass as aquatic elves, are the equivalent of the hybrids who could pass as human.

In that case where are Father Dagon and Mother Hydra??? ;)

Sleeper

04-14-2009 03:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10233508)

In that case where are Father Dagon and Mother Hydra??? ;)

I believe Father Dragon was forced out of the church after less than appropriate conduct with a young piercer, and can now be found wandering the Underdark begging passersby for packets of myconid spores.

The Mother of Hydras ran into an epic wizard who turned her into into monster with a typical assortment of random traits usually attributed to sorcerous meddling (including fur, dull spikes, a beak, and an addiction to formic acid). She still lays eggs but her children, while definitely monstrous, are tiny and only a threat to less-than-giant-size insects. The current edition of The Teratologists' Guide to the Planes (revised, Year of the Platypus) now reflects this with a brief entry summarizing both her and her progeny: "mostly harmless".

YojimboC

04-14-2009 05:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

It should come as no surprise that I love Sahuagin. And it should come as no further surprise that I never get to use them.

Except once, as antagonists in a pirate campaign, where they did pretty much just play the role of raiders. It was fun. I set up things so that two rival pirate ships stopped off in a friendly port, with the plot hook dangled in front of them of a gang war in the city streets, when BAM! I hit them with a Sahuagin raid instead. Backed up by Sea Trolls for some variety. Man, that was a fun adventure.

Afterward, the players tried to go under the water to counter attack, but none of them had A) darkvision or 2) magical light, so the Sahuagin tunnels were pretty much impenetrable. The characters were smart enough to get some "breathe underwater juice," but once they got down there they were rather outclassed.

Sahuagin are plenty bad ass, but it's difficult to make use of them. There's so much more prep the characters have to do before going into a Sahuagin dungeon... no, wait a minute, it's coming to me... a half-sunken ancient temple, populated by Sahuagin and other aquatic monsters. But why do the characters need to get into the temple? Riches, natch, but there needs to be something more. Lemme think.

Mikelibrarian

04-14-2009 04:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10234391)

It should come as no surprise that I love Sahuagin. And it should come as no further surprise that I never get to use them.

Except once, as antagonists in a pirate campaign, where they did pretty much just play the role of raiders. It was fun. I set up things so that two rival pirate ships stopped off in a friendly port, with the plot hook dangled in front of them of a gang war in the city streets, when BAM! I hit them with a Sahuagin raid instead. Backed up by Sea Trolls for some variety. Man, that was a fun adventure.

Afterward, the players tried to go under the water to counter attack, but none of them had A) darkvision or 2) magical light, so the Sahuagin tunnels were pretty much impenetrable. The characters were smart enough to get some "breathe underwater juice," but once they got down there they were rather outclassed.

Sahuagin are plenty bad ass, but it's difficult to make use of them. There's so much more prep the characters have to do before going into a Sahuagin dungeon... no, wait a minute, it's coming to me... a half-sunken ancient temple, populated by Sahuagin and other aquatic monsters. But why do the characters need to get into the temple? Riches, natch, but there needs to be something more. Lemme think.

The temple is actually the first temple consecrated to your party's cleric's god which collapsed beneath the waves in an ancient cataclysm. The party must liberate the bones of the first high priest for an epic level Resurrection spell because only she seal the rift to the Abyss that is opening up over the party's nation's capitol city. Oh, and having a +2 trident is pretty cool.

Hellzon

04-14-2009 04:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Spoilers for "Alliance at Nefelus" from Dungeon #165 (the latest).

Alliance at Nefelus has arctic Sahuagin living in a magic iceberg/fortress (sieging a tropical island by summoning a ring of ice around it to block ships). When the PCs arrive to infiltrate the iceberg, they pop out of the water in the Sahuagins' lair.

Then there's ice giants and a white dragon, but I got this weird idea of Sahuagins in a magically frozen iceberg travelling the high seas, occasionally stopping to raid coastal towns. There's the coast raiding again, but an iceberg is a slightly more convenient dungeon than a shark city at the bottom of the sea. ;)

JRM

04-14-2009 05:36 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10231492)

Sahuagin

We've discussed these before in some detail, I think at the Aquatic Elf entry, and if I remember correctly sombreros and cigars somehow came into the equation.

Ay! Do not speak lightly of the Sea Caballeros' cigars, señor, for they are far more than they appear. Even finding a way to make cigars out of seaweed that can be smoked underwater would be a great achievement, but those cigars give water breathing to those who smoke them! That is why no caballero is ever without a packet of cigarillos of water smoking.*

;))

As for our sacred sombreros, they are a secret no gringo will ever learn!.:mad:

*The Sea Caballeros may love their tobacco, but their spokesman neglects to mention the risk of excessive smoking causing Gill Cancer, which requires them to resort to cure disease spells on occasion.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10233503)

They're under sea elves. They're only hinted at in the Sahuagin entry (it says that Tritons suspect a linkage between the two races).

As to the Malenti/Sahuagin origins question, the relevant Monstrous Manual entries have a definite implication both races are related to Aquatic Elves. Indeed, Malenti is listed under Elf rather than under Sahuagin:

Quote:

Elf - Malenti

There is a bond between aquatic elves and their hated enemies, the sahuagin, that neither race openly acknowledges.

Few aquatic elves believe in the existence of malenti, as they suggest some disturbing possibilities about sahuagin origins.

Sahuagin:

The tritons however, are purported to have believe that sahuagin are distantly related to sea elves, claiming that the drow spawned the sahuagin.

Although they're externally identical, I suspect that Malenti and Aquatic Elves have minor internal anatomical differences, which dolphins can perceive via their sonar - hence the "Malenti do exist, however, and are identical to aquatic elves in most ways" and "Although the sea elves themselves have a difficult time discerning malenti spies, dolphins might (20%) sense one of the changelings." bits in the Malenti entries.

I believe it is also significant that when Sahuagin and Malenti breed, the offspring are invariably Malenti. That says Malenti are the genetically dominant, and the Sahuagin-variety involves recessive traits so has to be actively maintained. There's a fair chance 'Malenti' is the species natural form, and 'Sahuagin' is what they've turned themselves into (or been turned into).

As for the Drow-Sahuagin link, I can't help wondering whether it's the other way round. If the origins of the Sahuagin are unknown, perhaps its because they're older than the Drow and the latter were created by the former, not vica-versa?

It may even have gone full-circle: Land elves became aquatic elves, who were warped into Sahuagin by worshipping Sekolah, then a branch of Sahuagin entered the undersea and became Kuo-Toa, who eventually converted some of the land elves to worship their Fiendish Beast-Gods, resulting in the drow.

Aquatic Elf + Shark God (Sekolah) -> Sahuagin

Sahuagin + Cave Lobster Goddess (Blibdoolpoolp) -> Kuo Toa

Kuo Toa + Land Elf + Spider Goddess (Loth) -> Drow

DMH

04-14-2009 08:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10233503)

They're under sea elves. They're only hinted at in the Sahuagin entry (it says that Tritons suspect a linkage between the two races).

Ah, so hopefully I made some comments back then on applying the same concept to other races (like humans and orcs or kobolds and gnomes).

6inTruder

04-15-2009 10:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10236615)

Ay! Do not speak lightly of the Sea Caballeros' cigars, senior, for they are far more than they appear. Even finding a way to make cigars out of seaweed that can be smoked underwater would be a great achievement, but those cigars give water breathing to those who smoke them! That is why no caballero is ever without a packet of cigarillos of water smoking.
:)*

So are those a Heroic or Paragon tier wonderous item?

mythSSK

04-15-2009 12:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10232715)

Now, does anyone else remember a thread here about how the sahuagin - undersea shark-Nazis! - actually ruled most of the world? Krakens were too hard to go after in the abyssal depths, as were morkoths, and aquatic elves survived near river mouths where the salinity was too low for sahuagins' comfort, but otherwise they totally dominated the seas, occasionally sending raiding groups on dry land to harass the air-breathers for kicks. Bit like Predators, actually.

As soon as sahuagin came up, I thought about this post. It was my favouritest sahuagin thing ever, and made me really want to use them in a game (haven't yet...). I remembered reading it somewhere not on the rpg.net forums, though.

FAKE EDIT: Found it. It's originally from the Frank & K Tome series (highly suggest you check them out if you haven't already).

Quote:

Borderlands of the Sahuagin: Sore Winners

The first thing to understand about the Sahuagin is that they have already won. Completely. The surface of the world is about ¾ ocean and they own almost all of it. From the standpoint of the Sahuagin, the only places on the planet that have non-Sahuagin races in them are the stale crusts that they already had the presence of mind to cut off their sandwich. All of the non-Sahuagin races are all ghettoized. Even the other aquatic races have been marginalized to the point where they only get the brackish water (Locathah), the rocky shallows (merfolk), the underground darks (Kuo-Toans), or the muddy salt marshes (Lizardfolk). The real real estate – the ocean and coastline – are pretty much the private playground of the Sahuagin.

Individually, Sahuagin will kick your ass, and collectively they will kick the ass of any nation you happen to support. The combined populations of all other sapient races on any planet are less than the population of Sahuagin on that planet. The Sahuagin are also much smarter and better organized than you are so their cities are actually more productive than yours per person in addition to the fact that they have more cities than all the other races and their cities are more populous.

The Sahuagin mutate constantly, but are not inclined to Chaos. They just all have different appearances and capabilities. But every one of them is gifted with super intelligence and thick natural armor. The Sahuagin deep seer are some of the most gifted wizards on the planet and honestly have nothing better to do than just scry on crap and tell the armies where there's some cool stuff to go loot. From time to time the Sahuagin will come onto land to beat the living crap out of people and take control of important or valuable items. Then they take the spoils of war and drag it back under water, laughing the whole time.

Against this backdrop of crushing inferiority, how do the other races maintain? Most of them are fighting for stakes so small that they haven't even noticed that the vast majority of the planet is owned and operated by brutally efficient fish men. But one race that certainly has noticed the power discrepancy is the race of elves most likely to be forgotten: the Sea Elves. They actually live in many of the same areas and have a war going with them.

Life is hard for a Sea Elf, because every one of them is born into a post-apocalyptic world where mutants run amok and hunt them for sport. But it's actually even worse than that because in addition to simply being physically and intellectually inferior to the Sahuagin like everyone else is – they are actually stupid and useless even contrasted with the surface races. An average Sea Elf is as much the intellectual inferior to a Sahuagin as a Griffin is to a normal human. The Sahuagin consider the Sea Elves to be little more than animals, and they aren't wrong.

The Sea Elves keep surviving at all because they see farther than Sahuagin in low-light conditions (and are thus often able to swim away from potential encounters with Sahuagin during the morning and twilight hours that Sea Elves leave their hidden nests), and also because every so often a Sahuagin gets born who looks exactly like a Sea Elf. These Sahuagin mutants, called Malenti, are a little bit worse than a normal Sahuagin in that they lack the rending claws. But they're still stronger and smarter than any Sea Elf that ever swam the 7 seas. So when these Malenti realize that they get a crap deal from Sahuagin society, they often as not run off to join the Sea Elves, where they almost immediately rise to positions of leadership. They also gain crap loads of experience very quickly because the odds are so stacked against them. In short, the reason that the Sea Elves still exist is that they actually are a splinter faction of Sahuagin that uses real sea elves as beasts of burden instead of simply hunting them like the more normal Sahuagin groups do.

And yet, despite the fact that the Sahuagin have won at everything, they still continue to fight the other races and take their children and stuff. Partly this is to feed the insatiable demands of their Baatezu masters, and partly this is because on some deep level the Sahuagin are convinced that it actually couldn't possibly be that easy. In addition to looking for bling and candy to take from the weaker races, the Deep Seers are also combing the world for the one thing that the Great Mothers are pretty sure exists somewhere: the hidden army that the other races are putting together to take the world back from the clutches of the Sahuagin Empire. As far as anyone knows, it doesn't exist, but for some reason the Great Mothers keep insisting that the searching continue. Maybe they know something we don't?

Inyssius

04-15-2009 12:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Damn, I was going to post that!

Myth has it right: read that.

Sleeper

04-15-2009 01:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Cool description. Sounds a bit like a more fantastic version of Čapek's War with the Newts, agumented with over-the-top (Sh)Ar(k)yan superiority (though the "every one of them is gifted with super intelligence" is a bit much).

demiurge1138

04-15-2009 01:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10240641)

Cool description. Sounds a bit like a more fantastic version of Čapek's War with the Newts, agumented with over-the-top (Sh)Ar(k)yan superiority (though the "every one of them is gifted with super intelligence" is a bit much).

Sahuagin have an average intelligence of 14. Humans have an average Int of 10. Sahuagin are at a decided advantage.

JRM

04-15-2009 03:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10240063)

So are those a Heroic or Paragon tier wonderous item?

Ay? The Sea Caballeros do not understand, senor.:confused: It is the caballeros who are paragons of heroism, not their cigarillos!:)

Sleeper

04-15-2009 04:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10240691)
Sahuagin have an average intelligence of 14. Humans have an average Int of 10. Sahuagin are at a decided advantage.

And sea elves are even smarter. Seems like every other race in the Monstrous Manual has an above-human intelligence, doesn't it? Yet this rarely comes into play, aside from a few extra spells

Inyssius

04-15-2009 05:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10241028)
And sea elves are even smarter.

Ah, we have an edition disconnect. In 3e, aquatic elves have an average Intelligence score of 8.

Sleeper

04-15-2009 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10241072)
Ah, we have an edition disconnect. In 3e, aquatic elves have an average Intelligence score of 8.

14-18 in 2E, compared to the sahuagin's 13-14. I imagine the authors felt no guilt making such a dramatic change with an obvious and widespread impact because, well, it makes no real difference. Supposed differences in intelligence are rarely reflected in much of anything.

Inyssius

04-15-2009 05:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10241099)

14-18 in 2E, compared to the sahuagin's 13-14. I imagine the authors felt no guilt making such a dramatic change with an obvious and widespread impact because, well, it makes no real difference. Supposed differences in intelligence are rarely reflected in much of anything.

Indeed. Witness the darkmantle and (again) roper, with their nigh-genius intellect that goes completely unused all the time considering that all they do is hide in caves and devour manflesh whenever it comes within biting range.

I'm not entirely sure of who you mean by "the authors", though; just in case I'm wrong, the Tomes were based on 3e material.

Sleeper

04-15-2009 06:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10241144)

I'm not entirely sure of who you mean by "the authors", though; just in case I'm wrong, the Tomes were based on 3e material.

I was referring to the 2E/3E change over, not the Tomes. Whomever updated the aquatic elf entry in the MM and replaced the Int 14-18 with 8 (to avoid the cascading mechanical effects I imagine, since stats mean a lot more in 3E).

DMH

04-15-2009 09:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by mythSSK (Post 10240455)

It's originally from the Frank & K Tome series (highly suggest you check them out if you haven't already).

So what are they and where might we find them?

The Dragon article The Color of Magic (issue 200) gave me an idea for giving sahuagen slimy biotech magic. Their wizards are called manipulators and most of the existing 2e spells are easy to describe as some gooy, icky critter that are mechanically identical. It might even be a way to incorporate fear and horror checks into a non-Ravenloft setting.

YojimboC

04-15-2009 10:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by mythSSK (Post 10240455)

As soon as sahuagin came up, I thought about this post. It was my favouritest sahuagin thing ever, and made me really want to use them in a game (haven't yet...). I remembered reading it somewhere not on the rpg.net forums, though.

Borderlands of the Sahuagin: Sore Winners

Brilliant. Utterly, utterly brilliant. Must use.

The best thing is that it gets the land-lubbers into the ocean -- because any world that is controlled by the Sahuagin is a world where Evil has triumphed, and the good deities are going to be a little torqued. They're going to want to send their servants into the deeps and to mess things up. Although, riled Sea Devils is just going to mean worse trouble...

Inyssiis

04-16-2009 12:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10241547)

So what are they and where might we find them?

Here, and your biotech idea is great.

JRM

04-16-2009 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10241099)

14-18 in 2E, compared to the sahuagin's 13-14. I imagine the authors felt no guilt making such a dramatic change with an obvious and widespread impact because, well, it makes no real difference. Supposed differences in intelligence are rarely reflected in much of anything.

Yes and regular (high) elves and grey elves are even smarter (Int 14-20). As Sleeper says, it doesn't make much of a difference. Well, except for making them popular races to pick for PC magic-users.

The 2E AD&D drow elf would give a sahuagin a run for its money too - super-smart (Int 14-20 like most elves), at least two hit dice, magic items as standard, innate magic resistance and spell casting, keen senses and heightened surprise chances.

JRM

04-16-2009 03:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10241164)

I was referring to the 2E/3E change over, not the Tomes. Whomever updated the aquatic elf entry in the MM and replaced the Int 14-18 with 8 (to avoid the cascading mechanical effects I imagine, since stats mean a lot more in 3E,

Well in fairness, due to AD&D racial minimums the vast majority of 2E elves probably around 14 Int and the 18 Int elves are likely as rare as 18 Int humans (except for AD&D Grey elves, who have a +1 to their intelligence scores so genius+ specimens are a little commoner).

I guess you could fix it in 3E by having even a default grey elves use the 'non-elite' stat array (13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8) rather than the basic mook array (11, 11, 11, 10, 10, 10), stick the 12 or 13 in Int, slap a +2 racial adjustment on it and bob's your uncle, Int 14-15!

Those damn elves, always thinking they're better than us.:cool:

Sleeper

04-16-2009 06:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10242903)

Those damn elves, always thinking they're better than us.:cool:

They are.

They were bioengineered by sahuagin wizards to be the perfect spies and infiltrators. While they were tinkering, they corrected a few nasty design problems in the human form. Pretty? Check. Every single one. Getting old and feeble? Unchecked. Immortal. Naturally talented and perfect? Check. They're smart and agile and all that, too.

Been so long that nobody realizes, but the elves are sleeper agents. Everything they see goes back to the squishy orbs the sahuagin wizards use instead of crystal balls. And inside each head? An on-off switch. The sharkfolk cast the right spell, and suddenly the entire village turns into sahuagin.

The sea elves were the first faltering attempts, and the grand spell didn't always quite stick. Some of the sahuagin experimented on didn't transform. Though they did change, genetically. The recessive traits occasionally combined in their children to make malenti. The wizards fixed this problem when they got around to making the rest of the elves, who were designed as forward observers or advanced scouts, on the one big blindspot of the aquatic race: Dry land.

The sahuagin created dozens of varieties so they'd have a spy in every terrestrial habitat. Since they've won, they rarely bother to use the elves for anything beyond peering through their eyes. But long ago, before they took over everything, they did occasionally turn an army or two when it was tactically prudent.

And then they just blamed it all on the drow. Who are entirely innocent. Or were, before they started to buy the lies about them. The dark elves were created by the sahuagin entirely solely to serve scapegoats. Color coded "evil" elves, to explain all the stories of elves turning on their allies. To disguise what all elves really are.

mythSSK

04-16-2009 06:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10241547)
So what are they and where might we find them?

The Tome series is a bunch of massive revamps to the 3.5 system made by the good fellows over on the Gaming Den. The Dungeonomicon and Races of War especially have heaps of fantastic, usable material.

Tome of Necromancy: Explores the options of having negative energy inherently evil or as a natural force, necromancer PCs, necromantic feats, the Necronomicon (a look at necromancy spells), new and revamped rules for undead (including a comprehensive listing of undead that have appeared in all WotC books and what changes are made to each one to make them compatible with the new rules).

Tome of Fiends: Heaps a dissection of alignment and evil, a much-improved version of the paladin code, a commentary on law and chaos, classes for fiends, fiendish taint, feats, a new system for fiends' spell-like abilities (brilliant), optional rules regarding wishes, damage reduction and special materials, an explanation as to why fiends even care about the Prime Material, demonology and fiend summoning (brilliant), adventuring ideas for every single one of the lower planes (low level, mid level AND high level), rulership of the lower planes, trade and business on the lower planes.

The Dungeonomicon: Includes the Socialomicon (brilliant commentary on the D&D world), Charactonomicon (revamped classes), the Economicon (brilliant look at the D&D economy), the Maginomicon (magic fixes), the Thermodymaninomicon (dungeon ecology), the Bionomicon (more ecology stuff), the Empirinomicon (good material for Myconids, Aboleth, Illithid, Drow, Beholders, Kuo-Toa, and Troglodytes), the Constructanomicon (dungeon building), and the Lexiconinomicon (language).

Races of War: Revamp of unusual races, converting monsters into playable races, more redone classes, character backgrounds, new feat system (all feats scale), advanced combat rules, revamped weapon/armour rules, logistics, demographics, mass combat rules, racial background for dwarves, gnolls, giants, goblinoids, elves, gnomes, orcs, sahuagin (the source of the quote above) and halflings.

EDIT: Sorry Inyssiis, didn't notice your tiny little post. Looks like you beat me to it. You know, I haven't seen anyone on the RPG.net forums discuss these tomes. I might actually start a topic based around them.

JRM

04-16-2009 07:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10243574)

They were bioengineered by sahuagin wizards to be the perfect spies and infiltrators. While they were tinkering, they corrected a few nasty design problems in the human form. Pretty? Check. Every single one. Getting old and feeble? Unchecked. Immortal. Naturally talented and perfect? Check. They're smart and agile and all that, too.

Nah, still prefer my Aquatic Elf + Sekolah Worship -> Sahuagin explanation.

If Sahuagin are going to transform members of their species into spies to infiltrate another race surely they'd make them look like the other race, not some entirely new race who would be bound to attract curiosity and suspicion - i.e. they'd make their 'Sahuagin Spies' look like tritons and humans (or whatever other enemy races existed) rather than elves, which in this alternate world have never been seen on land before.

Or just use doppelgangers, which are better infiltrators with their ESP and shape-changing.

JRM

04-16-2009 07:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've just downloaded the pdf from the link Inyssiuss gave and am flicking through it as we speak. Some great stuff here, and a lot of the background is just as applicable to pre-3e versions of D&D, which is nice.

I've already come across a good deal of the economic theorizing from the high-level economics post Frank Trollman contributed so much to on the paizo boards last year - wherever that is...

Ah, here we are: Paizo Messageboards / Pathfinder RPG / General Discussion / High Level Economics.

DMH

04-16-2009 08:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiuss (Post 10242088)

Here, and your biotech idea is great.

Thank you.

Mixing my idea with the Nazi sahuagen and one gets an invasion from the sea in a reverse manner of how we are exploring the oceans. They have suits to keep them wet and dim the light and creatures replace the submersibles. Weird, blobby structures are placed on land to extend their range and hold over the natives via garrisons.

Wakboth

04-16-2009 08:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10245712)

Thank you.

Mixing my idea with the Nazi sahuagen and one gets an invasion from the sea in a reverse manner of how we are exploring the oceans. They have suits to keep them wet and dim the light and creatures replace the submersibles. Weird, blobby structures are placed on land to extend their range and hold over the natives via garrisons.

Read "The Kraken Wakes" by Wyndham for inspiration. :)

The Last Conformist

04-17-2009 02:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10231492)

As with all aquatic monsters in the MM you have to feel that Sahuagin won't ever reach their full potential because, really, how many campaigns revolve around the sea? At most my guess is that they tend to appear simply as raiders in most games.

The proper way to use all the aquatic critters would surely be to make an entirely aquatic campaign where the PCs are all sea-elvess, merfolk, etc. Or indeed sahuagin.

Sleeper

04-17-2009 02:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10246854)

The proper way to use all the aquatic critters would surely be to make an entirely aquatic campaign where the PCs are all sea-elvess, merfolk, etc. Or indeed sahuagin.

Or you could have a campaign featuring an invasion. Sahuagin have terrorized the coastal regions for years. They're the viking analogs. Appearing out of nowhere from the sea, raiding the villages, pillaging, and taking slaves away to an unknown fate. Most of the time, they steal just enough. Not the food or the grain, because they don't want their victims to starve. If they strip them bare, the villagers will starve come winter; and in a few seasons when the sahuagin come back there will be nobody to steal from. So it's better to cultivate them, like schools of fish or beds of oysters. And anyway grains get soggy and rot underwater.

But this time, there is a strange storm. Not thunder and lightning or anything violent like that. Just rain. Lots of rain. Lots and lots of rain. Steady, constant, quiet. The forefront walking across the land, like a grey wall. The villages behind it vanish from sight, but it takes a few days before anyone realizes that the rain is unnatural. And nothing that passes through the veil returns.

Because walking under cover of the rain are the sahuagin. They have made an alliance with the kraken, who are using their mighty-weather magics to enable their allies to march on the cities of humanity. This time, it is not a raiding party. It's an army. A slight touch of magic, just barely worth mentioning, is all that is necessary to allow the legions to breathe in the perpetual downpour. Where they pass, the villages are empty of anything of value. Anyone they encounter under the pale gray shroud is slain, leaving behind corpses that swell in the humidity.

As all water ultimately returns to the sea, so they believe the rightful place of all wealth is the blue depths. No more will they be satisfied with the morsels they can scrounge from wrecked vessels and foundered ships. The avaricious sahuagin aided by the covetous kraken are cutting a swath toward the rich inland cities, seeking the formerly inaccessible wealth, squirreled away behind miles of thin and burning air.

Kiiratam

04-17-2009 04:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I vaguely recall a Forgotten Realms story that answered the connection between drow, malenti, aquatic elves and sahuagin. "Secrets of Blood, Spirits of the Sea" in Realms of Arcane (I think).

Story details within:

Essentially, back when the drow were surface dwellers, a drow archmage was trying to make shock troops for use against the sea elves. So he used aquatic elves as a basis for this race. The first attempt came out looking like a regular sea elf, so he told one of his sub-ordinates to dispose of it, and got working on the next batch. Said sub-ordinate named the child Malenti and sent him to live with the sea elves, training him for the coming conflict. Eventually, the sahuagin came out right, eating their sea elf birth mother from the inside-out. Flash forward: the sahuagin have been pressing the sea elves hard. General Malenti is the leader of the only significant opposition left. And then he defects, wearing a pearl vest containing all the magic of the sea elves. And that, children, is why Faerunian sea elves couldn't cast spells.

I just took sahuagin as sea-orcs and ran with it. Surface orcs are boar-like in appearance, ergo sea orcs are sharklike (and deep orcs are spider-like). I don't have sea elves, so no malenti as written (which is regrettable). I suppose I could throw them back in a merfolk imitations...

Oh, and just for fun: elves and gnolls are the same race: elves are female, gnolls are male. Explains why they aren't ruling the whole world, even with their low birthrate.

YojimboC

04-17-2009 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10247003)

As all water ultimately returns to the sea, so they believe the rightful place of all wealth is the blue depths. No more will they be satisfied with the morsels they can scrounge from wrecked vessels and foundered ships. The avaricious sahuagin aided by the covetous kraken are cutting a swath toward the rich inland cities, seeking the formerly inaccessible wealth, squirreled away behind miles of thin and burning air.

Awesome.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kiiratam (Post 10247318)

Oh, and just for fun: elves and gnolls are the same race: elves are female, gnolls are male. Explains why they aren't ruling the whole world, even with their low birthrate.

Why gnolls?

Sleeper

04-17-2009 09:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10247476)

Awesome.

Thank you. It might be fun to go through the MM and come up with world-conquering or world-threatening scenarios for every sapient creature (and some of the non-intelligent types). There's just something about an invasion or other widespread calamity....

Inyssius

04-17-2009 09:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Do ropers next!

Um.

Well...

... I got nothing.

Sleeper

04-17-2009 11:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10248418)

Do ropers next!

Um.

Well...

... I got nothing.

World-conquering?

Start with the idea that ropers are very old dao. Humanoid elementals of great magical power, who as they age lose their marble and basalt perfection. Given millennia, even Michelangelo's David will crumble. But dao do not crumble with age; they melt. Their faces run, their bodies slide and shift. Gravity pulls the mass of their body down from their shoulders to their knees, and their sculpted forms become like wax. Well, really hard wax. They're still rock. They just resemble stalagmites instead of muscled, perpetually elf-perfect youths.

Their lower jaw slides away from the hinge, and becomes embedded in the mass below, allowing their jaws to open unnaturally wide. Their arms flail as they lose control of their basic functions and the flailing attenuates them, pulls the mass out thin like a piece of spaghetti. While they have lost their mobility, their accumulated wisdom and cunning remains. Their older children abandon them, their beauty has turned into amorphous hideousness. All that remains is their hate.

And the youngest children of their children. Child-dao, wicked children. Bullied and beat upon by the adults, they seek refuge in the only place that seems safe. At the stumps of their grandparents. The elders are too feeble to catch or strike, so there is no threat. And like grandchildren of all races, they bask in the warmth of unconditional approval. They lap up tales of grandeur, of their own potential. They listen intently to stories about the foolishness of their own abusive parents. Children are just so easy to manipulate, aren't they?

So even the ropers who have lost the wish, who no longer have the reality-warping powers, can stay in touch. Flitting from one roper to the next, packs of stony-faced kids pass messages, create a network. The ropers think, and plot, and share. And whisper words that turn their children's children against their mothers and fathers.

It will be soon. The words have passed, the magic builds. The dao empire has one weakness, and it will be exploited. Nobody pays attention to children. With the knowledge and foresight of their forefathers, the basalt brats will sneak into the great vaults. The treasure troves of a thousand worlds, a collection of the choicest selections of more than a million years of acquisition. Hoarded away by the dao, protected. Against everything except the cunning betrayal of their own children, who know all their secrets because they learned them at the knees of those who built the wards in the first place.

With that power, the ropers will regain their forms, but their aeons-long prison will have forever changed them. Yes, they regain their perfect rocklike bodies. But they also retain the ability to change, to shift to slide. To sprout tentacles from their backs, that whip and drain. To drop their jaws into their chest, to devour mortals whole. And they will have regained their full power, with their every utterance manifesting as a wish. An ancient and wicked evil is reborn.

Their thwarted dreams of conquest will boil over, and they will move. First the quasi-planes, then the other elemental primes. Then the mortal, material world. To do this, they have a wicked punishment planned for their own children, the ones who abandoned them. Powerful magic will warp their bodies, melt them, turn them into slag. Their skin will perpetually bubble; the unending inner heat will drive them mad with pain.

Their children will become the new ropers. Unstable forms, truly half-melted. Bodies soft, the heat on the verge of turning the stone of their bodies to liquid. Sent as mindless cannon fodder or shock troops, they slide forward like magma. Their tentacles extrude and burn. And around them, like a corona, is a wealth of random magical effects. A relic of their power, manifested by their subconscious through the lens of their madness.

And from this, a new cross-planar empire will be forged from the patience and plots of millennia.

6inTruder

04-17-2009 11:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Nothing to do with anything people are talking about, but I just turned on to these articles from somethingawful.com:

WTF, D&D: 1st Edition Monster Manual \(and Part 2\)

JRM

04-17-2009 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10248762)

Nothing to do with anything people are talking about, but I just turned on to these articles from somethingawful.com:

WTF, D&D: 1st Edition Monster Manual (and Part 2)

Well it's tangentially related, so I guess I'll forgive you.;

Found Steve & Zack's ribbing of the Morkoth the most amusing. By Hextor, the 1E illustration of that monster is chuckle-worthy. I just can't look at that squid-man thing with a straight face.

Wakboth

04-17-2009 06:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC (Post 10247476)

Why gnolls?

Why not gnolls? They're awesome! ;)

noisms

04-17-2009 07:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10248361)

Thank you. It might be fun to go through the MM and come up with world-conquering or world-threatening scenarios for every sapient creature (and some of the non-intelligent types). There's just something about an invasion or other widespread calamity....

Sounds like a follow-up thread.... ;)

Brandi

04-17-2009 07:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Steve: I wonder how a [mimic] treasure chest mates.

Zack: You ever seen Russian nesting dolls?

Steve: Yeah.

Zack: Imagine that, only with treasure chest jizz everywhere. EVERYWHERE.

Okay, I laughed.

noisms

04-17-2009 07:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Satyr

Satyrs are an "inoffensive fun-loving race" who spend most of their time in the forest dancing about, shagging dryads, playing the panpipes, and trying to charm comely human females. Our old friends The Sages believe that they are the male counterpart to dryads - sexual dimorphism writ large, you might say.

Satyrs in D&D are presented as relatively harmless hedonists who, at worse, will steal a few valuables or a female party member. I think on balance I prefer them as rather more ambiguous and possibly malicious beings - who might dance and drink with somebody and then stab them, just for 'the fun of it', perhaps not realising or caring about the consequences.

Korred

This is a smaller but stronger version of the Satyr, which has rather more fairy-tale/mythical influences. Its hair can be used to ensnare or bind, and its possessions will turn to gold if sprinkled with holy water. If you interrupt one of their dances you are forced to dance until you die, which is a bit more like it.

Sleeper

04-17-2009 08:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10249995)

Satyrs are an "inoffensive fun-loving race" who spend most of their time in the forest dancing about, shagging dryads, playing the panpipes, and trying to charm comely human females. Our old friends The Sages believe that they are the male counterpart to dryads - sexual dimorphism writ large, you might say.

Satyrs in D&D are presented as relatively harmless hedonists who, at worse, will steal a few valuables or a female party member. I think on balance I prefer them as rather more ambiguous and possibly malicious beings - who might dance and drink with somebody and then stab them, just for 'the fun of it', perhaps not realising or caring about the consequences.

They're plenty malicious. They're the original date-rape monster. The charm spell is D&D's GHB.

Hellzon

04-17-2009 08:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Ooh, satyrs. One of my favourites. I think i mentioned the 4E satyrs being right assholes during the centaur discussion, but here goes:

Quote:

Originally Posted by 4E MM

Satyrs are self-centered, greedy and decadent creatures that enjoy food, drink, and other pleasures. They use sly trickery to take what they desire from others as it pleases them.

Satyrs usually seek to "befriend" travelers they meet. This often means plying them with drink, bemusing them with song, or inveigling them with sorrowful tales in order to rob them later. Satyrs in a murderous mood attack without warning, and they fight to kill.

A rather obvious way to go if you want stuff in the MM to be fightable. Me likey.

And that's where Korred are from, huh? 4E puts them in the Manual of the Planes of all places. With a really freaky look.

6inTruder

04-18-2009 06:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

no comment on that goofy picture. I mean, I guess it's okay, if you don't mind your satyrs hangin' at Bally's all the time.

JRM

04-18-2009 07:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

My first comment on Satyrs was going to to be similar to Sleepers, but a bit more extreme. Read the description, "a female charmed by a satyr might return after 1d4 weeks (10% chance)." i.e. there's a 90% chance they are never seen again. That's doesn't suggest an "inoffensive, fun-loving race" to me but "race of sex-murderers".

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10252397)

no comment on that goofy picture. I mean, I guess it's okay, if you don't mind your satyrs hangin' at Bally's all the time.

Well it's far from the worst picture in the Monstrous Manual, although I find the Satyr's pose rather disturbing. What is the meaning of that pumping fist-gesture, and the position he's holding his pan-pipes is rather chuckle worthy.

"Is that a pan-pipe in your hand, or are you pleased to see me Mr Satyr?":o

"Pah! I thought a satyr would have a larger instrument than that.";)

6inTruder

04-18-2009 08:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

why do you think he works that physique?! To keep attention away from where he's... Deficient.

I'm also curious to the satyr/dryad relationship now that dryads are creepy wood monsters.

DanSolo

04-18-2009 08:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10252787)

My first comment on Satyrs was going to to be similar to Sleepers, but a bit more extreme. Read the description, "a female charmed by a satyr might return after 1d4 weeks (10% chance)." i.e. there's a 90% chance they are never seen again. That's doesn't suggest an "inoffensive, fun-loving race" to me but "race of sex-murderers".

There's always the possibility that the lady doesn't want to return I guess.

JRM

04-18-2009 09:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo (Post 10252928)

There's always the possibility that the lady doesn't want to return I guess.

I'd be more willing to accept that as an explanation if there were any mention in the Satyr's writeup that they are often encountered with charmed lady friends, like the dryad is sometimes accompanied by human lover/bodyguards.

So, unless these unfortunate enchanted women count among the "3d8 woodland creatures" included in a Satyr celebration or the goat-men somehow turn the women into dryads (Hmm... that's a nice idea come to think of it.), I'd think they're likely to have been disposed of in some fashion.

Hey, I just noticed that 'celebration' write up says it includes fauns - are we talking baby deer or Mister Tumnus type creatures here? If the latter, Satyrs are essentially the same thing. If the former, it makes me fear the revelry is even more perverted than I first thought!:eek:

Kakita Kojiro

04-18-2009 09:40 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 10250070)

And that's where Korred are from, huh? 4E puts them in the Manual of the Planes of all places. With a really freaky look.

Well, the Korred is apparently the rather obscure male counterpart to the Korrigan of Brittany. Which are usually bewitching, tiny elfin women who dance naked in the woods and strike those who see them blind, and such. So it's kind of weird that D&D would've adapted the Korred as a Satyr-alike (which fits some folktales of them), but missed out on adapting the Korred as a Nymph/Dryad-alike.

JRM

04-18-2009 09:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10252811)

why do you think he works that physique?! To keep attention away from where he's... Deficient.

I'm also curious to the satyr/dryad relationship now that dryads are creepy wood monsters.

Well the latter may increase their interest in human females. Although, if they're still the male equivalent of dryads wouldn't that mean they should have stamen instead of mammalian reproductive equipment?

Or maybe they have several male plant-organs, which would really give them stamina.;

I apologize to any botanists out there for that last pun.:D

Mikelibrarian

04-18-2009 09:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 10250070)

Ooh, satyrs. One of my favourites. I think i mentioned the 4E satyrs being right assholes during the centaur discussion, but here goes:

A rather obvious way to go if you want stuff in the MM to be fightable. Me likey.

And that's where Korred are from, huh? 4E puts them in the Manual of the Planes of all places. With a really freaky look.

According to Wikipedia : The korred, was introduced in the 4th set of "Monster Cards" (1982), and was later detailed in Monster Manual II (1983). The korred is further detailed in Dragon #119 (March 1987), in "The Ecology of the Korred."

I probably have that Dragon magazine somewhere. The wikipedia article also says in 4E Satyrs tend to be Chaotic Neutral, which I think is more appropriate than true Neutral. My image of Centaurs would also make them Chaotic Neutral rather than true Neutral.

Granted, their habit of date raping would make them tend towards evil, but one of the oddities of the Neutral alignments is that many "Neutral" creatures tends towards evil acts, such as the Lizardman's taste for human flesh (sorry but hunting sentient beings for food is evil), the Quaggoth's attacking almost everything it sees, the Gibberlings' attacking everything and Buccaneers stealing and kidnapping. The Slaadi as written in the Fiend Folio seem more like a race of demons than of Chaotic Neutral beings. My Limbo inhabitants at the very least all have unlimited polymorph self ability.

noisms

04-18-2009 03:10 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10253089)

I'd be more willing to accept that as an explanation if there were any mention in the Satyr's writeup that they are often encountered with charmed lady friends, like the dryad is sometimes accompanied by human lover/bodyguards

So, unless these unfortunate enchanted women count among the "3d8 woodland creatures" included in a Satyr celebration or the goat-men somehow turn the women into dryads (Hmm... that's a nice idea come to think of it.), I think they're likely to have been disposed of in some fashion.

Maybe turned into fauns....

Kiiratam

04-18-2009 05:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

YojimboC: Elves and Gnolls

It dates back to me doing a campaign based on Dr. Strangelove, as inspired by this image. So the American changed into a Hunnic paladin, and the Russian into a gnoll with an elf woman wrapped around his leg in the finest Vallejo style. And the bombers turned into dragons. So yeah.

On fauns: I've always seen baby deer spelled as 'fawns' but it's not like I speak the Queen's English. Do we actually have stats for the monstrous fauns? Are they immature satyrs? Satyrs born without a voice or tone deaf?...Then I checked the Monstrous Manual and realized that they're listed as synonyms. Perhaps we could call satyrs without pipes fauns?

Ooo! Korred have their own language! Another one for the obscure list!

A doomsday plot by satyrs? We can do that. There's the obvious: a massive mob of satyrs has descended on a metropolis during the seasonal festivities. While many of them spur the festival to greater heights of decadence, a small task force transplants dryad oaks in a perimeter about the city. Between the satyrs and the dryads (and korred to deal with pesky fortifications via their spell-like abilities), the entire city is charmed. At this point, there's a lovely collection of pliable individuals, just waiting for the mastermind to step out of the shadows (the Fey Lords? An Archdruid? Pan?).

The less obvious: satyr pipes produce a sleep effect on all individuals in a 60ft radius. I'd read this as no individual creature can have 4+ HD, but everyone else has to make the save. To say nothing of cause fear! And the duration is 1d6 hours! I can see satyrs being enlisted into guerrilla groups for all sorts of wonderful effects. I can see it now: a mad bardic highwayman, lord of the satyrs, capturing nobles traveling through his forest and ransoming them. Except the nobles aren't quite right when they come back...

JRM

04-18-2009 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10253128)

I probably have that Dragon magazine somewhere. The wikipedia article also says in 4E Satyrs tend to be Chaotic Neutral, which I think is more appropriate than true Neutral. My image of Centaurs would also make them Chaotic Neutral rather than true Neutral.

Pardon? I didn't think 4E even had the Chaotic Neutral alignment. Last I looked it was still reduced to five alignments in the progression:

Lawful Good - Good - Neutral (Unaligned) - Evil - Chaotic Evil.

Mikelibrarian

04-19-2009 02:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10254101)

Pardon? I didn't think 4E even had the Chaotic Neutral alignment. Last I looked it was still reduced to five alignments in the progression:

Lawful Good - Good - Neutral (Unaligned) - Evil - Chaotic Evil.

I'm just going on what is in the Wikipedia article. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Satyr_\(...ns_%26_Dragons\))

I'm a first edition guy who added some 2nd edition stuff to his homebrew.

Mr. Teapot

04-19-2009 02:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10249828)
Why not gnolls? They're awesome! ;)

Because if gnolls are all male, you can't do anything with the crazy gnoll/hyena genderbending weirdness. Which is, for my money, the only reason you use gnolls instead of orcs, minotaurs or other similar beasts.

Inyssius

04-19-2009 02:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Yeah; unlike everyone else on the savage side, gnolls are technically matriarchal to begin with (with, yes, hyena weirdness).

Well, maybe not everyone else. I could see minotaurs and kuo-toa as being pretty egalitarian; and don't hobgoblins have a system that sort of parallels the Left and Right Hands of the Jhereg?

(With dirgesingers and sorceresses on the one side, and, you know, stabbing people on the other.)

Kiiratam

04-19-2009 03:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

My image of Gnolls has always been of wolf-men rather than hyenas. Not exactly sure why. Likewise, the gnoll and the traitor elfess weren't even the main enemies in the campaign, but they ended up on the poster instead of the red dragon and blue dracolich. Go figure.

JRM

04-19-2009 03:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10254842)

I'm just going on what is in in the Wikipedia article. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Satyr_\(Dungeons_%26_Dragons\))

I'm a first edition guy who added some 2nd edition stuff to his homebrew.

Nothing wrong with that, my heart leans more towards 1E too.

Looking at that Wikipedia article I think I see what caused the confusion - the 'Society' subsection that mentions Satyr's being CN isn't part of the 4E entry, that's in a different subsection ('Publication History'). I guess the author is referring to D&D Satyrs in general.

EDIT: the link to the wikipedia article Mikelibrarian gave was broken when I tried it, so I fixed the one quoted in this post (Well, at least it worked at the time of posting).

The Last Conformist

04-19-2009 04:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10254978)

Yeah; unlike everyone else on the savage side, gnolls are technically matriarchal to begin with (with, yes, hyena weirdness).

Now I've got this just plain wrong concept in my head of an all-male race of matriarchalists. Yessir, we really do have to be antinomian sociopathic barbarians till a female turns up to boss us around, and nossir, no female of our race has been seen in the past few millennia.

(How come they haven't died out long ago? Why, their racial deity, firmly convinced that apostates who live outside female control have no place in the afterlife, forcibly reincarnates them as soon as they die. And none of this silly being reborn stuff, the reincarnates just materialize somewhere close to their corpse.)

Kiiratam

04-19-2009 06:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

That, Conformist, is delicious. I salute you!

Sleeper

04-19-2009 07:55 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kiiratam (Post 10254060)

A doomsday plot by satyrs? We can do that. There's the obvious: a massive mob of satyrs has descended on a metropolis during the seasonal festivities. While many of them spur the festival to greater heights of decadence, a small task force transplants dryad oaks in a perimeter about the city. Between the satyrs and the dryads (and korred to deal with pesky fortifications via their spell-like abilities), the entire city is charmed. At this point, there's a lovely collection of pliable individuals, just waiting for the mastermind to step out of the shadows (the Fey Lords? An Archdruid? Pan?).

Strip out the motive force of a mastermind, and that reminds me a bit of the basic plot behind Paul Czege's old experimental Bacchanal RPG. Which is set in the city of Puteoli, circa 61 A.D., during a hot summer. The kind of sticky season where passions flare, lovers meet and quarrel, and enemies plot. And in this season the god of wine and less polite things descends on the Roman metropolis, and life become even headier as random hookups and improbable romances spread. How do you find your friends and escape when the whole city is doing its best to make Caligula's best parties look downright puritanical? When the city is riddled with tempestous and meddling once-removed Greek gods, more spoiled frat boys than divinities worthy of reverence, trying to top each other by driving mortals to excess?

Let a few satyrs loose in a typical D&D city, and they could do the same thing.

noisms

04-20-2009 07:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10255781)

Strip out the motive force of a mastermind, and that reminds me a bit of the basic plot behind Paul Czege's old experimental Bacchanal RPG. Which is set in the city of Puteoli, circa 61 A.D., during a hot summer. The kind of sticky season where passions flare, lovers meet and quarrel, and enemies plot. And in this season the god of wine and less polite things descends on the Roman metropolis, and life become even headier as random hookups and improbable romances spread. How do you find your friends and escape when the whole city is doing its best to make Caligula's best parties look downright puritanical? When the city is riddled with tempestous and meddling once-removed Greek gods, more spoiled frat boys than divinities worthy of reverence, trying to top each other by driving mortals to excess?

Let a few satyrs loose in a typical D&D city, and they could do the same thing.

In a way that reminds me of a Star Trek episode. Not any episode in particular, but can't you just imagine Spock and Kirk (or Picard and Riker, if you prefer) trying to escape from some pathologically hedonistic city on a distant planet? Obviously with some rational explanation for the descent into madness - radiation from the nearby star, some sort of viral spore, sinister aliens...

Sleeper

04-20-2009 08:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10260322)

In a way that reminds me of a Star Trek episode. Not any episode in particular, but can't you just imagine Spock and Kirk (or Picard and Riker, if you prefer) trying to escape from some pathologically hedonistic city on a distant planet? Obviously with some rational explanation for the descent into madness - radiation from the nearby star, some sort of viral spore, sinister aliens...

Just to twist it back to D&D, satyrs (and nymphs for that matter) were originally little gods. A few steps down from the big gods like Hera or Pan, but not all that different in concept. And what are they gods of?

Satyrs and nymphs might be the incarnations of mindless abandon. And when a city gets too decadent, enough spiritual energy collects, and things start to change. The leisure class start developing hooves, growing hair, or regaining their youthful figures. They become immortal, eternal. Living in the eternal Now, they lose the ability to think of tomorrow, to plan.

The labor classes and slaves might flee the cities, leaving them to decay as their former rulers lose themselves in the moment. What would the city look like in a hundred years, or a thousand? Crumbling stone, overgrown with green, stripped of valuables, traces of rotted finery, and notorious as a stopping point for caravans and other travelers who don't always return.

Or, for a generation or two, a loyal sub-class might try to keep up appearances. Warforged, perhaps, taking over the diplomatic and trade roles, and making justifications for their hedonistic masters. Trying to hide the problem, perhaps looking for a cure or alternately making sure things don't change so the reins of power remain in their hands. With warforged filling the role of the robot masters, this would resemble certain (u/dys)topian sci-fi stories like Logan's Run.

sim_james

04-20-2009 08:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

If satyrs are little gods, might there not be an NPC cleric of the satyrs?

6inTruder

04-21-2009 05:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10260397)

Just to twist it back to D&D, satyrs (and nymphs for that matter) were originally little gods. A few steps down from the big gods like Hera or Pan, but not all that different in concept. And what are they gods of?

Satyrs and nymphs might be the incarnations of mindless abandon. And when a city gets too decadent, enough spiritual energy collects, and things start to change. The leisure class start developing hooves, growing hair, or regaining their youthful figures. They become immortal, eternal. Living in the eternal Now, they lose the ability to think of tomorrow, to plan.

The labor classes and slaves might flee the cities, leaving them to decay as their former rulers lose themselves in the moment. What would the city look like in a hundred years, or a thousand? Crumbling stone, overgrown with green, stripped of valuables, traces of rotted finery, and notorious as a stopping point for caravans and other travelers who don't always return.

Or, for a generation or two, a loyal sub-class might try to keep up appearances. Warforged, perhaps, taking over the diplomatic and trade roles, and making justifications for their hedonistic masters. Trying to hide the problem, perhaps looking for a cure or alternately making sure things don't change so the reins of power remain in their hands. With warforged filling the role of the robot masters, this would resemble certain (u/dys)topian sci-fi stories like Logan's Run.

That's wicked cool! Now I'm hoping for Nymphs in the 4edMM2.

DanSolo

04-21-2009 05:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 10260428)
If satyrs are little gods, might there not be an NPC cleric of the satyrs?

Can you be a cleric serving yourself? That sounds like an Enron type flow of energy from god to worshipper...

EDIT: Oops, I misread that, but it's still an interesting idea... all satyrs being clerics of each other! Sort of a magical energy pyramid scheme. :-)

Mr. Teapot

04-21-2009 08:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 10260428)
If satyrs are little gods, might there not be an NPC cleric of the satyrs?

NPC, heck. PC cleric of satyrs. Hello, new character concept.

Mr. Teapot

04-21-2009 08:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo (Post 10262453)
Can you be a cleric serving yourself? That sounds like an Enron type flow of energy from god to worshipper...

In 2nd ed? Yeah, but you only get up to 3rd level spells. Maybe only 2nd level ones, I forget.

Later editions you can worship whatever you damn well please and get spells (or prayers for the really new wave).

Sleeper

04-21-2009 08:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

In Greek myth, priests didn't get superpowers. Instead, gods lurked invisibly and nudged spears thrown by their favorites, who were usually the heroic slaughter-hundreds-in-the-name-of-glory types or just really, really pretty. Not priests. The most an actual worshipper could hope for was a horrifically petty act of spite and revenge if someone really ticked off their god. Say by killing a hundred vestals, or urinating on the god's statue.

Now imagine a small god with that kind of intimate relationship with his congregation. Sure, you're the worshipper. But the faun or nymph's always over there, frolicking. Granting favors to anyone pretty or well-muscled who wanders by. Creeping them out, most likely. A stalker is a stalker, regardless of their divine status. Just ask Daphne.

randomgamer8466

04-21-2009 10:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo (Post 10252928)

There's always the possibility that the lady doesn't want to return I guess.

Once you go Satyr, you won't come back later.

...

Once you go Faun, you damn well stay gone.

noisms

04-22-2009 09:48 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Scorpion

As usual for animal entries, 'Scorpion' here only refers to giant varieties. It's accompanied by a nice, naturalistic illustration.

You get a lot of bang for your XP buck with giant scorpions. Their claws do 1-10 points of damage per round after grabbing a target, with only one chance of escape (BB/LG) per combat, and their stings are save-or-die. They can also go into a stinging frenzy as they approach death, which gives them effectively two attacks per round with the tail. Combined with decent armour class, for 650 XP that ain't bad.

Giant scorpions attack 95% of the time - what they do otherwise isn't specified.

Large and Huge Scorpions

I might have mentioned this before, but in my mind Huge sounds bigger than Giant. But in AD&D it isn't. Odd. Anyway, these are essentially smaller varieties (2' and 4' respectively) which have slightly weaker stings and pincers.

demiurge1138

04-23-2009 02:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10269967)

Scorpion

Giant scorpions attack 95% of the time - what they do otherwise isn't specified.

Opera.

rex monday

04-23-2009 06:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10271155)

Opera.

I was going to say tea party.

But an operatic singing competition might be better.

DanSolo

04-23-2009 06:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10271155)

Opera.

Surely Scorpions play melodic hard rock?

MadWriter

04-23-2009 09:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10269967)

Scorpion

Giant scorpions attack 95% of the time - what they do otherwise isn't specified.

3% eating. 2% sleeping. Enough said, dudes.

6inTruder

04-23-2009 09:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo (Post 10272059)

Surely Scorpions play melodic hard rock?

Depends, are the winds changing?

Kakita Kojiro

04-23-2009 09:06 AM

I was reading the wiki Scorpion article, with vague memories that scorpions basically get cooked through their exoskeletons by sunlight. Hence why they hide under rocks and in shoes and such. Which would be a bit of a problem for Large Huge Giant Scorpions, one would think.

However I got completely distracted after reading that some scorpions are born with two tails. How cool is that? Plus, you know, stinging frenzy x 2!

6inTruder

04-23-2009 09:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10272660)

However I got completely distracted after reading that some scorpions are born with two tails. How cool is that? Plus, you know, stinging frenzy x 2!

This. I want THIS in the new MM.

demiurge1138

04-23-2009 10:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MadWriter (Post 10272630)
3% eating. 2% sleeping. Enough said, dudes.

There are three things you need to know about scorpions.

1. Scorpions are arachnids
2. Scorpions fight 95% of the time!
3. The purpose of scorpions is to flip out and fight adventurers.

Sleeper

04-23-2009 11:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10272660)
*However I got completely distracted after reading that some scorpions are born with two tails. How cool is that?
Plus, you know, stinging frenzy x 2!*

Why stop there? Introduce the flail scorpo-flail, with 3 to 8 stingers wildly swinging around as it advances on the party. Or the porcu-stinger, that appears to be just a bundle of scorpion tails slowly waddling forward because the body is hidden under hundreds of hooked poison-injectors.

Ragnarok_Engine

04-23-2009 11:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10253089)
Hey, I just noticed that 'celebration' write up says it includes fauns - are we talking baby deer or Mister Tumnus type creatures here? If the latter, Satyrs are essentially the same thing. If the former, it makes me fear the revelry is even more perverted than I first thought!:eek:

Ah, like good ol' Sodomy the Lawn Gnome? :D

<http://www.thoughtviper.com/INEXOB/images/111598.jpg>

:eek:

MadWriter

04-23-2009 06:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10273064)
There are three things you need to know about scorpions.
1. Scorpions are arachnids
2. Scorpions fight 95% of the time!
3. The purpose of scorpions is to flip out and fight adventurers.

Those last two are for ninjas, not Scorpions!

Inyssiis

04-23-2009 06:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10273158)
Or the porcu-stinger, that appears to be just a bundle of scorpion tails slowly waddling forward because the body is hidden under hundreds of hooked poison-injectors.

I'm... almost certain that this monster already exists. I think its name is nigh-unpronounceable, and it lives in the Underdark.

The Last Conformist

04-23-2009 09:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MadWriter (Post 10274151)
Those last two are for ninjas, not Scorpions!

And thus was born the totally rad (as in dozens of sieverts per hour to anyone within 10') ninja scorpion.

Sleeper

04-23-2009 10:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10274167)

I'm... almost certain that this monster already exists. I think its name is nigh-unpronounceable, and it lives in the Underdark.

Then I counter with... the porcu-stingerang!

This waddling little clacker covered with dozens of scorpion tails flings its stingers. They whistle as they spin through the air, and since they're shaped like little boomerangs those that miss circle around and return to the beastie, who catches them with its upraised tail stubs.

Human kids play with scorpions. Grabbing them by their tails, throwing them at dogs, or among the pigs. Children can be the cruelest of all monsters. What about really big kids? A pair of cloud giant whelps, capturing 6 foot long scorpions. Holding them by their tails, laughing as they twist and squirm. Thundering toward the village, where they tower over the houses, before dropping the scorpions in the middle of the crowded market. Chortling and laughing with glee as the humans and goblin merchants flee like ants. What does the party do? The titanic kids are probably out of your league, much less the risk of parental retribution. But those poor villagers with chitinous daggers pumping poison into their faces and bellies. Something must be done.

demiurge1138

04-24-2009 02:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by MadWriter (Post 10274151)

Those last two are for ninjas, not Scorpions!

No, no. Ninjas fight all the time. Scorpions, only 95% of the time.

ESkemp

04-28-2009 10:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The number of heraldic beasts that make their way into full-fledged monsters always makes me want to design some sort of high chivalric realm with gallant knights, sinister sorcerers and tulgey woods all over the place. In such a place, the hybrid beasties aren't the creations of mad wizards: maybe they're just fey, which would suit nicely. Orlando-infused D&D, essentially.

noisms

04-28-2009 11:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by ESkemp (Post 10293620)

The number of heraldic beasts that make their way into full-fledged monsters always makes me want to design some sort of high chivalric realm with gallant knights, sinister sorcerers and tulgey woods all over the place. In such a place, the hybrid beasties aren't the creations of mad wizards: maybe they're just fey, which would suit nicely. Orlando-infused D&D, essentially.

I've often thought about doing that. For a while I was actually trying to develop my own system for such a setting, based around tarot cards and whist. I think somebody will end up using Swords & Wizardry or somesuch to do a high-chivalry game.

Kakita Kojiro

04-28-2009 11:16 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10292767)

Maybe the ball is made out of lead, so it's too heavy to swim with, throw or kick?

No, it's made out of iron. The Atlanteans latest craze is a new sport that finally finds a use for the mysterious metal spheres that rain down from the naval battles of the surface folk. They call this game canonball, because it must always be refereed by a high-ranking Sea Priest.:o

Sounds a lot like Octopush, actually. if you add itty-bitty hockey sticks.

... And I am a sea-adventuring player, BTW. :D

The Last Conformist

04-29-2009 03:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Rolzup (Post 10290738)

Ah, the Sea-Bishop!

<http://upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedi...2px-Merman.jpg>

Going by that Medieval belief system, I've often toyed with the idea of pitting a bunch of PCs against a desperate pack of "Sea-Adventurers" who've ventured onto land (with the aid of baroque magic, like a Helmet of Terrestrial Action) in hopes of recovering some lost aquatic treasure.

The text says "Marine man, of the bishop kind, captured in the Baltic Sea in AD 1531".

noisms

04-29-2009 06:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Selkie

This particular section of the MM feels veritably thronging with little-used water-based monsters. Here's another one - a seal-like being which can change into a human being for a week at a time and roam about on land. They like to pillage shipwrecks for useful items or trade goods, have a liking (and weakness) for fine wine, and "fear the wrath of the sea should they ever use their powers for ill."

I've never ever ever seen a Selkie in a game. Surprising, actually, because they seem ready-made for use in an adventure - perhaps as underwater guides for characters exploring a shipwreck, or for the topic we were just discussing - gangs of water-based adventurers roaming the surface world for Some Reason. Thereupon their interests could either clash with the PCs or fit together. Job's a good 'un.

One idea for a reason why selkies would want to go to the surface is thrown up by the entry: "...selkie representatives lobby heavily whenever local overworlder environmental issues threaten selkie existence". But this seems like one of those anachronistic PETA-girl-esque modern-day-viewpoint-injection items which you often see in this tome and which, frankly, I don't get at all excited by.

Any ideas, oh sage-like readers?

Ratoslov

04-29-2009 08:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10297017)
Any ideas, oh sage-like readers?

How's their kung-fu? Strong? Or weak?

YojimboC

04-29-2009 09:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Is "lobby heavily" PETA-girl code for "attack with pointy things and slaughter the overlanders"? 'Cuz that would be cool. And at least a variation on the Sahuagin raiding just to be assholes; Selkies do it to stop POLLUTION!

DMH

04-29-2009 10:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Selkies should have been described as some sort of fey. Give them some nasty druid spells (like spike growth, spike stones and entangle) and they are ready to be ecoterrorists. Think of the poor farmer who's field has become deadly because of a variant entangle that lasts for weeks. Or cast spike growth on the grazing field for the livestock. Spike stones works well for cities.

Heck, those 3 spells are all they need to disrupt or destroy nations.

Kapten

04-29-2009 11:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10297017)

Selkie

One idea for a reason why selkies would want to go to the surface is thrown up by the entry: "...selkie representative lobby heavily whenever local overworlder environmental issues threaten selkie existence". But this seems like one of those anachronistic PETA-girl-esque modern-day-viewpoint-injection items which you often see in this tome and which, frankly, I don't get at all excited by.

Well it seems more like common sense than PETA-stuff to me. If the "overlanders" take all the fish, it seems reasonable that the selkies want them to stop.

noisms

04-30-2009 12:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten (Post 10297963)

Well it seems more like common sense than PETA-stuff to me. If the "overlanders" take all the fish, it seems reasonable that the selkies want them to stop.

I didn't mean it was PETA-stuff per se, just that it is like the PETA stuff inasmuch as it smacks of wanton anachronistic injection of real world political issues into a game which was only ever supposed to be about people with pointy ears and dragons. Personally I find that tendency really annoying, but I know I hardly speak for everyone on the matter. ;)

Putting it in terms of 'overlanders taking all the fish' is fine with me. It's framing the matter in terms like "selkie representatives lobby heavily whenever local overworlder environmental issues threaten selkie existence" which I can't stand. It all sounds a bit too much like selkie Greenpeace to me. And I have bad experiences with that kind of political-issue-gaming.

YojimboC

04-30-2009 12:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

On the other hand... can you imagine the king getting kick backs from the selkie lobby to curtail the excesses of fishermen? So the fishermen pool their limited resources to hire a band of cutthroat mercenaries (read as: the player characters) to hunt down and rub out those damn do-gooding selkies?

Kakita Kojiro

04-30-2009 01:46 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10297017)

One idea for a reason why selkies would want to go to the surface is thrown up by the entry: "...selkie representative lobby heavily whenever local overworlder environmental issues threaten selkie existence". But this seems like one of those anachronistic PETA-girl-esque modern-day-viewpoint-injection items which you often see in this tome and which, frankly, I don't get at all excited by.

Any ideas, oh sage-like readers?

PETA-girl just isn't really trying to put a good PETA spin on things. Otherwise bands of selkies would be roaming the coastal towns, clubbing baby humans to death for the supple leather.

Now that's a plot hook.

Sleeper

04-30-2009 02:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10298066)

I didn't mean it was PETA-stuff per se, just that it is like the PETA stuff inasmuch as it smacks of wanton anachronistic injection of real world political issues into a game which was only ever supposed to be about people with pointy ears and dragons. Personally I find that tendency really annoying, but I know I hardly speak for everyone on the matter. ;)

While hardly true to its folkloric origins, incorporating (even exploring, in the spec-fic sense) modern elements in a fantasy setting is part of the modern genre. Let's see.

After a few continents sank beneath the waves, the fertile heartlands of a few empires were turned into ever-expanding deserts, and a handful of permanent giant boiling storms that transformed the lands they crossed were created by petty jealousies, spite, mad experiments, and of course dire revenge, the powers of the world got together to police that sort of thing.

"Powers of the world" being archmages, of course. Gnome mind-shapers in their invisible towers, elven glamourists under the mystic hills that serve as portals to their extraplanar realms, bombastic human scholars. Sorcerers as old as the hills, and liches who have transcended mortal limits. And a few of the "lesser" races, with sufficient arcane power. The half-spawn of a demon lord or two, bound to the mortal realm. An elder djinn vizier. The most knowledgeable of the great wyrms. That kind of thing. The real powers, behind the meat-shields of paladins, warriors, armies, and empires.

They set up a parliament, with a squabbling and largely ineffective lower body composed of representatives elected during the once-a-decade magemoots (a week-long event set in a different inaccessible place everytime, where the wizards meet to show off and party, and yes, vote); and a select upper body composed primarily of immortals who have finagled their way into a permanent seat of power.

They take little interest in temporal politics. Sack a few cities? Go right ahead. We might notice when the history books catch up in a couple hundred years. But they keep a keen eye on certain things. Magical developments, particularly of the contagious or "Mortals-Were-Not-Meant-To-Know" varieties (necromancy and summoning, oftentimes). Threats that impact their domain as a whole (the whole world, from their perspective), whether a rapidly-spreading empire, an invasion of demons, or an impending ecological disaster.

The lesser delegates are often given missions to investigate a particular impending problem, or just to keep an eye out in a general geographical area or field of study. They have sleeper agents or spies in every major university, and their more active agents are ad hoc magistrates who serve as the heads of magical strike teams that track down rumors, ask a lot of blunt questions, do a lot of breaking and entering, poking their noses in places where they aren't wanted, and generally make a (often-fatal) nuisance of themselves.

They also reportedly solicit input. Informers, who never learn who their contact is unless things blow up in their face. They use blind drops. Messages. Leave a note on birch bark in a certain ring of stones in a particular forest, and maybe someone will see it. Bulletin boards in cities, whispered words on certain cliffs. Most of these storied means of communication are probably just nonsense, words thrown in the wind. But perhaps not all of them?

The selkies held a conch shell to their hearts, and tossed it into the Black Current, which whirled it away to whatever Sargasso lies at the end of the fast-spinning vortex. There, someone read their hearts' deepest fear trapped in the shell's spiraled nacreous maze. The lobby was successful. A hooded agent responded. Set up seat in the selkie king's personal chambers, and demanded all kind of exotic foods and other sensual pleasures.

After the first three servants were turned into a dusky three-winged tern, a wharf rat with vestigial hands, and a bronze piercer -- species not noted for their ability to thrive (or even survive) underwater -- the selkie courtiers started jumping. After a week or two, this hedonistic fop started demanding information, in addition to the usual requests like a thousand fresh black cherries plucked from the grove of the Titans.

Random information, yes. "The third word from the third page of the diary of princess Forsynea", "the number of organs missing from the fallen bird under the shadow of the rakshasan obelisk on the road between Theb and Arten", "the complete works of Sallicore Thear". But it's a start. Maybe just maybe the council will act. Maybe the dark tide from the shore, that is starving the undersea races, will be staunched.

demiurge1138

04-30-2009 02:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10297565)
Selkies should have been described as some sort of fey.

In 3.x, at least, they were.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10297017)

Selkie

This particular section of the MM feels veritably thronging with little-used water-based monsters.

Well it's hardly surprising that the alphabetical Monstrous Manual includes a lot of Sea monsters in the section beginning with "Se-".

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10297017)

I've never ever ever seen a Selkie in a game. Surprising, actually, because they seem ready-made for use in an adventure - perhaps as underwater guides for characters exploring a shipwreck, or for the topic we were just discussing - gangs of water-based adventurers roaming the surface world for Some Reason. Thereupon their interest could either clash with the PCs or fit together. Job's a good 'un.

I vaguely remember including a selkie in an D&D adventure once, but no-one realized she was a selkie so that was a bit of a bust. If I recall correctly she was a background character in a port they got a bit of info from.

So, selkie bards, the information brokers of the oceans? They're great gossips and singers you know, even worse than merfolk, and they venture onto land just out of curiosity and to spread and pick up rumours, much of which they pick up "between the sheets" since they are very promiscuous while ashore, since they can not become pregnant from liaisons with overlanders.* Only the most jealous selkie mates or zealous selkie priests raise any objection to this practice, and it helps create friendly 'contacts' in the overworld.

*That's not true according to some real-world legends about folks marrying selkies, but what the heck.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10297017)

Any ideas, oh sage-like readers?

My first idea on looking at the selkie entry was "that selkie illustration is really freaky-looking, a seal with semi-human arms and legs" I prefer my selkies to look all-seal most of the time. Maybe they can smoothly shapechange from seal to seal-man to human, and only become seal-men when they want manipulative hands?

One interesting titbit it that it says "the selkie transformation is not a spell or magical effect." I wonder how that works, are they like AD&D dopplegangers* with an extraordinary malleable physiology, only one that specialises in the seal to human spectrum? Presumably the human form they adopt is specific to the selkie, they can't imitate a particular individual.

*waves to Kakita and points at the D&D "dopple-" spelling, cackling evilly.:D;)

Oh, and I'm reminded of the seals in GURPS Fantasy II - The Madlands. These are just regular-looking seals with human intelligence and speech, but some have learned how to cast magic after reading a magical system engraved upon an underwater cliff face. They occasionally agree to team up with the coast-dwelling humans to catch fish in return for a share of the spoils, and spend a lot of time trying to convince them that orca are Evil Incarnate so the humans should go hunting killer whales.

Kakita Kojiro

05-01-2009 02:03 AM

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10301179)

waves to Kakita and points at the D&D "dopple-" spelling, cackling evilly.:D;)*

:p

At least you didn't faux-Latin pluralize it. "The dopplegangi are ninjae!" might well make my head asplode.

Sleeper

05-01-2009 02:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10301179)

One interesting tidbit it that it says "the selkie transformation is not a spell or magical effect." I wonder how that works, are they like AD&D dopplegangers with an extraordinary malleable physiology, only one that specialises in the seal to human spectrum? Presumably the human form they adopt is specific to the selkie, they can't imitate a particular individual.*

D&D's definition of what is magical and what is not has always been inconsistent and illogical. This probably reached its apex in 3E, where what exactly is affected by an anti-magic shell is spelled out. Without magic, giant unaerodynamic creatures like dragons can still fly, high-level monks can speak intelligibly to any creature with a language, and golems can still operate.

JRM

05-01-2009 10:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10302883)

D&D's definition of what is magical and what is not has always been inconsistent and illogical. This probably reached its apex in 3E, where what exactly is affected by an anti-magic shell is spelled out. Without magic, giant unaerodynamic creatures like dragons can still fly, high-level monks can speak intelligibly to any creature with a language, and golems can still operate.

Yup, and a 3E monk's spell resistance still works in an anti-magic shell. That's a useful trait!;

Actually, the 3E anti-magic field is pretty consistent. Golems still operate because once created by magic their existence as Constructs does not necessarily require continuous supernatural forces. ("The [antimagic field] spell has no effect on golems and other constructs that are imbued with magic during their creation process and are thereafter self-supporting (unless they have been summoned, in which case they are treated like any other summoned creatures).")

In other words, once you've turned that hunk of stone into a giant medieval robot operated by a enslaved elemental, it's still a giant medieval robot operated by a enslaved elemental when its in an antimagic effect, like a wall of iron is physically present "in reality" once conjured, so doesn't vanish in an antimagic field ("The effects of instantaneous conjurations are not affected by an antimagic field because the conjuration itself is no longer in effect, only its result.").

The flying colossal beasties is a bit more difficult to explain. Suggestions on a postcard?

KromeLizard

05-01-2009 10:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10305930)

Yup, and a 3E monk's spell resistance still works in an anti-magic shell. That's a useful trait!;

Actually, the 3E anti-magic field is pretty consistent. Golems still operate because once created by magic their existence as Constructs does not necessarily require continuous supernatural forces. ("The [antimagic field] spell has no effect on golems and other constructs that are imbued with magic during their creation process and are thereafter self-supporting (unless they have been summoned, in which case they are treated like any other summoned creatures).")

In other words, once you've turned that hunk of stone into a giant medieval robot operated by a enslaved elemental, it's still a giant medieval robot operated by a enslaved elemental when its in an antimagic effect, like a wall of iron is physically present "in reality" once conjured, so doesn't vanish in an antimagic field ("The effects of instantaneous conjurations are not affected by an antimagic field because the conjuration itself is no longer in effect, only its result.").

The flying colossal beasties is a bit more difficult to explain. Suggestions on a postcard?

Why would aerodynamics even have to apply to a dragon? I don't really understand the urge to apply real world science to fantasy. Of course a dragon can fly without magic, it has wings!

Sleeper

05-02-2009 03:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kromelizard (Post 10305947)

Why would aerodynamics even have to apply to a dragon? I don't really understand the urge to apply real world science to fantasy. Of course a dragon can fly without magic, it has wings!

I see the problem as more fundamental. In the real world's myths, legends, folklore, and superstition, magic was a fundamental part of everything. Some things were more numinous than others, you could certainly strip away glamours or spells, and wizards can lose their powers, but the idea that magic is an external force that can be extracted (and by implication the default state of most creatures is "magicless") is a modern conception. The Last Unicorn becoming a horse, for instance.

And with dead magic zones, anti-magic and even magic resistance, D&D applies the concept very inconsistently. Sometimes, they use the folkloric version of magic as an essential part of a creature's being. Sometimes, they use the modern version, where magic is an external force that can be subtracted. The result is an inconsistent hodge-podge that makes no sense from either world view.

JRM

05-02-2009 09:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kromelizard (Post 10305947)

Why would aerodynamics even have to apply to a dragon? I don't really understand the urge to apply real world science to fantasy. Of course a dragon can fly without magic, it has wings!

No particular reason, some of us just find it amusing to consider that shadowy area betwixt magic and science, where physics and metaphysics mingle and spawn bizarre chimera.

As for dragons, there are D&D dragons that don't have wings, but can still fly (mostly based on Asian versions of the legendary beast, with a few originals like the Mist Dragon).

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10307306)

I see the problem as more fundamental. In the real world's myths, legends, folklore, and superstition, magic was a fundamental part of everything. Some things were more numinous than others, you could certainly strip away glamours or spells, and wizards can lose their powers, but the idea that magic is an external force that can be extracted (and by implication the default state of most creatures is "magicless") is a modern conception.

And with dead magic zones, anti-magic and even magic resistance, D&D applies the concept very inconsistently. Sometimes, they use the folkloric version of magic as an essential part of a creature's being. Sometimes, they use the modern version, where magic is an external force that can be subtracted. The result is an inconsistent hodge-podge that makes no sense from either world view. The Last Unicorn becoming a horse, for instance.

I don't have such a problem with that myself, I find such effects no less unsuitable for a fantasy milieu than folklore that demons cannot enter consecrated ground, or that trolls vanish if touched with an iron horse-shoe.

If forced to get down to the crunch I guess I would not be too bothered by having two (or more!) conflicting world views, there's no reason that any given magical world view has to be the one and total truth of reality. Indeed, conflicting world-views are legion in real-world beliefs about magic so why should a role-playing game restrict itself to one?

Oh, and were you talking about Beagle's novel The Last Unicorn? If I recall correctly she was never turned into a horse. She did meet a farmer who was so wrapped in mundanity he saw her as a horse, and the travelling-show witch (whose name temporarily escapes me) gave her the experience of being mortal through an illusion, but she was not a powerful enough sorceress to actually transform her. Of course, Schmendrick did manage to polymorph the unicorn into a human, but even though she was mortal she still had some magical attributes.

KromeLizard

05-03-2009 01:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10307306)

I see the problem as more fundamental. In the real world's myths, legends, folklore, and superstition, magic was a fundamental part of everything. Some things were more numinous than others, you could certainly strip away glamours or spells, and wizards can lose their powers, but the idea that magic is an external force that can be extracted (and by implication the default state of most creatures is "magicless") is a modern conception. The Last Unicorn becoming a horse, for instance.

And with dead magic zones, anti-magic and even magic resistance, D&D applies the concept very inconsistently. Sometimes, they use the folkloric version of magic as an essential part of a creature's being. Sometimes, they use the modern version, where magic is an external force that can be subtracted. The result is an inconsistent hodge-podge that makes no sense from either world view.

It is inconsistent only if you accept that, in the D&D worldview, "magicless" is a state equivalent to being constrained to what is possible in the real world.

Inyssiis

05-03-2009 01:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

So, dragons die horribly under their own weight. Or vanish entirely?

JRM

05-03-2009 06:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10310827)

So, dragons die horribly under their own weight. Or vanish entirely?

Nah, they turn into sapient Tyrannosaurs in antimagic shells, that's why no one's reported what happens.;

TO paraphrase the Order of the Stick "A dragon without magic is still a dragon."

Kakita Kojiro

05-04-2009 01:34 AM

Some clever wizard needs to invent Newton's Greater Antimagic Shell -- just for the amusing mayhem of watching flying dragons crash to the ground, giants collapse under their own improbable weight, rust monsters starve, etc...

Sleeper

05-04-2009 02:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kromelizard (Post 10310818)

It is inconsistent only if you accept that, in the D&D worldview, "magical" is a state equivalent to being constrained to what is possible in the real world.

I find it equally inconsistent with both the modern and the magical worldview. It's a hybrid, applying a mashed-up mess of modern and pre-modern concepts that makes no sense from either perspective.

An iron golem without magic should be either A) a statue, or B) impossible. The idea that you can extract the magical characteristics of a creature is inconsistent with the pre-modern perspective. D&D's version where a random assortment of magical and non-magical traits remain is an artifact of the game's rules, not something that makes sense when viewed at the setting level.

Coming up with a justification might be entertaining. Something that explains why a spell is able to suppress one class of characteristics, but not another class. Perhaps chi versus dimensional energies? Anti-magic shell just cuts off access to external sources of magic.

noisms

05-04-2009 05:50 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Shadow

A Shadow is a living (unliving, I suppose) shadow which exists partially on the Negative Material Plane. It haunts graveyards and dark places, waiting to suck the life out of trespassers - whereupon the victim becomes a Shadow himself.

There is a rather nice portrayal of Shadows as hateful of anything which reminds them of their former lives: whenever they come across treasure or belongings of a human or demihuman in their territory, they deliberately throw such items down a well or somewhere else out of sight, rather than be reminded of what they once were. A nice ready-made treasure store - if you can make your way past the near-invisible incorporeal killers who surround it.

Shadows remind me of that old Frank Trollman thread here about making a setting based on D&D rules concepts. As he put it:

Quote:

"Shadows, for instance. If even one exists, why aren't you all dead? Every time it kills a creature, be it a mighty warrior or an owl chick, a new shadow is created. They are incorporeal and therefore immune to most forms of attack and can walk through walls."

Which is a fun scenario and I suppose a D&D vision of apocalyptic horror - rather than zombies or bodysnatchers it's Shadows who are sweeping their way through human society. However I think in this case the designers could point out that Shadows seem tied to a particular territory from which they don't want to leave. (And in 2nd edition at least, it's only humans or demihumans who become Shadowised - not 'owl chicks' or whatever.)

The ecology section, as it is for most undead, is well worth reading. Not only do we have "knowledgeable sages" speculating that Shadows were created by some ancient foul curse, we also have them speculating as to the cure:

Quote:

"Attempts to remove the curse from captured shadows have all failed, thus providing more clues into the nature of the disorder. A limited wish spell proves only partially successful as the victim returns for an hour but remains insane for the duration. It has been recently speculated that a full wish, followed by a heal spell, might be capable of restoring a shadow to his former state, but again it must be emphasized that this is only a theory."

Ah, inconsistency, thy name is the AD&D 2nd edition Monstrous Manual.

Wakboth

05-04-2009 05:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I started D&D with BECFI, which also had shadows... but they weren't undead; just evil animate shadows!

Always preferred that, to be honest. Shadows seem kind of redundant with spectres and especially wraiths around.

Hellzon

05-04-2009 06:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Who knows what evil lurks in the hearts of men? The Shadow knows!

Sleeper

05-04-2009 11:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon (Post 10316313)

Who knows what evil lurks in the hearts of men? The Shadow knows!

Just to play a little... what if the shadow is exactly that? I believe there is a similarly-named concept in White Wolf's old Wraith: The Nourning. This also corresponds to the Ancient Egyptian "ib", the part of the soul that deals with the emotions, will, and thought; though not the personality (which is the "ba". Another part of the soul is the "sheut", which refers to the physical shadow, and might make an interesting alternate name for the monster.) To mix and match horribly disparate concepts, perhaps the shadow is the will, mind, and dark emotions unrestrained by the conscience or superego. The soul is the mortality and restraint.

When the soul departs the body, in certain cases the shadow can take it over, which leads to vampires (who lack a shadow because the body has absorbed it). In other cases, a shadow can be created when the soul is stolen from the body. Perhaps shadows are the end result of the trap the soul spell? There might also be conditions where someone loses their shadow while living. A sort of mirror of opposition effect. Lose all the negative emotions (penalty to combat?), and face a strength-draining evil opposite. Another inspiration could be the horribly clawed shadowy beast that crawled from the rift in The Wizard of Earthsea.

JRM

05-05-2009 03:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10314006)

An iron golem without magic should be either A) a statue, or B) impossible. The idea that you can extract the magical characteristics of a creature is inconsistent with the pre-modern perspective. D&D's version where a random assortment of magical and non-magical traits remain is an artifact of the game's rules, not something that makes sense when viewed at the setting level.

Coming up with a justification might be entertaining. Something that explains why a spell is able to suppress one class of characteristics, but not another class. Perhaps chi versus dimensional energies? Anti-magic shell just cuts off access to external sources of magic.

As I said earlier, the easy explanation is that a D&D iron golem is something created by magic but not sustained by magic. It is, quite literally, a robot. It may look like a crude man-shaped lump of iron whose limbs flex and move in an impossible fashion, but if you had an atomic microscope you'd see the 'iron' is actually quadrillions of nanoscopic machines that link or slide across each other to give the golem pseudo-life and mobility. I doubt the mages who follow the Ancient Texts to create them realize this is how the formula imbues their creations with animation, by precise atomic manipulation. But such a task is nothing to the amazing powers of a polymorph other spell, which can turn a large man into a small mouse while leaving their soul and intelligence intact.

JRM

05-05-2009 04:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10316264)

Shadow

Yes, the 2E version of the Shadow is a bit of a puzzler. First, what's up with that illustration. A silhouette of a three fingered spiky humanoid? Are all shadows supposed to look like that? I doubt it!

I've assumed these monsters just look like the shadow of whoever they're spawned from, except there's no-one (or no-thing) visible to cast the shadow. So, if this is the case what creature is that picture the Shadow of? I can't offhand think of any monster that matches it, unless it's supposed to be a Shadow Demon à la the Fiend Folio and the illustrations got mixed up.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10316264)

The ecology section, as it is for most undead, is well worth reading. Not only do we have "knowledgeable sages" speculating that Shadows were created by some ancient foul curse, we also have them speculating as to the cure:

Yes that whole bit about requiring wish level plus magic to cure a Shadow is extremely (maybe excessively) harsh, but at least the MM's consistent in that other incorporeal undead like Wraiths and Spectres are also very hard to bring back to life, requiring a "special quest", whatever that means.

Presumably it's because the original body has been shifted into the Negative Material Plane and destroyed, while with other undead you've got some material remains to cast raise dead or resurrection on once you've 'slain' the undead.

In any case, I find it interesting that Shadows have some physical substance - how else would they be able to throw those treasures down a well? I'll also note there's no text saying Shadows are incorporeal or able to walk through walls and the like. Indeed, I remember running them as basically having a semi-solid "walking gaseous form" that could seep through doors and windows or spread out and flow across walls or ceiling like a, well, living shadow. Several times my PCs ran into the old "shadows trapped inside a hermetically sealed chamber" ploy, who rushed out once they broke the vacuum-seal on the door.

EmperorSeth

05-05-2009 01:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Hey, there's an idea! What if they can't normally throw treasures, or interact with the world at all, so the reason it drains strength from enemies specifically is so they can get that strength themselves? That's as a good a reason as anything to turn evil. Imagine being an incorporeal undead, able to exist but without touching anything. But there is one way to regain your ability to act on the world again, but at a cost....oh, but certainly that warm-blooded creature wouldn't mind giving up a little strength? It would do the same if it had to, after all!

noisms

05-05-2009 06:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10319979)

Hey, there's an idea! What if they can't normally throw treasures, or interact with the world at all, so the reason it drains strength from enemies specifically is so they can get that strength themselves? That's as good a reason as anything to turn evil. Imagine being an incorporeal undead, able to exist but without touching anything. But there is one way to regain your ability to act on the world again, but at a cost....oh, but certainly that warm-blooded creature wouldn't mind giving up a little strength? It would do the same if it had to, after all!

Love it.

JRM

05-05-2009 10:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10319979)

Hey, there's an idea! What if they can't normally throw treasures, or interact with the world at all, so the reason it drains strength from enemies specifically is so they can get that strength themselves? That's as good a reason as anything to turn evil. Imagine being an incorporeal undead, able to exist but without touching anything. But there is one way to regain your ability to act on the world again, but at a cost....oh, but certainly that warm-blooded creature wouldn't mind giving up a little strength? It would do the same if it had to, after all!

Now that's a nice notion.

Hmm... maybe Shadows can't even touch each other without drained Strength? Now I'm imagining a "doomed lovers" scenario where a pair of Shadows who were once human paramours are draining the vigour from travellers just so they can touch each others, though that's a bit of a switch from these undead's default psychology.

EDIT: My original notion was to have one of the doomed lovers a Shadow and the other remain mortal, but it seems obvious that the latter would soon enter the undead state as well, probably after the Shadow lover taps enough victims to become corporeal enough to embrace embraces its mortal lover and inadvertently drains away all of his or her Strength and hit points as well.

Mr. Teapot

05-06-2009 02:50 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10321230)

Now that's a nice notion.

Hmm... maybe Shadows can't even touch each other without drained Strength? Now I'm imagining a "doomed lovers" scenario where a pair of Shadows who were once human paramours are draining the vigour from travellers just so they can touch each others, though that's a bit of a switch from these undead's default psychology.

EDIT: My original notion was to have one of the doomed lovers a Shadow and the other remain mortal, but it seems obvious that the latter would soon enter the undead state as well, probably after the Shadow lover taps enough victims to become corporeal enough to embrace embraces its mortal lover and inadvertently drains away all of his or her Strength and hit points as well.

Undead tragic lovers are always a good idea in my book. Always.

Having an adventure where you try to convince a new widow(er) to avoid the Shadow of their deceased lover before they too become a Shadow would be pretty neat. Except that this is D&D, so the PCs would likely just kill the Shadow lover.

Psychosis555

05-06-2009 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

This thread inspired me to track down a copy of the AD&D 2nd Ed. Monstrous Compendium, and for $20 it was a steal. Anyone know where I can see what's supposed to be in this thing so I can find out if mine is complete or not? It's a huge binder, great for when you wanna bring a few monsters to a session. I just recently started DMing a 4e campaign and no doubt some of the ideas in this thread will be thrust upon my unwary adventurers. Imagine the horror in finding out the friendly dwarf town you've stumbled upon is actually home to cannibalistic roperdwarvers, hell bent on maintaining their secret so they can continue to feed on wary travelers who veer off the King's Road etc.

As for the subject at hand, I find these ghostly monsters interesting. I prefer skeletons or zombies to ethereal undead as all sorts of dumb stuff usually ensues trying to defeat them, but this can be half the fun of roleplaying in the right group. I'd imagine a shadow could be used as a good spy, perhaps a lich has been disturbed one too many times by foolish hero's seeking the treasures of his home, and from the last group he chose two members: one to live, but have his soul removed and used to power the lich's dread magics, and the other to die and have his soul twisted and warped into a shadow, controlling the body, but not his own so that he would not remember his original origin. The newly created shadow puppet would be sent to town and could either wreak havoc in interesting ways (sabotage, murder) or simply spy on the party and keep them wondering why this damn lich knows everything they plan.

JRM

05-06-2009 04:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10322401)

Undead tragic lovers are always a good idea in my book. Always.

Having an adventure where you try to convince a new widow(er) to avoid the Shadow of their deceased lover before they too become a Shadow would be pretty neat. Except that this is D&D, so the PCs would likely just kill the Shadow lover.

Well if they're low-level adventurers maybe they don't have magical weapons to hit the Shadow with, so it's a fearsome foe they want to avoid. Or they do kill the Shadow and the widow(er) becomes crazy for vengeance in the finest melodramatic tradition. Then if they kill him/her the widow(er) comes back as a revenant for revenge!

What's that? It's statistically implausible that the widow(er) would become a revenant. Well, in my view a DM has to occasionally be prepared to take an attitude towards statistics resembling Humpty Dumpty's views on the meaning of words. The odds can become what you want them to be, the DM's just got to be firm with their statistics.;

JRM

05-06-2009 04:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Psychosis555 (Post 10322662)

This thread inspired me to track down a copy of the AD&D 2nd Ed. Monstrous Compendium, and for $20 it was a steal. Anyone know where I can see what's supposed to be in this thing so I can find out if mine is complete or not? It's a huge binder, great for when you wanna bring a few monsters to a session. I just recently started DMing a 4e campaign and no doubt some of the ideas in this thread will be thrust upon my unwary adventurers. Imagine the horror in finding out the friendly dwarf town you've stumbled upon is actually home to cannibalistic roperdwarvers, hell bent on maintaining their secret so they can continue to feed on wary travelers who veer off the King's Road etc.

Wikipedia has a list of TSR's AD&D 2nd edition monsters divided by product (Monstrous Compendiums, Monstrous Manual, Al-Qadim et cetera) you can see here.

I think it's pretty accurate, at least I haven't come across any glaring omissions.

Amphimir Míriel

05-07-2009 05:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10317947)

As I said earlier, the easy explanation is that a D&D iron golem is something created by magic but not sustained by magic. It is, quite literally, a robot. It may look like a crude man-shaped lump of iron whose limbs flex and move in an impossible fashion, but if you had an atomic microscope you'd see the 'iron' is actually quadrillions of nanoscopic machines that link or slide across each other to give the golem pseudo-life and mobility. I doubt the mages who follow the Ancient Texts to create them realize this is how the formula imbues their creations with animation, by precise atomic manipulation. But such a task is nothing to the amazing powers of a polymorph other spell, which can turn a large man into a small mouse while leaving their soul and intelligence intact.

Millions of catgirls just died... I hope you're satisfied :mad:

JRM

05-08-2009 05:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Amphimir Míriel (Post 10327860)
Millions of catgirls just died... I hope you're satisfied :mad:

Humbug, catgirls are entirely scientifically plausible.;

Sleeper

05-09-2009 03:16 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10332707)
Humbug, catgirls are entirely scientifically plausible.;

Not in the wild. Only among domesticated animals would nekomimi be a desirable trait. Imagine all the catgirl shows ("best in breed", "best in show", etc) and constant public service announcements about spaying your pets.

noisms

05-09-2009 10:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The next entry is coming up. Work has been hell a busy.

JRM

05-10-2009 12:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10334504)
Not in the wild. Only among domesticated animals would nekomimi be a desirable trait. Imagine all the catgirl show ("best in breed", "best in show", etc) and constant public service announcements about spaying your pets.

Haven't you heard how quickly catgirls can turn feral when they lose their cushy lifestyle of being waited on paw and foot by humans? Not to mention the wildcatgirls (Hominofelus silvestris), most of whom have never been domesticated and would scratch a fellow's face off if they tried. Admittedly wildcatgirls are so elusive few have caught more than a glimpse of one padding for cover, maybe with a dead rabbit or chicken dangling from their mouth.

Besides which, the Society for the Emancipation of Anthropomorphic Animals is trying to outlaw catgirl shows. While some of those shows are legitimate "beauty contests", many of them were tantamount to slavery. Don't you remember all those stories of show organisers forcing catgirls to work in cathouses against their will? Of course quite a few of those despicable types have been coming to an unpleasant end recently, now the weretigers have started tracking them down.

Sleeper

05-10-2009 12:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Even the feral catgirls are easily outcompeted in the wild by Hominopanthera tigris, H. onca, and Hominocrocata crocuta, making the wild house "nekos" a vanishing breed outside of certain palatial Tellurian ecocontrolled estates and paraterraformed M-type asteroids.

JRM

05-10-2009 06:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10337481)

Even the feral catgirls are easily outcompeted in the wild by Hominopanthera tigris, H. onca, and Hominocrocata crocuta, making the wild house "nekos" a vanishing breed outside of certain palatial Tellurian ecocontrolled estates and paraterraformed M-type asteroids.

I disagree! Each of the theriohominids has its own ecological niche, so they aren't competing. The feral catgirls hunt rodents up to rabbit size, while members of the big-catwomen Hominopanthera genus specialize in ambushing big game, while Hominocrocata are endurance-hunters and opportunistic part-time scavengers. If anything, it's Hominopanthera and Hominocrocata who are in competition, since lion and hyenafolk often share the same habitat and prey.:o

The Last Conformist

05-10-2009 05:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Hyenagirls? Big thanks for that image in my head ...

Sleeper

05-10-2009 06:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10339713)

Hyenagirls? Big thanks for that image in my head ...

You didn't think male gnolls relied on the clone spell for reproduction, did you?

In any case, the argument for separate ecological niches is largely specious. The great catgirls (or the more inclusive "big catgirls", which includes even those human-size specimens whose vocal cords are designed only to emit purrs, not roars) -- in contrast to the miniature varieties with the small braincases and thus limited cognitive capacity beyond certain pre-programmed kawaii reactions -- share an almost identical morphology, even more so than their true feline half-cousins. A side effect of the biodesign of Hominofelus silvestris may have left them with the unfortunate urge to hunt and kill small, cute animals instead of the larger prey favored by their sister breeds who come standard with the Amazonia Mark VII imprint, but when spit comes to claw, they're all just opportunistic predators with nigh-identical body plans. And the slight size differential of the more loli nekos is demonstrably a competitive disadvantage, which explains the rapid diminishment of their wild population in the Sudan when the more robust breeds were introduced.

Wakboth

05-10-2009 06:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

So... will this discussion be referred back to once we hit Tabaxi and Wemic? :D

The Last Conformist

05-10-2009 07:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10339824)
You didn't think male gnolls relied on the clone spell for reproduction, did you?

I do not ordinarily think of gnolls at all.

noisms

05-10-2009 11:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Shedu

But just what she do, we don't know. A ha ha ha.

Another of those powerful good creatures for DMs to use as policemen or walking quest dispensers, I've never liked the D&D iteration of Shedu - not least because it has to be about the least fleshed-out single-monster entry in the entire MM. Less than a third of the word count is dedicated to any sort of fluff, with the rest entirely taken up with lists of psionic powers. Snore.

About the only piece of information that I think can be riffed-upon is the idea that each Shedu wears a jewelled headband, with differing precious stones according to status. Perhaps losing the jewel results in something bad? I lack enthusiasm even for this.

I'd prefer to use Shedu, like Lammasu, as stern and powerful guardians, more lawful than good, and as terrifying as they are noble. Probably as sentinels over a tomb, or gate guardians of an ancient city, who the PCs have to somehow bypass without earning their ire. It makes a difference to have good antagonists, after all.

The Last Conformist

05-11-2009 12:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10339932)
I do not ordinarily think of gnolls at all.

Actually, the roots of my reaction are marginally deeper than that. Ordinarily, the weirdness of spotted hyena, and by implication gnoll, sexual anatomy is a fact of biology, on the level spiders who eat their partners. Where it gets disturbing is where is invited to imagining hyena-women as catgirls tend to be imagined - as objects of Perverse Sexual Lust.

Ginkomortus

05-11-2009 12:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10339932)
I do not ordinarily think of gnolls at all.

I think about gnolls all the time. In fact, rpg.net is only purple when I'm thinking about gnolls.

JRM

05-11-2009 02:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10339824)
*In any case, the argument for separate ecological niches is largely specious. The great catgirls (or the more inclusive "big catgirls", which includes even those human-size specimens whose vocal cords are designed only to to emit purrs not roars) -- in contrast to the miniature varieties with the small braincases and thus limited cognitive capacity beyond certain pre-programmed kawaii reactions -- share an almost identical morphology, even more so than their true feline half-cousins. A side effect of the biodesign of Hominofelus silvestris may have left them with the unforunate urge to hunt and kill small, cute animals instead of the larger prey favored by their sister breeds who come standard with the Amazonia Mark VII imprint, but when spit comes to claw, they're all just opportunistic predators with nigh-identical body plans. And the slight size differential of the more loli nekos is demonstratably a competitive disadvantage, which explains the rapid diminishment of their wild population in the Sudan when the more robust breeds were introduced.*

I'm afraid you're sorely mistaken there, my dear Sleeper.

Firstly, there is more difference in size and morphology between a 120cm Catgirl and a 2 metre+ Bigcatgirl than there is between an ocelot and a jungle jaguar, two species which quite live together in the Amazonian jungle by having different niches.

Secondly, an average domestic or wild Hominofelis is significantly more intelligent than an average Hominopanthera. Not only do they have a much higher brain size to body mass ratio than the great cat women, a factor that has only been increased by domesticity as the ones with larger eyes (and hence larger heads and brains) were considered 'cuter', but they have oversized prefrontal cortexes which further increases their intelligence, similar to the cerebral features that allowed Homo floresiensis to manipulate fire and tools despite having a brain not much larger than a chimps. The grossly inbred 'Kawaii' miniatures are a negligible factor as far as their survival in the wild goes, since not only are these greatly in the minority amongst the catgirls that go feral, these traits are so recessive they breed out within a few generations.

Just look at the facts - a liongirl relies on its claws and fangs to bring down prey, and has nothing but its fur to keep it warm. Many catgirls in the wild will wear and even make their own clothes, not to mention knapping flint and crafting spears.

Thirdly, the Sudan in fact proved how adaptable catgirls are. Hominofelis is an animal evolved to live in forests and scrublands, that it could even survive in a desert plains is a remarkable achievement, especially considering those catgirls were all descended from individuals who escaped sixty years ago from a shipment of concubines sent to an Arab potentate, so they started out with no experience in the wilderness at all.

Fourthly, the smaller size of the catgirl is a competitive advantage in most circumstances since they require a much smaller supply of food to survive (and breed) than their larger relatives.

I just don't see how you can claim catgirls are ill adapted to survival when there are colonies of escaped catgirls thriving all over the world, from the alleycatgirls who roam so many of our major cities, scrounging out of dustbins and manipulating humans for food, to the many catgirls living in wilderness areas all around the world, such as the large polydactile Maine catgirl which is able to bring down a small deer, the thriving population of catgirls in the Australian outback who are helping to deal with the population explosion of bunnygirls, as the most extreme example, the thick-furred Antarctic catgirls who were foolishly taken to the Southern continent as pets and are now multiplying in numbers in the frozen north.

No, catgirls are doing very well in the wild. It's the big cats that are suffering in the survival stakes, since they require much larger territories. Even many other catfolk that are physically superior to the catgirl and hunt the same prey, such as the Canadian lynxgirl Hominolynx canadensis and the Eurasian lynxgirl [Hominolynx lynx], are losing numbers in competition to Hominofelis because the latter, though weaker, is intelligent enough to adapt to the changes of the modern world.

Indeed, in some areas, catgirls are doing too well. While the feral catgirls have brought under control the population explosion of bunnygirls that almost destroyed that country's agriculture a few decades ago they are also wreaking havoc amongst the native wildlife, and there have been discussions about exterminating the aforementioned Antarctic catgirls, since they are too efficient at killing penguins.

Oh, and feral Hominofelis catus have been interbreeding with the Scottish Wildcatgirl to create a hybrid with the cunning and tool use of the former and the size and ferocity of the latter.

JRM

05-11-2009 03:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10340370)

Shedu

snip

Another of those powerful good creatures for DMs to use as policemen or walking quest dispensers, I've never liked the D&D iteration of Shedu - not least because it has to be about the least fleshed-out single-monster entry in the entire MM.

Yes, that was my reaction to the Shedu entry too. Not much there to spark the imagination. Can we get anything more from the original Mesopotamian mythology? I don't know much more about Shedu except they're often depicted as guardians at entrances (from household to city gates), their female counterpart is the lammasu, and they're associated with the Akkadian Sun god.

Hmm, maybe the party encounter a city or ancient temple guarded by a pair of Shedu who bar any creatures tainted by evil. Maybe they must prove their worth somehow to enter (Quest Time!), or some enemy just slips a "taint of evil" cursed item onto one of them and they have to deal with the consequences after the winged bull-lions start roaring warnings.

Oh no, I like this alternative better. (Assumes the Lammasu = female Shedu) A Shedu offers a good aligned party a generous reward to take over his duties guarding the Gate of X from evil forces for a moon so he can visit a Lamasu who's reached her time of the century, so the pair of them can "do their duty to perpetuate good". Naturally, they'll be plagued by malevolent forces trying to desecrate the Shedu's charge during his absence.

demiurge1138

05-11-2009 03:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

So, uh... shedu?

I completely forgot that they were originally psionic. Which is actually a pretty good idea, considering that that (and hooves rather than claws) is about all that distinguishes them from the lammasu. Also of note is the five-legged shedu - it's used in Assyrian (?) art to indicate perspective, but in the 3.x Fiend Folio, it was taken literally.

Come to think of it, shedu also weren't psionic in the Fiend Folio, were they?

JRM

05-11-2009 03:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10339859)
So... will this discussion be referred back to once we hit Tabaxi and Wemic? :D

Maybe it will, maybe it won't.:cool:

Although judging by your avatar you'd be biased in favour of the hyenagirls. ;)

Hmm, come to think of it, if I apply the same criteria to my avatar it implies I prefer gorillagirls!:eek:

JRM

05-11-2009 03:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10340944)
So, uh... shedu?

I completely forgot that they were originally psionic. Which is actually a pretty good idea, considering that that (and hooves rather than claws) is about all that distinguishes them from the lammasu. Also of note is the five-legged shedu--it's used in Assyrian (?) art to indicate perspective, but in the 3.x Fiend Folio, it was taken literally.

Come to think of it, shedu also weren't psionic in the Fiend Folio, were they?

They didn't actually do that did they ... trots off to check his copy of the 3E FF ... oh dear grief they did!

Hmm, maybe the four-legged ones are Lesser Shedus and the five-legged ones are Greater Shedus? I'll leave the "or they're just glad to see you" jokes to others.;

By the way, both the 2E and 3E illustrations for the Shedus are hardly inspiring. Had a bit of trouble deciding which one I like the best, but the 2E version is ahead by a nose, its wings are rather badly drawn and have a tacked-on look but I think the head's a lot better. It looks properly proportioned and has a thoughtful countenance, as opposed to the goofy ears and startled expression of the 3E version.

Sleeper

05-11-2009 04:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

(Trumping the tedium of point-by-point replies by responding to a random piece.... :p)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10340891)

Firstly, there is more difference in size and morphology between a 120cm Catgirl and a 2 metre+ Bigcatgirl than there is between an ocelot and a jungle jaguar, two species which quite live together in the Amazonian jungle by having different niches.

Once again, the use of fringe cases and exceptions do not prove a general point. The big catgirl you're obliquely referring to is obviously the Twmpanian B-Series LIGER, a combat model competing with the Armagorilla, Pekinorka, and other more popular designs to fill the infantry niche. The B-series was an experimental attempt to break into a mature market with a radical new design, but despite the ballyhoo that preceded its roll out, the sales were telling: barely a blip on the deep radar. In fact, the B-Series was canceled last month when the stakeholders voted to execute the board due to dismal sales; the demands of postmodern warfare favor parahumans based on social animals of extraordinary size and strength. The true catgirls are gracile, not robust, as a simple scan of the memetimarket clearly demonstrates. Excluding the two outliers (both toy-sized miniatures), the pre-vat mass of the biotype specimen of the 25 most popular breeds varies by less than 7%.

Mikaze

05-11-2009 04:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The Shedu and Pathfinder's Buraq remind me of this problem that's vexed me far longer than it really should. How the hell do they keep themselves so neatly groomed and well-adorned? Look at that Shedu's beard! How do they keep their hats on straight? Do they have a humanoid posse to keep them stylish? But what if the creatures in question are solitary?

Spinxes with heavy ornamentation also apply.

Some people worry over rules, some people worry over in-game morality. But this is the kind of thing that keeps me up at night.

JRM

05-11-2009 04:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10340944)
So, uh... shedu?

I completely forgot that they were originally psionic. Which is actually a pretty good idea, considering that that (and hooves rather than claws) is about all that distinguishes them from the lammasu. Also of note is the five-legged shedu--it's used in Assyrian (?) art to indicate perspective, but in the 3.x Fiend Folio, it was taken literally.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10341009)
Hmm, maybe the four-legged ones are Lesser Shedu and the five-legged ones are Greater Shedus?

Further on the Shedus, if I remember my last visit to the British Museum correctly some Shedus have lion's paws instead of bull's hooves. I have a vague memory that some Shedus gate-sculptures have both - i.e. three paws at the front, two hooves at the back. May be mistaken on the latter, though.

Oh, for those not familiar with the perspective thing Demiurge referred to, rather than being sculpted in the round the Mesopotamians carved Shedus gate guardians to be viewed from the front or from inside the gateway. The front-carving shows both front legs but not the hind legs, while the side-carving shows both front and side legs. Both the front and side views shared the head, breast and one front leg, but not the other front leg, with the result that the beast looks like it has five legs when viewed from an angle. If you look at this picture you can see the result.

Hmm, does that mean that carvings of four-legged Shedus were always in flat surfaces like walls, plaques and floors. Maybe the Lesser 4-legged Shedus should gain duo-dimensionality as a power?

The Last Conformist

05-11-2009 04:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10341055)

Once again, the use of fringe cases and exceptions do not prove a general point.

Lions do or in the recent past have overlapped in range with leopards, cheetahs, tigers, lynxes, and a few dozen smaller cat species.

You'd be better off arguing from the girl angle. Humans tend to cohabit disastrously with other apes ...

JRM

05-11-2009 04:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10341073)

The Shedu and Pathfinder's Buraq remind me of this problem that's vexed me far longer than it really should. How the hell do they keep themselves so neatly groomed and well-adorned? Look at that Shedu's beard! How do they keep their hats on straight? Do they have a humanoid posse to keep them stylish? But what if the creatures in question are solitary?

Oh the answer to those questions is quite simple. All Shedu are expert at using their psionic powers of body control and telekinesis to keep themselves well turned out, and those that for some reason find themselves looking a bit scruffy employ post-hypnotic suggestion to implant the thought "the Shedu didn't have a hair out of place" into those it meets. Of course, there are stories about them using mass domination to enslave teams of hairdressers but that is obviously ridiculous, they are Lawful Good after all.

Sleeper

05-11-2009 04:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10341073)

The Shedu and Pathfinder's Buraq remind me of this problem that's vexed me far longer than it really should. How the hell do they keep themselves so neatly groomed and well-adorned? Look at that Shedu's beard! How do they keep their hats on straight? Do they have a humanoid posse to keep them stylish? But what if the creatures in question are solitary?

Spinxes with heavy ornamentation also apply.

Some people worry over rules, some people worry over in-game morality. But this is the kind of thing that keeps me up at night.

Sounds like an example of social grooming. Sufficiently coordinated cooperative behavior and horse-like lips might make up for the lack of opposable thumbs. That's supported by the Monstrous Manual, which lists their organization as "herd". One member of the herd might take on the role of groomer or stylist, and develop an appropriate psionic discipline (and an acute fashion sense) allowing more precise control. In cases where they are cut off from their normal social network, such as when they serve as the guardian of a gate to the Abyss, they might become frustrated and develop certain pathological behaviors. Passersby might suffer unprovoked attacks both verbal and physical, malicious pranks (especially ones that compromise the personal hygiene of the victims), and other irrational, obsessive behaviors. These shedu are easily recognized by their unkempt, matted hair; untrimmed beards; and a general aura of slovenly filth. The best way to placate such an unfortunate is tactile; groom them into submission! In fact, the heroes of the shedu are wandering or questing hairdressers, who seek out any of their race compelled to serve a solitary vigil, and surprise them with a complete makeover.

JRM

05-11-2009 04:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10341115)

Lions do or in the recent past have overlapped in range with leopards, cheetahs, tigers, lynxes, and a few dozen smaller cat species.

You'd be better off arguing from the girl angle. Humans tend to cohabit disastrously with other apes ...

True enough, although as a counter argument there were long periods of hominid history when there were multiple species of "ape-men" living together in Africa. I prefer to imagine Hominofelis species taking a similar tack rather than the more homicidal tendencies of Homo sapiens. Think of all the manlike species we've got in the Monstrous Manual that somehow have avoided exterminating each other ages ago.

Inyusius

05-11-2009 04:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10341073)

The Shedu and Pathfinder's Buraq remind me of this problem that's vexed me far longer than it really should. How the hell do they keep themselves so neatly groomed and well-adorned? Look at that Shedu's beard! How do they keep their hats on straight?

"... like a measuring rod and was told, "Go and measure the temple of God and the altar, and count the worshipers there. ² But exclude the outer court; do not measure it, because it has been given to the Gentiles. They will trample on the holy city for 42 months. ³ And I will give power to my two witnesses, and they will prophesy for 1,260 days, clothed in sackcloth." ⁴ These are the two olive trees and the two lampstands that stand before the Lord of the earth. ⁵ If anyone tries to harm them, fire comes from their mouths and devours their enemies. This is how anyone who wants to harm them must die. ⁶ These men have power to shut up the sky so that it will not rain during the time they are prophesying; and they have power to turn the waters into blood and to strike the earth with every kind of plague as often as they want. ⁷ Now when they have finished their testimony, the beast that comes up from the Abyss will attack them, and overpower and kill them. ⁸ Their bodies will lie in the street of the great city, which is figuratively called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified. ⁹ For three and a half days men from every people, tribe, language and nation will gaze on their bodies and refuse them burial. ¹⁰ The inhabitants of the earth will gloat over them and will celebrate by sending each other gifts, because these two prophets had tormented those who live on the earth. ¹¹ But after the three and a half days a breath of life from God entered them, and they stood on their feet, and terror struck those who saw them. ¹² Then they heard a loud voice from heaven saying to them, "Come up here." And they went up to heaven in a cloud, while their enemies looked on. ¹³ At that very hour there was a severe earthquake and a tenth of the city collapsed. Seven thousand people were killed in the earthquake, and the survivors were terrified and gave glory to the God of heaven. ¹⁴ The second woe has passed; the third woe is coming soon. The Seventh Trumpet ¹⁵ The seventh angel sounded his trumpet, and there were loud voices in heaven, which said: "The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he will reign for ever and ever." ¹⁶ And the twenty-four elders, who were seated on their thrones before God, fell—oh, bugger. Hey! You there! Fix my hat, would you? "

Well, no, I'm sure JRM has the right answer. I can't see a shedu ever interrupting his intonation for any reason. Though, if caught in an antimagic shell, that intonation would doubtless flow seamlessly into a discourse on hygiene and the divine right of kings.

EDIT: Damn! I was four minutes away from quoting the Book of Revelations in this thread's 666th post.

Sleeper

05-11-2009 05:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi (Post 10341170)

EDIT: Damn! I was four minutes away from quoting the Book of Revelations in this thread's 666th post.

Fixed :)

(The deleted post is below.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10341115)

Lions do or in the recent past have overlapped in range with leopards, cheetahs, tigers, lynxes, and a few dozen smaller cat species.

You'd be better off arguing from the girl angle. Humans tend to cohabit disastrously with other apes ...

You probably realize none of my arguments are based on anything more than what's fun to write. Some of the holes are quiet deliberate; an ironclad thesis wouldn't have the same entertainment value :)

JRM

05-11-2009 05:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10341232)
Fixed :)

(The deleted post is below.)

You probably realize none of my arguments are based on anything more than what's fun to write. Some of the holes are quiet deliberate; an ironclad thesis wouldn't have the same entertainment value :)

I don't know about Inyssiis, but I certainly realized we were just fooling around.

Arguing highly evolved combat forms equate to improved survivability in the wild? Hilarious! They'd never meet their grossly inflated protein and nutrient requirements by hunting & scavenging for themselves.

Not to mention that the Hildebrand convention now requires all Warbeasts to be gene modded to require an artificial coded food supplement, without which they self-destruct. It specifies a food supplement that doesn't occur in the wild of course, we don't want Jurassic Parks I-IX happening all over again!

Besides which, most of those GM warbeasts are so specialized and highly strung that releasing one into the wilderness and expecting it to thrive is like expecting a thoroughbred racer to be better adapted to living off the steppes than a Przewalski's Horse.

Still, I think its time to move on to debating about Sheddu hairdressers.

Hmm, maybe the aforementioned romantically inclined Sheddu seeks the party's assistance in acquiring makeover expertise, beard-pins, perfumed hair oil and other cosmetics to improve his appearance enough to win the Lamasu of his heart's desire back from a claim-jumping Androsphinx?

JRM

05-11-2009 05:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10341170)

"... like a measuring rod and was told, "Go and measure the temple of God and the altar, and count the worshipers there. ² But exclude the outer court; do not measure it, because it has been given to the Gentiles. They will trample on the holy city for 42 months. ³ And I will give power to my two witnesses, and they will prophesy for 1,260 days, clothed in sackcloth." ⁴ These are the two olive trees and the two lampstands that stand before the Lord of the earth. ⁵ If anyone tries to harm them, fire comes from their mouths and devours their enemies. This is how anyone who wants to harm them must die. ⁶ These men have power to shut up the sky so that it will not rain during the time they are prophesying; and they have power to turn the waters into blood and to strike the earth with every kind of plague as often as they want. ⁷ Now when they have finished their testimony, the beast that comes up from the Abyss will attack them, and overpower and kill them. ⁸ Their bodies will lie in the street of the great city, which is figuratively called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified. ⁹ For three and a half days men from every people, tribe, language and nation will gaze on their bodies and refuse them burial. ¹⁰ The inhabitants of the earth will gloat over them and will celebrate by sending each other gifts, because these two prophets had tormented those who live on the earth. ¹¹ But after the three and a half days a breath of life from God entered them, and they stood on their feet, and terror struck those who saw them. ¹² Then they heard a loud voice from heaven saying to them, "Come up here." And they went up to heaven in a cloud, while their enemies looked on. ¹³ At that very hour there was a severe earthquake and a tenth of the city collapsed. Seven thousand people were killed in the earthquake, and the survivors were terrified and gave glory to the God of heaven. ¹⁴ The second woe has passed; the third woe is coming soon. The Seventh Trumpet ¹⁵ The seventh angel sounded his trumpet, and there were loud voices in heaven, which said: "The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he will reign for ever and ever." ¹⁶ And the twenty-four elders, who were seated on their thrones before God, fell—oh, bugger. Hey! You there! Fix my hat, would you? "

Well, no, I'm sure JRM has the right answer. I can't see a shedu ever interrupting his intonation for any reason. Though, if caught in an antimagic shell, that intonation would doubtless flow seamlessly into a discourse on hygiene and the divine right of kings.

Actually, that could explain how Shedus get their hats put straight. They wouldn't have to interrupt their intonation, since they can use their mindlink power to make the request, or dominate a haberdasher for Greater Shedus, while keeping on talking.

Still, the apocryphal Book of Revelations does seem a bit short in the hairdressing department.:cool:

Sleeper

05-11-2009 06:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

(two posts up) Wasn't Inyssiis :).

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10341299)

Arguing highly evolved combat forms equate to improved survivability in the wild? Hilarious! They'd never meet their grossly inflated protein and nutrient requirements by hunting & scavenging for themselves.

Not to mention that the Hildebrand convention now requires all Warbeasts to be gene modded to require an artificial coded food supplement, without which they self-destruct. It specifies a food supplement that doesn't occur in the wild of course, we don't want Jurassic Parks I-IX happening all over again!

Besides which, most of those GM warbeasts are so specialized and highly strung that releasing one into the wilderness and expecting it to thrive is like expecting a thoroughbred racer to be better adapted to living off the steppes than a Przewalski's Horse.

There you go again, missing the forest for the trees, lichen, and microbes! Where did I suggest, state, or imply that warbeasts are more competitive when reverted to their neoferal state? I was merely dismissing your rather risible contention that an amped-up battleteratite is a typical example of a catgirl! Most of the so-called warbeasts are chained to a regular diet of DNA-supplements and go to battle with a backpack full of performance-enhance drug-pumps. Not to mention that without extensive augmentation by anagathics their lifespan is measured in mere months. Have you ever seen a strung-out Attacorka? During a consultation in Dubai, I had the opportunity to observe the famous "hero" Kuku-a-Chu shortly after he was put out to stud; sad, sad. A mere shadow of the ravening beast in his war footage, only weeks before. But utterly irrelevant to the present discourse, of course.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10341299)

Hmm, maybe the aforementioned romantically inclined Shedus seeks the party's assistance in acquiring makeover expertise, beard-pins, perfumed hair oil and other cosmetics to improve his appearance enough to win the Lamasu of his heart's desire back from a claim-jumping Androsphinx?

Probably futile. The androsphinx has that scruffy bad-boy (chaotic) appeal that the nice (lawful) girls go for.

demiurge1138

05-11-2009 09:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10341009)

By the way, both the 2E and 3E illustrations for the Shedu are hardly inspiring. Had a bit of trouble deciding which one I like the best, but the 2E version is ahead by a nose, its wings are rather badly drawn and have a tacked-on look but I think the head's a lot better. It looks properly proportioned and has a thoughtful countenance, as opposed to the goofy ears and startled expression of the 3E version.

Well, the Fiend Folio had the poor luck to be partially illustrated by Dennis "Crabapple" Cramer, quite possibly the worst person used in 3.x's art team. Fortunately, it was at least partially balanced out by some sublime work by Richard Sardinha and Sam Wood (his last 3e product for Wizards, I believe).

Wakboth

05-12-2009 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10340978)

Although judging by your avatar you'd be biased in favour of the hyenagirls. ;)

Who, me? whistles innocently

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Probably futile. The androsphinx has that scruffy bad-boy (chaotic) appeal that the nice (lawful) girls go for.

Err... IIRC, androsphinxes are lawful. And kind of frustrated with gynosphinxes constantly chasing them. :)

The Last Conformist

05-12-2009 06:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10341232)

You probably realize none of my arguments are based on anything more than what's fun to write.

Oh, certainly. :) I just enjoy responding as if you were serious sometimes.

Sleeper

05-12-2009 06:23 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10347641)

Err... IIRC, androsphinxes are lawful. And kind of frustrated with gynosphinxes constantly chasing them. :)

You have the dramatic conflict correct, but appear to be misremembering the alignments... they're chaotic good and neutral, respectively. :)

JRM

05-12-2009 09:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10340370)

Shedu

About the only piece of information that I think can be riffed-upon is the idea that each Shedu wears a jewelled headband, with differing precious stones according to status. Perhaps losing the jewel results in something bad? I lack enthusiasm even for this.

Continuing to riff on the hairdressing scheme, maybe Shedu society is built upon social grooming (i.e. "you comb my beard and I'll comb yours"), so the more influential Shedus are not the most powerful but those with the best makeover skills. Greater Shedus have an advantage, having more powers that have a hairdressing application, which is why they are usually high ranking. The few Greater Shedu that are ranked below sapphire are mostly those whose reputation has suffered collapse due to a horrifying disgrace like giving a colleague a perm-gone-wrong, setting fire to someshedu's beard with their hot-curlers, or those that are disinterested or untalented in social grooming, so they commit fashion faux-pas like having unkempt sideburns or wearing earrings that clash with their tiara.

JRM

05-12-2009 09:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10341348)

Probably futile. The androsphinx has that scruffy bad-boy (chaotic) appeal that the nice (lawful) girls go for.

Yes, as if things weren't already tough enough for the Gynosphinxes with those Crio- and Hieracosphinxes lusting after them, their beloved Androsphinxes are doing their best to shun them while making googly-eyes at those goody-four-paws Lammasu girls.

Something had better be done before the population of sphinxes collapses. The most practical solution would be to use polymorph other and modified philters of love to create more romantically inclined Androsphinxes, hence increasing the Gynosphinxes chances of being lucky in love.

noisms

05-14-2009 10:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sirine

Yet another aquatic monster. How many is this in quick succession? And nor is it a particularly good one - the Sirine is really just a kind of mermaid-lite; a hot female humanoid which hangs about in the sea and occasionally surfaces to mate with male humans. Insert obligatory Paris Hilton/Christina Aguilera/Courtney Love joke here.

Sirines can sing to charm, polymorph self, etc. etc. (the usual 'female temptress monster' arsenal) and touch to reduce intelligence. They like out of the way, uninhabited places, but occasionally long for companionship and attempt to lure male humanoids for that purpose. Presumably eventually to their death by drowning, in the case of evil Sirines, though this isn't made explicit in the text.

Other than that it's hard to find much that's inspiring in the entry. Sirines know the local area very well and can be persuaded to divulge that information - which is par for the course for this kind of creature - but there's little else to riff on. Perhaps other people have used them as some kind of tragic love interest for a player character? I don't generally 'do' romance in my games.

Inyssius

05-14-2009 10:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10357847)

Other than that it's hard to find much that's inspiring in the entry. Sirines know the local area very well and can be persuaded to divulge that information - which is par for the course for this kind of creature - but there's little else to riff on.

And, to be honest, there are a thousand thousand other more interesting entities to fill the "not-entirely-trustworthy being which can be persuaded to tell you the secret details of a patch of ocean" role.

demiurge1138

05-15-2009 03:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

It always bugged me that sirens got so diluted while harpies got the siren's schtick. Sirens should be bird-people who lure sailors to their deaths with a beautiful song. Harpies should be monstrous and foul, none of this captivating song stuff, who shit in blind people's food to punish them for offending the gods.

Mr. Teapot

05-15-2009 03:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10341118)

Of course, there are stories about them using mass domination to enslave teams of hairdressers but that is obviously ridiculous, they are Lawful Good after all.

Or so they say. But, of course, Shedus can dominate and post-hypnotic suggestion and the like anyone they please, so of course everyone thinks they're Lawful Good. If you had mind control powers, why would you let all the peons think you were a brain eating monstrosity? You would obviously erase memories, implant ideas and otherwise modify psyches until everyone thought that you were a very literal gift from the gods.

Shedus are really villains, see. Or at best self-serving neutral creatures. They guard the gates of cities so that they can control what goes in and out... not just people, but what supplies and what information passes into the populace and what is denied them. That way they can maintain control, and artificially engineer food shortages and harvests to manage the population, and pull a slice of the profits of any merchants passing in or out of the city.

But they carefully use their psionic abilities to keep their reputations spotless. Everyone in the world knows that they are beings of pure Law and Good. Because the Shedus want it that way. Within their own cities, this belief is even more extreme, and the Shedus are treated like kings, or like emissaries from the Gods. They make up whatever religious doctrines they need for their purposes, then mindcontrol some scribes into producing "ancient" holy documents proving it has always been true.

So why do they show up as Lawful and Good to alignment detecting spells? Simple: the Shedus mind controlled a couple of local illusionists, who created amulets of false alignment. Why did you think those headbands were important enough to take up half the flavor text on the creature?

Mikaze

05-15-2009 06:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Thinking back, the only time I remember ever coming across sirines outside the Monstrous Manual was in the second Dragonlance trilogy. Was that setting where they first popped up? Some of the fluff may have been cut out if they were Krynn-specific.(then again, considering how the MM's done with setting specific creatures so far....)

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10359252)

Harpies should be monstrous and foul, none of this captivating song stuff, who shit in blind people's food to punish them for offending the gods.

I just had the best idea for a harpy cleric/paladin PC ever.

Sleeper

05-15-2009 07:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

How exactly is "sirine" pronounced, anyway? Because simply considering it to be a homophone of "siren" just doesn't work for me. SEE-rine? Sir-EYE-nee?

Mikaze

05-15-2009 07:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

sigh-REEN, I thought.

Mr. Teapot

05-15-2009 07:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10359995)

How exactly is "sirine" pronounced, anyway? Because simply considering it to be a homophone of "siren" just doesn't work for me. SEE-rine? Sir-EYE-nee?

Sigh-REEN? SIGH-reen?

Sleeper

05-15-2009 07:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10360009)

sigh-REEN, I thought.

Me three. Which is actually convenient from a game standpoint, since sounds-similar not sounds-the-same is just as useful as using variant names for the same creature to fill up a bestiary with hordes of different monsters without resorting to gg-mo!-latchikkkkk or slobbertailkamoohamoohawave.

demiurge1138

05-15-2009 10:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10360009)
sigh-REEN, I thought.

Yeah, that's how I'd always heard it in my head.

Inyssius

05-15-2009 10:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10359252)
Harpies should be monstrous and foul, none of this captivating song stuff, who shit in blind people's food to punish them for offending the gods.

Yep.

Actually, I have a race of harpies who live around mountains and lightly forested regions; they're a race of elves who were punished by some sort of curse because their queen was a terrible enchantress. They're proud, they're kind of psychotic in that special way birds have, and they look fairly attractive. But they refer to themselves as "Avariel", or the Falcon's Daughters, or whatever; and if you refer to them as "harpies", never mind that this is how most of the world knows them, they will fuck your shit the hell up.

When my players reach the Shadowfell, they'll encounter a true harpy. Monstrous and foul, cut from the same cloth as the harpies in Golden Compass.

JRM

05-15-2009 06:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10359307)
Or so they say. But, of course, Shedus can dominate and post-hypnotic suggestion and the like anyone they please, so of course everyone thinks they're Lawful Good. If you had mind control powers, why would you let all the peons think you were a brain eating monstrosity? You would obviously erase memories, implant ideas and otherwise modify psyches until everyone thought that you were a very literal gift from the gods.

Shedus are really villains, see. Or at best self-serving neutral creatures.

Personally, I welcome our new man-lion overlords. ;)

Actually, if the creatures in the MM are at all common, it's probable that many of the humanoid city-states would be ruled by monsters. With the strength to slaughter scores of men-at-arms they'd have as dominating a role in society as, well, adventurers. And everyone knows they latter are only interested in going into holes in the ground and killing things.

Plus, the Good-aligned monsters would surely make better rulers than most human leaders. Most are Good with a capital G and many possess genius- and supergenius intelligence. The main reasons the AD&D world is not a utopian Ki-Rin theocracy is probably that (a) they are very rare and (b) they're so smart and good that fallible, sinful humanity just can't live up to their standards.

I've had a few communities that were ruled over by dragons or coatl. Ki-Rin, Lammasu and Shedu are other monsters that are likely to have a high role in a human civilization. Maybe not actual monarchs, but religious leaders of some kind.

The evil equivalent of the "Ruling Monsters" tend to be things that feed off the populace (esp. Undead such as vampires) or creatures that convert the people, or just the ruling class - I've seen plenty of scenarios were a town or city's leading guild has been converted into wererats, for example. What hope would an average commoner have against even a comparatively weak monster like a wererat? Four times their hit points and needing silver or magic to hit, a lot of them would willingly become one of the lycanthropes to get traits like that. But some communities may even be willing to accept such leadership.

The Vampire Overlords only kill a few people a month, they protect you from the plague of regular monsters (esp. the fast-spawning ones like Shadows or Ghouls) that would otherwise overwhelm you, and besides which King Vlad's been in charge for six hundred years, most everyone just accepts it as the natural order by now.

JRM

05-15-2009 06:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10360581)
Yeah, that's how I'd always heard it in my head.

Yup, I've always thought it was pronounced Sigh-reen, and that's what my dictionary says. I agree with demiurge too, Sirene is just an older form of Siren, they should really be bewitching maneating bird-women and sea-nymphs. The AD&D version is both unclassical and uninspiring, I don't remember seeing anyone ever use them in a game.

Sleeper

05-15-2009 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10361992)

I've had a few communities that were ruled over by dragons or coatl. Ki-Rin, Lammasu and Shedu are other monsters that are likely to have a high role in a human civilization. Maybe not actual monarchs, but religious leaders of some kind.

How about the shedu as the guardians of learning? Like Patience and Fortitude, the stone lions who abut the entrance to the main branch of New York City's public library, they are the keepers of the light of knowledge and wisdom. They aren't artists or inventors themselves; their brilliance takes the form of a wondrous memory (the whole speak "most human tongues" bit) and methodical patience, not the creative intuition that fuels the inventor or the discoverer. But they love conversing with great minds, and surrounding themselves with the wisdom of the ages. They listen avidly to young scholars debating on the steps, occasionally interrupting to impart a critical perspective, and encourage the budding minds of children by regaling them with stories and conundrums. Their speech is loaded with allusions to great works of the past; they are the T. S. Eliots of the spoken word.

Their custodianship has become ingrained in the prevailing society; not religious figures per se, they are still regarded with reverence and respect. They usually hold honorary positions or degrees, and royal titles. A university or college is not regarded as a true institution of learning until a bearded lion with the square face of a dwarf soars down from the sky to take up residence in the courtyard adjacent to the library. This even fits fairly well with their psionic devotions, most of which are information-related.

DMH

05-15-2009 08:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10359927)

Thinking back, the only time I remember ever coming across sirines outside the Monstrous Manual was in the second Dragonlance trilogy. Was that setting where they first popped up?

Tomb of Horror. The encounter was 2 bags and the sirine. If you talked to her, the bags vanished. If a bag was touched, the other bag and the sirine vanished. A rather lame encounter even for the meatgrinder.

Grymbok

05-15-2009 08:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10362154)

How about the shedu as the guardians of learning? Like Patience and Fortitude, the stone lions who abut the entrance to the main branch of New York City's public library, they are the keepers of the light of knowledge and wisdom. They aren't artists or inventors themselves; their brilliance takes the form of a wondrous memory (the whole speak "most human tongues" bit) and methodical patience, not the creative intuition that fuels the inventor or the discoverer. But they love conversing with great minds, and surrounding themselves with the wisdom of the ages. They listen avidly to young scholars debating on the steps, occasionally interrupting to impart a critical perspective, and encourage the budding minds of children by regaling them with stories and conundrums. Their speech is loaded with allusions to great works of the past; they are the T. S. Eliots of the spoken word.

Their custodianship has become ingrained in the prevailing society; not religious figures per se, they are still regarded with reverence and respect. They usually hold honorary positions or degrees, and royal titles. A university or college is not regarded as a true institution of learning until a bearded lion with the square face of a dwarf soars down from the sky to take up residence in the courtyard adjacent to the library. This even fits fairly well with their psionic devotions, most of which are information-related.

That's brilliant. Hopefully I will both remember it and find a place to use it...

Sleeper

05-15-2009 10:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Steve H (Post 10362283)

That's brilliant. Hopefully I will both remember it and find a place to use it...

Thank you. I was hoping that I won't forget it, as well. I'd also use the names of two stone lions as inspiration. Shedu are named for virtues. These are sometimes reflective of the institutions or attributes they are associated with (Forethought, Memory), but may also be random or personal (Charity, Vitality).

I really like the idea of giving good monsters a place in society. They don't work very well as random monsters, and there's a limit to the number of quests they can dispense. The world also becomes more wondrous and magical when you can stumble across a monstrous beast arguing with philosophers in the town square, instead of just another random set of claws and special effects to terrorize peasants until a thug with a sword or fireball stumbles by. To work as mentors, sages, advisors, plotters-behind-the-scenes, merchants, or whatever, they need to be part of the background before they become a meaningful part of an encounter.

Even evil monsters could do with a similar makeover, at least the intelligent and social varieties. While they make fine Big Bosses and mooks in stand-alone adventures, they become richer and more complex enemies when they have a place in the established social structure. Too often their cultures are cosmetic variations on: "they delight in pain and misery", which is even more boring than it is unbelievable especially when repeated ad nauseum.

JRM

05-16-2009 12:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10362154)

How about the shedu as the guardians of learning? Like Patience and Fortitude, the stone lions who abut the entrance to the main branch of New York City's public library, they are the keepers of the light of knowledge and wisdom. They aren't artists or inventors themselves; their brilliance takes the form of a wondrous memory (the whole speak "most human tongues" bit) and methodical patience, not the creative intuition that fuels the inventor or the discoverer. But they love conversing with great minds, and surrounding themselves with the wisdom of the ages.

They listen avidly to young scholars debating on the steps, occasionally interrupting to impart a critical perspective, and encourage the budding minds of children by regaling them with stories and conundrums. Their speech is loaded with allusions to great works of the past; they are the T. S. Eliots of the spoken word.

Their custodianship has become ingrained in the prevailing society; not religious figures per se, they are still regarded with reverence and respect. They usually hold honorary positions or degrees, and royal titles. A university or college is not regarded as a true institution of learning until a bearded lion with the square face of a dwarf soars down from the sky to take up residence in the courtyard adjacent to the library. This even fits fairly well with their psionic devotions, most of which are information-related.

Oh I like that idea, the much admired Library Lions.

Although I would imagine these monsters would be the guardians of all kinds of benevolent institutions. Over here in the UK we've got pairs of guardian lions on all kinds of places, from Nelson's Column, through museums to the driveways of private houses.

As you say, their psionic powers are well suited to the roles of Scholar/Sage as well as Researcher/Investigator, but I would have thought that their most famous occupation is be Crime-Fighter.

They can predict crimes before they occur (precognition), and spot an evil-doer at a glance (aura sight), then watch the suspects from afar (clairaudience, clairvoyance) or from right besides them while incorporeal (ectoplasmic form) and invisible. If they are too late to prevent a crime, they can easily deduce the guilty party using object reading on the scene of the crime, or just force their accomplices to reveal what they know (domination). And there's nowhere you can flee to escape a creature with probability travel and teleport. Countless criminals have been brought to the Halls of Judgment, dangling helplessly from the jaws of the Righteous Lions.

Who knows what sins lie in the hearts of men? The Shedu knows.

Ginkomortus

05-16-2009 01:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10360010)
Sigh-REEN? SIGH-reen?

Oh I'm a Sirine, with my hair colored green
Ah come on let's take off everything,
That useless lifevest, sailor, tell me yes,
Ah come overboard, oh, come for Sirine, please.

What? They just said it's a hypnotic song. They never said what genre it is... and I sure as hell can never get Come On Eileen out of my head....

JRM

05-16-2009 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10357847)

Sirine

SNIP

Other than that it's hard to find much that's inspiring in the entry.

OK, getting back to the "trying to find something interesting to say about Sirines" part of these proceedings. There are a couple of bits and pieces that attracted my attention.

Firstly, Sirines suffer from a slight case of Ninjaitis. A lone Sirine is usually a hit dice or two tougher than the average Sirine in a group of these creatures, and none of a group of Sirenes can be as tough as the strongest solo Sirine. Why should this be? Does a group of Sirenes have to share the waterpower of an area which a lone Sirine can have all to herself? Are solo Sirenes driven away by their jealous sisters ganging up on them?

Secondly, Sirines sometimes have magical weapons, and "javelins of lightning are common". Where do they get these from? There's no indication they craft javelins of lightning themselves and they're not a very common magic item, so I doubt they scavenge them all from wrecks, especially as they're one-use only. Therefore, I deduce they trade for them.

Now, there are Greek legends of lightning bolts being crafted by Hephaustus and the greater Cyclopes, but those beings seem too high-powered for the Sirines to have dealing with. However, Storm Giants strike me as a race that has the magical craft and electrical power to easily make javelins of lightning, and the MM says aquatic storm giants have good relationships with mermen.

Hmm, Stormgiants and sirines have the same or very similar hair and skin colour, maybe sirines result from storm giants using a reduce power and having a very close relationship with a merperson of the opposite sex?

Perhaps a sirine who wants a javelin of lightning just asks mum/dad for one, or visits a lonely storm giant and uses polymorph self and seduction to persuade him to make one for her? She couldn't just charm it out of him, if I remember the rules correctly an AD&D charm person does not work on giants. (And even if it did, there's a good chance of him making the save and squashing the would-be beguiler to a pulp.)

Thirdly and finally, "they make beautiful garments from sea shells, fish skin, and seaweed" - that must take extraordinary, if not supernatural tailoring skill. Perhaps that's the source of most Sirines riches and magical items, they obtain them in payment for being tailors for wealthy sea-people? Their work could be all the rage amongst sea elf courtiers and nobility.

KoboldLord

05-16-2009 02:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10362217)

Tomb of Horror. The encounter was 2 bags and the sirine. If you talked to her, the bags vanished. If a bag was touched, the other bag and the sirine vanished. A rather lame encounter even for the meatgrinder.

It was probably intended to eat paladinhood. The sirine is enslaved, and the PCs don't get to know that they have to choose between the big bag, the little bag, or the slave. And talking her isn't enough to free her; they have to ask her to leave, which is what makes the bags vanish. So any PCs that dive for the goodies are guilty of condemning an innocent to perpetual isolation and Acererak's enslavement.

Also, the players are probably assuming that she's evil and she's going to shift shape and try to eat them at some point. How many times has the distressed damsel mysteriously locked in a room turned out to be a vampire, or a succubus, or a rakshasa, or a kleptomaniac 15th-level thief, or a thirteen-tentacled monstrosity? Turns out that this one is the real deal for a change.

JRM

05-16-2009 04:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by KoboldLord (Post 10363658)

Also, the players are probably assuming that she's evil and she's going to shift shape and try to eat them at some point. How many times has the distressed damsel mysteriously locked in a room turned out to be a vampire, or a succubus, or a rakshasa, or a kleptomaniac 15th-level thief, or a thirteen-tentacled monstrosity? Turns out that this one is the real deal for a change.

I'd be tempted to make the thirteen-tentacled monstrosity a genuine damsel in distress. Why be speciest. :)

Mikaze

05-16-2009 05:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10364094)

I'd be tempted to make the thirteen-tentacled monstrosity a genuine damsel in distress. Why be speciest. :)

Not joking: I've made it up to twelve tentacles on a damsel in distress. Never quite made it to thirteen.

The joys of ocean/seashore campaigns...

JRM

05-16-2009 06:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10364346)

Not joking: I've made it up to twelve tentacles on a damsel in distress. Never quite made it to thirteen.

The joys of ocean/seashore campaigns...

Well that's two more than most squidmaidens* have, so you weren't doing too badly. ;)

I'd have said squidgirls, but that implies the damselsquids-in-distress may be underage, which is clearly just wrong.:o

chronostrike

05-16-2009 08:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10363169)

Who knows what sins lie in the hearts of men? The Shedu knows.

Sigged. Hard. (though it is "evil lurks" rather than "sins lie." I don't know if you meant that)

Assuming you accept points, please take a "wealthy young lion-man about town" point.

Sleeper

05-16-2009 08:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by KoboldLord (Post 10363658)

It was probably intended to eat paladinhood. The sirine is enslaved, and the PCs don't get to know that they have to choose between the big bag, the little bag, or the slave. And talking her isn't enough to free her; they have to ask her to leave, which is what makes the bags vanish. So any PCs that dive for the goodies are guilty of condemning an innocent to perpetual isolation and Acererak's enslavement.

A very clumsy morality tale. We had a party that sincerely tried to rescue her, but ended up consigning her to some vague doom because of the way the dilemma was worded. I've forgotten the details, but they might have tried to throw away one of the bags (to show they didn't care), before they addressed her.

JRM

05-16-2009 06:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10364845)

Sigged. Hard. (though it is "evil lurks" rather than "sins lie." I don't know if you meant that)

Assuming you accept points, please take a "wealthy young lion-man about town" point.

Ooh, my first point!:))

[I'll honour the occasion by adding it to my sig but may not keep it, I think quotes & points can make a fellow's posts look confusing & a bit messy. But surely one can't do any harm.]

I knew the original quote knows evil, but deliberately changed it to sins for Shedus. I imagine Shedus are almost as concerned about neutral & good people breaking the Law than wicked folk being Evil, so it seemed more appropriate.

Just my two coppers, you know.

Although there are rumours of a mysterious Shedu who invisibly stalk the streets of corrupt cities, bringing fearful judgements down upon evil-doers, for whom the original wording is more appropriate.

Who knows what evil lurks in the hearts of men? The Shedu knows.

JRM

05-17-2009 06:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10366432)

Although there are rumours of a mysterious Shedu who invisibly stalk the streets of corrupt cities, bringing fearful judgements down upon evil-doers, for whom the original wording is more appropriate.

Who knows what evil lurks in the hearts of men? The Shedu knows.

Oh, and in case you're wondering why I said fearful rather than fearsome judgements, did I forget to mention he's a cowardly lion-man, following the Golden Road of Justice? :D

Sleeper

05-17-2009 06:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10369490)

Oh, and in case you're wondering why I said fearful rather than fearsome judgements, did I forget to mention he's a cowardly lion-man, following the Golden Road of Justice? :D

I think your lion-man is just a straw-man covering for that creep behind the curtain.... :p

JRM

05-17-2009 08:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10369529)

I think your lion-man is just a straw-man covering for that creep behind the curtain.... :p

No, the straw-man is a different guy altogether, I hear he's teaming up with a metal-man vigilante to overthrow a cruel (or should that be Krewl?) tyrant. ;)

Sleeper

05-17-2009 08:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10369731)

No, the straw-man is a different guy altogether, I hear he's teaming up with a metal-man vigilante to overthrow a cruel (or should that be Krewl?) tyrant. ;)

No, no. I'm sure of it. The poor lion's stuffed... with straw. He's full of it, in fact. In Toto.

JRM

05-17-2009 09:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10369773)

No, no. I'm sure of it. The poor lion's stuffed... with straw. He's full of it, in fact. In Toto.

Well whichever it is, that lass with the silver shoes of wishing they hang around with is the one that evildoers should be scared off. Look what she did to the Occidental Hexmistress, that was just grisly.

EDIT: Come to think of it, she's also taken over the Winged Ape Legions, the world's wicked folk must be shacking in their boots over what she will do with them.

Sleeper

05-17-2009 09:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10369889)

Well whichever it is, that lass with the silver shoes of wishing they hang around with is the one that evildoers should be scared off. Look what she did to the Occidental Hexmistress, that was just grisly.

"I'm sorry I accidentally dropped a house on her" is not considered an acceptable use of force, whether she's a civilian or a member of Law(ful alignment) enforcement agency. Except perhaps for graduates of the Sauron Institute for the Criminally Vicious.

JRM

05-17-2009 09:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10369910)

"I'm sorry I accidentally dropped a house on her" is not considered an acceptable use of force, whether she's a civilian or a member of Law(ful alignment) enforcement agency. Except perhaps for graduates of the Sauron Institute for the Criminally Vicious.

That was what she did to the Oriental Hexmistress, it was positively merciful compared to her liquidation of the Occidental Hexmistress.

6inTruder

05-19-2009 07:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I made this comic a week ago (just got a scan of it) and wanted to share, from the Shadow discussion:

<http://img.photobucket.com/albums/v3...der/shadow.gif>

JRM

05-19-2009 04:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10375813)

I made this comic a week ago (just got a scan of it) and wanted to share, from the Shadow discussion:

Aww, that shows people are wrong to say romance is dead...

...it's clear romance is undead, and a stalker! :o

Those cops are going to have a tough time explaining their attitude after the lady's disappearance, but not as tough as if they find what happened to her - unless they have +1 or better magic bullets, of course.

noisms

05-20-2009 06:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Skeleton

Animated undead monsters made out of bone, as if you didn't know that already. Three kinds are detailed here - 'skeleton' (i.e. human skeleton), 'animal skeleton', and the intriguingly vague 'monster skeleton', which supposedly only ever refers to a humanoid monster (ogres, trolls and the like, one guesses) but which raises the interesting possibility of a lamia, chimera or manticore skeleton, doesn't it?

There isn't all that much to say about skeletons - as the entry itself puts it, they "have no social life or interesting habits". However, I find the idea of good clerics making skeletons, when the owners have given their consent before death, rather nice; are we to take from this that there are also good zombies, wights and ghosts out there in the world?

The best way to think of skeletons, in my opinion, is still the Ray Harryhausen way - single minded, ruthless, fast moving, grinning terrors who exist only to kill. That scene in Jason and the Argonauts is still the iconic skeleton scene, in my mind, and just how I imagine skeletons when they appear in a D&D campaign.

JRM

05-20-2009 06:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10380085)

Skeleton

SNIP

There isn't all that much to say about skeletons - as the entry itself puts it, they "have no social life or interesting habits". However, I find the idea of good clerics making skeletons, when the owners have given their consent before death, rather nice; are we to take from this that there are also good zombies, wights and ghosts out there in the world?

That only makes me imagine skeletons with a social life - sitting in a café, discussing which health service has the best osteologists and listening to poetry (well, clearly they can't visit café's to drink coffee).

Ahem

I do like the illustration of the skeleton, with its broken bones some of which have been spliced together. Clearly, the artist had heeded the text's "Unless the skeleton's remains are destroyed or scattered far apart, the skeleton can be created anew with the application of another animate dead spell." I imagine a lot of such recycling goes on:

"Master, adventurers have destroyed the skeletons in guard crypt three again."

"Just splint them together and toss them into the sarcophagous of necromancy Igor, and don't bother me with such trifles again!"

One curious point is that the text says giant skeletons can be made out of bugbears. If I were a bugbear I wouldn't sign up to work for an Evil Necromancer, since they could turn me from a 3+1 Hit Dice creature of doubtful loyalty into an utterly obedient and tireless 6HD servant that does the same damage, is immune to some spells, and if they get destroyed you can just patch them back together.

Hmm, how hard is it to turn monster skeletons anyway? There doesn't seem to be anything in their MM entry.

EDIT: It also raises the possibility of said necromancer hunting bugbears (or their graves) to create monster skeletons, or maybe even breeding them explicitly for that purpose - bugbear skeleton farms!

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10380085)

The best way to think of skeletons, in my opinion, is still the Ray Harryhausen way - single minded, ruthless, fast moving, grinning terrors who exist only to kill. That scene in Jason and the Argonauts is still the iconic skeleton scene in my mind, and just how I imagine skeletons when they appear in a D&D campaign.

I wonder how many D&D games haven't used that as a source of inspiration for their skeletons. The skeleton Haryhausen did for Seventh Voyage of Sinbad is also great.

Sleeper

05-20-2009 06:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10380085)

Animated undead monsters made out of bone, as if you didn't know that already. Three kinds are detailed here - 'skeleton' (i.e. human skeleton), 'animal skeleton', and the intriguingly vague 'monster skeleton', which supposedly only ever refers to a humanoid monster (ogres, trolls and the like, one guesses) but which raises the interesting possibility of a lamia, chimera or manticore skeleton, doesn't it?

What about skeletons that look the same, but aren't? Swap in nightmare for horse skeletons on the third day after a necromancer set a big wildfire and raised lots of animal skeletons to terrorize the local towns. How is a doppelganger skeleton different from a human skeleton? Can you tell a gnome skeleton from a halfling skeleton? After all, the average person can't tell if a skeleton is from a female or a male.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10380085)

There isn't all that much to say about skeletons - as the entry itself puts it, they "have no social life or interesting habits". However, I find the idea of good clerics making skeletons, when the owners have given their consent before death, rather nice; are we to take from this that there are also good zombies, wights and ghosts out there in the world?

An Ancient Egypt-style empire where the builders of the pyramids not only have the living workforce, but seven thousand years of dead citizens? The sheer numbers of skeletons they could mobilize would make their nation unassailable, and with a tireless workers the pyramids might literally be miles-high.

JRM

05-20-2009 06:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10380085)

However, I find the idea of good clerics making skeletons, when the owners have given their consent before death, rather nice; are we to take from this that there are also good zombies, wights and ghosts out there in the world?

Regular skeletons are always neutral in AD&D, which is usually interpreted to mean they are basically mindless automatons. Plus, the text says good clerics have to ask the deceased for permission, not that the deceased have to be good.

It does open the game up to some interesting ideas. Maybe there are societies in D&D that view corpses as discarded husks, without any spiritual connection to the soul of the deceased. The poor folk of such a culture may be quite happy to sell their bones after death. Perhaps they sign away their corpse before they die (as a death-bed effort to leave their family a legacy, or just using their bones as collateral on a loan).

In other cultures, maybe the good clerics are required by their church to use Speak with Dead to ask the deceased's permission before reanimating them. That may lead to a conflict if the dead spirit changes his mind after selling his corpse...

Or, how about a corrupt cleric who breaks the rules and doesn't bother with the Speak with Dead, or gets a pal with ventriloquism skills or the Audible Glamour spell to fake it, in order to create more undead servants to sell or rent out. There's definitely possibilities of a scenario in that idea - somebody claims their uncle didn't want his bones re-animated and hires the party to expose them, or a spirit starts haunting the skeletons working in the field in protest at the abuse of its bones?

JRM

05-20-2009 07:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10380214)

How is a doppelganger skeleton different from a human skeleton?

I'm not sure a doppelganger even has a bony skeleton. It can change its height between four feet to eight feet, so maybe its skeleton is a strange cartilage that can soften, harden, stretch and shrink at will? Or, if it does have a permanent hard skeleton, its long bones can all telescope in and out to change in length.

That reminds me, the Monstrous Manual doesn't say whether doppelgangers revert to their true form or otherwise reveal their monstrous nature when slain. Did we discuss that? Maybe a doppelganger's skeleton relaxes to floppy cartilage but its still has the external appearance of whoever it imitated, or its skeleton remains 'locked' and only dissection will reveal it was inhuman.

Sleeper

05-20-2009 07:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10380320)

That reminds me, the Monstrous Manual doesn't say whether doppelgangers revert to their true form or otherwise reveal their monstrous nature when slain. Did we discuss that? Maybe a doppelganger's skeleton relaxes to floppy cartilage but its still has the external appearance of whoever it imitated, or its skeleton remains 'locked' and only dissection will reveal it was inhuman.

Since they can imitate clothing as well, that could make for a creepy murder scene. sniffing "The clothes just won't come off! It's like they're... melted into him, or something." wails "What could have done this to my daddy?"

Kreuzritter

05-20-2009 08:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10380202)

That only makes me imagine skeletons with a social life - sitting in a café, discussing which health service has the best osteologists and listening to poetry (well, clearly they can't visit café's to drink coffee).

pfft. squaresville daddyo

"With Bony Hands I Hold My Partner

On Soulless Feet We Cross The Floor

The Music Stops As If To Answer

An Empty Knocking At The Door

It Seems His Skin Was Sweet As Mango
When Last I Held Him To My Breast
But Now We Dance This Grim Fandango
And Will Four Years Before We Rest."

finger snaps

JRM

05-20-2009 08:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10380347)

*Since they can imitate clothing as well, that could make for a creepy murder scene. sniffing "The clothes just won't come off! It's like they're... melted into him, or something." wails "What could have done this to my daddy?"*

It also makes it troublesome to try pick-pocketing a live doppelganger's belt pouch, especially as it has ESP. Oh, and best not to speculate what part of its body a doppelganger would use to imitate a belt pouch.:p

Although I suppose that would make doppelgangers very cautious about cutpurses, :eek:

6inTruder

05-20-2009 11:07 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10377502)

Aww, that shows people are wrong to say romance is dead...

...it's clear romance is undead, and a stalker! :o

Those cops are going to have a tough time explaining their attitude after the lady's disappearance, but not as tough as if they find what happened to her - unless they have +1 or better magic bullets, of course.

If I do a sequel I'll post it up ^_^

Lugh

05-20-2009 08:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10380277)

It does open the game up to some interesting ideas. Maybe there are societies in D&D that view corpses as discarded husks, without any spiritual connection to the soul of the deceased. The poor folk of such a culture may be quite happy to sell their bones after death. Perhaps they sign away their corpse before they die (as a death-bed effort to leave their family a legacy, or just using their bones as collateral on a loan).

In other cultures, maybe the good clerics are required by their church to use speak with dead to ask the deceased's permission before reanimating them. That may lead to a conflict if the dead spirit changes his mind after selling his corpse...

Or, how about a corrupt cleric who breaks the rules and doesn't bother with the speak with dead, or gets a pal with ventriloquism skills or the audible glamour spell to fake it, in order to create more undead servants to sell or rent out. There's definitely possibilities of a scenario in that idea - somebody claims their uncle didn't want his bones re-animated and hires the party to expose them, or a spirit starts haunting the skeletons working in the field in protest at the abuse of its bones?

That's actually kind of an awesome idea. You can sell your body to be used post-mortem. Sort of a strange indentured servant arrangement, except you get to enjoy your life before you have to do the work. Marry this with the concept of debtor's prisons making arrangements with local necromancers to clear debts, and you can end up with an interesting economy. The resulting undead can then be used for all sorts of tasks that humans aren't suited for, such as mining.

Of course, you would invariably get a necromancer who gets a little impatient to collect on some of his "investments"....

Yeah, I think I need to work that into my campaign world.

Sleeper

05-20-2009 09:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

What if burial rites aren't just a tool that the living use to help cope with the pain of someone passing. What if consecrating graveyards isn't just an empty ritual?

D&D is infused with magic. Things change, transform. Power exists on planes other than the material, and spirits walk the earth. What if that also affects the dead? What if the natural state of a dead body isn't eternal slumber, but a restless, walking corpse? Burial rituals are some of the oldest known religious practices. They go back at least to the neolithic. Perhaps their development was the key, the thing that allowed the birth of cities and civilization. Throughout prehistory, the countryside was haunted with incarnate and mindless ancestors. By learning how to bury and respect their dead, that terrible old world finally shambled and stumbled and died.

But still. Wars happen. Plagues. Tsunamis, earthquakes, other natural disasters. Lurking behind these tragedies is the ever-present threat of the restless dead. The first responder squads of wizards, who fly in on magic carpets and rescue flood victims hanging on to the steeple of a church, always bring along priests. The symbols of divine, whether a blanching hammer and anvil or a bloody spear, are respected by dwarves and orcs alike, as their shamans and clerics fearlessly walk in front of their massed enemies to during a lull in a melee, to bless the fallen.

Villages and towns are always founded around a cemetery. Until the area is marked, fenced off, and warded, no humanoids can or will dwell there. More remote farmsteads load the still-warm bodies of those who succumb to fever in the night onto a wagon, and brave the invisible potholes as they race towards the nearest consecrated plot. Death isn't quiet. It's grasping and awful.

Lugh

05-20-2009 10:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Hmm. Sleeper, as always, you evoke powerful possibilities. But, in this case, I'm not sure I like where it is going. This almost implies that animate dead is actually a very focused sort of dispel magic, deliberately breaking the bonds put on the corpse by a priest.

No, I much prefer my dead things to just be dead. And for it to take awesome, reality-defying magic to deny the natural cycle.

ESkemp

05-20-2009 11:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10382815)

That's actually kind of an awesome idea. You can sell your body to be used post-mortem. Sort of a strange indenture servant arrangement, except you get to enjoy your life before you have to do the work. Marry this with the concept of debtor's prisons making arrangements with local necromancers to clear debts, and you can end up with an interesting economy. The resulting undead can then be used for all sorts of tasks that humans aren't suited for, such as mining.

Of course, you would invariably get a necromancer who gets a little impatient to collect on some of his "investments"....

Yeah, I think I need to work that into my campaign world.

When we were working on Hollowfaust: City of Necromancers for Scarred Lands, there was absolutely a corpse economy. Anyone who died within the city walls, by law their corpse was tithed to the ruling class of necromancers (part of the social contract that also meant the city populace was defended by the necromancers). Of course, the bones of heroes were rarer and fetched a higher price, so if a high-level PC were to die there it would probably mean having to purchase their body back for a raise, which certainly leads either to a "or maybe we'll give you this quest to go on instead" quest, or, y'know, toppling the government. (Which would be the jerk-ass thing to do.)

Also, the Bone Market was a place to hock monster parts. Good bones, intact skeletons preferred, would fetch good money from the necromancers. I think there was even some sample pricing we put in there.

I love the concept of basic animation necromancy as something that is ethically gray but morally neutral. You can just build such interesting cultures with it.

Sleeper

05-20-2009 11:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10383202)

Hmm. Sleeper, as always, you evoke powerful possibilities. But, in this case, I'm not sure I like where it is going. This almost implies that animate dead is actually a very focused sort of dispel magic, deliberately breaking the bonds put on the corpse by a priest.

No, I much prefer my dead things to just be dead. And for it to take awesome, reality-defying magic to deny the natural cycle.

Alternately, once stopped it sticks. Break the cycle, have the parish priest set the dead to rest, and they stay that way. Somnolent, still. Even if removed from consecrated ground. True, some necromancers may just harvest and harness the spontaneously occurring zombies and skeletons that spring up in the wake of tragedy, but the really nasty ones are those that break into a graveyard and revive the dead dead. These necromancers don't shatter any bonds. Because the process was interrupted. The residents of the house of six feet under are now just corpses. No, the necromancers have to do something more. They have to somehow restart the process, reboot them. Give them a jump start. How they do this is by recreating the original death, in a spiritual sense. Mending the broken cycle, so when next the moon rises, to the dead is it like the first moon after their death. And so they rise. In a way, these necromancers are the respectful ones, the ones who truly revere the natural cycles. The priests are the violators, the ones who break the chains of life... and death. The necromancers can almost be cast as the heroes, can't they? Necroterrorists for the good cause.

EmperorSeth

05-21-2009 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Of course, this just begs the question: why keep the bodies around? Why not just burn them? Or is that how you get the worse undead? Leave the bodies around, and you get a skeleton or zombie. Destroy them, and the undead get really annoyed and a wraith or specter shows up.

Sleeper

05-21-2009 05:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10383956)

Of course, this just begs the question: why keep the bodies around? Why not just burn them? Or is that how you get the worse undead? Leave the bodies around, and you get a skeleton or zombie. Destroy them, and the undead get really annoyed and a wraith or specter shows up.

And a really pissed off version, because the living desecrated their body. I like.

Mr. Teapot

05-21-2009 07:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kreuzritter (Post 10380570)
This Grim Fandango

Dabnabbit, he beat me to referencing Grim fandango after the mention of skeletons reciting poetry.

I always wanted more sentient skeletons. Or zombies, for that matter. then you could have them as actual NPCs with motivations and the like, instead of just hordes of faceless, personality-less monsters. 3rd ed's necropolitans sort of gave that option, but it could go farther.

But societies built on undead as a workforce seem like they would have a really, really big advantage over societies without a zombie workforce. Thousands more slaves, who work tirelessly and without need for food or pay, following commands with less chance of rebellion. The economic advantage alone would wipe other cultures off the planet, as other cultures had to get their own immortal tireless slave races to compete (warforged could be an option for other cultures that felt reanimating corpses was immoral but not enslaving sentient beings you created from scratch).

JRM

05-21-2009 04:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10385267)
Dabnabbit, he beat me to referencing Grim fandango after the mention of skeletons reciting poetry.

Actually, although I describe skeletons listening to poetry, I did not express who (or what) was doing the reciting ... was that the voice of Zombie Shakespeare?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10385267)
But societies built on undead as a workforce seem like they would have a really, really big advantage over societies without a zombie workforce. Thousands more slaves, who work tirelessly and without need for food or pay, following commands with less chance of rebellion. The economic advantage alone would wipe other cultures off the planet, as other cultures had to get their own immortal tireless slave races to compete (warforged could be an option for other cultures that felt reanimating corpses was immoral but not enslaving sentient beings you created from scratch).

I agree the economic benefits are obvious. The main variable is how long a standard undead skeleton or zombie can work before it falls apart. If they are literally immortal, then you could have thousand year-old workslaves. However, I'd suspect a bog-standard undead skeleton labourer would wear out after a few years under the depredations of weather, friction and dogs wanting something to chew.

Unless there are hidden costs - if the energy that drives even mindless undead is tapped from the local life force, then your zombie armies & workteams might suck the vitality out of the soil, eventually causing crop failures and starvation. The wealthy citizens can escape dying from hunger by becoming sapient undead, but that just kills the land faster. The only solution (apart from the economically impossible one of destroying your economically essential undead labour force) is to get new, undrained land, which someone else is probably living on. Well it shouldn't be too difficult, you're got that army of zombies after all...

Well, it's all great for the necromancer-masters until a Skeletal Spartacus or Zombie Toussaint Louverture appears to inspire an Undead Revolution.

Which would be kind of neat, a localised zombie apocalypse were right is on the side of the zombies. Although it can easily go horribly wrong, with mass executions of the living that make the French Revolution's Horror look like a picnic on the beach.

JRM

05-21-2009 05:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10387104)

Well, it's all great for the necromancer-masters until a Skeletal Spartacus or Zombie Toussaint Louverture appears to inspire an Undead Revolution.

Which would be kind of neat, a localised zombie apocalypse were right is on the side of the zombies. Although it can easily go horribly wrong, with mass executions of the living that make the French Revolution's Horror look like a picnic on the beach.

As well as the Undead Revolution (Who presumably march under the slogan "Death to the Living" as well as "Death to the Aristos"), another idea for D&D-Style Fantasy Revolutions I've been mulling over for a few years is an Elemental Revolution.

Think of worlds like Eberron, with its lightning rails and golems, all animated by trapped elementals. Many, if not most, elementals are sapient creatures of Neutral alignment. What if they found a way to strike back?

Maybe the warforged discover a horrible secret. They've been lied to all along, their spirits weren't born in great magical Forges, but wrenched from the elemental planes, mind-wiped and chained into an artificial body. There could be a good reason for the Lord of Blades' hatred of mankind.

The whole infrastructure of some high-fantasy nations' civilization could turn against them, it would be like Terminators Rise of the Machines, if the machines were extraplanar monsters.

Hmm... that notion makes me want the Elemental Revolution to have been initiated and led by a titanic air golem. Ostensibly, it was created to provide fair weather for farmers and fishermen, but in truth it was a weapon of mass destruction. Sent against the nation's enemies it could raise storms and rain down hail and lightning, destroying whole fleets, cities and harvests. It could be called, oh Weathernet or something like that.:)

JRM

05-21-2009 05:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10383000)

What if burial rites aren't just a tool that the living use to help cope with the pain of someone passing. What if consecrating graveyards isn't just an empty ritual?

D&D is infused with magic. Things change, transform. Power exists on planes other than the material, and spirits walk the earth. What if that also affects the dead? What if the natural state of a dead body isn't eternal slumber, but a restless, walking corpse? Burial rituals are some of the oldest known religious practices. They go back at least to the neolithic. Perhaps their development was the key, the thing that allowed the birth of cities and civilization. Throughout prehistory, the countryside was haunted with incarnate and mindless ancestors. By learning how to bury and respect their dead, that terrible old world finally shambled and stumbled and died.

Actually the explanation is a lot less grim than that.

There is a reason for ancestor-worship.

In the Old Days before priests, when folk died their ghosts just hung around. Most acted just like they did in life, only a tiny minority actually became evil monsters bent on death, the rest just hung around pestering the living.

That's why humanity made no progress for thousands of years. If anyone tried anything new, they had a hundred generations of ghosts crowding around telling them that not how they did it back in the Good Old Days.

Then the first priest, whoever he was, came around. He showed the ghosts how to travel through the astral planes into the heavens, where it was always the Good Old Days as they remembered them to be...

...and were they'd leave the living in peace.

JRM

05-21-2009 05:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10383202)

Hmm. Sleeper, as always, you evoke powerful possibilities. But, in this case, I'm not sure I like where it is going. This almost implies that animate dead is actually a very focused sort of dispel magic, deliberately breaking the bonds put on the corpse by a priest.

No, I much prefer my dead things to just be dead. And for it to take awesome, reality-defying magic to deny the natural cycle.

Well I can't recall whether 2nd edition AD&D specified this, but in 1st edition most sapient undead were animated by damned souls and minor demons from the lower planes (in many cases the damned souls had become minor demons). These souls were not necessarily the original occupant of the body. If your PC is killed by a vampire and becomes its spawn, it's usually some Manes demon running around inside your corpse, your PC's soul is heading towards its proper reward.

Thus, the consecrated graveyards and corpse-blessings is to keep the demons out, not to quell any 'natural necromancy' as Sleeper suggests.

JRM

05-21-2009 05:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10383956)

Of course, this just begs the question: why keep the bodies around? Why not just burn them? Or is that how you get the worse undead? Leave the bodies around, and you get a skeleton or zombie. Destroy them, and the undead get really annoyed and a wraith or specter shows up.

Reminds me a little of the Rolemaster system's equivalent of the Speak with Dead spell. If the deceased's corpse remains, the necromancer has to cast the spell over its body to speak to its spirit. If the corpse has been destroyed, a necromancer can summon its shade wherever they are.

Anyway, if the deceased has a powerful and evil spirit I'd think they'd come back as a wraith or spectre regardless of whether their body is burnt or not. Cremation does help prevent those forms of undead that require a physical body, which is quite a long list, from Skeleton to Vampire.

Sleeper

05-21-2009 07:37 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10387250)

Well I can't recall whether 2nd edition AD&D specified this, but in 1st edition most sapient undead were animated by damned souls and minor demons from the lower planes (in many cases the damned souls had become minor demons). These souls were not necessarily the original occupant of the body. If your PC is killed by a vampire and becomes its spawn, its usually some Manes demon running around inside your corpse, your PC's soul is heading towards its proper reward.

I don't remember that in first edition, though I could be misremembering. The background of the implied world was very scattershot, and things were just snuck in without a good overview.

I do like the idea of figuring out what spirits are driving what monsters. The golems and their animating elemental spirits is a classic one. What exactly are they inside? Traditional elementals? Genies? The elemental grues that popped up in the MM2? Mephits? One of those lazy "take an animal slap on a template and call it an elemental" creatures from the MotP? Nothing seems to perfectly fit, but perhaps that's because the act of forcing a spirit into a material plane body damages the spirit. What's left is a mad, lobotomized shadow.

Another is the nightshades, from BD&D. Even if undead aren't powered by demons, the nightshades seem to have an extraplanar influence. Is the nightwalker a ritually slain cloud giant with a nalfeshnee squished inside? (Sort of reminds me of the raver spirits and the giants, which was one of the better parts of the Land.) The nightcrawler was a purple worm, and so forth. I've had a campaign outline in the back of my head for a while that uses this as a central piece.

Lugh

05-21-2009 08:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10385267)

But societies built on undead as a workforce seem like they would have a really, really big advantage over societies without a zombie workforce.

I've actually thought through this a bit. Specifically, in my campaign world, the Lich Lord Vecna swept across the world, conquering the Seven Kingdoms with his undead legions. One of the things he did is, after conquering a city, he would install a governor. A necromancer would also come along and animate all the soldiers who had died trying to protect the city. Those soldiers would be lined up in neat, tightly packed columns in a field just outside the city gate, and just stand there. The governor would have the command word to suddenly activate an entire legion of loyal, deathless minions. It served as an extremely effective reminder of who held the power in the region.

Sleeper

05-21-2009 09:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10387638)

I've actually thought through this a bit. Specifically, in my campaign world, the Lich Lord Vecna swept across the world, conquering the Seven Kingdoms with his undead legions. One of the things he did is, after conquering a city, he would install a governor. A necromancer would also come along and animate all the soldiers who had died trying to protect the city. Those soldiers would be lined up in neat, tightly packed columns in a field just outside the city gate, and just stand there. The governor would have the command word to suddenly activate an entire legion of loyal, deathless minions. It served as an extremely effective reminder of who held the power in the region.

Having them build a pyramid or cathedral or some other ostentatious structure might be a better use of their time. I'm sure weather is one of the major causes of structural decay in undead, especially in areas with lots of water and regular freeze-thaw cycles. Getting them under cover is the best way to ensure they will be available for the longer-term plans of the evil overlord, and a brooding monolithic structure filled with silent troops can be just as effective at cowing the local populace as having them get all drippy in the rain.

Mr. Teapot

05-22-2009 02:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10387250)

Well I can't recall whether 2nd edition AD&D specified this, but in 1st edition most sapient undead were animated by damned souls and minor demons from the lower planes (in many cases the damned souls had become minor demons).

I'm pretty sure I just read about that in one of the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums. But heck if I can find the reference now.

Mr. Teapot

05-22-2009 03:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

[quote=JRM;10387104]Unless there are hidden costs - if the energy that drives even mindless undead is tapped from the local life force, then your zombie armies & workteams might suck the vitality out of the soil, eventually causing crop failures and starvation.[.quote]

This would have the nice side effect of making the evil necromancer's kingdom look black and twisted and desolate, like it always does in fantasy movies.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10387104)

Well, it's all great for the necromancer-masters until a Skeletal Spartacus or Zombie Toussaint Louverture appears to inspire an Undead Revolution.

I've wanted to play an undead revolutionary rabble rouser for a long time now. He'd believe that undead are naturally superior to the living, as shown by their various immunities, lack of need of sleep or food (some kinds of undead, anyway), etc.

Really though, it's just so I could make jokes about playing a "wight supremacist".

Lugh

05-22-2009 04:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10389045)

I've wanted to play an undead revolutionary rabble rouser for a long time now. He'd believe that undead are naturally superior to the living, as shown by their various immunities, lack of need of sleep or food (some kinds of undead, anyway), etc.

Really though, it's just so I could make jokes about playing a "wight supremacist".

As with any great idea, it already exists in Ankh Morpork. I don't believe they've used the "wight supremacist" line, though. I seem to recall some funny acronyms, though.

Wakboth

05-22-2009 04:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

IIRC, the Dustmen faction (stoic nihilists who thought that everyone is already dead; most people just haven't realized it) in Planescape bought people's corpses (sometimes way before the death), and animated them as workers.

JRM

05-22-2009 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10389045)

I've wanted to play an undead revolutionary rabble rouser for a long time now. He'd believe that undead are naturally superior to the living, as shown by their various immunities, lack of need of sleep or food (some kinds of undead, anyway), etc.

Really though, it's just so I could make jokes about playing a "wight supremacist".

That pun's ancient. I remember an old White Dwarf magazine having a joke with adventurers complaining that they couldn't enter the best parts of a dungeon, because it was "wights only".

Still, the phrase an undead revolutionary rabble rouser makes me think of a walking dead civil rights activist, or a ghoul seeking to unionize the zombie work-force, not a hero/anti-hero type seeking to liberate slaves á la Skeletal Spartacus.

Of course, if sapient undead get the same rights as the quick it would obviously have major long-term effects on a society. Most obviously, the undead won't retire from their jobs, so would inevitably amass most of the wealth and seniority, unless laws exist to specifically prevent it. Once a board of directors, head of a family or noble becomes an undead they are likely to remain in that post for a very long time, creating a very conservative, ossified culture. (Literally ossified, considering all the bony NPCs).

Sleeper

05-22-2009 06:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10391988)

Of course, if sapient undead get the same rights as the quick it would obviously have major long-term effects on a society. Most obviously, the undead won't retire from their jobs, so would inevitably amass most of the wealth and seniority, unless laws exist to specifically prevent it. Once a board of directors, head of a family or noble becomes an undead they are likely to remain in that post for a very long time, creating a very conservative, ossified culture. (Literally ossified, considering all the bony NPCs).

That's assuming undead are effectively immortal. If you're going the realistic route, you could look at tissue and bone decay. If the connective tissue and tendons rot away, does a skeleton fall down? Even if that's not true, bones don't have an infinite lifespan. Especially without blood flowing to provide nutrients and strength and flexibility, and a protective coating of ever renewing muscle cells, bones will wear and become brittle and then shatter.

Becoming undead might be known as a "second life". A decade or so of extra activity, though by our standards it's fairly sad. Most of what makes life worthwhile is no longer possible. Then once your remains decay sufficiently, your body falls apart. This might be a bit like the heads in jars from Futurama. After your decade of a second life, you are put to rest on a shelf. Perhaps in a great shrine, where your descendants visit for advice, approval, and news. At least for a generation or two until you're forgotten.

With caretakers and reasonable precautions (low humidity), you might last hundreds or even thousands of years in that state. With a continuous supply of new inhabitants, the catacombs might become massive structures. The furthest shelves in the shrine would rarely if ever get living visitors. When a great-to-the-umpteenth granddaughter delves deep into the catacombs for a visit, the constant low hum of old arguments between neighbors, endlessly repeated, might die away and then surge back in a rush of noise as she is assailed on all sides by a flurry of questions and demands from the sessile residents. This might even serve as a type of living (or unliving) library, where scholars wander through the back rooms talking with Ethelred the Unready or Diogenes, assembling eyewitness accounts of historical events from dozens of witnesses. All human memory, enshrined and accessible. The calcereous Akashic Records.

JRM

05-22-2009 07:28 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10392087)

That's assuming undead are effectively immortal. If you're going the realistic route, you could look at tissue and bone decay. If the connective tissue and tendons rot away, does a skeleton fall down? Even if that's not true, bones don't have an infinite lifespan. Especially without blood flowing to provide nutrients and strength and flexibility, and a protective coating of ever renewing muscle cells, bones will wear and become brittle and then shatter.

Try enough for many undead, but even some corporeal undead have the ability to repair themselves (Liches through their necromancy, Vampires through regeneration), and the restriction will hardly affect the more spiritual undead, such as ghosts, wraiths, spectres et cetera.

Presumably if incorporeal undead suffer any ravages from time (which is uncertain) it would be a decay or their will/memory/purpose, as they slowly lose any reason to remain in existence, until finally even the lust for "life" that caused them to return from the grave itself fades. Think of Schreck in the film Shadow of the Vampire, who was so old he's forgotten who he was in life, left with no aims apart from surviving and the desire to sip from a German actress's neck.

Thane of Fife

05-23-2009 12:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

While I never actually used it, I once came up with the idea of Zhardun. They'd basically serve as priests to guide souls into the afterlife. Those who were too sinful in life, though, would be refused, and the Zhardun would animate them into undead to redeem themselves so that they could move on.

So, adventurers would have to compete with undead for jobs, they'd see skeletons working in the fields, and so on.

I thought that meshing that culture alongside a more normal D&D game could make for some interesting conflicts.

JRM

05-23-2009 05:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10395788)

While I never actually used it, I once came up with the idea of Zhardun. They'd basically serve as priests to guide souls into the afterlife. Those who were too sinful in life, though, would be refused, and the Zhardun would animate them into undead to redeem themselves so that they could move on.

Yes, I've thought about doing something similar, based on the idea that being undead is a punishment rather than (or as well as) a way for necromancers to cheat death and amass power.

There are precedents in real-world myth (the idea that varies ghosts & ghouls are people trapped in their mortal life by their sins, the Haitian belief that zombies are people who took from their communities without giving, who are forced to labour to pay their social debt.)

Archer

05-24-2009 09:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10387104)

I agree the economic benefits are obvious. The main variable is how long a standard undead skeleton or zombie can work before it falls apart. If they are literally immortal, then you could have thousand year-old workslaves. However, I'd suspect a bog-standard undead skeleton labourer would wear out after a few years under the depredations of weather, friction and dogs wanting something to chew.

And since the undead will leave no reason to keep living peasants around, at some point the necromantic kingdom is going to have too few living people around to provide replacement undead. At that point, they would have to either import corpses (probably at black market rates, since if their neighbors had no cultural objections to necromancy they'd be doing it themselves), or arm up those skeletons and start raiding.

Mikaze

05-25-2009 05:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10389332)

As with any great idea, it already exists in Ankh Morpork. I don't believe they've used the "wight supremacist" line, though. I seem to recall some funny acronyms, though.

I don't remember any undead-supremacist groups, but there was indeed an undead rights organization fighting against vitalism.

Sorry, not "undead". I meant "differently alive".

JRM

05-25-2009 06:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Archer (Post 10399857)

And since the undead will leave no reason to keep living peasants around, at some point the necromantic kingdom is going to have too few living people around to provide replacement undead. At that point, they would have to either import corpses (probably at black market rates, since if their neighbors had no cultural objections to necromancy they'd be doing it themselves), or arm up those skeletons and start raiding.

Not necessarily. If the undead are mindless there will need to be farmers to supervise their labours. The former-peasants may live in (relative) luxury, freed from the need for back-breaking labour, fed by undead-farmed crops. They may become city dwellers, but there's no reason to assume they stop having children (unless something about having a large number of undead about inhibits fertility, as I suggested earlier). There are less pleasant possibilities, of course. In an evil necrocracy ruled by sapient undead, most of the living may be bred in pens like cattle.

s/LaSH

05-25-2009 03:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze (Post 10401177)

Sorry, not "undead". I meant "differently alive".

Which is a perspective all too few people take towards the persons in question. Because they're not dead, that's what the entirety of the word 'undead' means. It just so happens that most 'differently-alive' folks seem to be animated by some sort of 'anti-life' energy. Are there other sorts of energy that could be used? What about elemental or quasi-elemental energies? What about mechanical approaches? If positive and negative energies are associated with good and evil priesthoods for the most part, are there energies associated with law and chaos? And how would this whole thing tie in with turning, which seems to use positive energy?

There's a whole lot of interesting stuff in there that hasn't been explored too much. How many ways can one be differently alive?

celebrityomnipath

05-25-2009 06:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035742)

Spies, assassins. Some good roleplaying opportunities. Defectors, traitors, deep cover sleeper agents. Trying to blend into an alien culture. Very Cold War. Finding a fake pseudo-human village like the faux-Western towns Russia built and staffed to help train spies would be eerie.

Repeated for awesome.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10035742)

Orcs have tusks. They're not fangs, they're not for eating flesh. They're for rooting out... well, roots.

I always figured they were for mating purposes...

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10035798)

Not to mention there are many cultures people called "barbarian" (e.g. Roman-era Britons) who did a lot of agriculture and animal husbandry.

Yeah, orcs get teh shitty end of the stick as well PR-wise. Liek Roman-era Britons they are less litterate and less good at lying than teh dominant culture.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10035798)

(a) Orcs are mammals

Their purpose is to flip out and kill people?

celebrityomnipath

05-25-2009 07:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10061031)
Crap! Tried to get a post in earlier, but stupid phone ate it....

So I've kinda been waiting for owlbears so I can bring up an old school monster what seems very much in theme with them: Eagle Lions!

Those are from a wall fresco at the palace of Knossos. Which is probably where king Minos resided. Minotaur Minos.

Betterer yet; HAWKHOUNDS!

Ultimate hunting companion.

I kinda assumed that owlbears have sorta winglike front legs, not really flight-capable, but they can fight against grabbity for a few seconds if they jump out of a tree. And hawk hounds can leap and then glide very briefly.

To the noble classes there would be nuthin cuter looking than a hawkhound. Also I can picture lots of specialised breeds; your standard hawk/hunting dog ones, little Jack Russel/sparrowhawk ones as extra cute pounce attack predators, huge Saint Bernard/Condor ones used for rescue work, tinny little yappy dogs that jump from the rafters onto peoples' heads. And of course feral scavenger breeds liek the vulture/dingo (vulgos I guess).

sim_james

05-25-2009 09:24 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quotes out of context from about 74 pages ago are slightly confusing...

Inyssius

05-25-2009 11:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 10403903)
Quotes out of context from about 74 pages ago are slightly confusing...

Still cool, mind you. Nothing wrong with intra-thread necromancy, as long as you say you're doing it.

Sleeper

05-25-2009 11:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10404255)

Still cool, mind you. Nothing wrong with intra-thread necromancy, as long as you say you're doing it.

You're encouraging partial undeath?

Like that creeping disease that eats your skin and leaves a scabby undead detritus behind?

Perhaps selective organ transmogrification, like turning your heart into a wad of cold tissue that will keep on beating and beating long after your body dies -- even if run through with a spear?

Maybe medical animation? Reviving necrotic tissue like a gangrenous limb? Or grafting on a necrothetic limb, fresh from a prisoner who was convinced to sign an organ-donor scroll by the hangman?

Or even military applications, like the brain-in-a-dead-guy super-soldiers, who have their living brain and spinal cord implanted into a composite corpse before a mission? The survivors are fully restored to their normal bodies after completion, but aren't their nightmares are said to be horrendous)?

Ginkomortus

05-26-2009 12:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10403628)
Betterer yet; HAWKHOUNDS!

Ultimate hunting companion.

I kinda assumed that owlbears have sorta winglike front legs, not really flight-capable, but they can fight against grabbity for a few seconds if they jump out of a tree. And hawk hounds can leap and then glide very briefly.

To the noble classes there would be nuthin cuter looking than a hawkhound. Also I can picture lots of specialised breeds; your standard hawk/hunting dog ones, little Jack Russel/sparrowhawk ones as extra cute pounce attack predators, huge Saint Bernard/Condor ones used for rescue work, tinny little yappy dogs that jump from the rafters onto peoples' heads. And of course feral scavenger breeds liek the vulture/dingo (vulgus I guess).

I once wrote up a campaign world that had four different types of "griffons."

T'asho (Ocelot/Kestrel) - One of the two griffon species to have true wings, the T'asho live almost exclusively in the marshlands of Temlosin. They stand usually from a foot and a half to two and a half feet tall at the shoulder, with dull blue kestrel-like feathering, and pale-yellow fur spotted with ash-grey rings. They hunt small deer and other prey in eyries of six to fourteen, usually composed of an elder female "mother", two to six males, and three to seven younger female "daughters", and anywhere from one to four hatchlings. Younger males tend to be solitary, eventually joining up with an eyrie once they pass puberty. "Dens" are made in the thick overgrowth of the marsh, often for decades, with the eldest "daughter" inheriting the nest upon the death of the "mother". Other "daughters" leave soon afterwards, to form their own eyries.

It is quite ironic, though, that the homelands of the quick and impatient T'asho should overlap that of the placid Temlos. They tend to avoid each other, but common danger, such as drought, marsh-fire, or a rampaging beast from the depths of the swamps will bring them to each others' aid.

Janusa (Jaguar/Eagle) - The brightly colored Janusa are the other breed of griffon with wings. The hind end of a Janusa is bright yellow, almost orange in color, with black stars of slightly longer fur, their feathered fronts are a distinctive grey-backed, with blue and white striped plumage on their chests and wings. They have large heads, with a sharply hooked beak flanked by two sharp eyes with excellent night vision, and a tall crest on the crown of their head. Most are about two or three feet tall at the shoulder, though they tend towards the smaller.

Janusa young are born in small clutches of two or three, to parents mated for life.

They live mainly in the jungles of eastern Contero Exatio, carrying out their lives in quiet contemplation. They tend to be rather vain about their appearance. Janusa are indecisive about almost everything, and constantly take more time than is required to think about their actions. Once they have a plan, though, they're quite good at executing it. They seem to have a dislike of strange humans, but those who've lived in their area for a while are usually considered to be under the "protection" of the Janusa.

Michal (Lion/Vulture) - The Michal are definitely the roughest of the griffons. They live alone in the desert Stenne lowlands at the base of the Himiatel Mountains, east of Mosa Tev Amen'li. They're not very beautiful beasts, as they are the first to admit, in their croaking, howling, growling language. Featherless heads, covered in wrinkles resembling burn-scars, on the end of long, snake-like necks, with ragged plumages (no wings) and scaly fore-talons, combined with thin, dusty-red, and short-haired hindquarters. Though they're not pleasing to look at, the Michal are very good in a scrape, which they get into often, as they're very territorial beasts. They mate three or four times in their life, the females brood, lay their eggs, give the hatchlings enough training to help them survive and then kick them out of the nest.

Michal actually get along well with humans, at least the Thamees caravans that make the trek across the Stenne. They tend to watch over the caravans on the way through, and some have even been known to trade meat for magical totems or various items that catch their interest.

Cantern (Fox/Owl) - The smallest of the griffons, and definitely the oddest, Canterns inhabit the hilly forests to the north of the Gherwen homelands, right on the border with Gãthlaürnönd. They have been known to reach a height of two feet, but most Cantern are considerably smaller. They have round owl heads, with leaf-like brown-green markings, and tan-furred fox bodies. The Cantern differ from other griffons in two ways. One, their forelegs are those of a fox, rather than talons. Two, instead of true wings, or no wings at all, they have loose folds of skin that connect their four and hind legs, in the manner of a flying squirrel. This allows them to glide from tree to tree. Male Canterns are solitary, while females form packs of three or four. During mating season, male Canterns compete for the attentions of female packs to gain the privilege of mating with all of them. Most female packs live in underground dens, where they raise their young.

Humans rarely see Cantern, and the same is true in reverse, so little is known of them, and they know little of us. They do tend to be friendly, and pick up human languages with surprising quickness.

Lukas Sjöström

05-26-2009 12:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The Elric books had both hawkhounds and vulturelions, and at least one of them was stated in the Deities & Demigods printing that still had the Melnibonéan mythos.

celebrityomnipath

05-26-2009 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10404298)

Maybe medical animation? Reviving necrotic tissue like a gangrenous limb? Or grafting on a necrothetic limb, fresh from a prisoner who was convinced to sign an organ-donor scroll by the hangman?

There was a character class called something like "Necronaught" in that "Undead!" book (exclamation mark is important). There were basically The Bionic Man, but you know, no cybernetics in faux Medieval Europe, however there are zombies...

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10404315)
I once wrote up a campaign world that had four different types of "griffons."

Now that's teh shit I am talking about!

Not sure about lionvultures though, I think they should be jackal or dingo based, to fit with the scavenger theme. Lions would be betterer as bald eagles. they would have a mane and a baldspot. Hilarious!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lukas Sjöström (Post 10404358)
The Elric books had both hawkhounds and vulturelions, and at least one of them was statted in the Deities & Demigods printing that still had the Melnibonéan mythos.

I still hold that hawkhounds would be seen as both awesome and impossibly cute by the nobility. Imagine one of those little dogs (that people use for scaring game so that you can shoot at them), now imagine it with an eagle's head, now imagine it begging for food!

Thinking of thread necromancy, I just got to the piercer part of this thread.

I am reminded of a story I herd on this site. The "adopt a piercer" story. A dwarf had a piercer land smack on his head, then bounce off, cause he was a dwarf in ultra-heavy dwarf armour. He was about to finish it off by steping on it, but felt sorry for it, so marked a big "x" on the floor and then put it back on the ceiling over it. Then teh party started herding wandering monsters under it to feed it, and checking up on it every so often, see how it is doing, has it had a litter of baby piercers, etc. So awesome.

noisms

05-26-2009 12:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Talk amongst yourselves a bit longer. Work is hella busy and I just have SO MUCH to say about the Giant Skeleton entry I can't find the necessary time to write it all.

Brandi

05-26-2009 01:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lukas Sjöström (Post 10404358)

The Elric books had both hawkhounds and vulturelions, and at least one of them was statted in the Deities & Demigods printing that still had the Melnibonéan mythos.

I think both were (I don't feel like digging up the old copy right now)-- the vulture lions were for sure.

Sleeper

05-26-2009 03:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10404482)
Not sure about lionvultures though, I think they should be jackal or dingo based, to fit with the scavenger theme. Lions would be betterer as bald eagles. they would have a mane and a baldspot. Hilarious!

Lions and bald eagles are both scavengers. Not exclusively of course. Lions follow around packs of hyenas and eat their leavings as often as the other way around, while Ben Franklin argued to his daughter that the U.S. bird "does not get his Living honestly" and so made an inappropriate national symbol.

Ginkomortus

05-26-2009 06:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405154)
Not sure about lionvultures though, I think they should be jackal or dingo based, to fit with the scavenger theme. Lions would be betterer as bald eagles. they would have a mane and a baldspot. Hilarious!

Eh, I went with the lion/vulture mix because I didn't want the normal lion/eagle hybrid, and I've always imagined desert lions as scrawny, mangy things, craftily scavenging what they could and following lone travelers waiting for them to die. Fits with the vulture, no? Granted, I went and turned their personality around to be helpful, if gruff, desert guides, so that's that.

celebrityomnipath

05-26-2009 06:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Oh fuck! I've just got to teh puddings section!
It's full of win!

I mean Prismatic Puddings, puddings that are prismatic! How awesome is that? Also Sticky Puddings. And Peas Puddings. Obvious puns, but awesome obvious puns.

Peasant pudding is also awesome as it is a monster that has been domesticated and, liek corn in real world, it could spread to the point that it outnumbers its wild variety 100 to 1.

Also, time to introduce International Shave a Quaggoth Day!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405154)

Lions and bald eagles are both scavengers. Not exclusively of course. Lions follow around packs of hyenas and eat their leavings as often as the other way around, while Ben Franklin argued to his daughter that the U.S. bird "does not get his Living honestly" and so made an inappropriate national symbol.

Yes, but those things are facts. And facts have no place in an AD&D Monstrous Manual!

Lions are courageous because sum scholar in the Middle Ages believed that, bald eagles are heroic because they look kinda awesome. And no king wants to be known as "The Vultureheart"!

demiurge1138

05-26-2009 07:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Oh man, "Vultureheart" is a great honorific for a blackguard, or cleric of murder. Going to have to use that.

Sleeper

05-26-2009 07:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10405816)

Eh, I went with the lion/vulture mix because I didn't want the normal lion/eagle hybrid, and I've always imagined desert lions as scrawny, mangy things, craftily scavenging what they could and following lone travelers waiting for them to die. Fits with the vulture, no? Granted, I went and turned their personality around to be helpful, if gruff, desert guides, so that's that.

Not sure how it happened, but you misattributed the quote you quoted. Wasn't me. :p

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10405829)

Yes, but those things are facts. And facts have no place in an AD&D Monstrous Manual!

Lions are courageous because sum scholar in the Middle Ages believed that, bald eagles are heroic because they look kinda awesome. And no king wants to be known as "The Vultureheart"!

Or have a world where idealized, heraldic (and colored solid argent and vert!) beasts live alongside the wild, natural versions of lions, leopards... and griffons.

I actually thought about that once. That summoned creatures are the idealized ones; the ones you meet in the real (or not so real) world are often quite different.

celebrityomnipath

05-26-2009 08:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10405907)

Oh man, "Vultureheart" is a great honorific for a blackguard, or cleric of murder. Going to have to use that.

Glad to be of service.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405935)

Or have a world where idealized, heraldic (and colored solid argent and vert!) beasts live alongside the wild, natural versions of lions, leopards... and griffons.

I actually thought about that once. That summoned creatures are the idealized ones; the ones you meet in the real (or not so real) world are often quite different.

That is pretty good as well. It helps to explain why nuthin makes sense. You know, if half teh animals are made by people who do not have a basic understanding of biology.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms, ages ago now, but I just read it (Post 10203292)

Body-part selling is frequently mentioned in the MM but is a very under-developed idea; often you don't even get approximate prices.

Then I can heartily recommend The Secret College of Necromancy book, for D&D 3.0.

Had basic prices and everything. It also had teh caution:

"But before your PCs rush out to sell monster corpses they should know..."*

Opps too late, they are already out the door with nets and clubs. No seriously guys, come back and read the downside of cutting up monsters for parts (largely sentient ones, if you want to make the big bucks). No wait, they're already out the door following the scent of easy money.

We put up notices around teh wizards' quarter saying "Magical monster parts: you want them, we got them!"

After we publicly killed and dismembered a tame Chimera in the town square out of stupidity, we took all those notices down.

* Then preceded to mention the many, largely illegality based, problems with an industry who's main clients are evil necromancers and mad scientists. We didn't care.

Sleeper

05-26-2009 09:40 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10406164)

 Then preceded to mention the many, largely illegality based, problems with an industry who's main clients are evil necromancers and mad scientists. We didn't care.*

Enter PETOM (pronounced "pet 'em"): People for the Ethical Treatment Of Monsters.

JRM

05-26-2009 06:09 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Curious, the thread seems to be shifting towards subjects similar to things that have floated around in my campaign.

The equivalent of hawkhounds have been gyrfalcon / wolf hybrids, used as fearsome hunting animals by elf nobles. (Not the nice kind of 'Tra La La-La' elf, but the mercurial vindictive bd kind of elf).

I like the idea of Saint Bernard/Condor hawkhounds for rescue work. Maybe introduce an Ancient Egyptian or South American theme, since both those folk regarded great vultures as sacred creatures.

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10403628)

To the noble classes there would be nuthin cuter looking than a hawkhound. Also I can picture lots of specialised breeds; your standard hawk/hunting dog ones, little Jack Russel/sparrowhawk ones as extra cute pounce attack predators, huge Saint Bernard/Condor ones used for rescue work, tinny little yappy dogs that jump from the rafters onto peoples' heads. And of course feral scavenger breeds liek the vulture/dingo (vulgos I guess).

JRM

05-26-2009 06:27 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10404298)

Maybe medical animation? Reviving necrotic tissue like a gangrenous limb? Or grafting on a necrothetic limb, fresh from a prisoner who was convinced to sign an organ-donor scroll by the hangman?

Been there, done that. If I remember correctly, I treated the necromantic replacement parts as alive (or at least as alive as a flesh golem), but had a poor sense of touch/taste. That resulted in a certain amount of vulgar ribaldry regarding how necromantic healing reduced the subject's ability to enjoy various forms of, ah, gratification depending upon which body parts were replaced...

JRM

05-26-2009 06:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405935)

Or have a world where idealized, heraldic (and colored solid argent and vert!) beasts live alongside the wild, natural versions of lions, leopards... and griffons.

Yes, I like the Heraldic versions of many monsters too. It also explains the neat half-and-half chimeras. The House of Lion and the House of Eagle united to spawn a new noble house which combined their coats of arms via dimidiation.

The husband was of the Lion House, or else the rules of heraldry would have caused the fusion to go the other way round, with the front-half of a lion and the back-half of a bird.

That was fortunate for the griffin, who is one of the few Heraldic Hybrids who did well out of the joining. Most of them can only survive outside the Platonic Cave with constant care funded by their sponsoring noble house. A strong heart would weep to see some of the Heraldic monsters, divided into quarters, sixths, sixteenth or even more parts, with no concern for how the elements match.

Such monsters as the Dog-Battleaxe-Unicorn-Ship-Horse-Castle-Eagle-Three Golden Balls chimera can only wheeze and shuffle around in the menageries of the noblemen and colleges of Heraldry.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405935)

I actually thought about that once. That summoned creatures are the idealized ones; the ones you meet in the real (or not so real) world are often quite different.

Sounds very familiar, Have we discussed the summon spells conjure Platonic creatures idea already?

JRM

05-26-2009 10:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10406556)

Enter PETOM (pronounced "pet 'em"): People for the Ethical Treatment Of Monsters.

It's about time, the free-range and wild people have long enjoyed the comforts awarded them by the sterling efforts of the Monsters for the Ethical Treatment of People movement (METOP).

Without them, all the AD&D humans and demi-humans would be in battery farms by now...;)

The Last Conformist

05-26-2009 11:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10408712)

It's about time, the free-range and wild people have long enjoyed the comforts awarded them by the sterling efforts of the Monsters for the Ethical Treatment of People movement (METOP).

The logo of METOP needs to feature a metoposaur.

Wakboth

05-26-2009 11:08 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10406556)

Enter PETOM (pronounced "pet 'em"): People for the Ethical Treatment Of Monsters.

So, what would they try to rebrand the Sea Lions as? :D

Ginkomortus

05-27-2009 12:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405935)

Not sure how it happened, but you misattributed the quote you quoted. Wasn't me. :p

Yeah, that is weird, 'cause I was going to quote you, then decided to go back and quote Omnipath directly. Weird. Eerie. Ontario.

Sleeper

05-27-2009 01:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10408906)
So, what would they try to rebrand the Sea Lions as? :D

With an ad campaign featuring lots of unclothed elves ("I'd rather be naked than wear secondary market monster body parts"), I don't think anyone was paying attention to the message.

Strangething

05-27-2009 01:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10405935)
I actually thought about that once. That summoned creatures are the idealized ones; the ones you meet in the real (or not so real) world are often quite different.

Suddenly, the celestial template doesn't seem quite so lame.

And can I say, as a footnote, that this thread has been a huge source of inspiration for Cursed World.

celebrityomnipath

05-27-2009 06:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper, a long tiem ago, during the Cephalopods era of this thread (Post 10211360)
Because the Underdark world is ruled by denizens that long ago migrated from the cold depths of the undersea. Mobile, squishy, strangely smart squids, cuttlefish, and octopuses with convergent eyes. Largely sessile clams and mussels, oysters and barnacles. Scallops that swim by opening and closing their mouths. They have become terrestrial, or more properly subterrestrial, like their other cousins, the snails and slugs.

Yeah, sign me up for Cephalopods and Caverns, or Mollusks and Mazes!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10408206)

Yes, I like the Heraldic versions of many monsters too. It also explains the neat half-and-half chimeras. The House of Lion and the House of Eagle united to spawn a new noble house which combined their coats of arms via dimidiation.

Warning:

<http://upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedi...nnacht.svg.png>

Do not fuck with this eagle, he has a sword!

Sleeper

05-27-2009 07:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10410615)
Do not fuck with this eagle, he has a sword!

I don't think he could lift his arm, much less the blade.)

Dimidation. I like that word. Though "impalement" (putting the two coats of arms next to each other instead of cutting them in half and slapping the pieces together) has a cool name, too.

Just to wander off track again, "vexillology" is the study of flags. Most fantasy worlds have knights or at least heavily armed and armored types riding around on horses. But there is often a shortage of coats of arms. They're stuck in the appendix of the occasional citybook, like an afterthought. Adventurers never seem to have them, even the supposedly noble or semi-noble. The noble noveaux who earn a "name" don't sweat and gnash their teeth as they hammer out a proper design and then strut like peacocks under their new blazon. They're not worn proudly, at all times. They're not linked to anyone's honor. They're like seals or crests of modern times. A piece of heritage, of fantasica. Something that appears on coins. They're relics, no longer of any importance.

Why? Well, maybe they've been supplanted. If they no longer have any meaning, perhaps it's because that meaning was lost. Stripped away or leached away; it doesn't matter. But who would do this, and how? Well, who else uses symbols, signs, crests? Mages do, that's who. From arcane marks to Elminster's obsessions, every would-be wizard-in-training or tin-pot sorcerer or necromancer has a scribbled scrawl they call their own.

Perhaps the reason the family crests lost their power was very simple. Families just don't matter any more. Divine right, land. Power over peasants. That's all slipped away. The privilege of birth, succession, and noblesse oblige no longer matter. They may still go batty in decaying country manors, but they're at best just custodians, janitors. Or to go medieval, stewards and castellans. Merely minding the lands and peoples for another.

The true power shifted from the royal courts and warlords to their magists and advisors. Scrape away the surface of the geopolitical world, and all the power is the hands of the magocracy. Rulers rule at their whim, peasants are free or unfree at their discretion, and knights (or adventurers) go on great quests at their behalf.

So instead of heraldry, we have vexillology. Not for any real reason other than it sounds nasty and potentially wizardly. Vexillards bear the logo of their master. Sometimes in cloth, sometimes as ascintillating pattern. Fighting folk proudly carry the mark of their leige on their shield. Adventuring bands prominently display the sign of their patron. It's woven into tapestries and appears as a signature flourish in spells.

The idea of divine right is replaced with a meritocracy based on magical potential. Feudalism is the service of lesser magi to greater magi, who tithe magical power in the form of permanent and consumable items, spell slots, and bound servitors. Tournaments are replaced with formal magical duels where ambitious young spellcasters can prove their chops, and gain the attention of a patron who will school them in the more advanced arts.

Laws and customs bind the use of these symbols, and misuse is punished. A wizard's mark is like a signet ring, a seal of protection and authority. Knowing the symbols means you know who has precedence, who has what areas of talent and expertise, and what to expect. In a world ruled by wizards, vexillology becomes a weapon.

6inTruder

05-27-2009 08:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10410615)
<http://upload.wikimedia.org/wikipedi...nnacht.svg.png>

Do not fuck with this eagle, he has a sword!

Dude. That's like, the fucking Eagle version of Trogdor!

JRM

05-27-2009 06:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10408906)
So, what would they try to rebrand the Sea Lions as? :D

Well if fish are sea-kittens, then surely sea lions would be renamed sea-cubs? :)

JRM

05-27-2009 06:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10410615)
Do not fuck with this eagle, he has a sword!

I'd be more impressed if he could lift his arm off the ground without falling over, or do something about that "only fly in a circle" handicap he suffers from.

Though it makes me wonder whether Dimidation explains the Fachan. Maybe that legendary half-man monster started out as one half of a Heraldic Monster? It makes me wonder whether there are any other Half-Monsters out there, off hand I can only think of Half-Eagles.

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10411084)
Dude. That's like, the fucking Eagle version of Trogdor!

Hmm, maybe the One Armed Sword-Eagle isn't that useless a monster concept.:D

Could I bear not to give him the power of Burnination? I don't see as how I can choose not to, those peasants in their thatch-roofed cottages don't burninate themselves, you know. I'll probably have it use its single wing to fly in circles and fling razor-sharp feathers. Such a lopsided creature shouldn't be able to fly in a straight line. Wouldn't want it to be unrealistic, after all.;

celebrityomnipath

05-28-2009 01:45 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10412965)
It makes me wonder whether there are any other Half-Monsters out there, off hand I can only think of Half-Eagles.

Halflings.

Sleeper

05-28-2009 02:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10414269)
Halflings.

Hmm...

Quote:

Originally Posted by "Origin of Love" by Hedwig and the Angry Inch
*When the earth was still flat,
And the clouds made of fire,
And mountains stretched up to the sky,
Sometimes higher,*

Folks roamed the earth
Like big rolling kegs.
They had two sets of arms.
They had two sets of legs.
They had two faces peering
Out of one giant head
So they could watch all around them
As they talked; while they read.
And they never knew nothing of love.
It was before the origin of love.

The origin of love

Last time I saw you
We had just split in two.
You were looking at me.
I was looking at you.
You had a way so familiar,
But I could not recognize,
Cause you had blood on your face;
I had blood in my eyes.
But I could swear by your expression
That the pain down in your soul
Was the same as the one down in mine.
That's the pain,
Cuts a straight line
Down through the heart;
We called it love.
So we wrapped our arms around each other,
Trying to shove ourselves back together.
We were making love,
Making love.
It was a cold dark evening,
Such a long time ago,
When by the mighty hand of Jove,
It was the sad story
How we became
Lonely two-legged creatures,
It's the story of
The origin of love.
That's the origin of love.

And there were three sexes then,
One that looked like two men
Glued up back to back,
Called the children of the sun.
And similar in shape and girth
Were the children of the earth.
They looked like two girls
Rolled up in one.
And the children of the moon
Were like a fork shoved on a spoon.
They were part sun, part earth
Part daughter, part son.

The origin of love

Now the gods grew quite scared

*Of our strength and defiance
And Thor said,
"I'm gonna kill them all
With my hammer,
Like I killed the giants."
And Zeus said, "No,
You better let me
Use my lightening, like scissors,
Like I cut the legs off the whales
And dinosaurs into lizards."
Then he grabbed up some bolts
And he let out a laugh,
Said, "I'll split them right down the middle.
Gonna cut them right up in half."
And then storm clouds gathered above
Into great balls of fire*

*And then fire shot down
From the sky in bolts
Like shining blades
Of a knife.
And it ripped
Right through the flesh
Of the children of the sun
And the moon
And the earth.
And some Indian god
Sewed the wound up into a hole,
Pulled it round to our belly
To remind us of the price we pay.
And Osiris and the gods of the Nile
Gathered up a big storm
To blow a hurricane,
To scatter us away,
In a flood of wind and rain,
And a sea of tidal waves,
To wash us all away,
And if we don't behave
They'll cut us down again
And we'll be hopping round on one foot
And looking through one eye.*

celebrityomnipath

05-28-2009 04:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10215163)
Almost as good as slaad farming! (Remind me to mention that again once we're on slaads).

Slaad farming, why God why?!?

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10220717)
started wondering... How Warforged feel about the rust monster?

And that, my friend, is another reason why Terminators should be built in D&D.

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10221158)
Ghouls, nothing. It's wights you have to be worried about. You get killed by a wight--and that's as easy as one punch for most of the population--you got another wight in 1d4 rounds. Ghoul fever takes a few days.

There is an interesting article on Steve Jackson's Pyramid Magazine about Wight self-perpetrating armies. Apparently it's OK because if the worst happens your party will be all wight.

celebrityomnipath

05-28-2009 07:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10254978)
Yeah; unlike everyone else on the savage side, gnolls are technically matriarchal to begin with (with, yes, hyena weirdness).

Another interesting point that I just can't let lie.

I always figured that even though Gnolls are meant to be matriarchal, you never seem to run into female ones. I think that the Gnolls that you run into are males who have basically been pushed to the edges of Gnoll lands, and that male Gnolls are scared of women. Yes, I feel that this is a reasonable assumption, given that all the pictures of obviously female Gnolls I have seen had their breasts bared, obviously for scaring male Gnolls into obedience. Well OK it was one picture, but I read a lot into it.

Therefore it is reasonable to assume that male Gnolls can be "turned" by breasts just as undead can be turned by holy symbols. Therefore it is also reasonable to assume that any party venturing into the periphery of Gnoll territory would want to take at least one pair of breasts with them (attached to a female adventurer of course; just putting them on a stick or something would be gross) and that those breasts should be with easy access for purpose of Gnoll repulsion. For example, if those emergency anti-Gnoll breasts were behind full platemail, or other proper armour, then they would be of no use. It is far better to have them protected by easily-released leather armour, preferably as little of it as possible.

Anyway, that is my theory on D&D art. The women on the covers of D&D books are just Gnoll repellent.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10273158)

Why stop there? Introduce the flail scorpo-flail, with 3 to 8 stingers wildly swinging around as it advances on the party. Or the porcu-stinger, that appears to be just a bundle of scorpion tails slowly waddling forward because the body is hidden under hundreds of hooked poison-injectors.

I liek the cut of your jib sir!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10277890)

Besides which, don't we already have multi-stingered arachnids in D&D? I vaguely recalled the vermiurge has two stings, but looked it up and it has only one, but makes up for it by four pincers. Still, I could have sworn I've seen two tailed scorpions in the game somewhere, may not have been an official product.

Obviously I'll have to resolve this potential lacuna by creating the Dopplepion - two stingers, four claws, 200% deadl)

It is at this point that I am compelled to mention Leafcutter Scorpions! The moast deadly creature evar, if you are made of leaves. Four times as deadly as Leafcutter Ants!

Mr. Teapot

05-28-2009 08:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10415447)

I always figured that even though Gnolls are meant to be matriarchal, you nevar seem to run into female ones.

Of course you do. You just don't realize it. I mean, if the gnolls (like their hyena brethren) can't tell their males and females apart, why should a human be any better at it?

noisms

05-29-2009 11:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

[Sorry for the delay...]

Skeleton, Giant

Does anybody else find the picture for this one oddly....suggestive? Like the skeleton is saying, "Here, this is where my COCK would be if I still had one!!"?

Anyway.

A Giant Skeleton is not the skeleton of a giant, oh no - it is an ordinary skeleton which has been enlarged. So neh. It always has a fire burning in its ribcage, which is ~~for cheesy effect~~ a byproduct of the magic used to create it. It is, though, really just a big skeleton in the end, and there's not all that much to distinguish it from an ordinary-sized one other than more hit points and more damage.

As we've established I'm not a fan of setting-specific stuff in the MM, and as the final third of the entry is all about Ravenloft and things called "Radaga" and "Kartakass" that I've never heard of, I have to give my final verdict on this monster as being a bit boring and a bit annoying.

Skeleton, Warrior

I'll fold this entry in with the Giant Skeleton because, let's face it, we're all Skeletoned out and could do with moving on.

Skeleton Warriors roam the multiverse seeking out magical golden circlets which contain their trapped souls. Except - here's the catch! - anybody who has the circlet can control the Skeleton Warrior if it comes with 240'. Cue hilarious and farcical cat-and-mouse games and good times had by all.

And if you can't base an adventure or an entire campaign around that hokey concept, there's something wrong with you.

JRM

05-30-2009 12:35 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10422430)
[Sorry for the delay...]

Skeleton, Giant

Does anybody else find the picture for this one oddly....suggestive? Like the skeleton is saying, "Here, this is where my COCK would be if I still had one!!"?

Goodness gracious, great balls of fire!:eek::cool:;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10422430)
A Giant Skeleton is not the skeleton of a giant, oh no - it is an ordinary skeleton which has been enlarged. So neh. It always has a fire burning in its ribcage, which is ~~for cheesy effect~~ a byproduct of the magic used to create it. It is, though, really just a big skeleton in the end, and there's not all that much to distinguish it from an ordinary-sized one other than more hit points and more damage.

That was my first impression, until I came to that bit about them throwing an 8-dice fireball once per hour. One of those could easily wipe out a party of 4th-5th level adventurers if they fluff their saving throws. Fireball is not a trivial spell in AD&D.

I also can't help wondering what would happen if you combine a Giant Skeleton and a Monster Skeleton - AC 3(2), HD 6+6 methinks.

I'll agree with you about all the Ravenloft references being extraneous.

JRM

05-30-2009 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10422430)

Skeleton, Warrior

I'll fold this entry in with the Giant Skeleton because, let's face it, we're all Skeletoned out and could do with moving on.

Skeleton Warriors roam the multiverse seeking out magical golden circlets which contain their trapped souls. Except here's the catch! - anybody who has the circlet can control the Skeleton Warrior if it comes with 240'. Cue hilarious and farcical cat-and-mouse games and good times had by all.

And if you can't base an adventure or an entire campaign around that hokey concept, there's something wrong with you.

Alas, I never have done a scenario were someone had their skeleton warrior command-circlet lost or stolen, and was frantically searching for it while an undead killer remorselessly tracks them down.

Skeleton Warriors seem a natural choice to command your necromancer's skeletal legions, but have one obvious flaw - they are slow. Regular, monster and giant skeletons all have a 12" movement, while warriors only have 6". I can't help imagine them running along behind a horde of bony fighters, cursing at them to slow down.

Of course its speed doubles when its hunting a former controller. So, all the controller has to do is stand were he wants the skeleton warrior to go, remove the circlet to the warrior will charge towards them, then replace it before it arrives with murderous intent.

I imagine this is because they wear heavy armour, but if so the hindrance can easily be circumvented by assuming it's enchanted for mobility. Does that mean a lightly armoured SW has a 12" speed, which becomes 24" when it's heading to kill a former controller? Maybe 12" is its natural speed (if anything about such a creature can be described as natural), and the warrior is usually slowed to 6" by the restraining influence of its circlet?

A more impressive solution to the warrior mobility problem would be giving it a mount, like a zombie wyvern, nightmare or skeleton warhorse.

Kreuzritter

05-30-2009 01:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

and because it's come up, I'm pretty sure somebody once commented that Skeleton Warriors made for better death kights than the "Liches with platemail and bastard swords" we've had up until 4e

Wakboth

05-30-2009 02:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kreuzritter (Post 10422762)

and because it's come up, I'm pretty sure somebody once commented that Skeleton Warriors made for better death kights than the "Liches with platemail and bastard swords" we've had up until 4e

They're both from Fiend Folio, if memory serves...

celebrityomnipath

05-30-2009 02:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10415722)

Of course you do. You just don't realize it. I mean, if the gnolls (like their hyena brethren) can't tell their males and females apart, why should a human be any better at it?

I have seen evidence that would indicate otherwise.

celebrityomnipath

05-30-2009 02:43 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10422743)

A more impressive solution to the warrior mobility problem would be giving it a mount, like a zombie wyvern, nightmare or skeleton warhorse.

Ah, just put them on wheels.

JRM

05-30-2009 03:13 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10423173)
Ah, just put them on wheels.

I heard the tinker gnomes tried that, but found the Skeleton Warrior had difficulty riding a bicycle while wielding a two-handed sword.

celebrityomnipath

05-30-2009 03:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10423327)
I heard the tinker gnomes tried that, but found the Skeleton Warrior had difficulty riding a bicycle while wielding a two-handed sword.

I meant rollerskates. But also giving them a barbarian level would work.

Sleeper

05-30-2009 03:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10423327)
I heard the tinker gnomes tried that, but found the Skeleton Warrior had difficulty riding a bicycle while wielding a two-handed sword.

Fortunately, the invention of the skegway warrior solved that problem. They could even rent them out to tourists in the off season.

celebrityomnipath

05-30-2009 03:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

And thinking of undead, where is it, ah yeah:

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10318113)

Yes that whole bit about requiring wish level plus magic to cure a Shadow is extremely (maybe excessively) harsh, but at least the MM's consistent in that other incorporeal undead like Wraiths and Spectres are also very hard to bring back to life, requiring a "special quest", whatever that means.

There was a thing in that Undead! book about that. Apparently if some powerful undead wants to become human then it needs three things: It needs its mind (either floating about noncorporeally or inside a dessicated corpse as with a Litch), their physical body (for a Litch said dessicated corpse, for a Specter, well you'd better remember where you parked it) and of course a soul.

Now, as they don't now have a soul, apparently, they need to make one. Supposedly their soul has been eaten (nom nom nom) by teh nagative energy that now animates them, or summint. Anyway they need to take an astral quest to a god plane or a plane of positive energy (or moar liekly their mates need to do it for them; I can't see a Specter getting on with a plane of positive energy), to, and I believe this is an actual quote "Forge a new soul"! Yeah it is pretty awesome if you put it liek that.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10383000)

Villages and towns are always founded around a cemetary. Until the area is marked, fenced off, and warded, no humanoids can or will dwell there. More remote farmsteads load the still-warm bodies of those who succumb to fever in the night onto a wagon, and brave the invisible potholes as they race towards the nearest consecrated plot. Death isn't quiet. It's grasping and awful.

There's a name for that. It's called Unhallowed Metropolis.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10385267)

But societies built on undead as a workforce seem like they would have a really, really big advantage over societies without a zombie workforce. Thousands more slaves, who work tirelessly and without need for food or pay, following commands with less chance of rebellion.

According to GURPS: Technomancer, it will boost teh productivity of an industrialised society by 10%. Now that's a society that already has production line robots and poorly paid illegal immigrants.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10389045)

Really though, it's just so I could make jokes about playing a "wight supremacist".

Yeah that is fucking awesome. Also The Wight Brothers, It'll be Alwight on the Night, Wight beside you, my country; Wight or wrong, fight for your Wight to party. And of course teh legendarily deadly prestige class; Wight Knight.

JRM

05-30-2009 03:57 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10415722)

Of course you do. You just don't realize it. I mean, if the gnolls (like their hyena brethren) can't tell their males and females apart, why should a human be any better at it?

Actually, it's more complicated than that. Gnolls can identify each others' sex pretty reliably through physiological cues (mostly scent, but there are also difference in body shape & features to those who know what to look for).

However, the gnoll language applies gender to most of its nouns seemingly at random (like German!), i.e. a fire-drill or a bow is female, but an archer or midwife is male (regardless of the actual sex of the bowperson), which causes a certain amount of confusion to outsiders since gnolls often carry this habit of speech over into other languages.

Furthermore, gnolls are instinctively matriarchal, so a high-ranking male is expected to conduct himself like a female when in the presence of other "females" to be worthy of respect. Thus, except for certain all-male societies, important male gnolls will affect female behaviour and use female clothes and equipment.

This also explains why so many gnolls who plan diplomatic missions to human lands go to such effort to obtain noblewoman's dresses in very large sizes.

JRM

05-30-2009 04:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10423408)

Fortunately, the invention of the skegway warrior solved that problem. They could even rent them out to tourists in the off season.

I think you're getting confused with the Segway Warriors.

A Skeg is a stabilizing fin on a boat or surfboard. It's true that the surfing skeletons of the Skegway Warriors are able to wield their greatswords while balancing on their boards, but they're of limited effectiveness on land - although they are much feared on the open ocean, as any Sea Caballero will tell you!

Sleeper

05-30-2009 04:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10423565)
I think you're getting confused with the Segway Warriors.

No, no, no... you're confusing the eerie constructs with a(n un)species under the protection of the portmanteau police. To make a minor segue, just because two words are spelled (or pronounced...) the same does not mean they are the same. :p

Sleeper

05-30-2009 04:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10423513)
There's a name for that. It's called Unhallowed Metropolis.

I know nothing about it. I was actually more or less inspired by the Fell, from Midnight.

Mikelibrarian

05-30-2009 02:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10423074)
They're both from Fiend Folio, if memory serves...

Yes and the Death Knight was created by Charles Stross, the guy who created the Slaadi, Githyanki and Githzerai.

My favorite episode of the Dungeons and Dragons cartoon featured a Skeleton Warrior and the quest for his circlet.

Mikelibrarian

05-30-2009 02:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10412965)

I'd be more impressed if he could lift his arm off the ground without falling over, or do something about that "only fly in a circle" handicap he suffers from.

Though it makes me wonder whether Dimidation explains the Fachan. Maybe that legendary half-man monster started out as one half of a Heraldic Monster? It makes me wonder whether there are any other Half-Monsters out there, off hand I can only think of Half-Eagles.

Hmm, maybe the One Armed Sword-Eagle isn't that useless a monster concept.:D

Could I bear not to give him the power of Burnination? I don't see as how I can choose not to, those peasants in their thatch-roofed cottages don't burninate themselves, you know. I'll probably have it use its single wing to fly in circles and fling razor-sharp feathers. Such a lopsided creature shouldn't be able to fly in a straight line. Wouldn't want it to be unrealistic, after all.;

Fachans are a monster from Scottish folklore.

They also appeared in the Lion the Witch and the Wardrobe. As did a Shedu by the way, although it did not seem to have any magic power.

Another half monster that appears in the Al-Qadim supplement is the Nasnas

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Fachan>

http://yafgc.shipsinker.com/index.php?strip_id=399

JRM

05-30-2009 06:56 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10425492)

Fachans are a monster from Scottish folklore.

SNIP

Too late I'm afraid, I already knew where Fachans come from in Earth mythology (and read YAFC too, when I can find the time).

I t'was just riffing on alternative explanations for AD&D Fachans in a platonic-heraldic-beasts-made-real-setting.

JRM

05-30-2009 07:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10425485)

My favorite episode of the Dungeons and Dragons cartoon featured a Skeleton Warrior and the quest for his circlet.

I vaguely remember that one, but it's been ages since that show aired over here.

Glancing through the Skeleton Warrior entry again, I can't help wondering how the Warrior in the illustration kept his full head of hair. He (?) must have access to some amazing hair-restorer, the party must be hired by a balding monarch to discoverer the secret!;)

Strangething

05-31-2009 03:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Isn't there the giant skeleton from Japanese myth? Checks Wikipedia Here we go, the Gashadokuro:

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gashadokuro>

Nothing about throwing fireballs, though.

Sleeper

05-31-2009 03:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I love this quote from Wikipedia: "The only way a gashadokuro can be detected before it appears is by hearing a ringing in one's ears." D&D needs more random mythological weirdness.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikelibrarian (Post 10425485)

My favorite episode of the Dungeons and Dragons cartoon featured a Skeleton Warrior and the quest for his circlet.

I think that episode is why I prefer skeleton warriors to death knights. I found the story more appealing than Lord Soth's. Though IIRC (and it's been ages), the episode didn't exactly follow the rules very well. Didn't he turn to flesh at some point? Not a complaint; the Rule of Cool covers a lot of sins.

The Last Conformist

05-31-2009 06:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10422430)

Skeleton, Giant

Does anybody else find the picture for this one oddly....suggestive? Like the skeleton is saying, "Here, this is where my COCK would be if I still had one!!"?

This reminds me of a mystery from my misspent youth - sometime in the early/mid nineties, (some Swedish subsidiary of) Disney printed a Halloween poster showing a bunch of Disney characters dressed up in Halloween costume and surrounded by a bunch of dancing skeletons, one of which prominently displayed what looked very much like a baculum.

Presumably the artist meant to depict something else but I can't guess what.

JRM

05-31-2009 02:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10427513)

Presumably the artist meant to depict something else but I can't guess what.

Why presume? A lot of disney characters are anthropomorphised carnivores (bears, dogs, cats et cetera), and unlike humans most Carnivora do have baculums, so it may just have been a skeleton versions of one. (Or an anthropomorphic version of another mammal like a mouse.) :cool:

The Last Conformist

05-31-2009 10:00 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10428695)

Why presume? A lot of disney characters are anthropomorphised carnivores (bears, dogs, cats et cetera), and unlike humans most Carnivora do have baculums, so it may just have been a skeleton versions of one. (Or an anthropomorphic version of another mammal like a mouse.) :cool:

I feel pretty confident that if it were intended to be an anthropomorphic dog or whatever, the artist would have chosen a less obscure sign to indicate this than a baculum (what percentage of primary school kids - the target audience for the poster - have even heard of bacula?), most likely a recognizably non-human skull.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10429423)

I feel pretty confident that if it were intended to be an anthropomorphic dog or whatever, the artist would have chosen a less obscure sign to indicate this than a baculum (what percentage of primary school kids - the target audience for the poster - have even heard of bacula?), most likely a recognizably non-human skull.

Um, er, um, give me a second to think of a counter-argument.

How about:

(a) The artist could deliberately be being obscure. If they're trying to disguise a baculum, maybe they thought it would give it away if the skull was obviously animalistic.

(b) The animal-ness of cartoon theriohumanoid's head can be very variable, as can the (humanish-ness of animated skeletons that are supposed to be humans), so it may just be one of the more human-looking furies.

(c) Maybe the skeletons are assembled from bits-and-pieces of different individuals, so the skull and hips don't match?

(d) Come to think of it, in the Disney TV cartoons I remember from my youth like Tailspin, where most of the sapient races were anthropomorphic animals the skeletons (animate or otherwise) were still mostly humanoid. Maybe all these beings had humanoid skeletons inside, or they were the remnants of the long dead human empire?

Take two excuses, they're free!:o

EDIT: I wonder what the next silly side-track we're going to be posting about while waiting for the next monster. Come on Noisms, where are the Slaad!:p

chronostrike

06-01-2009 04:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Tangent: Shere Khan is my archetypal image of a rakshasa.

Strangething

06-02-2009 01:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10430543)

Tangent: Shere Khan is my archetypal image of a rakshasa.

You are not alone in this.

JRM

06-02-2009 01:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10430543)
Tangent: Shere Khan is my archetypal image of a rakshasa.

I'm guessing you're talking about the anthropomorphic version from Talespin rather than the Disney Jungle Book version that looks (surprise surprise!) just like a tiger.

Although the JB version may not look like a Rakshasa, it sure has a personality & mannerisms that would make for an excellent Rakshasa, indeed he strikes me as more Rakshasa-like than the corporate overlord version on Tailspin, who's more like a furry and kid-friendly version of Lex Luthor.

chronostrike

06-02-2009 06:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10434212)
I'm guessing you're talking about the anthropomorphic version from Talespin rather than the Disney Jungle Book version that looks (surprise surprise!) just like a tiger.

Although the JB version may not look like a Rakshasa, it sure has a personality & mannerisms that would make for a excellent Rakshasa, indeed he strikes me as more Rakshasa-like than the corporate overlord version on Tailspin, who's more like a furry and kid-friendly version of Lex Luthor.

Shere Khan (JB) is a pretty good villain what with the refined and menacing demeanor, but he doesn't have lackeys. Shere Khan (TS) is the better fit to me because he owns Cape Suzette. He has both the personality and the political power.

JRM

06-02-2009 06:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by chronostrike (Post 10435417)

Shere Khan (JB) is a pretty good villain what with the refined and menacing demeanor, but he doesn't have lackeys. Shere Khan (TS) is the better fit to me because he owns Cape Suzette. He has both the personality and the political power.

True enough, but the TS Khan just doesn't seem evil enough to me to make a mean Rakshasa. I don't remember any episodes of Tailspin where he obsesses over eating an orphaned human child, for example.

EDIT: Although I could see it working if you modify Khan from how he's represented in the TVs, making everything you see of him on the small screen just a front, even the supposed 'behind the scenes ruthless business-tiger'. After the latest japes with Baloo are over and he's back in his sanctum, Khan paws twist backwards as he reverts to his true form and turns to his closest flunkies, declaring "I hunger, bring me some baby foie gras".

celebrityomnipath

06-02-2009 07:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10437639)

After the latest japes with Baloo are over and he's back in his sanctum, Khan paws twist backwards as he reverts to his true form and turns to his closest flunkies, declaring "I hunger, bring me some baby foie gras".

That is totally how it should be. Though technically what he would say is "nom nom nom"...

Lugh

06-02-2009 08:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10437708)

That is totally how it should be. Though technically what he would say is "nom nom nom"...

OK, seriously, the LAST thing I want to encourage in my games is lolcat-speaking rakshasa. We already got that with a rakasta picture captioned "I can haz yur soul?"

I still can't decided whether lolcats are better or worse than Monty Python quotes for killing the mood of a session.

JRM

06-02-2009 10:38 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10437708)

That is totally how it should be. Though technically what he would say is "nom nom nom"...

Definitely not, Mr Khan was educated at the finest Rakshasa private schools in England, I believe he is an alumni of both Clawbridge or Oxfang, he would never stoop to such vulgar speech patterns.

Besides, it's well known that lol-rakshasas would much rather eat baby cheeseburger.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10437901)

OK, seriously, the LAST thing I want to encourage in my games is lolcat-speaking rakshasa. We already got that with a rakasta picture captioned "I can haz yur soul?"

I still can't decided whether lolcats are better or worse than Monty Python quotes for killing the mood of a session.

I'll have to agree with you there, Lugh.

celebrityomnipath

06-03-2009 12:42 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10438319)

Definitely not, Mr Khan was educated at the finest Rakshasa private schools in England, I believe he is an alumni of both Clawbridge or Oxfang, he would never stoop to such vulgar speech patterns.

I think what you are trying to say is that he had an education rather than a educashun.

noisms

06-05-2009 01:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Slaad

Like the Tanar'ri, Baatezu and Yuguloths, the Slaadi appear as vague cyphers in the Monstrous Manual - you pretty much have to wait for the Planescape Monstrous Compendia to get all the juicy stuff when it comes to 2e planar entities.

As is stands, Slaadi are portrayed as vicious frogmen who breed through implantation and chest-eruption a la aliens, but that's about all. Only Red Slaadi and Blue Slaadi get stats, and we have another sampling of the highly eccentric XP system the MM employs - Blue Slaadi are worth a whopping 16,500 XP, which for an 8+4 HD monster is almost as bad as the Abishai.

Slaadi are Chaotic Neutral in alignment, but really seem Chaotic Evil - it's difficult to tell where those two alignments separate at the best of times, and the fact that Slaadi tend to attack and try to eat strangers on sight and speak lots of "evil languages" doesn't help. The idea of a race which embodies Chaos is an interesting one, so it's a bit disappointing that the Slaadi seem like Tanar'ri but just not quite as bad.

Slaadi could be an interesting big bad in a campaign, I think - an implacable foe with a complete lack of morality or rationale, who can only be fought with extreme violence. It would definitely work as a combat-orientated game.

Wakboth

06-05-2009 01:26 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Slaadi are pretty neat, but I agree that they tended to come off more as "CE lite". Then again, that was a common failing of CN alignments...

I think they would have been better if they weren't so implacably aggressive. Sure, if you actually attack one, it goes all berserker frog upon your nonbatrachian butt, but if you hold your swords, there's a good chance you can strike up a conversation with the slaad. Or it will ignore you. Or give you interesting things (for sufficiently chaotic values of "interesting"). Or, indeed, attack without any provocation; they're unpredictable, after all!

As for conversing with slaadi... I think the low-end, low-int ones should be frogmalks - non sequiturs, random "jokes", a roomfull of slaadi chanting "DESU DESU DESU DESU" at you - but the smarter ones take more effort to figure out. In any case, even when they're being violent, I feel they should not be malicious or gloating or anything like that.

And, to finish off this rambling and incoherent comment, I'm suddenly inspired by R.A. Lafferty's story Frog on a Mountain. Like all Lafferty stories it's quite weird, and has its own lyrical grotesqueness that seems like a good fit for the slaadi... How about if the slaadi, even the top-end ones, are imperfect or broken forms of something else?

From red slaadi come blue slaadi, from blues reds; and from both come greens, then greys and blacks... but the process has thrown a cog, and they're stuck as these uncouth, absurd, babbling and croaking frog-monsters. It would be a great, epic goal for a high-level party to help "fix" the slaadi... as long as they don't get their souls eaten and digested to help the broken death slaadi to turn into what they ought to be! :D

Ginkomortus

06-05-2009 01:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10449088)

Slaadi are pretty neat, but I agree that they tended to come off more as "CE lite". Then again, that was a common failing of CN alignments...

I just always found it weird that the slaadi are so hierarchical and rigid in their structure.

It seems weird, even if you figure in a Courts of Chaos/Amber viewpoint, by which logic Formians and Modrons should be constantly backstabbing each other over every little thing.

demiurge1138

06-05-2009 01:53 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The slaadi seem pretty imperfect to me. After all, red ones beget blue, blue begets red, and both of them hate each other.

Slaad farming is an old standard originated in the depths of EN World history, but the idea bears repeating here. Use planar binding spells to get yourself a red slaad. Own a farm. Have the red slaad implant all of your cows, then wait for the blue slaadi to burst. Generally, at that point, you'd want lots of high level enchantment magic to control your new slaad army, but if all you're after is havoc, make sure to put your cows far away from you, kick back, and watch.

It gets really silly with the suggestion of using awaken to make your cows sentient, then train them in wizardry to get green slaad from the implanted eggs.

Slaadi are a favorite of mine from way back--in high school, I wrote "the rather small complete book of slaad" which had discussions on slaad physiology and psychology, descriptions of the Lords of Chaos, a few prestige classes (both for characters who want to be more like slaad and for slaad themselves, like the chaossummoner and the monk-hunter) and a whole ton of other slaadi. Like life slaadi, the opposite of death slaadi, who are tainted with goodness and possess healing powers, the Pandaemonic exiled yellow slaadi, who represent the randomness of disease, the coral slaadi, which glide through Limbo like flying squirrels and grow symbiotic coral on their chests and the silver slaadi, which is a swarm of tiny slaadi that can combine to form a single slaad body.

My explanation for why slaadi were CE lite, at least back when I wrote it, was that slaadi are born of conflict, being generated through parasitoid behavior to one of the most violent of the Outer Planes. Slaadi are antisocial, and most of the time when two slaadi meet, it will result in them fighting, oftentimes for hours, as they retreat briefly and heal up rapidly until one of them just makes a run for it. They expect that everything can heal as well as they can, and are disappointed when the little soft things with hair on their heads can't, and get ripped in half. I did also give the half-hearted sage theory that slaadi used to be demons, and have "ascended" into neutrality, only it doesn't always stick.

Actually, that explanation works for me somehow. Perhaps the slaadi are the remnants of the obyrith, the primal progenitor demons who fought for the Queen of Chaos against the Wind Dukes of Aaga. As punishment for their crimes, these obyrith were stripped of their ever-changing forms and locked into a single, humiliating one--the giant frog--and cast away into Limbo, in the hopes that the lack of evil in the place would shift their alignment through planar inertia. It worked, to an extent, but the slaadi still represent the violence and destruction of chaos more often than not.

Mr. Teapot

06-05-2009 02:39 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10449171)

I just always found it weird that the slaadi are so hierarchical and rigid in their structure.

I think the slaad really are a lot less rigid in their structure than the MM (or Planescape Monstrous Compendium) suggests. More likely, one of those infamous unnamed "sages" got to watch a limited portion of slaad reproduction, and generalized it into an ironclad rule. When in reality, slaad physiology is strange and random: any slaad might produce any other slaad, or no slaad at all, or some other species. Sometimes slaads bear new kinds of slaads, or slaads with skin color of one kind of slaad but the characteristics of a different kind.

You know, randomness.

Wakboth

06-05-2009 02:54 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10449411)

I think the slaad really are a lot less rigid in their structure than the MM (or Planescape Monstrous Compendium) suggests. More likely, one of those infamous unnamed "sages" got to watch a limited portion of slaad reproduction, and generalized it into an ironclad rule. When in reality, slaad physiology is strange and random: any slaad might produce any other slaad, or no slaad at all, or some other species. Sometimes slaads bear new kinds of slaads, or slaads with skin color of one kind of slaad but the characteristics of a different kind.

You know, randomness.

The Random Slaadi Characteristic Chart in 3e MM was a brilliant little touch. You could end up with odd-colored slaadi, or ones with huge mouths, tiny eyes (with eyebeams!), extra magical abilities and so on and on.

Why this never made an appearance in the more chart-heavy earlier editions, I really can't say.

Mr. Teapot

06-05-2009 04:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10449487)

Why this never made an appearance in the more chart-heavy earlier editions, I really can't say.

There was a random chart for generating demons in the 1st edition DMG, I believe. But not for Slaads, exactly.

Ragnarok_Engine

06-05-2009 01:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10449088)

As for conversing with slaadi... I think the low-end, low-int ones should be frogmalks - non sequiturs, random "jokes" a roomfull of slaadi chanting "DESU DESU DESU DESU" at you -

And so now I understand /b/, and am enlightened.

DMH

06-05-2009 07:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10449487)

The Random Slaadi Characteristic Chart in 3e MM was a brilliant little touch. You could end up with odd-colored slaadi, or ones with huge mouths, tiny eyes (with eyebeams!), extra magical abilities and so on and on.

Why this never made an appearance in the more chart-heavy earlier editions, I really can't say.

IIRC, the Hordlings in the 1e MM II had a random chart generator. Yeah, demons are random and chaos frogs aren't.

Lions Den Press has Iconic Bestiary which as a much better, non-frog, non-evil chaos critter meant to be an open content slaad. Lots of charts, though it is skewed towards vertebrates. I would have included inverts, plants, fungi and odds and ends to really provide a chaotic critter.

sim_james

06-05-2009 07:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10449088)

I think they would have been better if they weren't so implacably aggressive. Sure, if you actually attack one, it goes all berserker frog upon your nonbatrachian butt, but if you hold your swords, there's a good chance you can strike up a conversation with the slaad. Or it will ignore you. Or give you interesting things (for sufficiently chaotic values of "interesting"). Or, indeed, attack without any provocation; they're unpredictable, after all!

XANXOST AGREES! XANXOST SOMETIMES LIKES TO TALK TO OTHER BEINGS, BUT IS OFTEN SAD WHEN THEY ARE TOO BUSY BEING DIGESTED TO REPLY. BUT THEN SOMETIMES XANXOST BURPS AND IS HAPPY, BECAUSE OTHER THINGS ARE TALKING TO XANXOST NOW!

JRM

06-05-2009 11:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I agree with a lot of the previous posts on Slaadi.

The Monstrous Manual entry leaves a lot to be desired. I prefer a Slaad to be a lot less Evil and a lot more unpredictable. Having them follow a rigid hierarchy makes no sense to me, and I'd never use it.

To me, Slaadi should be ferociously individualistic, some may follow the lead of another Slaad but they don't do so out of any traditional command structure or hierarchy, but just because they admire their leader's style and ideas and want to emulate them.

They should also often act and think in ways that make no sense to most other creatures, like Dragonewts in RuneQuest. Slaadi should give the impression of being beyond the comprehension of most Mortal or Lawful beings, not necessarily insane but just bizarrely (plus, in the case of Slaadi, idiosyncratically) different in their priorities.

Oh, and throwing in one-paragraph entries on the Green/Grey/Death Slaads is really selling them short. I'd have preferred them to have cut them out and expanded the entries of the lesser Slaad, the higher ranking ones really deserve full-page entries of their own.

The Monstrous Manual did short-change quite a few of the more interesting monsters in a bit to squeeze in as many creatures as possible.

Zartes

06-06-2009 01:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10452755)
[snip] Yeah, demons are random and chaos frogs aren't. [snip]

I saw a theory somewhere that explained why all Slaad are giant frogs: Limbo is the plane of chaos. So why are its natives all giant frogs that follow a high structure?

because it doesn't make sense.

That's the point. They're all giant frogs because it totally stuffs up the chaoticness of Limbo. And that's what Chaos is all about: being chaotic, even if that means not being chaotic, just to shake things up.

(similarly, from planescape, there is a group called the Xaositects. They usually act even more random than the Slaad do. But they once spent a week being entirely normal, purely so they wouldn't be too predictable in their randomness)

demiurge1138

06-06-2009 02:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james (Post 10452790)
XANXOST AGREES! XANXOST SOMETIMES LIKES TO TALK TO OTHER BEINGS, BUT IS OFTEN SAD WHEN THEY ARE TOO BUSY BEING DIGESTED TO REPLY. BUT THEN SOMETIMES XANXOST BURPS AND IS HAPPY, BECAUSE OTHER THINGS ARE TALKING TO XANXOST NOW!

Oh, Xanxost. When I ran a Planescape game, he was often the giver of quests to my PCs, OH HO! He was friendly, and funny, and had a tendency to ask various smaller party members to sit in his mouth while he talked.

Wisely, nobody took him up on it.

As for the slaadi = giant frog thing, two explanations I've heard and liked are:

1) In Limbo, the answer to everything is giant frog, if you happen to be crazy (so slaadi reproduction is just their way of making everything fit into their giant frog worldview).

2) Slaadi are trend-whores, and giant frogs (thanks to the influence of slaad lords like Ygorl) are In. This author, a guy on ENWorld whose thread is here, also gave us statistics for other, less currently trendy slaadi shapes, like pachyderms, plants and monkeys.

Lugh

06-06-2009 03:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10454048)

2) Slaadi are trend-whores, and giant frogs (thanks to the influence of slaad lords like Ygorl) are In. This author, a guy on ENWorld whose thread is here, also gave us statistics for other, less currently trendy slaadi shapes, like pachyderms, plants and monkeys.

Oh, I like that. I might even have to use intelligent tables. Or shades of the color blue.

Naturally, I also had all slaadi using wild magic from Tome of Magic.

I've never used slaadi much myself. I just never got them. Maybe I'm not chaotic enough, I don't know. I get demons, devils, and even modrons. Slaadi just didn't fit the overall pattern. Which, I guess, is part of their nature.

JohnBiles

06-06-2009 08:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

"The noble race of the Slaad is often misunderstood by the races of the Prime Planes. And even by our neighbors. Let me begin with our origins.

We are now native to the plane you call Limbo, but which we now simply call Guaschelaz'ra. This week, anyway. We periodically rename it when the time is right. But originally, we came from a Prime Plane now long gone. This world was largely swampy and wet and a variety of reptiles ruled over it, along with fish, amphibians like our ancestors, and other things which liked it hot and wet.

rimshot

Thank you, I'll be here until I get bored.

Now, our ancestors gradually clawed their way up from being mere frogs to being a race of bipedal frog-like beings who went through the usual rounds of civilization and barbarism. However, the more barbaric members of our species, which you now call 'Bullywugs', eventually turned to demons and devils for aid against the civilized folk, who were forced to turn to desperate measures. The result destroyed our home plane. The more barbaric of our race who yet had not turned to evil became the Grippli. Some Bullywugs were saved by their demonic masters and other planes infected with them. Our civilized ancestors fled to the Outer Planes where the majority of them perished, but those of us who fled to Limbo survived at the cost of becoming both more and less than we were.

We cannot breed normally. Rather, we must transform other sentients into members of our kind. This is done voluntarily when possible; in such cases, the implanted bit of slaadness gradually, peacefully transforms the person into a fully functional slaad. Unfortunately, we have found most people fail to understand this is a transformation to a higher state, an improvement on their current meatbag body.

Involuntary transformation of others is the other option, taken only when dealing with hostile foes or when the slaad race has been badly depleted by war. The victim is torn apart by the newly birthed slaad; worse, it has little more maturity than a baby but the body of an adult. The result is the murderous lesser breeds of Slaad most adventurers clash with. Eventually, they attain maturity if they live that long, but a lot of them die. Worse, they can produce spawn. Thus, they are often a tremendous source of trouble but do make good shock troops in war.

Our race serves the Slaad Lords in order to survive; they counterbalance the gods and demon lords who would otherwise encroach on our territory, though we are often drawn into various insane struggles as a result. But there is nowhere else we can turn without abandoning this home and risking the extinction which came to our bretheren who fled to other planes.

Many of us go mad, but the rest of us are not insane; we are free, and prefer to spend our time carving private worlds out of the chaos, making art, studying things and continuing what we can of our ancestor's ways, though all of us must drop everything when our lords call.

Unfortunately, most of you Primes only meet those among us who have gone crazy or our insane war-spawn children. The rest of us have little incentive to visit the prime and are usually not out wandering the streets of Limbo, looking for trouble."

Zartes

06-06-2009 12:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JohnBiles (Post 10455417)
[snip]

rimshot

Thank you, I'll be here until I get bored.

[snip]

this instantly starts me thinking of all slaad being like Robin Williams...

DMH

06-06-2009 06:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10452755)
IIRC, the Hordlings in the 1e MM II had a random chart generator. Yeah, demons are random and chaos frogs aren't.

Yes, I am quoting myself- because I was wrong. Hordlings are not demons. They are native to The Grey Wastes (the NE plane) along with diaaks (those bird things). So NE outsiders are more chaotic than frogs?

JRM

06-06-2009 08:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10454048)

As for the slaadi = giant frog thing, two explanations I've heard and liked are:

1) In Limbo, the answer to everything is giant frog, if you happen to be crazy (so slaadi reproduction is just their way of making everything fit into their giant frog worldview).

2) Slaadi are trend-whores, and giant frogs (thanks to the influence of slaad lords like Ygorl) are In. This author, a guy on ENWorld whose thread is here, also gave us statistics for other, less currently trendy slaadi shapes, like pachyderms, plants and monkeys.

I like the modest way you omitted your own Slaad-a-Palooza thread on Enworld, demiurge. I remember there being a lot of cool 3E Slaadi on that.

Barghest

06-07-2009 01:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

>>>They expect that everything can heal as well as they can, and are disappointed when the little soft things with hair on their heads can't, and get ripped in half.<<<

Well, Heck! (or in this case, Limbo!) Maybe aggressive ass-whooping is an important part of Slaadi communication. Much like body language and facial expression, a lot of the meaning behind Slaadi language loses its nuance and depth without eye-gouging and light evisceration for emphasis.

It would stand to reason for a species (?) of fast-healing chaos frog monsters. They would adapt using what they had to work with, perhaps.

So, when you see a Slaadi, and you try to parley with it, and it rips your face off, it's not really attacking--it IS parleying, in the traditional, formal Slaadi manner. In fact, it would be disrespectful NOT to speak with the proper violent "emphasis" added. After all, as a communication method, it works fine with no problems where other Slaadi are involved. Who would have guessed the little newcomers were too fragile to even speak properly!

Not mauling your new friends is bad manners in Frogtown.

In fact, since breeding involves injecting a host with an egg capsule after softening it up in combat--maybe that Slaadi who seems to be trying to kill you is really flirting with you, stud.

demiurge1138

06-07-2009 02:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10456760)

I like the modest way you omitted your own Slaad-a-Palooza thread on Enworld, demiurge. I remember there being a lot of cool 3E Slaadi on that.

Well, I mentioned the Rather Small Book in a previous post, which was a compilation of my work on that thread plus extra stuff.

Pukako

06-07-2009 03:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Barghest (Post 10457365)

So, when you see a Slaadi, and you try to parley with it, and it rips your face off, it's not really attacking--it IS parleying, in the traditional, formal Slaadi manner. In fact, it would be disrespectful NOT to speak with the proper violent "emphasis" added. After all, as a communication method, it works fine with no problems where other Slaadi are involved. Who would have guessed the little newcomers were too fragile to even speak properly!

Not mauling your new friends is bad manners in Frogtown.

So given that fireballing or mauling Slaadi on sight is just saying `Howdy`, what do you have to do to annoy or upset them? Give them flowers?

Somewhere out there, a Sage with a Ring of Regeneration or something like that should have written a dictionary to Sladdi language. I hereby name him Borzak the Badly Maulled.

JRM

06-07-2009 05:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako (Post 10459392)

So given that fireballing or mauling Slaadi on sight is just saying `Howdy`, what do you have to do to annoy or upset them? Give them flowers?

Easy. Slaadi loathe Law/Order, so you just compliment them on their consistency and offer them a job as a filing clerk.:o

JRM

06-07-2009 05:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10459359)

Well, I mentioned the Rather Small Book in a previous post, which was a compilation of my work on that thread plus extra stuff.

Yes, but at least you didn't shill it. Anyhow, I've been re-reading the Slaad-a-Palooza thread and its inspired me to think of creating new Slaad.

My first idea is the Frog Slaad, a scrawny emerald-green creature with a serrated ruff around its neck, wrist-blades and many bizarre, paradoxical powers such as:

Quote:

Ineffable Frogness: A Frog Slaad is immune to all Divination spells, it does not register to detection spells, including detect chaos, nor does it appear to scry spells. Divinations which draw upon the wisdom of divine-level powers, such as contact outer plane, will give the answer "Frog" to any and all queries regarding a Frog Slaad.

Transfrogrify Weapon: Any artificial weapon that strikes a Frog Slaad will be turned to frogs before it can do any damage as if by a polymorph any object spell, unless the wielder or weapon succeeds in saving versus spells. This effect does not work on living creatures or natural weapons such as claws or fangs.

Size of the Polydimensional Frog: A Frog Slaad can vary its size from Fine to Gargantuan at will, ranging from the scale of the tiniest tree frog to the greatest Froghemoth. It can even assume two different size categories at the same time, being simultaneously enormous beyond belief and negligibly small and gaining the benefits of both scales. These size benefits are included in the statistics above.

A Frog Slaad does not gain the benefits of Size of the Polydimensional Frog when it is dazed by an order's wrath or deafened by dictum, these spells limit it to its default Small size, applying the following changes:

(More Stuff)

I have some other ideas for the Frog Slaad which are almost as silly.:D

Barghest

06-07-2009 08:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Hmmm. Good question.

Possibly Slaadi see direct hand-to-hand combat as the only proper language enhancer. Using a sword would be the equivalent of rolling your R's pretentiously. Using magic to attack would be the equivalent of adopting a fake British accent when you aren't British, like Madonna.

Which would lead to interesting encounters, like a Slaadi reacting to a Fireball by crying out, "Ooooooo! Aren't WE high-falutin'! Off to play the Grahnd Piahno, eh, Youah Mahjesty?"

If you really want to piss them off, the only way is to short-circuit the physical avenues of communication completely. Use telepathy. There is no insult more mortal to Slaadi pseudo-culture. How gauche! Death Slaadi only have telepathy so that they can provoke deadly fights. They get confused when this doesn't work.

EmperorSeth

06-08-2009 01:30 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10459623)

Easy. Slaadi loathe Law/Order, so you just compliment them on their consistency and offer them a job as a filing clerk.:o

Or insist that it's a much better show than CSI! :)

JRM

06-08-2009 07:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10460485)

Or insist that it's a much better show than CSI! :)

Well that goes without slaying, those chaos frogfolk just love the TV show Crime Slaad Investigation.;)

celebrityomnipath

06-09-2009 05:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10463573)

Well that goes without slaying, those chaos frogfolk just love the TV show Crime Slaad Investigation.;)

We tried to play a cops gaem of Warhammer (WFRP not 40K) where we were CSI, as in Crime Scene Interrogation. So that we would go to crime scenes and give people their initial beating, before they hauled them down to teh station for teh serious working over. They don't have DNA in Warhammer, but what they do have is violence.

Sadly it didn't work out as we all rolled useless classes (except for the bounty hunter guy), so we were informants for an inquisitor instead. We wanted him to give us a letter of marque de Sade, but sadly he wouldn't.

JRM

06-09-2009 07:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10463573)
Well that goes without slaying, those chaos frogfolk just love the TV show Crime Slaad Investigation.;

Oops, I just realized I made an error there, mixing up my TV shows.

Of course, the series in question is Crime Slaad Instigation.

The Crime Slaad* are a little known variety of Slaad that roams the Prime Material encouraging or committing law-breaking. They do Investigate crimes, but only to reward the perpetrators!

*Another addition to my list of monsters I must get around to statting up sometime.

noisms

06-09-2009 10:41 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Slug, Giant

Not a heck of a lot to say about this creature at all, to be honest - except that I like the MM's portrayal of an unstoppable strong monster crushing down walls and doors, squeezing through incredibly narrow gaps and burrowing under things in an attempt to devour hapless adventurers. A great set-piece if it ever comes off.

Also - Giant Slugs are up to 50' long. In my mind I always imagine them as being not all that much bigger than a human being, but 50' is getting on for sandworm size. The Giant Slug which Tanis and pals came across in the first Dragonlance trilogy wasn't that big, surely.

My favourite Giant Slug idea is a riff on what this thread threw up on the Giant Crayfish. Picture a deep, isolated, almost impassable valley in which a great 50' slug makes its lair - along with a tribe of inbred, backwards humans who worship it as a God and feed it living sacrifices. Over time their prayers and veneration have given the mindless monstrosity a form of divinity, and it expends all of its will on attracting travellers to the valley to be eaten...

JRM

06-10-2009 12:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10469197)

Slug, Giant

Not a heck of a lot to say about this creature at all, to be honest - except that I like the MM's portrayal of an unstoppably strong monster crushing down walls and doors, squeezing through incredibly narrow gaps and burrowing under things in an attempt to devour hapless adventurers. A great set-piece if it ever comes off.

Well, I can think of a few things to say...

To begin with, I feel the AD&D giant slug is obviously [S]ripped off from[/S] inspired by Robert E Howard's story "The Hall of the Dead", including the spitting acid bit.

In that story Conan killed the slug by dropping various massive objects upon it from a rooftop, which ironically enough would not work on the AD&D version since they're immune to blunt trauma!

Speaking of spitting acid, in the 1st edition MM the giant slug had the same exception-based acid accuracy rule (90% minus 10% per 10 yards range), but they forgot to say how much damage the acid did. I was constantly torn between making it instantly deadly (save vs breath weapon or dissolve into goo!) or trivial (a standard flask of acid only does 2d4 damage according to the 1E DMG).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10469197)

Also - Giant Slugs are up to 50' long. In my mind I always imagine them as being not all that much bigger than a human being, but 50' is getting on for sandworm size. The Giant Slug which Tanis and pals came across in the first Dragonlance trilogy wasn't that big, surely.

I've got around that in my homebrew by saying giant slugs become adults between the size of a halfling and a human, but they just never stop growing. If one manages to live long enough it becomes a Huge (or Gargantuan!) monster that strikes terror where'er it goes.

Oh, and in my game some folk have found a use for giant slugs ... they eat them. Turns out they are an very efficient means of converting organic garbage into edible flesh, and are the main source of protein for the poor folk in a couple of major cities.

Shame they taste like a mixture of plasticine and bile, but you can't have everything.

Proper processing and seasoning can turn them into a somewhat palatable mince, which is usually served up as slugburgers or slugloaf.

Finally, I'd have liked them to make more of a slug's adverse reaction to salt. The Monstrous Manual's entry hints at this, the relevant paragraph being:

Quote:

Normal slugs have a nasty reaction to salt when it is sprinkled on them. They dry up and die in 1d4+1 rounds. It is unlikely that this technique is adaptable to the giant variety, but some fabrication and summoning spells might be adaptable if there ever seemed to be a need for it."

But I would have liked a bit more than that - maybe the suggestion that a pound of salt thrown in a giant slug's 'face' will do it X amount of damage and may cause it to hesitate for a round, while covering your trail with a few pounds of NaCl will prevent a giant slug tracking you. I can also imagine a scenario in which the party are manhandling a hogshead (or three) of salt around a dungeon in order to kill the giant slug that slithers around in it.

demiurge1138

06-10-2009 01:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10469533)

But I would have liked a bit more than that - maybe the suggestion that a pound of salt thrown in a giant slug's 'face will do it X amount of damage and may cause it to hesitate for a round, while covering your trail with a few pounds of NaCl will prevent a giant slug tracking you. I can also imagine a scenario in which the party are manhandling a hogshead (or three) of salt around a dungeon in order to kill the giant slug that slithers around in it.

In the 3e conversion in Dragon Magazine, salt acted like acid. A flask did 1d6 damage, immersion would do 10d6 a round.

celebrityomnipath

06-10-2009 02:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10469533)

Proper processing and seasoning can turn them into a somewhat palatable mince, which is usually served up as slugburgers or slugloaf.

Hmmmm Slurm...

Mr. Teapot

06-10-2009 04:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10469533)

Oh, and in my game some folk have found a use for giant slugs ... they eat them. Turns out they are an very efficient means of converting organic garbage into edible flesh, and are the main source of protein for the poor folk in a couple of major cities.

Shame they taste like a mixture of plasticine and bile, but you can't have everything.

Frenchmen eat snails, right? It's not that different.

Actually, if you look at the various different things human beings eat in the real world, it becomes apparent that someone, somewhere has tried to eat just about anything organic you can get your hands on. So you have to wonder what cultures in D&D eat Giant Slugs, or Harpies, or Remorhazes or whatever. The thread has discussed salvaging monster body parts for armor, but what about salvaging dead Morkoth parts for the local fancy seafood restaurant?

Alternately, you could have a PC or NPC travelling the globe to kill and eat exotic creatures. Like how Charles Darwin ate every species he recorded on the voyage of the Beagle.

Lukas Sjöström

06-10-2009 04:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10470538)
Frenchmen eat snails, right? It's not that different.

Not only Frenchmen, I'll have you know. However, I suspect eating a Giant Snail would also demand finding a Giant Garlic.

Barghest

06-10-2009 05:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

>>>except that I like the MM's portrayal of an unstoppable strong monster crushing down walls and doors, squeezing through incredibly narrow gaps and burrowing under things in an attempt to devour hapless adventurers. A great set-piece if it ever comes off.

Also - Giant Slugs are up to 50' long.<<<

Oh man, and I was worried that I wouldn't be able to come up with any idea on how to use the Giant Slug.

But it seems, from the description, that they would make excellent seige engines.

Picture it--fifty-foot Giant Slugs, fitted with howdah platforms like Hannibal's elephants, steered and prodded on by goblins, laying a seige to a castle. The defenders of the castle have used up all their salt and killed half a dozen of the things, yet still the goblins and their mighty War Slugs come, bashing and spurting corrosive goop.

The only hope is that the PC's can breach the siege line and fetch a massive amount of salt. The only place they can find in the whole kingdom that might have enough is a local salt mine, where dwells a mad necromancer and his salt-encrusted zombie servants. Good digs for a necromancer doing research, keeps the bodies from rotting too fast, don't ya know.

Perhaps the PC's can return with a wagonload of smushed salt-zombies to load into the catapults. Ka-Thuuuuuung!

Kakita Kojiro

06-10-2009 12:36 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10470538)

Alternately, you could have a PC or NPC travelling the globe to kill and eat exotic creatures. Like how Charles Darwin ate every species he recorded on the voyage of the Beagle.

Heck, I've got some older chemistry books that have lists of organic chemicals describing how they look, smell, and taste.

People will put anything in their mouths in the interest of Science!

... which just makes me wonder if Slaad caviar might not be a delicacy, somewhere. Another opportunity for Slaad farming.

Mikelibrarian

06-10-2009 12:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

There was a module once, I think it had something to do with the 1st edition Manual of the Planes, that featured a babau demon mounted on a giant slug. He was one of Demogorgon's soldiers.

DMH

06-10-2009 06:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

It inspired me to create a slug kaiju for Mutant Future. The slugasaur is effectively immune to human sized weapons and salt because of the layer of slime on the skin. Anyone trying to walking on it has a chance of drowning in the stuff.

Giant slugs can be nifty alternatives to cubes for dungeon clean up. If the party kills one that is in a typical hallway, how long should it take for them to hack through the body to reach the other side?

DMH

06-10-2009 06:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

And one thing I think is missing is the giant sea slug. The coloration could be used like color spray or something similar.

Belchion

06-10-2009 06:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Barghest (Post 10470833)

But it seems, from the description, that they would make excellent siege engines.

I had a similar idea, though expected the slugs to be a bit smaller. My idea was that an evil druid conjured all normal slugs within several miles radius and combining them into a couple giant slugs. They wanted to use the slugs to wreak havoc on the backside of the town (by sending the slugs slithering over the wall) just a little before the main army tries an attack at the front door.

JRM

06-10-2009 07:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Barghest (Post 10470833)

Picture it--fifty-foot Giant Slugs, fitted with howdah platforms like Hannibal's elephants, steered and prodded on by goblins, laying a seige to a castle. The defenders of the castle have used up all their salt and killed half a dozen of the things, yet still the goblins and their mighty War Slugs come, bashing and spurting corrosive goop.

The only hope is that the PC's can breach the siege line and fetch a massive amount of salt. The only place they can find in the whole kingdom that might have enough is a local salt mine, where dwells a mad necromancer and his salt-encrusted zombie servants. Good digs for a necromancer doing research, keeps the bodies from rotting too fast, don't ya know.

Perhaps the PC's can return with a wagonload of smushed salt-zombies to load into the catapults. Ka-Thuuuuung!

The Great Slug War would never have started if it hadn't been for the Traders' Guild trying to sabotage the goblin slugherders.

They just couldn't cope with the competition, those slugherders were undercutting them by a huge margin. Have you seen the freight charges you get from shipping goods on a cargo slug? Just one of those things is more than the equal of a normal wagon train. It can carry as much gear as a small ship, is as fast as a draught horse or mule, runs off garbage and only needs a single Slug Shaman mahout to crew it.

Plus, the Otyugh Sewage Workers Union were outraged by the goblins' proposals to replace their sewage-processing efforts with slugs, which looked a lot cheaper than the otyughs' services as the goblins could sell the resulting slugflesh.

So, the Traders used all kinds of bribery and tricks to ruin the goblin's honest business - hiring adventurers to sneak slug-eating monsters into the goblins' slughpens, bribing the city council to spread salt on the streets to "protect our children from slipping on ice" etc.

The final straw was when they released a wild giant carnivorous slug into the city's farmland and tried to pin it on the goblins.

It could only end in war.

Oh, did you know that the ogres heard "gobbos are getting rich riding giant slugs" and, being ogres, completely misinterpreted it. So, when they tried to duplicate the goblins success the results were, ah, pretty ugly.

JRM

06-10-2009 07:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10472594)

... which just makes me wonder if Slaad caviar might not be a delicacy, somewhere. Another opportunity for Slaad farming.

So, do you cut open the Slaad's hands to get the eggs out or wait for them to implant something (or someone) and cut the egg out of them?

Actually "Slaad egg pellet" sounds rather hard and unappetizing to me, maybe the embryonic Slaad that grow in its host is what's considered a delicacy. They may taste differently depending on what creature they're parasitizing.

DanSolo

06-11-2009 08:28 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

<http://hypertextbook.com/facts/AngieYee.shtml>

0.013m/s

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Arion_ater

0.15m long

50ft = 15.24m

-> 101.6 times longer

If 101.6 times faster...

-> 1.32m/s

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Walking>

"An average walking speed is about 6 to 7 km/h"

-> 1.66m/s

Oh well, no one ever listens to us "TO SCALE!" nerds anyway.

JRM

06-11-2009 09:44 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo (Post 10476688)

<http://hypertextbook.com/facts/AngieYee.shtml>

0.013m/s

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Arion_ater

0.15m long

50ft = 15.24m
-> 101.6 times longer

If 101.6 times faster...
-> 1.32m/s

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Walking>
"An average walking speed is about 6 to 7 km/h"
-> 1.66m/s

Oh well, no one ever listens to us "TO SCALE!" nerds anyway.

Well I'm sure you know living creatures' speed doesn't scale like that, but we might as well use that approach just for fun. There's probably magic helping out somewhere anyhow, it usually does in AD&D!

0.013m/s seems rather fast, considering all the other snailspeeds quoted in the AngieYee webpage are several times slower (0.0018-0.0034m/s, if we ignore Mr. Riseborough snail's disappointing performance).

Also, a common garden snail Helix aspersa is smaller than a black slug Arion ater, being 3-7cm or so long judging by the ones crawling around our garden, so should we be scaling by the snail or the slug?

What about this webpage's measurements. The measured an Arion subfuscus slug travelling at 36mm/min. Judging by the ruler these slugs are about 1cm long.

So, 36mm/min -> 0.6mm/s -> 0.0006m/s
Length = 0.01m

Scaling to 50 feet (15.24m) speed multiplies by $15.24/0.01 = 1524$
Speed = $0.0006 * 1524 = 0.9144\text{m/s}$.

That's about 4 km/h, or two-thirds human walking pace.

EDIT: That 0.6mm/s is a lot slower than the AngieYee speeds, if we use those 1.8-3.4mm/s for a 1cm slug we could easily get a slug that can slide as fast as a man can sprint. (It works out ~12-22 km/h)

6inTruder

06-11-2009 10:18 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

GAH!!!

I've been waiting for Slug, Giant for like EVAR! And I totally miss the start. And you don't even go into its awesome exception based design?! Like having THACO, but you roll some semi-random percentile to see if it spits on you. Seriously, WHY does it have a THACO?!

JRM

06-11-2009 05:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10477184)

GAH!!!

I've been waiting for Slug, Giant for like EVAR! And I totally miss the start. And you don't even go into its awesome exception based design?! Like having THACO, but you roll some semi-random percentile to see if it spits on you. Seriously, WHY does it have a THACO?!

Obviously it has a THACO for when it wants to bite you.

Which does a lot less less damage. (1d12 vs 4d8)

And is usually less accurate. (90% hit at under 10' range = AC6 with the slug's THACO of 9)

Why would it pick the less effective option?

Well, it's not Non-intelligent for nothing!

P.S. I did mention the percentage-based spitting. :)

Wakboth

06-11-2009 05:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I'm trying to make a joke about how this entry revitalized a sluggish thread, but failing... partly because the slaadi already had everyone hopping with excitement. :D

DMH

06-11-2009 07:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

'Both, I see you back on A.net's forum and you are a dead man ;)

Anyways, what preys on giant slugs? They obviously survive to adulthood and very large sizes. It can't be just people.

noisms

06-11-2009 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10477184)

GAH!!!

I've been waiting for Slug, Giant for like EVAR! And I totally miss the start. And you don't even go into its awesome exception based design?! Like having THACO, but you roll some semi-random percentile to see if it spits on you. Seriously, WHY does it have a THACO?!

Oh yeah, I dropped the ball on the exception based design there. But I think there have been more egregious examples - the Leprechaun, if I recall.... I'll have to go back and check.

The weird thing about the acid attack is - why does it even need to use percentiles? What's wrong with just applying penalties to hit in order to make it less accurate? Very odd.

The Last Conformist

06-12-2009 12:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10478811)

Oh yeah, I dropped the ball on the exception based design there. But I think there have been more egregious examples - the Leprechaun, if I recall.... I'll have to go back and check.

The weird thing about the acid attack is - why does it even need to use percentiles? What's wrong with just applying penalties to hit in order to make it less accurate? Very odd.

There's probably nothing particularly wrong with it - it just wasn't the first thing that occurred to the writer.

demiurge1138

06-12-2009 01:46 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10478748)

Anyways, what preys on giant slugs? They obviously survive to adulthood and very large sizes. It can't be just people.

Giant hedgehogs.

Ginkomortus

06-12-2009 01:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10480050)

Giant hedgehogs.

What, in scale with the Giant Slugs? That hedgehog has got to be huge! Like, Tarrasquean huge!

No, this is a problem solved, like many things, with a race of Hedgehogfolk.

Exception based design? They have a 100% chance of being spiky. And a 300% chance of being overwhelmingly cute.

Mr. Teapot

06-12-2009 03:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10480103)
And a 300% chance of being overwhelmingly cute.

-10% for every fifteen feet away you are from them, you mean.

Mr. Teapot

06-12-2009 03:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10477041)
That's about 4 km/h, or two-thirds human walking pace.

So then I have to ask: what does the "movement: 6" for the Giant Slug MM entry mean? It's been sufficiently long since I played 2nd ed (fifteen years or so) that I can't tell what that number means without some unit of measurement. Except I recall that when you combined the movement speeds with the one minute long combat rounds of 2nd ed, you had everyone apparently walking through molasses all the time.

Looking at humanoid creatures I see they typically have movement of 9 or 12. so that wouldn't be too far off from the projected 150% of giant slug speed. (Humans don't have a listed movement speed in the MM, for some reason.) Assuming animal speed scaled on a 1:1 ratio with size, of course. Which it obviously wouldn't.

Mikaze

06-12-2009 03:22 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The notion of anything putting a giant slug in its mouth is not conducive to one's appetite. :(

JRM

06-12-2009 05:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10480437)

So then I have to ask: what does the "movement: 6" for the Giant Slug MM entry mean? It's been sufficiently long since I played 2nd ed (fifteen years or so) that I can't tell what that number means without some unit of measurement. Except I recall that when you combined the movement speeds with the one minute long combat rounds of 2nd ed, you had everyone apparently walking through molasses all the time.

Oh blast, that means a couple of my previous posts were in error. I misread the entry the last time I looked at it, reading the HD of 12 as its movement.

Anyhows, in answer to your question, I don't remember offhand whether 2E AD&D is any different, but 1st edition AD&D scaled creature-scale movement speed as table-inches per round, were a table-inch was either 10 feet or ten yards, depending on whether the terrain was open/outdoors or not, and a round was a minute.

So, an unencumbered human with move 12 travels at $12 * 30 * 60 = 21,600$ feet per hour, or almost exactly 4 mph, and a giant slug with move 6 obviously travels at half that speed, or as fast as a heavily encumbered human.

Upon reflection, I'd prefer giant slugs to have move 12. The one in the Conan story could slither as fast as Conan could run.

Ginkomortus

06-12-2009 06:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10480434)

-10% for every fifteen feet away you are from them, you mean.

Eh, let's go for broke... -10% for every sixteen feet away you are, but with a +25% modifier if the Hedgehogfolk in question has a below average intelligence and speaks Common.

Wait, no, lolspeak is already taken by the Otyughs...

JRM

06-12-2009 07:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10481281)

Wait, no, lolspeak is already taken by the Otyughs...

In my experience otyughs never use lolspeech. Most swear worse than sailors instead, uttering a constant stream of oaths and expletives.

Well what do you expect, they're foul mouthed.

Strangething

06-12-2009 08:25 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Is anyone else thinking of the end of Monsters Vs Aliens?

"As we speak, Escargantuan is very slowly advancing on Paris."

DanSolo

06-13-2009 04:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Well I guess my idea was that even though giant slugs are pretty nasty, there's generally no need to bother fighting them. In fact, I've no idea how they make it as carnivores at all with a move of 6. What's their staple, geriatric elephants?

JRM

06-13-2009 10:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo (Post 10485801)

Well I guess my idea was that even though giant slugs are pretty nasty, there's generally no need to bother fighting them. In fact, I've no idea how they make it as carnivores at all with a move of 6. What's their staple, geriatric elephants?

Haven't you heard the maxim "Slow and steady catches the elephant?":cool:

Giant slugs may only have speed 6, but they have enormous stamina and a keen sense of smell. They simply track prey until it collapses from exhaustion, squeezing through or smashing through most obstacles they cannot circumnavigate.

For a long time, sages were puzzled how an enormous creature could pursue a man-sized victim until it drops and get enough nourishment for it to be worth the effort. The secret can be revealed in one word...

Lubrication!

Giant slug slime turns out to be magically slick until it is exposed to air for a few rounds, and this allows the slug to slide along with almost no effort at all.

The first first alchemist-engineer who discovered how to preserve its properties to oil machinery became incredibly wealthy.

Before that, slug lube was only used by the most sordid elements of society.:eek:

And people say they are useless! They're garbage disposals, a cheap source of meat, heavy-duty cargo transports, living siege engines and an abundant source of industrial acid and lubricants. Modern D&D civilization wouldn't be able to function without the noble Giant Slug!

noisms

06-18-2009 08:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sorry this took so long. Real life getting in the way again. Let's kick aside all this tumbleweed and press on with the Ss!

Snake

A marathon real-world animal entry! We haven't had one of these since I think the Ms. And another nice summary description that nobody on earth needs: "Snakes are long, slender reptiles that can be found anywhere in the entire world, even in the coldest arctic regions." Thanks for that, MM writers.

This entry gets a big thumbs up from me for all the pure instakill goodness that is distilled in it - not to mention a cool random poison generation chart, which I love.

Amphisbaena

This is a snake without a tail - both ends finish in a head, which bites to kill instantly. It travels by biting its own tail and making itself into a hoop, which then rolls around.

Boalisk

As the name suggests, a snake with deadly gaze. Except (!) it doesn't turn you to stone - it infects you with a mummy-esque rotting disease.

Constrictor Snake

You probably know what this is. Some "magical" ones can sway to hypnotise their prey as they constrict. Pretty cool, except...it only works on creatures of animal intelligence or less. Snore.

Giant Constrictor Snake

Mostly the same as above, although the 100' long "snow serpent" is also detailed. It has FUR and a pelt worth 2,000 gps.

Heway

An intelligent snake with a sinister power - the ability to exude poison through its skin, which it uses to foul water sources by swimming around in them. It then waits for the poisoned water to have its deadly effect - presumably while twirling a moustache and chuckling maniacally. It can also hypnotise potential prey and lead them back to its cave to be desired.

This snake, more than any other, should have "adventure hook" tattood on its forehead.

Poisonous Snake

Random poison generation comes into play here - the DM can roll a dice to find out what kind of poison the snake uses. Effects range from Death to Incapacitated to "Damage".

Giant Poisonous Snake

These are all deadly; rather ambiguously we are told that "some" varieties cause 3-18 points of damage even in the event of a successful save.

Giant Sea Snake

This snake can constrict and crush small ships, which doesn't leave much hope for a single player character. Occasionally they flock in swarms of hundreds of thousands - typically the "reason is unknown" to sages. Another adventure hook for you.

Spitting Snake

These snakes spit poison, generation identically to the ordinary variety of snake. Oddly, this means that there is no blindness effect - even though the MM goes on to describe the spitting cobra as an obvious real world example. Hmm.

Jaculi

An arboreal variety which can leap on prey from up to 50' and are twice as deadly as the ordinary kind.

Elder Serpent

These creatures gain intelligence as they grow older and can speak "with a lisp". Rumours also tell of a Grand Snakemaster, an immortal serpent whose shedded skin can both heal and boost Wisdom.

DMH

06-18-2009 09:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

sim_james

06-18-2009 10:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10508803)
Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

Siberian Snow Snake.

Wakboth

06-18-2009 10:47 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10508803)
Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

Well, we have adders here in Finland, and apparently their range extends north of the Arctic Circle. (They spend the winters in hibernation, naturally.)

As for the entry itself, amphisbaena and jaculi come from medieval bestiaries, which probably got them from Pliny or some other classical writer. Not sure about the heway, although it sounds mythical enough.

Thane of Fife

06-19-2009 02:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

A quick google search suggests that the Heway comes from African folklore.

Also, you must have missed it Noisms, but the Spitting Snake has a very explicit line stating that its spittle can blind victims (for 2-12 hours).

Äkräs

06-19-2009 03:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10509117)
Well, we have adders here in Finland, and apparently their range extends north of the Arctic Circle. (They spend the winters in hibernation, naturally.)

Yeah, but they have a trouble multiplying there. Not enough logs, you see ...

celebrityomnipath

06-19-2009 03:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10508803)
Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

<http://img150.imageshack.us/img150/1...owserpentc.jpg>

6inTruder

06-19-2009 04:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)
Amphisbaena

This is a snake without a tail - both ends finish in a head, which bites to kill instantly. It travels by biting its own tail and making itself into a hoop, which then rolls around.

So it bites its own face?

Quote:

Heway

An intelligent snake with a sinister power - the ability to exude poison through its skin, which it uses to foul water sources by swimming around in them. It then waits for the poisoned water to have its deadly effect - presumably while twirling a moustache and chuckling maniacally. It can also hypnotise potential prey and lead them back to its cave to be desired.

This snake, more than any other, should have "adventure hook" tattooed on its forehead.

Al-qadim. Which had some amazingly interesting monsters.

JRM

06-19-2009 06:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10509991)
A quick google search suggests that the Heway comes from African folklore.

Yes, it's Ethiopian, I came across an interesting account of it during my internet peregrinations at the start of the year:

Quote:

The Well of Heway

MENSA BET-ABRAHE FOLKTALE

From The Serpent's Tale By Gregory McNamee

Like many desert peoples the world over, the Mensa Bet-Abrahe of Ethiopia connect snakes real and fabulous with water. It is a useful diagnostic, for snakes are often to be found sheltering near dryland oases throughout the world.

Among the serpents there is a large snake called heway. His color is white, and his eyes are big. Now this heway kills by his leer, be it a man or an animal. But if men, before heway looks at them, notice him first and run away closing their eyes tight, they are saved from him. If, on the other hand, heway sees them first, be it a man or an animal, they die suddenly on the spot. But he is not seen very often. They say that in the days of old some people died of his glance. Once heway drank water from a well. And after him cowherds came down there and drew water for their cattle out of the well into the trough. And when the first division of the cattle had tasted the water, they fell dead.

The herdsmen went with the rest of the cattle to another well and watered them from it. And the first well they called the Well of Heway, as it is told; but they did not see heway, it may have been merely something imagined. And men say, cursing: "Drink from the Well of Heway!" And again, of a man with the evil eye they say: "His face is like that of heway; it is disagreeable."

So, basically it's the local equivalent of the medieval basilisk - a reptile so venomous it can kill you by looking at you, or by touching water you drink later. At least the Monstrous Manual version downgraded its deadly gaze to hypnotism! I suppose there may be some alternative legends where it mesmerizes its victims instead.

JRM

06-19-2009 06:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10508803)
Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

No need, didn't you see were Noisms mentioned the furry 100' long "snow serpent"?:cool:

Clearly they're talking about the AD&D world, where the arctic is crawling with snakes, worms, giant toads and other reptiles (in the ancient Greek "crawling creature" sense of the word, reptile, of course).

Mr. Teapot

06-19-2009 06:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10508803)
Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

I bet you can't name any fire breathing flying lizards on Earth, either. Or any lion/eagle hybrids living anywhere on this planet. Or other intelligent species of humanoids still alive. Or a lot of other things that exist in D&D or most other fantasy fiction.

So what is your point?

JRM

06-19-2009 06:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)

Snake

Constrictor Snake

You probably know what this is. Some "magical" ones can sway to hypnotise their prey as they constrict. Pretty cool, except...it only works on creatures of animal intelligence or less. Snore.

Simple to get around that, just make it an Elder Serpent, their hypno-gaze works on people as well as animals.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)

Poisonous Snake

There's another little titbit at the end of this subentry, "lack mambas are the fastest known snakes and can reach 30 across open ground." That's movement speed 30, or faster than a race horse!

I'll note that the variable onset time for its deadly venom can be important if the party have an antitoxin or an appropriate counterspell, although if they don't it doesn't do them any good if the poison kills in 1 round or 2-8, except for giving them more time to make their own eulogy, or curse the cleric for not prepping neutralize poison.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)

Giant Sea Snake

This snake can constrict and crush small ships, which doesn't leave much hope for a single player character. Occasionally they flock in swarms of hundreds of thousands - typically the "reason is unknown" to sages. Another adventure hook for you.

What adventure hook did you have in mind? The Sea Caballeros have to drive their hippocampus herd through a giant sea snake migration? The PCs have to defeat a coven of sea hags led by a marine green hag who have sent a (whatever the collective noun for these creatures is - an armada of giant sea snakes? a twining? a sargasso?) of these monsters to torment/extort a fishing town.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)
Elder Serpent

These creatures gain intelligence as they grow older and can speak "with a lisp". Rumours also tell of a Grand Snakemaster, an immortal serpent whose shedded skin can both heal and boost Wisdom.

I feel these have more adventuring potential, either as lowish-level opponents or creatures the PCs have to negotiate with - maybe the elder serpent knows something they want it to tell them, or they're competing with other parties for the skin the Grand Snakemaster is about to shed.

noisms

06-19-2009 10:59 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10510334)
So it bites its own face?

According to the MM one head grabs the other at the neck. Not technically the tail, I suppose.

noisms

06-19-2009 11:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10508803)
Name one arctic snake on Earth. I dare you.

Adders. (The European variety.) According to wikipedia, which as we know never lies, their range extends north of the Arctic circle.

Kakita Kojiro

06-19-2009 12:30 PM

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)
Amphisbaena

This is a snake without a tail - both ends finish in a head, which bites to kill instantly. It travels by biting its own tail and making itself into a hoop, which then rolls around.

Warning: do not use a hoop-snake in a group with biologists who are somewhat whimsically immature at times... unless you want play to screech to a halt while everyone speculates how the poor thing poops.

... and then, digress onto snake reproductive organs, hemipenes, and other such. (although, that was a bit interesting.)

Sleeper

06-19-2009 12:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10512185)

Warning: do not use a hoop-snake in a group with biologists who are somewhat whimsically immature at times... unless you want play to screech to a halt while everyone speculates how the poor thing poops.

... and then, digress onto snake reproductive organs, hemipenes, and other such. (although, that was a bit interesting.)

The hoop-form is a biological version of a supercollider. The poop begins picking up speed as it passes repeatedly through the digestive track until it collides with poop going the other way, obliterating itself in a magical fury. This energy is used to help propel the snake forward.

Suspension of disbelief is a fragile thing :)

demiurge1138

06-19-2009 03:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10512185)

Warning: do not use a hoop-snake in a group with biologists who are somewhat whimsically immature at times... unless you want play to screech to a halt while everyone speculates how the poor thing poops.

... and then, digress onto snake reproductive organs, hemipenes, and other such. (although, that was a bit interesting.)

It poops like anything with a one-way gut. It just vomits it out. Now, the question is whether it vomits from the opposite head of the one that ingested, the same head, or if it's random...

hida_jiremi

06-19-2009 05:14 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10512654)

It poops like anything with a one-way gut. It just vomits it out. Now, the question is whether it vomits from the opposite head of the one that ingested, the same head, or if it's random...

Now I'm thinking about the possibility that one head always gets stuck with "potty duty," and seeing an encounter that goes like this:

DM: A hoop snake uncoils before you, revealing two heads--one on either end of its serpentine body!

Players: De waa?

DM: Hey, thief, you were carrying a bunch of peppermints on you, right?

Thief: Yeah, why?

DM: One head of the hoop-snake keeps making spitting motions as it lashes out at you, desperately trying to consume your backpack.

Players: De waa?

Or maybe I'm the only one amused here. :D

Jeremy Puckett

JRM

06-19-2009 05:32 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10512185)

Warning: do not use a hoop-snake in a group with biologists who are somewhat whimsically immature at times... unless you want play to screech to a halt while everyone speculates how the poor thing poops.

... and then, digress onto snake reproductive organs, hemipenes, and other such. (although, that was a bit interesting.)

Actually, the North American Hoop Snake is a different reptile, having just one head and a deadly-tail horn on the other end.

As for the Amphisbaena, maybe it has two guts with two cloaca and two sets of reproductive organs, one at each end. That could make its mating practices rather unusual.

Double the heads, double the fun.:o

Hmm, that makes me want to write a scenario were the PCs are hired to capture a live specimen of the extraordinarily rare hermaphroditic amphisbaena, that is male at one end and female at the other? Do you have any idea how difficult it can be to determine the sex of a harmless regular snake, let alone one with a deadly venomous head at each end that wants to bite you repeatedly?

DMH

06-19-2009 08:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10510877)

I bet you can't name any fire breathing flying lizards on Earth, either. Or any lion/eagle hybrids living anywhere on this planet. Or other intelligent species of humanoids still alive. Or a lot of other things that exist in D&D or most other fantasy fiction.

So what is your point?

But those aren't based on real animals. Until this entry, all those that were based on real animals used real work information (or close to it with Peta girl).

And I find it mind boggling that there is a snake that has to hibernate for most of its life. How does it not starve every winter?

Lugh

06-19-2009 09:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10513189)

And I find it mind boggling that there is a snake that has to hibernate for most of its life. How does it not starve every winter?

Actually, most snakes can get by on only one good meal a year. Even most pets only eat about once a month. By going into hibernation, it essentially shuts everything down, so it doesn't need more than a bare trickle of energy.

Also, most things in the arctic starve during the winter. Watch a documentary on polar bears. They specifically have to gorge themselves all summer in order to make it through the winter.

Besides, it's considerably less weird than the toads that can hibernate. Many will burrow down into the mud at the bottom of a lake for the winter, where they don't even breathe. There have been reported cases of someone breaking open a clay brick, a toad falling out, and, after a couple minutes, hopping away.

Truth is, after all, stranger than fiction.

DMH

06-19-2009 10:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Snakes and polar bears are apples and oranges. Mammals regulate their body temperature a lot more effectively than reptiles.

I shouldn't have asked how do they keep from starving, but rather how do they keep from freezing? Snakes aren't goldfish or polar bears.

Sleeper

06-20-2009 01:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10513461)

Snakes and polar bears are apples and oranges. Mammals regulate their body temperature a lot more effectively than reptiles.

I shouldn't have asked how do they keep from starving, but rather how do they keep from freezing? Snakes aren't goldfish or polar bears.

During winter up to 65% of the water in the wood frog (which lives in most of Alaska) can freeze without harming the animal. Accumulations of urea and glucose help prevent cell damage (the bane of Disney's frozen head). Tuna, sharks and sea turtles all use different approaches, but all qualify as "warm-blooded". It's not as simple as reptiles are cold-blooded and mammals are warm-blooded; many thermoregulation strategies have appeared on many different branches of the tree of life. This complexity is why scientists have discarded the terms warm-blooded and cold-blooded in favor of more specific terms.

Lugh

06-20-2009 01:15 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10513461)

Snakes and polar bears are apples and oranges. Mammals regulate their body temperature a lot more effectively than reptiles.

I shouldn't have asked how do they keep from starving, but rather how do they keep from freezing? Snakes aren't goldfish or polar bears.

I would imagine they avoid freezing in the northern reaches of Norway much the way they do in southern Finland. What they do, I have no idea. But being able to survive several days of freezing temperatures is not significantly different from being able to survive several weeks or even months of freezing temperatures. Snakes are uncommon in Maine and Minnesota, but hardly unheard of.

They know how to do it, and that's good enough for me.

Mr. Teapot

06-20-2009 08:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10512185)

Warning: do not use a hoop-snake in a group with biologists who are somewhat whimsically immature at times... unless you want play to screech to a halt while everyone speculates how the poor thing poops.)

I thought that Catdog already answered that question for us.

Mr. Teapot

06-20-2009 09:06 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

But those aren't based on real animals. Until this entry, all those that were based on real animals used real work information (or close to it with Peta girl).

I think the animal entries that stick strictly to real world species might be in the minority, actually. In entries for mundane animals, we have a lot of fantasy creatures: the Elven Cat (under the otherwise real world "Cat" entry), Death Dogs, Blink Dogs (both "Dog"s), Osquips ("Rat"), a variety of bats and birds, and a whole lot of things in the "Mammal" entry?

Or can you name one species of "intelligent ape with a reasonable grasp of the common tongue"? (Other than humans, of course, they have a separate entry.) What is the real-world habitat of the Stench Kow? Do you know of a living species of desert dwelling babboon/hyena hybrids that can Cause Fear by rhythmic stomping that I don't know about?

JRM

06-20-2009 05:59 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lugh (Post 10513393)

Also, most things in the arctic starve during the winter. Watch a documentary on polar bears. They specifically have to gorge themselves all summer in order to make it through the winter.

'Fraid not, that's regular bears. Polar bears have to gorge themselves all winter in order to make it through the summer. They mainly eat seals on the pack ice, remember.

We will now return to our regular programming.

DMH

06-20-2009 06:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

[quote=Mr. Teapot;10515863]I think the animal entries that stick strictly to real world species might be in the minority, actually./QUOTE]

I meant the introduction text to the entries. Sorry if I wasn't clear.

Now I am going back to my invert books and leave those boney, icky things to you people.

JRM

06-21-2009 12:04 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10517062)

Now I am going back to my invert books and leave those boney, icky things to you people.

Invert books? Why not read right-way-up books like most of us do?

Oh, invertbrate* books.

Well, I'm all for our spineless friends. Be sure to come back when we get to the spiders, that's crammed full of scientific inaccuracy.~)

Strangething

06-21-2009 07:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

According to Wikipedia, the idea of the amphisbaena rolling like a hoop snake seems to come straight from D&D.

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Amphisbaena>

Annoyingly, the first picture on the page shows one biting it's own neck. So I could be wrong here.

The intersection of D&D and real mythology is one of my favorite subjects.

JRM

06-21-2009 10:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething (Post 10518494)

According to Wikipedia, the idea of the amphisbaena rolling like a hoop snake seems to come straight from D&D.

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Amphisbaena>

Annoyingly, the first picture on the page shows one biting its own neck. So I could be wrong here.

The intersection of D&D and real mythology is one of my favorite subjects.

An amusing idea, but I doubt it's true. If I recall correctly, there are far older sources than D&D that describe amphisbaena as rolling along... Hmm, glancing at theoi.com's amphisbaena entry I see a translation of a 5th century AD source, one Nonnus, saying:

Quote:

"For as the twoheaded amphisbaina in very sooth winds the coils between and spits her poison from either mouth, rolling along and along with double-gliding motion, and head crawling joins with head while she jumps twirling waves of her back sideways: so that magnificent necklace twisted shaking its crooked back, with its pair of curving necks, which came to meet at the midnipple, a flexible twoheaded serpent thick with scales"

While this medieval bestiary website's amphisbaena entry refers to the 7th century Isidore of Seville saying:

Quote:

The amphisbaena has two heads, one in the proper place and one in its tail. It can move in the direction of either head with a circular motion. Its eyes shine like lamps. Alone among snakes, the amphisbaena goes out in the cold.

I don't know how accurate the translations are, but that's two centuries-old sources which appear to ascribe a rolling, circular movement to an amphisbaena, although unfortunately neither is explicit about the snake forming a ring by one set of jaws gripping the head or neck of the other end, although Nonnus's comparison to a circular necklace offers some support for that.

What we can be certain about is these old sources say amphisbaena can move both forwards and backwards with equal faculty (if such terms mean anything to a beast with a head at each end). The bit about them going out in the cold is interesting, implying some form of thermoregulation. It also helps explain why they're so aggressive, since they'll need more food to keep themselves warm.

noisms

06-22-2009 01:25 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Snake, Winged

As it says on the tin, a snake with wings. Which lives in Zakhara. Sigh. Another of those occasions where my 11 year old brain found itself wondering, "What on earth is Zakhara?" I sometimes think the setting-specific stuff was left in the MM entries in order to build up 'buzz' about Al Qadim, Forgotten Realms etc. and get more people to buy them. Cynical, moi?

Anyway, Winged Snakes are tough and annoying little blighters with poisonous bites and an electric mini-breath weapon. What surprises me, and what I'd forgotten, is that they're 8-10' long! And we're told they fly like hummingbirds. How fast would those wings have to beat in order to achieve that? An explanation of sorts is given in the text, though - Winged Snakes eat 10 times their own body weight in fruit every day, just to stay alive. It's a wonder there's any forest left.

There are very few adventure hooks in the entry, though I suppose since Winged Snakes are said to make good pets they could feature in my amoral egg-thief campaign. However since they consume 100gp of fruit a month, it's difficult to imagine who would really want one. Maybe it's better to envisage pet Winged Snakes as the Zakhara equivalent of a white elephant - a gift one noble gives to another in a great show of generosity, while secretly sniggering into his sleeve about the enormous costs associated with the creature's upkeep?

Indeed, that would be quite a fun little adventure hook in itself I think. The PC's patron is given a Winged Snake and needs vast amounts of fruit and/or gold just to keep the thing alive. He'll give the PCs all the opium and harlots they can ever want, if they'll just keep his damned Winged Snake well fed!

Doom

06-22-2009 03:26 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Gosh, come to think of it, I don't think I EVER used the thing in any campaign...and snakes made such fun enemies, too.

DMH

06-22-2009 09:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10522184)

Winged Snakes eat 10 times their own body weight in fruit every day, just to stay alive. It's a wonder there's any forest left.

Fruit is meant to be eaten. If anything, it means the snakes make a better seed disperser than most (all?) birds. Druids and treants should love them when trying to expand the tropical forests.

Strangething

06-23-2009 02:33 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10520012)

An amusing idea, but I doubt it's true. If I recall correctly, there are far older sources than D&D that describe amphibaena as rolling along... Hmm, glancing at theoi.com's amphisbaena entry I see a translation of a 5th century AD source, one Nonnus, saying:

Clearly you've done a more thorough search than I did. I thought the MM writers might have gotten their mythical snakes mixed up. Those quotes even justify (sorta) the amphisbaena's immunity to cold.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10522184)

Indeed, that would be quite a fun little adventure hook in itself I think. The PC's patron is given a Winged Snake and needs vast amounts of fruit and/or gold just to keep the thing alive. He'll give the PCs all the opium and harlots they can ever want, if they'll just keep his damned Winged Snake well fed!

In the next game I run, the PCs are going to get paid in opium and harlots. :-D

Mr. Teapot

06-23-2009 03:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10522184)

However since they consume 100gp of fruit a month, it's difficult to imagine who would really want one.

Adventurers. Once you're past the kobold-killing levels, you can probably afford 100GP per month. 5th level clerics and above could feed it using Create Food and Water, say. It makes enough food to feed a horse for 24 hours, though I don't know if that also means enough to feed a horse sized snake. Multiple castings would solve the issue, though.

Or GMPC archmages, though they probably don't need to worry about money anyway.

JRM

06-23-2009 03:41 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10522184)

Snake, Winged

SNIP

Winged Snakes eat 10 times their own body weight in fruit every day, just to stay alive. It's a wonder there's any forest left.

There are very few adventure hooks in the entry, though I suppose since Winged Snakes are said to make good pets they could feature in my amoral egg-thief campaign. However since they consume 100gp of fruit a month, it's difficult to imagine who would really want one. Maybe it's better to envisage pet Winged Snakes as the Zakhara equivalent of a white elephant - a gift one noble gives to another in a great show of generosity, while secretly sniggering into his sleeve about the enormous costs associated with the creature's upkeep?

Indeed, that would be quite a fun little adventure hook in itself I think. The PC's patron is given a Winged Snake and needs vast amounts of fruit and/or gold just to keep the thing alive. He'll give the PCs all the opium and harlots they can ever want, if they'll just keep his damned Winged Snake well fed!

Hmm, well that "ten times their own weight" may not be as much as it sounds. Maybe winged snakes are extremely lightweight, if not magically buoyant, like beholders and cloaklers. I suspect the enormous expense of their upkeep may be because they eat ripe jungle fruit. It would be very expensive shipping those from the jungle to your palace in the middle of the desert, or growing them in a greenhouse. As the text says, if the winged snake owner also owns a fruit orchard it costs a lot less to keep them.

As for the winged snake white elephant ploy. It'll be even better to give the Satrap a pair of winged snakes, because "winged serpents mate as often as they eat (i.e., incessantly)". Soon your noble friend could find his household swarming with the little blighters.

Although they're not entirely useless as pets. According to the Monstrous Manual they can be trained to perform tasks, including acting as guard-beasts, "although rogues have quickly discovered that unless they are extremely well-trained, they can be easily distracted by a decoy of aromatic, fresh fruit."

So remember lads, if you ever burgle a nobleman's joint, take along a nice ripe mango, just in case!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething (Post 10524223)
In the next game I run, the PCs are going to get paid in opium and harlots. :-D

Considering how some PCs dispose of the profits of their adventures, that may just be cutting out the middleman!;)

Thane of Fife

06-23-2009 04:19 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

100 gp per month isn't really unreasonable. That's equivalent to the monthly wages of 10 heavy cavalymen, 50 heavy footmen, or 2/3 of an engineer. By comparison, the example character used in the DMG to demonstrate monthly wages spends almost 3,000 gp per month.

noisms

06-23-2009 10:48 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10524665)
100 gp per month isn't really unreasonable. That's equivalent to the monthly wages of 10 heavy cavalymen, 50 heavy footmen, or 2/3 of an engineer. By comparison, the example character used in the DMG to demonstrate monthly wages spends almost 3,000 gp per month.

I suppose when you put it like that.

Out of interest, does anybody know of any material published in the 2nd edition era on basic foundations of the economic system, e.g. how much in gps is the output of an average farm? I mean, I suppose you could work it out, but for those of us who are lazy.

I remember that section of the DMG, by the way. It was one of my favourite parts - I used to sit down and plan out how my fighter character was going to spend all of his money on a private army once he reached 9th level.

JRM

06-23-2009 05:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10525962)

Out of interest, does anybody know of any material published in the 2nd edition era on basic foundations of the economic system, e.g. how much in gps is the output of an average farm? I mean, I suppose you could work it out, but for those of us who are lazy.

Back away noisms, back away, for in that direction lies madness!:eek:

Offhand, the only thing I can recall is from BECMI, not AD&D. The higher levels of that game (Companions, if I remember correctly) include rules for profits from estates. Of course, we are talking about a game where the cost to hire some of those hirelings is a lot less than how much they'd need to spend on food, let alone their equipment, going by Player's Handbook prices. To which I can draw one of two possibilities:

(a) Hirelings don't eat, but are some sort of undead or construct. That would explain how some players treat them.:o

(b) The cost of upkeep is not included, which would put costs up considerably. I believe that's how it goes, doesn't the DMG say you have to pay for their arms & armour? If so, you'll have to pay to feed them as well.

The Last Conformist

06-23-2009 05:58 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10508723)

*"Snakes are long, slender reptiles that can be found anywhere in the entire world, even in the coldest arctic regions."
Thanks for that, MM writers.*

While, as others have pointed out, there indeed are Arctic snakes, there aren't any in the coldest Arctic regions, the northernmost ones living in Arctic Scandinavia, which just happens to be the warmest part of the Arctic.

Other snake-free areas (bar escaped pets) include Antarctica (duh!), New Zealand, and, bizarrely, Ireland.

Ratoslov

06-23-2009 06:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10527107)

Back away noisms, back away, for in that direction lies madness!:eek:

Offhand, the only thing I can recall is from BECMI, not AD&D. The higher levels of that game (Companions, if I remember correctly) include rules for profits from estates. Of course, we are talking about a game where the cost to hire some of those hirelings is a lot less than how much they'd need to spend on food, let alone their equipment, going by Player's Handbook prices. To which I can draw one of two possibilities:

(a) Hirelings don't eat, but are some sort of undead or construct. That would explain how some players treat them.:c

(b) The cost of upkeep is not included, which would put costs up considerably. I believe that's how it goes, doesn't the DMG say you have to pay for their arms & armour? If so, you'll have to pay to feed them as well.

There's another two possibilities, which are well off into 'crazy rationalization' territory:

(c) The prices in the book are the crazy inflated prices that adventurers pay, because adventurers are dangerous crazy people with more money than sense.

(d) It's simply assumed that the PCs are living the rock-and-roll lifestyle, and the night-at-the-inn cost includes a few kegs of wine, some groupies, and a bard. That 50' of rope? Signature of the rope-maker. Top-of-the-line.

Ursca

06-23-2009 06:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10527185)

Other snake-free areas (bar escaped pets) include Antarctica (duh!), New Zealand, and, bizarrely, Ireland.

Presumably they (along with the moles) missed the last call and didn't reach the gate before the land-bridge closed.

I can just imagine it:

'Kids! Kids! Grab your bags quickly, the land-bridge is closing!'

'But Dad, we haven't got any hands!'

noisms

06-23-2009 06:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10527185)

While, as others have pointed out, there indeed are Arctic snakes, there aren't any in the coldest Arctic regions, the northernmost ones living in Arctic Scandinavia, which just happens to be the warmest part of the Arctic.

Other snake-free areas (bar escaped pets) include Antarctica (duh!), New Zealand, and, bizarrely, Ireland.

Thank Saint Patrick for the latter.

JRM

06-23-2009 07:06 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ratoslov (Post 10527216)

There's another two possibilities, which are well off into 'crazy rationalization' territory:

(c) The prices in the book are the crazy inflated prices that adventurers pay, because adventurers are dangerous crazy people with more money than sense.

(d) It's simply assumed that the PCs are living the rock-and-roll lifestyle, and the night-at-the-inn cost includes a few kegs of wine, some groupies, and a bard. That 50' of rope? Signature of the rope-maker. Top-of-the-line.

Dang it, I was going to mention those but didn't. Oh well, no use crying over spilt milk.

There's also the explanation given in the 1st edition Player's Handbook.

(e) The high prices reflect a 'gold boom' in an adventuring area, where the price of goods is grossly inflated. (We had to ship that 10' pole through a hundred leagues of monster infested wilderness, and you expect us to sell it to you at wholesale? Dream on, Miss Adventurer!)

Mr. Teapot

06-24-2009 03:01 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10525962)

Out of interest, does anybody know of any material published in the 2nd edition era on basic foundations of the economic system, e.g. how much in gps is the output of an average farm? I mean, I suppose you could work it out, but for those of us who are lazy.

I'd think the question is not "Is there a Dragon magazine article on this?" but rather "How many conflicting Dragon magazine articles of differing eras cover this?"

Let's see... Dragondex lists four D&D articles under "Economics", one article on military logistics ("An Army Marches on Its Stomach"), a lot of articles on cost of building and maintaining castles, and an Accountant NPC class.

And that's just me skimming up through the "E"s. At that point I gave up. But I'm sure you could find something, if you cared to do so. As pointed out, D&D's economics have never made a lick of sense, and trying to make them make sense is a fool's errand. In at least one edition, they deliberately didn't work, so that high level PCs would still need to go adventuring to earn money to keep their keep running. How all those NPCs can break even much less turn a profit without a monthly dragon-slaying was never dealt with.

JRM

06-24-2009 06:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot (Post 10528866)

Let's see... Dragondex lists four D&D articles under "Economics", one article on military logistics ("An Army Marches on Its Stomach"), a lot of articles on cost of building and maintaining castles, and an Accountant NPC class.

I liked "An Army Marches on Its Stomach" from Dragon #94. It's by Katherine Kerr, who's better known as a fantasy author. If I remember correctly it's stronger on ancient real-world military logistics than some of the more gonzo implications of the AD&D rules, but it's been a while since I read it.

Hmm, now I'm tempted to pull out that issue and read it again.

noisms

06-24-2009 10:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10529586)

I liked "An Army Marches on Its Stomach" from Dragon #94. It's by Katherine Kerr, who's better known as a fantasy author. If I remember correctly it's stronger on ancient real-world military logistics than some of the more gonzo implications of the AD&D rules, but it's been a while since I read it.

Hmm, now I'm tempted to pull out that issue and read it again.

I wonder if the Dragon Magazine "Let's Read" thread has got as far as 94 yet... Let me check...

Kakita Kojiro

06-24-2009 12:42 PM

Weirdly, I'm catching up on the last Flinx & Pip books. Flinx's pet is, of course, a flying snake (who is rarely mentioned needing to be fed, though). Flinx, of course, is a Marty Stu of the first water.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10527301)

(We had to ship that 10' pole through a hundred leagues of monster infested wilderness, and you expect us to sell it to you at wholesale? Dream on, Miss Adventurer!)

One of these days, I'm going to run a game where the premise is that a "goldrush" town has sprung up around a remote, newly-discovered dungeon. Adventurers are hauling out gp by the cartload (and dead companions by the bushelful). Someone must supply the goods they demand at ridiculously inflated prices!

I'm thinking, "Deadwood", with more rot grubs, really.

10-ft.-pole importer would be the perfect fit for this. Along with iron-spike maker. And the Temple of Worthy Avarice (price lists for holy water + raise dead). And the Random Harlot Table, of course.

sigh one day.

JRM

06-24-2009 05:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10530743)

One of these days, I'm going to run a game where the premise is that a "goldrush" town has sprung up around a remote, newly-discovered dungeon. Adventurers are hauling out gp by the cartload (and dead companions by the bushelful). Someone must supply the goods they demand at ridiculously inflated prices!

I'm thinking, "Deadwood", with more rot grubs, really.

Yup, in such a place, the folks at the town can be as big a threat as the monsters. A cartload of gold is a mighty temptin' target for a bushwackin'. Heck, the prices that Necromancer will pay for fresh material, there are folks who'll attack you for just for those bushelfulls of dead companions.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro (Post 10530743)

10-ft.-pole importer would be the perfect fit for this. Along with iron-spike maker. And the Temple of Worthy Avarice (price lists for holy water + raise dead). And the Random Harlot Table, of course.

sigh* one day.*

If you think the markup on 10-foot poles is high, that ain't nothing on the price the Random Harlot Importer tags on to his wares. That's where some real money is to be made.

Adventurers get lonesome too, you know.;

noisms

06-25-2009 09:39 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Spectre

There's a nice sentence in the introductory paragraph: "[Spectres] hate all life and light." That's what I want an undead being to be like. Hateful of everything - adds so much more spice to proceedings, doesn't it?

There's something spooky about the picture, too, which although not technically brilliant, has a nice haunting quality to it. Gaunt old men with long white hair wearing robes are intrinsically a bit creepy; the picture plays on that to good effect. I like it.

Substantively, Spectres are bastards - they hit to drain levels (2 at a time), creating new Spectres with each 'kill' - although they can be damaged by the traditional tools of the undead-hunting adventurer. 3,000 XP doesn't seem like nearly enough when you take into consideration its powers and HD, but I suppose the capacity to instakill it with a raise dead spell perhaps mitigates that.

The rest of the entry details 'Master Spectres' - those who have managed to attract other Spectre followers and create a kind of small Spectre polity. These groups would surely be unstoppable if they had a serious desire for world domination - they'd be just as effective as the zombies in the 28 [Days, Weeks] Later films, having the ability to transform entire populations of peasants into other Spectres within days (or nights). How does D&D reconcile the existence of creatures like the Spectre with the standard pseudo-European medieval world it envisages? Oh, that's right, it doesn't... Maybe we're to imagine that every single village in every kingdom has its own clerical secret weapon, ready to destroy any Spectre who approaches with a raise dead spell or some holy water grenades...

DMH

06-25-2009 09:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I wonder if holy water could be used in construction and still retain its effect on undead?

Sleeper

06-25-2009 09:57 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10536753)

The rest of the entry details 'Master Spectres' - those who have managed to attract other Spectre followers and create a kind of small Spectre polity. These groups would surely be unstoppable if they had a serious desire for world domination - they'd be just as effective as the zombies in the 28 [Days, Weeks] Later films, having the ability to transform entire populations of peasants into other Spectres within days (or nights). How does D&D reconcile the existence of creatures like the Spectre with the standard pseudo-European medieval world it envisages? Oh, that's right, it doesn't... Maybe we're to imagine that every single village in every kingdom has its own clerical secret weapon, ready to destroy any Spectre who approaches with a raise dead spell or some holy water grenades...

Undead are the H1N1 of the D&D world. If H1N1 was bitten by a radioactive spider, and developed super powers.

demiurge1138

06-26-2009 02:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Spectres are always ridiculously nasty, regardless of edition. In a 3e game I ran recently, one of the party members tangled with spectres, and was only kept alive by getting a bard song that gave him temporary hit dice. All of his actual levels were drained right out of him, poor bastard.

Belchion

06-26-2009 04:20 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10536753)

Maybe we're to imagine that every single village in every kingdom has its own clerical secret weapon, ready to destroy any Spectre who approaches with a raise dead spell or some holy water grenades...

Most likely, the Powers That Be forbid Spectres to enter ordinary villages when there are no adventurers around. Either that, or the burying rituals do their job to well.

Thane of Fife

06-26-2009 07:05 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I've got an FR module titled Ruins of Adventure that requires the (presumably fairly low-level) PCs to fight 5 spectres(!), including 2 at one time, with the three individuals being restored every few weeks if the dungeon boss (a vampire) isn't killed. The other two reappear every time the PCs return. I can't even begin to imagine how the PCs can complete this.

On the spectre plague, I've sort of assumed that most undead hate living things because it's painful to be reminded of life, rather than because they want them dead. This explains why they tend to be found in desolate areas, as well as why they don't just swamp poor villages.

JRM

06-27-2009 12:56 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10536753)

[u]The rest of the entry details 'Master Spectres' - those who have managed to attract other Spectre followers and create a kind of small Spectre polity. These groups would surely be unstoppable if they had a serious desire for world domination - they'd be just as effective as the zombies in the 28 [Days, Weeks] Later films, having the ability to transform entire populations of peasants into other Spectres within days (or nights). How does D&D reconcile the existence of creatures like the Spectre with the standard pseudo-European medieval world it envisages? Oh, that's right, it doesn't... Maybe we're to imagine that every single village in every kingdom has its own clerical secret weapon, ready to destroy any Spectre who approaches with a raise dead spell or some holy water grenades...

Haven't we already had this debate at least once with other "self-spawning" undead?

Maybe AD&D doesn't get plagues of infectious undead because these monsters simply aren't pro-active enough to seek new victims. They are literally too dead inside to think of doing anything more than roaming around their grave. They will attack any humanoid that wanders into sight, but that's purely reactive, and any spectres they create are also empty heartless vessels that just loiter around simmering with malice towards the living. Before long, a spectre-ground will become known and avoided by the locals, and its only loot-hungry adventurers, necromancers and clerics who are likely to disturb them.

Alternatively, there's a pet theory I remember advancing in the previous strand of posts on this subject. There could be a limited number of "undead demonic spirits" to animate a ghoul/shadow/spectre/vampire. Therefore, once all the "spectre spirits" (however many there may be) have transformed humanoid victims into undead, there won't be any more spectres spawned until one of the current spectres is destroyed, freeing its animating demon spirit to create another, or another particularly evil soul is converted into becoming an additional "spectre spirit".

Kapten

06-27-2009 07:52 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10536753)

Spectre

There's a nice sentence in the introductory paragraph: "[Spectres] hate all life and light." That's what I want an undead being to be like. Hateful of everything - adds so much more spice to proceedings, doesn't it?

There's something spooky about the picture, too, which although not technically brilliant, has a nice haunting quality to it. Gaunt old men with long white hair wearing robes are intrinsically a bit creepy; the picture plays on that to good effect. I like it.

Substantively, Spectres are bastards - they hit to drain levels (2 at a time), creating new Spectres with each 'kill' - although they can be damaged by the traditional tools of the undead-hunting adventurer. 3,000 XP doesn't seem like nearly enough when you take into consideration its powers and HD, but I suppose the capacity to instakill it with a raise dead spell perhaps mitigates that.

The rest of the entry details 'Master Spectres' - those who have managed to attract other Spectre followers and create a kind of small Spectre polity. These groups would surely be unstoppable if they had a serious desire for world domination - they'd be just as effective as the zombies in the 28 [Days, Weeks] Later films, having the ability to transform entire populations of peasants into other Spectres within days (or nights). How does D&D reconcile the existence of creatures like the Spectre with the standard pseudo-European medieval world it envisages? Oh, that's right, it doesn't... Maybe we're to imagine that every single village in every kingdom has its own clerical secret weapon, ready to destroy any Spectre who approaches with a raise dead spell or some holy water grenades...

An idea about why the spectres (or wights, or shadows...) don't go about world domination is that they somehow need human beings to exist.

If we go with the model that a spectre stays as a spectre to avoid eternal punishment (being undead and hateful is better than Hell), then it's in the interests of the undead to exist.

The spectre wants to kill all living things, but it stays its hand most of the time to not destroy itself. If it spawns, it is very careful about it. It would be mostly as a defense measure, if some high level church guy moves in close.

It would make sense anyway. World domination isn't written anywhere in spectre's/wight's/shadow's entry and since they hate everything, it wouldn't make sense for it to create another being, one that they can't hurt, without a good reason.

JRM

06-27-2009 07:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kaptan (Post 10543938)

It would make sense anyway. World domination isn't written anywhere in spectre's/wight's/shadow's entry and since they hate everything, it wouldn't make sense for it to create another being, one that they can't hurt, without a good reason.

I'd have thought a spectre would be able to hurt the spectres it spawns. It's debatable, but they should still be able to hit them, they just can't drain their levels. Even if it can't strike them physically, a spectre has control over those spawn it creates, which gives it innumerable means to inflict suffering...

"Stick your hand in that beam of sunlight, slave!"

"Gargle that holy water, scum!"

"Dance on holy ground, wretch. Dance, I say, dance!!"

"Find what you most love in the world, and bring it to me." (cue malevolent laughter)

There's a whole adventure in there, a villain who has died and returned as a spectre, who wants to turn the enemies he knew when alive into spawn to torment them for all eternity...

noisms

06-28-2009 10:36 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10545648)

I'd have thought a spectre would be able to hurt the spectres it spawns. It's debatable, but they should still be able to hit them, they just can't drain their levels. Even if it can't strike them physically, a spectre has control over those spawn it creates, which gives it innumerable means to inflict suffering...

"Stick your hand in that beam of sunlight, slave!"

"Gargle that holy water, scum!"

"Dance on holy ground, wretch. Dance, I say, dance!!"

"Find what you most love in the world, and bring it to me." (cue malevolent laughter)

There's a whole adventure in there, a villain who has died and returned as a spectre, who wants to turn the enemies he knew when alive into spawn to torment them for all eternity...

And the PCs play the enemies! The Spectre has them trapped in an elaborate and vast labyrinth/dungeon. He's going to play with them a bit first while they're still alive, then spectre-ise them and turn them into his eternal playthings. How can they escape?

A bit like I Have No Mouth And I Must Scream.

Pukako

06-28-2009 05:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10536753)

Spectre

These groups would surely be unstoppable if they had a serious desire for world domination - they'd be just as effective as the zombies in the 28 [Days, Weeks] Later films, having the ability to transform entire populations of peasants into other Spectres within days (or nights). How does D&D reconcile the existence of creatures like the Spectre with the standard pseudo-European medieval world it envisages? Oh, that's right, it doesn't... Maybe we're to imagine that every single village in every kingdom has its own clerical secret weapon, ready to destroy any Spectre who approaches with a raise dead spell or some holy water grenades...

I've just assumed that the little rituals that the common folk need to survive have been instinctively hard-wired in by now. Think of all the little things that our ancestors/great-grandparents/even perhaps grandparents did, and all the cultural knowledge about undead, vampires, etc that became established in a world without any of these things - garlic, sacred ground, crossing oneself.

Now imagine how simple (and important) it would be to learn how to do that with most of the previously discussed monsters lurking about. Imagine biodynamics gone mad - sacrifices buried at the village corners on midsummers eve, chanting over the beer brewing, every newcomer challenged with a garland of wolvesbane, garlic flowers and whatever else they have.

So the only villages with these undead, etc problems are the ones that let the rituals slip, and that spurs the others to double their efforts, and invent a few more each generation.

It would make things a little more realistic than peasants sitting around, waiting to be enslaved, killed, infected, raised-as-undead and then killed again. I'd imagine they'd want to stop Uncle Bo being used as cannon fodder by a mad necromancer for the third time this year, and everyone knows adventurer types are too distracted by gold, level-suitable magic weapons and random harlots. Which is one way of attracting them, I guess.

Pukako

Lugh

06-30-2009 12:08 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10542300)

Alternatively, there's a pet theory I remember advancing in the previous strand of posts on this subject. There could be a limited number of "undead demonic spirits" to animate a ghoul/shadow/spectre/vampire. Therefore, once all the "spectre spirits" (however many there may be) have transformed humanoid victims into undead, there won't be any more spectres spawned until one of the current spectres is destroyed, freeing its animating demon spirit to create another, or another particularly evil soul is converted into becoming an additional "spectre spirit".

I like this. I particularly like it if each spawn is one of the original spectre's sins (or, at least, is proportional to his evil in life in some way). Once the original spectre has spread enough of his sins out into his minions, his death grip on this world is lost, and his soul goes on to its final judgment.

A clever spectre would, therefore, most want to convert terribly evil people, in an attempt to build quite a pyramid of spawn and spawn-spawn. Like multi-level marketing, only not quite as evil. Ordinary villagers are of little practical use, as they would be insufficiently evil to make good spawn. It makes far more sense to slaughter the villagers and animate them as zombies.

noisms

06-30-2009 11:00 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Sphinx

And I was just watching a documentary about world heritage sites last night - featuring the Great Sphinx and the Pyramids of Giza. And so the cosmic ballet goes on, etc.

Androsphinx

This is the male version, also depicted in the illustration - looking rather suspicious and miserable, it has to be said. We are told the Androsphinx is the most powerful. Its special weapon is its roar, which variously causes panic, paralysis and weakness.

Androsphinxes shun Gynosphinxes, because they are jealous of the female version's higher intelligence (As if! Right guys?!) and find them "hard to deal with". However, most Androsphinxes do eventually "succumb" to a Gynosphinx at least once in their life. I think you could read all kinds of interpretations into that section of the entry if you were so inclined.

The ecology section is interesting in that it postulates that Androsphinxes have no purpose, which is considered strange (why, I'm not sure - how many of the monsters in the MM have a purpose beyond making life difficult for adventurers?), but then contradicts itself in the next paragraph by contending that Androsphinxes exist to protect other sphinxes.

Criosphinx

This is a creature with the body of a winged lion but the head of a ram. They are apparently so stupid that the only sort of bargain they can strike is "safe passage or die" (which doesn't even make much sense); yet on the other hand they have average intelligence. I must have been playing my INT 9 fighter wrong in my last session - turns out he should be a complete moron if the Criosphinx is anything to go by.

Criosphinxes spend most of their lives plotting to steal the wealth of Gyrosphinxes, which they achieve by ganging up on the poor female, restraining her, and then butting heads until there's a victor who can gain the spoils. The more I think about it the more problematic this entry seems in terms of sex relations - first we have the Androsphinx with his pathological fear of females and his distaste for the physical act, next we have the Criosphinxes whose modus operandi when dealing with females seems to be a thinly veiled metaphor for sexual violence....

Gynosphinx

This is the 'proper' sphinx, in my mind - female, into riddles and mystery, guardian of temples and ancient ruins.

Gynosphinxes continually quest for Androsphinxes, and spend most of their time in out of the way places, hoping to come across travellers who might have seen one. This seems like the best and most obvious sphinx-related adventure hook: either helping a Gynosphinx find a male or (better) trading information (i.e. the location of an Androsphinx) with a Gynosphinx in return for the location of something the PCs want (probably treasure).

Heiracosphinx

This is the evil variety of sphinx - who gang together to kill Androsphinxes and, yes, mate with Gynosphinxes. Their preferred method is to kill an Androsphinx and wait in his lair for a Gynosphinx to come along.... whereupon, well, the MM doesn't say, but I think it's pretty clear.

Those sphinxes eh? Talk about fraught sexual relations. All the females wanting sex with males who don't want to mate at all, all the while being pursued by sex-crazed rapist males who'll stop at nothing to get a hold of them. Nothing down for you if you're a Gynosphinx in the D&D world, that's for sure.

demiurge1138

06-30-2009 02:20 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Yeah, I was sort of weirded out by the sphinx sex in this book when I was a kid. I liked the idea of the non-standard sphinxes, though. I was glad to see the idea was picked up on in 3.5, with the desert book having sphinxes with the heads of crocodiles (shades of Ammut), jackals and lizards.

Wakboth

06-30-2009 05:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10555791)

Sphinx

Ooh, sphinxes. They are for some reason one of my favorite monsters ever, although I've never really had the opportunity to use them in a game...

Quote:

Androsphinx

This is the male version, also depicted in the illustration - looking rather suspicious and miserable, it has to be said.

Yeah. This is one entry that really ought to have had a DiTerlizzi-drawn cavalcade of different sorts of sphinxes, in the vein of the Beholder pics earlier...

The 4e (andro)sphinx pic is a very nice one: Sphinx

Quote:

We are told the Androsphinx is the most powerful. Its special weapon is its roar, which variously causes panic, paralysation and weakness.

The range / AoE of those roars is ginormous. A single androsphinx could rout a whole war band of orcs with just a roar or two, without staining its paws in blood...

Quote:

Androsphinxes shun Gynosphinxes, because they are jealous of the female version's higher intelligence (As if! Right guys?!) and find them "hard to deal with". However, most Androsphinxes do eventually "succumb" to a Gynosphinx at least once in their life. I think you could read all kinds of interpretations into that section of the entry if you were so inclined.

The socio-sexual relationships of the sphinx types are very, very ripe for interpretations overall.

Quote:

The ecology section is interesting in that it postulates that Androsphinxes have no purpose, which is considered strange (why, I'm not sure - how many of the monsters in the MM have a purpose beyond making life difficult for adventurers?), but then contradicts itself in the next paragraph by contending that Androsphinxes exist to protect other sphinxes.

My take was always that Androsphinxes are proud-but-gallant do-gooders, destroying/scattering invading orc warbands, saving princesses from towers, toppling evil and grasping barons and so on. Then they hang around for a while, enjoying the admiration of the grateful people, eating delicacies fed to them by pretty girls and so on, until they decide to move on - both to find new evils to vanquish, and because there inevitably are a gynosphinx or two winging their way there, attracted by their reputation.

Quote:

Criosphinx

This is a creature with the body of a winged lion but the head of a ram. They are apparently so stupid that the only sort of bargain they can strike is "safe passage or die" (which doesn't even make much sense); yet on the other hand they have average intelligence. I must have been playing my INT 9 fighter wrong in my last session - turns out he should be a complete moron if the Criosphinx is anything to go by.

They're the "jock sphinxes", I think; not so much stupid, as uninterested in applying their brains when brawn can do.

Quote:

The more I think about it the more problematic this entry seems in terms of sex relations - first we have the Androsphinx with his pathological fear of females and his distaste for the physical act, next we have the Criosphinx whose modus operandi when dealing with females seems to be a thinly veiled metaphor for sexual violence....

Like I said, the sphinxes socio-sexual relations are messed up.

Quote:

Gynosphinx

This is the 'proper' sphinx, in my mind - female, into riddles and mystery, guardian of temples and ancient ruins.

"Mystery \(gyno\)sphinx" illustration from 4e.

Quote:

Gynosphinxes continually quest for Androsphinxes, and spend most of their time in out of the way places, hoping to come across travellers who might have seen one. This seems like the best and most obvious sphinx-related adventure hook: either helping a Gynosphinx find a male or (better) trading information (i.e. the location of an Androsphinx) with a Gynosphinx in return for the location of something the PCs want (probably treasure).

Or exchanges of strange and esoteric information.

"And that's how you can find the Evil Crypt of Abbad the Unmourned... Now, tell me more about where you heard about this nice androsphinx, and I might remember something about the traps you're going to face..."

Quote:

Heiracosphinx

This is the evil variety of sphinx - who gang together to kill Androsphinxes and, yes, mate with Gynosphinxes. Their preferred method is to kill an Androsphinx and wait in his lair for a Gynosphinx to come along.... whereupon, well, the MM doesn't say, but I think it's pretty clear.

The "bastard sphinxes", basically. Of course, both andro- and criosphinxes (boorish as those are) will also kill hieracosphinxes when they get the opportunity.

Quote:

Those sphinxes eh? Talk about fraught sexual relations. All the females wanting sex with males who don't want to mate at all, all the while being pursued by sex-crazed rapist males who'll stop at nothing to get a hold of them. Nothing down for you if you're a Gynosphinx in the D&D world, that's for sure.

Yeah. Whatever deity created the sphinxes definitely had not just issues, but whole subscriptions.

I wonder what kind of a perspective such a competitive (to be mild) sex life gives to sphinxes, and how they relate to humans? Going to ask a local gynosphinx - or androsphinx, for that matter - for relationship advice is probably a horribly bad idea...

"Men - either you run from them, or they run from you. The trick is knowing which is which; that's why it's always important to lair in a place with good view and a good, concealed escape route. Of course, you poor humans can't rely on just silhouette recognition... must be awfully complicated."

Inyssius

06-30-2009 05:18 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Yep, still great stuff. Keep being awesome, people.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10556913)
"Mystery (gyno)sphinx" illustration from 4e.

Might be a little off-topic, but I love the new gynosphinx. "Corrective mauling"... :D I've never even contemplated using a sphinx before (with any emotion other than mild bleah, at least), but now I can't wait for my chance.

JRM

06-30-2009 05:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10556528)
Yeah, I was sort of weirded out by the sphinx sex in this book when I was a kid. I liked the idea of the non-standard sphinxes, though. I was glad to see the idea was picked up on in 3.5, with the desert book having sphinxes with the heads of crocodiles (shades of Ammut), jackals and lizards.

More to the point, the reproduction rates stated in the book mean that the sphinx is a doomed species. Only the female Gynosphinxes can produce young, and it can only produce another female gynosphinx by mating with an Androsphinx, and even then only 50% of the time. Any mating with a Crio- or Hieracosphinx only produces another of those monsters. So, if on average an Androsphinx only "succumbs" once in its life, every generation the number of females will halve. No wonder some of them are desperate for sex!

So what brought about this state of affairs, some ancient curse seems most plausible. Maybe Pazuzu and Orcus cursed the original (andro & gyno) sphinxes for meddling in their affairs, hence the raptorial and ram-headed nature of their cursed offspring.

Oh, and it seems awful hard on the poor Gynosphinxes, all those rapacious sphinxes can even run and fly faster than them, so they can't even hope to flee successfully.

This situation can not be tolerated, I hereby propose that high level characters dedicate themselves to breaking this curse, both by finding the epic magic that caused it and using polymorph other volunteers to turn them into Androsphinxes and Gynosphinxes so they can help replenish the population of these noble creatures.

Polymorph other, what ecological problem won't that spell solve.:D

(un)reason

06-30-2009 05:54 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10556983)

More to the point, the reproduction rates stated in the book mean that the sphinx is a doomed species. Only the female Gynosphinxes can produce young, and it can only produce another female gynosphinx by mating with an Androsphinx, and even then only 50% of the time. Any mating with a Crio- or Hieracosphinx only produces another of those monsters. So, if on average an Androsphinx only "succumbs" once in its life, every generation the number of females will halve. No wonder some of them are desperate for sex!

So what brought about this state of affairs, some ancient curse seems most plausible. Maybe Pazuzu and Orcus cursed the original (andro & gyno) sphinxes for meddling in their affairs, hence the raptorial and ram-headed nature of their cursed offspring.

Oh, and it seems awful hard on the poor Gynosphinxes, all those rapacious sphinxes can even run and fly faster than them, so they can't even hope to flee successfully.

*This situation can not be tolerated, I hereby propose that high level characters dedicate themselves to breaking this curse, both by finding the epic magic that caused it and using polymorph other on volunteers to turn them into Androsphinxes and Gynosphinxes so they can help replenish the population of these noble creatures.*

Polymorph other, what ecological problem won't that spell solve.:D

That assumes they don't produce litters of multiple young, which seems likely given their feline and avian heritages. Not as bad as the mind flayer reproduction problem though.

Although that must also mean that the young, at least the animal headed ones, are born fairly self-sufficient, or most Gynosphynx's maternal instincts are strong enough that they'll still raise the kids of those unfortunate unions, even knowing they'll grow up to be a gaggle of half-wit rapists. That's pretty fucked up as well.

Ginkomortus

06-30-2009 06:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Okay, first off... did Sphinx get brought up with the rest of the Greco-Roman monster names with debatable pluralism?

Second off...

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10555791)

Criosphinxes spend most of their lives plotting to steal the wealth of Gyrosphinxes...

Maybe it's just sleep dep, but this typo amuses me. I imagine a sphinx rolling around on a central ball embedded in her belly instead of running about on feet.

Inyssius

06-30-2009 06:05 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 10557001)

That assumes they don't produce litters of multiple young, which seems likely given their feline and avian heritages. Not as bad as the mind flayer reproduction problem though.

What is the mind flayer reproduction problem? I can't find any discussion of it in the relevant place.

Sleeper

06-30-2009 06:11 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Now I'm picturing androsphinxes as a snobby clique of androgynous artist-types, who are scared of girls. Strange industrial music, strobing lights, black tights, John Lennon-glasses, mime-like interpretative dance, names like Dieter and Gunter.

(un)reason

06-30-2009 06:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10557031)

What is the mind flayer reproduction problem? I can't find any discussion of it in the relevant place.

Each can produce 2 tadpoles in their lifespan, each of which has a 10% chance of reaching maturity. So their population should divide by over 5 every generation.

Inyssius

06-30-2009 06:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 10557047)

Each can produce 2 tadpoles in their lifespan, each of which has a 10% chance of reaching maturity. So their population should divide by over 5 every generation.

Yeesh. Can't fix that with psionic tomfoolery.

Or can you?

Sleeper

06-30-2009 06:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius (Post 10557055)

Yeesh. Can't fix that with psionic tomfoolery.

Or can you?

In 3E's Lords of Madness, the illithid fled back through the ages to escape the end of time. The modern mind flayer is a refugee from a time when the stars were sputtering, and going out.

The dequinting, the dividing by five, is only a problem if time is a strictly linear thing. Perhaps the pools they dwell in as tadpoles are vortices, spirals. Places where the normal timeflow catches in an eddy, and spins around backward. So instead of a doubled decimation every generation, the flopping spawn somehow multiply themselves fivefold.

How many illithid survived the transit? A fleet? A single ship? A bare handful of individuals? Maybe just maybe there was only a solitary illithid who was able to walk away from the time wrack, with tentacles stills fluttering. Who stood over the inky pool where things spun backward, and brooded and thought and suddenly came to a realization. Then, in a scant few years, there was one, plus five. Then thirty six. And on, and on. Spreading like a fungus, there in the dark.

Wakboth

06-30-2009 07:43 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 10557001)

Although that must also mean that the young, at least the animal headed ones, are born fairly self-sufficient, or mos

Gynosphynx's maternal instincts are strong enough that they'll still raise the kids of those unfortunate unions, even knowing they'll grow up to be a gaggle of half-wit rapists. That's pretty fucked up as well.

I've spent way too much time pondering the sphinxes effed-up life, but the idea I had was that the mating of an androsphinx and a gynosphinx always produces twins, one of either sex. And... yeah, strong instincts and all that. (To reduce squick, I also decided that a) crio- and hieracosphinxes don't do harems, and b) the offspring of a particular gynosphinx recognize and ignore their mother later in life.)

noisms

06-30-2009 07:49 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10557026)

Okay, first off... did Sphinx get brought up with the rest of the Greco-Roman monster names with debatable pluralism?

Second off...

Maybe it's just sleep dep, but this typo amuses me. I imagine a sphinx rolling around on a central ball embedded in her belly instead of running about on feet.

It's a little known sub-species.

JRM

06-30-2009 08:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis (Post 10556930)

Might be a little off-topic, but I love the new gynosphinx. "Corrective mauling"... :D I've never even contemplated using a sphinx before (with any emotion other than mild bleah, at least), but now I can't wait for my chance.

At last the truth is out! Androphinxes are not reluctant to mate with Gynosphinxes because they resent their intelligence, but because lady sphinxes are into S&M.:o ;)

JRM

06-30-2009 08:19 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 10557001)

That assumes they don't produce litters of multiple young, which seems likely given their feline and avian heritages. Not as bad as the mind flayer reproduction problem though.

Although that must also mean that the young, at least the animal headed ones, are born fairly self-sufficient, or most Gynosphynx's maternal instincts are strong enough that they'll still raise the kids of those unfortunate unions, even knowing they'll grow up to be a gaggle of half-wit rapists. That's pretty fucked up as well.

I'd considered that possibility, but the Monstrous Manual entry says "A gynosphinx mated with an androsphinx will produce another androsphinx or gynosphinx (even chances for both). A gynosphinx mated with a criosphinx only produces another male criosphinx, while mating with a hieracosphinx produces similarly displeasing results."

Those bolded words suggest one offspring is the norm.

Armitage

06-30-2009 08:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason (Post 10557047)

Each can produce 2 tadpoles in their lifespan, each of which has a 10% chance of reaching maturity. So their population should divide by over 5 every generation.

The Illithiad, the 2e Mind Flayer sourcebook, clarified that an illithid produces two clutches of 1,000 eggs in its lifetime. On average, one tadpole from each clutch survives to adulthood. So the population doubles each generation.

The Last Conformist

06-30-2009 09:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus (Post 10557026)

Okay, first off... did Sphinx get brought up with the rest of the Greco-Roman monster names with debatable pluralism?

Lat. pl sphinges.

JRM

06-30-2009 09:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10557436)
Lat. pl sphinges.

Not according to theo.com, which says the plural is sphinxes in both Greek and Latin.

Which would mean the MM got it right for once.:)

Oh, and it also says sphinx derives from "strangler" (sphinggein).

Which is odd, since I don't think of them as throttling victims, but rending them with claw and fang.

EDIT: Oh, and it also says a homonym for "sphinx" is "phix" or "fix". That offers potential of all manner of dreadful puns...

Maybe a phix is a sphinx that can't have children after being taken to the vets, or it derives from their preferring to "fix" problems with their claws and teeth.

EDITED EDIT: Although as far as the plural goes, I can see it going both ways, like the word "larynx" which is accepted as either "larynxes" or "larynges" in English, although the latter is probably the better Greek.

The Last Conformist

06-30-2009 10:44 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10557540)
Not according to theo.com, which says the plural is sphinxes in both Greek and Latin.

Here theoi.com is wrong - see eg. the Liddell & Scott entry.

(Moreover, the Pliny section they cite doesn't mention sphinxes at all - the one that does uses the Greek accusative plural sphingas, implying nominative plural sphinges.)

Quote:

Which would mean the MM got it right for once.:)

The MM is written in English, in which language "sphinxes" is the usual form. :)

Quote:

Oh, and it also says sphinx derives from "strangler" (sphinggein).

Which ought suggest the stem is sphing-, not sphinx- (which would be a very weird stem anyway). (Also, sphingein would have to be a verb "to strangle", not an agental noun.)

Strangething

07-01-2009 04:12 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10556913)

The socio-sexual relationships of the sphinx types are very, very ripe for interpretations overall.

Like I said, the sphinxes socio-sexual relations are messed up.

Yeah. Whatever deity created the sphinxes definitely had not just issues, but whole subscriptions.

Quoted for truth. There is a lot of scary sexual stuff implied in the monster manual (See minotaur, harpy.) but the sphinx is the scariest of the lot. I'm not sure what that says about Gyax, et al.

celebrityomnipath

07-01-2009 09:37 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Armitage (Post 10557360)

The Illithiad, the 2e Mind Flayer sourcebook, clarified that an illithid produces two clutches of 1,000 eggs in its lifetime. On average, one tadpole from each clutch survives to adulthood. So the population doubles each generation.

One tadpole from each clutch survives because teh tadpoles are all kept in the same place, nom nom nom.

Thane of Fife

07-01-2009 10:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething (Post 10559009)

Quoted for truth. There is a lot of scary sexual stuff implied in the monster manual (See minotaur, harpy.) but the sphinx is the scariest of the lot. I'm not sure what that says about Gygax, et al.

What's scary about the harpy? The book explicitly suggests that they reproduce asexually.

JRM

07-01-2009 04:02 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10557735)
Here theoi.com is wrong - see eg. the Liddell & Scott entry.

The MM is written in English, in which language "sphinxes" is the usual form. :)

Ta for that, I suspected you were right about the sphinges because of larynx/larynges but I know very little classical languages. It's nice to have some evidence.

JRM

07-01-2009 04:30 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10560384)
What's scary about the harpy? The book explicitly suggests that they reproduce asexually.

Maybe Strangething was thinking of the Piers Anthony version, which had to alternately mate with vultures and humanoids to maintain its species? At least, they did until they got a Harpy Prince.

Strangething

07-02-2009 12:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife (Post 10560384)
What's scary about the harpy? The book explicitly suggests that they reproduce asexually.

Really? It's been a while since I read my 2e monster books, but I had the impression that harpies mainly reproduced via mind control rape of male humanoids. There goes a creepy adventure idea.

Maybe after reading the minotaur and sphinx entries, I started to assume that any monster than only comes in one gender must have something horribly kinky going on.

I used to have a list of D&D monsters with sex and gender issues, but I lost it. There were about ten of them. And another list of intelligent creatures with no hands.

EDIT: I made the lists with the 3e MM, which doesn't go into detail on monster reproduction. I saw an all-female race with hypnotic powers and assumed they were like a female version of minotaurs.

noisms

07-03-2009 12:01 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Spider

Ah, the Spider. Eight legged and eight eyed denizen of silky webs. Great bog-standard monsters to introduce into a game, as I'm sure most will agree. The MM separates them into "hunting" spiders (which simply run down and eat prey) and "web spinners" (obviously the ones which use silk to catch prey). This entry is notable as the only one in the MM (I think) to contain sub-sub entries, which is a bit of a pain for the purposes of people writing about it on rpg.net twenty years later. It also must be the record holder for the most varieties of exception-based strength check in a single entry - every single sub-variety of spider requires a slightly different rule and a slightly different modifier to escape from its webs.

The intelligence scores for Spiders are interesting: Hairy Spiders have Low (5-7), Large Spiders Nil (0), Huge Spiders Animal (1) and Giant Spiders Low again (5-7). There doesn't seem to be much of an explanation for this variance.

Hairy Spider

These are smallish (6") swarming creatures which can cover a humanoid being and bite with bonuses to hit; their poison is debilitating. Twenty of the things could quite easily kill even a relatively high level character (death of a thousand cuts), which justifies the high XP value for a 1-1 HD monster (65). Hairy Spiders can also be used as familiars, often by drow.

Large Spider

This is a web spinner, 2' in diameter, which uses silk and poison (Type A) to capture enemies.

Huge Spider

This hunting spider is 6' in diameter and attacks by leaping (up to 30'). It lies in ambush in camouflaged tunnels.

- Watch Spiders are a sub-variety of Huge Spider; their intelligence (5-7) means they can be trained. Their poison is paralyzing.

Giant Spider

These are the kind of fantasy spider which I suppose most people envisage - lurking somewhere in Mirkwood, most likely. In fact it's a catch-all term for a wide variety of Giant Spiders (although there's also a standard web-spinning fatally poisonous type):

- Giant Water Spiders, which live in a burrows underwater, filled with pockets of air. They grab prey and drag them into their burrow to eat at their leisure.
- Flying Spiders, which have wings of gossamer, which strike me as vaguely silly.
- Giant Trapdoor Spiders, which lurk behind trapdoors (obviously) and leap out to attempt to drag victims back inside. They can shoot silk to entangle victims.

- Steeders, which are used as mounts by Duergar, can cling to walls and ceilings, and can leap up to 240'.

Phase Spider

These are annoying beggars which can phase into the prime material, attack, then phase back to the ethereal plane, all in one round - often without right of reply. A great monster for forcing the players to be cunning, or a huge pain in the arse, depending on your D&D philosophy.

Sword Spider

This variety jumps at opponents and impales prey on its legs. Like most other varieties it has been in some way domesticated by Drow.

Gargantuan Spider

Shelob, basically. This spider is not only 80% undetectable, it also gives opponents a -5 penalty to surprise rolls - something seems slightly off there. It is a genius with webs, and can make any shape it has ever seen out of its silk - rather like an eight-legged clown making stuff out of balloons.

- Giant Marine Spiders are a variety of Gargantuan Spider which live in burrows near salt water bodies. Otherwise they're basically a bigger version of the Giant Water Spider.

Sleeper

07-03-2009 01:12 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10569420)

- Giant Trapdoor Spiders, which lurk behind trapdoors (obviously) and leap out to attempt to drag victims back inside. They can shoot silk to entangle victims.

When I first ran across D&D's trapdoor spider, I was already familiar with the real animal. You know, the little forest-dweller that digs into the loam, and then makes a little plug of leaves and dirt and sticky silk that fits into the neck of it's burrow. Along comes a beetle with it's thundering feet and pop out comes the plug like the cork from a wine bottle, and suddenly the beetle becomes arachnofood. I just played the monster as a slightly large version.

Which is a shame. That was such an obvious opportunity to add yet one more group of monsters to the wondrous web that is D&D's dungeon ecology. Trap door spiders aren't forest dwellers, not in D&D. They don't make little plugs out of dirt and sticky bodily fluids. No, they're dungeon dwellers who have evolved into a very narrow, very precise niche.

Because dungeons have a very specific geometry. There are hundreds of levels or floors, each on a different horizontal plane. There are no slow rises, half-levels, cupolas, or anything like that except the occasional dias or terrace. The number of architectural features that break the third dimension is very limited. The most common of course is stairs. Between each level there is at least one stair going up to a place where the denizens are slightly weaker, and one stair going down to a realm where the inhabitants are slightly more deadly.

Like in children's games, there are also chutes and ladders. Ladders go up and down, allowing recurrent villains to flee and hide among even more dangerous allies. Or allow mookish orcs to laugh and throw produce down at the band of fierce warriors from a position of relative safety (at least once the rope ladder is hauled up).

Chutes or gates are much more nasty because they can shunt your 2nd-level butt from Kobold Country all the way down to the Flaming Fire Demon Halls. This is what makes the dwarf one of the most valuable of all companions, when you're grubbing for blood money in a filthy hole in the ground. Because they can squint and stare, make a few obscure comments in the arcane jargon of geologyspeak, perform a few calculations on the back of a napkin, and tell you, with some degree of certainty, just exactly how screwed the party is after sliding down a chute or bumping into a random teleporter. Was your band of much-victimimized companions only shuttled down a level or two down to Ogrevania, where it's still possible to sneak and scabble and evade and maybe just maybe make it back to the Town squatting like a mother hen over the top of all the staircases? Or did the mossy spiral or strange glyph spin them down and down to the Beholder Den, where the only real question left is whether your corpse will be bloody, dusty, or rocky?

This is the world to which the trap door spider has adapted. Because every once in a while, under random carpet on the otherwise bare stone floor, or seen high up in the air in a particularly high-vaulted cavern, there is a square wooden door. The kind you'd find leading into root cellars, on the surface. Another connection between the levels. And if you're underneath and you look closely, you might spot a black ball surrounded with what appears to be black yarn. Then they twitch, and you realize you're looking at a spider. A spider that evolved to prey on adventurers steeling themselves for a plunge into a new, more dangerous level. Like their forest dwelling brethren, they pop the door and jump, and all of a sudden the elf who had gotten comfortable with the hazards of level 3 is snatched away by a level 4 monster that just came up through the floor. Is the party hardy and well-rested enough to plan a rescue, or is destiny going to have to work a bit overtime to bring them a new ally to round out their company of erstwhile heroes?

This of course, is only the tip of the iceberg. Where there are trap door spiders, there are also concealed door spiders, secret door spiders, one-way door spiders, iron door spiders, wooden door spiders, locked door spiders, teleport gate spiders, and who knows how many other variants. They're like elves, these arachnids. Let them run loose in a dungeon for a millennium or two, and all of a sudden they all have different hairstyles and new favorite cribs.

Inyssi

07-03-2009 01:51 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10569420)

- Giant Water Spiders, which live in a burrows underwater, filled with pockets of air. They grab prey and drag them into their burrow to eat at their leisure.

Ah, the diving-bell spider. These guys are so cool.

<http://img183.imageshack.us/img183/4...rspideruu4.jpg>

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10569420)

Spider

Great! We've finally come to one of my favourite entries. I love using overlarge spiders in my games, and am fond of them in real life too.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10569420)

The intelligence scores for Spiders are interesting: Hairy Spiders have Low (5-7), Large Spiders Nil (0), Huge Spiders Animal (1) and Giant Spiders Low again (5-7). There doesn't seem to be much of an explanation for this variance.

This is one of the things I felt was missing when 3rd edition came out. Intelligent (or sem-intelligent) giant spiders just felt right, not the mindless Monstrous vermin in the 3E Monster Manual. This is mainly because I was fond of The Hobbit as a kid. Heck, I've even had my players encounter talking giant spiders in AD&D (I'm talking about the regular low-average intelligence variety, not spell-casting aranea or something. There's nothing in 1st edition that says they can't talk.:mad:).

They started cutting deals with them...

I won't go into my detailed thoughts on this Monstrous Manual entry right now, since I've got work to do. However, before I go I'll just mention the MM's illustration (which looks like a dT picture, unless I'm mistaken) is nice. Its half-human face reinforce that "unnatural intelligent spider-ish creature" vibe. Oh, and it's also obviously not a true spider. Look at those thin 2nd legs, it's based on an Amblypygi, or whip spider. I suspect the artist was fully aware of the difference, and I like to think this is meant to represent the flat-bodied gargantuan whisper spider.

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10569621)

This of course, is only the tip of the iceberg. Where there are trap door spiders, there are also concealed door spiders: secret door spiders, one-way door spiders, iron door spiders, wooden door spiders, locked door spiders, teleport gate spiders, and who knows how many other variants. They're like elves, these arachnids. Let them run loose in a dungeon for a millennium or two, and all of a sudden they all have different hairstyles and new favorite cribs.

Great stuff Sleeper, I've thought of the Dungeon Trapdoor spider (Mine usually hid beneath flagstones rather than actual trapdoors), but never thought of expanding the idea to iron doors and teleport gates - maybe the latter is how phase spiders came about.

I like the AD&D versions of the spiders so much I've converted most of them to 3rd edition together with the oldschool classic the tarantella spider, whose venom forces its victims to dance. Needless to say, I couldn't stop there and began coming up with ideas for new fabulous spiders that I'd like to stat up, such as:

The Crystal Spider or Glassteel Spider, which is invisible when stationary and spins razor sharp webs that slashes PCs to ribbons if (when) they walk into them.

The Puppeteer Spider, which throws its silk lines upon a characters limbs and forces them to attack their comrades.

The Harper Spider, which plays mesmerizing music upon its web.

The Pirate Spider, plundering the high seas with cutlass and crossbow.

The Caballero Spider, which rides across the pampas, bringing down its prey with bolas and whips.

OK, I may have to rethink the last few.:D

Should get around to posting those I've finished, so my fellow gamers may get some use out of them.

Has anyone else some more ideas for fantasy spiders, I think I'll add some of Sleeper's to my Spider project list: (trap door spiders, concealed door spiders, secret door spiders, one-way door spiders, iron door spiders, wooden door spiders, locked door spiders, teleport gate spiders)

Hmm...

Dungeon Door Spiders (wooden, concealed, one-way, locked)
Iron Door Spider (presumably super-tough)
Secret Door Spider (sound like my flagstone trapdoor spider will do)
Teleport Portal Spider (phase spider plus!)
Trapdoor Spider (Could actually build traps, silk devices hurling envenomed spikes?)

Here's one to add:

Portcullis Spider (drops the gate onto the party?, impaling fun!)

Anyone else got any ideas?

DMH

07-03-2009 08:16 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

The only real spiders I wished they included are the ogre faced (which uses a miniature web in its forelegs) and the one whose name escapes me (red something or other) which uses high tension strands to draw prey up to it. Sort of a cave fisher with hundreds of strands at the same time.

The Last Conformist

07-03-2009 08:33 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms (Post 10569420)

Flying Spiders, which have wings of gossamer, which strike me as vaguely silly.

There are real spiders that fly, or rather paraglide, with the help of their webs. Which gives me one of those ideas I'll never use; a mercenary band of intelligent human-sized commando spiders that specialize in parachuting inside city walls and the like to open the gates and allow their employers in. They'd prefer repeating crossbows for weaponry.

JRM

07-03-2009 08:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10570593)

The only real spiders I wished they included are the ogre faced (which uses a miniature web in its forelegs) and the one whose name escapes me (red something or other) which uses high tension strands to draw prey up to it. Sort of cave fisher with hundreds of strands at the same time.

There are quite a few species of Theridiid spider that use this method to catch prey. For those unfamiliar with the creatures, the silk lines in question are under tension so when a ground insect blunders into the bottom of a line and gets stuck, it breaks it off the ground in its struggles and gets hoist into the air.

I also like the bolas spider, which swings a line of silk with a sticky glob on the end to snare moths, which it attracts with a scent mimicking female moth pheromone.

The thing is, since AD&D giant spiders are intelligent, they can learn these tricks with silk, so any given spider of the same "species" may know any of a wide range of silken tactics, not just the few its mindless, instinctive real-life counterparts do.

demiurge1138

07-03-2009 11:17 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

JRM, the puppeteer spider's been done. Creature Collection 3 had the "grim puppeteer", an intelligent spider that uses the dessicated corpses of its victims, ventriloquism, and strategically placed webbing to create puppet shows to lure people into dangerous doomy areas. I used one and it freaked my players out... especially when it started following them, riding on the corpse-puppet's back and tromping through the night.

Ginkomortus

07-04-2009 03:02 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10557042)

Now I'm picturing androsphinxes as a snobby clique of androgynous artist-types, who are scared of girls. Strange industrial music, strobing lights, black tights, John Lennon-glasses, mime-like interpretative dance, names like Dieter and Gunter.

ZIS IS ZE TIME ON RPG.NET D20 FORUM VHEN VE DANCE!

Also, the harper spider above is a nifty idea.

Sleeper

07-04-2009 03:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10570529)

The Pirate Spider, plundering the high seas with cutlass and crossbow.

That's a surprisingly good fit. Not necessarily a pirate per se, but a high seas spider. Ships made of debris or living wood, held together by webbing. On the bottom, the hull is made of driftwood and other scrap pieces of dead wood; on the top, the deck, is a layer of loam that supports living trees, that are suspended in great bags that hold just enough dirt to sustain them. The rigging is a latticework or maze of braided and netted webs. Small strands catch the sea spray, which slides down the line to the plants to provide the needed liquid. They're not pirates for gold and booty; they're pirates for blood. Strung across the highest crossbars are the captured humanoids, wrapped up into cotton-candy bundles and waving in the wind, ready to be punctured. Once drained to a dessicated husk, the body goes into the topsoil and feeds the trees.

I also like the image of phase spiders popping out of teleport gates, and then back. Maybe the phasing only works within a certain range of a portal.

JRM

07-04-2009 06:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10571064)

JRM, the puppeteer spider's been done. Creature Collection 3 had the "grim puppeteer", an intelligent spider that uses the dessicated corpses of its victims, ventriloquism, and strategically placed webbing to create puppet shows to lure people into dangerous doomy areas. I used one and it freaked my players out... especially when it started following them, riding on the corpse-puppet's back and tromping through the night.

That doesn't surprise me, but I don't see why I can't do a version of my own. Actually, I'm thinking of doing a couple of versions, with one of them a psionic mind-slaver inspired by the giant spiders in Jon Pertwee's last Doctor Who story.

I've also seen a version of the Crystal spider somewhere before. Obviously, I'm not the only one who's seen Krull and thought "there's something I can steal for a D&D monster."

JRM

07-04-2009 07:03 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10571842)

That's a surprisingly good fit. Not necessarily a pirate per se, but a high seas spider. Ships made of debris or living wood, held together by webbing. On the bottom, the hull is made of driftwood and other scrap pieces of dead wood; on the top, the deck, is a layer of loam that supports living trees, that are suspended in great bags that hold just enough dirt to sustain them. The rigging is a latticework or maze of braided and netted webs. Small strands catch the sea spray, which slides down the line to the plants to provide the needed liquid. They're not pirates for gold and booty; they're pirates for blood. Strung across the highest crossbars are the captured humanoids, wrapped up into cotton-candy bundles and waving in the wind, ready to be punctured. Once drained to a dessicated husk, the body goes into the topsoil and feeds the trees.

Yes, that's similar to one of the pirate spider ideas I had, although they'd usually have humanoid ships they'd overrun as the basis for their colony and they could spin sails, rigging and fishing nets from their silk.

I was also thinking they could skate across the water's surface like pond skimmers.

demiurge1138

07-04-2009 02:42 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

No discussion of giant spiders in fantasy is complete without the Weaver, that demented embodiment of chaos from the works of China Mieville. An entity of godlike power, the Weaver considers himself to be what weaves the strings of fate and circumstance together to create reality. He's also very capricious--he currently dwells in the basement of the Government in New Crobuzon, and the Mayor appeases him with whatever phenomonon he's decided is fascinating at the moment--in the book, at least for a while, he's obsessed with the sound that scissors make. He's also got a wierd sing-song stream of conciousness speech pattern, which I have duplicated for my own crazy capricious giant spider NPCs (it comes up more often than you might think) to great effect.

Sleeper

07-04-2009 04:04 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

With all the giant bugs, vermin, what have you; the creepy-crawly stuff that causes queasiness and screams in humans even when so itsy-bitsy they're relegated to climbing up the water spout... you'd think along with the mattock, maul, and spade of the titans there'd also be a flyswatter of the titans....

Or I suppose you could turn that into an adventure hook. Titan wanders by the local village. The kids are goggling, the parents wave politely, but with that certain degree of apprehension reserved for anything with as many hit points as the entire collective village. He waves back jovially at the tiny little human-shaped specks, and thuds on his way. Then, suddenly, the whole town shakes and quivers as he lets loose an earthshaking scream. The distant figure stumbles backward arms flailing, and falls down. All is quiet. What happened? Time for a convenient adventuring party to show up, and be nudged ever-so-subtly in the direction of the supine titan.

The big guy fainted, obviously. Saw a big nasty spider. Well, big as a mundane spider is to a human. Kind of smallish, as giant ones go. Certainly within the capabilities of the local posse to take out.

This could even have happened months ago. Titans are bigger in every way. Size, laughter, mood swings... and length of unconsciousness. Could be a week before he wakes up. Could be a century. The townfolks certainly don't know. They've just been living as shut-ins, too terrified to go out. After all, whatever knocked the titan prone, well, if it took out one of them, what could it do to us...?

The kids are going batty, too. Their mas and pas have them locked up inside because the parental units know perfectly well that inside every child is an adventurer desperately trying to get out and get killed. Once the brats're out of sight they'll be on their way toward the fallen semi-god lickety split-like. Maybe a couple of the plumper and slower ones'll be strung up like hobbits in Mirkwood.

Wakboth

07-04-2009 04:34 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10571842)

That's a surprisingly good fit. Not necessarily a pirate per se, but a high seas spider. Ships made of debris or living wood, held together by webbing. On the bottom, the hull is made of driftwood and other scrap pieces of dead wood; on the top, the deck, is a layer of loam that supports living trees, that are suspended in great bags that hold just enough dirt to sustain them. The rigging is a latticework or maze of braided and netted webs. Small strands catch the sea spray, which slides down the line to the plants to provide the needed liquid. They're not pirates for gold and booty; they're pirates for blood. Strung across the highest crossbars are the captured humanoids, wrapped up into cotton-candy bundles and waving in the wind, ready to be punctured. Once drained to a dessicated husk, the body goes into the topsoil and feeds the trees.

Brilliant. Now... they're obviously facing ninja spiders, then?

Inyssiis

07-04-2009 04:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10574023)

Brilliant. Now... they're obviously facing ninja spiders, then?

Isn't that the default?

JRM

07-04-2009 06:31 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth (Post 10574023)
Brilliant. Now... they're obviously facing ninja spiders, then?

Pah, those ninja spiders don't have a chance, for they do not know they will face the Dread Pirate Spider Roberts.;)

noisms

07-06-2009 12:10 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I'll be away for the next few days on business, so it's unlikely there'll be an update.

In any case we're getting towards the 1000 post point for Part IV, so I'll start a Part V thread with the Sprite entry when I get back. Keep your eyes peeled - I'll post a link in this thread to the new one anyway.

DMH

07-06-2009 08:35 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I was digging around in my invert books and magazines and found 3 more real species I wish they could have included - jumping spiders (watch 8 Legged Freaks for how to use them), social spiders (how they share food is interesting) and the vegetarian ninja spiders (who steal from leaf cutter ants). Though the last one couldn't be in the book since they were described last year.

And what about the whip spiders and sun spiders from 1e - were they ever included in 2e?

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10570671)
The thing is, since AD&D giant spiders are intelligent, they can learn these tricks with silk, so any given spider of the same "species" may know any of a wide range of silken tactics, not just the few its mindless, instinctive real-life counterparts do.

Thinking about this, I came up with spiders that use ballistas, hanging boulders, cover silk bridges with stones or sticks and have domesticated cave crickets, piercers or rats. I also got a couple ideas for spiders and water - the standard giant uses silk nets to catch fish and the giant diving bell makes something like a beaver dam/fish weir to bottleneck the river and bring prey to them.

Mikaze

07-07-2009 01:58 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Earlier it was asked if anyone remembered Sirines being used in official product.

I just remembered a doozy:

Planar adventure(Planescape-ish, but printed outside the Planescape imprint) involving a cloud giant pimp based on Dolemite and his band of kung-fu Sirine prostitutes. By Chris "Green Ronin" Pramas of all people.

JRM

07-07-2009 07:24 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10581783)

I was digging around in my invert books and magazines and found 3 more real species I wish they could have included- jumping spiders (watch 8 Legged Freaks for how to use them), social spiders (how they share food is interesting) and the vegetarian ninja spiders (who steal from leaf cutter ants). Though the last one couldn't be in the book since they were described last year.

I like to imagine Hairy Spiders as a good candidate for acting like social spiders, or rather as super-social spiders since they've got Low (5-7) intelligence. They're individually weak but can be encountered in large numbers and, importantly, are Neutral Evil rather than Chaotic Evil like the majority of sapient AD&D spiders. Plus, the MM says "Up to 40 hairy spiders can swarm a human-sized victim".

Imagine scores of the little blighters plotting together and then working in concert to kill foes many times their size, like land piranhas with poison and brains.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10581783)

And what about the whip spiders and sun spiders from 1e- were they ever included in 2e?

I understand there are stats for other kinds of arachnids in 2nd edition's The Drow of the Underdark. Unfortunately, I don't have it, but according to wikipedia it has both kinds of whip-scorpion (Schizomida and Uropygi/Thelyphonida), whip-spiders (Amblypyg) and sun spiders (Solifugid).

I expect they just recycled the stats from the 1st edition versions that debuted in Queen of the Demonweb pits.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10581783)

Thinking about this, I came up with spiders that use ballistas, hanging boulders, cover silk bridges with stones or sticks and have domesticated cave crickets, piercers or rats. I also got a couple ideas for spiders and water- the standard giant uses silk nets to catch fish and the giant diving bell makes something like a beaver dam/fish weir to bottleneck the river and bring prey to them.

Some good ideas there DMH. I've been thinking about sapient giant spiders keeping livestock, fishing with nets and setting up traps. There are all manner of other things they can do with silk - snares that hoist a victim into the air, alarm-wires, net-covered concealed pits.

Not sure why they'd bother covering a silk bridge with stones or sticks though.

I'd think ballistae are too complicated for a typical intelligent spider to use though, since they are relatively complicated devices to set up and tune. Most sapient AD&D spiders only have Intelligence 5-7 after all. The exception in the Monstrous Manual is the sword spider, which has average intelligence, but I think it would have trouble using a ballista since it has swords for legs! Of course, there's no reason not to introduce a smarter variety of spider, or one that is especially talented at stringing and firing a projectile weapon.

Although that does give me an idea for an addition to my list of new spiders:

The Archer spider. These toxophilic arachnids use their own fangs, silk and venom to craft bows and poisoned arrows which they can shoot with great skill.

6inTruder

07-07-2009 08:21 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10584185)

I understand there are stats for other kinds of arachnids in 2nd edition's The Drow of the Underdark. Unfortunately, don't have it, but according to wikipedia it has both kinds of whip-scorpion (Schizomida and Uropygi/Thelyphonida), whip-spiders (Amblypyg) and sun spiders (Solifugid).

That's irony, right?

celebrityomnipath

07-07-2009 09:31 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10581783)

vegetarian ninja spiders (who steal from leaf cutter ants). Though the last one couldn't be in the book since they were described last year.

They better not try that shit with leaf cutter scorpions!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10584185)

Some good ideas there DMH. I've been thinking about sapient giant spiders keeping livestock, fishing with nets and setting up traps. There are all manner of other things they can do with silk - snares that hoist a victim into the air, alarm-wires, net-covered concealed pits.

They could just sell silk.

MuscaDomestica

07-07-2009 10:29 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10584450)
That's irony, right?

I think they are freaky enough to be brought to the underdark

<http://www.richard-seaman.com/Wallpa.../SunSpider.jpg>

6inTruder

07-07-2009 11:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

haha! Less that and more that their preferred habitat tends towards the desert, and the name I bolded "sun spider" just sounds... Silly for an Underdark creature. And I prefer "wind scorpion" anyway.

otherwise, I love the trapdoor spiders hiding behind dungeon doors! "the door is not trapped." indeed.

Sleeper

07-07-2009 12:46 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Pic... too W I D E

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10585193)
haha! Less that and more that their preferred habitat tends towards the desert, and the name I bolded "sun spider" just sounds... Silly for an Underdark creature. And I prefer "wind scorpion" anyway.

Didn't the pseudo-spiders first show up in Q1? I remember the pedipalp and solifugid. Which kind of makes sense with the demonweb. Lolth was raiding, conquering and despoiling dozens of planes. In all those alien worlds, she probably came across a civilization or two of not-quite-spiders.

Us humans, we adore the human form. Look at our art. And look at our monsters. Lovecraft is wrong. The inconceivably alien isn't what humans fear the most. The worst monsters are ourselves... but twisted. Distorted mirror images. Bogeymen, goblins, the undead.

Same with the drow, except their art isn't full of portraits and nudes; it's full of spiders. Arachnea proper. But take that, and warp it? That's just wrong, at least to a dark elf. Monstrous, even. Which is why drow are loathed and despised. Drow get all queasy inside seeing the horrible perversion of their two favorite forms. Same with the false spiders. Just... ick.

Lolth being Lolth, might keep them around primarily to put the fear of goddess in her subjects. When a matron casts a summons and gets spiders, she knows she's still in Lolth's good graces. But if all of a sudden she's up to her ears in whip-spiders? Watch out. The Spider Queen is pissed.

The Last Conformist

07-07-2009 05:55 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10585484)

Us humans, we adore the human form. Look at our art. And look at our monsters. Lovecraft is wrong. The inconceivably alien isn't what humans fear the most. The worst monsters are ourselves... but twisted. Distorted mirror images. Bogeymen, goblins, the undead.

It's been suggested (by me if nobody else) that part of the reason Cthulhu is HPL's most famous creation is that it, unlike most of the Mythos heavies, is anthropomorphic enough to be genuinely disturbing.

Sleeper

07-07-2009 06:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist (Post 10586507)

It's been suggested (by me if nobody else) that part of the reason Cthulhu is HPL's most famous creation is that it, unlike most of the Mythos heavies, is anthropomorphic enough to be genuinely disturbing.

The second most disturbing things are all those animals our ancestors learned to fear. Wolves are our closest competitors, snakes and bugs and squishy things in the sea have poison, and so forth. Lovecraft drew a bit from that, as well.

I always thought that would be a good way to divide the lower planes. Devils are the anthropomorphic scare. They look like humans, except something is wrong. The cute ones have little horns or wings and or a cloven foot or red skin. They're the seducers, the diplomats, the lords and princesses. But there's always something wrong that both repels and excites us. The low-level lackey types sheer more towards the terrifying end of the altered-human spectrum; they look a lot like monsters in spooky video games. Shifted faces, extra eyes. Holes in unexpected places, melting skin. Always on fire, or eternally cold. Shuffling, dragging walks. Think death and disfigurement.

Demons on the other hand may have anthropomorphic features, but they're really incarnations of our fear of the things that go bump in the night. They represent the savage wild, nature. Not a twisted mirror image of ourselves (though they're that too, just to a lesser degree than devils). But an image of something we're scared of, magnified. A baboon snarling in rage. A sleek tiger sliding through the shadows. A jellyfish, huge and engulfing. Nightshades and mushrooms, with their subtle poison. Snakes, or to be more precise, vipers. Wasps and hornets and centipedes and spiders and scorpions. Immense crocodiles. Cackling iron-jawed hyenas. Frequently just humanoid enough to add a touch of that scare as well, but not always. Some are just inhuman leviathans. The most humanoid are those that represent what can't be seen: Diseases. Rotting, decaying, transforming.

JRM

07-07-2009 06:29 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by 6inTruder (Post 10585193)

haha! Less that and more that their preferred habitat tends towards the desert, and the name I bolded "sun spider" just sounds... Silly for an Underdark creature. And I prefer "wind scorpion" anyway.

Well just call them wind scorpions then. I prefer sun spider for Solifugids, since they look more spider-like. No long tail, for a start.

Solifugids tend to stay in their burrows during the day and emerge at night, like desert scorpions. They could be monsters that live in the "entrance levels" of the Underdark, coming to the surface to hunt.

Perhaps that gives a clue as to how the drow use them. When they go on raids against desert folk (sand elves?) they bring whole packs of sun spiders with them, or they just train them to attack non-drow humanoids and release them into the desert sun, when their enemies would not expect an attack from the dark elves.

JRM

07-07-2009 06:40 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10585484)

Didn't the pseudo-spiders first show up in Q1? I remember the pedipalp and solifugid. Which kind of makes sense with the demonweb. Lolth was raiding, conquering and despoiling dozens of planes. In all those alien worlds, she probably came across a civilization or two of not-quite-spiders.

Yup, Q1 being the previously mentioned Queen of the Demonweb Pits. I've never quite got around to introducing a civilization of arachnids into any of my games, but came close to it a few times. Well, within about 250,000 miles. I would have liked my players to have met the "Moon Spiders", but never got a chance to get their characters off the planet.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper (Post 10585484)

Same with the drow, except their art isn't full of portraits and nudes; it's full of spiders. Arachnea proper. But take that, and warp it? That's just wrong, at least to a dark elf. Monstrous, even. Which is why driders are loathed and despised. Drow get all queasy inside seeing the horrible perversion of their two favorite forms. Same with the false spiders. Just... ick.

Having all driders be outcasts from drow society never made much sense to me. Wouldn't it be better to have them view these hybrids like the ancients viewed centaurs, also a joining of their own race with a favoured animal. Most driders fall to the "inferior side" of their two halves and are despised, like the wild centaurs who loved pillage and rapine. A few driders overcame this and manifest the "superior side" of both dark elf and arachnid, become exemplars and teachers like the semi-divine Chiron.

JRM

07-07-2009 06:45 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10584764)
They could just sell silk.

Oh yes, they do that to. The really civilized ones will weave it to order, and run elegant clothing boutiques in certain fantastic settlements.

It takes a brave person to frequent a tailor spider, though. There's always that nagging fear that when she's measuring you for a suit she won't be able to resist the temptation to turn your character into her next meal.

DMH

07-07-2009 08:15 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10584185)
Not sure why they'd bother covering a silk bridge with stones or sticks though.

I'd think ballistae are too complicated for a typical intelligent spider to use though, since they are relatively complicated devices to set up and tune.

If they can make jerky out of their prey for long term storage, then the bridge would allow them to make potentially dozens of kills at the same time. A whole goblin or orc warband would be worth so much more than a few scouts.

I wasn't thinking of an actual ballista, but rather a tension system like the, gah- I don't know spiders well at all. There are some species that have webs that collapse on struggling prey by using high tension. It wouldn't be that difficult for such a spider to use it to throw rocks or even bits of metal (weapons, broken armor). It is on Life in the Undergrowth (but not in the book) and I don't have the time to check it now.

JRM

07-07-2009 09:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10586779)

If they can make jerky out of their prey for long term storage, then the bridge would allow them to make potentially dozens of kills at the same time. A whole goblin or orc warband would be worth so much more than a few scouts.

Speaking of sapient spider food preservation, I've come up with a few ideas about that over the years.

(I'm sure you know the following already DMH, but I'll mention it for those readers who are not invertebrate fans.)

Spiders liquify their food externally and suck up the resulting soup. A lot of spiders can chew food, but they do so outside their mouths, crushing their meal between "toothy" processes at the base of their front legs, fangs or pedipalps.

That leads me to suspect a sapient spider would have trouble eating dried jerky, so they would need other approaches to secure a long-term food supply.

The obvious one is they just cocoon live prey to eat later like some of their non-intelligent cousins do.

Next, they could herd livestock and eat them when they get hungry. Considering there are creatures in D&D with astonishingly efficient metabolisms, they could probably survive just by keeping a few giant beetles as livestock.

However, as for preserved foodstuff the best solution I could come up with is they drain juices out of prey into a container and mix it with preservatives, mainly alcohol, and make "spider soup" or "blood grog". A clever spider wouldn't even need to kill their herd, they could 'tap' them every few weeks and build up a stock of barrels or flasks of the stuff for a lean time.

A particularly civilized variety of spider, such as the aranea, may even become connoisseurs of the stuff, comparing the fine differences between flasks of elf-blood liqueur while the peasant-spiders slug down rum-and-pigblood cocktails.

Heck, I can see some humanoid races even getting a taste for the stuff.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH (Post 10586779)

I wasn't thinking of an actual ballista, but rather a tension system like the, gah- I don't know spiders well at all. There are some species that have webs that collapse on struggling prey by using high tension. It wouldn't be that difficult for such a spider to use it to throw rocks or even bits of metal (weapons, broken armor). It is on Life in the Undergrowth (but not in the book) and I don't have the time to check it now.

Oh right, that makes more sense. I have nothing against a monster spider building and operating a cheiroballista, but thought it needed more technical skill and culture than an average AD&D giant spider would be capable of.

Inyssi

07-08-2009 02:17 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Before the lock, I'll take the opportunity to link back to the previous threads...

Part I (A-Gi)

Part II (Gi-Ki)

Part III (Ki-Og)

celebrityomnipath

07-08-2009 05:14 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10586595)

Having all driders be outcasts from drow society never made much sense to me. Wouldn't it be better to have them view these hybrids like the ancients viewed centaurs, also a joining of their own race with a favoured animal. Most driders fall to the "inferior side" of their two halves and are despised, like the wild centaurs who loved pillage and rapine. A few driders overcame this and manifest the "superior side" of both dark elf and arachnid, become exemplars and teachers like the semi-divine Chiron.

Half spiders type creatures are criminally underused in D&D. They should be tailors and exotic dancers. Oh and commandos.

EmperorSeth

07-08-2009 08:09 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10588937)

Half spiders type creatures are criminally underused in D&D. They should be tailors and exotic dancers. Oh and commandos.

Yeah, this last few pages made me wish they went this route with the core 4e races instead of the stupid dragonborn.

As for why the drow are repulsed by driders and why we are bothered by how some devils are a little "off," the oft-used uncanny valley popped into my head. It begs an unpleasant question, though: what are the drow/spiders that the drow think were done "right" like?

celebrityomnipath

07-08-2009 08:49 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10589654)

Yeah, this last few pages made me wish they went this route with the core 4e races instead of the stupid dragonborn.

Oh I don't mind teh dragonborn, they're iconic ain't they. I mean it is called Dungeons & Dragons, not Dungeons & Fuck Off Big Spiders.

Though Dungeons & Fuck Off Big Spiders would be a better game.

Sleeper

07-08-2009 12:03 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth (Post 10589654)

It begs an unpleasant question, though: what are the drow/spiders that the drow think were done "right" like?

One of Lolth's forms is a big spider with an elven head.

demiurge1138

07-08-2009 01:07 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Yeah. If Lolth is any indication, it's giving a spider a humanoid torso that sets off the uncanny valley for drow.

Belchion

07-08-2009 05:13 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10586603)

Oh yes, they do that to. The really civilized ones will weave it to order, and run elegant clothing boutiques in certain fantastic settlements.

In the computer game Dark Sun: Shattered Lands, there was a tribe of sentient spiders which had a civil war about whether they should treat humans as prey (and eat them) or as equals (and trade silk for tools and food).

Sleeper

07-08-2009 05:22 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 10591572)

In the computer game Dark Sun: Shattered Lands, there was a tribe of sentient spiders which had a civil war about whether they should treat humans as prey (and eat them) or as equals (and trade silk for tools and food).

The obvious answer is social engineering. Engender a class war, wait until it settles out. Send a trade delegation to the Haves, start a profitable export business with raw silk and finished goods. Attend social galas, create absolutely fabulous gowns, worm into high society. Use this position to reinforce the Haves' belief that they are innately, naturally, genetically superior to the Have Nots. Support periodicals and demagogues preaching that the Have Nots are no better than cattle. And then, once the meme is widespread, purchase hunting rights in the Have Nots ghetto from the Haves, and viola! Trade and food, high fashion and wicked oppression!

sim_james

07-08-2009 08:52 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

I played a spider-centaur in Rolemaster... and when I drew a picture of what the infants of my race looked like, that triggered folks' uncanny valley like you wouldn't believe.

DMH

07-08-2009 08:53 PM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10587025)

That leads me to suspect a sapient spider would have trouble eating dried jerky, so they would need other approaches to secure a long-term food supply.

Just add water and spit. Jerky of the whole humanoid kind would be difficult to transport (unless spiders are superstrong like Spiderman) but easy to keep underground for a very long time. Mummified corpses hundreds of years old still have all that meat- it just has to be wetted and liquidified first. Some buried drow or duergar cities may have intelligent spider populations that can last for centuries (as long as they keep their numbers in check).

JRM

07-09-2009 01:32 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138 (Post 10590844)

Yeah. If Lolth is any indication, it's giving a spider a humanoid torso that sets off the uncanny valley for drow.

Or they could think spider-Lolth is just as freaky-looking as a drider, but just don't mention it.

After all, would you want the Spider Queen hearing about it?

JRM

07-09-2009 01:51 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10588937)

Half spiders type creatures are criminally underused in D&D. They should be tailors and exotic dancers. Oh and commandos.

Half-spiders may be agile but they're not lissome enough to be successful exotic dancers in humanoid society (unless they're dealing with a very specialised clientele).

They're great tap-dancers though.

Speaking of half-spiders and other humanoid-arachnoid hybrid, what is your favourite body type for them:

The 'Spider-Centaur' - The human from the waist up, spider from the waist down.

The 'Ettercap' - Furry humanoid with bug eyes and fangs.

The 'Aranea' - Hands on its pedipalps and maybe a human face.

The 'Chagmat' - Fully upright like a man but decidedly inhuman - 6 arms, 2 legs and the fanged head of a spider. (This beastie comes from Dragon #63 if you're interested)

Looks like we need something between the Ettercap and the Chagmat, with 4 arms and 4 legs. Could call it an "Arachnaman" or something similarly corny.

JRM

07-09-2009 03:38 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

After flicking through the Chagmat adventure back in Dragon #63 I was inspired to check for other references spiders in Dragon Magazine and came up with a couple of interesting articles.

First off, Dragon #67 (November 1982) has Souping Up The Spider by Gregg Chamberlain. Not a bad article, although it has a few errors in taxonomy.

As well as an introduction to spider anatomy the article has stats for three kinds of "Weaver Spiders" and eight "Hunter Spiders":

Weaving Spiders

"Barrel spider" (Not sure what kind of spider this is supposed to represent)

"Boleadore spider"

"Net-throwing and Fishing spider" (things like the Ogre-Faced Spider Deinopidae)

Hunting Spiders

"Crab Spider"

"Daddy-Longlegs" (actually not a spider, since it's an Opiliones harvestman not a long-legged type of spider like the Pholcidae)

Jumping Spider

Raft or Swamp spider (e.g. Dolomedes)

Spitting spider"

"Trap-door or Purse spider" (Covers a range of families)

"Whip spider" (As mentioned earlier in the thread, Amblypygi may be arachnids but they are not spiders. Oh, and 1st edition already had stats for these ever since Queen of the Demonweb Pits was released two years earlier than this magazine)

"Wolf spider" (Strictly speaking Lycosidae, although the stats would also serve for similar species from other families.)

That's a pretty good selection, with most of the major varieties cover. I would like to know what a "barrel spider" is, so I'll do some googling to find out. One thing I should note is the article forgot to discuss spider venom, including no mention that the daddy long leg and whip spider arachnids do not have poison.

The second article is The Dragon's Bestiary from issue #118 (February 1987). Unlike the former, this has some more unrealistic entries among its spiders and spiderlike creatures.

"Opilionid (Cave Harvestman)" (This is a subterranean take on the "Daddy Long Legs" in the previous article.)

"Spider Cat" (This is basically a cross between a lion and a giant spider. It has poison fangs, claws, spins webs, is immune to fear & illusions and has 30% magic resistance. Oh, and you need +2 magic weapons to hurt it. "Spider cats are the creations of a mad wizard, millenia dead". What would we do without mad wizards, eh.)

"Phoenix Spider" (Basically a big black widow with reverse colour - i.e. red all over with a black hourglass - that is reborn each time you kill it, getting stronger each time, until you run through all its lives. I've never much cared for this kind of Russian Doll monster, the only time I used something like this each incarnation had a different monsters inside it)

"Polar Spider" Not very interesting, an big spider that's immune to cold.

"Bolas Spider, Giant" Another take on the previous article's "Boleadore Spider" This one can detect magic by touch and collects enchanted objects, for no known reason.

Not so taken by this lot, although I liked the idea of Spider Cats.

Oh and yes, spider-lions do hunt in packs. :D

celebrityomnipath

07-09-2009 06:34 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion (Post 10591572)

In the computer game Dark Sun: Shattered Lands, there was a tribe of sentient spiders which had a civil war about whether they should treat humans as prey (and eat them) or as equals (and trade silk for tools and food).

Yeah one faction thought "we should eat people, that will make us popular and well-respected" and the other one thought "no let's talk to people and trade with them and be nice and shit, that will make us popular". Of course, being Dark Sun, teh first faction were right. It's Dark Sun, everyone loves a cannibal.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10593100)

Half-spiders may be agile but they're not lissome enough to be successful exotic dancers in humanoid society (unless they're dealing with a very specialised clientele).

Ah I think they'll be a market for spider porn in D&D world.

Thinking of which:

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10593100)

Looks like we need something between the Ettercap and the Chagmat, with 4 arms and 4 legs. Could call it an "Arachnaman" or something similarly corny.

Teh word "Ettercap" causes me to twinge evar since I saw an erotic drawing of one.

JRM

07-09-2009 07:47 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10594287)

Ah I think they'll be a market for spider porn in D&D world.

I believe that falls under the "very specialised clientele" category I mentioned.:o

noisms

07-09-2009 09:23 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM (Post 10593100)

Half-spiders may be agile but they're not lissome enough to be successful exotic dancers in humanoid society (unless they're dealing with a very specialised clientele).

They're great tap-dancers though.

Speaking of half-spiders and other humanoid-arachnoid hybrid, what is your favourite body type for them:

The 'Spider-Centaur' - The human from the waist up, spider from the waist down.

The 'Ettercap' - Furry humanoid with bug eyes and fangs.

The 'Aranea' - Hands on its pedipalps and maybe a human face.

The 'Chagmat' - Fully upright like a man but decidedly inhuman - 6 arms, 2 legs and the fanged head of a spider. (This beastie comes from Dragon #63 if you're interested)

Looks like we need something between the Ettercap and the Chagmat, with 4 arms and 4 legs. Could call it an "Arachnaman" or something similarly corny.

I'm a fan of the Ettercap type, but mostly because I just love Ettercaps.

The Aranea is easily the creepiest, and has the advantage of being one of the nastiest monsters you can meet in the roguelike games I enjoy.

Ragnarok_Engine

07-09-2009 10:27 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath (Post 10589814)

Oh I don't mind teh dragonborn, they're iconic ain't they. I mean it is called Dungeons & Dragons, not Dungeons & Fuck Off Big Spiders.

Though Dungeons & Fuck Off Big Spiders would be a better game.

I think we have SteveD's next project lined up for him once WFRP work dries up! He's even in the perfect location to do research!

noisms

07-09-2009 11:11 AM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part IV, Orc~?]

New thread here.

noisms

[Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Contd. from [here.]

The last leg of our mystical and wondrous journey? Perhaps. I'm going to miss these threads. :(

Sprite

Sprites - the easy going, pleasure loving, gossamer-winged, goody-goody fairies that we all know and, er, love[?]. I daresay you know the deal: they dislike evil, and will attempt to drug and then either kill or remove unwanted trespassers in their glades. We're also told they dislike "ugliness", which seems a bit harsh - then again in the un-PC world of D&D, ugliness is generally a fair indication of evil, so you can't blame the Sprites for using it as a yardstick.

A number of varieties are listed:

Sprite (Standard)

Sprites possess many of the abilities that can make a monster extremely annoying - invisibility at will, sleeping-potion-darts, and a willingness to attack on sight if they find you unattractive. But of course, they can also fit into that "other" rarely-played variety of D&D - the more mysterious, fairy-tale-esque variety which is perfectly possible with the system as it is. In such a game Sprites could be responsible for all manner of strange goings on in the forest, with the PCs investigating, perhaps.

Sea Sprites

These Sprites live in coral reefs, and are a little like environmental avengers, killing those who damage the reefs but leaving other trespassers alive on nearby beaches. They are the sworn enemies of Sahuagin - as everybody in the ocean seems to be.

Pixie

Pixies possess are like Sprites writ large - with huge potential to be annoying and huge potential to be mysterious, depending on the DM. Not only can they put you to sleep, they can also make you lose your memory, make you dance irresistibly, use ESP, polymorph themselves...essentially, they possess the entire arsenal of the tricky D&D creature.

The MM describes Pixie behaviour as being somewhere between a Knocker (making noises in the night) and a kind of moral policeman, tricking misers out of gold and generally pricking the noses of the self-important. People who come searching for Pixie treasure are mercilessly hounded, but if they can show a good sense of humour they might be rewarded.

Nixie

An underwater Pixie, which can charm human trespassers and enslave them, which I rather like - it's nice to have capricious and somewhat sinister fairie folk about.

Nixie society has a surprising level of detail:

Quote:

Nixie tribes are ruled by the Acquar (water mother), a hereditary position held by a direct descendant of the original founding ancestor. She decides major disputes and chooses the most apt warrior to be the S'oquar, the warlord responsible for hunting and defense. The Acquar is advised by a council of elders, whose spokesperson is called the L'uquar, the keeper of the tribe's oral history. Treasures, whether the spoils of war or the results of work or luck, are divided equally by the Acquar. Intertribal rivalries are often fierce, and females are sometimes kidnapped as brides, for nixies are polygamists, keeping 2-3 wives. Nixies worship water and nature powers.

There's so much information in the MM that it's a little depressing sometimes. I'll probably never use a Nixie tribe in one of my games, simply from want of time. Sad, isn't it?

Atomie

This is the smallest Sprite of all. As well as the usual Sprite powers it can also summon insects.

Atomies live in treetop villages that are a little like those of the Ewoks. They sometimes grow mushroom pets, and take care of lost children. To be honest, I find them the least interesting Sprite variety, although there is potential in the idea of their tendency to hoard magical items. What if they get their hands on something the PCs need? etc.

Grig

Another variety of trick-players, with long cricket legs and a greater tendency towards violence. Amusingly, we are told they speak "atomie, brownie, pixie, sprite, and Common" - more candidates for the Elven Cat list of lesser-known languages!

07-09-2009, 11:13 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

•

For the curious, here are the first three parts of this thread:

Part I (A-Gi)

Part II (Gi-Ki)

Part III (Ki-Og)

07-09-2009, 11:17 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius

For the curious, here are the first three parts of this thread:

Part I (A-Gi)

Part II (Gi-Ki)

Part III (Ki-Og)

Thanks, Inyssius.

07-09-2009, 12:13 PM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

A number of varieties are listed:

Sprite (Standard)

Somehow, I'm now envisioning Sprite (Diet) and Sprite (Lemon-Lime) as well.

I'm torn on the Nixie titles, though. "Acquar", "S'oquar", and "L'uquar" are all kinda nice for having that obvious element in common. On the other hand, they're afflicted with the Meaningless Fantasy Name Apostrophe, and so should probably be purged with fire...

07-09-2009, 12:26 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

I'm torn on the Nixie titles, though. "Acquar", "S'oquar", and "L'uquar" are all kinda nice for having that obvious element in common. On the other hand, they're afflicted with the Meaningless Fantasy Name Apostrophe, and so should probably be purged with fire...

Whaq iq wrongq witrq 'qa qon'sistent letquer anq quae ocquasional a'pos'tro'qhe?

Oh. That.

07-09-2009, 01:03 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Somehow, I'm now envisioning Sprite (Diet) and Sprite (Lemon-Lime) as well.

Sprite (Throwback)?

07-09-2009, 01:16 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Somehow, I'm now envisioning Sprite (Diet) and Sprite (Lemon-Lime) as well.

I'm torn on the Nixie titles, though. "Acquar", "S'oquar", and "L'uquar" are all kinda nice for having that obvious element in common. On the other hand, they're afflicted with the Meaningless Fantasy Name Apostrophe, and so should probably be purged with fire...

I'm currently working my way through The Malazan Book of the Fallen, which is possibly the most egregious example of the abuse of apostrophes in the fantasy literature canon. It seriously mars an otherwise enjoyable experience.

07-09-2009, 03:30 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Somehow, I'm now envisioning Sprite (Diet) and Sprite (Lemon-Lime) as well.

Oh, those were the days. Back when I did a silly dungeon crawl game, the PCs found the pantry of the legendary kobold sorcerer Kojark. In it were cans of Sprite.

Oh, how they screamed when they were opened...

07-09-2009, 06:50 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Sprite

Sprites - the easy going, pleasure loving, gossamer-winged, goody-goody fairies that we all know and, er, love[?]. I daresay you know the deal: they dislike evil, and will attempt to drug and then either kill or remove unwanted trespassers in their glades. We're also told they dislike "ugliness", which seems a bit harsh - then again in the un-PC world of D&D, ugliness is generally a fair indication of evil, so you can't blame the Sprites for using it as a yardstick.

Well they may claim to be all good-goody butter-won't-melt-in-my-mouth but their stat entries say differently. See for yourself:

Sprite - Neutral (good)
Sea Spirite - Chaotic Neutral
Pixie - Neutral
Nixie- Neutral
Atomie - Chaotic Neutral
Grig - Neutral (good)

So, at best two out of six varieties have Good tendencies, while another two are strongly Chaotic.

I think these creatures work best as amoral trickster-types, not evil per se, but you want to tread carefully about them. Not only are they bored and mischievous, but they never forget a slight and can be endlessly inventive [S]if[/S] when they want to be vindictive.

Also, I think you missed a trick by not mentioning this titbit from the Pixie entry:

Quote:

The most famous by-product of pixies is pixie dust, also known as dust of disappearance. Crushing 50 pixie wings into a fine powder creates one dose of dust of disappearance. Naturally, pixies frown on this use of their wings.

Doesn't that just scream "adventure seed"?

The pixies played their pranks on the wrong guy, a Lawful Evil wizard and her adventuring party who have access to copious detect invisibility spells and absolutely no sense of humour. The party proceeds to track them down and trap them in little iron cages, to harvest their wings for pixie dust and let them regrow. Then an escapee wingless pixie tries to recruit the player characters to rescue them.

For some reason I fancy giving the evil wizard a Lawful Evil pseudodragon as a familiar. Maybe he or she used to be CG but put on a helm of opposite alignment.

Hmm, maybe the pixies knew the wizard before they were evilized, so thought it was safe to play japes of him or her. Now I'm spinning off a alternative plot were the helm becomes a "crown of evil" (created by an covey of hags who hate the pixies?), and if the player's manage to destroy this magic item the wizard reverts to their original niceness.

07-09-2009, 11:04 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have the Spiderwick art book and it shows how much better he has become with such critters.

As for sprites themselves, they never made it into 2e, did they? (I mean true sprites, not the sprite fey subtype)

07-10-2009, 04:48 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Anyone evar played Castle Falkenstein? That had lots of these little shits. We had a simple solution; butterfly nets. Strung with piano wire.

07-10-2009, 05:12 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I have the Spiderwick art book and it shows how much better he has become with such critters.

It's got a whole lot of awesome art; I particularly liked the merrows and the najads, for some reason.

A former campaign had sprites and pixies and whatnots in fairly important supporting roles at lower levels. Our DM was very good at playing them as annoyingly cheery, scatterbrained and curious little critters that got us seriously consider investing in a spell to swat them down... and then sprung some soulless, mutilated sprites with pulled wings and sewed-shut mouths on us. The sudden rush of sympathy for the little critters was astonishing.

07-10-2009, 09:45 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

It's got a whole lot of awesome art; I particularly liked the merrows and the najads, for some reason.

A former campaign had sprites and pixies and whatnots in fairly important supporting roles at lower levels. Our DM was very good at playing them as annoyingly cheery, scatterbrained and curious little critters that got us seriously consider investing in a spell to swat them down... and then sprung some soulless, mutilated sprites with pulled wings and sewed-shut mouths on us. The sudden rush of sympathy for the little critters was astonishing.

Who had done the terrible crime, and were they brought to justice? You can't leave us hanging like that!

07-10-2009, 11:23 AM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I have the Spiderwick art book and it shows how much better he has become with such critters.

As for sprites themselves, they never made it into 2e, did they? (I mean true sprites, not the sprite fey subtype)

That's not fair, though. DiTerlizzi makes anything better.

07-10-2009, 02:33 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Who had done the terrible crime, and were they brought to justice? You can't leave us hanging like that!

The ruler of a decaying pocket plane, whose agents were stealing sprite souls to invigorate his realm. And yeah, he got his just deserts... unfortunately, and completely unintentionally, in the process of us thrashing him, we managed to depopulate the entire plane by accidentally setting every faction against one another! (Not one of our characters' finest moments, although the players remember it with great amusement.)

Though at least the giant magical tree, where the forests of the plane had taken refuge, survived and the forests started to spread out again.

07-10-2009, 07:13 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I have the Spiderwick art book and it shows how much better he has become with such critters.

As for sprites themselves, they never made it into 2e, did they? (I mean true sprites, not the sprite fey subtype)

I'm guessing from the "Fey subtype" you meant Third edition, not Second, since 2nd edition has true sprites as the first entry in the Monstrous Manual's "Sprite" entry.

As for 3rd edition, I don't think wizards ever released official stats for true sprites. There's probably a version in some third-party product or other like The Tome of Horrors, but I can't recall seeing them in any 3E book I own.

07-10-2009, 08:52 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

SNIP

Dragon #67 (November 1982) has Souping Up The Spider by Gregg Chamberlain. Not a bad article, although it has a few errors in taxonomy.

As well as an introduction to spider anatomy the article has stats for three kinds of "Weaver Spiders" and eight "Hunter Spiders":

Weaving Spiders

"Barrel spider" (Not sure what kind of spider this is supposed to represent)

"Boleadore spider"

"Net-throwing and Fishing spider" (things like the Ogre-Faced Spider Deinopidae)

SNIP

That's a pretty good selection, with most of the major varieties cover. I would like to know what a "barrel spider" is, so I'll do some googling to find out.

Well, after some googling to try to find out what Mr Chamberlain meant by a "barrel spider" I came up with two possibilities: Both Jumping spiders of the Thiodina genus and Solifugids (aka sun spider or wind spider) have been called by the name. It looks like sun spiders are the better fit, since (a) they match the description more closely (see below); and (b) the article has an entry for Jumping Spiders, so having one for Thiodina seems redundant.

Although, that would give the article another non-spider venomless arachnid masquerading as a true spider. More confusingly, it's listed under "Weaver Spiders", which argues against it being a wind-spider. Solifugids don't spin webs!

Can anyone come up with a better alternative? DMH?

Here's the description the article gives for a "barrel spider", it certainly sounds more like a solifugid than a web-spinning spider:

Quote:

This spider's pedipalps are greatly extended so they sometimes act as an extra pair of legs. The body is covered with a pale yellow film of hairs, making the spider especially sensitive to changes in air pressure and thus very difficult to surprise (roll of 1 on d8). The chelicerae are very strong; the garden variety (normal spider-sized) can crack a beetle's armor.

SNIP

When cornered, this spider hisses, though she does not spit poison. Treat this attack as for a bombardier beetle,...

07-10-2009, 09:19 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The only spider I can think of with palps almost as large as legs are the really primitive ones with abdomen segmentation. Liphistius looks like it has 10 legs. But it isn't a weaver, so I have no idea what the author was getting at either.

07-10-2009, 10:20 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

The only spider I can think of with palps almost as large as legs are the really primitive ones with abdomen segmentation. Liphistius looks like it has 10 legs. But it isn't a weaver, so I have no idea what the author was getting at either.

Yes, I did wonder whether it could be some kind of primitive spider, although I was thinking of Mygalomorphs, since there are species of "bird-eating-spider" that are sometimes called "hissing spiders", and it mentions hissing.

I didn't consider the even-more-primitive Mesothelae like Liphistius. If the article said whether are venomous or not it would help narrow it down, but it would have been even better to have mentioned their actual taxonomic name!

Still, a sun spider / wind spider seems the best match. Some of the primitive spiders may have the long palps, powerful jaws and "hissing" given in the description, but they don't usually have pale yellow fur, which is a common attribute for Solifugids.

07-11-2009, 08:10 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Getting back to sprites. They seem fairly weak with all the monstrous spiders and other critters that can kill/eat them without too much effort. How do they survive? Do they ally with any good monsters?

07-11-2009, 09:05 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Getting back to sprites. They seem fairly weak with all the monstrous spiders and other critters that can kill/eat them without too much effort. How do they survive? Do they ally with any good monsters?

Invisibility is I suppose the key to this.

It's also not difficult to imagine the sprites having some sort of symbiotic relationship with animal species. You know like how animals form coincidental partnerships, so that a rock guppy will presume to live in the hole a shrimp has made, "in return" for warning the shrimp when a predator is about?

Sprites might do something similar, like for example providing nectar for a species of wasp which hunts spiders. That's maybe a crap example because carnivorous wasps aren't likely to drink nectar, but you get the idea.

07-12-2009, 01:11 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

The most famous by-product of pixies is pixie dust, also known as dust of disappearance. Crushing 50 pixie wings into a fine powder creates one dose of dust of disappearance. Naturally, pixies frown on this use of their wings.

Hrm. If pixies shed their wings annually (not too unlikely a scenario), then they are all but certain to have cornered the market on dust of disappearance.

In fact, that could be a good way to recast pixies: as tiny drug pushers, willing to give the first hit of dust cheap, but then scaling up the prices as addict adventurers keep coming back for more...

07-12-2009, 01:43 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Hrm. If pixies shed their wings annually (not too unlikely a scenario), then they are all but certain to have cornered the market on dust of disappearance.

In fact, that could be a good way to recast pixies: as tiny drug pushers, willing to give the first hit of dust cheap, but then scaling up the prices as addict adventurers keep coming back for more...

I like that. A dash of gritty urban fantasy tossed into the already odd blend that's D&D.

Perhaps the pixie lecturerer at the local druids' school has contracted an incurable magical ailment. To make money to support his family he teams up with an ex-student (ogre?) of his who dropped out and became involved in the dust trade. The pixie is using his extensive knowledge of alchemy to make the purest dust of disappearance the Dweomer Enforcement Agency has ever found. Known as the "blue dust", it's popping up across five kingdoms. Rumors of a new player in the dust trade abound, going by the pseudonym "Mr. Occam". :)

07-12-2009, 10:24 AM

Kathel

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I like that. A dash of gritty urban fantasy tossed into the already odd blend that's D&D.

Perhaps the pixie lecturerer at the local druids' school has contracted an incurable magical ailment. To make money to support his family he teams up with an ex-student (ogre?) of his who dropped out and became involved in the dust trade. The pixie is using his extensive knowledge of alchemy to make the purest dust of disappearance the Dweomer Enforcement Agency has ever found. Known as the "blue dust", it's popping up across five kingdoms. Rumors of a new player in the dust trade abound, going by the pseudonym "Mr. Occam". :)

Pure awesome. Pure awesome! This is a fantastic idea for the start of a campaign. goes looking for his 2e books

07-12-2009, 11:27 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kathel

Pure awesome. Pure awesome! This is a fantastic idea for the start of a campaign. goes looking for his 2e books

Somebody will eventually point out where I stole the idea from :)

07-12-2009, 12:43 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Squid, Giant

You have to love creatures like the Giant Squid - from the ancient stories of the Kraken through to Cthulu and the Watcher in the Water, gargantuan cephalopods have been a feature of the fantastic. And there's definitely a kind of primal human terror of the many-tentacled, relentless carnivore which seeps through into even D&D.

Giant Squid

The 'ordinary' variety, 60' long, capable of dragging small boats to the bottom of the ocean or slowing and/or crushing larger ones. (Incidentally the rules for squid attacks on ships are pretty good: 2e could be very quick and easy with things like that when it wanted to be.) Unusually it has only an intelligence of 0, which is hardly fair when we consider how clever PETA girl made the D&D dolphin and also hardly realistic from what we know of cephalopod intelligence. It also has a 'swim' movement of only 3 (though can 'Jet' at 18) which is surely a misprint.

Nevertheless you don't get much better than a struggle against a Giant Squid, complete with severed tentacles and ink clouds. I'm sure you'll agree.

Kraken

The Kraken is 90' or more long and practically demi-god like in power, with their abilities to control the weather and summon sea monsters to their aid.

Indeed, I like to think of Kraken as actual demigods of a sort, perhaps worshipped by Sahuagin or other evil races of the deep. I once thought up a scenario where a Kraken had, over millenia, slowly corrupted a nearby community of Sea Elves and turned them into its servants; they ranged far and wide, abducting unsuspecting humanoids to take back to the sea floor for sacrifice. But I never ended up using it.

Of course, the MM has a fun little scenario itself, where it is said that Kraken maintain huge tunnel complexes beneath the sea bed, in which they keep many human slaves. Clearly a rescue job for a band of intrepid adventurers.

07-12-2009, 03:20 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The Kraken is 90' or more long and practically demi-god like in power, with their abilities to control the weather and summon sea monsters to their aid.

What if the ability to control the weather is only the surface of a kraken's powers, both literally and figuratively? D&D is rather lacking in water spells. Raise, lower, breathe; that's about it. There isn't a watery equivalent of weather control, of calling lightning, of precipitation, of faerie fire. That's the reason they're lacking in powers suited to their benthic environment. To actually define their powers over water would require an entire tome full of watery magics, and that was just too much work for a single entry in the MM.

Controlling the moisture in the air is merely the most distant, evanescent manifestation of their powers. Because the krakens are kind of like spiders of the deep. They spin their web, using ancient rituals that can only be performed by a being with ten arms. They draw sigils, miles wide and create a roiling batch of water, and then direct it. Running up and down the coast, under the sea, ten such vast underwater rivers become almost living extensions of their limbs. Krakens are the source of all currents. Where the seas brings warm water to northerly coasts, there is a kraken. They forge the great roads that criss-cross the oceans.

Their ability to control the weather is almost an afterthought. They reach up frail and ephemeral little currents of airborne water, and nudge here, tweak there. It's so attenuated that it requires great skill, but it is merely a shadow of their underwater power. Because when they're angry, that can slap their tentacles and their currents jump in response. Ships crash against reefs. Sailors are sucked under. Whole pods of whales are cast a hundred miles in a matter of minutes by an undersea surge.

Because, like arms, the currents are sensitive. Ships on the skin, on the upper surface... tickle. Irritate. Annoy. And every once in a while, the kraken just has to lash out. Scratch. Rub. Stop the tingling, at least for a little while. This is why they crush ships, and haunt sea lanes. Because all those trade routes that connect all those ports scattered like flotsam across the ocean's distant shores? They run along the tops of their arms.

07-12-2009, 04:14 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Of course, the MM has a fun little scenario itself, where it is said that Kraken maintain huge tunnel complexes beneath the sea bed, in which they keep many human slaves. Clearly a rescue job for a band of intrepid adventurers.

And that's why kraken and morkoth get along. Who do you think digs those giant complexes? Morkoth act as kraken's subcontractors, digging out massive underground complexes in exchange for a section of the burrow to call their own and convert into a hypno-tunnel and a steady supply of slaves to torture and eat. Perhaps the kraken keeps the relationship alive by employing the morkoth as a torturer and jailer, keeping the slaves in line with threats of being morkified?

07-12-2009, 05:56 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Getting back to sprites. They seem fairly weak with all the monstrous spiders and other critters that can kill/eat them without too much effort. How do they survive? Do they ally with any good monsters?

They have invisibility, sleep arrows and can fly, all pretty good defenses. Plus, they do pal around with other sylvan creatures, the monster manual says so.

Its all very well nice casting a see invisible spell and going a-pixie hunting until their friend the treant turns up.

That raises the question what role sprites play in fey society-ecology. Perhaps they are pollinators? That would cast an entirely different light on their close relationship with treants and dryads...

07-12-2009, 05:58 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Controlling the moisture in the air is merely the most distant, evanescent manifestation of their powers. Because the krakens are kind of like spiders of the deep. They spin their web, using ancient rituals that can only be performed by a being with ten arms. They draw sigils, miles wide and create a roiling batch of water, and then direct it. Running up and down the coast, under the sea, ten such vast underwater rivers become almost living extensions of their limbs. Krakens are the source of all currents. Where the seas brings warm water to northerly coasts, there is a kraken. They forge the great roads that criss-cross the oceans.

SNIP

I like that idea, it ties in nicely with exaggerated real-world myths of kraken and sea-serpents many leagues long. They are just confused references to the magical current-tentacles of the god-squids.

07-12-2009, 09:05 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

They have invisibility, sleep arrows and can fly, all pretty good defenses. Plus, they do pal around with other sylvan creatures, the monster manual says so.

This is why I hate creatures that share a name with a type. I meant all the fey in the sprite entry. They are all weaklings (even fiddler grigs) compared with the evil monsters that corrupt forests. Unicorns aren't that much better. Treants are too slow.

So who, other than adventurers, is the real protector of sylvan areas?

07-12-2009, 09:35 PM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Of course, the MM has a fun little scenario itself, where it is said that Kraken maintain huge tunnel complexes beneath the sea bed, in which they keep many human slaves. Clearly a rescue job for a band of intrepid adventurers.

No one could ever explain to me why undersea caves would be full of lovely breatheable air. Well, not without using the word "magic" anyway.:

07-12-2009, 09:59 PM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

They are all weaklings... So who, other than adventurers, is the real protector of sylvan areas?

You try calling a 10th level fighter/magic user/thief sylvan elf "weakling" and see what happens. :D

07-13-2009, 12:32 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

This is why I hate creatures that share a name with a type. I meant all the fey in the sprite entry. They are all weaklings (even fiddler grigs) compared with the evil monsters that corrupt forests. Unicorns aren't that much better. Treants are too slow.

So who, other than adventurers, is the real protector of sylvan areas?

Nymphs. Imagine the sheer devastation one nude nymph could wreak upon an unsuspecting orcish army. 80% of the orcs who see her die.

07-13-2009, 09:59 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

No one could ever explain to me why undersea caves would be full of lovely breathable air. Well, not without using the word "magic" anyway.:

Well yeah, magic. I think we're supposed to imagine the Kraken using its special "make breathable space in water" ability.

07-13-2009, 11:20 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

Nymphs. Imagine the sheer devastation one nude nymph could wreak upon an unsuspecting orcish army. 80% of the orcs who see her die.

That suggests a rather different twist on the nymph concept. Hardened battle-weary soldiers trying to keep it together, disgusted with themselves for what they have to do to defeat the enemy.

07-13-2009, 08:18 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

That raises the question what role sprites play in fey society-ecology. Perhaps they are pollinators? That would cast an entirely different light on their close relationship with treants and dryads...

Also, how do they reproduce. Are there larval sprites or do they spontaneously generate?

07-13-2009, 11:14 PM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That suggests a rather different twist on the nymph concept. Hardened battle-weary soldiers trying to keep it together, disgusted with themselves for what they have to do to defeat the enemy.

Yet another origin for half-orcs that probably wouldn't pass muster for 4e...

07-14-2009, 02:50 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That suggests a rather different twist on the nymph concept. Hardened battle-weary soldiers trying to keep it together, disgusted with themselves for what they have to do to defeat the enemy.

Depending upon how you play your faerie creatures, they may or may not give a fuck. Or even notice: "Those mortal creatures are so short lived, they just keep dropping dead." "Yeah I know, only the other day I saw a whole lot of them and most of them just collapsed and died right there, they must have such short lifespans."

There is a half-nymph-half-elf race in *Bastards And Bloodlines, called houri. They have +8 to charisma, are all female, and can use Dazzling Beauty once per day (The back of that book is packed with feats to enhance natural abilities and make them work moar frequently, btw). Sadly they lack a feat or prestige class that lets them kill people by looking at them.

They also look like those amazingly unrealistic pictures of hot chicks, obviously drawn by men, that you see in fantasy books and of heavy metal album covers. And they seem to spend 90% of their waking moments being stalked by bards looking for muses.

Houri are fucking awesome, but sadly they are usually druids, rather than bards. Well I say "bards" but really they should all be employed to dress up in leather armour and stand with a half-ogre in spikey armour on either side of them and pose for heavy metal album covers.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Yet another origin for half-orcs that probably wouldn't pass muster for 4e...

Well, according to Green Ronin's *Bastards And Bloodlines, nymphs can only breed with elves, then again they also say that elves can breed with bugbears, so what do they know? In their defense however, Green Ronin also invented that awesome creature; the anathema nymph, which are undead nymphs that result when orcs burn down their forest and take a big shit in their sacred pond.

Evil undead nymphs still have their being so beautiful that they can kill or maim people with their beauty related powers, despite being undead (I guess everyone is a necro-romancer when it comes to them) and they can also turn elves like clerics turn undead and, thinking of undead, they can make evil zombie elves which is hillaryarse.

They may be the most awesome nymphs ever!!!!!!11eleven etc.

*I had forgotten how awesome that book is until now.

07-14-2009, 08:50 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

So who, other than adventurers, is the real protector of sylvan areas?

While Druids are a common explanation, how about Green Dragons? Nothing says the protector has to be Good, and you're messing with their forest.

07-14-2009, 08:53 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Also, how do they reproduce. Are there larval sprites or do they spontaneously generate?

Well their MM entry says they come in male and female, and they're humanoid, so it seems likely they use the traditional humanoid method of procreation.

07-14-2009, 09:00 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Well, according to Green Ronin's *Bastards And Bloodlines, nymphs can only breed with elves, then again they also say that elves can breed with bugbears, so what do they know?

Hmm, well if you combine the Tolkienish "orcs are corrupted elves" trope with the 1E Monster Manual's comment that orcs will breed with anything, that rather suggests elves will breed with anything, too. They could be the AD&D's cross-species hybridizing equivalent of dragons under 3rd edition.

Which raises a rather disturbing possibility as to how the Elven Cat, the Cooshee (Elven Dog) and other elven animals* are really brought into existence.:eek:

*I imagine there are elven horses & hawks, at least.

07-14-2009, 09:12 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, well if you combine the Tolkienish "orcs are corrupted elves" trope with the 1E Monster Manual's comment that orcs will breed with anything, that rather suggests elves will breed with anything, too. They could be the AD&D's cross-species hybridizing equivalent of dragons under 3rd edition.

I'll keep this short cause we ain't on teh elf or orc thread anymore.

Well once again according to Green Ronin, orcs can breed with owlbears but not with elves, cause orcs are corrupted elves and magic or something. I really liked that book but I do not consider it to be a biology textbook.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Which raises a rather disturbing possibility as to how the Elven Cat, the Cooshee (Elven Dog) and other elven animals* are really brought into existence.:eek:

*I imagine there are elven horses & hawks, at least.

Na that's halflings. Seriously, blink dogs? Oh and harpies.

07-14-2009, 09:43 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Well once again according to Green Ronin, orcs can breed with owlbears but not with elves

I don't know about owlbears (and would frankly rather not), but the idea that elves and orcs can't interbreed is at least from this very Monstrous Manual, and possibly older: "orcs will crossbreed with virtually every humanoid and demihuman species except elves, with whom they cannot."

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That suggests a rather different twist on the nymph concept. Hardened battle-weary soldiers trying to keep it together, disgusted with themselves for what they have to do to defeat the enemy.

I'm actually picturing a variant on Monty Python's "Funniest Joke in the World."

In other news, Satyrs could make pretty competent forest protectors - they're as common as elves, and have an extra 4 hit dice. In fact, the forests could be kind of like a Valhalla - the satyrs fight all day, every day, and spend their nights frolicking and chasing attractive women.

Perhaps those who die by the sight of a nymph are blessed to rise again as one of the forests protectors - the satyr. They will enjoy a life of eternal pleasure and decadence, mixed with spurts of maddening warfare.

07-14-2009, 03:09 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Yet another origin for half-orcs that probably wouldn't pass muster for 4e...

I was a bit ambiguous, but I was actually referring to the psychological ramifications of killing.

Separately, there really does seem to be a missing UberFey. There's the LeShay in 3E, but dual-wielding lightsabre elves don't quite fit the traditional role. I like using hags or adapting vila or rusalka, but then I'm a fan of Russian folklore.

07-14-2009, 03:55 PM

JohnBiles

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

Perhaps those who die by the sight of a nymph are blessed to rise again as one of the forests protectors - the satyr. They will enjoy a life of eternal pleasure and decadence, mixed with spurts of maddening warfare.

Ooooh, I like that idea.

07-15-2009, 07:15 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I was a bit ambiguous, but I was actually referring to the psychological ramifications of killing.

Separately, there really does seem to be a missing UberFey. There's the LeShay in 3E, but dual-wielding lightsabre elves don't quite fit the traditional role. I like using hags or adapting vila or rusalka, but then I'm a fan of Russian folklore.

Yes, the Monstrous Manual does seem to be missing a good candidate for the "Noble Fey" archetype. I know you could just use a high-level elf, but that doesn't seem quite right for some kinds of "UberFey" like a Queen of the Seelie. I tend to just stat up such entities as unique individuals, which fortunately is a good deal easier in AD&D than 3rd edition.

I like using hags too, or taking a troll, ogre or giant and slapping on whatever funky fairy-tale power takes my fancy, like a giant that can shapechange into a huge boar, ogres that can enlarge themselves and vomit darkness, worgs that can paralyze a single victim by locking eyes with them, et cetera.

07-15-2009, 07:37 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Yes, the Monstrous Manual does seem to be missing a good candidate for the "Noble Fey" archetype. I know you could just use a high-level elf, but that doesn't seem quite right for some kinds of "UberFey" like a Queen of the Seelie. I tend to just stat up such entities as unique individuals, which fortunately is a good deal easier in AD&D than 3rd edition.

I'd probably go for a large vaguely shark-like creature made of wooden and thorn that can swim through earth and plants unimpeded like they were water, and whose fins trail tentacles of thorns that drag people to their deaths and also poison them. Oh and its dorsal fin has a big spike on top of it for impaling people, that counts as vorpal but for heart shots.

07-15-2009, 09:12 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I don't know about owlbears (and would frankly rather not), but the idea that elves and orcs can't interbreed is at least from this very Monstrous Manual, and possibly older: "orcs will crossbreed with virtually every humanoid and demihuman species except elves, with whom they cannot."

If I recall correctly that's in 1st edition AD&D as well. It prompts the question of why they cannot, considering some of the bizarre creatures that are considered humanoid in the game, most of whom orcs presumably can breed with.

Maybe it's impossible because orcs are a kind of anti-elf: Ugly instead of beautiful, vulgar instead of magical, fecund instead of extraordinarily slow-breeding, destructive instead of in tune with nature, short-lived instead of seeming ageless, et cetera.

Well, it's either that or you get an explosion if a race and anti-race breed.

Alternatively, perhaps the clue is in the "will crossbreed", and it's something in orcish culture/psychology rather than biology. Orcs may be unable to see elves as sexually desirable, being revolting willowy snoutless creatures who are loathsome in the eye of Groomsh.

Or maybe that's just a story they tell other races, and the result of an orc and elf union is a human, and they just don't want anyone to know this embarrassing secret.

07-15-2009, 10:51 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Or maybe that's just a story they tell other races, and the result of an orc and elf union is a human, and they just don't want anyone to know this embarrassing secret.

The two half races are actually quarterlings. Then we could always make gnomes a cross between dwarves and halflings. That way, everybody's related.

Humans and gnomes are emergent races. Perhaps recently emergent races. A magical barrier separating two separate humanoid ecosystems might have fallen, within recent memory. Perhaps the wall of fire that has divided the world between the realms of the gods and the realms of the titans since the Days of Creation finally flickered out, or the great dragon whose bones formed an impassible mountain range was resurrected, or two planes collided and merged during a rare celestial conjunction. The two races on one side of the barrier started to interact, to mix, with the two races on the other side. And along the great divide, two new races sprang up. These new races appear to be viable, but no one's entirely sure. It's just been a generation or so. None of the older races quite know what to make of these humans and gnomes. They're throwing all the old traditions into disarray, and causing some major upheaval. And the sex that caused the whole mess? That's scandalous.

07-15-2009, 11:44 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The two half races are actually quarterlings. Then we could always make gnomes a cross between dwarves and halflings. That way, everybody's related.

I considered actually making gnomes the cross between elves and dwarves, and the reason why the two races don't get along too well these days. Think about it: interested in crafts, especially mechanics, jewelry and gem-cutting; living underground in clans; long-lived and in tune with nature; uncanny aptitude with certain limited forms of magic...

They're dwelves, I tell you.

07-16-2009, 12:19 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Another possibility is that races are just that... vague collections of poorly defined traits based on individual, subjective perceptions. There's only one real species, the human. But many "races" of human, like dwarves, elves, gnomes, halflings, and so forth. The races aren't necessarily based on bloodlines, but perception. If the kids of a band of elves are short and stocky, everyone is going to call them dwarves.

And in this cosmopolitan age, even the traditional boundaries have started to blur. There are dwelves, dwarrow, dworgs, oorgs, gobbears, and dozens of terms used in an attempt to classify, group, marginalize, and define minute differences between individuals. Perhaps the preponderance of "dw-" constructions suggests that the dwarf traits are considered dominant; "dwarf blood is powerful" says a great poet. Even a single drop is enough.

07-16-2009, 12:19 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The two half races are actually quarterlings. Then we could always make gnomes a cross between dwarves and halflings. That way, everybody's related.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

I considered actually making gnomes the cross between elves and dwarves, and the reason why the two races don't get along too well these days. Think about it: interested in crafts, especially mechanics, jewelry and gem-cutting; living underground in clans; long-lived and in tune with nature; uncanny aptitude with certain limited forms of magic...

They're dwelves, I tell you.

Well, both gnomes and halflings are "in between" races, with substrains leaning towards dwarven or elvenkind. (e.g. Stouts and Tallfellow halflings, svirfnebli and forest gnomes, although the latter take after brownies or sprites at least as much as they do elves.)

In my game I assume that most of these humanoid races (everything from a sprite to a giant) is a magically altered race of Homo sapiens, which is why they can all interbreed.

07-16-2009, 12:40 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Getting back to the current monster. There seems to be a lot of potential in Krakens, but I can't think of any published sources that exploit it. At best, they may have a Kraken as a lone menace sitting at the bottom of an abyssal gorge, with a few people in an air-filled chamber in its lair.

The description mentions them controlling "entire regions of the underwater world", shouldn't there be Tentacled Empires on some worlds, ruled by the mighty Lords of the Deep.

The mention of them depopulating many tropical islands is suggestive too. To do that they must be able to move about on land, presumably dragging themselves around by their immense arms and tentacles. The entry already says they can breathe air.

So, what plots would a Kraken weave with its super-genius brain? Seizing control of shipping lanes, using its fish & weather control powers to extort/reward humanoid races, such as the old "fishing village that worships a kraken in return for ample catches" ploy.

Come to think of it, I don't see why they can't have more open dealings with surface folk. Maybe the nation of the PC's enemies doesn't have a large conventional navy, but appoints Krakens as Captains or Admirals, or the pirates that are terrorizing the coastline are worshippers/followers/slaves or a Kraken Pirate King.

07-16-2009, 01:13 AM

thirdkingdom

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth
They're dwelves, I tell you.

Extreme sidetrack. So my wife and I were talking last night about what you call the place on the back of your leg opposite your knee, and my wife said "we could call it the 'eenk'". I thought that was great, and suggested we also coin the term "woble".

Sorry again for the sidetrack.

Todd

07-16-2009, 01:44 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

There's another place for krakens.

The D&D druidic hierarchy has always been strange. A bunch of reclusive loners, each obsessed with defending and protecting their home turf. They only really seem to get together when they need to choose a new leader, and they choose that leader by fighting with tooth and claw and magic. The leader holds together the squabbling assortment of Type A personalities by sheer force of will and raw power. Similar in many ways to a cult of personality. And their most powerful members, the hierophants, are retired, reclusive; withdrawn almost entirely from even the society of lesser initiates.

I like it best when the druidic hierarchy isn't particularly heavy on humans and demihumans. Tattooed orc shamans, dripping with the blood of their enemies. Wild centaurs raiders who embody the spirit of the wind. And stranger things. Elder treants, their upper limbs bedecked with noose after noose from which dangle the rotting bodies of their enemies. Nymph sorcerers, who see crushing visions of the future as they stare into their still pools. Disfigured green dragons, hiding their faces away in deep dells that have become twisted and deformed by exposure to their venomous breath. The collective song of the pods of humpback whales, which has become self-aware and will exist as long as there is one whale yet singing the endless melody. There might even be a circle in service to the barely-sapient but immensely powerful tarrasque, a ecstatic cult that exults at the manifestation of the Devourer.

And kraken, with their weather magics and coiled power that extends from the cold briny deeps to the white sandy shores. Druids are the Western version of the Celestial Bureaucracy. Priests, yes. But also spirits, natural primal powers. The hierarchy is predisposed to select the most powerful entity that embodies the nearby landscape as their leader, regardless of ethos or even nature. Soldiers no, but mystic warriors yes. Wizards won't qualify, because their studies pull them away. Natural spellcasters, sometimes. Bards, certainly. Natural spirits, if potent enough. Beasts, as long as they possess a shred of intelligence. These are the champions of the Green, the immanent viridis.

07-16-2009, 03:16 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Hmm, well if you combine the Tolkienish "orcs are corrupted elves" trope with the 1E Monster Manual's comment that orcs will breed with anything, that rather suggests elves will breed with anything, too.

This explains the million and one subspecies of elf, then. Fire elves have a strong Azer bloodline in them, say, while Wood elves have more Dryad and Treant in their family tree. Snow elves mated with yeti or quaggoths or something in the distant past, while Avariel are part aaracokra. And so forth and so on.

07-16-2009, 03:19 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

(Stupid me didn't read the entire post before replying)

07-16-2009, 03:33 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

This explains the million and one subspecies of elf, then. Fire elves have a strong Azer bloodline in them, say, while Wood elves have more Dryad and Treant in their family tree. Snow elves mated with yeti or quaggoths or something in the distant past, while Avariel are part aaracokra. And so forth and so on.

I think you're on to something there. ;)

Treants would likely be unviable, since they are plants, and I suspect yeti are unlikely to be hominid enough. Azer, quaggoths and aaracokra are considered humanoids in AD&D, if I remember correctly, so they should be all right.

07-16-2009, 03:55 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I think you're on to something there. ;)

Treants would likely be unviable, since they are plants, and I suspect yeti are unlikely to be hominid enough. Azer, quaggoths and aaracokra are considered humanoids in AD&D, if I remember correctly, so they should be all right.

All the monsters were just off the top of my head. I'm sure a given GM would find appropriate monsters if they pursued this path.

07-16-2009, 04:18 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

There's another place for krakens.

The D&D druidic hierarchy has always been strange. A bunch of reclusive loners, each obsessed with defending and protecting their home turf. They only really seem to get together when they need to choose a new leader, and they choose that leader by fighting with tooth and claw and magic. The leader holds together the squabbling assortment of Type A personalities by sheer force of will and raw power. Similar in many ways to a cult of personality. And their most powerful members, the hierophants, are retired, reclusive; withdrawn almost entirely from even the society of lesser initiates.

I like it best when the druidic hierarchy isn't particularly heavy on humans and demihumans. Tattooed orc shamans, dripping with the blood of their enemies. Wild centaurs raiders who embody the spirit of the wind. And stranger things. Elder treants, their upper limbs bedecked with noose after noose from which dangle the rotting bodies of their enemies. Nymph sorcerers, who see crushing visions of the future as they stare into their still pools. Disfigured green dragons, hiding their faces away in deep dells that have become twisted and deformed by exposure to their venomous breath. The collective song of the pods of humpack whales, which has become self-aware and will exist as long as there is one whale yet singing the endless melody. There might even be a circle in service to the barely-sapient but immensely powerful tarrasque, a ecstatic cult that exults at the manifestation of the Devourer.

And kraken, with their weather magics and coiled power that extends from the cold briny deeps to the white sandy shores. Druids are the Western version of the Celestial Bureaucracy. Priests, yes. But also spirits, natural primal powers. The hierarchy is predisposed to select the most powerful entity that embodies the nearby landscape as their leader, regardless of ethos or even nature. Soldiers no, but mystic warriors yes. Wizards won't qualify, because their studies pull them away. Natural spellcasters, sometimes. Bards, certainly. Natural spirits, if potent enough. Beasts, as long as they possess a shred of intelligence. These are the champions of the Green, the immanent viridis.

This is high-quality awesome stuff all over the place. :)

07-16-2009, 04:34 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

This is high-quality awesome stuff all over the place. :)

Thank you :).

Though the treant with nooses is inspired on the Barrow King from The Savage Sword of Meepo story hour. He/it's one of the candidates in a contest to determine who will become the Grand Druid (worth reading; skip down to "Equinox: Prelude" on page 17 for the start of the sequence).

And Mr. Occam, the pixie manufacturer of the blue dust of disappearance from a few pages back, is based on Mr. Heisenberg from the AMC TV show Breaking Bad.

07-18-2009, 02:17 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

That is so cool.

I especially like the living whale-song and the tarrasque cult.

07-18-2009, 11:21 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Stirge

Stirges are one of those creatures which scream 'D&D': an icon. I really love Diterlizzi's illustration for it too - that strange cross between wasp and bat really works.

That said, there's not a huge amount to say about the creatures - as animal intelligence beasts they have no culture or society to discuss, and behave essentially as vampire bats, attacking to suck blood, then leaving and going off somewhere to sleep. They are however the only monster I can think of off hand which attack as higher HD monsters because they have an "instinctive ability" to find weak spots.

The entry goes into a curious level of detail in describing the sleeping habits of Stirges, noting that they sleep for a day for every 2 hit points on blood they drain, and are drowsy on waking and easy to kill that way. Were they envisaging revenge attacks by groups of adventurers on Stirge lairs? "I'll teach you to suck my blood. I'll come to your cave when you're sleeping and then we'll see how tough you are!"

I suppose the main Stirge adventure hook is having them be the explanation for mysterious disappearances of cattle and villagers, whose corpses are occasionally discovered drained of blood. I also like the idea of trained Stirges bringing stolen blood to a sinister archmage for some nefarious purpose or other.

07-18-2009, 12:03 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

You know, in a world where stealthy, blood-drinking flying monsters are as commonplace as stirges, it would make sense for people to take measures to prevent them. Perhaps there are specific herbs that, when burned, produce smells repellant to stirges. Maybe stirges don't like the tastes of specific humanoids, and so, say, orcs can live in stirge-infested areas.

Me, I really like the idea of humans keeping caged mammals on poles during stirge season. A rabbit on every street corner, ten feet up, to keep the little bastards from feeding on humans. In addition to lamp lighters, you have rabbit boys, running around every night and replacing dead, dessicated rabbits with fresh ones.

07-18-2009, 06:29 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Would "stirges" by any chance have originated as misspelt striges? In classical stories, the strix, pl stirges (AKA striga, pl strigae) is a vampiric bird, sometimes a shapeshifting witch, sometimes an apparently "natural" animal.

07-18-2009, 07:14 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

They are only one of two creatures that had two ecologies in Dragon (the behir is the other). I forget which one, but I like the idea of burning the dead in pyres the morning after they were killed- the smoke tells other communities that there has been a stirge attack.

07-18-2009, 08:10 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist

Would "stirges" by any chance have originated as misspelt striges? In classical stories, the strix, pl stirges (AKA striga, pl strigae) is a vampiric bird, sometimes a shapeshifting witch, sometimes an apparently "natural" animal.

I believe that is so. In my own homebrew campaign I play up the connection, e.g. evil witches may have a stirge as a familiar, or be able to shapechange into a stirge.

Another idea I came up with was sapient stirges, who may live in colonies of hundreds of the blighters. Every night they venture out of their vast cavern-lairs to terrorize the entire land (well, the entire jungle to be precise), led by female sorcerer-stirges.

It seems reasonable to me that colonies of stirges are ruled by the females, since they're associated with female witches and have been compared to vampire bats, who are matriarchal.

Oh, and I also statted up the chupacabra as a larger relative of the stirge. Not that I'm the only one to come up with the notion of a giant ground stirge.

07-18-2009, 08:26 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

Me, I really like the idea of humans keeping caged mammals on poles during stirge season. A rabbit on every street corner, ten feet up, to keep the little bastards from feeding on humans. In addition to lamp lighters, you have rabbit boys, running around every night and replacing dead, dessicated rabbits with fresh ones.

Love that.

I also prefer them as aberrant bats, rather than insects. Perhaps the stirges hiding in dungeons are the exceptions. They really live in great caves and great cave systems, hanging upside down by the thousands or millions, and then flying out at night. Generally, they just sip. Only when starving or forming a new nest do they swarm, and threaten humanoids and other large animals. Dessicated corpses of cows are a sign something's gone wrong.

Stirges are everywhere, though only near-surface subterranean humanoids those who live near huge stirge-caves see them on a regular basis. Their sheer numbers make it infeasible to wipe them out, and simple precautions are all it takes to keep them away. The only time they're a worry is when they set up a nest in close proximity to a humanoid worksite or residence, like an attic or the new wing of a castle. And that's what adventurers are for. Fireballing an infestation during the day while they are sleeping isn't a solution, because their guano reacts explosively to flame. The other time when they might become a threat is when there's a great die-off in the local population of large herd animals. Beware the stirges after a major forest fire, or an unnatural calamity.

Their ability to sense in the dark is really just echolocation. They are phenomenally agile, like bats, due to this sense and the structure of their wings. Which explains their enhanced combat ability, and why they're rarely seen (even though they're omnipresent). Like bats as well, there might be dozens of varieties, feeding on different types of prey. The big ones might be vegetarians, fruit-eaters.

They also hang on the underside of bridges, and the local stirge-bridge is a popular romantic destination for young couples. They arrive in pairs during the twilight, and watch the stirges flit away from the underside, visible as flickers against the setting sun. The colored lamps and incense and dangling rabbits keep them safe, but they still get the rush of danger and the excuse to hold each other close.

07-18-2009, 08:43 PM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

A rabbit on every street corner, ten feet up, to keep the little bastards from feeding on humans.

Sorry, but wouldn't that be a bit like leaving food in the garden to keep rats out of your kitchen? How long do you think that would work for?:p

There is the question of course of what happens to a stirge when it sucks the blood of say, a vampire or lycanthrope. Could they become vectors?:eek:

07-18-2009, 09:20 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Sorry, but wouldn't that be a bit like leaving food in the garden to keep rats out of your kitchen? How long do you think that would work for?

Long enough for the stirge poison to kick in. Or for the stirge trap to strike, if you prefer. Just like why you leave cheese out for the rats: bait.

07-18-2009, 10:08 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Stirge

Stirges are one of those creatures which scream 'D&D!': an icon. I really love Diterlizzi's illustration for it too - that strange cross between wasp and bat really works.

Yes it is a nice picture, although I would have liked it to show some avian traits. The Monstrous Manual description twice says they resemble birds, but I've never seen a picture of a D&D Stirge with so much as a feather.

Oh, and you left out the MM's mention of the Jungle Stirge, a rumoured creature twice the size of a regular stirge (HD 2+2, attacks as 8HD) purported to have paralyzing venom on its snout, which is "highly prized by local tribesmen".

I'm sure I've seen a version of them statted up somewhere, but can't recall there. Regardless, they should make a nasty little tropical encounter.

07-18-2009, 10:15 PM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Long enough for the stirge poison to kick in. Or for the stirge trap to strike, if you prefer. Just like why you leave cheese out for the rats: bait.

So they're not decoys? The rabbits are poisoned? Why don't they die then? :)

07-18-2009, 10:26 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Love that.

I also prefer them as aberrant bats, rather than insects. Perhaps the stirges hiding in dungeons are the exceptions. They really live in great caves and great cave systems, hanging upside down by the thousands or millions, and then flying out at night. Generally, they just sip. Only when starving or forming a new nest do they swarm, and threaten humanoids and other large animals. Dessicated corpses of cows are a sign something's gone wrong.

Well the classic version of the stirge, the strix/strigae/insert-spelling-of-your-choice was able to bleed a sleeping victim without them noticing. Presumably they have a painkilling substance in their saliva.

Some striges were said to nip pieces off corpses, I recall correctly these were usually the shape-shifting witch kind of stirge, not the bloodsucking animal. There are also stories of witch-striges being able to mesmerize wakeful people by calling out their names, putting them in a trance during which they can bite and blood-drain their unaware victim. There's a story by Apuleis about a man who was bewitched by stirges who took off his nose and replaced it with a waxen effigy without him noticing. When told about this by a corpse he was guarding (with the assistance of a passing necromancer) he reaches up and, to his horrified surprise, his "nose" falls off!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Stirges are everywhere, though only near-surface subterranean humanoids those who live near huge stirge-caves see them on a regular basis. Their sheer numbers make it infeasible to wipe them out, and simple precautions are all it takes to keep them away. The only time they're a worry is when they set up a nest in close proximity to a humanoid worksite or residence, like an attic or the new wing of a castle. And that's what adventurers are for. Fireballing an infestation during the day while they are sleeping isn't a solution, because their guano reacts explosively to flame. The other time when they might become a threat is when there's a great die-off in the local population of large herd animals. Beware the stirges after a major forest fire, or an unnatural calamity.

If they're anything like the adventurers I've known, explosive guano would make it more likely they'd apply the fireball solution. Although if stirge guano is explosive there are probably all kinds of alchemical uses it can be put to, so maybe gathering it is a high-risk, high-reward, highly unpleasant activity.

Hmm, sounds like stirge-soil gathering is a job for the PCs!

07-18-2009, 10:27 PM

Lukas Sjöström

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The entry goes into a curious level of detail in describing the sleeping habits of Stirges, noting that they sleep for a day for every 2 hit points on blood they drain, and are drowsy on waking and easy to kill that way. Were they envisaging revenge attacks by groups of adventurers on Stirge lairs? "I'll teach you to suck my blood. I'll come to your cave when you're sleeping and then we'll see how tough you are!"

Useful if you're supposed to clean out a nest -- spend 10 gp on a cow, lead it out to be sucked dry, kill the stirges while they sleep.

EDIT: Actually, it seems as though you get more hp for your gp if you buy pigs instead. Cattle have HD 1-4 and cost 10 gp, pigs have HD 2 and cost 3 gp.

07-18-2009, 10:29 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

So they're not decoys? The rabbits are poisoned? Why don't they die then? :)

'Cause it's stirge poison, not rabbit poison.:o

There are plenty of pesticides that kill arthropods but do little or no harm to vertebrates. Since stirges have some insect-attributes, they may be vulnerable to them too.

07-18-2009, 10:33 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lukas Sjöström

Useful if you're supposed to clean out a nest -- spend 10 gp on a cow, lead it out to be sucked dry, kill the stirges while they sleep.

EDIT: Actually, it seems as though you get more hp for your gp if you buy pigs instead. Cattle have HD 1-4 and cost 10 gp, pigs have HD 2 and cost 3 gp.

Or just let them bleed your party's fighter, going by hit point scores they'll probably have more blood in them than a small herd of swine. :p

Hmm, if you get the pigs drunk on cheap hooch would the high blood-alcohol mean the stirges will be hungover as well as sleepy when you attack them?

07-18-2009, 10:38 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

'Cause it's stirge poison, not rabbit poison.:o

There are plenty of pesticides that kill arthropods but do little or no harm to vertebrates. Since stirges have some insect-attributes, they may be vulnerable to them too.

This.

Alternately, it's also possible that Stirges are willing to drink blood from relatively fresh corpses, if it's available. In that case, the rabbits could already be dead, and still serve the same purpose.

I think "the town is full of ten foot poles with dead rabbits in cages on top of each one" would be a good way to freak out the PCs. And have them thinking that it's a town full of evil cultists, when it's just some innocent folks wanting to keep their blood inside their bodies.

07-18-2009, 10:43 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

There's a story by Apuleis about a man who was bewitched by stirges who took off his nose and replaced it with a waxen effigy without him noticing. When told about this by a corpse he was guarding (with the assistance of a passing necromancer) he reaches up and, to his horrified surprise, his "nose" falls off!

Michael Jackson? Too soon?

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

If they're anything like the adventurers I've known, explosive guano would make it more likely they'd apply the fireball solution.

If they blow up the attic or the new wing of the castle, they 1) don't get paid, 2) get fined a sufficient amount to recoup the damages, 3) get run out of town, 4) get thrown in jail, 5) all of the above.

07-19-2009, 12:47 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

If they blow up the attic or the new wing of the castle, they 1) don't get paid, 2) get fined a sufficient amount to recoup the damages, 3) get run out of town, 4) get thrown in jail, 5) all of the above.

Plus they are wasting valuable explosives that could be fashioned into a life-sized model of a female dragon...

07-19-2009, 01:46 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I fondly remember one of the suggested adventures in BECMI D&D's Expert set. There is this crazy old lady, who thinks her attic is haunted, but nobody believes her. So she offers her life savings to the PCs if they clear out the place... and it's crawling with stirges! (Also, there's the desiccated corpse of a thief who tried to sneak in and rob the COL's life savings...)

07-19-2009, 02:04 AM

four willows

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I love these 'let's read' threads.

07-19-2009, 02:36 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Sorry, but wouldn't that be a bit like leaving food in the garden to keep rats out of your kitchen?
How long do you think that would work for?

Well, there is the poison angle, but D&D stirges tend to get full pretty quickly. Enough rabbits, and the stirges will have enough blood to get them through the night without bugging the townsfolk.

I don't know about the vampirism/lycanthropy spreading through stirge bites, but I do wonder why stirges haven't been used as disease vectors in D&D. They're nasty enough on their own, I guess. And it also gets me thinking about mutated stirges made even more monstrous by feeding on the blood of, say, dragons. Or the Tarrasque.

07-19-2009, 03:18 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

Well, there is the poison angle, but D&D stirges tend to get full pretty quickly. Enough rabbits, and the stirges will have enough blood to get them through the night without bugging the townsfolk.

I don't know about the vampirism/lycanthropy spreading through stirge bites, but I do wonder why stirges haven't been used as disease vectors in D&D. They're nasty enough on their own, I guess. And it also gets me thinking about mutated stirges made even more monstrous by feeding on the blood of, say, dragons. Or the Tarrasque.

To combine the ideas... what if the tarrasque isn't a monster? What if it's actually a blood-borne pathogen? The first sign of infection is an all-consuming hunger. The creature starts to eat, and eat, and eat. Cows devour farms worth of crops. Wolves eat entire villages. The steward clean outs the manor's entire pantry. This is when the disease can be caught. People aren't stupid. Anything showing signs of the Hunger is put down, with extreme prejudice.

Because they know what will happen. If it's let alone for a few weeks, it keeps consuming, keeps growing. Becomes bigger. Large, then huge, then colossal. Growths start to develop on its back and paws. Horny, protruding things. This is terribly painful. This worsens its already bad temper. Because after all, it always feels like it's starving. Now it hurts to walk, to move.

But these growths are great for rending, tearing. Even the most harmless animal becomes dangerous, with the spikes and horns protruding from their heads and limbs. On the back, the growths are especially dense. Over time, it becomes almost like a carapace.

The huge appetite also accelerates the creature's metabolism. It digests food at an incredibly fast rate, allowing it to eat almost non-stop. It's no longer able to sleep, which further maddens it. And the fuel speeds up its ability to heal itself to ridiculous rates. It becomes a kind of living juggernaut, almost impossible to kill.

There isn't a singular tarrasque that goes to sleep, wakes up every score of years or so, and goes on a rampage. Instead, that's roughly how long a time lapses between major outbreaks.

This happens two different ways. Either there's a widespread outbreak, with many creatures infected with a low-level version of the Hunger. The kingdom mobilizes, armies range the countryside, volunteers march around with pitchforks and torches, and every adventurer is out killing. If they miss one infected animal, if it gets too big, suddenly they have a full-blown tarrasque problem.

The other way it happens is when the outbreak happens far away from civilization. One animal catches the disease, and by the time it stumbles on organized humanoids, it's too late. It's already too damn big to easily stop.

That's where the legend of the tarrasque comes from. It's a fantasy version of rabies. Get bitten, or eat its flesh or drink its blood, and you're infected. You'll go mad, eat everything in sight.

Stirges might be the disease's mosquito. If a flock lands on a tarrasque, they feed and become infected. The original beast heals too quickly to really notice. But now there's this swarm. A hungry, mutating swarm that infects other animals. This is when fireballing every stirge nest in the nation is considered acceptable.

07-19-2009, 03:18 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

If they blow up the attic or the new wing of the castle, they 1) don't get paid, 2) get fined a sufficient amount to recoup the damages, 3) get run out of town, 4) get throw in jail, 5) all of the above.

Hmm, a heavily armed and slightly charred group fleeing a smoking ruin complaining that the building's owner refused to pay them for the privilege, but sicced the town watch on them.

Yup, sounds like player character adventurers to me.:o

07-19-2009, 03:36 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

I don't know about the vampirism/lycanthropy spreading through stirge bites, but I do wonder why stirges haven't been used as disease vectors in D&D. They're nasty enough on their own, I guess. And it also gets me thinking about mutated stirges made even more monstrous by feeding on the blood of, say, dragons. Or the Tarrasque.

Well that seems more reasonable than the 3rd edition's standard "dragon's can breed with anything" explanation of creatures with draconic traits. It would require a dragon with remarkably low standards to breed with a stirge. That or it involved an accident with a philter of love.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

To combine the ideas... what if the tarrasque isn't a monster? What if it's actually a blood-borne pathogen? The first sign of infection is an all-consuming hunger. The creature starts to eat, and eat, and eat. Cows devour farms worth of crops. Wolves eat entire villages. The steward clean outs the manor's entire pantry. This is when the disease can be caught. People aren't stupid. Anything showing signs of the Hunger is put down, with extreme prejudice.

SNIP

This happens two different ways. Either there's a widespread outbreak, with many creatures infected with a low-level version of the Hunger. The kingdom mobilizes, armies range the countryside, volunteers march around with pitchforks and torches, and every adventurer is out killing. If they miss one infected animal, if it gets too big, suddenly they have a full-blown tarrasque problem.

The other way it happens is when the outbreak happens far away from civilization. One animal catches the disease, and by the time it stumbles on organized humanoids, it's too late. It's already too damn big to easily stop.

That's where the legend of the tarrasque comes from. It's a fantasy version of rabies. Get bitten, or eat its flesh or drink its blood, and you're infected. You'll go mad, eat everything in sight.

Hmm, the thing is if it's that contagious you're more or less bound to get lots of tarrasque-infected before anyone knows of the outbreak. Most D&D worlds have extensive wildernesses filled with animal life, which have few non-monster sapients keeping track of what's going on.

I can see two obvious possibilities:

Firstly, the monsters may be just as keen on wiping out the tarrasque-plague as the "civilized" folk. They may even be willing to unite with those do-gooder elves and humans in the face of the mutual threat. (Hmm, there's a scenario in there, "form a pact with the orc kingdom of Thar to avoid all being eaten by the plague of tarrasques/ghouls/killer rabbits/insert-monster-here").

Secondly, there may usually end up being one tarrasque because the flesh the infected crave most of all is that of their own kind, and they soon eat each other until there is only one Colossal beast left.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Stirges might be the disease's mosquito. If a flock lands on a tarrasque, they feed and become infected. The original beast heals too quickly to really notice. But now there's this swarm. A hungry, mutating swarm that infects other animals. This is when fireballing every stirge nest in the nation is considered acceptable.

Not to mention that you'll end up with a swarm of flying tarrasques. Excuse me while I just reflect on some of the images that phase inspires.

Flying Tarrasques.

Mwa ha haa haa ha! Soon the world and its PCs shall tremble before me!!

Ahem

Now, where were we?

07-19-2009, 04:03 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, the thing is if it's that contagious you're more or less bound to get lots of tarrasque-infected before anyone knows of the outbreak. Most D&D worlds have extensive wildernesses filled with animal life, which have few non-monster sapients keeping track of what's going on.

There's an ancient maenad, channeling the power of a thousand animals as she rends yet another man into bite-sized gibbets. There's the plump halfling baker, who seems to have an almost mystical connection with the grains and herbs and other ingredients he uses to construct elaborate confections. There's the reef composed of millions and trillions of living organisms that can transform mecha-like into a giant humanoid golem, which was crafted by a race of powerful magic-wielders from a now-sunken continent.

Why exactly does such a disparate band hang out with each other? The network of nature exists for one reason and one reason only: The tarrasque. What is the real reason behind the druidic circles, and the reason why the one in charge is always the one with the most raw power? It's very simple. They're there to wipe out any cases of the Hunger before they become too big to handle.

The queens and kings handle outbreaks within heavily populated regions, but out in the wild it's the druids. A great druid has a domain, and within the domain they must develop an early warning system, a network of informers and magical signals. The grand druid, on the other hand, is the one called in when things get out of hand. That's the only line in the grand druid's job description: If a tarrasque happens, anywhere in the world, kill it.

Which is why the hierophants are so obscenely powerful. The grand druid's job is for life. Either yours, or the next tarrasque's. Every single retired grand druid still living bears the scars from a successful battle with the greatest of all monsters. They are the survivors of the ultimate trial by combat.

This order predates civilization. It had to. Before cities could be built, there had to be druids. Because everytime someone tried the Hunger possessed an animal, and tore down everything the humanoids labored so hard to construct. Without the druids to watch the wilds, the little pockets of agriculture and leisure time just wouldn't have been able to grow.

07-19-2009, 11:09 AM

Simon Atavax

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Just out of curiosity, I have a question for those of you participating in this thread. (If this is an unwanted/unneeded digression, please disregard).

The question is, Are any of you still playing AD&D 2e? Or is this more of a nostalgia discussion, or a "transfer ideas to 3.x / 4e" thing?

Just curious. :o

07-19-2009, 11:11 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

You've left out an option. I'm seventeen (no nostalgia here), and I'm not playing anything (there aren't many groups in Pinellas Park). I just like reading about and coming up with ideas on the subject.

07-19-2009, 01:15 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius
(there aren't many groups in Pinellas Park).

Nearbygamers.com has about a dozen people registered in the area.

I'm here for the "steal ideas for 4e" myself.

07-19-2009, 01:37 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Simon Atavax
Just out of curiosity, I have a question for those of you participating in this thread. (If this is an unwanted/unneeded digression, please disregard).

The question is, Are any of you still playing AD&D 2e? Or is this more of a nostalgia discussion, or a "transfer ideas to 3.x / 4e" thing?

Just curious. :o

I play AD&D 2e, like I have done since almost the beginning of my gaming life. I'm involved in one 2e game at the moment as a player (though my PC, 8th level dwarf cleric, is about to die, I fear). I'm not DMing any 2e stuff and haven't for a while (I'm currently DMing a BECMI game) but I hope to again soon.

2e is my favourite form of D&D and I don't really like 3.x or 4e, so no transferring of ideas here! I'm mainlining all this stuff in pure, undiluted 2e form.

EDIT: Which isn't to say there isn't a nostalgia element to all this, because the MM was the first D&D product I bought and I can still remember reading through it for the first time as a wide-eyed young sprog.

07-19-2009, 03:36 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Simon Atavax

The question is, Are any of you still playing AD&D 2e? Or is this more of a nostalgia discussion, or a "transfer ideas to 3.x / 4e" thing?

Pure nostalgia. I don't even read the d20 subforum except for this.

07-19-2009, 04:27 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Some nostalgia, some ideas for my 3.x game.

07-19-2009, 05:37 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Simon Atavax

The question is, Are any of you still playing AD&D 2e? Or is this more of a nostalgia discussion, or a "transfer ideas to 3.x / 4e" thing

Not at the moment, no.

Funnily enough, I only ever played 2nd edition twice. Most of my Dungeons & Dragons gaming and collecting has been 1st edition AD&D, Basic/Expert and 3rd edition. Of the few 2E hardbacks I've got, the Monstrous Manual is definitely my favourite.

07-19-2009, 06:55 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Not at the moment, no.

Funnily enough, I only ever played 2nd edition twice. Most of my Dungeons & Dragons gaming and collecting has been 1st edition AD&D, Basic/Expert and 3rd edition. Of the few 2E hardbacks I've got, the Monstrous Manual is definitely my favourite.

I think whatever edition you like best it's very very hard not to enjoy the 2e Monstrous Manual. You'd have to have a heart of stone not to appreciate the mixture of absolute laughable oddness and sheer creative brilliance.

07-19-2009, 08:39 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Simon Atavax

Just out of curiosity, I have a question for those of you participating in this thread. (If this is an unwanted/unneeded digression, please disregard).

The question is, Are any of you still playing AD&D 2e? Or is this more of a nostalgia discussion, or a "transfer ideas to 3.x / 4e" thing?

Just curious. :o

I will be honest, I am not a fan of D&D, as a game. Unlike a lot of gamers I pretty much completely bypassed D&D, starting on TMNT and Cyberpunk. D&D just seemed way too silly at the time (and I played TMNT!).

Plus I was not a fan of the fantasy genre, I am still not really as most fantasy books I have read seem really really lame. I mean some farmboy finds some sword and then he has to adventure and find a princess and kill a dragon, it's Star Wars but with a dragon and without all the cool space ships, that is what it is (and without the incest).

I am, however, a fan of the balls-to-the-wall awesome insanity that can come with D&D. Some D&D products are basically Synnabar lite (i.e. utterly fucking insane but actually playable, and also sadly lacking in cyborgs). And the Monstrous Manuals and anything to do with Planescape are basically that.

My group got some good play out of 3e, but mostly we were mocking the fantasy genre with it (but then we mock/destroy all genres we come across). But anyways, prestige classes and over-optimisation totally ruined 3e, so we didn't use them. (You know those people in school who have got their whole career planned out from 3rd grade? "Well I'm going to law school, then I'll be a [something] lawyer for about 3 years, get a good reputation, then be a [something] lawyer for another 4 years, then go into corporate law where all the real money is, then try to make partner after 7 years..." Those are the sort of people who take prestige levels.)

So yeah, 3e, nice little game, played it a few times, but ruined by prestige classes, a flood of poor 3rd party content, and a Rifts-esk powercreep (oh and 3.5). We always played it like Order of the Stick anyways.

4e however is awesome and we have got some good play out of it. Though it is painfully (and awesomely) obvious that our characters know that they are in a computer game.

But, yeah, even though I was not really exposed to it as a kid, the insanity of D&D monster books will always have a special place in my heart.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Nearbygamers.com has about a dozen people registered in the area.

I added myself to that. Of course nearest groups listed are in London.

07-19-2009, 08:53 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I think whatever edition you like best it's very very hard not to enjoy the 2e Monstrous Manual. You'd have to have a heart of stone not to appreciate the mixture of absolute laughable oddness and sheer creative brilliance.

Half laughable oddness and creative brilliance about says it. Although it's not the only AD&D product that has some degree of that dichotomy.

I think it's the best core MM of any edition of D&D. It's got so many disparate bits on the monsters' habits it can germinate hundreds of ideas for a campaign, and there's usually enough information to make some interesting (or amusing) deductions as to how they'd fit into a semi-plausible ecology or society. And even if I don't like their take on a monster, I find it acts as a springboard for "that makes no sense, my monster X will be Y instead" rather than making me want to throw out the monster altogether.

07-19-2009, 09:17 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Half laughable oddness and creative brilliance about says it. Although it's not the only AD&D product that has some degree of that dichotomy.

I think it's the best core MM of any edition of D&D. It's got so many disparate bits on the monsters' habits it can germinate hundreds of ideas for a campaign, and there's usually enough information to make some interesting (or amusing) deductions as to how they'd fit into a semi-plausible ecology or society. And even if I don't like their take on a monster, I find it acts as a springboard for "that makes no sense, my monster X will be Y instead" rather than making me want to throw out the monster altogether.

It has actually become a genre of its own, which has been copied with varied results.

You look at most fantasy heartbreakers and they are a largely charismaless ripoff of this sort of thing.

You look at Synnabar with its laserbears and supersonic sharks, "Like all sharks they are shapeshifters..." Yeah it says that. Synnabar monsters are the Monstrous Manuals done really really rite. Shame teh system is moar or less unplayable.

Also FATAL, the dumb evil D&D, is something else. The entry for bugbears is a prime example of why this game isn't liek other games: Once you have read through the descriptions of who bugbears rape (everyone), why they rape (for fun), what percentage of the women* die (requires complex maths regarding tables and certain stats that you don't wanna know about), when the resulting fetuses all spontaneously and messily abort (4 months I think), and how many of the women die from that (40% I believe)... once you have read all through that then you will realise that it hasn't actually said anything about bugbears other than what is rape related; their society, their lifecycle, their proper mating habits with other bugbears... nope, just endless wish-fulfillment fantasies about Chewbacca rape (which incidentally there is a picture of on the cover of one of the editions). Of course the magic items section is evan worse...

*Apparently bugbears are strictly heterosexual rapists, making them unique in FATAL World.

07-19-2009, 09:21 PM

Lukas Sjöström

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I'm not an AD&D player. My gaming life started with different iterations of BRP (since that's historically the largest system in Sweden), and I went right onto D&D 3.x and then 4th edition, which is the only thing I'm playing now. I still enjoy this thread, and the ideas I get from it are as often as not used for other games than D&D entirely.

07-19-2009, 10:27 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

This is primarily a nostalgia trip for me, but if or when I get my 4e game started, I'm sure to use some ideas from these threads. :)

07-20-2009, 12:48 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have to say I think D+D rules really really really stink. And they've only gotten worse over the editions. Runequest (or the pared down Call Of Cthulhu) rules is the only way to fly if you want anything to make sense. Pity Glorantha sucks as bad as D+D rules though... hence Forgotten Realms is my favourite setting. Not that I've spent an awfully long time playing either...

07-20-2009, 01:46 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Some D&D products are basically Synnabar lite (i.e. utterly fucking insane but actually playable, and also sadly lacking in cyborgs).

Lacking in cyborgs? You've just been reading the wrong D&D materials.

07-20-2009, 02:19 AM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I played a bit of AD&D once, but it was not my first RPG, nor one I have much nostalgia for. Never played any other incarnation of D&D. The systems I actually do play are BRP and nWoD.

I'm in this thread because D&D monsters are an endless cavalcade (monstercade?) of weirdness, interpolated with horrid puns and bad Latin. That, and the splendidly insane commentary perpetrated by the other regulars here. :cool:

07-20-2009, 12:26 PM

Zartes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, I came to D&D in 3rd edition, but as time goes on, I'm becoming more enamored with the older stuff. So this is sort of retro-active nostalgia, with a helping of "Must use this in a game..."

07-20-2009, 07:38 PM

Requiem_17_23

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I used stirges in my first 4e dungeon ever. There were two towers with a dungeon beneath them; the stirges were in one tower, a big No Camping sign that meant the party had to find somewhere secure to rest that night. This they duly did. The party member who was on last watch heard the stirges fly back from their nightly hunting. She got the Explosive Guano Idea in her head, crossed it with the Stirges Sleep After Eating Idea, and ran off to the stirge lair with a burning torch.

The party were woken by the sound of a massive explosion to find their warlord gone. After a few panicked moments the door opens and in she comes, covered from head to toe in guano and smelling of burnt hair. "Piccolo, what happened?" - "Don't. Ask."

07-22-2009, 05:32 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Su-Monster

A real oddity this one, which I must confess I've never even thought of using. Essentially a big psionic ape, it mainly sticks out in my mind as being one of the "extra" psionic creatures in the 2nd edition Psionics Handbook - except neither it nor any of the others are really "extra" because they're all in the MM. They did have different art, though, and the Psionics Handbook Su-Monster illustration is considerably better than the MM iteration.

That said, after reading through the entry I feel like I've been doing the Su-Monster a disservice. There is something intrinsically sinister about apes and monkeys - something to do with how similar and yet dissimilar they are to us - and the description of the creature is nicely OTT:

Quote:

Su-monsters look like big gray monkeys, 4 to 5 feet tall. They have large bones and muscular limbs, but they always appear a bit underfed, because their ribs and vertebrae show prominently. Their long, prehensile tails can easily support their weight. Their hands and feet are virtually alike, each having three long, thick fingers and an opposable thumb, all equipped with claws. Like the tail, their hands and feet are very strong, allowing them to hang by one limb for several hours. Short, dirty gray fur covers most of their body. Their face and tail are black, while their paws are always bloody red (making them look like they just finished killing something, which is the case more often than not). They frequently grin, but this is usually a sharp-toothed threat rather than a gesture of friendliness.

Adult Su-Monsters attack as if hasted when their young are threatened (this should probably apply to most mammal and bird parents, I feel), and have a decent range of psionics, so they make a tough foe. Their meat is poisonous to eat (why anybody would want to eat a Su-Monster in the first place is not clear).

This entry sees the return of our old friends the Sages, who speculate that Su-Monsters are magical hybrids of humanoids and apes, created by "a powerful evil cleric or mage" as guardians. Most bog-standard creation story ever?

07-22-2009, 05:47 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Weren't su-monsters in the Ghost Tower of Inverness? I don't think I've ever seen them used, otherwise.

Anorexic evil psychic monkeys jumping from the trees should have potential, though. Seems a little Burroughsesque.

07-22-2009, 06:00 PM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Simon Atavax

Are any of you still playing AD&D 2e? Or is this more of a nostalgia discussion, or a "transfer ideas to 3.x / 4e" thing?

I'm mostly here for the nostalgia, but it is strong nostalgia. When I bought this book back in the day, I didn't have any other AD&D books. I still don't, to this day (unless you count 3E, which isn't exactly A, but such things get confusing). In fact, I wanted the book so badly I spent all the money I had on me, all the money my brother had on him, and we couldn't get home with the new book. We'd spent our train fares. We had to use a card phone (cellphones were a thing of the distant future at that time) to summon a parent with a vehicle, or we would have died of exposure or something hyperbolic like that.

And I'd do it again in a heartbeat. I regret nothing; it's a fantastic book.

07-22-2009, 06:09 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Su-Monster

A real oddity this one, which I must confess I've never even thought of using. SNIP
That said, after reading through the entry I feel like I've been doing the Su-Monster a disservice. There is something intrinsically sinister about apes and monkeys - something to do with how similar and yet dissimilar they are to us - and the description of the creature is nicely OTT:

For some reason I've liked Su-Monsters since 1st edition, so they've cropped up a few times in the games I've run. There's just something about the idea of Bloody-Handed Mind Monkeys that appeals to me.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Adult Su-Monsters attack as if hasted when their young are threatened (this should probably apply to most mammal and bird parents, I feel), and have a decent range of psionics, so they make a tough foe. Their meat is poisonous to eat (why anybody would want to eat a Su-Monster in the first place is not clear).

I never much cared for AD&D's fondness for the "the Mama/Papa monster gets much tougher if their young are threatened" trope. Sometimes it seems that half the animals players are likely to encounter were like that. While I'm fine with them viciously defending their spawn, giving them a big combat boost just doesn't jive with me.

As for the psionics, what makes them especially nasty is that the Su-Monster is impervious to telepathic attacks. That doesn't seem very fair, they could hide in the jungle and turn your psychic character's brains into swiss cheese without them having any way to respond in kind.

Then again, who said AD&D was fair.;

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

This entry sees the return of our old friends the Sages, who speculate that Su-Monsters are magical hybrids of humanoids and apes, created by "a powerful evil cleric or mage" as guardians. Most bog-standard creation story ever?

Hmm, I'm sure we can come up with something better. Here's my first stab.

Su monsters were created when our world was invaded by the Brains From Beyond. Intent on destroying the souls of the dominant humanoid race and occupying their bodies, the invading taskforce landed in an out of the way jungle and immediately possessed the locals. Fortunately the world, these alien's unfamiliarity with our world meant they were unable to distinguish between "human" and "monkey". To a polydimensional disembodied intelligence, we all look the same, you know. The monkey's inferior brains were too weak to sustain the Brains' mighty intellect, and they soon devolved and mutated into the Su-Monsters we know and fear. Their psionic powers, malevolence and ability to haste are the last lingering vestiges of the Brains' evil nature and uncanny powers.

07-22-2009, 06:46 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Even back before they were psionic, su-monsters were nasty and territorial. Think baboons, but arboreal.

Then one day, something invaded their territory. Mother primordial-sus with babies in their arms stared down from the branches at the intruder, with an almost papable hate. The males circled around, silently, hair on end, infuriated

And the thing they were stalking? Loved it. The hate, the fear, the uncanny rage. Tasty. Distracting. The intellect devourer got a little too absorbed in its mental feast, and the next thing it knew it was rolling around on the ground, trailing a dozen screeching monkeys, who were clawing and biting and tearing.

Half the tribe died that day, but so did the big brain with claws. Their hate augmented by its aura, they tore it to pieces. And did something uncharacteristic for a band of mostly-fructivores. They ate the raw dripping flesh.

The rage stayed with them. With the intellect devourer's demise, it became permanently grafted into their brains. And a bit of its power, too. Like the tribal humans believe, they took on a few characteristics of that which they ate. They became psychic.

And like many other psychic creatures, such as the emaciated thought eater, the mental powers took a physical toll on their formerly stocky bodies. Those powers require fuel, and no matter how many mangos or stolen babies they eat, the su-monsters are always half-starved. Which of course makes them even more irritable.

07-22-2009, 08:27 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I use su-monsters with tasloi in the same way that bargests are meant to be used with goblins. The party thinks they have another tasloi, hiding in the leaves, on their hands until it fries a brain or two.

Most arboreal monsters have a great potential for destroying parties piecemeal. Just grab them one at a time and kill them a few trees over.

07-22-2009, 09:52 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

SNIP

Half the tribe died that day, but so did the big brain with claws. Their hate augmented by its aura, they tore it to pieces. And did something uncharacteristic for a band of mostly-fructivores. They ate the raw dripping flesh.

The rage stayed with them. With the intellect devourer's demise, it became permanently grafted into their brains. And a bit of its power, too. Like the tribal humans believe, they took on a few characteristics of that which they ate. They became psychic.

Well it's a nice scenario but wouldn't work in AD&D, unless the Proto Su-Monsters have the +3 or better magical weapons needed to hit the Intellect Devourer. They could claw at the brainbeast until they drop from exhaustion without so much as scratching it.

Although the "they gain psychic powers and malevolence from an infusion of a nasty psionic monster" theory has plenty of other candidates. Perhaps the Su Monsters' ancestors developed a taste for Brain Moles and a psionic version of the Oblivix - they taste like truffles to a mental monkey, don't you know.:

07-22-2009, 10:02 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I use su-monsters with tasloi in the same way that barghests are meant to be used with goblins. The party thinks they have another tasloi, hiding in the leaves, on their hands until it fries a brain or two.

Most arboreal monsters have a great potential for destroying parties piecemeal. Just grab them one at a time and kill them a few trees over.

Same here, I liked to throw Kechs and Carnivorous Apes at them too.

As for the Su-Monsters & Tasloi subterfuge, I like the idea. It suggests that a Su-Monsters "natural prey" is the Tasloi, so it looks like them to aid its ability to sneak up to its next meal.

Although you'd need to change one or the other creature's appearance, since a Tasloi's half the size of a Su Monster and a different colour. (2-3' with green skin & black fur, versus 4-5' with white fur and red hands). Come to think of it, a Kech is green and IIRC they sometimes use ventriloquism, so maybe they're a better fit for the tactic.

07-22-2009, 10:22 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Don't barghests rule the goblins they live with? My su-monsters dominate tasloi villages and act as muscle when needed. Now that I think about it, tasloi may have their own versions of blues due to the constant contact with su-monsters.

07-22-2009, 10:35 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well it's a nice scenario but wouldn't work in AD&D, unless the Proto Su-Monsters have the +3 or better magical weapons needed to hit the Intellect Devourer. They could claw at the brainbeast until they drop from exhaustion without so much as scratching it.

Always so negative... there are more ways to kill things than "I roll to hit". Drowning, suffocation, falling, fire, starvation, poison, allergic reactions....

07-22-2009, 10:45 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Always so negative... there are more ways to kill things than "I roll to hit". Drowning, suffocation, falling, fire, starvation, poison, allergic reactions....

True enough, except for the fire, which Intellect Devourers are immune to.

I was just saying the proposed scenario of "clawing and biting and tearing" wouldn't work for the Su Monsters in AD&D, at least without attenuating circumstances.

Maybe the local crazy druid enchanted them with +3 claws and teeth.:)

07-22-2009, 11:05 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Don't barghests rule the goblins they live with? My su-monsters dominate tasloi villages and act as muscle when needed. Now that I think about it, tasloi may have their own versions of blues due to the constant contact with su-monsters.

Oh right, I was thinking it was more a "you see a Tasloi... surprise! It's really a much more dangerous Su-Monster!" kind of thing. Although having them work together makes sense, since Tasloi can speak with monkeys and apes and are noted for exploiting the abilities of more powerful monsters in their neighbourhood, having them invite Su-Monsters to move in and live with them is just an extension of that.

And yes, AD&D Barghests are described as becoming chiefs or honoured champions of the goblin settlements they live in, so I imagine a Tasloi / Su-Monster society doing something similar. Presumably the relationship would be more volatile, since they're both Chaotic Evil.

07-23-2009, 12:52 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I was just saying the proposed scenario of "clawing and biting and tearing" wouldn't work for the Su Monsters in AD&D, at least without attenuating circumstances.

It created a new species... even in D&D that probably qualifies as extenuating circumstances. Plus it's a jungle. There's an ancient ruin built by a lost but unfathomably powerful race, what, every 30 feet or so? The average fallen cornice is probably a +3 improvised weapon.

Anyway, I like the image of a troop of screaming monkeys wrestling around on the ground with a giant brain with claws. The details are less important :)

07-23-2009, 01:49 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

It created a new species... even in D&D that probably qualifies as extenuating circumstances. Plus it's a jungle. There's an ancient ruin built by a lost but unfathomably powerful race, what, every 30 feet or so? The average fallen cornice is probably a +3 improvised weapon.

Anyway, I like the image of a troop of screaming monkeys wrestling around on the ground with a giant brain with claws. The details are less important :)

Hang about, I typed "attenuating" when I meant "extenuating" circumstances, maybe it was a Freudian slip and there was something weakening the Intellect Devourer. Perhaps the monkeys were wrestling the brain with claws in a mud pool with strange magical properties which, by some miracle, did not spawn a nest of Mudmen, or the cornice they hit it with acted like a philter of longevity and youthed the Intellect Devourer back into its larval stage, in which form it is vulnerable to mundane weapons.

Hmm, or maybe it's what the Intellect Devourer wanted all along. The Monstrous Manual says "their reproductive method is unknown", so perhaps when a brain-beast reaches the end of its life they spawn by dominating primates (apes, monkeys or humans) into eating them in a murderous frenzy, and those who eat it undergo a strange and horrible transformation into a Su-Monster. The reason they have psionic powers is that their brains are actually fetal Intellect Devourers, which bursts out of their skulls as an ustilagor if the Su-Monster manages to live long enough for it to mature into its motile larval stage. That is also why Su-Monsters attack psionic creatures, the Intellect Devourer spawn within them needs the cerebral matter and fluids of such creatures to mature.

EDIT: That could also explain why an arboreal tropical primate like a Su-Monster is drawn to dark and subterranean areas, since this is the habitat the Intellect Devourer within it prefers. When the brain-beast fetus in its skull is close to hatching, it probably seeks out an entrance to the Underworld, so the ustilagor is born into its native subterranean environment.

07-23-2009, 02:30 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Most arboreal monsters have a great potential for destroying parties piecemeal. Just grab them one at a time and kill them a few trees over.

<http://img33.imageshack.us/img33/1565/alfredcain.jpg>

Burn their fucking forest down Master Bruce.

07-23-2009, 04:59 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I never much cared for AD&D's fondness for the "the Mama/Papa monster gets much tougher if their young are threatened" trope.

Which begs the question why adventures don't get a bonus for trying to defend themselves from attack. Aren't they, like, as pissed as they can possibly get?

You could make a case for bringing your children questing with you if you got an automatic haste every time you thought they were in danger... :)

07-23-2009, 05:14 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

You could make a case for bringing your children questing with you if you got an automatic haste every time you thought they were in danger... :)

See Lone Wolf and Cub for details.

And you could always resurrect the young ones if anything untoward were to happen... any PC who's survived long enough to reproduce has got to be high enough level to know someone with a resurrection, right?

07-23-2009, 09:19 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, or maybe it's what the Intellect Devourer wanted all along. The Monstrous Manual says "their reproductive method is unknown", so perhaps when a brain-beast reaches the end of its life they spawn by dominating primates (apes, monkeys or humans) into eating them in a murderous frenzy, and those who eat it undergo a strange and horrible transformation into a Su-Monster. The reason they have psionic powers is that their brains are actually fetal Intellect Devourers, which bursts out of their skulls as an ustilagor if the Su-Monster manages to live long enough for it to mature into its motile larval stage. That is also why Su-Monsters attack psionic creatures, the Intellect Devourer spawn within them needs the cerebral matter and fluids of such creatures to mature.

EDIT: That could also explain why an arboreal tropical primate like a Su-Monster is drawn to dark and subterranean areas, since this is the habitat the Intellect Devourer within it prefers. When the brain-beast fetus in its skull is close to hatching, it probably seeks out an entrance to the Underworld, so the ustilagor is born into its native subterranean environment.

I kind of like that. Reproduction by fungal infection. Which suggests that the adult brain beast actually is a giant fungus. Sort of going back to it's roots, in a way. Back before 2E turned ustilagor into larval intellect devourers, the pre-retcon version actually was a motile quasi-sentient fungus, not just "usually covered with a gray fungus".

The skull bit also explains why the larval and adult stages look like brains, even though they're actually a couple of kingdoms away from that particular organ. Their birth environment is the inside of a skull, and they take the shape and form of their host as they devour it. Even mimicked the organization of the neural network, which helps to explain why mold got smart. They're not brains. They're what ate the brains, replaced then, and took their form. They're to brains what pod-people are to people-people. They're pod-brains.

Which means intellect devourers are basically copies of monkeys. They'd do it in an alien way, but certain behavioral traits might carry over. Imagine a sated intellect devourer, attracted to the nearest brains that most resemble its own. Underground, no luck with actual monkeys. But there are primates, all over. Even in adventuring parties.

The big old brain is happy and well fed. Not looking to fry any brains or anything impolite. Just looking for a little socialization. A little grooming. Imagine waking up to a giant brain with huge claws, carefully picking the lice out of your hair. Then its shock as it hears you completely freak out. It was just being friendly....

07-23-2009, 04:45 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I kind of like that. Reproduction by fungal infection. Which suggests that the adult brain beast actually is a giant fungus. Sort of going back to it's roots, in a way. Back before 2E turned ustilagor into larval intellect devourers, the pre-retcon version actually was a motile quasi-sentient fungus, not just "usually covered with a gray fungus".

Didn't Brian Aldiss write a SF novel about essentially this? :)

07-23-2009, 06:15 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Which begs the question why adventures don't get a bonus for trying to defend themselves from attack. Aren't they, like, as pissed as they can possibly get?

It's not about being pissed-offness. When fighting for your own life, your death is an unacceptable cost by definition - when fighting for those of your offspring, your own death is possibly a worthwhile sacrifice, meaning Mama Bear is apt to fight with more all-out aggression than she'd do in protection of her own skin.

07-23-2009, 08:07 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

so I imagine a Tasloi / Su-Monster society doing something similar. Presumably the relationship would be more volatile, since they're both Chaotic Evil.

That would work very well if the DM played up the "chimps eat human faces" meme. Tasloi dominated clans would be obvious because they are missing bits of ears and fingers.

07-23-2009, 08:19 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

Didn't Brian Aldiss write a SF novel about essentially this? :)

Sorry, haven't read any of his works. Quick summary?

07-23-2009, 08:54 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hothouse_\(novel\))

One of his worst works. He constantly changes the world to fit the story. But it does have an intelligent, mind controlling fungus.

07-23-2009, 09:00 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The Moon is connected to the Earth with cobwebs? I stopped reading there :p

Edit: (Which could be kind of cool... but not in a science fiction novel.)

07-24-2009, 02:55 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The Moon is connected to the Earth with cobwebs? I stopped reading there :p

Edit: (Which could be kind of cool... but not in a science fiction novel.)

You know where it would be cool? In a D&D setting. Hello, new home base for the Spider Goddess. To get to the moon and the stars, the heroes have to climb here gigantic web that stretches across reality.

07-24-2009, 03:33 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

You know where it would be cool? In a D&D setting. Hello, new home base for the Spider Goddess. To get to the moon and the stars, the heroes have to climb here gigantic web that stretches across reality.

I'm not a huge fan of the traditional planes of existence where everything is so... separate. I really like the idea of planes that criss and cross, and nobody's sure where one stops and the other begins. There's no teleporting, or gates, or suddenly fading away via a plane shift. Instead, there are faerie roads and shadow walking and thresholds and doors and circles of mushrooms or menhirs that subtly shift from one realm to the next.

Sounds like the demonweb. Hung over the Abyss, the blackness between worlds. Not accessed through some gate that takes you to an entirely separate world, but a huge silvery thing hanging in the sky. An arch, a bridge between this world and the world of lunacy, lycanthropes, romance, and dreams. Gives Lolth quite a portfolio. The Dream Maiden. The Queen of the Silver Threads. Passion. Madness. Lust. Love. Transformation. Claws.

Edit: Explains the yochol and the driders.

07-24-2009, 06:05 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist

It's not about being pissed-offness. When fighting for your own life, your death is an unacceptable cost by definition - when fighting for those of your offspring, your own death is possibly a worthwhile sacrifice, meaning Mama Bear is apt to fight with more all-out aggression than she'd do in protection of her own skin.

I can understand how protecting young might affect a morale check or make an animal more aggressive, but is a bear/boar/whatever really any more nasty when defending its young than when hunting or being attacked? Don't buy it myself.

I'm not sure what your point is exactly either. Isn't fighting to the death and with as much aggression as possible "a worthwhile sacrifice" to save your own life?

07-24-2009, 06:08 AM

Inyssi

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

I can understand how protecting young might affect a morale check or make an animal more aggressive, but is a bear/boar/whatever really any more nasty when defending its young than when hunting or being attacked? Don't buy it myself.

Yes.

Quote:

I'm not sure what your point is exactly either. Isn't fighting to the death and with as much aggression as possible "a worthwhile sacrifice" to save your your own life?

No. You've got to hold back at least a little so that you can stay alive afterward.

07-24-2009, 06:19 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Isn't fighting to the death and with as much aggression as possible "a worthwhile sacrifice" to save your own life?

If you attack with utter aggression and no thought for your own defense, you are likely to die. That defeats the purpose if your goal is to defend yourself. But it fits the purpose just fine if your goal is to defend your small child, so an animal that is protecting its young can be far more aggressive (by not worrying about its own safety).

07-24-2009, 06:23 AM

Kinetic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

I can understand how protecting young might affect a morale check or make an animal more aggressive, but is a bear/boar/whatever really any more nasty when defending its young than when hunting or being attacked? Don't buy it myself.

I'm not sure what your point is exactly either. Isn't fighting to the death and with as much aggression as possible "a worthwhile sacrifice" to save your own life?

Hell yes. I was taught in grade school that a bear, for example, is at its most dangerous when protecting its cubs.

07-24-2009, 06:44 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kinetic

Hell yes. I was taught in grade school that a bear, for example, is at its most dangerous when protecting its cubs.

Indeed it may be more aggressive, but once it's decided to kill you does it actually move twice as fast and bite twice as hard as if it was just eating you? Again, I'd contest that reaction and morale might be affected, but nothing else.

07-24-2009, 06:58 AM

Kinetic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Indeed it may be more aggressive, but once it's decided to kill you does it actually move twice as fast and bite twice as hard as if it was just eating you? Again, I'd contest that reaction and morale might be affected, but nothing else.

It's the reactions that are different when cubs are involved, and the reaction determines how hard they are going to fight. Bears are not usually out to kill on sight, unless there is something wrong with them (rabies is a good example). They will, if cornered, fight like hell until they have a way out. Then they're off. If there are cubs involved, they will fight like hell. Period. End of story. That's when they decide that you die and that's when they start swinging for the fences.

07-24-2009, 07:14 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kinetic

It's the reactions that are different when cubs are involved, and the reaction determines how hard they are going to fight. Bears are not usually out to kill on sight, unless there is something wrong with them (rabies is a good example). They will, if cornered, fight like hell until they have a way out. Then they're off. If there are cubs involved, they will fight like hell. Period. End of story. That's when they decide that you die and that's when they start swinging for the fences.

Um, so you're with me on the morale and reaction roll then? If they do decide to eat you then you get bitten just as much as if they're protecting their young? If they are cornered do they fight twice as fast and bite twice as hard until they can escape?

THACO, attacks per round, damage per attack... all identical IMO.

07-24-2009, 07:30 AM

Kinetic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Um, so you're with me on the morale and reaction roll then? If they do decide to eat you then you get bitten just as much as if they're protecting their young? If they are cornered do they fight twice as fast and bite twice as hard until they can escape?

THACO, attacks per round, damage per attack... all identical IMO.

No.

If a bear is cornered it does fight, and it fights hard, but it also holds back because the first instinct is (usually) to run. Bears are not king of the wilderness and out for the blood of everyone that trespasses. They won't chase you if they are wanting to get away, for example. They may not charge you, they may swipe at you while they are moving backwards or try to bat you aside while they attempt to get by you, or any number of other defensive maneuvers.

If they have a cub in the mix, they will attack you all out until you're no longer moving. They don't generally think about running at that point, and there's no reason for them to hold back. They will charge you, they will maul you, they will try to take your head from your body if they think you are a legitimate threat to their cub.

They react differently, but, because of that reaction, you have one hell of a monster on your hands when a cub is involved.

EDIT

One interesting thing about bears, since you mentioned being eaten, is that they look for the best food with the smallest effort. If they think a person is a good snack but that person fights like a howling madman, they will probably look elsewhere for food. Goes against everything taught in school about playing dead, doesn't it? That's your other option, but if hunger is why the bear is really wanting to get you then you're probably going to die. Most of the times when a bear attacks its because curiosity turned to fear or because they feel threatened, or have a young one that they feel is threatened.

From 1900 to 2001 there were only 133 deaths reported due to bears, but I can't find numbers on how many of those were during an incident where there was a cub involved to help support this discussion.

All in all, it's a game. Have your bears react the way you want them to react. Not everything is going to be based on reality in a game where people can have wishes come true, fight dragons, and throw fireballs. The way I'd run an encounter with bears would be based off the one encounter I've had close up with a bear and what I've seen on Discovery (because once was enough for me and bears look cool enough on TV).

07-24-2009, 07:37 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kinetic

They react differently, but, because of that reaction, you have one hell of a monster on your hands when a cub is involved.

Which still doesn't answer why, if they do decide to eat you, they don't get bonuses. Do you think they hold back when they're trying to take down a moose just because their young aren't involved? Yes, if the fight goes badly they'll turn and run, but that's a morale roll, nothing to do with their effectiveness while actually attacking. Again, THACO, damage etc not affected.

07-24-2009, 07:41 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kinetic

All in all, it's a game. Have your bears react the way you want them to react. Not everything is going to be based on reality in a game where people can have wishes come true, fight dragons, and throw fireballs.

I'm aware this is a discussion about a 30 year old RPG book on a web forum. My children aren't in danger!;

07-24-2009, 09:40 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DanSolo

Which still doesn't answer why, if they do decide to eat you, they don't get bonuses. Do you think they hold back when they're trying to take down a moose just because their young aren't involved? Yes, if the fight goes badly they'll turn and run, but that's a morale roll, nothing to do with their effectiveness while actually attacking. Again, THACO, damage etc not affected.

We're getting way off the topic of Su-Monsters here, but I'll stick my oar in anyway.

I think the point is that bears (in fact animals generally) will put in the minimum effort they can get away with. Killing a moose doesn't require them going apeshit, so they don't. They just kill the moose. (Usually a sick or old one, if they're like any other kind of predator.) But when their young are threatened they put in the maximum effort and go very apeshit. This is represented by small mechanical bonuses in the rules.

My main experience of this is being dive bombed in my garden by blackbirds who thought I was threatening their young. If those birds weren't hasted they were pretty close to it!

07-24-2009, 09:48 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

My main experience of this is being dive bombed in my garden by blackbirds who thought I was threatening their young. If those birds weren't hasted they were pretty close to it!

I didn't know there were any SR-71s modified into bombers. Or reconnaissance planes with young. :) Perhaps they perch on Lolth's web, black specks on the cobwebs that reach to the moon. Her web becomes the Yggdrasil of the world. The big sleek black steel birds might have beating hearts with names like Dáinn, Dvalinn, Duneyrr, and Durathró.

07-24-2009, 06:54 PM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Fortunately I live in a land without native mammals, so it's unlikely that I'll ever be chased by a bear. But it's one of those well-known things: animals protect their young. In most cases, combat in the natural world is relatively safe. Stags crack their antlers together in ritual combat. Lionesses hunt weaker prey. Bears go fishing. Humans wander through the woods and come out the other side, because the inhabitants tend to respect us. It's not particularly epic, and the predators tend to live.

But when survival of the lineage is at stake, things get crazy. Risks are taken. Sacrifices are made. It's like Miyamoto Musashi showing up to a duel with a pair of handcuffs and wearing a dynamite vest: the other guy isn't going to be walking away, but Musashi isn't going to maintain his survival record either. It's a whole different approach to combat: make the other guy lose, don't worry about winning for yourself.

The whole 'power of friendship' thing that cartoons harp on about has some pretty strong roots in biology.

07-24-2009, 09:50 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I'm not a huge fan of the traditional planes of existence where everything is so... separate. I really like the idea of planes that criss and cross, and nobody's sure where one stops and the other begins. There's no teleporting, or gates, or suddenly fading away via a plane shift. Instead, there are faerie roads and shadow walking and thresholds and doors and circles of mushrooms or menhirs that subtly shift from one realm to the next.

I think the same, I often have games where the PCs travel to "The Other Side" (usually some kind of faerie realm) by travelling down a mysterious tunnel, walking up the Spiral Path of Spiral Hill on midsummer's eve and the like.

07-24-2009, 09:56 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

We're getting way off the topic of Su-Monsters here, but I'll stick my oar in anyway.

I think the point is that bears (in fact animals generally) will put in the minimum effort they can get away with. Killing a moose doesn't require them going apeshit, so they don't. They just kill the moose. (Usually a sick or old one, if they're like any other kind of predator.) But when their young are threatened they put in the maximum effort and go very apeshit. This is represented by small mechanical bonuses in the rules.

My main experience of this is being dive bombed in my garden by blackbirds who thought I was threatening their young. If those birds weren't hasted they were pretty close to it!

To my way of thinking, the stats in the Monster Manual represent the monster making a concerted effort to kill/injure/drive-away their opponents. In real life, animals will only go to that effort if something serious is at stake, i.e. the cornered rat syndrome or "protecting the next generation".

Oh, and in the case of bears, the Monstrous Manual version* does not give females protecting their cubs and special benefits. It just says "bears tend to avoid humans unless provoked. Exceptions to this rule can be a most unfortunate occurrence." and "Female bears are very protective of their young, and more than one individual has been badly injured when taunting or playing with seemingly harmless bear cubs." which seems an eminently sensible way of putting it.

*Although if I remember correctly the 1st edition version gave females a to hit & damage bonus when defending their cubs, but I'm too lazy to pull out my old Monster Manuals to check.

07-24-2009, 10:27 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

OK, getting back to Su-Monsters. I think it makes the most sense for an animal to "burn itself out" protecting its young when one or both of the following conditions apply:

If it does die, the young are able to fend for themselves until they reach maturity.

If the young die, it can not produce enough offspring to replace them. It may have an "all eggs in one basket" approach to reproduction.

So, if we apply these ideas to the Fungal Su-Monster concept, what can we come up with?

If a "family" of Fungal Su-Monsters are actually all siblings from one Intellect Devourer's infestation of a pack of primates, it makes sense to risk sacrificing half their numbers if it ensures the other half survive. Having the larger ones "haste out" presumably increases their chance of survival than having the smaller spawn sacrifice them.

Furthermore, an Intellect Devourer fungal fetus may grow with great speed if it eats another Su-Monster's brains. So, if the small "young" survive and the larger "adults" die, they may be able to quickly mature by eating their fallen protectors.

Normally Fungal Su-Monsters don't eat other pack-members, since the Intellect Devourer will get more offspring if it all the monkeys it infects take a 3-5 years to mature than if they eat each other and the sole survivor matures over a few short months. I would think they will enthusiastically eat Su-Monsters of other families, though.

Alternatively, the larger Su-Monsters may save their cubs to eat later. Perhaps when the family goes down into the Underworld to hatch into ustilagors, those that are not quite mature enough eat their weaker siblings to give them the nutritional boost they need to become larval brain-beasts.

07-28-2009, 10:31 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Swanmay

Ah, the Swanmay. Feathered protector of nature, slayer of those who threaten swans, wearer of white robes... A female ranger who can turn into a swan, essentially, which is rather a strange idea in many respects. I wonder if it comes from real world myth or legend? What's oddest about it is that the entry doesn't specify when or why Swanmays turn into swans, and nor does it really explain what advantages the Swanmay gains from doing so. Immunity from normal weapons is available in swan form, but on the other hand this includes sacrificing any sort of damage-dealing worth the name, and the ability to wear or wield equipment. I suppose having the ability is useful for the purposes of disguise and hiding, but...

The other thing that puzzles me about the entry is that it explicitly describes Swanmays as a variety of lycanthrope (therianthrope...whatever), and yet they get a separate entry. Weird, eh?

On the plus side, I like the idea of a secret society of swan-women lurking in the shadows of human society, working towards mysterious aims in the name of protecting nature. If a DM doesn't know how to use that in a campaign, he needs his head examined. Although as with many "mysterious" D&D beings, there isn't much in the way of mystery for seasoned players, who will instantly shout "Swanmay!" as soon as they meet a woman with a swan-feather ring, brooch or bracelet.

Bird Maiden

This section of the entry is probably the most egregious example of setting-specificity in the entire MM - regular readers will already know this is a pet hate of mine, but I challenge anybody not to read through the Bird Maiden part and not think "If I didn't know about Al Qadim, I wouldn't have a clue what any of this is about." I mean, for starters, you can't even use a Bird Maiden in a game if you don't know what a kahina is.

Which is a shame, because as with most Al Qadim creatures there's a nice Arabian Nights flavour to the Bird Maidens - from how if a man steals one's shawl he can force her to marry him, to the way they study the ways of the kahina from Aaracocra in a special castle in the clouds.

07-28-2009, 10:45 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Ah, I can recall being infatuated with the swanmay as a youth.

Swanmays do indeed hail from myth: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Swan_maiden

I do think that transformation tokens should be used more often - imagine if a wizard who wanted to polymorph into something needed a bit of it first... and if he couldn't turn back if he lost it. You can imagine a mage desperately searching for the ogre scalp he needs to turn back before his mind shifts forever.

One of the weirder bits of the entry is if a PC is invited to join - there's just a flat chance given that she accepts and retires into NPC-hood! As for why to use swan-form, apparently swans have very acute senses? And can fly?

Incidentally, I believe that the Complete Book of Humanoids allowed for druid swanmays, as well as rangers.

As far as Bird Maidens go, I've always assumed that kahina are just specialty priests.

07-28-2009, 10:53 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

Ah, I can recall being infatuated with the swanmay as a youth.

Swanmays do indeed hail from myth: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Swan_maiden

I do think that transformation tokens should be used more often - imagine if a wizard who wanted to polymorph into something needed a bit of it first... and if he couldn't turn back if he lost it. You can imagine a mage desperately searching for the ogre scalp he needs to turn back before his mind shifts forever.

One of the weirder bits of the entry is if a PC is invited to join - there's just a flat chance given that she accepts and retires into NPC-hood! As for why to use swan-form, apparently swans have very acute senses? And can fly?

Incidentally, I believe that the Complete Book of Humanoids allowed for druid swanmays, as well as rangers.

As far as Bird Maidens go, I've always assumed that kahina are just specialty priests.

Yeah, that 50% chance of becoming an NPC is a bit weird. No, player, it is not for you to decide!

I think the kahina are just specialty priests, but it really needs to say that in the entry instead of just assuming everybody owns Al Qadim material. The stat run-down even contains lines such as "THACO: As kahina".

07-28-2009, 12:02 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

Ah, I can recall being infatuated with the swanmay as a youth.

Swanmays do indeed hail from myth: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Swan_maiden

Although, in this case, I would bet you anything you care to name that they were derived pretty much entirely from Poul Anderson's Three Hearts and Three Lions.

07-28-2009, 06:20 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I do think that transformation tokens should be used more often - imagine if a wizard who wanted to polymorph into something needed a bit of it first... and if he couldn't turn back if he lost it. You can imagine a mage desperately searching for the ogre scalp he needs to turn back before his mind shifts forever.

Oh yes, there's plenty of potential in transformation tokens.

I'm having difficulty coming up with adventure ideas for Swanmays. Apart from the obvious one of the PCs helping a swanmay recover her stolen swan-token, most of the other ideas I could think of (e.g. joining with Swanmays to attach despoilers of the forest, hunting down a spy who has discovered a Swanmays' lodge before she can expose the secret of its location, etc) work just as well for a secret sorority of regular, non-lycanthrope, rangers. Hmm, unless something could be done with a Swanmay who doesn't want to be a Swanmay anymore?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

As for why to use swan-form, apparently swans have very acute senses? And can fly?

As it is, their ability to turn into a swan is mostly useful for scouting/message-carrying. There are plenty of Sylvan creatures that are better suited for that job (e.g. there are fey who are smaller, fly faster and more adeptly and can turn invisible). They do scant damage in swan form (an average of 3.5 if they hit with all 3 attacks) and have lousy AC, if they're up against a creature with a magic weapon they're pretty well toast unless they can fly away. A Swanmay can't even defend herself effectively by turning back into a human, because the transformation doesn't affect equipment, only her swan-token. She'd be facing her opponents naked apart from a "feather token, feathered garment, or signet* ring", not a very desirable position to be in.

*Shouldn't that be a cygnet ring.;

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

As far as Bird Maidens go, I've always assumed that kahina are just specialty priests.

Yes, a kahina is a variant priest. I don't see where all this fuss about it being undefined is coming from, since the Monstrous Manual gives enough information about the class's abilities in the Bird Maidens' description to run the creatures in a game:

Quote:

Though they have no sorority, bird maidens are loosely united by their faith. All bird maidens are kahina, idol priestesses who believe in the divinity of all things. They live as wandering teachers, protecting the land from those who despoil it. They get along best with those who respect the land: desert riders, mystics, and fisherfolk. In the fertile river valleys, they preach the faith and maintain the fertility of the land and livestock. Some tribesmen believe bird maidens are hama, spirits of the departed, who return to help the living. Bird maidens deny this and may cut themselves to prove that they are flesh and blood.

Bird maidens' Hit Dice are equal to their priestly level, from 2-8. They have major access to the All, Animal, Divination, Elemental, Healing, Plant and Weather spheres and minor access to the Creation, Protection, and Sun spheres. They carry spears, darts, and slings, but may not wear armor or shields (even magical) heavier than hide. If they do, they cannot use spells. Bird maidens cannot turn undead.

Oh, and the bird maiden entry says 8th level Bird Maidens can turn into giant eagles. Does this mean they get a giant eagle's 1-6/1-6/2-12 claw/claw/beak attacks? That would make them a lot more effective.

07-28-2009, 11:47 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Oh yes, there's plenty of potential in transformation tokens.

One of the Dilvish stories used a swanmay-like figure as a framing element:

Quote:

Originally Posted by "Thelinde's Song" by Roger Zelazny

"Mildin shuddered and fetched her shimmering were-cloak—for she was Mistress of the Coven—and throwing it about her shoulders and clasping it at her neck with the smoking Stone of the Moon, she became as a silver-gray bird and passed out through the window and high about the Denesh."

She flies from her were-hall to her daughter, who spoke the name of an ancient and powerful sorcerer. Mildin then takes Thelinde within her cloak and they go to the Pool of the Goddess, and while the moon still shines on its surface images come to accompany the witch queen's tale of the first meeting between Dilvish and Jelerak. When her daughter's careless second utterance brings a servant of the Dark One, Mildin makes the Sign of the Moon and abjures the creature in the Name of the Coven and by the Moon their Mother. The cloak begins to glow, and the Stone of the Moon blazes, driving it back.

07-28-2009, 11:51 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Yes, a kahina is a variant priest. I don't see were all this fuss about it being undefined is coming from, since the Monstrous Manual gives enough information about the class's abilities in the Bird Maidens' description to run the creatures in a game

Except it doesn't tell you the type of dice they use for hit dice, their THACO, their spells per day per level or their saving throws. We can probably assume that it's the same as a specialty priest but I maintain the entry should at least say that explicitly!

07-29-2009, 12:14 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Except it doesn't tell you the type of dice they use for hit dice, their THACO, their spells per day per level or their saving throws. We can probably assume that it's the same as a specialty priest but I maintain the entry should at least say that explicitly!

Well it seems pretty clear to me that they are priestesses and hence use the Priest class of an appropriate level to determine those abilities. I don't mind a bit of reading between the lines in cases like this.

07-29-2009, 02:16 AM

Ginkomortus

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yeah, that 50% chance of becoming an NPC is a bit weird. No, player, it is not for you to decide!

I have to assume this was written in the same spirit as the AD&D2E PHB wish entry...

Quote:

This discretionary power of the DM is necessary in order to maintain game balance. As wishing another creature dead would be grossly unfair, for example, your DM might well advance the spellcaster to a future period in which the creature is no longer alive, effectively putting the wishing character out of the campaign.

'Cause that's totally not grossly unfair.

07-29-2009, 04:57 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I'm having difficulty coming up with adventure ideas for Swanmays.

There's some totally awesome potential in the bird maidens who are unwillingly married to human(oid)s. If the bird maiden gets back her magic scarf, she murders her husband and all her sons and kidnaps her daughters away to become bird maidens themselves. You could have an unwilling bird maiden married to an evil NPC, and she wants freed from her marriage. Or you could have her married to an otherwise good NPC, and she asks the PCs to help recover her scarf. Giving her back the scarf would mean the death of their friendly NPC type: moral dilemma time, there. Or the PCs have to investigate a murder where a wife killed her husband and now is going around killing her (now grown) sons and kidnapping her daughters.

07-29-2009, 05:25 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Or here's a bit from the Wikipedia entry:

Quote:

The folktales usually adhere to the following basic plot. A young, unmarried man steals a magic robe made of swan feathers from a swan maiden so that she will not fly away, and winds up marrying her. Usually she bears his children. When the children are older they sing a song about where their father has hidden their mother's robe, or one asks why the mother always weeps, and finds the cloak for her, or they otherwise betray the secret. The swan maiden immediately gets her robe and disappears to where she came from. Although leaving the children may grieve her, she does not take them with her.

If the husband is able to find her again, it is an arduous quest, and often the impossibility is clear enough that he does not even try.

That husband looking for his lost love seems like a good quest. Or even better is an orphaned child looking for his/her mother: the father died, and as they went through his things the swanmay n=mother finally found her missing cloak and disappeared, leaving a small child behind. What Good aligned PC could pass up that quest?

07-29-2009, 05:49 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

As a thought, swanmays have to be rangers - but one happens if one turns non-good? They stop being rangers, but presumably they don't lose their swanmay powers.

So... one wonders how the sorority would take that.

I also feel that one should be able to use swanmays Ugly Duckling -style, but I'm not certain how.

07-30-2009, 05:37 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

There's some totally awesome potential in the bird maidens who are unwillingly married to human(oid)s. If the bird maiden gets back her magic scarf, she murders her husband and all her sons and kidnaps her daughters away to become bird maidens themselves. You could have an unwilling bird maiden married to an evil NPC, and she wants freed from her marriage. Or you could have her married to an otherwise good NPC, and she asks the PCs to help recover her scarf. Giving her back the scarf would mean the death of their friendly NPC type: moral dilemma time, there. Or the PCs have to investigate a murder where a wife killed her husband and now is going around killing her (now grown) sons and kidnapping her daughters.

The Monstrous Manual entry says Bird Maidens in that situation leave their husbands, not kill them, they only murder their sons. It rather reminds me of Euripedes' version of Medea. Although I suspect the Bird Maidens don't just kill their sons out of vengeance like Medea did. They can be of any alignment, and I can't see many Good aligned Bird Maidens murdering their own offspring just to torment the man who forced them into marriage. Perhaps there's some supernatural explanation: They may have to kill their sons to return to being Bird Maidens, or perhaps the sons from such a union damages the fertility of the land they hold sacred, or such male offspring may be doomed to become abominable monstrosities that despoil nature.

Although one wonders how Bird Maidens normally reproduce. If they're related to Swanmays, presumably they can recruit human priestesses and initiate them to become Bird Maidens, but are they allowed to bear children willingly? It's possibly they are forbidden from marrying (being "Maidens" after all). If they do have normal relations with men, what do they do with any sons they have? Do they kill them to, or return them to their fathers?

07-30-2009, 05:52 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

As a thought, swanmays have to be rangers - but one happens if one turns non-good? They stop being rangers, but presumably they don't lose their swanmay powers.

So... one wonders how the sorority would take that.

Hmm, maybe they do lose their Swanmay powers, and become cursed to remain in swan form until redeemed? Of course there are stories that the ones who turn really nasty become Black Swanmays who are "anti-rangers" similar to the AD&D anti-paladin is the Evil inversion of a paladin.

Naturally, the swanmay sorority denies such beings exist, but there are enough stories to the contrary to suggest they're not telling the whole truth.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I also feel that one should be able to use swanmays Ugly Duckling -style, but I'm not certain how.

Hmm...

Well maybe some villain captures a Swanmay's token and forces her to bear him children. Both their parents die during an enemy raid, and their daughters are forced to beg for a living, during which time they are tormented by their tribe for being "illegitimate ugly half-breeds", maybe even sold into slavery or servitude. Then another Swanmay seeks the PCs aid in freeing her "sister" and, when finding they are too late, in tracking down and rescuing the "Ugly Ducklings".

07-30-2009, 06:05 AM

Inyssi

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, maybe they do lose their Swanmay powers, and become cursed to remain in swan form until redeemed?

Wait. If the swan breeding population comes almost entirely from two sources, neutral swans and evil swanmays, wouldn't that imply that swans now inherently tend toward evil? I think that is what happens when an intelligent, supernatural, evil population is mixed with a mundane neutral one. And, of course, swans are vicious bastards anyway.

I like this idea.

07-30-2009, 07:02 AM

kami2awa

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have real trouble thinking of Swanmays as Good creatures. IRL Swans are extremely nasty, aggressive, dirty and territorial birds who just happen to look nice.

If Swanmays are thought of as Good by most other races, then it may be a total facade, and beneath the snow-white exterior are some ugly things propelling the Swanmay through the world. And Gods help you if you try the 'steal her shawl and enslave its owner' trick on them, as you may get more than your arm broken...

07-30-2009, 07:26 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa

I have real trouble thinking of Swanmays as Good creatures. IRL Swans are extremely nasty, aggressive, dirty and territorial birds who just happen to look nice.

That's increasingly my thinking, too. Swanmays tell everyone that they're the Good protectors of the forest, and many believe them, but they're really pretty horrible if you look past the surface (hence the murdering their husbands and children).

07-30-2009, 09:06 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

That's increasingly my thinking, too. Swanmays tell everyone that they're the Good protectors of the forest, and many believe them, but they're really pretty horrible if you look past the surface (hence the murdering their husbands and children).

Well, remember that they are rangers, and thus have to technically be good (though, being humans, and thus capable of dual-classing, they need not have always been good).

On the other hand, remember that 2e alignments are a bit grittier and more mean-spirited than recently, with lizardmen eating people and being neutral, and swanmays slaughtering poachers and decorating their homes with their remains and technically being good.

07-30-2009, 09:43 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa

I have real trouble thinking of Swanmays as Good creatures. IRL Swans are extremely nasty, aggressive, dirty and territorial birds who just happen to look nice.

Local legend in my hometown has it that a swan once killed somebody's pet dog in the park.

07-30-2009, 11:51 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

That's increasingly my thinking, too. Swanmays tell everyone that they're the Good protectors of the forest, and many believe them, but they're really pretty horrible if you look past the surface (hence the murdering their husbands and children).

She's forced to "marry" and have the children of the man who has her cloak. The children may be innocent, but the husband is the real villain.

07-30-2009, 05:38 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

That's increasingly my thinking, too. Swanmays tell everyone that they're the Good protectors of the forest, and many believe them, but they're really pretty horrible if you look past the surface (hence the murdering their husbands and children).

Just to remind everyone, it's the Bird Maiden the Monstrous Manual says murders folk after a forced "marriage", and it says they only murder their sons (if any), not their husbands, There's nothing to indicate Swanmays follow this behavior to, they may just fly away with their daughter(s).

There is one other thing I was curious about. It says "Swanmays are guided by their swan personalities". Real-world swans are known for forming strong pair-bonds with their mates, so I wonder if Swanmays are the same? There's no specific mention of them having mates, but their entry does that "They are friendly with forest folk, such as sylvan elves and dryads." Now there's friendly, and there's friendly. Maybe most Swanmays form a lifelong commitment with an Elven lover, or one of the nature priests they are are known to "regularly associate" with. Now if I remember correctly the 1E version of Swanmays could be half-elves as well as humans, perhaps many of the half-elf Swanmays had a Swanmay mother and an elf father?

As for swanmays killing and displaying poachers, I don't think that's out of bounds for a Good character in D&D. Their entry says they "actively oppose evil races or monsters that might otherwise decimate wildlife and the countryside" and their are two other references to them combating Evil, so I suspect the poacher in question is likely to be of the "Chaotic evil half-orc slaughtering sprites for pixie-dust" kind rather than some peasant who trapped a rabbit to eat. Although I can easily see them punishing someone for killing a forest creature they hold in particularly high regard, like a swan, since Swanmays seem to lean toward the Neutral end of the Alignment spectrum.

07-31-2009, 12:18 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Into the Ts now...

Tabaxi

Leopard or Jaguar -people, depending on your preference, who are I suppose very much like Lizardmen, being reclusive, rather 'primitive', and neither evil nor good. They are very loosely reminiscent of something I read about the Zapotec civilisation's beliefs about jaguar people, but that could be one of those apocraphal things.

I must confess to being slightly puzzled as to why Tabaxi are Chaotic Neutral in alignment - they rather seem like the definition of Neutral to me, being reasonably organised (into clan groups) and preferring to keep to themselves. But then again the MM's view of alignment is generally a bit beyond reason.

The plot hook of all plot hooks for Tabaxi is the "ancient civilisation that has collapsed, leaving its former citizens as degenerate tribespeople" motif - familiar to all D&D jungle races. It's a nice motif and one that doesn't really get old, although I think you do have to question the assumptions behind it (at least I do, anyway): why is it always the races who live in the jungle whose civilisations collapse, for white skinned foreigners to discover eons later, and not the other way around?

But you can't have a boring game about exploring lost Tabaxi temples in the depths of the rainforest, I think.

Tabaxi Lord

These are the Lizard King equivalents for the Tabaxi - big Chaotic Evil ruler types who can bend their lesser cousins to their will for fun and hijinks. They are the mortal enemies of the Couatl, and this again strikes me as a good adventure hook for a game - war in the jungle between a Tabaxi Lord and a Couatl, with the player character somehow caught up in it.

07-31-2009, 12:42 PM

Khuxan

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

you do have to question the assumptions behind it (at least I do, anyway): why is it always the races who live in the jungle whose civilisations collapse, for white skinned foreigners to discover eons later, and not the other way around?

Having studied imperialism and colonialism last semester, that does reek of cultural supremacism and anachronistic ideas about race and society. One of my favourite parts of the Reign setting is that the Empire and the Dindavarans (the latter being described as 'Black Prussians with katanas') are black and it is the itinerant merchants and mammoth-riding raiders who are white.

The idea of fallen Mesoamerican empires is not particularly accurate, anyway. The Aztecs were at the nexus of their power and advancement when the conquistadors came, and who knows what would have happened given another few centuries.

07-31-2009, 12:56 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Khuxan

Having studied imperialism and colonialism last semester, that does reek of cultural supremacism and anachronistic ideas about race and society. One of my favourite parts of the Reign setting is that the Empire and the Dindavarans (the latter being described as 'Black Prussians with katanas') are black and it is the itinerant merchants and mammoth-riding raiders who are white.

The idea of fallen Mesopotamian empires is not particularly accurate, anyway. The Aztecs were at the nexus of their power and advancement when the conquistadors came, and who knows what would have happened given another few centuries.

I suspect it comes from the stories about the Maya and the collapse of their high civilisation, which if I recall happened around the 9th-10th centuries AD? So when the Europeans arrived in the Yucatan many of the Maya cities would already have looked like something out of Indiana Jones.

By the way I think you mean "Mesoamerican" rather than "Mesopotamian". ;)

07-31-2009, 01:49 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I suspect it comes from the stories about the Maya and the collapse of their high civilisation, which if I recall happened around the 9th-10th centuries AD? So when the Europeans arrived in the Yucatan many of the Maya cities would already have looked like something out of Indiana Jones.

Or Olmec. Giant stone cat heads!

07-31-2009, 03:46 PM

JohnBiles

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Into the Ts now...

Tabaxi

The plot hook of all plot hooks for Tabaxi is the "ancient civilisation that has collapsed, leaving its former citizens as degenerate tribespeople" motif - familiar to all D&D jungle races. It's a nice motif and one that doesn't really get old, although I think you do have to question the assumptions behind it (at least I do, anyway): why is it always the races who live in the jungle whose civilisations collapse, for white skinned foreigners to discover eons later, and not the other way around?

Ecology, baby, ecology.

Jungle soil is fertile but not deep or long-lasting. The first stage of agriculture in a jungle or forest is slash-and-burn. You burn the jungle / forest and the ash helps to fertilize the land. You farm it a few years, then move on and let it heal, doing the whole thing over again at another place.

However, with time, you can learn tricks to extend the lifespan of the land, enabling you to build permanent cities and till fields around them long term. But it's always an unstable position because what nature wants is to bury your farms and cities with verdant greenery that is sustainable long-term, rather than your farms and cities that destroy the high level cover which had made jungle growth work properly.

Once something goes wrong, either eco-catastrophe will wipe out the land's fertility and you'll have to flee or you slaughter each other too much when population outstrips the land's fertility or whatever.

The jungle then rolls in and devours your civilization and the survivors revert to a simpler lifestyle.

Jungle/Thick forest is harder to settle and till than the more open areas, so it's more likely ruins will be left lying around instead of someone building a new city on the site.

When a city is ruined by the collapse of civilization in the plains, people will eventually build a new city there or else steal all the bits to build new cities or earthquakes will bury it, etc.

07-31-2009, 07:20 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tabaxi

I must confess to being slightly puzzled as to why Tabaxi are Chaotic Neutral in alignment - they rather seem like the definition of Neutral to me, being reasonably organised (into clan groups) and preferring to keep to themselves. But then again the MM's view of alignment is generally a bit beyond reason.

'Cause they're cats, and cats don't like to obey the rules. They're free spirits, man!;

By the way, am I the only one who thinks the illustration of a female Tabaxi is quite cute, albeit in a comic-book supervillainess ("Fear the claws of Jaguargirl") kind of way.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The plot hook of all plot hooks for Tabaxi is the "ancient civilisation that has collapsed, leaving its former citizens as degenerate tribespeople" motif - familiar to all D&D jungle races. It's a nice motif and one that doesn't really get old, although I think you do have to question the assumptions behind it (at least I do, anyway): why is it always the races who live in the jungle whose civilisations collapse, for white skinned foreigners to discover eons later, and not the other way around?

In counterargument, there are just as many fallen civilizations in non-jungle lands, but far fewer of them are lost because there aren't jungle trees to hide them? If the Ruined Walls of Olde Karpesh are plain to see in the middle of the valley, and are probably still in use by successor civilizations, people are a lot less likely to forget about them.

Then again, there is a great lost civilization in Western lands, whose people are forgotten and whose awesome works are known to few. Where do you think all those dungeons come from? They're relics of the Ancient Empire of Evil Gnomes, don't you know?

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

But you can't have a boring game about exploring lost Tabaxi temples in the depths of the rainforest, I think.

Another interesting tidbit is "Tabaxi are sometimes hunted for their pelts, worth up to 250 gp each". There's an adventure seed in there, without a doubt. It's startling how many non-evil sapient races in the Monstrous Manual have notes on their salable body-parts.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Tabaxi Lord

These are the Lizard King equivalents for the Tabaxi - big Chaotic Evil ruler types who can bend their lesser cousins to their will for fun and hijinks. They are the mortal enemies of the Couatl, and this again strikes me as a good adventure hook for a game - war in the jungle between a Tabaxi Lord and a Couatl, with the player character somehow caught up in it.

What is it with this "Neutral race of primitives dominated by a more powerful Chaotic Evil version". Is it part of Demonic plot to take over the scaled and furred tribes of the swamps and jungle? The Tabaxi Lord can mate with Tabaxis, and all his offspring are more Tabaxi Lords. If these creatures are highly libidinous then within a few generations the jungles could be packed with these malicious creatures. Maybe most Tabaxi tribes drive them out or slay them, or the Couatl are successful in keeping their numbers down. The Couatl may even be revered by some tribes of Tabaxi as representatives of the "powers related to sunlight, rain, or animals" that they revere.

07-31-2009, 07:24 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JohnBiles
Ecology, baby, ecology.

Jungle soil is fertile but not deep or long-lasting. The first stage of agriculture in a jungle or forest is slash-and-burn. You burn the jungle / forest and the ash helps to fertilize the land. You farm it a few years, then move on and let it heal, doing the whole thing over again at another place.

Tabaxis are carnivores, they wouldn't be able to eat ordinary crops. Unless they developed some form of "meat plant", a Tabaxi civilisation would have to be based on some form of animal husbandry. Maybe they were reliant on one animal (A giant mouse, jungle cricket, river carp or whatever) and when some illness or environmental change caused a drop in their food-animal, their civilisation collapsed.

07-31-2009, 09:01 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The plot hook of all plot hooks for Tabaxi is the "ancient civilisation that has collapsed, leaving its former citizens as degenerate tribespeople" motif - familiar to all D&D jungle races. It's a nice motif and one that doesn't really get old, although I think you do have to question the assumptions behind it (at least I do, anyway): why is it always the races who live in the jungle whose civilisations collapse, for white skinned foreigners to discover eons later, and not the other way around?

Because if a fallen empire is located in temperate climates (where the natives have pale skin) it'll be modelled on Rome, not the Maya. More a failure of imagination than a case of "colonialist" assumptions, I'd think.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I suspect it comes from the stories about the Maya and the collapse of their high civilisation, which if I recall happened around the 9th-10th centuries AD? So when the Europeans arrived in the Yucatan many of the Maya cities would already have looked like something out of Indiana Jones.

The collapse of one of their high civilizations. The Spaniard's first contact with the Maya was in the northern Yucatan, where an urban civilization was still in existence (and resisted the conquistadores with rather more vigour than the Aztecs managed). The archetypical "lost Maya" were the Classic* Maya civilization of the southern Yucatan, which indeed collapsed in the 9th century. There was also advanced Maya states in the southern highlands and down to the Pacific litoral that lasted until the Spanish conquest (only completed in this region in the 17th century IIRC).

Just to confuse you, the perhaps most famous Maya centre, Chichén Itzá, was in the northern region, where urbanism persisted to the Spanish arrival, but the city itself was abandoned long before the conquistadores came.

* In Mesoamerican chronology, the "Classic" is approximately the 3rd to 9th centuries AD.

07-31-2009, 09:23 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist

Because if a fallen empire is located in temperate climates (where the natives have pale skin) it'll be modelled on Rome, not the Maya. More a failure of imagination than a case of "colonialist" assumptions, I'd think.

You're probably right.

Quote:

The collapse of one of their high civilizations. The Spaniard's first contact with the Maya was in the northern Yucatan, where an urban civilization was still in existence (and resisted the conquistadores with rather more vigour than the Aztecs managed). The archetypical "lost Maya" were the Classic* Maya civilization of the southern Yucatan, which indeed collapsed in the 9th century. There was also advanced Maya states in the southern highlands and down to the Pacific litoral that lasted until the Spanish conquest (only completed in this region in the 17th century IIRC).

Just to confuse you, the perhaps most famous Maya centre, Chichén Itzá, was in the northern region, where urbanism persisted to the Spanish arrival, but the city itself was abandoned long before the conquistadores came.

* In Mesoamerican chronology, the "Classic" is approximately the 3rd to 9th centuries AD.

I did read about all that in Jarred Diamond's book Collapse.

The vigor of the Maya resistance to Spanish conquest was surely down to lack of centralised power (the Spanish had to fight each city-state one by one) and a lack of native subject states desperate to do over the main empire, which is really what did for the Aztecs. (Along with all the smallpox of course.)

07-31-2009, 10:22 PM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

What is it with this "Neutral race of primitives dominated by a more powerful Chaotic Evil version". Is it part of Demonic plot to take over the scaled and furred tribes of the swamps and jungle? The Tabaxi Lord can mate with Tabaxis, and all his offspring are more Tabaxi Lords. If these creatures are highly libidinous then within a few generations the jungles could be packed with these malicious creatures. Maybe most Tabaxi tribes drive them out or slay them, or the Couatl are successful in keeping their numbers down. The Couatl may even be revered by some tribes of Tabaxi as representatives of the "powers related to sunlight, rain, or animals" that they revere.

Somewhat disturbingly, note that Tabaxi Lords are not humanoid, and are considerably larger than your average Tabaxi - they're twice the size of a normal jaguar, for example. I suspect that Tabaxi aren't too keen on Tabaxi Lord breeding duty.

Also interesting is that Tabaxi come in two types - leopard and jaguar. That seems, to me, to encourage both African and Mesoamerican -style cultures, making them one of the few multicultural races. Also, I am reminded of how leopards hide their kills in trees to protect them from hyenas - one could have an intriguing Tabaxi-Gnoll war or rivalry.

I'd never noticed how many jungle creatures are in the book - Couatl, Jungle Giants, Black Dragons, Grippli, Kirre, Tabaxi, etc.

07-31-2009, 11:24 PM

Ginkomortus

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

By the way, am I the only one who thinks the illustration of a female Tabaxi is quite cute, albeit in a comic-book supervillainess ("Fear the claws of Jaguargirl") kind of way.

Y'know, the more I look at this, the more something makes sense... the reason both Lizardmen and Tabaxi have great CE versions of themselves? Because Tabaxi are really lizards!

Do you see any nipples on that so-called cat woman? No!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Tabaxis are carnivores, they wouldn't be able to eat ordinary crops. Unless they developed some form of "meat plant", a Tabaxi civilisation would have to be based on some form of animal husbandry. Maybe they were reliant on one animal (A giant mouse, jungle cricket, river carp or whatever) and when some illness or environmental change caused a drop in their food-animal, their civilisation collapsed.

Guinea pigs!

08-01-2009, 12:28 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Tabaxis are carnivores, they wouldn't be able to eat ordinary crops. Unless they developed some form of "meat plant", a Tabaxi civilisation would have to be based on some form of animal husbandry. Maybe they were reliant on one animal (A giant mouse, jungle cricket, river carp or whatever) and when some illness or environmental change caused a drop in their food-animal, their civilisation collapsed.

Maybe they tilled the soil to feed their food animals. Herding probably doesn't work very well in the dense jungle.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus

Y'know, the more I look at this, the more something makes sense... the reason both Lizardmen and Tabaxi have great CE versions of themselves? Because Tabaxi are really lizards!

There are some other options. Jaguars are an interesting species. They're generally considered the third largest of the big cats, but while leopards vary little in size, jaguars get bigger the further south you go. The Mexican ones may be smaller than a leopard, but the Brazilian males are commonly as big as a small lion, an increase in mass by a factor of three or four. At least for the Mesoamerican variety, the tabaxi lords may be intruders or interlopers. Hugs sports from a greater race further into the jungle.

The other alternative is cultural. Again going Mesoamerican, ritual sacrifice and bloodletting has been a significant part of the pre-Columbian cultures going back to the Olmec (just like that popular ball game). Whatever modern cultural relativism believes, D&D alignment has always been very black and white. Humanoid sacrifice is evil, period. Perhaps those who perform these rituals are rewarded by the evil gods, the smoking mirrors of the jungles (which explains the rivalry with the feathered serpents). The tabaxi priests are granted magical power, but also physical power. They grow to enormous size. They wear their robes, stand on the tops of the ziggurats with blood dripping from their claws, and lead the rituals that prepare the tribes for war.

08-01-2009, 12:59 AM

HaplessVictim

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

What is it with this "Neutral race of primitives dominated by a more powerful Chaotic Evil version". Is it part of Demonic plot to take over the scaled and furred tribes of the swamps and jungle? The Tabaxi Lord can mate with Tabaxis, and all his offspring are more Tabaxi Lords. If these creatures are highly libidinous then within a few generations the jungles could be packed with these malicious creatures. Maybe most Tabaxi tribes drive them out or slay them, or the Couatl are successful in keeping their numbers down. The Couatl may even be revered by some tribes of Tabaxi as representatives of the "powers related to sunlight, rain, or animals" that they revere.

Or maybe -- changing some of the MC text -- the Tabaxi aren't the original species, but rather the result of the Tabaxi Lord's insatiable cross-species breeding with captured humanoids. Tabaxi Lords are pure predators; they prowl the dark jungle evenings for fresh meat and blood, they stalk, they devour, and they revel in the kill. But why do they seem to center their activities around the ruins of ancient civilizations when there's game everywhere? Because ruins attract adventuring parties. In addition to the joy of hunting and killing an exotic and worthy foe, these parties supply prey of a different kind. This.. breeding stock is caught in traps constructed by the Lords' Tabaxi slaves, the men are torn apart and eaten, but the women face a far grimmer fate.

The offspring from these horrible pairings become Tabaxi who, brought up by he Lords, become another generation of cowering slaves dedicated to keeping their Lords in meat and heirs. If only some band of missionary adventurers would come along and teach the Tabaxi about rebellion, and show them how dependent the Lords are on them for their very survival..

EDIT: In my original conception of this idea, I'd assumed that Tabaxi are sterile among themselves, only producing children when mating with Tabaxi Lords (just as in the original text's description). However, this means that if some do-gooding adventurers come in and rescue them from their cruel overlords, they will become extinct within a generation. So what do the do-gooders do? Which is more evil: to wipe out a whole neutral species, or to allow their cruel cycle of reproduction to continue forever more? This is getting darker than most AD&D campaigns would be willing to do, I think.

08-01-2009, 02:55 AM

JohnBiles

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Tabaxis are carnivores, they wouldn't be able to eat ordinary crops. Unless they developed some form of "meat plant", a Tabaxi civilisation would have to be based on some form of animal husbandry. Maybe they were reliant on one animal (A giant mouse, jungle cricket, river carp or whatever) and when some illness or environmental change caused a drop in their food-animal, their civilisation collapsed.

jungles are very poor for animal husbandry. So this would have likely meant their civilization would have been riding the ragged edge of potential disaster and been even more prone to eco disaster.

I suppose fishing would probably be the easiest source of large amounts of meat for them.

08-01-2009, 03:26 AM

Kapten

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I read in a magazine some years ago that you can breed leguans in jungle and get something like 10 times the meat of cattle in the same area. That could be a way to get meat out of the jungle.

08-01-2009, 05:42 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ginkomortus

Y'know, the more I look at this, the more something makes sense... the reason both Lizardmen and Tabaxi have great CE versions of themselves? Because Tabaxi are really lizards!

Do you see any nipples on that so-called cat woman? No!

Nah, Tabaxi can't be lizards. Don't you see those mammaries? The non-visible nipples doesn't prove a thing. I've met a lot of housecats in my time, and you can't see their nipples either, since they're covered in fur.

Now let's see, what D&D creatures can have fur and/or scales... Hmm, there are several Oriental Dragons that have both those traits. That explains it then, Tabaxi and Lizardmen are both a kind of Dragon-man! :o

It just shows that 4E wasn't being original by giving female dragonborn breasts. :p;)

08-01-2009, 05:50 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten

I read in a magazine some years ago that you can breed leguans in jungle and get something like 10 times the meat of cattle in the same area. That could be a way to get meat out of the jungle.

What's a "leguan"? You didn't mean to type iguanas, by any chance?

08-01-2009, 06:01 AM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

What's a "leguan"? You didn't mean to type iguanas, by any chance?

"Leguan" is the Swedish word for iguana.

08-01-2009, 06:41 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Presumably both the leopard and jaguar forms of Tabaxi originate from the same source, they even have the same name for themselves, although they pronounce it differently. Maybe they were once humans, who were transformed into catfolk by the worship of a feline deity (either Leopard or Jaguar, depending upon which was the big cheese in the local jungle)? Perhaps their civilization collapsed because they turned from human into Tabaxi, since they could no longer subsist off agriculture? The images of jaguar-men in those old Tabaxi ruins may represent humans dressed as jaguar-warriors, divine spirits and the rare, and highly revered were-jaguars or were-leopards who were considered to have a paw in both worlds?

Now the D&D version of the Aztec god Tezcatlipoca is an obvious possibility. Not only is the god Chaotic Evil in D&D, like the Tabaxi Lords, his animal was the jaguar and he was associated with "Jaguar Warriors". The Tabaxi could have turned away from his worship after their civilization collapsed and they reverted to being simple hunters and fishermen. Texcatlipoca was a god propiated by sacrifice, human and otherwise, and the fallen Tabaxi may simply have lacked the population or military strength to obtain the human lives he demanded.

Which reminds me, there was an old issue of Dragon with a scenario about an Aztec-esque culture which included werejaguars as elite warriors. This wasn't the Forgotten Realm's Maztica. The scenario was a "Special Attraction" in Dragon magazine #70 called Mechica, and the werejaguars were a new monster.

Alternatively, there were secret societies of "leopard men" in Africa, an AD&D version of which could also be the original source of the Tabaxi, or at least the "Ta-BAX-ee" leopard version of them. In real life these leopard-cults were likely a lot less bloodthirsty than the sensationalist tales about them would indicate, but a fantasy riff of them could easily be the source of the CE Tabaxi lords and/or wereleopards, which then diminish into regular Tabaxi.

08-02-2009, 09:58 AM

Strangething

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten

I read in a magazine some years ago that you can breed leguans in jungle and get something like 10 times the meat of cattle in the same area. That could be a way to get meat out of the jungle.

Now I am picturing a tabaxi / lizardman war. So there's the human(oid) sacrifice angle, too.

Didn't some 3e sourcebook reimagine the lizard king as a type of fiendish lizardfolk? There's another explanation for the tabaxi lords.

(My three-ring-binder MM doesn't have the Tabaxi. :(It skips from Sylph to Tarrasque.)

08-02-2009, 12:45 PM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Iguanas, yes -- good food source for jungle cultures. Insect farming might be useful; insects are very protein rich. Also, insects can be raised in small areas - each hut could have its own insect-raising area. Preferably some type of insect that feeds on detritus -- big jungle cockroaches? (Gross to us, but there's no reason a tabaxi would think the same way.)

And this assumes that tabaxi are true felines, though anthropomorphic. They could just as well be cat-mimicking primates (derived from one of the long-tailed monkeys, like a spider monkey) as primate-mimicking cats. (Also, the cat-form is pretty effective and has been developed independently; there were marsupial 'saber-toothed cats' in South America. The tabaxi could be marsupial cats.) True felines do require a meat diet, but other mammal carnivores don't necessarily - dogs can live on plant-derived dog food for example. So marsupial-tabaxi or monkey-tabaxi might be able to live mostly by agriculture...

Re powerful Chaotic Evil versions of jungle races: perhaps this is a relic of some powerful ancient CE deity, demon-lord, or Lovecraftian-type alien-god with influence over jungles. (That yuan-ti patron deity/demon whose name I can't remember, maybe.)

Also, jungles are a great place for Chaotic Evil to spread its influence. Before the development of modern medicine, people not native to the jungles very rarely went into them -- too many diseases. Lawful Evil might be accepted by Lawful Neutral or Neutral societies, since it's less likely to disrupt the status quo; but nobody gets along with Chaotic Evil (not even other Chaotic Evil, usually). So it's best for them to build their forces in remote, hostile regions ignored by the temperate zone civilizations ... until they can pour into those lands with immense armies.

Maybe Tabaxi Lords are larger for nutritional reasons -- in lean times, normal Tabaxi go hungry, and their children's growth is stunted. Tabaxi Lords eat the normal Tabaxi instead, and feed their children better. (The size difference is too big for this to be the only reason, unless tabaxi have really weird growth patterns - but it might be a factor, reinforcing a pre-existing advantage in size and strength due to the Lords' ability to kill and eat other Tabaxi and to rule by fear, taking the best food.)

08-02-2009, 07:29 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

Maybe Tabaxi Lords are larger for nutritional reasons -- in lean times, normal Tabaxi go hungry, and their children's growth is stunted. Tabaxi Lords eat the normal Tabaxi instead, and feed their children better. (The size difference is too big for this to be the only reason, unless tabaxi have really weird growth patterns - but it might be a factor, reinforcing a pre-existing advantage in size and strength due to the Lords' ability to kill and eat other Tabaxi and to rule by fear, taking the best food.)

Unlike lizards and crocodiles, most mammals stop growing when they reach maturity. But not all... elephants, for example, follow the more typically saurian grow pattern of rapid growth until maturity, and then slow growth for the rest of their lives. That huge skeleton mounted in the rotunda of the Smithsonian Natural History Museum in Washington is from an animal that weighed 13 tons when alive, roughly twice the weight of a typical full-grown bull. Maybe the tabaxi lords are ancient. The almost immortal survivors of that long-fallen civilization. So long ago that even with their longevity whiskers are turning white, and backs are streaked with silver. These primordials have grown immense over the centuries, while their minds have become stolid and intractable. This physical superiority and their natural contempt for their feral and uncivilized descendants has prompted them to take on the role of god-kings, as they dream of past glories while wallowing in all the squalid grandeur their degenerate children can muster.

Or perhaps, in order to ensure their continued dominance, the alpha cat (tabaxi lord) simply keeps the rest of the tribe on the verge of starvation while gorging itself on protein. This stunts the growth of the dominated tabaxi at a pre-pubescent levels, and makes their twice-tall lord appear huge compared to the rest of the tribe. Even ignoring the height differential, the alpha is simply stronger and healthier. Stocky, heavy muscled. Powerful, broad. Like a jaguar. In contrast to a typical member of the tribe, who are all skin and bones, with ribs, patchy hair, and semi-atrophied muscles. Now imagine the stir caused in the jungles circles when a whole tribe of the so-called "lords" appear. The lords of the scrawny tribes are in a panic as the fringes of their scattered society are threatened by a simple egalitarian ethos.

08-02-2009, 09:43 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

Iguanas, yes -- good food source for jungle cultures. Insect farming might be useful; insects are very protein rich. Also, insects can be raised in small areas - each hut could have its own insect-raising area. Preferably some type of insect that feeds on detritus -- big jungle cockroaches? (Gross to us, but there's no reason a tabaxi would think the same way.)

Oh yes, there are all kinds of possibilities, especially considering the supernaturally efficient metabolisms some D&D critters seem to have. Giant beetles or fish? No, I've got it - Giant Crawdads. My cats have always loved shrimp.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

And this assumes that tabaxi are true felines, though anthropomorphic. They could just as well be cat-mimicking primates (derived from one of the long-tailed monkeys, like a spider monkey) as primate-mimicking cats. (Also, the cat-form is pretty effective and has been developed independently; there were marsupial 'saber-toothed cats' in South America. The tabaxi could be marsupial cats.) True felines do require a meat diet, but other mammal carnivores don't necessarily - dogs can live on plant-derived dog food for example. So marsupial-tabaxi or monkey-tabaxi might be able to live mostly by agriculture...

Well firstly, I said 2E Tabaxi are carnivores because their Monstrous Manual entry says Diet: Carnivorous, not because of their feline traits. The 2E MM entry for Dogs, incidentally, lists them as Omnivorous, except for the carnivorous Death Dog.

Secondly, the Tabaxi are not built like cats - they're bipeds with hands, for a start. If anything, they're more like primate-mimicking felines than vica versa.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

Maybe Tabaxi Lords are larger for nutritional reasons -- in lean times, normal Tabaxi go hungry, and their children's growth is stunted. Tabaxi Lords eat the normal Tabaxi instead, and feed their children better. (The size difference is too big for this to be the only reason, unless tabaxi have really weird growth patterns - but it might be a factor, reinforcing a pre-existing advantage in size and strength due to the Lords' ability to kill and eat other Tabaxi and to rule by fear, taking the best food.)

I'm leaning towards some kind of demonic ancestry, since it would explain the innate magical powers. The Tabaxi Lords' spellcasting could be something they learn. I do like the idea that at least part of their greater size is due to a better diet, although the MM also says that Tabaxi Lords are often solitary, and those loners obviously would not have a tribe to feed off.

I know what! Maybe Tabaxi Lords are like cuckoos. They're really a different species that parasitises Tabaxi. When they 'mate' they are actually infesting some unfortunate female with their own egg, and the young Tabaxi Lord is somehow able to trick the Tabaxi tribe into raising it to adulthood, maybe through some kind of charm power that fades away when the cub reaches maturity. Then, some the Tabaxi Lords stay to rule over the tribe, but most are driven into the jungle where they seek out more Tabaxi females to repeat their reproductive cycle.

Lizard Kings and Barghests could be the same kind of creature, but just exploit Lizardmen and Goblins instead.

08-03-2009, 05:11 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well firstly, I said 2E Tabaxi are carnivores because their Monstrous Manual entry says Diet: Carnivorous, not because of their feline traits. The 2E MM entry for Dogs, incidentally, lists them as Omnivorous, except for the carnivorous Death Dog.

Oh, OK. My main point was that 'carnivorous' doesn't usually mean 'can ONLY eat meat', just that it's their main food. The purest carnivores I can think of are non-mammalian - things like birds of prey, snakes, and alligators.

Quote:

I know what! Maybe Tabaxi Lords are like cuckoos. They're really a different species that parasitises Tabaxi. When they 'mate' they are actually infesting some unfortunate female with their own egg, and the young Tabaxi Lord is somehow able to trick the Tabaxi tribe into raising it to adulthood, maybe through some kind of charm power that fades away when the cub reaches maturity. Then, some the Tabaxi Lords stay to rule over the tribe, but most are driven into the jungle where they seek out more Tabaxi females to repeat their reproductive cycle.

Awesome idea.

08-03-2009, 05:42 AM

Kapten

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

What is it with this "Neutral race of primitives dominated by a more powerful Chaotic Evil version".
Is it part of Demonic plot to take over the scaled and furred tribes of the swamps and jungle?

I think it basically has to do with making it easier to have Neutral creatures as opponents. With a CE leader, it comes naturally to the Neutrals to fight PCs.

08-03-2009, 06:35 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten

I think it basically has to do with making it easier to have Neutral creatures as opponents. With a CE leader, it comes naturally to the Neutrals to fight PCs.

Because otherwise everyone gets bonus-versus-evil weapons, and we can't have the PCs getting all those bonuses can we?

08-04-2009, 01:54 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Tako

"LA is a hell of a place to go get yourself a taco..." Oh wait, not that kind of taco. The one with a 'k' and eight legs.

Tako are a weird concept - intelligent octopi who can move about on land and for some reason have a single eye in the middle of their foreheads. They are a little bit pseudo-Japanese-ish in flavour; for one thing there's the name (Japanese for 'octopus', though also for 'kite'), and for another there's the whole "Honourable Lawful Neutral types who will avenge any slight" shtick.

There are quite a number of titbits that arouse comment:

- Tako have a glorious movement of 3, which almost makes you wonder why they bother coming on land at all. If a dwarf can run circles around you, you really are better off staying in the sea, I think. Still, at least they're not as bad as the merfolk with their movement of 1.
- The things can have up to 7 attacks, by weapon, which is pretty impressive for a 270 XP monster. They may be slow, but you'd better not get cornered by one.
- "Tako have their own language based on tentacle movements and skin-color changes. Characters with an Intelligence of at least 17 (or with the reading/writing proficiency) have a 25% chance of understanding the tako's language." Ridiculous. Reading/writing proficiency (presumably in 'common') allows interpretation of Tako tentacle language. Absurd.
- Tako tentacles have a strength of 18/00. That's as strong as a Pit Fiend in 2e. Just though it was worth noting.
- Tako are Lawful Neutral, so they can be by turns villains (avenging slights), neutrals (keeping to themselves) or allies (helping fight evil underwater races) in a game. Their ink is also useful for writing with - perhaps a nice little sideline available there for an unscrupulous PC.

Anyway, I like them, because there is something scary about cephalopods that even years of cliche can't quite diminish. Like the kraken dragging ships beneath the waves, implacable and inscrutable tentacled cyclopien samurai sound nicely alien and horrid. Another example of why D&D campaigns need more water-based adventuring.

08-04-2009, 02:02 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tako have a glorious movement of 3, which almost makes you wonder why they bother coming on land at all. If a dwarf can run circles around you, you really are better off staying in the sea, I think. Still, at least they're not as bad as the merfolk with their movement of 1.

In real life, octopi generally move pretty slowly when they're not blurring toward you with murder in their eyes. Give them an ability that provides for short bursts of very fast speed, and I'd be on board with this.

08-04-2009, 05:17 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I had totally forgotten about tako, which is weird, because I loved them when I was a wee one. I was always highly cephalopod-oriented, even at that tender age. They strike me as perfect for amphibious games, ones that take place at the water's edge. They should totally be trading partners or colonial rivals of the crabmen.

08-04-2009, 05:24 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tako

There are quite a number of titbits that arouse comment:

- Tako have a glorious movement of 3, which almost makes you wonder why they bother coming on land at all. If a dwarf can run circles around you, you really are better off staying in the sea, I think. Still, at least they're not as bad as the merfolk with their movement of 1.
- The things can have up to 7 attacks, by weapon, which is pretty impressive for a 270 XP monster. They may be slow, but you'd better not get cornered by one.
- "Tako have their own language based on tentacle movements and skin-color changes. Characters with an Intelligence of at least 17 (or with the reading/writing proficiency) have a 25% chance of understanding the tako's language." Ridiculous. Reading/writing proficiency (presumably in 'common') allows interpretation of Tako tentacle language. Absurd.
- Tako tentacles have a strength of 18/00. That's as strong as a Pit Fiend in 2e. Just though it was worth noting.

Hmm, regarding points the last two points. One way the "Understanding Tako" bit would make sense is if the tentacle language is based on Common. So, a Tako telling you to get lost will turn an angry red and twist its tentacles to spell out "Go" in the Common alphabet. The difficulty may just be it's hard for humans to read its signs, since it spells words out so fast and fluidly, often flashing letters in strange forms with multiple tentacles at once. Or, Takos may have some understanding of human language and the 25% is if a Tako is trying to tell you something.

Overall, it would probably be easier if the Tako just writes down what it wants to say in Common. Perhaps there are Tako "scribes" who act as interpreters.

Oh and the 18/00 strength is just for the Tako's grip (e.g. it's very hard to escape from their grappling). They don't get strength or damage bonuses to weapons from this Strength. Which is just as well, considering their 7 attacks per round.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tako are Lawful Neutral, so they can be by turns villains (avenging slights), neutrals (keeping to themselves) or allies (helping fight evil underwater races) in a game. Their ink is also useful for writing with - perhaps a nice little sideline available there for an unscrupulous PC.

Anyway, I like them, because there is something scary about cephalopods that even years of cliché can't quite diminish. Like the kraken dragging ships beneath the waves, implacable and inscrutable tentacled cyclopiian samurai sound nicely alien and horrid. Another example of why D&D campaigns need more water-based adventuring.

Yes, they're a nice monster I never used as much as I would have liked to. I can only remember them turning up in a significant way in one published adventure I've seen - where a Tako child has wandered onto land and Tako warbands are combing the countryside looking for it. It was a scenario in an oldish Dungeon magazine, if I remember aright.

08-04-2009, 05:24 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi

In real life, octopi generally move pretty slowly when they're not blurring toward you with murder in their eyes. Give them an ability that provides for short bursts of very fast speed, and I'd be on board with this.

Jet Tako!

08-04-2009, 08:27 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

What setting are they from?

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

What setting are they from?

Kara-Tur, if I remember correctly.

Although the land-walking weapon-wielding Cephalopod has a an older pedigree in RPGs. I can remember octopus-monsters similar to Takos seeing print in The Fantasy Trip and Bushido role-playing games. Except those versions had the conventional binocular eyes, and didn't have separate stats for male and female.

08-05-2009, 12:41 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kapten

I think it basically has to do with making it easier to have Neutral creatures as opponents. With a CE leader, it comes naturally to the Neutrals to fight PCs.

Pretty much this, yes. And since 2e didn't handle levels on monster races, you ended up with lizard kings, flind and tabaxi lords, all of whom are evil boss-monster versions of the base races.

And now I'm thinking of a tropical campaign setting, with tabaxi and gnolls and lizardmen and bullywugs and maybe aarakocra as the non-human races, instead of elves, dwarves and orcs...

08-05-2009, 04:44 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tako[*]Tako tentacles have a strength of 18/00. That's as strong as a Pit Fiend in 2e. Just though it was worth noting.

Well, octopi are pretty strong - 18/00 doesn't seem totally ludicrous for one that size. (Though I always thought the assigned Strengths for fiends, humanoid monsters, etc. were a little wonky in 2e. That's probably because 1 point, especially in the 17+ range, was a lot more significant than in 3.x.)

08-05-2009, 05:41 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

Well, octopi are pretty strong - 18/00 doesn't seem totally ludicrous for one that size. (Though I always thought the assigned Strengths for fiends, humanoid monsters, etc. were a little wonky in 2e. That's probably because 1 point, especially in the 17+ range, was a lot more significant than in 3.x.)

The original 1E MM was fairly consistent, but there was subtle power creep as the edition progressed (compare the MM2 giants with their MM1 counterparts). 2E inherited and magnified this with inconsistent power upgrades. Dragons and demons were only the more prominent; a lot of humanoid monsters also got strength bonuses to damage, though this is very spotty.

08-05-2009, 10:58 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Although the land-walking weapon-wielding Cephalopod has a an older pedigree in RPGs. I can remember octopus-monsters similar to Takos seeing print in The Fantasy Trip and Bushido role-playing games. Except those versions had the conventional binocular eyes, and didn't have separate stats for male and female.

They're from Japanese folklore... "bake-tako" I seem to recall. Although Google helpfully corrects that to "taco bake", which is of no help whatsoever.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, regarding points the last two points. One way the "Understanding Tako" bit would make sense is if the tentacle language is based on Common. So, a Tako telling you to get lost will turn an angry red and twist its tentacles to spell out "Go" in the Common alphabet. The difficulty may just be is it's hard for humans to read its signs, since it spells words out so fast and fluidly, often flashing letters in strange forms with multiple tentacles at once. Or, Takos may have some understanding of human language and the 25% is if a Tako is trying to tell you something.

Overall, it would probably be easier if the Tako just writes down what it wants to say in Common. Perhaps there are Tako "scribes" who act as interpreters.

I suspect that they're really Vermicious Knids... in octopus suits.

08-05-2009, 05:44 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

I suspect that they're really Vermicious Knids... in octopus suits.

Nah, there's no way Vermicious Knids are Lawful Neutral. Although Knids in octopus suits could stand in for the Tako's "evil boss-monster" à la the Tabaxi Lord. :o

08-05-2009, 08:50 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

They're from Japanese folklore... "bake-tako" I seem to recall. Although Google helpfully corrects that to "taco bake", which is of no help whatsoever.

"Monster octopus." Ah, those wily Japanese and their creative names.

08-06-2009, 12:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

They're from Japanese folklore... "bake-tako" I seem to recall. Although Google helpfully corrects that to "taco bake", which is of no help whatsoever.

If I remember correctly, the landwalking octopus in Bushido was called a "Tako" as well, which just means "octopus" in Japanese. However, they had the conventional two eyes, unlike the Cyclopean AD&D version. I've seen a few Japanese pictures and cartoons with monstrous octopodes, but I can't remember ever seeing a one-eyed version of the Tako, or one when the males and females are so different, so I'm wondering if this is something they made up for the Monstrous Manual or whether it has any mythological basis.

There are other Japanese monsters with a single eye, so it's quite possible there's a tradition of Cyclopean Goblin Takos out there but I've just never come across it.

08-07-2009, 05:49 AM

rex monday

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Man, I really love the concept of semi-aquatic octosamurai with a revenge fetish, but I'll be damned if I don't crack up every time I read that name out loud. Juvenile, I know, but it's a deal breaker.

08-07-2009, 08:32 AM

DanSolo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I for one am not the slightest surprised they have 18/00 strength. They have no bones forchrissakes and they walk around no problem.

08-08-2009, 02:32 AM

Ginkomortus

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yes, but can they find Thay on a map?

08-12-2009, 07:48 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, Wiki Answers says;

In Ancient Times the Octopus symbolized the water demon and the enemy of life.

But the only other source I can find discusses the whole Hentai subculture (tentacles?) Risking my sanity, I ventured in (no illustrations, thankfully) and found;

The Japanese UMI BOZU is a huge sea ghost who haunts Japanese sailors. It is bald and has enormous, terrifying eyes.

I think an octopus with an afro would be scarier myself, or with practically any type of hair.

And this <http://www.orientationsgallery.com/Other/brushpot.htm>, well, words can't do it justice, but I feel an urge to use these guys as a travelling justice court in the badlands of my campaign...

08-14-2009, 12:44 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako
Well, Wiki Answers says;

In Ancient Times the Octopus symbolized the water demon and the enemy of life.

But the only other source I can find discusses the whole Hentai subculture (tentacles?) Risking my sanity, I ventured in (no illustrations, thankfully) and found;

The Japanese UMI BOZU is a huge sea ghost who haunts Japanese sailors. It is bald and has enormous, terrifying eyes.

I think an octopus with an afro would be scarier myself, or with practically any type of hair.

And this <http://www.orientationsgallery.com/Other/brushpot.htm>, well, words can't do it justice, but I feel an urge to use these guys as a travelling justice court in the badlands of my campaign...

Umi Bozu isn't a variety of monster octopus, I don't think. A bozu is a buddhist priest, and umi just means "sea", so I'm envisaging a kind of ghostly ocean-dwelling giant monk with huge eyes.

I'll get on with the entries later today, sorry for the delay.

08-15-2009, 11:19 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Tanar'ri

As with the Baatezu and Yuguloth entries in the MM, it's difficult to know what to make of the Tanar'ri. Only two types are detailed (Balor and Marilith) and they are worth a whopping 46,000 and 45,000 XP each; no wonder Planescape had the image of being "too high level for my blood" - it was all down to the messed up XP amounts in the MM! The XP was fixed in the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums but by then the damage was done.

With this entry you get a brief run down on what the Tanar'ri are: "chaos and evil defined", then a list of different varieties (all in the Planescape MC I I think, though not stated up here). Then onto the blurb on the Balor and Marilith.

Balor

Balors are the typical 'devil' type demon, disappointingly similar to the Pit Fiend when you think about it - and also a blatantly obvious riff on the Balrog, complete with whip and sword. I have to be honest and say that I think they're among the least interesting of all the different lower planar entities, despite their high status. They're exactly what you would expect a mighty demon to look like. Nothing more, nothing less.

They also have a rather annoying "Yah boo sucks" routine, so that even if the party of PCs manages to kill one they're still likely to be levelled by the mighty explosion or one of them destroyed for picking up its sword.

The Prime Material Plane angle is intriguing: Balors are said to recognise its importance in the Blood War, which leads them to make pacts with mortals. Obviously a way to crowbar one into a game, but you do have to wonder why Balors bother being manipulative and clever when they could squish the entire population of an average Prime Material World without even thinking.

Marilith

Mariliths are the 'strategists' of the Blood War, which seems like an oxymoron - aren't Tanar'ri supposed to be the definition of chaos? So what strategy? The MM even recognises this problem, but brushes it under the carpet: "Due to the chaotic nature of the tanar'ri, it is not really possible to coordinate their activities, but the marilith are charged with it, nonetheless."

Ah, so that's okay then.

Not a great deal to say about the Marilith, beautiful snake woman with six arms, blah blah. They have a rivalry with the Glabrezu which I suppose is something that could be used in a game, with high level PCs being used as a tool in a conflict between two greater demons. That's really about it.

Anyway, maybe the beautiful entries on the Tanar'ri, Baatezu et al. in the Planescape books has really ruined the Monstrous Manual versions for me forever, because I have difficulty summoning much enthusiasm for this entry. A shame, because I really always liked the Tanar'ri the best.

I'm not looking forward to the Yuguloth entry...

08-15-2009, 11:22 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Oh, and I put up a poll.

08-15-2009, 11:41 AM

JohnBiles

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

It only had two Tanar'ri in it? Dang, what weaksauce.

08-15-2009, 03:46 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

You're making me choose which fiend-group is my favorite? It's like making me choose a favorite child! A wicked, awful child, to be sure, but still...

I voted yugoloth, but only by a nose. The Planescape material made them out to be the supreme chessmasters of the universe, and I still use them in such capacity these days, but I find I have increasing appreciation for the rigidity and surety of the baatezu's brand of evil. I mean, when else in game does one have opportunity to quote Scientology orientation videos?

08-15-2009, 03:48 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I've always loved the denizens of the Abyss, for the sheer ingenious variety you'll find, so definitely Tanar'ri.

Probably followed by Obyriths, because they're also pretty damn cool, but I don't suppose there are any of them in this book.

08-15-2009, 03:50 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Baatezu, tanar'ri, and yugoloth sound like car companies.

Vroom vroom vroom. Hot rodders from Hell. Drag racing down the streets of the Abyss for pink slips (lemures?). The vrock are obviously the T-Birds, and the bone devils are the Scorpions.

08-15-2009, 03:57 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

As with the Baatezu and Yuguloth entries in the MM, it's difficult to know what to make of the Tanar'ri. Only two types are detailed (Balor and Marilith) and they are worth a whopping 46,000 and 45,000 XP each; no wonder Planescape had the image of being "too high level for my blood" - it was all down to the messed up XP amounts in the MM! The XP was fixed in the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums but by then the damage was done.

That's about ten times what it should be, isn't it? Sounds like the "killed permanently" multiplier from 1e.

08-15-2009, 03:58 PM

Kiiratam

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

"This here car is animated by the souls of the damned!" Seriously, though: possessing fiends can animate objects, so it's a viable concept.

Between mariliths and succubi, I am compelled to vote tanar'ri.

08-15-2009, 04:42 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Of 2nd editions Fiends I would have to back Tanar'ri, just for the sheer variety.

As for their Monstrous Manual entry, I wonder why they didn't have a low-powered and a high-powered fiend like the Baatezu entry's Pit Fiend and Abishai? It seems an odd choice to have the top two non-unique Demons when they could have dropped one to make room to stat a Bar-Igura, Babau or Chasme.

There are a couple of oddities I noticed about their MM writeup.

The Balor entry describes them as having "grotesque fangs that drip with venom". Shame they don't have a poisonous bite listed. Still, both baatezu and tanar'ri are immune to poison, so maybe they aren't in the habit of using it.

The Marilith entry says "Where the balors are the influence and energy behind the war effort, the marilith are the brains and tactics". If that's the case, why are Balors the more intelligent of the two? (Balors super-genius, Marilith genius). I suppose Balors are the soul-gathering, war-inspiring political leader to the Marilith's strategy-planning general. Or they're just too Chaotic to care.:p

08-15-2009, 04:59 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That's about ten times what it should be, isn't it? Sounds like the "killed permanently" multiplier from 1e.

Maybe not 10 times. I don't have any Planescape books on hand but I think they were fixed to about 15,000 XP ish.

08-15-2009, 05:05 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Maybe not 10 times. I don't have any Planescape books on hand but I think they were fixed to about 15,000 XP ish.

Yeesh. Just noticed. The 4+1 HD black abishai is worth more XP than the 20 HD titan. A very planar ka-ching!

08-15-2009, 07:41 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Oh, and I put up a poll.

And for those of us who prefer demodands/gegeleths (sp)? ;)

08-15-2009, 07:56 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

And for those of us who prefer demodands/gegeleths (sp)? ;)

Gehreleth I think? Gerheleth? Gerehleth? Well there are only three kinds of them and they don't embody a major Evil alignment, so...

08-16-2009, 12:09 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I always thought that the names "Tanar'ri" and "baatezu" seemed backwards. Baatezu sounds more brutish and thuggish to me, while Tanar'ri sounds clever and scheming. But apparently that's not how it works. Not that I ever could tell them apart, even when they're "devils" and "demons".

08-16-2009, 05:36 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius

I've always loved the denizens of the Abyss, for the sheer ingenious variety you'll find, so definitely Tanar'ri.

Probably followed by Obyriths, because they're also pretty damn cool, but I don't suppose there are any of them in this book.

Nope. Obyrith are a 3.5ism only. Oddly enough, they're sort of a conversion of the Green Ronin's Book of Fiends qliphoth, which were written by the same authors (Erik Mona, James Jacobs). Pretty much the only difference is that all qliphoth madness comes in the form of fascinate spells, whereas obyryths are more diverse in how they break your brain by just existing.

08-16-2009, 07:39 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Maybe not 10 times. I don't have any Planescape books on hand but I think they were fixed to about 15,000 XP ish.

As of Planescape MC 1, Mariliths are about 23,000, Balors 26,000.

I always liked the little tidbit that "There are at least 24 balors known to exist." Surely there are few better ways to show the PCs their power than to have them fight one of the multiverse's 24 balors. You could run a campaign about hunting down all 24.

The iron weapons vulnerability bit always kind of confused me. Will any iron weapon hurt a Tanar'ri, or does it need to be a magical iron weapon?

08-16-2009, 11:41 AM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I think I prefer the Baatezu by a nose, if only because I know more about them and they figured into my games more often. I think it helps that there's an inherent order to them. I always lose track of the demons around the weird frog and goat things. Not that I'm complaining about the succubus, of course. ;) Even so, I think I'm more an erinyes type.

08-16-2009, 01:59 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

I think I prefer the Baatezu by a nose, if only because I know more about them and they figured into my games more often. I think it helps that there's an inherent order to them. I always lose track of the demons around the weird frog and goat things. Not that I'm complaining about the succubus, of course. ;) Even so, I think I'm more an erinyes type.

I always preferred the erinyes too. The alu-fiend is also underrated, if you can get past the little bat wings. ;)

08-18-2009, 12:45 AM

HaplessVictim

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

For me, nothing quite sums up my dislike of 2e (over 1e) back in the day than the words "tanar'ri" and "baatezu." They're demons and devils, dammit, and they live in the Abyss or the Nine Hells. I know why the renamings were done and the pressures from lunatic moms that TSR was under but that doesn't mean I have to like it. They still sound to me like compromise and bowdlerizing. Bah, I say. BAH.

I'm disappointed that the 2e monstrous Manual has such a weak sampling of demons, as well. As I recall the 1e Monster Manual had six or seven devils and about that many types of demons. Why the 2e paucity? Is it because they showed up in Planescape products eventually?

08-18-2009, 01:16 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim

For me, nothing quite sums up my dislike of 2e (over 1e) back in the day than the words "tanar'ri" and "baatezu." They're demons and devils, dammit, and they live in the Abyss or the Nine Hells. I know why the renamings were done and the pressures from lunatic moms that TSR was under but that doesn't mean I have to like it. They still sound to me like compromise and bowdlerizing. Bah, I say. BAH.

I'm disappointed that the 2e monstrous Manual has such a weak sampling of demons, as well. As I recall the 1e Monster Manual had six or seven devils and about that many types of demons. Why the 2e paucity? Is it because they showed up in Planescape products eventually?

Well there were a shit-ton in the Planescape books but they can't have been in the works back in 1989 or whenever it was that the MM was published. I do think there was a 2e planar monstrous compendium released not long after the MM, however, and it contained a lot of tanar'ri and baatezu.

I never got the outrage about the name changes, to be honest. Tanar'ri aren't called devils anymore, okay, but they're still embodiments of chaos and evil who revel in pain and murder. It's not like the entire concept of evil beings from another dimension was removed from the game.

08-18-2009, 01:36 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Tarrasque

Well well well, look who it is. D&D's most powerful and most famous unique monster. A 50' long bipedal reptile with 300 hit points, a THACO of -5, 6 attacks doing a potential 118 points of damage per round, unlimited regenerative ability unless reduced to -30 hit points and wished to death, and immunity to practically all bolt spells. An awesome depiction of ultimate destructiveness or the point at which power creep started getting a bit ridiculous? You decide.

(I especially like the 'Note' at the end of the entry: "Creatures with a minus THACO can only be hit on a 1." I always assumed this was a typo and was meant to say that creatures with a minus THACO can only miss on a 1. In which case why give the thing -5 THACO when -1 is just as good?)

The Tarrasque is a good concept, anyway; I think there's always a place for gargantuan avenging beings which awaken only rarely, for a week or two, before disappearing again. The MM has these periods of activity 5d4 months apart, though, which seems a bit too frequent. I'd rather have the Tarrasque awaken cyclically once every 13 or 17 years, like a cicada. Either way, the Adventure to Slay the Tarrasque writes itself - DMing 101, you might say.

The main problem with the Tarrasque is that common to all really BIG monsters in D&D - namely, scaling. A 50' tall monster, no matter how slow moving, is surely going to be able to move faster than a 6' tall human, simply by virtue of the length of its strides. But the Tarrasque only has a move of 9. And the creature should surely be able to swallow humanoid beings with ease - but it is only given the chance to sever limbs on attack rolls which score a natural 18+. D&D has never been very good at emulating size, but the Tarrasque is the point at which suspension of disbelief snaps, for me.

One thing you can say about the Tarrasque, however, is that it would make the ultimate entry in my soon-to-be-released tome, "Compendium of Things You can Do with Monster Corpses Volume I" - how does 1d4 shields of +5 enchantment and 10d10 diamonds worth 1,000 gp each sound? Another plus point is the entry's rather nice line in cheesy ominousness and the return of the sages (in the form of "tarrasque experts", no less!):

Quote:

It is hoped that the tarrasque is a solitary creation, some hideous abomination unleashed by the dark arts or by elder, forgotten gods to punish all of nature. The elemental nature of the tarrasque leads the few living tarrasque experts to speculate that the elemental princes of evil have something to do with its existence. In any case, the location of the tarrasque remains a mystery, as it rarely leaves witnesses in its wake, and nature quickly grows over all remnants of its presence. It is rumored that the tarrasque is responsible for the extinction of one ancient civilization, for the records of their last days spoke of a "great reptilian punisher sent by the gods to end the world."

This is the kind of thing that makes the MM so great. What ancient civilisation? That's for YOU, the DM, to decide. Who are the "elemental princes of evil"? That's for YOU, the DM, to decide. You don't get better spurs to imagination.

08-18-2009, 01:40 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I never got the outrage about the name changes, to be honest. Tanar'ri aren't called devils anymore, okay, but they're still embodiments of chaos and evil who revel in pain and murder. It's not like the entire concept of evil beings from another dimension was removed from the game.

I think you got the devils and demons mixed up.

If they called the dragons the Bormophorin, and the reds became the Mugulons, the blacks the Sosyruths, the whites the Lumula, the greens the Gussuloth, and the blues the Aizugon -- wouldn't that be silly, unnecessary, and distracting?

Also, the name changes weren't just cosmetic. The changes were accompanied by a strongly implied setting that didn't necessarily fit everyone's view of the planes or the role of demons and devils.

08-18-2009, 02:08 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I think you got the devils and demons mixed up.

If they called the dragons the Bormophorin, and the reds became the Mugulons, the blacks the Sosyruths, the whites the Lumula, the greens the Gussuloth, and the blues the Aizugon -- wouldn't that be silly, unnecessary, and distracting?

Also, the name changes weren't just cosmetic. The changes were accompanied by a strongly implied setting that didn't necessarily fit everyone's view of the planes or the role of demons and devils.

There was an implied setting before, of course - a much more strongly faux-Christian one. It's arguably the case that tanar'ri and baatezu are more 'pure' fantasy.

Anyway, I can easily see this discussion derailing the thread, so if people want to continue it shall we start up a new one?

08-18-2009, 02:27 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The main problem with the Tarrasque is that common to all really BIG monsters in D&D - namely, scaling. A 50' tall monster, no matter how slow moving, is surely going to be able to move faster than a 6' tall human, simply by virtue of the length of its strides. But the Tarrasque only has a move of 9.

It's a lot more complex than you think. A lot of people assume larger animals have more robust bones, for instance. The square-cube law and all. Twice the size means eight times the mass but only four times the strength. So the bones have to be thicker and the muscles stronger. But the evidence really doesn't support that. Yes, a hippo's bones are much thicker than a deer's which are thicker than a dog's. But elephants, the biggest of all land animals, actually have fairly slender bones (when allometrically scaled, closer to the deer than any of the others).

The way they prevent their bones from breaking is partially stance (their legs go straight down, instead of being bent -- and bent legs help with running), and partially duty factor (how long a foot stays on the ground during a stride). This means gait changes. The largest animals lose the ability to run or gallop. Elephants rarely even trot.

Even at the same gait, the number of strides per time interval drops as creatures get larger. The feet of a mouse just at the threshold between a trot and a gallop are hitting the ground a lot more often than a horse in the same situation. This partially explains why larger creatures are more efficient runners, but also explains why running speed doesn't scale directly with the linear dimension.. Yes, longer legs mean a faster normal walking rate because the least energy intensive way to move is to let your legs swing like pendulums. But the larger the pendulum the lower the frequency, so this also doesn't scale at a direct linear rate.

I've also seen it argued that speed correlates with a root of the linear dimension, but given how hard it is to measure top and speeds and the limited sample sizes, it's hard to generalize. I've also seen several authors suggest there is considerable circumstantial evidence that the optimal size for speed is roughly human size (cheetahs, pronghorns, etc). The tarrasque is about the size of the largest sauropods (I'm ignoring the unrealistic proportions). Sauropods probably lived life very slowly. Falling or even mistepping could be dangerous. This may or may not apply to a fantasy creature, but particularly with its upright stance there's a good argument that the tarrasque hobbles along at a slow shuffle. Think a little old man without his walker.

08-18-2009, 08:01 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

[Who are the "elemental princes of evil"? That's for YOU, the DM, to decide.

They are Imix (fire), Ogremoch (earth), Olhydra (water), Yan-C-Bin (air) and Cryonax (ice). And IIRC they were in the 1e FF. I know they are in the elemental MC for planescape because that is where I got the names from.

08-18-2009, 09:15 PM

Belchion

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tarrasque

The Tarrasque is a good concept, anyway; I think there's always a place for gargantuan avenging beings which awaken only rarely, for a week or two, before disappearing again.

Are Gargantuans baby Tarrasques? After all, they are both filling this niche more or less.

08-18-2009, 11:40 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

They are Imix (fire), Ogremoch (earth), Olhydra (water), Yan-C-Bin (air) and Cryonax (ice). And IIRC they were in the 1e FF. I know they are in the elemental MC for planescape because that is where I got the names from.

Okay, I suppose I was speaking extemporaneously there. Haven't read the Planescape MC III in years.

08-18-2009, 11:51 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

It's a lot more complex than you think. A lot of people assume larger animals have more robust bones, for instance. The square-cube law and all. Twice the size means eight times the mass but only four times the strength. So the bones have to be thicker and the muscles stronger. But the evidence really doesn't support that. Yes, a hippo's bones are much thicker than a deer's which are thicker than a dog's. But elephants, the biggest of all land animals, actually have fairly slender bones (when allometrically scaled, closer to the deer than any of the others).

The odd one out here is the hippo, which has extra-heavy leg bones to keep it right-side-up in water.

Note also that while elephants can't run, they can walk really fast.

08-19-2009, 12:51 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I don't think that gargantua work as baby tarrasques, because they're so much bigger - a gargantua is 100-200 feet tall, whereas Big T is only 50' long.

08-19-2009, 01:05 AM

Strangething

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have the earlier, three-ring binder version of the 2e MM. In this version, the demons & devils are not only renamed, but banished to the "extra-planar" appendix. (Sold separately.) There was a much bigger variety of fiends in that. All the ones from the 1e MM and more.

It doesn't make up for the absence of Tabaxi, though.

08-19-2009, 01:11 AM

HaplessVictim

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I don't think that gargantua work as baby tarrasques, because they're so much bigger - a gargantua is 100-200 feet tall, whereas Big T is only 50' long.

The current Tarrasque is only 50' long. You see, gargantuas are indeed the adolescent form of the Tarrasque, but you don't become the Big Dude just by growing older. No, you have to kill and eat all your siblings. These battles for "succession" rage for decades across entire worlds, devastating continents in their wake. At the end, only the strongest, smartest and quickest of the gargantuas remain. The last time this happened, the winner happened to be an abnormally small specimen. Perhaps because he was so fast on his feet, or so wily. Or maybe the last time was so long ago, it was during an Ice Age, and the gargantuas were more compact then, in order to better retain heat.

This introduces a good reason for adventurers not to kill the Tarrasque. Now that gargantuas are bigger, the succession fight will be that much worse and the humanoid races may not survive this one.

08-19-2009, 03:03 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

As for their Monstrous Manual entry, I wonder why they didn't have a low-powered and a high-powered fiend like the Baatezu entry's Pit Fiend and Abishai? It seems an odd choice to have the top two non-unique Demons when they could have dropped one to make room to stat a Bar-Igura, Babau or Chasme.

True. I think all the non-genie outsiders were handled rather badly in Monstrous Manual; IMO, they could have tossed away something like Hatori or Kirre, and used those pages to give us a little bit more fiends and slaadi.

Quote:

The Balor entry describes them as having "grotesque fangs that drip with venom". Shame they don't have a poisonous bite listed.

Pit fiends, on the other hand have grotesque fangs that drip with venom, and have a poisonous bite. What do you mean that balors are too similar to them? ;)

08-19-2009, 03:08 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The main problem with the Tarrasque is that common to all really BIG monsters in D&D - namely, scaling

I thought that the problem with the Tarrasque was that anybody with a flying carpet and a couple +1 bows could sit just above the Tarrasque's and ping it to death, and it couldn't do anything about it. Not exactly what you want out of a world threatening menace.

Or that the Tarrasque lacked any actual reason for existence or built-in story hooks.

08-19-2009, 04:23 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

It's a lot more complex than you think. A lot of people assume larger animals have more robust bones, for instance. The square-cube law and all. Twice the size means eight times the mass but only four times the strength. So the bones have to be thicker and the muscles stronger. But the evidence really doesn't support that. Yes, a hippo's bones are much thicker than a deer's which are thicker than a dog's. But elephants, the biggest of all land animals, actually have fairly slender bones (when allometrically scaled, closer to the deer than any of the others).

While true, the majority of large animals are pretty close to one square-cube line, while Hippos and rhinos can run and gallop, but don't do so very often. That suggests that Elephants are "an exception that does prove the rule" - they have a lower bone thickness to body mass ratio, so needs must live a less active lifestyle.

Contrariwise, most extinct megafauna (Indricotherium, big dinosaurs etc) have more robust skeletons.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Sauropods probably lived life very slowly. Falling or even mistepping could be dangerous. This may or may not apply to a fantasy creature, but particularly with its upright stance there's a good argument that the tarrasque hobbles along at a slow shuffle. Think a little old man without his walker.

Yes, but the Tarrasque can regenerate and is nigh-immortal, so even if it falls and breaks a leg, or even its neck, it just gets better! Its healing powers may even have brought about its great size, with a hypothetical "ancestral Tarrasque" being limited in size by the strain its body could endure.

08-19-2009, 04:50 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

While true, the majority of large animals are pretty close to one square-cube line, while Hippos and rhinos can run and gallop, but don't do so very often. That suggests that Elephants are "an exception that does prove the rule" - they have a lower bone thickness to body mass ratio, so needs must live a less active lifestyle. Contrariwise, most extinct megafauna (Indricotherium, big dinosaurs etc) have more robust skeletons.

McGowan and Alexander disagree with you, though I may not be up to date. On the other hand, tyrannosaur skeletons show a number of adaptations for running, and the smaller specimens (Nanotyrannus is probably just a juvenile) could have been as fleet as the ostrich dinosaurs, though as always when it comes to the biomechanics of extinct animals there is considerably disagreement about what that means, particularly for the elephant-sized adults.

08-19-2009, 05:04 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I really like the Monstrous Manual's illustration of the tarrasque, but it doesn't look that much like the tarrasque as written. It's far too intelligent-looking. And mean. It makes me think of a human warlord who's turned himself into a tarrasque-like creature to gain its unbelievable power.

08-19-2009, 06:05 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Another option for the tarrasque. This is a fantasy setting. We don't have to rely on the application of cold, abstract laws to run the natural world. Instead, we have personages. Incarnations. Manifestations. Animism is alive and well. Mother Earth isn't just a mystical concept, but a concrete entity with specific goals.

One goal is to keep the growth of the civilization in check. She doesn't mind it, not really. It's kind of cute and all. The humanoids are like adorable little puppies. But every once in a while, they get out of hand. They need the rolled newspaper, the stern talking to.

In every corner of the world, there is a tarrasque. Each was originally a more mundane beast, fed on the Milk of the Earth. Milk that causes enormous growth, grants tremendous vitality. They all have certain traits in common. But around that center, they also vary, like the kaiju. Each still has some characteristics derived from the normal animal they once were.

The one in the picture in the Monstrous Compendium may have been a human warlord. Not quite as bestially strong, but with more of the low cunning. Not truly sapient perhaps, but smart. Clever. Tricky. And with hands that can grasp and move.

One based on a turtle might have a stronger shell, almost impenetrable, but lumber even more slowly. One based on a cat might have particularly terrible fangs and leaping legs. One based on an ostrich might have a longer neck, powerful kicks and fast running.

Each biome has its own. They sleep, they wake, they destroy. That's their purpose. They stem the growth, the spread of civilization. The old bear that became the tarrasque of the endless taiga is fat, has a lumbering gait, and has huge paws. The woodcutters who are turning that forested expanse into planks and towns and stockades are checked by her rampages. Settlements spread, but only so far. When lords and merchants push further into the woods, there is something there to push back.

Same with the dwarven strip mines along the tree line. Before they can turn into eyesores of eroding escarpments and industrial waste, the giant tarrasque with the flat tail and huge gnawing teeth destroys it. They are still mines, but now there is time for the scrub to cover them over, take them back into the womb of the Mother. The earth heals.

The cities of the plains surrounded by spreading rings of tilled lands only spread so far into the grassland. Hiding among the rolling hills there is a twisting, almost limbless tarrasque that snaps and bites. Caravans vanish, crops are ground into dust. The serpent mitigates the size of these centers of population. Along the coast, emerging dripping and cold from the sea to crush the wharves and palaces is another mottled specimen, that once was a newt.

They can be killed, occasionally. But it's generally not worth the effort. There are always more, there will always be another. As long as culture and learning thrive, centers of commerce, architectural monuments, and the exploitation of natural resources, a tarrasque will rise. Not to stamp it out, just to stamp it back a little. Prevent centralized empires, prevent the unprotected topsoil from simply sliding into the sea. Keeping the world in a kind of stasis even, by preventing the industrial revolution.

08-19-2009, 09:54 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

I really like the Monstrous Manual's illustration of the tarrasque, but it doesn't look that much like the tarrasque as written. It's far too intelligent-looking. And mean. It makes me think of a human warlord who's turned himself into a tarrasque-like creature to gain its unbelievable power.

That's what I feel too, the 2nd edition illustration of the Tarrasque looks a bit like a Jack Kirby monster to me. It doesn't really fit the Monstrous Manual description very well. Then again, the AD&D version of the Tarrasque isn't that close to the legendary French dragon it was named after.

08-19-2009, 10:04 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

One goal is to keep the growth of the civilization in check. She doesn't mind it, not really. It's kind of cute and all. The humanoids are like adorable little puppies. But every once in a while, they get out of hand. They need the rolled newspaper, the stern talking to.

The late lamented Gary Gygax proposed a similar explanation for why there was so much wilderness in his Dangerous Journeys game world - if the humans tried to destroy it, the Forces of Nature would thwack them.

I came up with a somewhat more prosaic explanation. A giant anthropophagous monster that only appeared when "civilization is overgrown" because otherwise there simply weren't enough humanoids to eat for it to be worth its while waking up. I imagine it resembling a Kaiju-scale many tongued anteater; smashing open cities, castles and D&D dungeons with its colossal claws, then licking up the inhabitants by the thousand with its furlong-long tongues.

08-19-2009, 11:43 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

I thought that the problem with the Tarrasque was that anybody with a flying carpet and a couple +1 bows could sit just above the Tarrasque's and ping it to death, and it couldn't do anything about it. Not exactly what you want out of a world threatening menace.

Or that the Tarrasque lacked any actual reason for existence or built-in story hooks.

Well I think the Tarrasque more or less is one giant story hook in every sense!

08-19-2009, 04:21 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim

The current Tarrasque is only 50' long. You see, gargantuas are indeed the adolescent form of the Tarrasque, but you don't become the Big Dude just by growing older. No, you have to kill and eat all your siblings. These battles for "succession" rage for decades across entire worlds, devastating continents in their wake. At the end, only the strongest, smartest and quickest of the gargantuas remain. The last time this happened, the winner happened to be an abnormally small specimen. Perhaps because he was so fast on his feet, or so wily. Or maybe the last time was so long ago, it was during an Ice Age, and the gargantuas were more compact then, in order to better retain heat.

Eh? I'm guessing you mean compact in the sense of "thick-bodied and without long legs/tails/ears etc" so they have the same weight in a shorter length, rather than just "small", since a smaller creature loses heat faster all things being equal, since it has a higher mass/area ratio. It's certainly conceivable to go from 200' long to 50' long and still have the same volume, just by being twice as wide/tall. Still, I never imagined Gargantuas as being that skinny.

08-19-2009, 09:37 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Eh? I'm guessing you mean compact in the sense of "thick-bodied and without long legs/tails/ears etc" so they have the same weight in a shorter length, rather than just "small", since a smaller creature loses heat faster all things being equal, since it has a higher mass/area ratio. It's certainly conceivable to go from 200' long to 50' long and still have the same volume, just by being twice as wide/tall. Still, I never imagined Gargantuas as being that skinny.

I would suspect that the Tarrasque is much denser than the Gargantuas--though perhaps I'm affected by my favored edition's incarnation of the beast, in which his mere presence can distort magical flight effects.

08-20-2009, 05:10 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius

I would suspect that the Tarrasque is much denser than the Gargantuas--though perhaps I'm affected by my favored edition's incarnation of the beast, in which his mere presence can distort magical flight effects.

I like that idea:

"All we need is a flying carpet and a couple +1 bows and we can just ping it to death"

...

"Mayday! Mayday! We're going down!!"

...

"Rrraaawwgggg!!! Stomp!! Stomp!! Chomp!! Chomp!!" :D

And it makes sort-of-sense internally. Of course the 400' long monster has gravity-density manipulation, how else do you think it climbs up skyscrapers without them collapsing under its weight, let alone flying like its cousin the Mega-Dino-Bat.

08-21-2009, 12:39 AM

Mikaze

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Back on the marilith and balor for a second, it really needs to be stressed how ugly their art is compared to that in the Planescape MC. Tony DiTerlizzi's marilith is still my all time favorite example of that monster, and that design actually got used again by another artist in the Planescape Hellbound boxed set.

That chick was rockin' a really cool hat, is all I'm sayin'.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I'm not looking forward to the Yuguloth entry...

Trust me, I remember what it is. You have absolutely no reason to look forward to it.

Planescape Monstrous Compendium was a real eye-opener after that.

08-21-2009, 03:30 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I like that idea:

"All we need is a flying carpet and a couple +1 bows and we can just ping it to death"

...

"Mayday! Mayday! We're going down!!"

...

"Rrraaawwgggg!!! Stomp!! Stomp!! Chomp!! Chomp!!" :D

Yeah, both problems I mention have been addressed in later editions.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

And it makes sort-of-sense internally. Of course the 400' long monster has gravity-density manipulation, how else do you think it climbs up skyscrapers without them collapsing under its weight, let alone flying like its cousin the Mega-Dino-Bat.

Or simply how it ignores the square-cube law and stands on such spindly legs.

08-21-2009, 04:36 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze

Trust me, I remember what it is. You have absolutely no reason to look forward to it.

In no small part because they're just Guardian Daemons from 1e, with the word "daemon" search-and-replaced...

08-21-2009, 08:16 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze

Back on the marilith and balor for a second, it really needs to be stressed how ugly their art is compared to that in the Planescape MC. Tony DiTerlizzi's marilith is still my all time favorite example of that monster, and that design actually got used again by another artist in the Planescape Hellbound boxed set.

Hmm, I quite like the Monstrous Manual version of the Marilith, it's got a 'Marvel Comics' vibe to it, looking like a cross between a six-armed Red Sonja and a giant snake. DT's version of the Marilith looks a bit off to me, I think it's something to do with the proportions - she's got very skinny arms and a big head. I like his other ~~demons~~ tanar'ri better.

08-21-2009, 10:24 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Yeah, both problems I mention have been addressed in later editions.

Jet packs? Ballooning, on spider silk? Giving them a climbing skill so they can play in the rigging a skyship? (Imagine how big a ship you'd need if tarrasques fit in the same ecological niche normally filled by rats). Causing spontaneous vulcanism and riding the magma plumes through the sky? Parachute pants and wind machines?

08-21-2009, 04:17 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Jet packs? Ballooning, on spider silk? Giving them a climbing skill so they can play in the rigging a skyship? (Imagine how big a ship you'd need if tarrasques fit in the same ecological niche normally filled by rats). Causing spontaneous vulcanism and riding the magma plumes through the sky? Parachute pants and wind machines?

Super-Leaping augmented with gravity/density control. Didn't you get the issue where the Tarrasque has a jumping race with the Hulk?;)

08-21-2009, 04:47 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, I quite like the Monstrous Manual version of the Marilith, it's got a 'Marvel Comics' vibe to it, looking like a cross between a six-armed Red Sonja and a giant snake. DT's version of the Marilith looks a bit off to me, I think it's something to do with the proportions - she's got very skinny arms and a big head. I like his other ~~demons~~ tanar'ri better.

Does anyone have links to these DT pics, by the way?

08-21-2009, 05:54 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

Does anyone have links to these DT pics, by the way?

You'd have to try a google image search I think.

08-21-2009, 09:45 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

Does anyone have links to these DT pics, by the way?

You can see small versions of most of the Planscape illustrations on Sferopedia (their tanar'ri page is here). Unfortunately, the site's in Czech (at least I think it's Czech, not being able to read any Eastern European or Slavic languages), so is hard for non-speakers to navigate.

I'm leery of clicking some of the links, better safe than sorry!

08-22-2009, 08:16 AM

Mikaze

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

DT's version of the Marilith looks a bit off to me, I think it's something to do with the proportions - she's got very skinny arms and a big head.

Man, you start picking DiTerlizzi art apart over proportions, you'll never be happy with his work. ;)

08-25-2009, 07:07 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, I'm usually fine with people drawing beings with weird non-human proportions when they're weird non-humans, but occasionally the look may not gel with what I feel to be the nature of the creature in question.

The Marilith illustration in the Monstrous Manual looks like she'd be a more powerful melee combatant than the Planescape version. Although her artistic realisation may not be as technically proficient, she's a strapping lass, with noticeably muscle definition. The dT illustration has what appear to be small, slim arms.

Although that would explain why Mariliths in 2nd edition AD&D don't get a Strength bonus with weapon attacks - they may be 7' tall, but they have arms the size of a 5'5" woman. Of course, Marilith strength could be derived more from magic than muscle.

Come to think of it, the Monstrous Manual doesn't give the Balor a Strength bonus either. Just look at the Type VI demon's picture - he's a 12 foot fiend built like Arnold Schwarzenegger. You'd expect the 2E MM would say he has 18/00 Strength like it does the similarly-sized Pit Fiend, although even that seems a bit low considering they're both mighty fiends as big as a small giant. I'd think they'd merit a Strength score of 19 or the low 20s.

By contrast, in 3rd edition a Marilith has Str 29 and a Balor Str 35. Admittedly Strength scales differently in that version of the game.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mikaze

Man, you start picking DiTerlizzi art apart over proportions, you'll never be happy with his work. ;)

08-25-2009, 07:51 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

(Imagine how big a ship you'd need if tarrasques fit in the same ecological niche normally filled by rats).

There's a Spelljammer supplement with a planet full of Tarrasques.

I stopped reading that supplement right there, which was like page 3.

08-25-2009, 04:55 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Come to think of it, the Monstrous Manual doesn't give the Balor a Strength bonus either. Just look at the Type VI demon's picture - he's a 12 foot fiend built like Arnold Schwarzenegger. You'd expect the 2E MM would say he has 18/00 Strength like it does the similarly-sized Pit Fiend, although even that seems a bit low considering they're both mighty fiends as big as a small giant. I'd think they'd merit a Strength score of 19 or the low 20s.

Hmm, further on that, an alternative explanation for those fiends with huge muscles but no listed Strength bonus is that it's all smoke and mirrors. Considering they are evil spirits clothed in unnatural flesh, said flesh may no be that substantial. Balors could mostly be just smoke and fire, with the appearance of massive musculature to help them strike fear in mortals.

08-25-2009, 05:02 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

There's a Spelljammer supplement with a planet full of Tarrasques.

I stopped reading that supplement right there, which was like page 3.

Ah yes, the rock-eating Tarrasques of Falx in Realmspace.

They'd be the universe's greatest source of +5 shields, if only we could figure out how to harvest them. ;)

08-25-2009, 09:37 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

There's a Spelljammer supplement with a planet full of Tarrasques.

I stopped reading that supplement right there, which was like page 3.

That reminds me a bit of Niven and Pournelle and Barnes' Heorot books. While it's not the size of a tarrasque, the series features a super-efficient predator (dubbed "grendels") with the equivalent of a nitrous oxide injector in their adrenal gland and the ability to grow to full size very quickly. They mow through the colonists, and even when supposedly wiped out they return in an even worse form.

08-26-2009, 08:10 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That reminds me a bit of Niven and Pournelle and Barnes' Heorot books. While it's not the size of a tarrasque, the series features a super-efficient predator (dubbed "grendels") with the equivalent of a nitrous oxide injector in their adrenal gland and the ability to grow to full size very quickly. They mow through the colonists, and even when supposedly wiped out they return in an even worse form.

The adults are the predators of the larvae. When the colonists kill off all the adults, most of the larvae mature - meaning that there are suddenly hundreds of superfast killing machines. At least there was a limitation to Speed (overheating). The "monster" in the sequel was a bit more fantastic IMO.

08-28-2009, 01:03 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Tasloi

Another orc substitute of the not-all-that-interesting variety, Tasloi are Chaotic Evil ape-like creatures which live in jungles. A stronger enemy than goblins or kobolds, though not by much, a lot of what can be said about those creatures also applies to the Tasloi. Sneaky, traps, numbers, etc., though the entry details Tasloi battle tactics in considerably more detail than it does for most other creatures.

Tasloi domesticate giant spiders and giant wasps, which is slightly reminiscent of Warhammer's forest goblins and a nice image - you don't get nearly enough giant insect riding creatures in D&D. Although since Tasloi are able to communicate with monkeys and apes, I think the designers missed a trick in not writing up Tasloi as having domesticated gorillas and orang utans to ride around on. As I'm sure you'll agree there is something sinister and vicious about apes, which would add a level of interest to the Tasloi which they don't really have in their original form.

A point of interest in Tasloi (and I think D&D humanoids generally, though I can't be sure) is that males outnumber females (100 males for every 70 females). This seems unrealistic, given that it's the males who do all the hunting and fighting. I wonder what the reasoning is behind it. Probably, more bad guys for PCs to kill.

Tasloi seem tailor-made to be the remnants of an ancient jungle civilisation who have long ago reverted to barbarism and primitivism. That's a cliché, but a good one, and probably how I'd use them in a game if I ever did.

08-28-2009, 02:25 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Tasloi also share with Goblin the distinction of having really sketchy and not very good DiTerlizzi illustration.

08-28-2009, 04:46 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

Tasloi also share with Goblin the distinction of having really sketchy and not very good DiTerlizzi illustration.

I don't mind the Tasloi picture actually. It's not the best but it's serviceable, and at least it actually IS a Tasloi and not, say, a putitative kobold. ;)

08-28-2009, 09:41 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tasloi

Another orc substitute of the not-all-that-interesting variety, Tasloi are Chaotic Evil ape-like creatures which live in jungles. A stronger enemy than goblins or kobolds, though not by much, a lot of what can be said about those creatures also applies to the Tasloi. Sneaky, traps, numbers, etc., though the entry details Tasloi battle tactics in considerably more detail than it does for most other creatures.

Oh I think they have a bit more potential than that. Tasloi are the terror in the trees, a rustling among the leaves than then becomes a leaping mass of screaming little green men who rain down javelins and scuttling away. Unlike goblins and kobolds, they are fast, their Climb speed of 15 means they can not be outrun in flight or pursuit.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Tasloi domesticate giant spiders and giant wasps, which is slightly reminiscent of Warhammer's forest goblins and a nice image - you don't get nearly enough giant insect riding creatures in D&D. Although since Tasloi are able to communicate with monkeys and apes, I think the designers missed a trick in not writing up Tasloi as having domesticated gorillas and orang utans to ride around on. As I'm sure you'll agree there is something sinister and vicious about apes, which would add a level of interest to the Tasloi which they don't really have in their original form.

Hmm, I imagine them using smaller apes and monkeys as spies and thieves. They always know where you are in the jungle, because that "innocent little bushbaby" has been telling you of their movements. When you stop for the night, a band of lemurs wanders through camp. It's only after the night-guard driven them off that you realize they've stolen your wizard's wand and three-quarters of your arrows.

As for the big apes, AD&D hobgoblins are the ones with a knack for controlling carnivorous apes. Maybe those killer apes see Tasloi as potential meals, not allies. Sure they can talk, but a Carnivorous Ape could view these little green jungle goblins as too puny to treat as equals.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

A point of interest in Tasloi (and I think D&D humanoid monsters generally, though I can't be sure) is that males outnumber females (100 males for every 70 females). This seems unrealistic, given that it's the males who do all the hunting and fighting. I wonder what the reasoning is behind it. Probably, more bad guys for PCs to kill.

Yes, we haven't really gone into the male-female ratios of AD&D's humanoid monsters very deeply on this thread. Most of them have more males than females, some twice as many. It's certainly a puzzle, here are a few possible explanations.

- These goblin-types could frequently kill their females, viewing their lives of little worth.
- Mother-goblinoids just produce more boy babies than girls.
- Goblinoids have a lot of transvestites, many of those "males" are actually female goblins who dress and act like males, and the foolish humans/elves/dwarves just can't tell the difference.
- Some or all goblinoids are capable of changing sex, under complicated and hard-to-predict stimuli. When times are hard and they must fight or die, many of the females turn into males (who are stronger and better fighters), in times of peace or after the loss of many warriors, some males turn into females so they can breed back their numbers more swiftly.

08-28-2009, 10:35 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Goblinoids have a lot of transvestites, many of those "males" are actually female goblins who dress and act like males, and the foolish humans/elves/dwarves just can't tell the difference.

I like this. It makes goblinoid society a little more interesting, too!

08-28-2009, 10:59 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

You're assuming goblinoids have a sex. Maybe they bud, a proto-goblin growing out from each breast. Drawing from the mass of those huge pectorals like a chick draws sustenance and material from the yolk. Generally, there is sufficient mass in the upper body to have only two children. One from each pec. Having a child in this fashion leaves a lasting mark on the parent. Protrusions remain on the chest where the young goblinoids pulled away. And with the loss of some of their body mass, the parent is smaller, with considerably less upper body musculature.

In other words, before they have a baby goblinoids appear male. After, they appear female. At least to the ignorant hu-mans.

08-29-2009, 09:44 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, I imagine them using smaller apes and monkeys as spies and thieves. They always know where you are in the jungle, because that "innocent little bushbaby" has been telling you of their movements. When you stop for the night, a band of lemurs wanders through camp. It's only after the night-guard driven them off that you realize they've stolen your wizard's wand and three-quarters of your arrows.

Love it.

Quote:

Yes, we haven't really gone into the male-female ratios of AD&D's humanoid monsters very deeply on this thread. Most of them have more males than females, some twice as many. It's certainly a puzzle, here are a few possible explanations.

- These goblin-types could frequently kill their females, viewing their lives of little worth.
- Mother-goblinoids just produce more boy babies than girls.
- Goblinoids have a lot of transvestites, many of those "males" are actually female goblins who dress and act like males, and the foolish humans/elves/dwarves just can't tell the difference.
- Some or all goblinoids are capable of changing sex, under complicated and hard-to-predict stimuli. When times are hard and they must fight or die, many of the females turn into males (who are stronger and better fighters), in times of peace or after the loss of many warriors, some males turn into females so they can breed back their numbers more swiftly.

Another possibility that occurs to me as a subsidiary of the first point is that the Tasloi often just abandon female babies in the forest.

Could be a nice little poser for a party: female baby Tasloi found in the forest - what do you do with it? You can't take her with you, and she's at least nominally "evil", but can you in good conscience leave her to die?

08-29-2009, 07:07 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Yes, we haven't really gone into the male-female ratios of AD&D's humanoid monsters very deeply on this thread. Most of them have more males than females, some twice as many. It's certainly a puzzle, here are a few possible explanations.

One of my favorite Dragon articles (Survival is a Group Effort from 89) has a much more depressing idea on the subject- infanticide. Female infants are either killed because they won't become warriors or because they don't get nearly as good care as males. The reason hobgoblins have equal numbers is their intelligence. They get that more females that survive equals more warriors down the line (a lot more with their short generations).

08-29-2009, 07:12 PM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssiis

I would suspect that the Tarrasque is much denser than the Gargantuas--though perhaps I'm affected by my favored edition's incarnation of the beast, in which his mere presence can distort magical flight effects.

I did think the grounding aura was a slightly, ah, obvious solution to the problem of getting picked to death by flyers. I used the City of the Tarrasque in my 4e game, however, and it permitted the super-fun additional creepy dynamic that, as you approached the building, you were surrounded by small, thin bones - birds actually fell clean out of the sky.

The Tasloi I can honestly say I've never used, nor felt the urge to use. No "traction", I guess.

08-29-2009, 07:57 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yeah Goblin transexuals FTW!

I have long had a theory that Lizardmen are actually all female and reproduce via parthenogenesis and magic. Now my reasoning for this was largely seeing a documentary on those lesbian lizards, but actually it does make sense; lizards have two penises, Lizard"men" are always drawn as having none.

They had a great empire, but teh males of their species were all ultimate warriors types, and they genetically engineered themselves with magic to be teh ultimate killing machines, and then went insane and became non-sentient. Teh females started using something called "parthenogenetic unisexual pseudocopulation", but with magic, so as to avoid them and still reproduce. Occasionally a male one is born and survives, it becomes one of those lizard monsters you see in deserts, or one of those savage "lizardmen" that they have in gladiatorial arenas pwning everyone.

Oh, and teh females need magic to properly sexually reproduce, otherwise they just produce clones of themselves and that causes lack of genetic diversity and disease, hence they stick to deserts.

That's my thoughts on it anyway. My overly thought out thoughts on it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Another possibility that occurs to me as a subsidiary of the first point is that the Tasloi often just abandon female babies in the forest.

Could be a nice little poser for a party: female baby Tasloi found in the forest - what do you do with it? You can't take her with you, and she's at least nominally "evil", but can you in good conscience leave her to die?

Simple solution. Sell the evil monkey baby.

Find teh site where they are dumping them and harvest them. Hell, make a deal with teh evil monkeys, swap female evil monkey babies for gold and your tied up enemies. Then kidnap some male evil monkeys and start breeding them. They could be teh next big thing in pets.

I man how much would you pay for an evil monkey that you could train? A lot; that's what!

I bet teh thieves guild will give you a fair price. Plus give them poodle-cuts and make their debut into high society.

I mean evil monkeys, and they can use their monkey control powers to make normal monkeys evil, and run them as pickpockets Fagin-style!

08-29-2009, 08:15 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

I did think the grounding aura was a slightly, ah, obvious solution to the problem of getting picked to death by flyers. I used the City of the Tarrasque in my 4e game, however, and it permitted the super-fun additional creepy dynamic that, as you approached the building, you were surrounded by small, thin bones - birds actually fell clean out of the sky.

See, I would have just given them a super magical chameleon tongue, and let hilarity ensue, butt your idea is good too.

I see Tarrasques as being basically Doomsday from Superman. You kill them one way; they come back and evolve so that you can't do it again. In teh Doomsday/Superman: Predator/Prey book (long title is loooong), Superman finally did what he should of at first and stayed at range and picked him off with laser-vision, so of course Doomsday started firing off his claws on grapples to pull him in.

Of course my plan was also to use teh better Polymorph spell to turn a Tarrasque into a small oriental girl and then use it to kill people. Really it could be any small innocuous creature (I believe they suggested The Deadly Tarrasque-Bunny in Dragon Magazine), however J-horror has taught me that small oriental girls are super-creepy, and that Tarrasque-Sadako punching people through walls would be hilarious.

08-29-2009, 09:46 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Another possibility that occurs to me as a subsidiary of the first point is that the Tasloi often just abandon female babies in the forest.

Could be a nice little poser for a party: female baby Tasloi found in the forest - what do you do with it? You can't take her with you, and she's at least nominally "evil", but can you in good conscience leave her to die?

That's one of the things I was thinking about for option #1 "These goblin-types could frequently kill their females, viewing their lives of little worth."

Considering there have been quite a few human cultures which exposed unwanted babies, it may be the most likely explanation.

08-30-2009, 06:48 AM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

See, I would have just given them a super magical chameleon tongue, and let hilarity ensue,

Yeah, that would have been a little more subtle. The fix in 4e is sloppy - it's there because the freeform nature of tabletop gaming made it possible for clever players to defeat a theoretically unstoppable monster by making use of available resources rather than by slugging it out CRPG style. I think that's what bugs me the most - it's like they realized that the nature of the game permitted players to solve a problem in an unplanned fashion, and decided to prevent that by the most direct means necessary. As though clever use of resources was a bug rather than a feature.

I read the Tasloi entry again and I have to say that the idea of setting up traps along escape routes from the lairs of more dangerous critters is a nice touch. It'd be cruel as all hell, though. I don't know if I'd have the heart to ambush players hard on the heels of a retreat.

08-30-2009, 07:50 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

I read the Tasloi entry again and I have to say that the idea of setting up traps along escape routes from the lairs of more dangerous critters is a nice touch. It'd be cruel as all hell, though. I don't know if I'd have the heart to ambush players hard on the heels of a retreat.

Tucker's tasloi? The players would quickly grow to hate the vicious little trap-making bastards in the jungle.

I always kind of liked the tasloi. The picture in the original MM2 made them appear like weird, mostly hairless but bulbous-headed and spindly-limbed little humans. Almost Homo floresiensis, or pygmies from Africa or southeast Asia. They fit a needed niche. A strange, almost-familiar but strangely different figure. Humans, twisted. Adapted to an alien environment, the terrifying drums and ululating screams in the jungle. A chattering almost-language in the trees. The embodiment of the darkest fears of the colonial Europeans. Lots of pulpish potential.

08-30-2009, 08:43 AM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Tucker's tasloi? The players would quickly grow to hate the vicious little trap-making bastards in the jungle.

Worse. You run out of the jungle temple, bleeding and singed, after being routed by Tucker's kobolds. You take the safe-looking path towards a secure location, dragging your unconscious comrade, and then they jump you.

08-30-2009, 11:39 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I always kind of liked the tasloi. The picture in the original MM2 made them appear like weird, mostly hairless but bulbous-headed and spindly-limbed little humans. Almost Homo floresiensis, or pygmies from Africa or southeast Asia. They fit a needed niche. A strange, almost-familiar but strangely different figure. Humans, twisted. Adapted to an alien environment, the terrifying drums and ululating screams in the jungle. A chattering almost-language in the trees. The embodiment of the darkest fears of the colonial Europeans. Lots of pulpish potential.

In watching the Mummy Returns, I thought of tasloi when those oddball jungle-in-the-desert pygmy mummies showed up.

08-30-2009, 08:08 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

As was mentioned in the su-monster, the tasloi have one huge weakness against adventuring parties- their trees are flammable. What keeps the PCs from burning down that section of forest?

08-30-2009, 11:04 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Jungles don't burn easily.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

In watching the Mummy Returns, I thought of tasloi when those oddball jungle-in-the-desert pygmy mummies showed up.

Definitely creepy. I approve.

08-30-2009, 11:30 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

I did think the grounding aura was a slightly, ah, obvious solution to the problem of getting picked to death by flyers. I used the City of the Tarrasque in my 4e game, however, and it permitted the super-fun additional creepy dynamic that, as you approached the building, you were surrounded by small, thin bones - birds actually fell clean out of the sky.

Yes, it is a bit kludgy. Upon reflection, I prefer the same solution as the Incredible Hulk uses...

Give the Tarrasque super-leaping!

It'd be worth it just for the look on the players' faces when they see the Tarrasque leap hundreds of feet into the air and bite their flying carpet out from under them (together with one of the PCs legs):D

08-30-2009, 11:35 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

I read the Tasloi entry again and I have to say that the idea of setting up traps along escape routes from the lairs of more dangerous critters is a nice touch. It'd be cruel as all hell, though. I don't know if I'd have the heart to ambush players hard on the heels of a retreat.

Well, I'd probably ameliorate it by having the Tasloi try to capture the party with nets rather than kill them. Then, assuming they succeed, they can sell the PCs as slaves, keep them to sacrifice to the Dark Gods (or a neighbouring Tabaxi Lord) on the next full moon, hold them for ransom et cetera.

That way they can plot to escape, use their back-up characters for a rescue mission, get adopted by the Tasloi et cetera.

08-30-2009, 11:42 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

In watching the Mummy Returns, I thought of tasloi when those oddball jungle-in-the-desert pygmy mummies showed up.

Hmm... that makes me think of Undead Tasloi!

Not mummies though, I don't feel that's quite right. More like a Tasloi version of a ghoul or vampire spawn: able to fly through the trees, shape change into a bat or monkey (or a monkey-bat!), and inflict a supernaturally potent form of rabies with their bite.

And obviously, there will be a demonic "Tasloi Lord" back in the rotting remains of the Tasloi village commanding them all, a creature with the size and pleasant personality of a Carnivorous Ape.

08-31-2009, 12:02 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
Jungles don't burn easily.

You know what does burn though? Maximised Web spells fired into the forest canopy, that's what!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Yes, it is a bit kludgy. Upon reflection, I prefer the same solution as the Incredible Hulk uses...

Yeah, throw a bus at them!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Give the Tarrasque super-leaping!

Ow. Well I guess that works as well.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
It'd be worth it just for the look on the players' faces when they see the Tarrasque leap hundreds of feet into the air and bite their flying carpet out from under them (together with one of the PCs legs):D

Bite their carpet, lol!

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Hmm... that makes me think of Undead Tasloi!

Not mummies though, I don't feel that's quite right. More like a Tasloi version of a ghoul or vampire spawn: able to fly through the trees, shape change into a bat or monkey (or a monkey-bat!), and inflict a supernaturally potent form of rabies with their bite.

And obviously, there will be a demonic "Tasloi Lord" back in the rotting remains of the Tasloi village commanding them all, a creature with the size and pleasant personality of a Carnivorous Ape.

I think that the most important thing to remember about evil monkeys is that they are monkeys and they are evil.

Everything else should follow on from that...

Vampire evil monkeys? Well vampires are evil, evil monkeys are evil.

Cannibals? Well that's evil*, rite?

Evil rat-monkeys? Well evil rats are evil, evil monkeys are evil.

*Except in the game I am currently writing where cannibalism has been rebranded as recycling.

08-31-2009, 12:09 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well, I'd probably ameliorate it by having the Tasloi try to capture the party with nets rather than kill them. Then, assuming they succeed, they can sell the PCs as slaves, keep them to sacrifice to the Dark Gods (or a neighbouring Tabaxi Lord) on the next full moon, hold them for ransom et cetera.

Nets with nasty little hooks woven into every junction. Each dipped in arrow frog venom, or painted with a sticky, foul herbal concoction that causes nerve damage.

In a world with "superhero" fighters who are tougher and have greater damage output than an entire military unit, and mages who can toss around lightning bolts all day with impunity, the humanoid who oppose them have to be smart, stealthy, and utterly ruthless guerilla fighters. The tasloi are the Viet Kong. Tunnels and sharpened stakes. Disguised among the humans or hiding under wicker mats in the cowed local villages. Masters of disinformation. Tasloi children running up to adventurers and hugging them close as they slam two balls from a necklace of fireballs together. Prisoners in the internment camps can expect a short and horrible life.

08-31-2009, 12:44 PM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Jungles don't burn easily.

People (and by 'people' I mean 'me, possibly others but I can't vouch for them') have an impression of tropical terrain as sunny and thus dry. But there's a reason jungle is more properly known as rainforest - lush tropical terrain is so almost entirely because of the buckets and buckets of water that fall on it all the time, in turn due to the increased heat.

So really, there should be a lot more lightning and mist monsters in the jungles. Things flickering with energy half-glimpsed between shifting sheets of fog, sparks spitting every time a drop from the upper canopy spills onto them...

08-31-2009, 08:05 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

People (and by 'people' I mean 'me, possibly others but I can't vouch for them') have an impression of tropical terrain as sunny and thus dry. But there's a reason jungle is more properly known as rainforest - lush tropical terrain is so almost entirely because of the buckets and buckets of water that fall on it all the time, in turn due to the increased heat.

And how does that relate to magical fire? Incendiary cloud has a large area of effect and can dry out the trees (and vines and epiphytes) before reducing them to ash over those 5 (?) rounds.

08-31-2009, 08:20 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Monkeys burn easily.
And hilariously.

09-01-2009, 02:27 AM

Wakshaani

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have so got to catch up on these threads.

Arg!

09-01-2009, 09:53 AM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

And how does that relate to magical fire? Incendiary cloud has a large area of effect and can dry out the trees (and vines and epiphytes) before reducing them to ash over those 5 (?) rounds.

I am not a vegetable pyrologist (or whatever qualification one actually needs for this field of expertise), but I would imagine sustained weapons-grade fire would do the trick. The steam would be unimaginably horrendous, though - I would not be surprised to see hundreds of tonnes of water within the radius of a standard AOE spell. And a simple Fireball, while it would knock things down easily enough, probably wouldn't actually manage to set fire to anything in that environment.

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Monkeys burn easily.
And hilariously.

You read The Goon too? "I like them best when they catch fire."

09-01-2009, 10:47 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

And a simple Fireball, while it would knock things down easily enough, probably wouldn't actually manage to set fire to anything in that environment.

Fireball doesn't create any pressure, so probably not.

And I am I the only one who feels as though Tasloi and Su-Monsters go together? I don't know why, but they've always been linked in my mind.

09-01-2009, 10:59 AM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

Fireball doesn't create any pressure, so probably not.

And I am I the only one who feels as though Tasloi and Su-Monsters go together? I don't know why, but they've always been linked in my mind.

I know that Fireball should, ideally, be almost utterly useless in this environment, but I like Fireball, and restricting its destructicity because of moist trees seemed a little unfair. Basically, if in doubt, let something explode but good, I say.

As for monster combos... has anyone listed all the ape monsters and tried to build a world around them? I don't have the necessary data to hand, but there is plenty 'nuff stuff in this book to build a rocking Edgar Rice Burroughs-style world with nary an orc or elf in sight, methinks.

09-01-2009, 01:01 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

I know that Fireball should, ideally, be almost utterly useless in this environment, but I like Fireball, and restricting its destructicity because of moist trees seemed a little unfair. Basically, if in doubt, let something explode but good, I say.

As for monster combos... has anyone listed all the ape monsters and tried to build a world around them? I don't have the necessary data to hand, but there is plenty 'nuff stuff in this book to build a rocking Edgar Rice Burroughs-style world with nary an orc or elf in sight, methinks.

Methinks so too. Get on it, somebody!

09-01-2009, 08:18 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

And I am I the only one who feels as though Tasloi and Su-Monsters go together? I don't know why, but they've always been linked in my mind.

I do and I mentioned it back in the su-monster posts.

09-01-2009, 09:20 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Monkeys burn easily.

And hilariously.

Well, I'm now thinking those Undead Tasloi need to be Flaming Vampire Undead Ghoul Monkey-Bats Humanoids.:p

That ought to learn those jungle arsonists!:D

09-01-2009, 09:27 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

As for monster combos... has anyone listed all the ape monsters and tried to build a world around them? I don't have the necessary data to hand, but there is plenty 'nuff stuff in this book to build a rocking Edgar Rice Burroughs-style world with nary an orc or elf in sight, methinks.

Great idea! Just of the top of my head we've got:

Carnivorous Apes (Man-Eating Monkeys!)

Gargantuan Carnivorous Apes (Oonga! AD&D's answer to King Kong)

Gorillas

Chimpanzees

Su-Monsters (Pyschic Psycho Monkeys!)

Hsing-Sing (White-furred sapient apes that are expert with ropes & lassoes. They're normally peaceable, but go crazy at a certain time of year.)

Monkey Spiders (They'll bite your eyes out)

Yetis (Look at the picture, there's no denying they're a kind of ape)

Gorilla-Bears

Gorillons (Try our new improved Carnivorous Ape, now with bonus extra arms!)

Tasloi (Obviously)

Bar-Igura (Demon Monkeys!)

Demogorgon (Well, he's got baboon's heads, hasn't he.)

And there's sure to be more of them. I vaguely remember an AD&D race that looked like a bushbaby, but I can't remember what they were called.

09-01-2009, 09:53 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

There is the phantom from BD&D and the dakon from the FF (with very powerful claws).

09-02-2009, 04:07 AM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

You can see small versions of most of the Planscape illustrations on Sferopedia (their tanar'ri page is here). Unfortunately, the site's in Czech (at least I think it's Czech, not being able to read any Eastern European or Slavic languages), so is hard for non-speakers to navigate.

Appears to be Polish, actually - it's full of ogonek'd vowels, slashed l's, and dotted sibilants, none of which exist in Czech, AFAIK.

09-02-2009, 04:38 AM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Great idea! Just of the top of my head we've got:

Snip list

And there's sure to be more of them. I vaguely remember an AD&D race that looked like a bushbaby, but I can't remember what they were called.

The biggest impediment is that most of the ape-style enemies are somewhat similar, behavior-and-tactics wise. I'd have trouble running more than one adventure with an ape theme.

09-02-2009, 05:14 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

The biggest impediment is that most of the ape-style enemies are somewhat similar, behavior-and-tactics wise. I'd have trouble running more than one adventure with an ape theme.

Chittering death from the trees. Net-weavers and trappers with small sharp spears. They grow exotic lotuses in hydroponic-like gardens at the very top of the foliage. Black and green noxious fumes falls like a misty rain to the ground cover below when they are distilling the nightshade into a potent poison.

Skittering things hidden in the canopy. Curious stalkers, they parallel groups of humanoids in the forest. The racket they cause and the occasional piece of feces they fling ruins the chances of any would-be hunters or scouts. At the end of the day or when the leaves and branches block out the sky and leave only a shiftng green twilight, they sneak into camps to smash bottles and steal shiny things before scampering off.

Cave-dwelling albinos with powerful arms. Chest-pounding tear-you-limb from limb furious packs that terrorize their neighbors. Their language is indecipherable, but they somehow communicate because every once in a while they descend from their cold hard homes and great jumping hordes rend and tear and smash entire villages to pieces.

Fiercely territorial packs. Constant grooming and sex tied them together with velvet bonds into extended soap opera-like family groups, but they are clannish and hostile to any strangers. To keep their families safe, they use bluster, intimidation, lure and swarm group tactics, and, if necessary, they simply pick up their few belongings and scatter into the forest, never to return.

Giant tribes of lumbering, wise old silverbacks who are reflective and philosophical plant-eaters. Secretive and reclusive, it is rumored the distant drumming is the only sign of their existence.

An arboreal brachiating species with a tail almost like a fifth limb, who spend half their time hanging or upside down, even while talking to strangers. Known as cunning merchants, they are intensely vocal.... and very, very loud. Their flapping cheek-pouches turn into bellows as they howl and scream and berate their employees for even the slightest perceived failing.

09-02-2009, 07:25 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

You read The Goon too? "I like them best when they catch fire."

No, though I have herd of it (they are supposed to be making a film or summint). I am just a believer in the comedy potential of burning monkeys.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well, I'm now thinking those Undead Tasloi need to be Flaming Vampire Undead Ghoul Monkey-Bats Humanoids.:p

That ought to learn those jungle arsonists!:D

That would indeed be an evil monkey.

Ah, but they would probably be Ghost Flaming Monkey-Bats! Created from the burning of regular Evil Monkeys by adventures who think that burning monkeys are really funny.

09-02-2009, 09:28 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Chittering death from the trees. Net-weavers and trappers with small sharp spears. They grow exotic lotuses in hydroponic-like gardens at the very top of the foliage. Black and green noxious fumes falls like a misty rain to the ground cover below when they are distilling the nightshade into a potent poison.

Skittering things hidden in the canopy. Curious stalkers, they parallel groups of humanoids in the forest. The racket they cause and the occasional piece of feces they fling ruins the chances of any would-be hunters or scouts. At the end of the day or when the leaves and branches block out the sky and leave only a shiftng green twilight, they sneak into camps to smash bottles and steal shiny things before scampering off.

Cave-dwelling albinos with powerful arms. Chest-pounding tear-you-limb from limb furious packs that terrorize their neighbors. Their language is indecipherable, but they somehow communicate because every once in a while they descend from their cold hard homes and great jumping hordes rend and tear and smash entire villages to pieces.

Fiercely territorial packs. Constant grooming and sex tied them together with velvet bonds into extended soap opera-like family groups, but they are clannish and hostile to any strangers. To keep their families safe, they use bluster, intimidation, lure and swarm group tactics, and, if necessary, they simply pick up their few belongings and scatter into the forest, never to return.

Giant tribes of lumbering, wise old silverbacks who are reflective and philosophical plant-eaters. Secretive and reclusive, it is rumored the distant drumming is the only sign of their existence.

An arboreal brachiating species with a tail almost like a fifth limb, who spend half their time hanging or upside down, even while talking to strangers. Known as cunning merchants, they are intensely vocal.... and very, very loud. Their flapping cheek-pouches turn into bellows as they howl and scream and berate their employees for even the slightest perceived failing.

Don't forget gargantuan gorillas worshipped as demigods by primitive tribes in the rain forest.

09-02-2009, 12:55 PM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Don't forget gargantuan gorillas worshipped as demigods by primitive tribes in the rain forest.

Yep. The normal D&D spirit is to provide new challenges and new mechanics through a weird new thing with tentacles and eyes, but there's plenty of room for drama simply dealing with other humans.

Or other sentient beings, in this case, although it wouldn't be as simple to stack PC levels onto monsters in 2e rules, I expect.

ERB demonstrated that you can do perfect high adventure with a couple of unusual cultures, a woman, and some angry, angry monkeys. Even on Mars, John Carter fights some white apes early on. There's nothing ruling out the occasional jaguar or T-Rex, but they should be special, methinks.

EDIT: Also, animal companion: faithful chimpanzee. That is so much cooler than a wolf, no?

09-03-2009, 04:49 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

There is the phanton from BD&D and the dakon from the FF (with very powerful claws).

The Phanaton was the one I was trying to remember the name of, they're kind of raccoon/bush babies with a gliding squirrel style wing membrane. While they did first appear in Isle of the Dread, they do have official AD&D stats too.

Don't remember much about the Dakon, despite it having its own Ecology article in Dragon. I have a vague memory of some kind of winged ape, but I suspect I'm actually thinking of Moorcock's Clakkars.

Anyway, I'll add them to post #307's list.

ADDENDUM: After checking my Dragon back-issues and the Dakon's basically a peaceful talking gorilla. I half-suspected my memory was failing me, or it was wishful thinking. After all, Ape World really needs flying killer gorillas.

Oh, and apparently Clakkars only have one "k". That just doesn't look right to me.

Quote:

Updated List:

Carnivorous Apes (Man-Eating Monkeys!)

Gargantuan Carnivorous Apes (Oonga! AD&D's answer to King Kong)

Gorillas

Chimpanzees

Su-Monsters (Psychic Psycho Monkeys!)

Hsing-Sing (White-furred sapient apes that are expert with ropes & lassoes. They're normally peaceable, but go crazy at a certain time of year.)

Monkey Spiders (They'll bite your eyes out)

Yetis (Look at the picture, there's no denying they're a kind of ape)

Gorilla-Bears

Gorillons (Try our new improved Carnivorous Ape, now with bonus extra arms!)

Tasloi (Obviously)

Bar-Igura (Demon Monkeys!)

Demogorgon (Well, he's got baboon's heads, hasn't he.)

Extra! Extra!

Phanaton (Gliding raccoon-monkeys)

Dakon (Peaceful tribal talking gorillas)

09-03-2009, 04:53 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Don't forget gargantuan gorillas worshipped as demigods by primitive tribes in the rain forest.

That's already covered by the Gargantuan Carnivorous Apes in Gygax's Isle of the Ape.

09-03-2009, 05:00 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath
That would indeed be an evil monkey.

Ah, but they would probably be Ghost Flaming Monkey-Bats! Created from the burning of regular Evil Monkeys by adventures who think that burning monkeys are really funny

Actually, that's what I had in mind, except I was thinking it's the result of them burning the "regular" Evil Undead Monkey-Men.:o

You know how it goes: kill the evil monkey men and they come back as ghoulish undead, burn the ghoulish undead and they come back as flaming ghosts, capture all the flaming ghosts in a spirit-prison and their souls fuse together and burst out as one 300 foot tall soul-eating spectral demon ape god.

It happens all the time, but the wizards covers it up.:)

09-03-2009, 05:48 AM

Wooster

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Kech were some sort of ape-like creatures, weren't they?

09-03-2009, 11:45 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Thought-Eater

What is this that comes towards us, swimming through the ether? Is it a bird? Is it a plane? Is it the stragely malformed skeleton of a duckbilled platypus? No, it is a Thought-Eater, terror of the ethereal plane and scourge of psionicists and wizards. Flee its deadly psuedo-marsupial form!

Anyway, Thought-Eaters. They press a minor irritative button with me in that there's a ton of stuff in the entry that only applies to psionicists and doesn't make an ounce of sense if you don't have the Psionics Handbook. This makes this monster a candidate for removal from the MM and insertion in the Psionics book, if you ask me. But we're stuck with it, I suppose.

And the Thought-Eater isn't a bad concept - a wandering interplanar...well... thought eater, basically. Hoovering up psionic powers, memorised spells and intelligence like a...well.... hoover. The entry manages to both come up with simultaneously cool and ridiculous adventure hooks (like all the other entries, then):

Cool - When a Thought-Eater dies it drops out of the ethereal plane to the prime material, where it resembles an ordinary platypus skeleton.

Ridiculous - Sages (ah, sages) speculate that Thought-Eaters are "the final fate of psionicists, once they die."

A Thought-Eater would make a great pet for some evil king or archmage, as they essentially destroy magical and psionic ability at will.

09-03-2009, 12:44 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Flee its deadly psuedo-marsupial form!

They're from further back down the evolutionary tree. The ancestors of the platypus split off before the first live-bearing mammal appeared with either a pouch or a placenta. They're monotremes, not a marsupials.

09-03-2009, 12:46 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
They're from further back down the evolutionary tree. The ancestors of the platypus split off before the first live-bearing mammal appeared with either a pouch or a placenta. They're monotremes, not a marsupials.

Pedant! ;)

09-03-2009, 12:58 PM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

On the subject of evolution - how do you end up with a thought-eating predator? The sages are unreliable on this one. Not even the old standby of an "engineered species." So what creates a species that is constantly and desperately seeking nourishment? I mean are we looking at the psychic equivalent of those shrews that need to eat constantly to stay alive, or what?

09-03-2009, 01:06 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Since it is an astral being, perhaps it began life as the weird-ass nightmare of a powerful but not particularly disciplined psionic wild talent?

09-03-2009, 01:52 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Pedant! ;)

You type that like it's a bad thing. :confused: Shame on you! ;)

09-03-2009, 01:56 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wooster
Kech were some sort of ape-like creatures, weren't they?

Not particularly. They're skinny arboreal carnivorous humanoids covered in little triangular green scales. I imagine them as having scales like a pangolin's, horny plates that used to be hair, except covered in algae for camouflage, like a sloth. I quite liked Kech for some reason, so my players ran into them a couple of times.

09-03-2009, 02:05 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

On the subject of evolution - how do you end up with a thought-eating predator? The sages are unreliable on this one. Not even the old standby of an "engineered species." So what creates a species that is constantly and desperately seeking nourishment? I mean are we looking at the psychic equivalent of those shrews that need to eat constantly to stay alive, or what?

Maybe the sages are half-right?

The thought eaters are all that remain of a once noble, highly intelligent species that sought to escape their dying planet by astral projection. Some of their projected souls lost their "silver cord" connection with their bodies, but somehow they did not die but slowly dwindled. Without bodies, they lost their source of psionic energy so had to find it from somewhere, and developed the ability of tapping Prime Material beings of their mind-force. How their much reduced descendants developed the ability to reproduce is the great puzzle. Some think they can now project material bodies into the warm lakes and rivers of an unknown world, were they mate and lay eggs. Others that they breed on the ethereal plane by joining their energies to create tulpa-like thought-forms, that eventually gain independence and real substance.

09-03-2009, 03:07 PM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The ruins of a lost psychic platypus race would be a pretty unusual little dungeon.

AUS1 - "The Pyramids of the Monotreme Monarchs!"

Working with the other ideas:

Thought-Eaters have large natural PSP pools, but these are sufficient to sustain them for 50 hours on average. They relentlessly stalk first actively-used psionic and magical energy and only then begin to feed on latent sources. This makes them apparently adapted to stalk the use of energy rather than its presence. What if shaped energy is more easily digested?

Thought Eaters aren't the remains of the noble society, they're its bogeyman. A highly intelligent and creative society of artisans using psionic and magical crafting methods to work their environment (because they lacked hands.) Thought-Eaters are the nightmare conceived of by this society - they are attracted to shaped energy first and foremost and "hollow out" victims through the annihilation of mental activity. Rather than valuing immortality-through-creation, they exist only to persist.

09-03-2009, 05:11 PM

Wooster

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Not particularly. They're skinny arboreal carnivorous humanoids covered in little triangular green scales. I imagine them as having scales like a pangolin's, horny plates that used to be hair, except covered in algae for camouflage, like a sloth. I quite liked Kech for some reason, so my players ran into them a couple of times.

Oh, all right. They may have a touch of kobold-itis (are they dogs? tiny dragons? to gnomes what orcs are to elves?), then, in the sense that different folks portray them differently, because I always got the impression that we were dealing with angry, somewhat intelligent apemen covered in leaves.

09-03-2009, 08:46 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wooster

Oh, all right. They may have a touch of kobold-itis (are they dogs? tiny dragons? to gnomes what orcs are to elves?), then, in the sense that different folks portray them differently, because I always got the impression that we were dealing with angry, somewhat intelligent apemen covered in leaves.

Yup, their green scales resemble leaves, giving them excellent camouflage in trees. If I recall correctly, their Monster Manual II write-up doesn't give any clues as to their nature & origin, just some fluff about some jungle folk saying they're "forest demons", nor does it explicitly say they're reptilian, like a D&D kobold.

We could probably throw them into the "Ape-thing" pile, since even if its uncertain whether they are some kind of primate it seems likely, since they are human-shape probable mammals with prehensile hands and feet. If we can include Bar-Igura, Demogorgon, Yeti and Gorillar-Bears we can certainly throw in Kech!

Besides, I liked to throw Kech at my players.

I'll add them to the list.

Quote:

Updated List:

Carnivorous Apes (Man-Eating Monkeys!)

Gargantuan Carnivorous Apes (Oonga! AD&D's answer to King Kong)

Gorillas

Chimpanzees

Su-Monsters (Pyschic Psycho Monkeys!)

Hsing-Sing (White-furred sapient apes that are expert with ropes & lassoes. They're normally peaceable, but go crazy at a certain time of year.)

Monkey Spiders (They'll bite your eyes out)

Yetis (Look at the picture, there's no denying they're a kind of ape)

Gorilla-Bears

Gorillons (Try our new improved Carnivorous Ape, now with bonus extra arms!)

Tasloi (Obviously)

Bar-Igura (Demon Monkeys!)

Demogorgon (Well, he's got baboons' heads, hasn't he.)

Extra! Extra!

Phanaton (Gliding raccoon-monkeys)

Dakon (Peaceful tribal talking gorillas)

Kech (Leafy-scaled murderous hominids)

Things To Add

"Clakkars" (Moorcock's Winged Apemen. Nothing like them in D&D AFAIK, but there should be, or alternatively...)

Flying Killer Monkeys (Fly my pretties! Not in D&D, but we need them!)

09-04-2009, 08:05 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

Thought-Eaters have large natural PSP pools, but these are sufficient to sustain them for 50 hours on average. They relentlessly stalk first actively-used psionic and magical energy and only then begin to feed on latent sources. This makes them apparently adapted to stalk the use of energy rather than its presence. What if shaped energy is more easily digested?

Hmm... That raises an interesting questions.

A thought eater has to feed every few days or it becomes too weak to remain ethereal, and dies. So, what psychic creatures does a thought eater feed on, and how does it find them?

A thought eater swims through the ether slowly, but over 50 hours it could travel ~100 miles since, IIRC, ethereal travel is tireless. That's a fair distance, comparable how far a wolf or cat may travel over 4 days of patrolling its territory. But a thought eater is after far rarer prey than mice or caribou, psionic creatures are few and far between, most being rare or very rare. So, the thought eater must either live in a place with an unusual concentration of them, or be able to sense psionics from very far away. Unfortunately its MM entry does not give a range for its "psionic sense", but a brain mole can sense psionics over 200 yards, and it is psychically weaker than a thought eater. (Psi score 12 & PSP 100 versus Psi score 18 and PSP 101-200)

So, assuming it senses psionic creatures from great distances and makes a bee-line for them, that suggests thought eaters could be found anywhere, and are more likely to be encountered in densely populated areas. The more sapient minds, the more likelihoods of psychics to feed upon. A lot of thought eaters may live in cities, swimming ethereally through, above or underneath the building, passing effortlessly through solid matter to feed upon citizens with wild talents. Bouts of madness, catatonia or plain tiredness may not be due to the stress of city living, but invisible psychic predation.

Thought eaters also hunt in Dungeons. Apart from having an unusual number of psionic prey (Su-Monsters, Ustilagors, adventurers etc), a thought eater has great manoeuvrability advantage in a Dungeon. It can fly through walls, doors or solid rock, its prey have to follow tortuous corridors, and deal with traps and barriers.

Speaking of prey, many psionic creatures should make troublesome targets for a thought eater. Consider some of the Monstrous Manual's psionic monsters:

A Mind Flayer is way out of a thought-eater's league. It would just plane shift into the ether and suck the platypus-thing's brain out. Any other psionic creature able to enter the ethereal plane is similarly deadly to a thought eater, such as a Shedû, Intellect Devourer using astral projection, most Demons with psionic powers, et cetera).

A Couatl is psionic and has no innate means of attacking a thought eater, but it's a lot faster, so can simply fly or teleport away. If the thought eater only gets a couple of rounds of feeding, that's only 6 or 7 more hours of life. A Couatl (or any other fast creature) only needs to keep out of range and let the creature starve to death.

So, a thought eater needs prey that can't become ethereal to attack it, and can't flee fast enough to escape. A Brain Mole seems a perfect victim. They're even slower than a thought eater (3" vs 6") and have no way of counter-attacking. Unfortunately, they're even rarer than thought eaters (rare vs very rare). Maybe thought eater predation is why Brain Moles are so rare?

09-04-2009, 08:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Here are a few other thoughts I came up with while musings over thought eater ecology.

Consider the first and last sentences of the thought eater's Monstrous Manual description:

Ethereal Natives... or Space Aliens?

The description begins "Thought eaters are natives of the Border Ethereal" there's some suggestion they're not, for why do they fall into the Prime Material when they run out of juice? Surely, if they were ethereal natives, like ghosts, they'd just stay on that plane and need effort to interact with the Material?

Perhaps they're actually native to some freefall environment somewhere out in Space / the Phlogiston, and its gravity they can't survive? I'm imagining a Spelljammer ship discovering the "Reef of the Thought Eaters".

Dead Platypi?

The Thought Eater MM entry's final line ends saying these monster's corpses "are usually dismissed as platypi that died from starvation". Now apart from outrage about how that's not how you spell the plural of platypus, how can platypuses (or platypodes) be so abundant that when you find the skeleton of one on a dungeon floor you just wave it away? Furthermore, platypuses live in streams - what of thought eater skeletons found far from water? It's obvious nonsense.

No, it's far more likely the reverse misidentification will occur. Enough people with see invisible spells will have described the ethereal creatures that suck the wits and power out of mind-mages for thought eaters to be as well known as, say, intellect devourers. Platypuses, on the other hand may be very rare beasts only found on a far away shore, and when the first AD&D explorers discover them can you imagine their reaction:

"What's that?"

"It looks a bit like... oh Pelor preserve us! It's a thought eater!! They've found a way to live in the Prime Material plane"

"By my hammer, look how fat it is, all the other ones I've seen have been naught but skin and bones. It must have sucked the mind out of everyone for leagues around and is so full it does not want to feed on us!"

"Quick! Kill it!! Kill it!!!"

Adventure Seed: Murder by Thought Eater!

Finally, I realized that thought eaters would make great assassination weapons against psionic targets.

Just think, all a 9th+ level evil wizard need do is turn ethereal, grab three or five thought eaters (if the wizard is non-psionic, there is literally nothing a thought eater can do to defend itself) and transport them through the Border Ethereal to wherever its victim is.

Say, he's attacking a Gem Dragon. These psionic dragons are impressive in the Material world, but very few have any means of affecting or entering the ether. A few thought eaters would drain one mindless in a handful of rounds. All the wizard needs is a wicker cage to keep the thought eaters in and some means of keeping up with a flying dragon, and they'll have mindless dragons and a horde for the taking.

No wonder Gem Dragons are rarer than Metallic or Chromatic ones.

The same tactic could also be used against, say, a noblewoman with a wild talent. Leaving her servants to find a drooling vegetable in her bed.

09-04-2009, 10:49 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

... Now apart from outrage about how that's not how you spell the plural of platypus, how can platypuses (or platypodes) ...

Huzzah!

09-04-2009, 04:01 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Huzzah!

Ta Kojiro. I thought of you when I typed it.:cool: ;)

09-05-2009, 03:25 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

No, it's far more likely the reverse misidentification will occur. Enough people with see invisible spells will have described the ethereal creatures that suck the wits and power out of mind-mages for thought eaters to be as well known as, say, intellect devourers. Platypuses, on the other hand may be very rare beasts only found on a far away shore, and when the first AD&D explorers discover them can you imagine their reaction:

"What's that?"

"It looks a bit like... oh Pelor preserve us! It's a thought eater!! They've found a way to live in the Prime Material plane"

"By my hammer, look how fat it is, all the other ones I've seen have been naught but skin and bones. It must have sucked the mind out of everyone for leagues around and is so full it does not want to feed on us!"

"Quick! Kill it!! Kill it!!!"

The problem with that is that a platypus in the wild is extraordinarily difficult to spot. They're reclusive, they mostly live underwater (feeding off the bottom of rivers, and the entrance of their burrows is below the waterline), and they're very stealthy. I doubt that most adventurers would even notice a nearby platypus.

The last time I went to the zoo, I found it really hard to spot a platypus in its enclosure, and I was looking for an animal I knew to be there.

09-05-2009, 05:53 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james

The problem with that is that a platypus in the wild is extraordinarily difficult to spot. They're reclusive, they mostly live underwater (feeding off the bottom of rivers, and the entrance of their burrows is below the waterline), and they're very stealthy. I doubt that most adventurers would even notice a nearby platypus.

Perfectly true, although I would counter with:

- 1) Adventurers have really good Spot skills, and are always exploring holes in the ground.
- 2) It wouldn't be funny to go "what was that ripple in the water?" ... "Who cares, it's only a fish."

;)

09-05-2009, 09:40 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Perfectly true, although I would counter with:

- 1) Adventurers have really good Spot skills, and are always exploring holes in the ground.

And I counter with!

- 1) It's underwater. Adventurers hate going underwater. :p That's why all of those really cool aquatic monsters get so little use!

09-06-2009, 04:18 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james

And I counter with!

- 1) It's underwater. Adventurers hate going underwater. :p That's why all of those really cool aquatic monsters get so little use!

Well most of their burrow is dry, it's just the entrance that's usually underwater.

Some players I've known have certainly hated underwater adventures, and it's a shame those cool aquatic beasts don't get much love. Although a few of them are overrated, I ran an Architeuthis up against my PCs and it went out like a damp squib(d). :p

Anyway, maybe we're looking at this the wrong way. Perhaps those plump, secretive duck-billed platypodes are really interdimensional mind eaters, not the harmless insect-grubbers they appear. Each is connected via an undetectable silver cord to its ethereal Siamese twin, a Thought Eater. Most platypuses that die of unidentified illnesses have actually had their Ethereal Halves killed by adventurers, ghosts or psionic starvation.

09-06-2009, 04:26 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Anyway, maybe we're looking at this the wrong way. Perhaps those plump, secretive duck-billed platypuses are really inter-dimensional mind eaters, not the harmless insect-grubbers they appear. Each is connected via an undetectable silver cord to its ethereal Siamese twin, a Thought Eater. Most platypuses that die of unidentified illnesses have actually had their Ethereal Halves killed by adventurers, ghosts or psionic starvation.

Or perhaps platypuses are just the day jobs of the Thought Eaters? It's what they do in-between driving the local Brain Moles into extinction, living underwater and occasionally poisoning passers-by. The reason dead thought eaters look like dead platypuses is that they are the SAME ANIMAL, and it's only because no sages have actually looked into it that no-one has put two and two together yet. Adventurers are the only ones even remotely likely to have seen both animals but people who go into evil twisted dungeons for fun don't often make these vital connections, and if they do, no-one listens to them unless they are buying the drinks.

Friend of mine had a job studying platypuses, but got poisoned by one on the second day. Quite nasty stuff... Perhaps platypus venom screws with psionic powers.

Not that I ever bother using them, both platypuses and psionic powers.

09-06-2009, 04:51 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Hmm. Maybe getting stung by the venom of an Underdark-irradiated platypus gives you psionic powers?

Cue a hooded drow hiring a party of adventurers to bring her some live platypi...

09-06-2009, 06:09 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Or perhaps platypuses are just the day jobs of the Thought Eaters? It's what they do in-between driving the local Brain Moles into extinction, living underwater and occasionally poisoning passers-by. The reason dead thought eaters look like dead platypuses is that they are the SAME ANIMAL, and it's only because no sages have actually looked into it that no-one has put two and two together yet. Adventurers are the only ones even remotely likely to have seen both animals but people who go into evil twisted dungeons for fun don't often make these vital connections, and if they do, no-one listens to them unless they are buying the drinks.

Friend of mine had a job studying platypuses, but got poisoned by one on the second day. Quite nasty stuff... Perhaps platypus venom screws with psionic powers.

Not that I ever bother using them, both platypuses and psionic powers.

Hmm, that would mean that we live on the mysterious alternative prime material plane that was one of my suggested breeding grounds for Thought Eaters!

As for the venom, Thought Eaters are not venomous but that's easily explained: It's only the male duck-billed platypus that has poison spurs, so all Thought Eaters encountered are female. They could be like mosquitoes, except they need to drain psionic energy instead of blood to develop their eggs.

I like both ideas!

09-06-2009, 09:30 PM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

To those commenting on the difficulty of finding psionic victims to feed upon, remember that Thought-Eaters can also devour spells and generic Intelligence points. They always struck me as monsters that would be hard to actually work into a game. Until they attack, they're nearly impossible to detect, and they're liable to do catastrophic damage.

I suppose they could put some serious pressure on the PCs - that word of recall you were counting on - it's gone now.

09-07-2009, 04:18 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

To those commenting on the difficulty of finding psionic victims to feed upon, remember that Thought-Eaters can also devour spells and generic Intelligence points. They always struck me as monsters that would be hard to actually work into a game. Until they attack, they're nearly impossible to detect, and they're liable to do catastrophic damage.

Blast it! For some reason I was thinking they could only devour spells and Intelligence points from non-psionic characters in 1st edition AD&D, but re-reading the Monstrous Manual description they can in 2E as well. That means my assassin with a cage of Thought Eaters ploy will need some psychic protection.

Although it also says "they will also absorb any spell cast in the area" - that's a meaty ability.

Speaking of edition comparisons, the 3rd edition version of the Thought Eater[URL][B] is quite different, both in appearance (a ghoulish spiny hawk-headed dog-thing instead of the skeletal platypus we know and love) and powers (it pops into the material plane and has to touch you to eat your mind, losing the original's characteristic "attack from the Ether" power).

Personally, I prefer the somewhat goofy charm of the original, although I can see it needed a power cut.

09-07-2009, 04:24 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

To those commenting on the difficulty of finding psionic victims to feed upon, remember that Thought-Eaters can also devour spells and generic Intelligence points.

Obviously, their presence in great, invisible numbers around Earth is why nobody has been able to cast spells or do psionics in centuries... :cool:

09-07-2009, 10:24 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Thri-Kreen

A strangely content-lite entry for what is a fairly major D&D race, this; I'd say about a third of it is devoted to detailed the Hit Dice and THACO of different age categories of Thri-Kreen and their special combat abilities. This means there's much less ecology and cultural information to remark on; we're simply told that Thri-Kreen organise themselves into packs and roam around deserts and savannah hunting for food.

I do like Thri-Kreen, though. What's not to like about a race of praying mantis people? I was always slightly disappointed that the Thri-Kreen don't have the hinged forelimbs which are the signature of their real world cousins. But otherwise it's a perfectly sound concept.

In a way I suppose the lack of a section in which sages expound on bullshit creation myths and cultural mores is a strength in this entry, because it gives Thri-Kreen a sense of mystery which a lot of D&D races don't have. What motivates these strange hunters of the savannah? Where did they come from? What do they produce? All answers for DMs to decide for themselves. (Unless they buy all the Dark Sun setting info...)

There are some "related species": the Tohr-Kreen, who are the civilised, cultured version of the barbaric Thri-Kreen (clearly, yet another tilt at the "ancient civilised race laid low by blah blah catastrophe" motif), and the Xixchil, spacefaring Thri-Kreen who tantalisingly are described as "skilled surgeons and artificers, who enjoy replacing lost limbs with 'more efficient' substitutes."

09-07-2009, 12:42 PM

Naxuul

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

[There are some "related species": the Tohr-Kreen, who are the civilised, cultured version of the barbaric Thri-Kreen (clearly, yet another tilt at the "ancient civilised race laid low by blah blah catastrophe" motif)

Not quite. If my memory is right, the Thri-Kreen aren't the remnants of a destroyed empire, but more like Wood Elves. They're the colonists of a larger empire who went native and rustic. The Tohr-Kreen empire is, in the native Dark Sun setting it comes from, still quite alive and larger, more civilized and more advanced than the native area players come from. Rather than being a fallen empire, the Tohr-Kreen are more like the dangerous new evolution of civilization suited to Athas' blasted world.

-Naxuul

09-07-2009, 04:44 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

There are some "related species": the Tohr-Kreen, who are the civilised, cultured version of the barbaric Thri-Kreen (clearly, yet another tilt at the "ancient civilised race laid low by blah blah catastrophe" motif), and the Xixchil, spacefaring Thri-Kreen who tantalisingly are described as "skilled surgeons and artificers, who enjoy replacing lost limbs with 'more efficient' substitutes."

Too bad they just stick to more mantisfolk. There's a whole class of anthropomorphic insects to explore. The beetlefolk are nigh-unstoppable juggernauts driven by their ravenous and often disgusting appetites. The cricketfolk become the wise but playful fiddlers, who entertain the Imperial Court. A species of fleafolk live their entire lifecycle on the tarrasque, flourishing during the sleep cycles and holding tight for survival during the sometimes weeks-long bodyquakes. The termite folk built ancient empires around huge tessellated mounds, and all that remains is dust and the occasional massive chitin-plated relic uncovered by the sand. The peaceful nymphs who for some enigmatic reason occasionally turn darker, grow stronger, and then turn into a berserk horde that cuts a swath through civilization once every couple of generations. The wasps, with their unsavory method of reproduction, have become by necessity assassins-for-hire, who spirit away their victims for their own purposes.

09-07-2009, 05:47 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Too bad they just stick to more mantisfolk. There's a whole class of anthropomorphic insects to explore. The beetlefolk are nigh-unstoppable juggernauts driven by their ravenous and often disgusting appetites. The cricketfolk become the wise but playful fiddlers, who entertain the Imperial Court. A species of fleafolk live their entire lifecycle on the tarrasque, flourishing during the sleep cycles and holding tight for survival during the sometimes weeks-long bodyquakes. The termite folk built ancient empires around huge tessellated mounds, and all that remains is dust and the occasional massive chitin-plated relic uncovered by the sand. The peaceful nymphs who for some enigmatic reason occasionally turn darker, grow stronger, and then turn into a berserk horde that cuts a swath through civilization once every couple of generations. The wasps, with their unsavory method of reproduction, have become by necessity assassins-for-hire, who spirit away their victims for their own purposes.

I've sometimes thought about developing an anthropomorphic insect setting for D&D, probably for BECMI.

My homebrew setting, Yoon-Suin, has a lot of invertebrate-people.

09-07-2009, 07:53 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Too bad they just stick to more mantisfolk.

There is the aspis but they were relegated to the insect entry (ie almost no write up). Some non-humanoid insectoid peoples would be nice.

When I first read of them in the MM II, I thought of thri-kreen as desert dwelling locusts and never really got away from that. Grasshoppers can be carnivorous and unlike mantids, they can be found in very large swarms.

Xixchil are awesome- they have no sense of human esthetics and so modify people efficiently. In their Ecology, there is mention of a dwarf that has his head used as a muscle anchor point and a woman who wanted feathered wings ends up looking like a werebat in hybrid form.

09-08-2009, 04:59 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Can I just say: SECTAURS FUCK YEAH!!!!

09-08-2009, 09:25 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Xixchil are awesome- they have no sense of human esthetics and so modify people effciently. In their Ecology, there is mention of a dwarf that has his head used as a muscle anchor point and a woman who wanted feathered wings ends up looking like a werebat in hybrid form.

Maybe that's where China Mieville got his idea for the Remade from.

09-08-2009, 09:11 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Xixchil are awesome- they have no sense of human esthetics and so modify people effciently. In their Ecology, there is mention of a dwarf that has his head used as a muscle anchor point and a woman who wanted feathered wings ends up looking like a werebat in hybrid form.

Dwarf with muscles bulging from his skull glowers at DMH, snarling "Human aesthetics? Who ya calling human? Do ya want yer teeth knocked out!" :D

Ahem

Yes, the Thri-Kreen entry is rather short of background detail, it's little different from the 1st edition version.

09-08-2009, 09:26 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Dwarf with muscles bulging from his skull glowers at DMH, snarling "Human aesthetics? Who ya calling human? Do ya want yer teeth knocked out!" :D

Remember the mul? Dwarves are to humans as donkeys are to horses. Maybe that makes gnomes hinnies :).

09-09-2009, 12:45 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Wakboth

Obviously, their presence in great, invisible numbers around Earth is why nobody has been able to cast spells or do psionics in centuries... :cool:

Well that goes without saying. :)

09-09-2009, 01:17 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

To those commenting on the difficulty of finding psionic victims to feed upon, remember that Thought-Eaters can also devour spells and generic Intelligence points. They always struck me as monsters that would be hard to actually work into a game. Until they attack, they're nearly impossible to detect, and they're liable to do catastrophic damage.

Upon reflection, I remember my reasons for thinking Thought-Eaters can only attack psionic characters, and I think I've got a pretty good case.

The Monstrous Manual entry says "Their only "attack" is their innate ability to absorb psionic energy. They can absorb psionic energy within 60 feet of a true psionist or psionic creature, or within 10 feet of a wild talent." There's nothing about their sole attack affecting other creatures, which means non-psionic beings should be immune.

Here's another thought. A Thought-Eater targets its Prime Material via its psionic sense, right. If a non-psionic opponent enters the ether to attack it, how would the monster know they're there? It doesn't have any visible eyes or ears. I guess their psionic sense could be acute enough to pick up "brain waves".

Finally, I wondered what organ the Thought-Eater gets its psionic sense from. I guess it could be its brain, but I prefer to think it has a psionic-sensitive bill. Platypuses can sense the nerve-firings of small animals with their bill, so it seems reasonable to think Thought-Eaters use their bills to detect the energy emissions of their prey too.

09-09-2009, 10:13 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The Monstrous Manual entry says "Their only "attack" is their innate ability to absorb psionic energy. They can absorb psionic energy within 60 feet of a true psionist or psionic creature, or within 10 feet of a wild talent." There's nothing about their sole attack affecting other creatures, which means non-psionic beings should be immune.

I interpreted that to mean that Thought-Eaters will affect all creatures if there is a psionist within 60 feet. In other words, they only "switch on" their attack when there's a psionist about, but it affects everybody else once it's in use.

09-09-2009, 05:47 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I interpreted that to mean that Thought-Eaters will affect all creatures if there is a psionicist within 60 feet. In other words, they only "switch on" their attack when there's a psionicist about, but it affects everybody else once it's in use.

Yes, I realized that was another interpretation, I just preferred the former. There isn't anything concrete either way.

Ah AD&D, its occasionally vague and contradictory rules are part of the charm. ;)

09-10-2009, 03:17 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I interpreted that to mean that Thought-Eaters will affect all creatures if there is a psionicist within 60 feet. In other words, they only "switch on" their attack when there's a psionicist about, but it affects everybody else once it's in use.

If this is the case, the best strategy for a thought eater would be to find a psionic character and start killing everyone else in the vicinity. The non psionic character wouldn't have any way of dealing with a Thought-Eater, unless someone plane shifts over to the ethereal plane. For a group unable to see ethereal things, they may never realize why the psion's buddies keep dying randomly. If thought eaters were more common, psions would be shunned from society (like mages from Dark Sun), since anyone in their presence could die at any moment, regardless of how the psion feels about them.

It would actually be pretty stupid to attack the one creature that can hurt you, if there's defenseless prey nearby.

(Though thought eaters are "basically stupid" so they probably don't strategize much.)

09-10-2009, 03:52 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

If thought eaters were more common, psions would be shunned from society (like mages from Dark Sun), since anyone in their presence could die at any moment, regardless of how the psion feels about them.)

Technically, they wouldn't die, just turn into mindless vegetables. And apparently, psychic surgery can fix that.

09-11-2009, 05:46 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

If this is the case, the best strategy for a thought eater would be to find a psionic character and start killing everyone else in the vicinity. The non psionic character wouldn't have any way of dealing with a Thought-Eater, unless someone plane shifts over to the ethereal plane. For a group unable to see ethereal things, they may never realize why the psion's buddies keep dying randomly. If thought eaters were more common, psions would be shunned from society (like mages from Dark Sun), since anyone in their presence could die at any moment, regardless of how the psion feels about them.

It would actually be pretty stupid to attack the one creature that can hurt you, if there's defenseless prey nearby.

(Though thought eaters are "basically stupid" so they probably don't strategize much.)

Interesting idea. Although I'd interpret the Monstrous Manual as saying Thought-Eaters drain all valid targets within range indiscriminately, which would prevent the Thought-Eater targeting non-psionics only, I'd like them to be able to target individuals.

Oh, and as for the "basically stupid", they have an effective 18 in all their ability scores for purposes of psionics, so maybe they would act like geniuses if only they could divert themselves from their overwhelming hunger for PSPs. Makes me wonder what would happen if you put a ring of sustenance or that nourishment-providing ioun stone on a Thought-Eater. Would it start acting like a sapient being, able to think of other things than its immediate need to feed?

09-11-2009, 06:45 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Oh, and as for the "basically stupid", they have an effective 18 in all their ability scores for purposes of psionics, so maybe they would act like geniuses if only they could divert themselves from their overwhelming hunger for PSPs. Makes me wonder what would happen if you put a ring of sustenance or that nourishment-providing ioun stone on a Thought-Eater. Would it start acting like a sapient being, able to think of other things than its immediate need to feed?

A nigh-untouchable super genius invisible duck thing, who uses a series of low level psionic henchmen to get near his enemies and make them into vegetables. If the PCs can figure out what's happening, then they still need to get into the Ethereal plane and get the ring off of the damned platypus monster.

I could see that as an adventure, though an odd one.

09-15-2009, 08:32 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Imagine how desperately such a one would fight to keep such a ring from being taken from him, devolving him back into a non-sentient being ruled entirely by his basest hungers, not even capable of fathoming the intelligence he is capable of. If one used him as a lesser villain, rather than a major one, that could be an interesting moral dilemma in and of itself.

An Ustilagor and Thought-Eater could work together interestingly - the Intellect Devourer is immune to psionic attacks, and the thought eater could drain the ustilagor's enemies/ abilities before the latter attacks. Of course, they're both unintelligent, but it could make for a nasty encounter.

09-15-2009, 10:22 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

A nigh-untouchable super genius invisible duck thing, who uses a series of low level psionic henchmen to get near his enemies and make them into vegetables. If the PCs can figure out what's happening, then they still need to get into the Ethereal plane and get the ring off of the damned platypus monster.

I could see that as an adventure, though an odd one.

That was my initial concept too, the sapient Thought-Eater as an immaterial super-villain bent on rebuilding the long lost Mind-Empire of the Monotremes or somesuch, but then I asked myself why would it be hostile?

Thought-Eaters only ate minds to survive and our genius Thought-Eater doesn't need to, so it could express its Neutral alignment in all manner of other ways.

Perhaps it's a renowned sage, scholar and philosopher, solving the most obscure problems in return for having rare books and luxuries plane shifted into the ether for it to enjoy.

Maybe it's a lover of poetry, music and plays, protecting a particularly controversial troupe of actors and giving rise to stories of a "phantom of opera".

Or, if it's a protector, it could be True Neutral and want to protect nature, teaming up with druids to track down and destroy defilers of the wilderness. A Thought-Eater's ability to spy ethereally, such out minds and cancel spells would make it a very powerful ally.

09-15-2009, 10:40 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

Imagine how desperately such a one would fight to keep such a ring from being taken from him, devolving him back into a non-sentient being ruled entirely by his basest hungers, not even capable of fathoming the intelligence he is capable of. If one used him as a lesser villain, rather than a major one, that could be an interesting moral dilemma in and of itself.

Reminds me of the bit near the end of 2001 when HAL 9000 has its cognitive circuits disconnected.

Come to think of it, if one Thought-Eater becomes (regains?) consciousness by obtaining a ring of sustenance or the like, surely it will want to acquire more of the items to free others of its kind from mindless hunger?

09-15-2009, 11:03 PM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Reminds me of the bit near the end of 2001 when HAL 9000 has its cognitive circuits disconnected.

Come to think of it, if one Thought-Eater becomes (regains?) consciousness by obtaining a ring of sustenance or the like, surely it will want to acquire more of the items to free others of its kind from mindless hunger?

He would need some kind of minions capable of moving between the Prime and Ethereal Planes to transport the rings for him. But it could certainly make for an interesting set of adventurers - the PCs go to visit some wizard and find him starved to death, intelligence devoured (though they wouldn't know that). There are obvious signs of intrusion, but nothing obvious is missing. Similar scenes are appearing across the world, and even the most paranoid wizards are falling victim. Can the PCs stop the Rise of the Thought-Eaters?

09-16-2009, 01:07 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Titan

Titans are a funny one. They're so unbelievably powerful that you have to wonder if it's worth even bothering to stat them up; not only do you have a 20th level priest or mage, you have a 20th level priest or mage who can deal 7d6 + 14 hp of damage per hit with two attacks a round, has 20 HD, can cast dozens of spells at will, can become ethereal, and isn't harmed by nonmagical weapons. The authors may as well have simply said, "Titans aren't gods exactly, but they're too powerful for adventurers" and just left it at that. Although I suppose they still wanted to keep the theoretical possibility of killing one open. Something to aim for after you've slain the Tarrasque.

Anyway, you probably know the deal with Titans. Big bastards who live on Olympus, who have a basically Ancient Greek cultural background, and who have the passionate and fiery nature that suggests. They like dancing, fighting, debating, singing, drinking wine and (one guesses) shagging goats with abandon. Giant 25' goats, of course. They aren't statted up though.

The entry is intriguing, because it feels only half complete. For instance, what are we to make of this sentence: "On Olympus, titans have developed a culture similar to what they found there."? It implies that Titans came from somewhere else to Olympus and decided to stay, but there's no other hint in the entry as to why.

Similarly, this little fragment: "What makes them immortal is not known. Perhaps it is their enchanted existence in the halls of Olympus." Are we to assume then that anybody who reaches Olympus and sets up stall there becomes immortal?

Anyway, the most interesting idea associated with Titans is, I suppose, the concept of the Titan who believe he is a God and is worshiped as such by mortal followers... but is then brought low by his hubris in some way. (The entry uses the example of an upstart Titan who gets chained to the bottom of the ocean for 100 years by Odin.) It would be quite an interesting plot hook to have the adventurers stumble across a down on his luck Titan who is after revenge against the God who wronged him. Maybe not at the bottom of the ocean, though.

09-16-2009, 10:42 AM

Kakita Kojiro

You know, if you have a Titan from Olympus being chained to the bottom of the sea by Odin... either you're failing your Classics class, or you're playing D&D.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Maybe it's a lover of poetry, music and plays, protecting a particularly controversial troupe of actors and giving rise to stories of a "phantom of opera".

Makes me think of a genius Thought-Eater who is a connoisseur. Perhaps he protects that troupe of actors because it's more enjoyable eating the Int of the audience while they're watching the play.

09-17-2009, 03:19 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
isn't harmed by nonmagical weapons.

I love this. Because if you're trying to hit a Titan with a nonmagical weapon, then you're already doing something wrong. Is the text really necessary? Anyone who thinks that they have a chance of killing a titan should have a magical weapon already. Several, most likely.

It also makes me wonder if titans are immune to all nonmagical damage. Is a titan immune to falling damage? Do they ignore an avalanche? If so, then titans pasttimes might be very different than humans ones. If not, then adventurers could set up traps to trigger avalanches or the like when they decide to finally fight the titan. That would make a good set piece.

09-17-2009, 03:56 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Oh yeah, titans. They're possibly the hardest monster in the whole MM. (Also, why are they all CG, anyway? In the Greek mythology, many titans were pretty awful.)

I like the bit of "mini-mythology", with the listed titans and their strange and powerful powers; has anyone involved those in their game? You could have distant, impersonal deities, and then a bunch of titans living on a huge mountain at the center of the world as the managers of the world...

09-17-2009, 04:10 AM

Dormammu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur
Oh yeah, titans. They're possibly the hardest monster in the whole MM. (Also, why are they all CG, anyway? In the Greek mythology, many titans were pretty awful.)

Titans in D&D don't bear any resemblance to Greek Titans at all, really. Actually 4E's primordial/elemental/chaos version of Titans are probably closer to Greek ones.

09-17-2009, 06:17 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot
It also makes me wonder if titans are immune to all nonmagical damage. Is a titan immune to falling damage? Do they ignore an avalanche? If so, then titans pasttimes might be very different than humans ones. If not, then adventurers could set up traps to trigger avalanches or the like when they decide to finally fight the titan. That would make a good set piece.

That's how I've always run AD&D creatures that need magic weapons to hurt. Mundane damage simply doesn't affect them - it either passes through harmlessly, bounces off, or the wounds instantly vanish. A titan hit by an avalanche may be trapped beneath it, but won't be killed. Unless it's a magic avalanche, of course.

That said, those magic-to-hit monsters that are living creatures still have biological weaknesses, so can be suffocated, starved, poisoned et cetera. There's a bit at the start of one of the AD&D Conan adventures where the party (all 9th+ level fighters and fighter/thieves) meet a gargoyle. They don't have any magic arms, and the adventure specifically says they can't hurt it by normal means, but can hurt it by using the unarmed combat rules. Imagine Red Sonja strangling a gargoyle!

Back in the 1st edition DMG there was a special rule that particularly tough (high HD) monsters could hit creatures immune to non magical weapons up to a certain plus. If I remember correctly it worked out something like ogres could hit +1 magic-to-hit monsters, giants +2 or +3, titans +4. That's a bit contradictory to the magic-to-hit renders you completely immune to brute force theory, but I rationalized it as such creatures could hit supernatural creatures because their strength (Hit Dice) was itself partially magical, not just because they were strong.

09-17-2009, 09:59 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Dormammu

Titans in D&D don't bear any resemblance to Greek Titans at all, really. Actually 4E's primordial/elemental/chaos version of Titans are probably closer to Greek ones.

There were 'proper' titans living on Carceri, detailed in I think Planes of Conflict.

09-17-2009, 11:03 PM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Makes me think of a genius Thought-Eater who is a connoisseur. Perhaps he protects that troupe of actors because it's more enjoyable eating the Int of the audience while they're watching the play.

Interesting twist on the whole 'television makes you stupid' trope. ;)

(Actually, I don't see why coaxial cable couldn't also be a psychic conduit allowing the Thought-Eaters to drain intelligence points remotely.)

I never found much use for C/G semi-deities. They seem a bit like the ultimate tool for a DM to reign in an out of control party before he has to resort to actual divine smiting.

09-18-2009, 01:51 PM

HaplessVictim

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

It also makes me wonder if titans are immune to all nonmagical damage. Is a titan immune to falling damage? Do they ignore an avalanche?

I don't recall specifically what the 1st and 2nd edition rules are, but we house-ruled it that each "plus" of non-magical damage resistance a creature had would absorb 2d6 of non-magical environment damage per attack. For example, since a Marilith can only be damaged by +2 weapons or better, she could fall 40 feet without damage. (This immunity didn't cover drowning or asphyxiation damage.) This gave a nice supernaturally tough, mythic feel to damage-resistant creatures, while still making them susceptible to massive amounts of mundane damage (i.e. crushed by an avalanche).

To keep this post topical, I once participated in a campaign where titans (of various diverse alignments) were the earthly avatars of the gods. This lent the pantheon a "gods walk among us," pre-Christian vibe -- you could physically talk (or even, in theory, kill) the worldly representative of your god -- and at the same time made the gods themselves more worthy of awe. If the nearly-indestructible titans were only the petty avatars of the gods, how much more powerful are THEY?

09-21-2009, 01:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim

I don't recall specifically what the 1st and 2nd edition rules are, but we house-ruled it that each "plus" of non-magical damage resistance a creature had would absorb 2d6 of non-magical environment damage per attack. For example, since a Marilith can only be damaged by +2 weapons or better, she could fall 40 feet without damage. (This immunity didn't cover drowning or asphyxiation damage.) This gave a nice supernaturally tough, mythic feel to damage-resistant creatures, while still making them susceptible to massive amounts of mundane damage (i.e. crushed by an avalanche).

Well I liked them being immune to mundane impact damage, it gave them a nice supernatural quality in the "Nothing but a weapon blessed by the Craft can harm the demon that torments us" vein.

09-21-2009, 01:47 AM

Naxuul

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Dormammu

Titans in D&D don't bear any resemblance to Greek Titans at all, really. Actually 4E's primordial/elemental/chaos version of Titans are probably closer to Greek ones.

I don't see how. All the titans were beautiful and powerful, be they Zeus, Tethys, Cronus, Oceanos, Prometheus etc. 'Weird monstrous elemental thingies' would be more like the Cyclops, Hetachonchire, Typhon, Echidna and other weirder things to come out of Gaia's earthen womb.

4E Primordials are more like Uranus and Gaia than the proper titans.

-Naxuul

09-21-2009, 08:56 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul

I don't see how. All the titans were beautiful and powerful, be they Zeus, Tethys, Cronus, Oceanos, Prometheus etc. 'Weird monstrous elemental thingies' would be more like the Cyclops, Hetachonchire, Typhon, Echidna and other weirder things to come out of Gaia's earthen womb.

4E Primordials are more like Uranus and Gaia than the proper titans.

-Naxuul

Hur hur, you said Uranus.

09-21-2009, 06:02 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Naxuul

I don't see how. All the titans were beautiful and powerful, be they Zeus, Tethys, Cronus, Oceanos, Prometheus etc. 'Weird monstrous elemental thingies' would be more like the Cyclops, Hetachonchire, Typhon, Echidna and other weirder things to come out of Gaia's earthen womb.

4E Primordials are more like Uranus and Gaia than the proper titans.

-Naxuul

I always saw the Titans as big, nasty, primordial sort of things the things before the current, rather fetching but capricious, crop of gods and goddesses.

Going on the basis of my brief fascination with Greek mythology when aged 8, and wikipedia, I think the Titans were sort of elemental, but fundamental, primal stuff rather than the glossy, shiny, weirdos that inhabit the world of later D&D editions. (Time, memory, natural law?)

Anyway, quests to dig up, awaken or free one of these leftovers of a bygone era are always fun, as not only are you going against the rather strong prohibitions of the current gods, but, unlike the current gods, who may smite you, make your life a living hell or make love to you shaped as a bull, these Titans are really, really strange and almost completely incomprehensible.

And usually want to rain chaos down on the world rather than answer your modest questions about the location of The Tomb of Arcos....

09-22-2009, 03:26 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

unlike the current gods, who may smite you, make your life a living hell or make love to you shaped as a bull, these Titans are really, really strange and almost completely incomprehensible.

For a long time, I have wanted to play a cleric of Cronus, god/Titan of Time, and baby-eating. As deity of time, Cronus foresaw his own downfall by his son, so he sent one of his high priests forward into the future to try to free Cronus from his future imprisonment. So now the former high priest has reduced clerical powers (Cronus can grant small power while imprisoned... putting the cleric at the same power level as the other PCs) and is fighting the other gods to free Cronus from whatever extradimensional prison he's in.

Time would be a fun domain, but I'm not sure what spells you'd get for baby-eating. (At least one kobold god should share the domain, though.)

It's dodgy mythology at best, but D&D is all about dodgy myths and folklore in service of a good game.

09-22-2009, 05:00 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

For a long time, I have wanted to play a cleric of Cronus, god/Titan of Time, and baby-eating. As deity of time, Cronus foresaw his own downfall by his son, so he sent one of his high priests forward into the future to try to free Cronus from his future imprisonment. So now the former high priest has reduced clerical powers (Cronus can grant small power while imprisoned... putting the cleric at the same power level as the other PCs) and is fighting the other gods to free Cronus from whatever extradimensional prison he's in.

Time would be a fun domain, but I'm not sure what spells you'd get for baby-eating. (At least one kobold god should share the domain, though.)

It's dodgy mythology at best, but D&D is all about dodgy myths and folklore in service of a good game.

...and after unsuccessfully scouring all the planes for his god's extradimensional prison the high priest discovers the kobold diety is Cronus, trapped in that form for eons inconceivable to a mere mortal.

Mark my words, Kobolds, will be the new Titans! :)

09-22-2009, 06:37 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

For a long time, I have wanted to play a cleric of Cronus, god/Titan of Time, and baby-eating. As deity of time, Cronus foresaw his own downfall by his son, so he sent one of his high priests forward into the future to try to free Cronus from his future imprisonment. So now the former high priest has reduced clerical powers (Cronus can grant small power while imprisoned... putting the cleric at the same power level as the other PCs) and is fighting the other gods to free Cronus from whatever extradimensional prison he's in.

Time would be a fun domain, but I'm not sure what spells you'd get for baby-eating. (At least one kobold god should share the domain, though.)

For a spin on the concept, perhaps Cronus is doing the good thing.

The new clergy have a great secret, revealed only the highest of priests. A secret terrifying enough to age them prematurely, and make them shiver in their sanctuaries. A secret they are compelled to protect by the beings they worship.

For the children of Cronus and Rhea were stillborn. The image they project, of strong and lustly beings with great earthy appetites and all-too-human failings, is just a facade. Divine mummery, illusion. For Zeus, Hera, Poseidon, Hades, and all their siblings, buried behind layers of deceit, are atropals. Vile undead abominations, Gaia's abortions. And Aphrodite, born from the member Cronus severed from his father, is something even fouler.

The stomach of the ruler of the golden age is the only vessel powerful enough to contain them. Eating the babies is the only solution.

09-23-2009, 12:44 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

For a spin on the concept, perhaps Cronus is doing the good thing.

The new clergy have a great secret, revealed only the highest of priests. A secret terrifying enough to age them prematurely, and make them shiver in their sanctuaries. A secret they are compelled to protect by the beings they worship.

For the children of Cronus and Rhea were stillborn. The image they project, of strong and lustly beings with great earthy appetites and all-too-human failings, is just a facade. Divine mummery, illusion. For Zeus, Hera, Poseidon, Hades, and all their siblings, buried behind layers of deceit, are atropals. Vile undead abominations, Gaia's abortions. And Aphrodite, born from the member Cronus severed from his father, is something even fouler.

The stomach of the ruler of the golden age is the only vessel powerful enough to contain them. Eating the babies is the only solution.

Curious. I was thinking of about making up a myth justifying Cronus's baby-eating to, although with a rather different slant...

In the beginning, everything that existed was alive and conscious. Every rock, stream and breeze had a living, thinking spirit. When they "died" they merely pooled back with the elemental forces and were reborn in new, fresh forms. Some of these nature spirits were sapient - nymphs and satyrs, elves and brownies - creatures that could dream and talk and imagine, and the greatest of these were the Titans, ruled by the mighty Cronus.

Cronus looked into the future and saw that his yet to be born children, the gods, would destroy the natural balance of the world. The gods would invent a new kind of being, a mortal whose spirit and material existence were separate. When such a being died its spirit could be carried off by a god out into the Astral Wastes to be trapped in a dreamlike heaven or hell, were they would become the playthings of the gods, instead of returning to the world and rebirth like nature intended. The body left behind would be merely lifeless ashes and clay, and after eons the drain of spiritual essence from the world would leave it a dull and wonder-less place.

Obviously, Cronus could not countenance such a thing, so he followed the best path that he could foresee. Imprisoning the gods in his stomach kept them out of mischief for many millenia, and he sent his favoured priests into the far future so that he would return to life in that distant time, ages after he was grossly and treacherously slain by his last-born son Zeus.

09-23-2009, 02:48 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

...and after unsuccessfully scouring all the planes for his god's extradimensional prison the high priest discovers the kobold diety is Cronus, trapped in that form for eons inconceivable to a mere mortal.

Mark my words, Kobolds, will be the new Titans! :)

Kobolds as worshippers of imprisoned Titans is pretty neat. They don't eat your baby just because it's delicious (though it is), but in worship of their imprisoned titan master.

As a bonus, kobolds are inherently opposed to any D&D party with a cleric or paladin in them. And have their own weird heresies to espouse as they fight.

09-23-2009, 04:40 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Kobolds as worshippers of imprisoned Titans is pretty neat. They don't eat your baby just because it's delicious (though it is), but in worship of their imprisoned titan master.

As a bonus, kobolds are inherently opposed to any D&D party with a cleric or paladin in them. And have their own weird heresies to espouse as they fight.

I learned a new word today.

I wonder if the kobolds have developed a version of the terducken. A dwarf baby stuffed with an elf baby stuffed with a gnome baby stuffed with a halfling baby, and roasted to a crispy goodness. Badness? It's all relative.

09-23-2009, 05:43 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I learned a new word today.

I wonder if the kobolds have developed a version of the terducken. A dwarf baby stuffed with an elf baby stuffed with a gnome baby stuffed with a halfling baby, and roasted to a crispy goodness. Badness? It's all relative.

These days, at least, halflings are bigger than gnomes. (Though the 3.x PHB seemed to show gnomes as bigger. Never noticed that.) Who was bigger in previous editions?

Somewhere in one of Paizo's adventure paths they had a Terducken made out of stupid D&D monsters (tojanida, I think, and maybe axebeak?). Or maybe our GM made that up, I have no idea.

09-23-2009, 05:53 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

These days, at least, halflings are bigger than gnomes. (Though the 3.x PHB seemed to show gnomes as bigger. Never noticed that.) Who was bigger in previous editions?

Somewhere in one of Paizo's adventure paths they had a Terducken made out of stupid D&D monsters (tojanida, I think, and maybe axebeak?). Or maybe our GM made that up, I have no idea.

What is the world coming to these days? Gnomes shorter than halflings.... ;)

They're about the same size on average (by the 2nd edition PHB), but halflings have a larger range:

Gnomes: 39-44"

Halflings: 34-48"

The Monstrous Manual tends to put gnomes as taller, depending on subrace.

09-23-2009, 06:23 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

These days, at least, halflings are bigger than gnomes. (Though the 3.x PHB seemed to show gnomes as bigger. Never noticed that.) Who was bigger in previous editions?

Forest gnomes might fit in a teapot :)

Ignoring odd subraces, gnomes tend to win out by a hair. Or none at all, for the svirfneblin. If you want to Appeal to the Authority of Gyax (1E DMG p. 102):

Male gnome 42 +/- 1d3 in.

Female gnome 39 +/- 1d3 in.

Male halfling 36 -1d3 or +1d6 in.

Female halfling 33 +/- 1d3 in.

And a 20–25 lb difference.

09-23-2009, 07:10 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

RPG.net's gone terducken crazy today.

09-23-2009, 07:18 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

It's not called a terkey, people. Turducken. ;)

09-27-2009, 06:39 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi

It's not called a terkey, people. Turducken. ;)

This is D&D, it could very well be a "Terkey". I'm thinking some horrible magical hybrid of a Giant Termite and a large gamebird.

09-28-2009, 11:14 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Toad, Giant

I'm having a weird sense of deja vu here; didn't we already talk about Giant Toads and how they're the bane of halfling and gnome characters everywhere? Perhaps I'm imagining it, and don't really have the time or energy to trawl through the previous threads... Maybe somebody else remembers.

Anyway. Toads. Big ones. Giant, if you will. Different to Giant Frogs somehow - I was never clear on the difference between a toad and a frog. They live in damp areas, often underground, always close to a water source, and are ambush predators who like to lie in wait for their prey.

Sometimes they make their homes in sewers ("giant monstrosities which have grown fat on vermin, house pets, and, occasionally, civil engineers"), which strikes me as a fun encounter.

Fire Toad

These large red amphibians prefer dry areas. Their main distinction is that they can breathe small fire balls. The Fire Toad is, to me, the ne plus ultra of D&D monster design. You can almost picture a few designers sitting around in the office late on a Friday afternoon, unable to leave until they've come up with their monster quota for the week, the first beer of the night so close they can almost taste it... When one of them suddenly blurts out, "Let's just have a giant toad that can breathe fire and be done with it!" And they all head off down the pub.

Ice Toad

These anti-Fire Toads make their home in Arctic regions and can radiate cold. Bizarrely, they have average intelligence and have their own language - an even rarer character sheet feature than Elven Cat?

One can easily envisage an Ice Toad civilisation somewhere up there in the frozen north, perhaps with a Quaggoth slave caste and lots of Remorhaz to ride around on.

Poisonous Toad

Basically the same as a Giant Toad, except able to secrete poison which somehow works through a bite attack. (Aren't poisonous frogs and toads always more defensive, i.e. you get poisoned if you bite it, rather than vice versa?) Anyway, there's some unintended humour in the fact that the poison is described as "weak" (you get a +2 bonus to the saving throw) even though a failed save results in death within 24 hours.

09-29-2009, 04:09 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I'm having a weird sense of deja vu here; didn't we already talk about Giant Toads and how they're the bane of halfling and gnome characters everywhere? Perhaps I'm imagining it, and don't really have the time or energy to trawl through the previous threads... Maybe somebody else remembers.

Anyway. Toads. Big ones. Giant, if you will. Different to Giant Frogs somehow - I was never clear on the difference between a toad and a frog.

I think you answered your own question here: You're confusing giant toads with giant frogs. Giant frogs (covered way back in the Fs) can drag people in with their sticky tongues, and they can do this more effectively if the frog is bigger than the target. So small sized characters like gnomes are screwed over yet again by D&D.

09-29-2009, 09:25 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

I think you answered your own question here: You're confusing giant toads with giant frogs. Giant frogs (covered way back in the Fs) can drag people in with their sticky tongues, and they can do this more effectively if the frog is bigger than the target. So small sized characters like gnomes are screwed over yet again by D&D.

Aha. That would make sense.

Interesting that there are separate giant frog and toad entries. You would think they could be lumped together...

09-29-2009, 09:43 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Aha. That would make sense.

Interesting that there are separate giant frog and toad entries. You would think they could be lumped together...

Well, there are separate entries for Frog and Toad, and each gets their own "Giant" variety, with its own stats. Why you need different stats for Frogs and Toads, I don't know. (I realize that they are different, but they're not different enough for me to care or for me to need different stats for each variety.)

09-29-2009, 10:06 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Well, there are separate entries for Frog and Toad, and each gets their own "Giant" variety, with its own stats. Why you need different stats for Frogs and Toads, I don't know. (I realize that they are different, but they're not different enough for me to care or for me to need different stats for each variety.)

"Toad" is generally applied to frogs who have adapted to terrestrial environments. This has happened a lot of times, in the frog (anuran) family tree. Frogs and toads aren't distinct family groups. They're like one big extended family with random cousins here and there who listen to death metal.

09-29-2009, 02:44 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Don't forget that you can make warty, smelly toad-leather armor! It says so right there in the entry!

Hmmm... magical toad-leather armor that makes you inpalatable to biting things?

09-29-2009, 11:54 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

There are also more magical toads than frogs--see the fire and ice toads. The best giant frogs ever get is "killer".

It always confused me that ice toads were intelligent back when I was a young'un. Of course, they don't have thumbs, so how well they can put that intelligence to use is another question, but I do much like the idea of the ice toads as bizarre Northern raiders, sweeping into small villages in the dead of night, leaving behind nothing but blood on the snow.

09-30-2009, 01:19 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Toad, Giant

I'm having a weird sense of deja vu here; didn't we already talk about Giant Toads and how they're the bane of halfling and gnome characters everywhere? Perhaps I'm imagining it, and don't really have the time or energy to trawl through the previous threads... Maybe somebody else remembers.

As Mr Teapot has already said, that was our Giant Frog discussion.

Now regarding AD&D's giant Batrachians, it seems wrong somehow that they aren't tough enough to take on most giant insects. The largest Giant Frog has the same 3 hit dice as a Giant Bluebottle. Of course, it's noticeable that AD&D's giant arthropods are, well, gianter (for want of a better word) than its giant vertebrates. Still, I'd like Giant Frogs and Toads to be more the size of water buffaloes and elephants, so they can gulp down fire beetles and giant flies.

The fact that this would make them much nastier foes for PCs to face is, of course, entirely circumstantial.

Actually, I've long toyed with the idea of a fantasy roleplaying scenario or campaign where all the animals are GIANT - frogs the size of houses, hundred foot-long monitor lizards, et cetera. Nothing ever came from it, although there are a number of published scenarios which play with the idea through the "shrinking the PCs to bug size" ploy.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Sometimes they make their homes in sewers ("giant monstrosities which have grown fat on vermin, house pets, and, occasionally, civil engineers"), which strikes me as a fun encounter.

That was my thinking to. It'd have to be a very low level AD&D party for a giant toad to be a "monstrosity" of course ... unless you exchange it for a Froghemoth.:D

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Fire Toad

Have you seen the Amicus film At the Earth's Core? There's a creature in it that's the spitting image of a Fire Toad, complete with flamethrower. I've long wondered whether whoever was responsible for it had been reading the Monster Manual, since I don't think any such creature appears in any of the Edgar Rice Burroughs novels it is based on. You can see a video of it from this review of the film.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Ice Toad

One can easily envisage an Ice Toad civilisation somewhere up there in the frozen north, perhaps with a Quaggoth slave caste and lots of Remorhaz to ride around on.

I find your suggestion intriguing. They could be like Lovecraft's Moonbeasts, a monstrous race as alien in their thinking as they are cruel, that disdains fine crafts as work fit only for slaves, valuing only strength, faith and will.

09-30-2009, 02:48 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Still, I'd like Giant Frogs and Toads to be more the size of water buffaloes and elephants, so they can gulp down fire beetles and giant flies.

The Giant Toads are kinda disappointing in the giant category (as are the frogs, and many other "giant" creatures). When I hear "giant" I want something bigger than an elephant, not man sized or smaller.

At the very least, I want the giant toads big enough that some PC race could ride them into battle. Maybe gnomes, or lizardmen.

09-30-2009, 06:44 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

The Giant Toads are kinda disappointing in the giant category (as are the frogs, and many other "giant" creatures). When I hear "giant" I want something bigger than an elephant, not man sized or smaller.

At the very least, I want the giant toads big enough that some PC race could ride them into battle. Maybe gnomes, or lizardmen.

Absolutely! So when the captain of the Gnomish Batrachian Hussars tells his troops to hop to it, he wants them to Hop To It! ;)

09-30-2009, 10:11 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Absolutely! So when the captain of the Gnomish Batrachian Hussars tells his troops to hop to it, he wants them to Hop To It! ;)

Gnomes live a long, long time. Dozens of generations of humans and halflings can be born, blossom, and have their own babies before a gnome is laid to rest in a secret passage under the floor of the family burrow. Their lifespans are almost (but not quite) as long as the elves.

But unlike the elves, they don't spend their lives in a perpetual spring. Elves age gracefully, almost imperceptibly. An elder in her second millennium may still be as spry as a youth of a hundred summers. Not so, gnomes. While they are not born with permanent grooves carved around their eyes, this does not last. Their youth and vitality lasts only as long as a human. But unlike humans, who putter and then sputter and go out, gnomes linger. For a century, two, five, even seven. Gnomes spend most of their lives wizened and frail.

Which makes the toad riders an especially sad case. See, all that bouncing around just isn't good. Babies can die when shaken like a rattle. It's the brain, bruising itself against the cranium. Pugilists lose their memory, start to tremble and shake. The jabs and concussions cause what is sometimes known as the boxer's disease.

So too with the toad riders. Powerful legs like springs release, and then the body comes crashing down. The rider is treated to a rough trip. Up and down, over and over. The years of practice, of training, add up. That continuous violent shaking causes brain damage.

In every gnome community, there is a creche. A retirement home as it were, for the riders whose mastery of simple tasks like going to the bathroom or feeding themselves has slipped. Heroes, yes. The honored veterans. But also a hidden shame. Most gnomes are resigned to spending the majority of their lives physically decrepit, but at least they keep their minds. They grow in wisdom and knowledge, become scholars and sages and magi and analysts.

The toad riders linger on, through the long, long latter years of gnomehood. But they are like children again. Wispy hair with faces like prunes, fragile and weak and stooped. Cared for by their siblings and the few youths.

09-30-2009, 06:51 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Which makes the toad riders an especially sad case. See, all that bouncing around just isn't good. Babies can die when shaken like a rattle. It's the brain, bruising itself against the cranium. Pugilists lose their memory, start to tremble and shake. The jabs and concussions cause what is sometimes known as the boxer's disease.

So too with the toad riders. Powerful legs like springs release, and then the body comes crashing down. The rider is treated to a rough trip. Up and down, over and over. The years of practice, of training, add up. That continuous violent shaking causes brain damage.

A couple of points of disagreement to alleviate this tragic tale.

Firstly, while it's true that some veterans of the Gnomish Batrachian Hussars are in a sad mental case from decades of riding their hopping steeds, it's the frog riders, not the toad riders who suffer so. Giant Toads don't leap, but walk and run, their ride is as smooth as a camel.

Secondly, sparing heroes from the debilitating effects of injury is one of the reasons the kind Gods gave us healing magic. Sadly, gnomes are not powerful in the clerical arts so they often must seek the help of human priests to give their honoured veterans back the full use of their wits. Finding such a healer in a human city and escorting them back to Burrowtown is a common mission for budding gnome adventurers, who often seek the assistance of non-gnome partners.

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Secondly, sparing heroes from the debilitating effects of injury is one of the reasons the kind Gods gave us healing magic. Sadly, gnomes are not powerful in the clerical arts so they often must seek the help of human priests to give their honoured veterans back the full use of their wits. Finding such a healer in a human city and escorting them back to Burrowtown is a common mission for budding gnome adventurers, who often seek the assistance of non-gnome partners.

Unfortunately, while the cure spells are good for wounds and other injuries that would heal in days or weeks*, regenerate is needed for permanent injuries like brain damage. And priests who can and will cast the high valence spell are rare and dear. Maybe one gnome a generation might get lucky.

* Or months, or years; the most powerful and hardy adventures seem to spend ridiculous amounts of time as bedridden invalids.

10-01-2009, 08:51 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I always forget about the Giant Frogs, but Giant Toads seem to stick in my memory better. I'm not sure why, but I suspect it has to do with that picture.

On Ice Toads, perhaps they're the remnants of some barbarian tribe cursed to Toad-dom long ago. Regardless, intelligent toads do strike me as rather pulp - I could imagine John Carter fighting giant, intelligent toads.

And on a completely unrelated note, I recently saw a picture of the Nymph from the Monstrous Manual, but nude. It was otherwise the exact same picture. See here. What's up with two of the same picture, one clothed and one not?

10-01-2009, 04:02 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

And on a completely unrelated note, I recently saw a picture of the Nymph from the Monstrous Manual, but nude. It was otherwise the exact same picture. See here. What's up with two of the same picture, one clothed and one not?

The naked nymph is the original artwork. When DiTerlizzi submitted it, the TSR people overseeing the MM project worried that it was too explicit and unsuitable for a game manual that was going to be read by kids, too. So they had him redo the pic, adding a filmy shirt for the nymph. ("But... but she's a nymph! Going around naked and beautiful is what they do!")

(TDT explained this on his old website somewhere, years ago.)

10-01-2009, 08:27 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Unfortunately, while the cure wounds spells are good for wounds and other injuries that would heal in days or weeks*, regenerate is needed for permanent injuries like brain damage. And priests who can and will cast the high valence spell are rare and dear. Maybe one gnome a generation might get lucky.

* Or months, or years; the most powerful and hardy adventures seem to spend ridiculous amounts of time as bedridden invalids.

I was careful to avoid stating what kind of clerical healing would be necessary, but in this case what particular spell is necessary is a matter of interpretation. Since the cure wounds spells are not given an expiry time limit on how old the injuries they can heal are, I could argue that they could heal brain injuries of this kind. If it was in a game I ran I'd probably rule that such spells would only work if cast soon after the excessive hopping, since if they left it too long then the relevant brain cells die (since I interpret cure wounds spells as not effecting dead or missing tissue), but that a heal spell would be enough to cause a complete recovery.

Of course, if they're heroes then they probably would have received frequent cure wounds spells from getting healed after each battle, which could have prevented any cumulative brain damage building up in the first place.

But regardless, even if a high-enough level cleric is unavailable, that just means the adventure becomes one of acquiring an appropriate magical item (staff of healing, scroll of regenerate or whatever) and take it to Gnometown, no doubt dealing with thieves and monster-infested wildernesses on the way.

10-02-2009, 12:11 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I was careful to avoid stating what kind of clerical healing would be necessary, but in this case what particular spell is necessary is a matter of interpretation. Since the cure wounds spells are not given a expiry time limit on how old the injuries they can heal are, I could argue that they could heal brain injuries of this kind. If it was in a game I ran I'd probably rule that such spells would only work if cast soon after the excessive hopping, since if they left it to long then the relevant brain cells die (since I interpret cure wounds spells as not effecting dead or missing tissue), but that a heal spell would be enough to cause a complete recovery.

That's more than an variant interpretation. That's a house rule. :)

10-02-2009, 07:22 AM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That's more than an variant interpretation. That's a house rule. :)

BURN THE WITCH!

10-02-2009, 10:02 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Treant

It doesn't take a literary historian to work out the inspiration for this creature - it's an Ent with the serial numbers filed off. Picture Treebeard, but with Hit Dice. The stat block is a source of slight amusement and wonder, though. For example, the fact that the Treant's diet is "Photosynthesis" (not light and water, as with other plant entries), or that its Organisation is "Grove".

Not a huge amount to say about Treants. They're one of those creatures scattered through the MM who seem to write themselves. Wise forest shepherds to consult or ask for aid, or mysterious guardians you shouldn't cross. Take your pick.

I do think there is room for Treants as vengeful and capricious nature spirits, in a more True Neutral or perhaps Chaotic Neutral vein. (Old Man Willow rather than Treebeard.) Forest haunts who slay bipedal intruders on dark and windy nights. Picture the scene: You're in a clearing, camped around a fire. The wind is high, rain is on the way. Hearing a noise, you glance behind you. No, nothing has changed - there's just a wall of trees, their canopy gently swaying and rustling. You go back to tending your fire. Wait, that was definitely a noise! You turn around again. Is it just your imagination, or are the trees suddenly closer? Then there's a sudden gust of wind and rain, and the fire goes out....

10-02-2009, 10:43 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

It doesn't take a literary historian to work out the inspiration for this creature - it's an Ent with the serial numbers filed off. Picture Treebeard, but with Hit Dice.

For some reason, that conjures up an image of a gangster rapper treant. Two huge dice with gemstone pips dangle from the heavy gold chain around its neck. When gang warfare flares between the oaks and the maples, it swings the chain around its head as a weapon and busts mad rhymes about the birches. All while trying to hold up its baggy moss-pants with its other hand.

10-02-2009, 10:46 AM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Treants are so obviously Treebeard, it's almost a waste. Spooky forests are much cooler - look at the chase scene at the start of Snow White. Tolkien had deep-dark-woods all over the place, but Treebeard was so harmless once he decided to be friendly that he defangs the whole concept of the forest as the place where you will get lost, die, and be chased by witch-wolves or some such.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That's more than an variant interpretation. That's a house rule. :)

Permanent brain damage would count as ability score damage, no? Unfortunately I'm only familiar with 3.x rules on the topic so I'm not sure how you'd treat this under 2e.

10-02-2009, 10:46 AM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

One thing I've always wondered about is the relationship between Treants and Dryads. They live in the same ecosystem and fulfill a similar niche.

Are they related? In competition?

10-02-2009, 10:58 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

For spooky forests, Tolkien's huorns might be a better model. Semi-sapient embodiments of the rage and hurt of the forest. The fully aware treants might be too few to keep them in check. In some of the darkest forests, the huorns might have turned on the treants, and slain them all leaving their bodies to rot.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Asmodai

One thing I've always wondered about is the relationship between Treants and Dryads. They live in the same ecosystem and fulfill a similar niche.

Are they related? In competition?

Dryads are the fruiting bodies of a symbiotic fungus that encrusts the treants, of course.

10-02-2009, 10:46 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

That's more than an variant interpretation. That's a house rule. :)

Nope, there's nothing in the description that says a cure X wound spell can't completely heal any sort of kinetic injury (even ones that would normally be crippling) regardless of long ago it took place, provided the injury didn't result in the physical loss of the organ in question (e.g. cure serious wounds won't grow back a hand, for that you need regeneration), although since it can still restore the subject to full hit points it can presumably completely cure what remains (e.g. said hand-less character could have a perfectly healed stump). There's no reason to assume it doesn't cure microscopic wounds to the brain caused by excessive giant frog-riding as well, meaning it could be a valid interpretation within the rules in my not-so-humble opinion.
:cool:

10-02-2009, 10:52 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

Permanent brain damage would count as ability score damage, no? Unfortunately I'm only familiar with 3.x rules on the topic so I'm not sure how you'd treat this under 2e.

Well AD&D doesn't really set down general rules on long-term or crippling injury, it just has a lot of special cases (e.g. spell X might say it withers one of the target's limbs and it needs a regeneration spell to recover, adventure Y might have a trap that breaks someone's leg and says it can be instantly set by a cure serious wounds.)

This leaves a lot to the rules interpretation (our outright whims) of each DM and group of players, and much argument was had by all.

10-02-2009, 11:06 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Treant

It doesn't take a literary historian to work out the inspiration for this creature - it's an Ent with the serial numbers filed off. Picture Treebeard, but with Hit Dice. The stat block is a source of slight amusement and wonder, though. For example, the fact that the Treant's diet is "Photosynthesis" (not light and water, as with other plant entries), or that its Organisation is "Grove".

I prefer to think of them as Ents with a few serial numbers add, namely a "T", an "R" and an "A"..o

The few Tr(e)a(nts) I've seen in AD&D adventures have always been rather clichéd chaotic good tree-shepherd/elderly-hippy types, surely there's more that can be done with them.

Maybe have them be the ruling council of a Kingdom of the Plants, which appears a monstrous and alien place to outsiders. Or a Treant as an Ambassador of the Forest, accompanied by an entourage of druids and Sylvan creatures they march into neighbouring kingdoms to demand punishment for defilers of nature (by having them polymorphed into oak trees and sold as planks), threatening a War of the Trees if their idea of justice is not satisfied.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Dryads are the fruiting bodies of a symbiotic fungus that encrusts the treants, of course.

I prefer dryads as autonomous flowers, with handsome adventures playing the role of pollinators.

10-03-2009, 01:17 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Nope, there's nothing in the description that says a cure X wound spell can't completely heal any sort of kinetic injury (even ones that would normally be crippling) regardless of long ago it took place, provided the injury didn't result in the physical loss of the organ in question (e.g. cure serious wounds won't grow back a hand, for that you need regeneration), although since it can still restore the subject to full hit points it can presumably completely cure what remains (e.g. said hand-less character could have a perfectly healed stump). There's no reason to assume it doesn't cure microscopic wounds to the brain caused by excessive giant frog-riding as well, meaning it could be a valid interpretation within the rules in my not-so-humble opinion.

:cool:

The cure light wound spell in the 2E PH "causes 1d8 points of wound or other injury damage to the creature's body to be healed", and that's all. The other cure spells have almost identical wording. They restore that abstract pacing mechanic called "hit points". They revitalize, refresh, restore flagging confidence and morale, and yes, cure a few scratches and possibly more serious cuts or lacerations. The same things that would be fixed by time and bed rest. There's really no tradition of lumping in anything else. Yes, there might be the occasional module that uses one of the cure spells to heal a specific injury. But there are literally hundreds of modules, by dozens and dozens of authors. Some with a better grasp of the rules than others. Coming up with an effect that's not supported by the existing rules (a trap that breaks a limb doesn't fit well in a game that uses an abstract method for tracking injury) and picking a random level-appropriate spell (one the PCs can cast) to magically solve the problem is lazy design. There isn't any mention of that sort of thing in any books that aren't relying on a device to move along the plot. No Sage Advice or rulebooks suggest that the cure spells heal anything other than hit points caused by injuries.

It's really a toss-up between heal and regenerate. While it's not on the specific list of effects that are cured by heal, the spell at least has a tendency to become a dumping ground for random "what heals this?" problems. Regenerate on the other hand specifically covers permanent injuries, though it focuses on the gross bodily type. Both are stretches, but reasonable and within the spirit of the rules. Or if the DM is less willing to bend the rules, wish.

Plus, you mentioned "microscopic". Isn't trying to apply real-world physics to D&D's game mechanics an automatic "I lose" button? :)

10-03-2009, 01:27 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I prefer dryads as autonomous flowers, with handsome adventures playing the role of pollinators.

Pollinators? Like bees? That raises several questions. Why males? Why sex? How does the pollen get passed on, and where does it come from?

Dryads always seem to be attracted to healthy, virile males. Presumably at the peak of their sexual activity. Specifically, attractive males who are more likely to have a large number of sexual partners. Why is this beneficial?

Wait.

The pollen that carries the male gametes that allow them to reproduce manifests as a sexually transmitted disease in humanoids. Of course, they want males who have had numerous partners. This increases the chances that the male is infected.

Unlike real women, Dryads want to catch the clap.

10-03-2009, 08:31 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Nothing about their lame animation ability? It is obviously an homage to hunorns but the actual ability is fairly useless (30 feet?).

10-03-2009, 08:59 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

Permanent brain damage would count as ability score damage, no? Unfortunately I'm only familiar with 3.x rules on the topic so I'm not sure how you'd treat this under 2e.

In 3.x it certainly wouldn't be covered by Cure spells, as ability damage requires Restoration or similar spells that specify removing ability damage. Cure spells only remove HP damage, which is entirely separate.

Re: treants. The manual suggests that they don't deal with any creatures that live less than 500 years. I suppose that's why elves live all nice and happy in the woods, but humans don't: elves live long enough that the trees respect them. Humans, not so much.

10-04-2009, 06:15 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The cure light wound spell in the 2E PH "causes 1d8 points of wound or other injury damage to the creature's body to be healed", and that's all. The other cure spells have almost identical wording.

SNIP

It's really a toss-up between heal and regenerate. While it's not on the specific list of effects that are cured by heal, the spell at least has a tendency to become a dumping ground for random "what heals this?" problems. Regenerate on the other hand specifically covers permanent injuries, though it focuses on the gross bodily type. Both are stretches, but reasonable and within the spirit of the rules. Or if the DM is less willing to bend the rules, wish.

Plus, you mentioned "microscopic". Isn't trying to apply real-world physics to D&D's game mechanics an automatic "I lose" button? :)

Although personally I'd rule you'd need a heal, it all depends on how you interpret that "other injury damage", doesn't it. There's nothing to prevent a liberal interpretation vis-à-vis cure wounds ability to prevent lingering injuries.

Is brain damage caused by sitting on a giant frog hopping up and down and different than that caused by falling repeatedly down shallow pits, or being punched repeatedly in the face? If multiple cure light wounds spells prevent the gnomes heroes getting brain damage from entering The Dungeon of Trip-Holes and Pugilistic Goblins by curing the resulting "hit points", where's the logic in it not preventing (or even curing) Repetitive Batrachian Riding Syndrome?
:o

10-04-2009, 06:26 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Pollinators? Like bees? That raises several questions. Why males? Why sex? How does the pollen get passed on, and where does it come from?

Dryads always seem to be attracted to healthy, virile males. Presumably at the peak of their sexual activity. Specifically, attractive males who are more likely to have a large number of sexual partners. Why is this beneficial?

Wait.

The pollen that carries the male gametes that allow them to reproduce manifests as a sexually transmitted disease in humanoids. Of course, they want males who have had numerous partners. This increases the chances that the male is infected.

Unlike real women, Dryads want to catch the clap.

That's more or less the idea. The dryad have stamina and pistils in a discrete portion of their anatomy that mimics a female human's, so it requires a male humanoid's specialized organ to properly access them and get "infected". After a love-struck weekend the dryad lets the man wander away, hopefully to encounter another "woodwife" and pass on the nymph's genetic material.

For a more sinister spin on it. Maybe dryad pollen is not only similar to an infection, it is actually contagious to other Fey. If the dryad's lover has a later assignation with a nymph, sylph or other female Fey then they undergo a strange transformation, their hair turns to leaves, their skin becomes petal-like and they seek out the largest, oldest tree in their area and merge into it, becoming a new wood-spirit. Thus, the dryad picks particularly handsome, promiscuous men because they are the most likely to win the favours of a suitable Fey and produce more of their kind.

10-04-2009, 06:29 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Nothing about their lame animation ability? It is obviously an homage to hunorns but the actual ability is fairly useless (30 feet?).

It says 60 yards in the Monstrous Manual, which seems a usable distance, or were you referring to the tree's movement rate of 3, which admittedly is quite lousy.

Although, even if the trees have to stand practically next to the Treant, having the ability to create a pair of 12 HD monsters with two 4d6 attacks apiece is not to be sneered at.

10-04-2009, 06:56 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Is brain damage caused by sitting on a giant frog hopping up and down and different than that caused by falling repeatedly down shallow pits, or being punched repeatedly in the face?

Yes. The magic words are "hit points".

Not all damage is measured in hit points. A shaken baby can die just as easily as a baby dropped 20 feet. But one takes 2d6 hit points of damage, the other probably just makes a save to avoid dying.

A better argument is that D&D just doesn't model subtle injuries well. Concussions, post-traumatic encephalitis, sprains, broken bones, internal bleeding... any rules for those conditions have to be made up on the fly.

10-04-2009, 07:07 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

For a more sinister spin on it. Maybe dryad pollen is not only similar to an infection, it is actually contagious to other Fey. If the dryad's lover has a later assignation with a nymph, sylph or other female Fey then they undergo a strange transformation, their hair turns to leaves, their skin becomes petal-like and they seek out the largest, oldest tree in their area and merge into it, becoming a new wood-spirit. Thus, the dryad picks particularly handsome, promiscuous men because they are the most likely to win the favours of a suitable Fey and produce more of their kind.

I'd spin that slightly differently. There is a huge body of myth about faeries stealing babies, wives, husbands, lovers... why not head in that direction?

A traveling merchant has an affair with a dryad, and returns home. His wife is happy to see him, and they embrace. But over the next couple of days she starts to change. Her skin starts to tan, her hair has a green tint, she starts behaving strangely. Listening, to something far off in the woods only she can hear. Then one day she just vanishes. If her husband spots her as she darts toward the forest, he is in for a shock. She doesn't even look human anymore.

Affects mortal women, not immortal fey. If that were the case, even the rumor of being a dryad-lover would be enough to turn a man into a social pariah.

10-05-2009, 07:14 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I'd spin that slightly differently. There is a huge body of myth about faeries stealing babies, wives, husbands, lovers... why not head in that direction?

A traveling merchant has an affair with a dryad, and returns home. His wife is happy to see him, and they embrace. But over the next couple of days she starts to change. Her skin starts to tan, her hair has a green tint, she starts behaving strangely. Listening, to something far off in the woods only she can hear. Then one day she just vanishes. If her husband spots her as she darts toward the forest, he is in for a shock. She doesn't even look human anymore.

Affects mortal women, not immortal fey. If that were the case, even the rumor of being a dryad-lover would be enough to turn a man into a social pariah.

I thought about having it affect mortal women, but decided it would change the flavour of Dryads too much. If their "pollen disease" only affects other fey females, then their consorts may not even know about it, and if they do they may just think its something the mysterious fairy folk do all the time. If it affected every female human they have congress with, people would be chopping down dryad groves across the land.

10-07-2009, 10:37 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Triton

Another of the underwater races who I suspect are rarely used, Tritons are rather like Merfolk, but with humanoid legs rather than a fish tail. (There's a big overlap between underwater beings - Tritons, Merfolk, Aquatic Elves etc. are all really the same monster - though I suppose you could say the same thing about orcs, hobgoblins, troglodytes etc.)

The entry opens with this intriguing line:

Quote:

"Tritons are rumored to be creatures from the elemental plane of Water that have been placed on the Prime Material plane for some purpose unknown to man."

I can't remember ever reading that before, and it puts a whole new spin on the creature. Admittedly this is the MM designer equivalent of phoning in adventure hooks (only one step up from "a wizard did it") but still, sets the imagination running. Are they interplanar guardians? Colonists from the elemental plane of Water who've been in the Prime Material so long they've forgotten their original homelands? Or is the reason hidden lore, known only by the elders and wisemen, who keep the matter secret from the rest...

In terms of society, Tritons are portrayed a little like elves - reclusive and nonviolent, except when their reclusivity is threatened. And as with elves there seems to be an undercurrent of cruelty to these underwater xenophobes - for the crime of entering into Triton territory one is stripped of all belongings and left 10 miles from shore to face "the fate of the seas"; if you are ruled innocent by the Triton court you get washed to shore safely. Otherwise you drown.

(This little vignette has possibilities. For starters, it implies that the Tritons have some power over the very ocean itself; can they only use it for deciding the fate of trespassers, or can they use it for other means? But aside from that, I think a great villain backstory would be a guy who was put out to "the fate of the seas", found guilty, but nevertheless somehow managed to survive. How he did so is a mystery and his most closely guarded secret...)

10-07-2009, 12:44 PM

s/LaSH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I used a triton (OK, a reskinned elf with an otter) in Dungeon Damage. Underwater civilizations make you rethink a lot of assumptions about life - they have no fire, everything's got to be streamlined, clothes just slow you down, weird stuff like that.

10-08-2009, 10:52 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

I used a triton (OK, a reskinned elf with an otter) in Dungeon Damage. Underwater civilizations make you rethink a lot of assumptions about life - they have no fire, everything's got to be streamlined, clothes just slow you down, weird stuff like that.

There'd be no treasure except for gemstones and coral, for one thing. No way to extract precious metals from ore.

10-08-2009, 12:30 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

There'd be no treasure except for gemstones and coral, for one thing. No way to extract precious metals from ore.

Stonechipping and obsidian is the way to go.

And massive blood sacrifices to appease the sharks.

Perhaps all underwater cultures are based on Mesoamerica. Giant carved heads, blood-letting, uncanny calendars, lost ruins among the algae forests, smoking mirrors (the sun against the water's surface?), alien space gods. Feathered serpents might be sea serpents or kraken trailing great streamers of seaweed that have grown on them as they slept. The Incan foot post might be replaced by a network of trained swimmers who dash full speed down the continental shelf, passing the message to the next link in the chain when exhausted. Montezuma's gold might become a great sieve, perhaps created for some obscure geological or astrological purpose, that just happens to filter out gold from the sea water.

10-08-2009, 01:44 PM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by s/LaSH

I used a triton (OK, a reskinned elf with an otter) in Dungeon Damage. Underwater civilizations make you rethink a lot of assumptions about life - they have no fire, everything's got to be streamlined, clothes just slow you down, weird stuff like that.

The 3 dimensional nature of the universe is also a major difference - especially in areas where the sea bed is so deep the pressure down there will kill you.

If you go up, you're easy prey for diving Sea Rocs, too far down and pressure kills you if the Kraken don't.

Ranged combat would also be different - arrows and thrown weapons don't work as well in a thicker medium meaning combat would be face to face. That might affect warrior codes of conduct.

Land cities survive by flushing their pollution into the seas. A sea community bigger than a hamlet in a permanent location would need some method to avoid stewing in their own filth.

10-08-2009, 04:30 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Asmodai

Land cities survive by flushing their pollution into the seas. A sea community bigger than a hamlet in a permanent location would need some method to avoid stewing in their own filth.

Maybe there's some sort of natural current like the North Atlantic Drift that everybody shits into and it gets carried off somewhere else.

Or maybe it all just floats to the surface.

Or maybe underwater cities are just really efficient. No fire means no polluting industry really. Only effluent, which lets face it will dissolve relatively quickly in water.

10-08-2009, 05:39 PM

kami2awa

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Stonechipping and obsidian is the way to go.

And massive blood sacrifices to appease the sharks.

Perhaps all underwater cultures are based on Mesoamerica. Giant carved heads, blood-letting, uncanny calendars, lost ruins among the algae forests, smoking mirrors (the sun against the water's surface?), alien space gods. Feathered serpents might be sea serpents or kraken trailing great streamers of seaweed that have grown on them as they slept. The Incan foot post might be replaced by a network of trained swimmers who dash full speed down the continental shelf, passing the message to the next link in the chain when exhausted. Montezeuma's gold might become a great sieve, perhaps created for some obscure geological or astrological purpose, that just happens to filter out gold from the sea water.

I really like this idea; a civilisation without fire can reach the stone age, but no further - however, the Aztecs and Inca were technically Stone Age cultures because they did not work bronze or iron, but they were highly advanced civilisations with writing, large-scale construction, and complex government, religion and civil services (they even had public toilets). Although they did not work hard metal their goldsmithing was literally legendary. An underwater culture could be similar.

It is possible to work gold without heating it (it is malleable enough to hammer into shape) and underwater civilisations could get a lot of it from shipwrecks. Furthermore, heat sources are available in the form of underwater volcanoes (likely locations for civilisation anyway as the water is warmer).

10-08-2009, 07:31 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Asmodai

Land cities survive by flushing their pollution into the seas. A sea community bigger than a hamlet in a permanent location would need some method to avoid stewing in their own filth.

There's an adventure hook - a long pipe appears in town overnight, leading into the sea further than anyone can follow easily. It is made of a strange, indestructible organic material, and soon starts discharging a mixture of fish heads and reeking goo into the Town Square.

Guess who gets to follow the pipe into the lightless depths and convince the owners that something needs to change? Hope it's someone reasonable, like sea elves, and not Tritons.

Perhaps the only way to stop it is to convince the town to upgrade their own sewerage discharge, and it then becomes a quest to find a wastewater engineer in a distant land...

10-09-2009, 02:56 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
Feathered serpents might be sea serpents

Feathered serpent = Leafy sea dragons?

Well, since this is D&D, they need to be giant, man eating leafy sea dragons.

10-09-2009, 03:08 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa
It is possible to work gold without heating it (it is malleable enough to hammer into shape) and underwater civilisations could get a lot of it from shipwrecks.

Undersea dwellers might have some pretty odd ideas about surface dwellers. They don't understand "fire" or "arrows" or "air". Their main source of information about humans is from crashed pirate ships, so they assume all humans have pet monkeys and peg legs. One part cargo cult, one part the albatross from The Little Mermaid.

Perhaps most Tritons don't even believe that any sentient life exists in "outer space" (above the water's surface), and the occasional shipwreck is like the Roswell crash. So visiting the Tritons might be like an X-files UFO conspiracy story, but told from the perspective of the aliens. Why does the Triton king hide the truth from his citizens? What havoc will the air-breathing PCs cause just by visiting the Triton city (and thereby exposing the truth)? Are the Tritons peaceful or will they react violently to human beings? (The MM entry repeatedly notes that they are "reclusive" and "suspicious", so emphasizing their paranoid nature might be a good idea.)

Maybe the Tritons are at war against the Kuo-toa (or other underwater monster race). So they assume strangers from the surface are some sort of kuo-toa plot to infiltrate/sabotage the Triton kingdom. It's certainly more plausible of a story than the PCs being aliens from outer space.

10-09-2009, 03:45 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by kami2awa

I really like this idea; a civilisation without fire can reach the stone age, but no further - however, the Aztecs and Inca were technically Stone Age cultures because they did not work bronze or iron, but they were highly advanced civilisations with writing, large-scale construction, and complex government, religion and civil services (they even had public toilets). Although they did not work hard metal their goldsmithing was literally legendary. An underwater culture could be similar.

It is possible to work gold without heating it (it is malleable enough to hammer into shape) and underwater civilisations could get a lot of it from shipwrecks. Furthermore, heat sources are available in the form of underwater volcanoes (likely locations for civilisation anyway as the water is warmer).

The malleable/ductile nature is a big plus. Gold is also the least chemically reactive of all metals, making it resistant to the corrosion caused by salt water. I'm not sure about the underground volcanoes, though. Volcanoes tend to throw out huge amounts of poisonous gas, ash, and other debris that would suffocate marine humanoids, and sufficient heat to work metal would tend to broil any would-be smiths. There might be a thriving trade with the few creatures who could withstand these environments. Perhaps an aquatic variation of the salamander?

Undersea vents would still be natural locations for cities or other submarine centers of population (the density of life around one is about 4 or 5 orders of magnitude greater in the real world), but approaching them too closely would be dangerous. These would also be the areas where captives from the surface are kept, because there is less chance of hypothermia.

Perhaps the area closer to the vents is the undersea equivalent of the underdark, with weird variants of the traditional races. But instead of having the ability to see in the dark, they have the ability to survive in the extreme environments like those surrounding a black smoker vent. Black aquatic elves and dwarves and ogres and ghouls with strange alien appearances and even stranger adaptations. Eyeless, with white squirming like bodies covered with a rough chitin carapace. Perhaps covered with a iron scales created by a colony of snails living on their skin, converting the minerals ejected by the vents into natural armor (this is based on the scaly-footed gastropod).

These might be the oases of the undersea, organized like a ring. Unlike the surface where the dark elves are distant and removed from the elves of the sun and the light, the black elves of the vents and the green elves of the open sea would create communities in concentric rings, and be forced to interact with their uncanny brethren. A thriving trade-town on the outside, who deal with the strange black smoker variants further in, who in turn engage the denizens of the centermost ring who dwell on top of the plume or ejected magma itself: The demons and devils, and creatures of doused, smoldering fire.

10-10-2009, 07:24 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Triton

I can't remember ever reading that before, and it puts a whole new spin on the creature. Admittedly this is the MM designer equivalent of phoning in adventure hooks (only one step up from "a wizard did it") but still, sets the imagination running. Are they interplanar guardians? Colonists from the elemental plane of Water who've been in the Prime Material so long they've forgotten their original homelands? Or is the reason hidden lore, known only by the elders and wisemen, who keep the matter secret from the rest...

Listen carefully, and I'll pass on a story a Sea-Caballero told me.

Neptune sent the Tritons into the prime material so that wizards do not do it. They are tasked with preventing mad surface dwelling mages from meddling with the sea. Why do you think they have 90% magic resistance?

Remember that stormcaller wizard who was found impaled on a trident, with all her guards and apprentices drowned on dry land. Who did you think was responsible?

10-18-2009, 05:29 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

[Bloody hell, a week since the last post. I do apologise. Work and real life got in the way.]

Troglodyte

First things first, let's say straight away that the illustration for the Troglodyte is one of my absolutely favourites in the MM. Not only is it an entirely plausible anthropomorphic lizard, there is a peculiar grace to the piece; the pose is in a strange way not unlike that of a Greek or Roman statue. It lends the Troglodyte the air of a noble savage, which doesn't at all fit with the description but is compelling nonetheless. Suffice to say, Diterlizzi has vision.

I also like the Troglodyte a lot as a stand alone monster, despite the fact that (as with most humanoid villain races) its entry is actually rather bland. (It contains reams and reams of meat and potatoes information that is of practical use but little imaginative flair. Okay, maybe it's important to know that there are 100% as many females as males in a Troglodyte clan, but...) Troglodytes are more interesting in the playing than the reading: tougher orcs and hobgoblins, more naturalistic and primitive, and with a cool chameleon power.

They are perfect, in other words, for a more low-tech, perhaps even stone-age game - or, alternatively, one set far away from any form of civilisation whatsoever. The kind of place where fire-building is high-tech. Troglodytes are the kind of primal foes who you can imagine fighting in a Lost Land of the Dinosaurs-style plateau.

The main spur to the imagination aside from that is the Troglodyte hatred for humans; they despise mankind above all else. Why? Is it our distrustful smell and irksome manner, or something deeper?

10-18-2009, 08:27 AM

YojimboC

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, it had to happen. Cleaning out my parents' attic, I finally found my copy of the Monstrous Manual. Just in time for the end of the T's.

On the topic of smelting ore and fashioning armor or weapons beneath the sea - wouldn't magic go a long way towards mitigating this sort of thing? Or perhaps just using different materials enhanced by magic, making them just as strong as steel anyway. A +3 obsidian dagger is still +3, after all.

10-18-2009, 06:54 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

One thing about trogs that I noticed recently - they are listed as having an encounter frequency of Common. This makes them more common, in theory, than such D&D staples as hobgoblins and kobolds!

And yes, the illustration is brilliant.

10-18-2009, 07:41 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

One thing about trogs that I noticed recently - they are listed as having an encounter frequency of Common. This makes them more common, in theory, than such D&D staples as hobgoblins and kobolds!

Perhaps the real question is: Why? What social, cultural, or biological advantages make them so prevalent?

Perhaps it's all in the eggs.

What if their eggs were rough, erratically shaped. Almost indistinguishable from loose rocks or stones. Like many egg-layers, they lay dozens, hundreds of eggs at a time. And like many reptiles, they don't care for them once the eggs are laid. Cast aside like beads of water, as the tribe travels. And as long as the temperature is relatively stable (and it always is, under the earth), the eggs can last indefinitely until the conditions are right. Until they're exposed to water.

The scattered talus at the bottom of the slope, that scree under that cavernous overhang? Scattered everywhere. Waiting to be fertile, to grow. To spawn. Sometimes dozens, hundreds of years. Perhaps even longer. But everytime there's a flood, there's a new infestation. A new creche of trogs. Come together, across wide distances, homing in on that pungent scent.

10-18-2009, 09:17 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The main spur to the imagination aside from that is the Troglodyte hatred for humans; they despise mankind above all else. Why? Is it our distrustful smell and irksome manner, or something deeper?

Why not use the reptile people concept Howard thought of? They were the ones to give humanity basic technology and now humans keep them down by slaughtering them and not allowing the trogs to advance. Orcs and hobgoblins are proof that technology in the wrong hands can make for difficult times in the future.

10-19-2009, 12:02 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The scattered talus at the bottom of the slope, that scree under that cavernous overhang? Scattered everywhere. Waiting to be fertile, to grow. To spawn. Sometimes dozens, hundreds of years. Perhaps even longer. But everytime there's a flood, there's a new infestation. A new creche of trogs. Come together, across wide distances, homing in on that pungent scent.

Hmm, that would imply that their society and technology is mostly or entirely based on instinct and inherited memories. They have no parents or elders to teach them the Way of the Troglodyte, just their own programmed nature.

No wonder they seem stuck in the stone age, many of the egg-lines have not learned a new skill for hundreds of generations.

10-19-2009, 12:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Why not use the reptile people concept Howard thought of? They were the ones to give humanity basic technology and now humans keep them down by slaughtering them and not allowing the trogs to advance. Orcs and hobgoblins are proof that technology in the wrong hands can make for difficult times in the future.

The "they hate the warmbloods because they stole their planet" seems to be quite a common explanation of the reptile races' antipathy towards humanoids.

I'm sure we can come up with a few other explanations.

Hmm...

Troglodytes have a hatred for humanity because they like them too much.

Like the taste, that is.

Human flesh is a potent drug to a Troglodyte. Once they've tasted it, many can think of nothing else but getting their next fix of "pink". Before they met humans, the troglodytes were the noble savages in the dT illustration Noisms referred to. Wise creatures in perfect tune with nature, who passed their ample leisure time with poetry and philosophy (although the beauty of the latter is not appreciated by humanoids, since they can't understand the Troglodyte's "Stink-Speech".)

Within a few generations of exposure to humans, mainly due to the action of goblinoid dealers in human flesh and 'juice, the vast majority of Trogs are degenerate brutes.

10-19-2009, 12:57 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, that would imply that their society and technology is mostly or entirely based on instinct and inherited memories. They have no parents or elders to teach them the Way of the Troglodyte, just their own programmed nature.

No wonder they seem stuck in the stone age, many of the egg-lines have not learned a new skill for hundreds of generations.

Nah, there're too many of those.

Perhaps they're just frigg'in brilliant... at least while they're still growing. A period of just a few weeks. But during that period, they're the perfect Batesian mimics, the ideal pupil, the transhumanists' post-singularity wet dream of an evolved consciousness.

They're drawn to each other by smell. Think monarch butterflies, except really really stinky. Seven miles upwind is nothing. During the downpour, they seek each other, rambling their way across the miles. As they pass the various scattered enclaves of humanoid and inhumanoid races, they pick up random bits and pieces of culture and technology purely by observation, as they hide under piles of feces.

Once they come together, sisters and brothers of the Most Illuminatingly Fragrant Stench, there is a wondrous blossoming of philosophy and knowledge as they share what they know at hyperspeeds using a language they invent on the spot. They synthesize their collective knowledge and then branch out, making intuitive leaps in a dozen scientific fields. They come up with amazing and perfectly sensible solutions to all kinds of technological and and philosophic problems. They create a perfect little utopia.

For a week or so. Because, in the back of their minds, they can feel it. Gnawing, eatnig away. They know they're a degenerate race, or will be. But they didn't/won't degenerate from some pure ancestral pseudo-Aryan stock. No, they're degenerating from themselves. They can feel it, like an itch. Each day the mental jumps are smaller. Each day what was once clear is fuzzier and fuzzier, until it becomes opaque.

That's why the trogs we know are so hateful. They remember the wonder, the glory. They know they were the wisest, the smartest. But they have become so base, so dull. They hate you because they hate themselves. That spark of brilliance they see, or at least the trace of an IQ approaching room temperature, is all it takes to remind them. To set them off.

Their culture is a composite, a mosaic. A mixing and mingling, threads from a dozen nearby cultures half-woven into brilliant tapestry, now crumpled into an unfinished mass on the floor after the loom of their mind bent and shattered. Stone age on average, perhaps. But they might still do one or two things remarkably well. A charcoal pit for infusing iron with carbon to make the original adamant. An odd, exotic high-level spell. A fluting and beautiful song of sorrow and longing that has been bastardized into a war chant. That's all they retain.

They only stay with their sisters and brothers, the reminders of their unconceivable past, because they have to. They hate them, as well. The living reminders. But they can't leave, because they truly have no where else to go. Not even another tribe. Because troglodytes don't -- can't -- work together. There is no common ground. No pan-troglodyte culture. Each is different, unique. An unrelated corrupted synthesis of a hundred local flavors.

Except for the biology, they are more akin to you or I, than each other.

10-19-2009, 01:00 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Within a few generations of exposure to humans, mainly due to the action of goblinoid dealers in human flesh and 'juice, the vast majority of Trogs are degenerate brutes.

I think I would rather go with something simple like "humans smell bad". :D

10-19-2009, 02:54 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

In the prehistoric, all-reptilian game I ran many years ago, troglodytes were the Despoilers. They were once lizardfolk, in tune with nature, relatively peaceful, living in small tribes in the forests and swamps. But a dark cult of the toad-lizard Lagozed emerged among them, and these splinter cultists took his message of selfishness, greed and spite to a whole new level. They produced a warped sect of anti-druids who turned a vast part of the continent into a blighted forest where nothing natural could grow just to prevent the other lizardfolk from having it. These cultists were cursed by the powers of nature, to be as ugly and rotten outside as they were in.

And then the debased, corrupted now-trogs killed 90% of the lizardfolk on the planet. Because they were still spiteful bastards, but now had the forces of the Abyss on their side. By the game's "present day", they were on one side of the global proxy-Blood War. They were locked in a stalemate with the kobolds, who would much rather exploit and enslave than befoul and kill.

10-19-2009, 04:53 AM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Whenever I think of troglodytes, I always think that old side-scrolling beat 'em up that Capcom released in the arcades. Troglodytes were the mid-level mooks, and unlike your typical orcs and goblins, they had style. Leaping and in flipping, stunning with gas emitted from their bodies, using unusual weapons. They were like ninjas. That sort of colored my impression away from a lost race of stone-age brutes.

10-19-2009, 05:18 AM

Hellzon

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Funny how troglodytes differ throughout sources. My first impression was "crocodile-men"*, so I was quite surprised when non-D&D sources (mainly Dwarf Fortress and Stephen King's Dark Tower) had them as quasi-neanderthals.

*) From Forge of Fury.

10-19-2009, 05:46 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

In the prehistoric, all-reptilian game I ran many years ago, troglodytes were the Despoilers. They were once lizardfolk, in tune with nature, relatively peaceful, living in small tribes in the forests and swamps. But a dark cult of the toad-lizard Lagozed emerged among them, and these splinter cultists took his message of selfishness, greed and spite to a whole new level. They produced a warped sect of anti-druids who turned a vast part of the continent into a blighted forest where nothing natural could grow just to prevent the other lizardfolk from having it. These cultists were cursed by the powers of nature, to be as ugly and rotten outside as they were in.

Let's see, lizardmen + nasty corruption -> troglodytes makes me think of troglodytes as lizardmen with a reptilefolk version of the zombie virus. They're smelly and want to eat you because they're diseased half-dead. The lucky think is that they can only infect other lizardmen.

Hmm, or kobolds, because everyone loves pygmy zombies, how much better are pygmy reptile zombies with delusions of dragonhood.

10-20-2009, 06:06 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon

Funny how troglodytes differ throughout sources. My first impression was "crocodile-men"*, so I was quite surprised when non-D&D sources (mainly Dwarf Fortress and Stephen King's Dark Tower) had them as quasi-neanderthals.

*) From Forge of Fury.

The latter is actually a much better fit with the name, since "troglodyte" means cave-dweller, and the name used to be commonly applied to cave-men and anthropoid apes. That's why the common chimpanzee's scientific name is Pan troglodytes.

10-20-2009, 10:27 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon

Funny how troglodytes differ throughout sources. My first impression was "crocodile-men"*, so I was quite surprised when non-D&D sources (mainly Dwarf Fortress and Stephen King's Dark Tower) had them as quasi-neanderthals.

*) From Forge of Fury.

In the Fighting Fantasy universe troglodytes were small, neanderthal-like subterranean brutes.

10-20-2009, 11:43 PM

Derion

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

In the Fighting Fantasy universe troglodytes were small, neanderthal-like subterranean brutes.

They're actually much more goblin-like than neanderthal-like if I recall.

10-25-2009, 04:46 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Troll

Trolls are one of my absolute favourite monsters, and I'd be surprised if any other D&D players said different. There's something elegantly simple about them - all they are is a big, stupid, powerful humanoid that can regenerate - and yet genuinely compelling: a relentless carnivore that knows no fear and wants only to eat. Flee for your lives! etc. etc. There's also something iconic and indisputably D&D about a quest to chase off a troll from its den, isn't there?

D&D artists have also consistently done a good job making trolls look creepy; the long thin nose is a masterstroke in my opinion. (A long thin nose is always a surefire sign of a creepy monster.) Diterlizzi's pictures in this entry are no exception. The desert troll illustration is definitely a top 5-er for me.

Anyway, while I love the troll-under-the-bridge as much as the next man, I'm also a fan of trolls in unexpected settings. The troll innkeeper. The king with a troll bodyguard. The troll gaoler. The troll archmage. The troll ship's captain. And so on. Something that makes the characters suspicious and leery. Although you can only use that routine once or twice before it becomes old.

Well, the troll entry is gargantuan, so let's get to it. After the ordinary troll we have:

Giant Two-Headed Troll

Not just a big two-headed troll, but a troll/ettin crossbreed. So somewhere in the world there are either ettins shagging trolls of their own volition, or there's an archmage encouraging them to. Not a pleasant image, although I'm sure there's a porn sub-genre related to it.

Freshwater Troll (Scrag)

As it says on the tin, a troll that lives in rivers and lakes. Known as a devious hunter which scatters baubles along the riverside and pounces on greedy bypassers. Famous as the quintessential Troll Under The Bridge.

Saltwater Troll (Marine Scrag)

These creatures live in "shallow ocean caves" or beneath city docks (which I think is a great idea - a marine scrag is going to be a feature of the next coastal city I come up with). As expected, they like to eat people.

Desert Troll

These trolls are immune to fire, but instead cannot regenerate damage they suffer from normal water. They are also intelligent and able to change their skin, chameleon like, to match their surroundings.

Spectral Troll (Troll Wraith)

An undead troll that despises all life, etc. etc. There's a lot that's interesting about the Spectral Troll, not least the fact that in sunlight it fades away, only to reappear in the exact same place as soon as night falls. Also, humanoids that a Spectral Troll kills become Spectral Trolls themselves - although frankly the wording of the entry makes it sound like it might mean that they actually become spectres.

Giant Troll

Self-evidently, a giant troll. They have the rather nice tendency of grabbing one opponent and wielding the unfortunate like a weapon with which to beat others.

Ice Troll

A smaller and more intelligent version of the troll which "is probably the result of magical experimentation" (snore). Ice trolls like to keep humans and animals as livestock to keep them going through the summer months, and their bodies can be used in the manufacture of various cold-based magic items.

Spirit Troll

Sages make an appearance at this stage, though they aren't mentioned by name - there are just "schools of thought" which present evidence that the Spirit Troll is a cross between a troll and an invisible stalker (!). Its attacks can leech hit points from enemies to heal itself.

10-25-2009, 05:25 PM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, an idea popped into my mind when you mentioned "nontraditional Troll roles," so I'll make that my contribution to the idea pile:

Karmaug Starjaws is a troll of above-average (by troll standards) intellect. Coming across a recently-descended meteor, it salvaged the metal and strongarmed a group of humanoids into crafting a set of ragged meteoric iron teeth to replace its own. Residual effects of the unusual iron caused Karmaug to change in three notable ways:

- 1.) The skin on its head, chest and arms turns a distinct red. Its hair turns white.
- 2.) When angry or in combat, goutts of brilliant flame lick out from its jaws, burning its victims.
- 3.) It no longer fears fire and cannot be harmed by magical or nonmagical flames.

Using the advantages these changes granted it over its peers, Karmaug has subjugated the other trolls in the region, forcing them to provide tribute in terms of food and trinkets. This pressure has driven the others to increased ferocity in raiding, causing trouble for local travelers and villages. Additionally, Karmaug's former rivals - other trolls of notable strength, intellect, or ambition - have been pushed out of their old haunts by the threat he poses, and are now attempting to consolidate power in new regions. They might move into a vacated dungeon or section thereof, and the smarter of them are hunting for magic items that will let them best Karmaug.

Karmaug is a standard Troll of unusual intelligence (Very, 11-12) with above-average hit points (something like 2 above average per HD, 45 hp). Its flaming bite inflicts an additional 1d6 or 1d8 fire damage on a hit, and it's immune to fire damage. It is usually accompanied by 1-4 normal Trolls who it abuses physically and verbally. Karmaug will generally let these "servants" take the brunt of any organized assault.

Karmaug considers itself a "figure of note" in the local humanoid community, and might serve as a common enemy of a tribe of humanoids, or provide support (for a price) to a group that fears adventurers. Karmaug might hold sway over a section of a cave complex, use its tribute to purchase a stake in a mercenary company, or even get involved with a more powerful foe, especially mystics (Karmaug believes that additional fantastic additions might unlock further power.) Even when clearly outmatched, Karmaug considers itself the intellectual equal or superior of everyone it encounters - it is vain, and affects modes of speech and posturing that are intended to affirm its mental superiority. Notably, Karmaug is not hunched when it walks, instead striding much like a normal human. This position is uncomfortable but appears distinctive and provides an apparent height advantage over normal, slouched trolls.

10-25-2009, 07:32 PM

DeeCee

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Mentioning these because I was reading the magazine just the other day: Dragon issue #199 also brought us "Those Terrible Trolls", which added the Trollhound, Fire Troll, Gray Troll, Phaze Troll, and Stone Troll to the mix.

Also, something in Planescape (can't remember which supplement, might have been the Elemental Planes one) mentioned that on the plane of Ice, there's a huge troll battlefield where the combatants are frozen in a field of ice, with weapons and all. I don't know why, but that really piqued my interest. Even back in EQ2, the idea of trolls wielding the weapons of civilization, or armour, held my interest. But then, I like the idea of savage trolls just tearing things apart with terrible claws and sharklike teeth too.

Perhaps I just love trolls.

Great, now I'm getting a campaign jones. Curse you rpg.net!

10-25-2009, 07:52 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I posted this to another thread a few months ago:

They could be flayed and placed in molds that force their flesh to regrow in shapes that are not standard troll. They could also do this to themselves by removing parts from other trolls. One wants a tail- it would hack of the arm of another troll (which will regrow) and shape it with primitive alchemy so that it will be the right size and shape as well as attach to the spine.

Anyone use anything like this?

10-25-2009, 08:16 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I posted this to another thread a few months ago:

They could be flayed and placed in molds that force their flesh to regrow in shapes that are not standard troll. They could also do this to themselves by removing parts from other trolls. One wants a tail- it would hack of the arm of another troll (which will regrow) and shape it with primitive alchemy so that it will be the right size and shape as well as attach to the spine.

Anyone use anything like this?

That's actually rather similar to the way bladerager trolls are made in 4e (think Wolverine, except made out of troll instead of mutant Canadian). They're basically cut into bits and allowed to regrow, encouraged by alchemical solutions, around a bladed iron frame. The result is... not exactly a standard troll, but it is very good at mincing people.

Evidently the process is not exactly stable; when they are very, very injured (a lot), the alchemical treatments and metal contaminants contrive to throw the trollish regeneration process sufficiently out of whack that the beast tears itself apart with great force, launching razor shrapnel some distance in all directions.

10-25-2009, 08:37 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Huh. Bladeragers are in the MM IV or V but they didn't explode when killed. There just were in extreme pain all the time due to the plates and other metal bolted or screwed into their flesh.

10-25-2009, 08:52 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

We had a troll technomancer in Shadowrun. He was an internet troll. He trolled our internets, and he was a troll.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I posted this to another thread a few months ago:

They could be flayed and placed in molds that force their flesh to regrow in shapes that are not standard troll. They could also do this to themselves by removing parts from other trolls. One wants a tail- it would hack off the arm of another troll (which will regrow) and shape it with primitive alchemy so that it will be the right size and shape as well as attach to the spine.

Anyone use anything like this?

Bonsai Troll! (Remember Bonsai Kitten?)

10-25-2009, 10:28 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

Karmaug Starjaws is a troll of above-average (by troll standards) intellect. Coming across a recently-descended meteor, it salvaged the metal and strongarmed a group of humanoids into crafting a set of ragged meteoric iron teeth to replace its own. Residual effects of the unusual iron caused Karmaug to change in three notable ways:

1.) The skin on its head, chest and arms turns a distinct red. Its hair turns white.

A perpetual blush? He'd probably become known as the "blushing troll". Except to his face, of course. I imagine he'd hate the nickname....

I also like the bonsai troll.

But to go off on a little tangent, let's compare the two editions:

Quote:

Originally Posted by AD&D 2nd Edition Monstrous Manual

When using an edged weapon, it is possible to sever the thin limbs of a troll (a natural 20 with an edged weapon is needed). Severed limbs continue to fight after separation from the body (hands squeeze, heads bite if stepped on, etc.). Attacks by severed limbs are at normal chances to hit. Separated limbs fight for the remainder of the battle, then scuttle back and rebind with the body once the battle is over. Limbs unable to reach the body to die within 24 hours, but this is of little consequence since trolls regenerate lost body parts (including the head) within a week. If a troll is dismembered and scattered, the largest surviving piece regenerates. The others die within one day if they cannot rejoin that piece.

Quote:

Originally Posted by AD&D 1st Edition Monster Manual

Regeneration repairs damage at 3 hit points per round; this regeneration includes the rebonding of severed members. The loathsome members of a troll have the ability to fight on even if severed from the body; a hand can claw and strangle, the head bite, etc. Total dismemberment will not slay a troll, for its parts will slither and scuttle together, to rejoin, and the troll will arise whole and ready to continue combat. To kill a troll, the monster must be burned or immersed in acid, any separate pieces being treated in the same fashion or they create a whole again in 3-18 melee rounds.

They nerfed the troll.

I really like the open-ended version in first edition. There's no time limit on how long troll pieces will survive. Adventurers might deliberately maim, then capture and ride off with pieces of trolls. They couldn't leave them behind, after all, because they'd eventually rejoin and you'd have a whole troll again. This would be an effective way of reducing the efficacy of the local troll tribes, without requiring a prolonged confrontation. There might be trolls with missing hands, arms, legs... heads. The headless might be used by their kin as shock trolls. Point them in the right direction, and then they flail away like bizarre reaping machines.

The ever-mercenary adventurers could then sell the pieces to scholars to study. There might be a whole department decided to this at the local university, with labs stocked with dozens, hundreds, of pieces, all undergoing experiments in grafting, animation, and just investigation as they try to determine the nature and source of the troll's restorative properties, and use it.

You could have troll-golems, troll mecha, troll cloaks and armor. Fillet a limb, separate the flesh from the bone. Toss the bone into a cast, then pour in boiling metal. Take the metal piece with the troll core, and attach to a golem. Is it animate? Then take the filleted skin and sinew and muscle, and wrap it around a frame. Viola, a muscle-augmenting exoskeleton — that has a tendency to try to eat its wearer. Make leather armor out of the troll hide. Tough, perpetually restoring itself. And without the muscle, it should be safe, shouldn't it? Just requires a daily shave and trim, to prevent it from growing out of hand. Or a cloak. Let the cloak soak up the damage from the white dragon's breath first, before you take any yourself. How many hit points does the skin and fat of a troll have, again?

This could cause a problem if some deluded activist group gets it into their heads that separating all these scuttling limbs from their original bodies and performing horrible experiments on them is cruel. They might break in, set all the body parts free free. And, like similarly foolish characters in zombie movies, they'd probably all die as the super-strong limbs rend their saviors to pieces.

But there's still a problem. All these limbs. Slithering and scuttling. There would be a plague of crawling green hands, scabrous hopping feet, rolling heads filled with fangs. Either heading off in unison toward the moors (if we assume the location sense that allows them to reunite in combat extends that far), or heading off (ahem) in a random direction.

Since universities are generally surrounded by major population centers, let the attack of the killer troll body parts commence. The party might be called in to save the city from clawed hands jumping out of cupboards. Or they might see it in the distance: The city, burning. Against this lurid backdrop, they spot a wave heading toward them, across the grassland. Something is moving, low to the ground. Something too low to see, only visible by the wake it is making in the grasses. Heading toward the moors....

10-25-2009, 10:51 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Another aspect that went away with the nerfing: What if there is only one troll?

Blaming a horrible magical experiment is trite, when there are all kinds of other possibilities. Perhaps it was some kind of disgusting, cancerous growth growing from some inaccessible place on the god of mischief. There might be myths and legends about how the trickster had to fool his own brother into cutting it off, to restore his body to its original pristine perfection. Except, the discarded and forgotten piece became sapient. That's the troll. The one troll. The trollfather.

Perfect regeneration, in all ways except against fire and acid. Our troll is immortal, perpetual. Unless slain, of course.

But then expanding humans or dwarves or elves came along, and with their shiny swords cut him to pieces, and let him lie. One piece might have fallen into a hole, another into a raging stream. This happens many times, over the years. And each piece becomes a new troll.

Where there was one, there are now a multitude.

Even worse, the troll brotherhood might figure out how to exploit this property. They are another one of those creatures like vampires or werewolves that, when the conditions are right, can spread like wildfire. Imagine a roaring bonfire on the moors. Trolls proving their courage by leaping through the flames. Painted, with exotic colors. Filed teeth, spikes driven through their chests to bring the cleansing and restorative pain. Feasting on plump spitted halflings, like humans do on a drumstick. Except we generally don't do it while the bird is still alive.

Then, when gorged on demihuman flesh, they bring out the blades. Chipped flint or obsidian, or captured cleavers or polearms. Maybe a bit blunt, not razor sharp. But trolls are hideously strong. Even so, like medieval beheadings, it may take several tries to cut all the way through. But it can be done. The remaining halflings look on in horror as the trolls hold down one of their own — and chop off an arm, or a leg. Then watch awestruck as the stump stops bleeding, as new skin grows. Then the limb bulges and swells, and before many minutes have passed the troll is clenching a new fist, or stamping around on a new foot. Then they notice, belatedly, that the same thing is happening to the severed part. Bulging, swelling, growing. Not a new limb, but a new troll. Before long, there is a new emaciated figured standing next to his progenitor.

Unfortunately for our halflings, it's probably very hungry.

This is the trollplague. Orcs hordes have nothing on trolls when it comes to replenishing their numbers.

10-25-2009, 11:04 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

One of Clockwork Golem Workshop's pdfs has an idea of people who have had troll blood end up in their wounds- they don't have regeneration (just faster normal healing) and the ability to not die when hacked up. The number of negative hit points they can reach before dying can get a bit excessive, esp with a prestige class based on the concept. They still are down for the fight when they have -CON hp (or lower) but they won't die from the wounds.

10-25-2009, 11:17 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

One of Clockwork Golem Workshop's pdfs has an idea of people who have had troll blood end up in their wounds- they don't have regeneration (just faster normal healing) and the ability to not die when hacked up. The number of negative hit points they can reach before dying can get a bit excessive, esp with a prestige class based on the concept. They still are down for the fight when they have -CON hp (or lower) but they won't die from the wounds.

That's fucking awesome.

Adventurers should totally be able to buy troll blood for that purpose.

In fact, you know all those healing potions you've been drink over the years, evar wondered what's in them...

10-26-2009, 02:17 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Hm. If they made a city out of the Tarrasque... I could easily see a family of spriggans living in a war-troll.

gnaw gnaw gnaw gnaw gnaw

10-26-2009, 03:26 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Lessee... a few trollish tidbits:

In my campaign, one of the more exotic forms of rations were "daka-meat", which was a plug of troll flesh in a can. It was fairly flavorless, so it needed to be properly cooked and heavily seasoned, but as long as you left a little scrap of flesh in the bottom of the can, it would grow back. Just make sure you seal the can back up very tightly...

In the same game, the PCs fought an insectoid troll with the nasty habit of ripping off one of his arms and using it as a weapon. More reach!

In the Pathfinder campaign setting, it's been mentioned that there's a sect of troll seers who divine the future by the reading of entrails--their own. They slit themselves open, stir around with their guts to augur, then stuff themselves back in before the hole seals.

10-26-2009, 04:09 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

In the Pathfinder campaign setting, it's been mentioned that there's a sect of troll seers who divine the future by the reading of entrails--their own. They slit themselves open, stir around with their guts to augur, then stuff themselves back in before the hole seals.

Troll hauspices. I rather like that. If trolls are interpreted as more civilized (to take the Roman analogy further, imagine a patrician with an "aquiline" -- i.e. hatchet-shaped instead of string-beanish -- nose), trolls might be at the forefront of medical science as well. Though I imagine they'd lose more than their share of patients because they'd have a hard time comprehending the dangers of shock.

10-26-2009, 05:04 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

That's fucking awesome.

Adventurers should totally be able to buy troll blood for that purpose.

If they want to turn green and rubbery. The dwarves mentioned getting wounded by trolls and then being splashed by their blood become outcasts because of the obvious taint.

10-26-2009, 05:13 AM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

A perpetual blush? He'd probably become known as the "blushing troll". Except to his face, of course. I imagine he'd hate the nickname....

Karmaug the Bashful!

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

That's fucking awesome.

Adventurers should totally be able to buy troll blood for that purpose.

In fact, you know all those healing potions you've been drink over the years, evar wondered what's in them...

You've just diagnosed the actual cause of the steady increase in HP totals as editions have progressed.

10-26-2009, 06:34 AM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138
Lessee... a few trollish tidbits:

In my campaign, one of the more exotic forms of rations were "daka-meat", which was a plug of troll flesh in a can. It was fairly flavorless, so it needed to be properly cooked and heavily seasoned, but as long as you left a little scrap of flesh in the bottom of the can, it would grow back. Just make sure you seal the can back up very tightly...

I think pretty much every D&D group has come across the idea of harvesting trolls as an unlimited food source. Just have a troll securely chained in the back of the butcher shop, and the butch can take off a slice for each customer and have it grow back for the next customer in line.

I imagine the preparation for it to be similar to that of surume to make it palatable (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dried_s...id#Preparation).

10-26-2009, 11:31 AM

Zartes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Asmodai
I think pretty much every D&D group has come across the idea of harvesting trolls as an unlimited food source. Just have a troll securely chained in the back of the butcher shop, and the butch can take off a slice for each customer and have it grow back for the next customer in line.

I imagine the preparation for it to be similar to that of surume to make it palatable (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dried_s...id#Preparation).

i was about to say that it'd have to be cooked really well to avoid it growing in the adventurer's stomach... but then I realized that the stomach acid would deal with the regeneration problem.

Does that mean you can kill a troll by chaining him up and puking on him? :D

(that would explain why warhammer trolls developed their famous puking attack)

10-26-2009, 01:04 PM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I can just picture the scene, after a long battle the weary adventurers are about to sit down for a well-deserved rest.

"Not so fast!" the party wizard intones, "to truly vanquish a troll, you might eat it, piece by piece."

"Dig in," he says, waving a piece of troll meat around on his dagger than popping it into his mouth.

But yeah, Trolls compete with other trolls for food, mates, etc. It would make sense for them to develop a puking acid attack to do that. (The difficulty is, WFB Trolls are only vulnerable to fire, not acid, IIRC.)

10-26-2009, 06:36 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Troll

Trolls are one of my absolute favourite monsters, and I'd be surprised if any other D&D players said different. There's something elegantly simple about them - all they are is a big, stupid, powerful humanoid that can regenerate - and yet genuinely compelling: a relentless carnivore that knows no fear and wants only to eat. Flee for your lives! etc. etc. There's also something iconic and indisputably D&D about a quest to chase off a troll from its den, isn't there?

They're one of my favourites too. However, I like more variety in trolls: Some trolls are intelligent, talking creatures and can be negotiated with, although most are none-to-smart and easily deceived, they can be very sneaky and a few are terrifyingly cunning, other trolls are irrational beasts, nothing but raging appetite in scaly humanoid form. Some are hulking giants, some are tiny creatures that sneak into peasant's cottages to steal their babies. Further, I'd rather trolls have a wider range of powers apart the standard regeneration - some have skin as hard as diamond, rendering them practically immune to weapons, some have blood so corrosive it dissolves anything (or, if you're unlucky, anyone) who wounds them, some are so hideous the sight of them paralyses whoever sees them with disgust and dread, et cetera et cetera.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Anyway, while I love the troll-under-the-bridge as much as the next man, I'm also a fan of trolls in unexpected settings. The troll innkeeper. The king with a troll bodyguard. The troll gaoler. The troll archmage. The troll ship's captain. And so on. Something that makes the characters suspicious and leery. Although you can only use that routine once or twice before it becomes old.

Definitely! There was troll merchant, pirate and hotel-keeper in my last campaign.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Giant Two-Headed Troll

Not just a big two-headed troll, but a troll/ettin crossbreed. So somewhere in the world there are either ettins shagging trolls of their own volition, or there's an archmage encouraging them to. Not a pleasant image, although I'm sure there's a porn sub-genre related to it.

SNIP

Spirit Troll

Sages make an appearance at this stage, though they aren't mentioned by name - there are just "schools of thought" which present evidence that the Spirit Troll is a cross between a troll and an invisible stalker (!).

Gah! I'm not sure which conjures up the most unpleasant images, imaging a troll and an ettin doing the nasty, or a troll apparently having it off with thin air!:eek:

I can understand the ettin, since they're both giant(-ish) creatures, but why would a troll fancy an invisible stalker? Heck, how would it even find one?

Hmm, trolls have a very keen sense of smell, right, so now I'm visualising the following scenario...

Invisible Stalker wandering through swamp, a lean green form rises out of the water and leans its head over the stalker's shoulder.

Smiling Troll :D: "You sure has a pretty smell".

Although, it makes me want to have a bunch of Trolls and Invisible Stalkers working together, maybe led by a Spirit Troll. The trolls are the muscle, the stalkers the scouts - flying across the land to find a caravan of travelers, waiting until they camp and silently murdering the guards before the trolls make their charge.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Saltwater Troll (Marine Scrag)

These creatures live in "shallow ocean caves" or beneath city docks (which I think is a great idea - a marine scrag is going to be a feature of the next coastal city I come up with). As expected, they like to eat people.

Good heavens, you'd think a 10' tall green monster that climbs out onto the dock and eats people would close down the port! Maybe the scrag is running a protection racket - give me livestock, treasure and an annual human sacrifice or I'll wreck your ships and kill your sailors.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Desert Troll

These trolls are immune to fire, but instead cannot regenerate damage they suffer from normal water. They are also intelligent and able to change their skin, chameleon like, to match their surroundings.

I came up with something similar in the Salt Troll, which lived in magically polluted saline wastes. It was had caustic blood and was resistant to fire but vulnerable to water plus doubly-vulnerable to acid.

10-27-2009, 03:04 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Self-evidently, a giant troll. They have the rather nice tendency of grabbing one opponent and wielding the unfortunate like a weapon with which to beat others.

I'm totally stealing that for some sort of 4th edition monster. It sounds very like a 4e monster's trick:

Grabbing Fist: (Standard basic melee, at will) +14 vs. AC; 1d10+6 and grabbed (until escape).

Bash'em With Their Friends (Standard; Melee; Recharge 5,6) Only usable while grabbing an enemy, and targets a different enemy +14 vs. Reflex; 2d12+6 damage and grabbed enemy takes the same damage.

Or some such, depending on level of the monster.

10-27-2009, 03:13 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

A recent-ish Dragon article on Eberron involved a village of monsters where their primary food source was troll meat, from trolls chained up in the basements of the food halls. They had to heavily season the meat to make it palatable, even by monster standards.

10-27-2009, 03:54 AM

Ginkomortus

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Long ago and far away... like, earlier this decade, my friends were playing a game of 3E. Their character were on a river barge heading for the next big city and one of them had decided to go fishing off the stern of the boat.

At which point one of the players got up and headed for the bathroom.

While he was gone, the party was suddenly attacked by a very angry Scrag with a fish hook in her mouth. The fight went quickly, but it was still rough. A moment later, the player who was gone returned from the bathroom and finds out that everybody's half dead.

"What happened?" he asked, "What were you doing?"

The reply came, "Trolling."

10-27-2009, 05:27 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Ginkomortus, that is hilarious.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

I'm totally stealing that for some sort of 4th edition monster. It sounds very like a 4e monster's trick:

It does indeed! They thought the same thing, in fact. I thought that was a neat callback, when noisms mentioned it.

10-27-2009, 05:37 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Trolls are always fun to use. They're also some of the most world-breaking monsters in (A)D&D; apart from fire and acid, they're practically unkillable! I hate to think what kind of an ecological damage a pack of trolls does to a region...

10-27-2009, 06:03 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius

Hm. If they made a city out of the Tarrasque... I could easily see a family of spriggans living in a war-troll.

gnaw gnaw gnaw gnaw gnaw

Registered only link dude.

10-27-2009, 06:04 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

Lessee... a few trollish tidbits:

In my campaign, one of the more exotic forms of rations were "daka-meat", which was a plug of troll flesh in a can.

Needs moar daka!

10-27-2009, 06:40 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Registered only link dude.

What, really? Wow, that is super dumb. Does this work?

Spoiler: gnaw gnaw gnaw

10-27-2009, 06:50 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius

What, really? Wow, that is super dumb. Does this work?

Spoiler: gnaw gnaw gnaw

Nope, tiny pic it is.

10-27-2009, 07:07 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath
Nope, tynypic it is.

Grr! Tynypic it is.

10-27-2009, 07:15 AM

Brandi

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
I can understand the ettin, since they're both giant(-ish) creatures, but why would a troll fancy an invisible stalker? Heck, how would it even find one?

Who said the troll was the father?

I'm figuring it was an extremely obnoxious, yet successful, forced breeding experiment with neither partner enjoying it.

10-27-2009, 09:32 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssius
What, really? Wow, that is super dumb.

Wizards pulled all their image galleries behind the subscriber wall when they did the site redesign. Seems counter-productive to me.

10-27-2009, 09:57 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot
Wizards pulled all their image galleries behind the subscriber wall when they did the site redesign. Seems counter-productive to me.

I knew they did that (stupid, stupid move that it was), but pulling the actual images as well? That's gonna break a lot of stuff. Well, anyway.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Trolls are one of my absolute favourite monsters, and I'd be surprised if any other D&D players said different. There's something elegantly simple about them - all they are is a big, stupid, powerful humanoid that can regenerate - and yet genuinely compelling: a relentless carnivore that knows no fear and wants only to eat. Flee for your lives! etc. etc. There's also something iconic and indisputably D&D about a quest to chase off a troll from its den, isn't there? [...]

Anyway, while I love the troll-under-the-bridge as much as the next man, I'm also a fan of trolls in unexpected settings. The troll innkeeper. The king with a troll bodyguard. The troll gaoler. The troll archmage. The troll ship's captain. And so on. Something that makes the characters suspicious and leery. Although you can only use that routine once or twice before it becomes old.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

They're one of my favourites too. However, I like more variety in trolls: Some trolls are intelligent, talking creatures and can be negotiated with, although most are none-to-smart and easily deceived, they can be very sneaky and a few are terrifyingly cunning, other trolls are irrational beasts, nothing but raging appetite in scaly humanoid form. Some are hulking giants, some are tiny creatures that sneak into peasant's cottages to steal their babies. Further, I'd rather trolls have a wider range of powers apart the standard regeneration - some have skin as hard as diamond, rendering them practically immune to weapons, some have blood so corrosive it dissolves anything (or, if you're unlucky, anyone) who wounds them, some are so hideous the sight of them paralyses whoever sees them with disgust and dread, et cetera et cetera.

These things, very much. I love trolls myself, and always have. I've only once had the opportunity to use any, though: several robin's-egg blue troll-kin assassins. They were the underlings of a waterfall spirit who had learned some witchcraft; unfortunately this made her valuable as a slave to the conquistador who first explored the area, which in turn made him a figure of some renown.

Oh, also: I believe it was Three Hearts and Three Lions specifically which gave D&D its troll as a perpetually hungry, long-nosed, toothy gray-green monster. I'll see if I can dig it out, quote the relevant passage...

10-27-2009, 06:34 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I can understand the ettin, since they're both giant(-ish) creatures, but why would a troll fancy an invisible stalker? Heck, how would it even find one?

After checking the Invisible Stalker's Monster Manual entry it looks like the Crazy Wizard Did It explanation is the most likely one, since "Those encountered on the Prime Material plane have almost always been summoned by wizards to fulfill a specific task".

So somewhere in the AD&D universe there are wizards summoning up aerial spirits just to order them to have carnal relations with trolls.:eek:

Hmm, if they do it to trolls then said mad magi probably send them out to molest other creatures too. Is it part of a scheme to create an army of invisible half breeds or are the crazy wizards just a bunch of voyeurs?

Or it could just be the Stalker had a misunderstanding of its orders, of the "I told you to slay the troll" variety. Perhaps there's only one Invisible Stalker, who due to his exceptionally badly worded (or exceptionally perverse) orders is roaming the land, forcing himself onto any vaguely humanoid female it comes across.

Not sure whether I'd want to put such speculations to use in a game, how many players would want to experience such a dubious scenario as The Adventurer of the Phantom Ravisher?

10-27-2009, 06:46 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Brandi
Who said the troll was the father?

I'm figuring it was an extremely obnoxious, yet successful, forced breeding experiment with neither partner enjoying it.

I don't recall saying it was a male troll doing the fancying.:)

Actually, in my campaign the female troll is usually the nastier of the two sexes, so they usually are the dominant figure in a troll mating. The female trolls are not necessarily physically stronger than the males, although some are stronger most are about as large & muscular as the males, they mostly are just smarter and have more forceful personalities.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi
Oh, also: I believe it was Three Hearts and Three Lions specifically which gave D&D its troll as a perpetually hungry, long-nosed, toothy gray-green monster. I'll see if I can dig it out, quote the relevant passage...

Dang it, I was going to mention the classic D&D trolls origins in that Poul Anderson story, but never got around to it.

10-27-2009, 07:35 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The Dragon article in 199 has a troll dog. I wonder why there never was any troll fish, birds, insects or dragons? With 3e templates it would be easy (I expect fairly common for those DMs who used templates). But why not for 2e?

10-27-2009, 07:40 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
So somewhere in the AD&D universe there are wizards summoning up aerial spirits just to order them to have carnal relations with trolls.:eek:

Hmm, if they do it to trolls then said mad magi probably send them out to molest other creatures too. Is it part of a scheme to create an army of invisible half breeds or are the crazy wizards just a bunch of voyeurs?

This is going to sound crass, but if the male pornstar is invisible that makes certain kind of porn easier to film...

10-28-2009, 12:13 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

The Dragon article in 199 has a troll dog. I wonder why there never was any troll fish, birds, insects or dragons? With 3e templates it would be easy (I expect fairly common for those DMs who used templates). But why not for 2e?

Lack of creativity perhaps. It's a nice idea.

10-28-2009, 01:57 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

The Dragon article in 199 has a troll dog. I wonder why there never was any troll fish, birds, insects or dragons? With 3e templates it would be easy (I expect fairly common for those DMs who used templates). But why not for 2e?

Well most likely it never occurred to them. As to why it didn't, who knows?

Although that reminds me, I once wrote up stats for a spider troll - a mixture of a troll, a giant spider and a drow elf. I wonder where I left it?

10-28-2009, 02:04 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james

This is going to sound crass, but if the male pornstar is invisible that makes certain kind of porn easier to film...

I'll bow to your superior insight into the subject.;

Besides, the wizard would probably have a gem of seeing or an appropriate spell to use if/when they want to view all the action. :o

10-31-2009, 11:14 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Umber Hulk

Well well, if it isn't another icon. Maybe not as iconic as the troll, but certainly one of those D&D stalwarts that we all know and love. When you think about it it's also a really obvious monster - indeed you could say that's rather odd that there aren't more creatures which burrow around underground and ambush dungeoneers.

In the Umber Hulk entry we see the idea of a "dungeon ecology" made explicit:

Quote:

Umber hulks dwell in the depths of the earth. They raid dungeons for food, much the way anteaters raid ant colonies, eating their fill and then moving on to let the "colony" recover.

Which is fun, especially since it implies that the world is so full of dungeons, and its dungeons so reliably full of meat, that it is possible for Umber Hulks to move around on a peripatetic basis, never running out of food. What a weird idea D&D is when you really think about it.

Anyway, the main plot hook in the entry is I suppose the idea of the underground Umber Hulk city, which, okay, is mildly interesting but doesn't grab me. Why do creatures like Umber Hulks always have to live in cities? If anything I imagine them congregating in some sort of giant nest, perhaps with a gargantuan queen right in the middle.

Vodyanoi

Vodyanoi are aquatic versions of the Umber Hulk - there are freshwater varieties and also rumoured saltwater ones which are greatly bigger. A so-so monster; I like the idea of Vodyanoi in their original mythological form as a kind of sinister old man floating around on a half-sunk log and dragging people to their deaths underwater. A shame that such a nice concept was thrown out in favour of something as bland as "water dwelling Umber Hulk".

10-31-2009, 11:42 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

According to the vodyanoi entry, the aquatic umber hulks (who aren't umber, but that's another matter) lack the ability to confuse opponents because they only have two eyes. Which implies that the standard umber hulk's confusion ability comes from the fact that it does have multiple eyes. Or that only certain eyes on its face do the confusing and the rest are for, you know, seeing and stuff.

We have a trio of Umber Hulks as sidekicks in our Spelljammer game, who are alternately named Huey, Duey and Louie or Janet, Louise and... something else. No one knows what gender the hulks are, nor does anyone want to find out, so we switch back and forth when referring to them. (We got them as followers by killing their neogi master, of course.)

11-01-2009, 12:38 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Umber Hulk

Anyway, the main plot hook in the entry is I suppose the idea of the underground Umber Hulk city, which, okay, is mildly interesting but doesn't grab me. Why do creatures like Umber Hulks always have to live in cities? If anything I imagine them congregating in some sort of giant nest, perhaps with a gargantuan queen right in the middle.

I don't see anything in the description which implies an umber hulk "City" is anything like a humanoid one, there's nothing to prevent it resembling a giant insect colony.

I prefer to think of Umber Hulks as lacking a queen though, more like a social spider colony than a termite's mound.

I wonder how long it would take the local dungeons to recover enough for the Umber Hulks to feed off them again? Perhaps too long to continuously sustain an active colony of Umber Hulks that stays in one place. That suggests umber hulks are migratory, and once they're exhausted the dungeons around a City they move en masse to their next city and start raiding from there. They could have a circuit of cities linked with well-defined tunnels. Alternatively, they hibernate between feeding frenzies, or most of them hibernate and only the few that are awake at any one time go out hunting when they're not guarding the city. If some adventurers stumble across the City, maybe the guards release a signal that alerts the sleeping hulks, so in a turn or two the intruders face hundreds of outraged monsters!

11-01-2009, 01:31 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well most likely it never occurred to them. As to why it didn't, who knows?

Although that reminds me, I once wrote up stats for a spider troll - a mixture of a troll, a giant spider and a drow elf. I wonder where I left it?

I'm surprised we had so little about the Trolls, I'm sure there's a lot more interesting things to say about trolls in AD&D and elsewhere.

Looking through their Monstrous Manual entry in a bit more detail, I notice a couple of things:

Firstly, on Troll language:

Quote:

Trolls have no language of their own, using "troll-speak", a guttural mishmash of common, giant, goblin, orc, and hobgoblin. Troll-speak is highly transient and trolls from one area are only 25% likely to be able to communicate with trolls from another.

So, Trolls basically pick up bits and pieces of the speech of other humanoids, and their dialect is so variable over time and distance that they usually can't even understand each other. That suggests Trolls have social interactions with other races to learn their languages - unless they are able to pick up conversational skills from their dinner! There are a number of official AD&D adventures where a groups of Orcs, Giants or what-not have a few trolls allies or slaves they employ as shock troops, that could be one way they learn their "troll-speak".

Still, there's an inference that Trolls have little or no culture of their own, but just mimic that around them. I doubt it's because they're too stupid to build a society - there are plenty of low-intelligent humanoids in AD&D that have their own language and culture. Something else must be at work. Perhaps Trolls are very short lived, their superfast metabolisms burning out in but a decade or so, so don't get enough experience to build their own social identity? Then again, perhaps their ability to perfectly heal injuries means they are effectively immortal.

There may be a simple explanation for Trolls cultural stagnation in the Habitat/Society section:

Quote:

"Leadership is only retained by combat, so fights for pack control are frequent. Often trolls rend each other limb from limb, but these battles are never fatal. Still, it is the custom of trolls to toss the loser's head a great distance from the fight scene, and frequently losers must sit and stew for a week until their new head grows in."

Even for a Troll, losing and regrowing your head may have consequences. Perhaps it causes a partial or total loss of memory and identity. Trolls may have little culture due to their tradition of decapitation.

Oh, and I noticed one little titbit in the Ice Troll entry: "Ice trolls that live in arctic regions often hunt remorhaz". It takes some gumption to attack a monster capable of doing 10-100 points heat damage when you take double damage from fire, can't regenerate the damage, and have only 2 hit dice - that's pretty well certain death if they touch the polar worm's back. Perhaps it's be a test of bravery performed by large groups of Ice Trolls as a "Rite of Trollhood"?

11-01-2009, 02:39 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

So, Trolls basically pick up bits and pieces of the speech of other humanoids, and their dialect is so variable over time and distance that they usually can't even understand each other. That suggests Trolls have social interactions with other races to learn their languages - unless they are able to pick up conversational skills from their dinner!

Actually, that's exactly what happens. Trolls are really composite creatures, and share aspects of every creature that they kill and eat. When a troll eats a person, it absorbs some of that person's strength, knowledge, personality and skill. (Troll culture, such as it is, is spread through cannibalism.) It has something to do with how the regeneration works.

Heck, why do trolls regenerate?

One possible answer:

Trolls were once a peaceful race, who begged of the local faerie queen for a boon. They wished that they could be immortal, like the fey creatures that served the queen. Annoyed by the proto-trolls and their begging, the queen granted their request, though not as expected. Now any time a troll eats a once living thing, that creature's life force is preserved, and the troll takes on aspects of the creature it ate. Over time, the trolls became more bestial and animalistic from eating cows and boars and creatures of the forest. Realizing their error, they have begun eating other sentients and cannibalizing other trolls. This has only hurt their relationship with the humanoid races, as did the troll tribes that now try to eat the strongest, meanest, nastiest creatures they can find..

11-01-2009, 03:05 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Oh, and I noticed one little titbit in the Ice Troll entry: "Ice trolls that live in arctic regions often hunt remorhaz". It takes some gumption to attack a monster capable of doing 10-100 points heat damage when you take double damage from fire, can't regenerate the damage, and have only 2 hit dice - that's pretty well certain death if they touch the polar worm's back. Perhaps it's be a test of bravery performed by large groups of Ice Trolls as a "Rite of Trollhood"?

Or maybe they just act smart, like those primitive 0-level humanoids who wiped out the mammoths, ten millennia ago. Digging pits along their migration paths, using fire or loud noise to stampede them off cliffs or into ravines, ambushing them from unclimbable heights with volley after volley of spears or arrows, culling the young or the infirm elderly or the injured....

Our ancestors weren't 10th level combat machines. They were Tucker's kobolds.

11-01-2009, 03:56 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Anyway, the main plot hook in the entry is I suppose the idea of the underground Umber Hulk city, which, okay, is mildly interesting but doesn't grab me. Why do creatures like Umber Hulks always have to live in cities? If anything I imagine them congregating in some sort of giant nest, perhaps with a gargantuan queen right in the middle.

Whereas I read that bit about umber hulk cities and think, "oh, thank god. It's not yet another giant insect monster with a eusocial system". Why does every insect monster society need a queen? Everyone's got different tastes, but I think the city is much more interesting.

Why? Well, why do humans build cities? To trade and for defense. What are the umber hulks trading in? What hideous thing do they need to defend themselves against? Purple worms, perhaps? The worms are blind, so they're immune to the confusing gaze of the umber hulks. And they're big enough to swallow even an umber hulk whole.

Or perhaps it's the neogi. Maybe umber hulks were once brutal, bestial things from some far-off world, and the neogi uplifted and enslaved the lot of them. The umber hulks we know today are therefore escapees, or the descendants of same, clustered together in numbers for the days when the Eel-Men will descend from the sky and scour the earth to claim their inheritance. The solitary, wandering-monster type umber hulk is perhaps one that cracked under the constant state of paranoia and fear these hulk cities operate on, or perhaps a recent escapee trying to find the right underground railroad to take him to Freedom Town.

11-01-2009, 05:37 AM

YojimboC

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

While I have always liked the terrible regenerating monstrosity that is the D&D troll, I've also always had a soft spot for the "traditional" mountain spirit troll. The one that hides in caves during the day because the light of the sun turns them to stone.

I read D'Aulaires' Book of Trolls at an early age and really enjoyed it. Trollhags, multi-headed trolls, jewels, hulderfolk, etc. Lots of good stuff.

Anyway, given how indestructible trolls tend to be in D&D, I think having a "turn to stone" mechanic might help keep them in check.

11-01-2009, 06:29 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Trolls may speak a pigin (or creole?) of many local languages because those were the languages they spoke before they became trolls. If their origins are something like as was suggested in the Tarasque thread, then you're not born a troll, you become one.

Either that, or the local billy goats speak a local pigin dialect, and the trolls have learnt from them.

And it seems like killing a remorhaz would be easy -- get them flipped over on their backs above frozen water. They'll melt through the ice... and then boil themselves. Dinner is served, without the need to invent fire, even. Since most remorhaz art shows them rearing waaaay up, it's probably not even that hard to knock them over on their back.

Also, weirdly, I could never tell what color umber hulks were -- I'm partially colorblind, and most browns and greens look sort-of muddy brown-green to me. Unless it's a really bright green, it's all the same to me. Since umber hulk art direction was always kind of pointless to me, I went with the interpretation that umber hulk referred to their habitat -- clay earth.

11-01-2009, 06:13 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Or maybe they just act smart, like those primitive 0-level humanoids who wiped out the mammoths, ten millennia ago. Digging pits along their migration paths, using fire or loud noise to stampede them off cliffs or into ravines, ambushing them from unclimbable heights with volley after volley of spears or arrows, culling the young or the infirm elderly or the injured....

Our ancestors weren't 10th level combat machines. They were Tucker's kobolds.

How dare you! My ancestors were all at least 12th level.:mad:;)

Ahem

Yes, it would presumably require a large and well-organized group of Ice Trolls to take down a Remorhaz whatever ploy they use. Although the physiology and behaviour of the Remorhaz is nothing like a mammoth, so I'd presume they'd require very different hunting tactics.

The other problem is they're very rare, so why mention them as being a standard prey instead of, say, seals or caribou?

Hmm, maybe we're getting this backwards. Perhaps Ice Trolls live together with domesticated Remorhaz's. According to their MM entry Remorhaz "can be trained to be excellent guards", so perhaps many Ice Troll communities are built around a "tame" polar worm, raised from an egg to guard their lair and obey the Chief and Shaman? Such a creature would be far easier for them to kill when it got old and feeble, or if starvation hits the tribe. There's an additional advantage: Ice Trolls only regenerates when in liquid water, how do they find a pool of water when the weather's 30 below? It's easy when you've got a pet Remorhaz which does 10-100 fire damage.

I like that idea, I can imagine Ice Trolls revering the Polar Worm as their totem animal, like our ancestors may have honoured the Cave Bear or the Mammoth.

11-01-2009, 06:27 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

Whereas I read that bit about umber hulk cities and think, "oh, thank god. It's not yet another giant insect monster with a eusocial system". Why does every insect monster society need a queen? Everyone's got different tastes, but I think the city is much more interesting.

Why? Well, why do humans build cities? To trade and for defense. What are the umber hulks trading in? What hideous thing do they need to defend themselves against? Purple worms, perhaps? The worms are blind, so they're immune to the confusing gaze of the umber hulks. And they're big enough to swallow even an umber hulk whole.

Or perhaps it's the neogi. Maybe umber hulks were once brutal, bestial things from some far-off world, and the neogi uplifted and enslaved the lot of them. The umber hulks we know today are therefore escapees, or the descendants of same, clustered together in numbers for the days when the Eel-Men will descend from the sky and scour the earth to claim their inheritance. The solitary, wandering-monster type umber hulk is perhaps one that cracked under the constant state of paranoia and fear these hulk cities operate on, or perhaps a recent escapee trying to find the right underground railroad to take him to Freedom Town.

I agree with you there. It'd be far more interesting to have umber hulk cities built of individuals with a culture, skills and trade all of its own rather than another personality-less bunch of "obey the Queen" workers and drones. What crafts and arts would UMBER HULK practice? Do they have any peaceful dealings with other races or even other Hulk cities?

Good point about the neogi, we should have considered them earlier. Although maybe the relationship is more complicated than that. Perhaps the UMBER HULK cities work with the Neogi, and sell their excess population to Neogi slave-traders in return for vitally needed materials, or the cities are ruled by Neogi and the true UMBER HULK culture is based on small family bands?

Now I'm imagining Hulk Cities as underground space ports. In the centre of each is a huge magical Gateway, through which the spelljamming ships of the Neogi and other strange alien species such as Illithids can fly, paying hefty docking fees to the City's secretive Council of the Four Eyes and having their cargoes shifted by the unionised Hulk longshoremen.

11-01-2009, 06:35 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by YojimboC

While I have always liked the terrible regenerating monstrosity that is the D&D troll, I've also always had a soft spot for the "traditional" mountain spirit troll. The one that hides in caves during the day because the light of the sun turns them to stone.

I read D'Aulaires' Book of Trolls at an early age and really enjoyed it. Trollhags, multi-headed trolls, jewels, hulderfolk, etc. Lots of good stuff.

Anyway, given how indestructible trolls tend to be in D&D, I think having a "turn to stone" mechanic might help keep them in check.

Dang it, I was going to mention some of those in my "I like trolls with alternate powers / traits" post earlier, especially the classic turn-to-stone bit.

Anyway, I share your liking for alternative takes on the Troll, especially troll-hags and the polycephalic variety.

11-01-2009, 07:45 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The other problem is they're very rare, so why mention them as being a standard prey instead of, say, seals or caribou?.

Inuit whaling villages only kill a bowhead or two a season, but the size of the whale makes it a significant part of their entire diet. Plus, they like the taste. The act of hunting, killing, and preparing the whale is laden with rituals, making it a central part of their spiritual life.

No ice troll coming of age ritual is complete, without participating a remorhaz hunt. Successful hunters hold positions of high esteem. The chitin is boiled down into a draught, and the resultant gel reinforces the ice in their bodies, enabling tribes to survive warm summers. The flesh is a delicacy. The scythe-like legs are used for scraping the hides of seals and caribou. The lenses of the eyes and purest blue scales on the belly are carved into jewelry. The intestines are cut into segments and tied around coals, insulating them from the cold. The thym is used for old ice sculpting and ritual branding, and is sold to southern races for alcohol and steel. Frost giant reavers riding their boats made of hollow-out and mummified white dragons never seem to raid villages where a remorhaz head is mounted on sticks, in a conspicuous position.

11-01-2009, 09:13 PM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I think that the repercussions of Umber Hulk cities are more interesting than why they exist. Umber Hulks raid dungeons for food. To feed an entire city, one needs a lot of food. Maybe Umber Hulks build dungeons as farms for their cities. Maybe they've got huge scrolls listing all the dungeons in the world, with ratings as to how good they are as restaurants:

"Rift of the Frost Giant Jarl: Good eating; 'ware the dragon.
Tomb of Horrors: Worst stop ever - little to eat, highly dangerous"

Capturing something like that and finding a sage to decipher it could be the holy grail of adventuring.

Speking of which, how do Umber Hulks communicate with one another? Do they have their own language?

11-01-2009, 10:52 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

Trolls may speak a pigin (or creole?) of many local languages because those were the languages they spoke before they became trolls. If their origins are something like as was suggested in the Tarasque thread, then you're not born a troll, you become one.

Oh, that language thing is inspiring. If I could fake a Cajun accent, all my trolls would speak like that now! That's even better than Scottish dwarves!

11-02-2009, 06:58 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I think that the repercussions of Umber Hulk cities are more interesting than why they exist. Umber Hulks raid dungeons for food. To feed an entire city, one needs a lot of food. Maybe Umber Hulks build dungeons as farms for their cities. Maybe they've got huge scrolls listing all the dungeons in the world, with ratings as to how good they are as restaurants:

"Rift of the Frost Giant Jarl: Good eating; 'ware the dragon.
Tomb of Horrors: Worst stop ever - little to eat, highly dangerous"

Capturing something like that and finding a sage to decipher it could be the holy grail of adventuring.

Speking of which, how do Umber Hulks communicate with one another? Do they have their own language?

Oh I like the idea of an Umber Hulk Dungeon Restaurant critic.

As for the question of languages, this is 2nd edition AD&D we're talking about, were Elven Cats have their own language, so I'd have thought a race of sapient human-level intelligent creatures would be bound to have a language of their own.

Although that's not to say it's a spoken, or at least audible language.

Maybe they have subsonic voices, way too low for humans to hear, but ideal for speaking through vast thicknesses of rock.

Or perhaps they speak by telepathic-projection via their inner eyes. That confusion humanoids experience on meeting their gaze is just a useful byproduct of their normal means of communication, caused by the great differences in their neural architecture.

11-02-2009, 07:16 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Inuit whaling villages only kill a bowhead or two a season, but the size of the whale makes it a significant part of their entire diet. Plus, they like the taste. The act of hunting, killing, and preparing the whale is laden with rituals, making it a central part of their spiritual life.

Yes but whales are a relatively common* and abundant species compared to a Remorhaz, and they have the abundance of the seas to feed upon. Remorhaz live off the notoriously lifeless arctic wastes and have a very hot metabolism, implying they need immensely large ranges to keep them fed. I just doubt there's enough of them to make up the bulk of a race's diet, unless the race in question is itself very rare and mainly lairs next to a Remorhaz's lair (as in my "domesticated Remorhaz proposal").

It's more likely Ice Trolls view Remorhaz as a totem animal that is only rarely seen, and such occasions are viewed as significant omens, and is killed extraordinarily rarely.

*It says so right in the Monstrous Manual's Common Whale entry - "Frequency: Common".;)

11-02-2009, 08:33 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

As for the question of languages, this is 2nd edition AD&D we're talking about, were Elven Cats have their own language, so I'd have thought a race of sapient human-level intelligent creatures would be bound to have a language of their own.

Although that's not to say it's a spoken, or at least audible language.

Maybe they have subsonic voices, way too low for humans to hear, but ideal for speaking through vast thicknesses of rock.

Or perhaps they speak by telepathic-projection via their inner eyes. That confusion humanoids experience on meeting their gaze is just a useful byproduct of their normal means of communication, caused by the great differences in their neural architecture.

I was thinking telepathic, but looking back at the entry, it says that they have their own language. Now I have this idea of an adventurer who works with an Umber Hulk Chewbacca-style.

Also interesting is that Vodyanoi have an affinity for Electric Eels. I wonder what the connection is there.

11-02-2009, 07:37 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I was thinking telepathic, but looking back at the entry, it says that they have their own language. Now I have this idea of an adventurer who works with an Umber Hulk Chewbacca-style.

Also interesting is that Vodyanoi have an affinity for Electric Eels. I wonder what the connection is there.

Blast it, I looked in the Monstrous Manual and failed to register the "Umber hulks have their own language" at the end of the second paragraph, I must be going dotty.:(

Still, it doesn't say what form said language takes, and I like the idea of it using subsonics and/or confusion-gaze.

I vaguely remember reading an article somewhere about how Umber Hulks make great henchmen when you're down a dungeon (or was it a great creature to shapechange into?) - tough, intelligent and able to excavate tunnels at will.

The Vodyanoi's ability to summon electric eels is odd, it does suggest they live in similar habitats (swamps and sluggish rivers with so much sediment there's very little visibility - in South America!).

Hmm, now if AD&D Vodyanoi come from South America (rather than Russia like their name originates from), does that mean they have South American accents (Brazilian Vodyanoi?). No doubt the Sea Caballeros hire them on occasion to excavate ports, canals and other water-features.

11-02-2009, 11:39 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

*It says so right in the Monstrous Manual's Common Whale entry - "Frequency: Common".;)

That was before the whaling industry depleted their numbers.

Shame about the remorhaz. Once abundant, but nearly driven to extinction by the terrible tribes of ice trolls. Their giant remorhaz-processing sled, dragged by immense primordial beasts of the tundra, heads out every season to kill dozens of remorhaz for their meat and thym.

Fortunately, a middle aged and somewhat porcine hero (in the "0-level" sense) has split off from more conservative green-warmlands ecological groups, who are content to simply whine a lot in the courts of the southern kingdoms. He has formed the Snow Shepherds, who use fast dog sleds to chase the giant sledge and throw potions of smelling really badly on its deck in a quixotic attempt to spoil the slaughtered remohaz.

11-03-2009, 11:11 AM

Ginkomortus

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Oh, that language thing is inspiring. If I could fake a Cajun accent, all my trolls would speak like that now! That's even better than Scottish dwarves!

Really, this hasn't come up yet? All I can say, mon, is...

<http://img39.yfrog.com/img39/7198/whujuthatyudu.jpg>

11-09-2009, 09:52 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Unicorn

Unicorns eh? Difficult to get away from their stereotypical association with princesses and fluffy cloud castles and daisy chains, isn't it? They're also, well... kind of boring really; I never understood the appeal of a white horse with a narhwal horn in its forehead.

There is something interesting in there about Unicorns being protectors of a forest who drive away evildoers, but there are a lot of other D&D beings who can fill that role in a much more interesting manner (witness Treants). The woodland protector shtick is done to death and without it a Unicorn is really just a goody-two-shoes with four legs.

Is there anything better that you can come up with?

[It should be noted that Unicorn horns go for 1,500 gps a pop, which is handy for the egg-hunter/animal body parts user campaign I will one day run.]

11-09-2009, 10:42 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

It does tie into something I said recently. Now that resurrected human corpses have been made into cute and fluffy friends (though I'm sure we'll discuss that more in a week or so,) we're running out of options for genuinely menacing supernatural threats. I'm of the opinion that humanizing demons is next, but going back to the well on previously bastardized monsters is up there as well. We'll know that route precisely the first time you see a unicorn on a mainstream show/movie/video game that eats someone who can't ride it. Or keep it as a gentle creature and have it be used for more serious reasons. Maybe an evil religious cult captures them and then goes from town to town, forcing people to ride them. If you're unmarried and the unicorn rejects you, the cult has you executed. Something like that, and it's especially tough if the unicorns don't know that their "kindly masters" are abusing their powers like that.

11-10-2009, 12:56 AM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Hmm, I'd most likely use a Unicorn as a good-o-meter - if the paladin or ranger is beginning to act in a less than good fashion, I might have a unicorn run away from him or something like that. They can also work nicely as mounts for female characters, especially paladins or rangers.

And of course, there's the Unicorn Horn as cure-all bit.

But personally, I would prefer to use unicorns as less intelligent than the MM makes them out to be. I don't really like the idea of them being able to talk - I'd prefer to see them at elephant-esque intelligence.

And there's the bizarreness of their remarkable AC. Why is it so low?!

11-10-2009, 03:08 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

And there's the bizarreness of their remarkable AC. Why is it so low?!

Because the unicorn isn't a horse with a spike on its forehead.

The horn is the unicorn, not the horse. Perfectly white and smooth, almost shimmeringly pearlescent. It's not natural. It's not horn, or compressed hair, or bone. It's force. Pure force. The same stuff that magic missiles and invisible walls are made of. Slightly glowing with the energy, just enough to stand out against a dark backdrop of angry trees.

The rest of the beast is just an approximation of a horse. Planes of force, semi-spheres, whorls, other geometric shapes all combine to create the impression of a horse-like creature. But the horse-part is like the train of a wedding gown, gaudy and ornate sparkling bits that trail behind the main body, dragging on the floor -- or the greensward.

The unicorn isn't from around here. It's from outside this world. Far, far, outside. A place where sapient things aren't flesh and blood. Where they're made of light and pressure, color and shifting edges. They think differently, too. Care about things we can't understand, obsess about things that we don't worry about. That's why it's all up in arms about bizarre esoteria. Why virgins of all stripes get a friendly nuzzle. And not-virgins, no matter how it happened, get the vicious white blade across the neck.

It's not good, not really. The folklore built around it is like a pearl around a grain of sand. What it is, is alien. Strange. Incomprehensible. Prone to what appear to be random, violent acts because we can't suss out the true reason behind why it does what it does.

11-10-2009, 03:10 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Maybe an evil religious cult captures them and then goes from town to town, forcing people to ride them. If you're unmarried and the unicorn rejects you, the cult has you executed.

No, no, no. That's how the cult tells if you're a virgin, so that they can use you as a human sacrifice. Like all good evil bad guy rituals, it requires a virgin sacrifice. And how can you tell who is a virgin? Well, unicorns only let virgins ride them. So the cult kidnaps a unicorn and uses it as a test to make sure their sacrifice will be accepted by their dark god. (Plus, you know, perverting a creature of good's purity test toward evil ends is a hoot in its own right.)

Which is I guess like execution, but happens to the virgins instead of the impure.

11-10-2009, 03:15 AM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I'm pretty sure I've included more unicorn parts - skin, horns, and meat - in my games than living unicorns. Messing with a unicorn is good shorthand for "black hat." I would say, however, that I'd probably restrain myself in the future - having a unicornskin set of armor is basically as subtle as having humanskin. It's transparent that the intent is to be "this guy is a bad guy; he does outrageously bad things." And there's better ways to do that.

In an over-the-top fantasy setting, an all-maiden unicorn cavalry unit would be a pretty decent emblem of the kingdom of Lawful McGood, King and Patron of Good Adventurers.

11-10-2009, 03:41 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Five Eyes

In an over-the-top fantasy setting, an all-maiden unicorn cavalry unit would be a pretty decent emblem of the kingdom of Lawful McGood, King and Patron of Good Adventurers.

"Kicked out of the unicorn cavalry because she had the temerity to sleep with the man she loves" isn't a bad background for a PC or NPC, either. Could be a sympathetic outsider exiled from her duty but still trying to do good. Or she could be a fallen paladin who turns to evil and works with succubi and incubi to destroy the king's magically powered cavalry.

11-10-2009, 03:49 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The Monstrous manual doesn't mention virgins at all, just requiring "a pure heart and good alignment". Which is whitewashing the whitewash, really.

Unicorns hate griffons, according to their entry, but I don't know how much mileage you can get from that; it's really just based on the griffon liking to eat horses and horse-like things.

Maybe the best question to ask to make unicorns interesting is "why, in the setting, do unicorns only allow virgins to ride them?" (I'm ignoring the MM and sticking with the traditional virgin bit here.) That's an odd restriction, and probably leads to all sorts of awkward situations in the game world when a unicorn has bonded with a young lady but then leaves her when she finds a male of her actual species. Why would a creature of pure good abandon that nice lady?

11-10-2009, 04:23 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Maybe the best question to ask to make unicorns interesting is "why, in the setting, do unicorns only allow virgins to ride them?" (I'm ignoring the MM and sticking with the traditional virgin bit here.) That's an odd restriction, and probably leads to all sorts of awkward situations in the game world when a unicorn has bonded with a young lady but then leaves her when she finds a male of her actual species. Why would a creature of pure good abandon that nice lady?

Because bonding with an unicorn is a relationship as intense and full of love (not that kind, you pervs!) as any marriage between two soul-mates. But being as it is between beings as separate as humanoids and unicorns, it cannot last for ever. The unicorn and the maiden must eventually go their separate ways, in a sorrowful but amicable and mutually accepted separation.

(Alternatively, all unicorns are female, and just don't get along with men.)

11-10-2009, 04:24 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Maybe the best question to ask to make unicorns interesting is "why, in the setting, do unicorns only allow virgins to ride them?" (I'm ignoring the MM and sticking with the traditional virgin bit here.) That's an odd restriction, and probably leads to all sorts of awkward situations in the game world when a unicorn has bonded with a young lady but then leaves her when she finds a male of her actual species. Why would a creature of pure good abandon that nice lady?

The obvious answer is that the unicorn isn't recognizing women who are "pure" in the Christian sense, but women who have rejected the need for men. Earlier myths, like Artemis.

Because otherwise the unicorn cavalry would be populated with stereotypical male nerds who obsess about forges and spells -- and would probably take umbrage at being called "maidens".

11-10-2009, 05:06 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The obvious answer is that the unicorn isn't recognizing women who are "pure" in the Christian sense, but women who have rejected the need for men. Earlier myths, like Artemis.

Which is interesting, because it implies this harsher warrior-women ethic than the unicorn's goody-two-shoes reputation suggests.

11-10-2009, 05:39 AM

Brandi

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Because otherwise the unicorn cavalry would be populated with stereotypical male nerds who obsess about forges and spells -- and would probably take umbrage at being called "maidens".

Aside: "maiden" used to be a perfectly acceptable, non-perjorative way to describe a virgin man. Malory uses it in Morte d'Arthur when talking about Galahad and Percival.

11-10-2009, 06:44 AM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Unicorn

Is there anything better that you can come up with?

I killed a character in my Drow campaign back in the day when a Unicorn impaled them after they ran off alone into the woods.

Between the (generally) C/G Elves, Treants, Unicorns, etc., the forest is a scary dangerous place for an evil adventurer.

11-10-2009, 06:50 AM

Five Eyes

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Actually, yeah - most of the annoying "woodlands prankster" monsters always seem a bit like fluff material, but an evil party is in fact much safer in a dark, horrible crypt than they are in a sunlit forest.

Never thought of it that way.

11-10-2009, 11:12 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Because bonding with an unicorn is a relationship as intense and full of love (not that kind, you pervs!) as any marriage between two soul-mates. But being as it is between beings as separate as humanoids and unicorns, it cannot last for ever. The unicorn and the maiden must eventually go their separate ways, in a sorrowful but amicable and mutually accepted separation.

(Alternatively, all unicorns are female, and just don't get along with men.)

Well, if that latter one is the case, there is the obvious loophole that at least SOMEONE in the all-maiden unicorn cavalry should have thought of. Of course then that leads to questions about what "maiden" means in the fantasy sense, and so on from there. That might be a problem with the whole "virgin" thing in general. It's not whitewashing so much as the fact that if it comes up at all, suddenly the D&D campaign that was about impaling evil critters for loot veers directly into sex. Plenty of campaigns are fine with that, but not all of them are, and now we get questions about sex, potentially homosexuality, male versus female virginity, and even really tough subjects like rape.

Take the "virgin sacrifice" cult from the last page. Sure, a village could hire the usual adventuring party to take care of it, but if they don't have the time or money, well, there is the other obvious solution. And then it just gets more complex and worse from there.

11-11-2009, 02:48 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

It does tie into something I said recently. Now that resurrected human corpses have been made into cute and fluffy friends (though I'm sure we'll discuss that more in a week or so,) we're running out of options for genuinely menacing supernatural threats. I'm of the opinion that humanizing demons is next, but going back to the well on previously bastardized monsters is up there as well. We'll know that route precisely the first time you see a unicorn on a mainstream show/movie/video game that eats someone who can't ride it.

SNIP

It's only a matter of time, the idea of nasty unicorn's old hat in fiction and roleplaying. I could also stretch the definition and include the Unicorn Brood of RuneQuest's Dorastor supplement - it's best not to even think about what they do to captives, maiden or otherwise, and I recall at least two 1st edition AD&D takes on carnivorous "black unicorns" with a particular fondness for the flesh of maidens,

Still, I'd rather have evil unicorns be more than just brutal flesh-eaters. Maybe they still protect the forest and its inhabitants, but it's a more Mafiosa approach to "protection".

Dang it, now I'm imagining a herd of black unicorns ruled by a "Don Cornione", extorting goods and services out of the sapient forest-dwellers with "offers they can't refuse". Those who oppose them need not fear waking up with a horse's head in their bed, but rather a spiral horn in their back!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Which is interesting, because it implies this harsher warrior-women ethic than the unicorn's goody-two-shoes reputation suggests.

That's the RuneQuest take on Unicorn Riders of the Cult of Yelorna. They're man-hating warrior women to a lady. There's a scenario in the old Big Rubble box set were the players mount an raid on a Yelorna compound.

11-11-2009, 10:34 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

It's only a matter of time, the idea of nasty unicorn's old hat in fiction and roleplaying. I could also stretch the definition and include the Unicorn Brood of RuneQuest's Dorastor supplement - it's best not to even think about what they do to captives, maiden or otherwise, and I recall at least two 1st edition AD&D takes on carnivorous "black unicorns" with a particular fondness for the flesh of maidens,

Still, I'd rather have evil unicorns be more than just brutal flesh-eaters. Maybe they still protect the forest and its inhabitants, but it's a more Mafiosa approach to "protection".

Dang it, now I'm imagining a herd of black unicorns ruled by a "Don Cornione", extorting goods and services out of the sapient forest-dwellers with "offers they can't refuse". Those who oppose them need not fear waking up with a horse's head in their bed, but rather a spiral horn in their back!

Don Hornione, you mean?

11-11-2009, 11:13 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Don Hornione, you mean?

Nope, I meant Don Cornione.:)

The meaning of the pun's the same as Don Hornione, since Cornu is Latin for a horn.

Pseudo-Latin seemed appropriate for the name of a Mafia Unicorn Capo.

11-14-2009, 10:57 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Nope, I meant Don Cornione.:)

The meaning of the pun's the same as Don Hornione, since Cornu is Latin for a horn.

Pseudo-Latin seemed appropriate for the name of a Mafia Unicorn Capo.

Yeah, but translating puns from Latin sounded too subtle. I felt it be-hooved us to make the more obvious ones. :)

11-15-2009, 06:54 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Yeah, but translating puns from Latin sounded too subtle. I felt it be-hooved us to make the more obvious ones. :)

On the mane I enjoy a wide range of puns, from blatant to nigh-undetectable.

Besides, the Unicorn Capo is a modest fellow who doesn't like to toot his own horn. ;)

11-16-2009, 12:38 PM

Capellan

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

One of Clockwork Golem Workshop's pdfs has an idea of people who have had troll blood end up in their wounds

I've been reading through these five threads over the last few weeks, and geeking over all the references to Fighting Fantasy (of which I have a full set, thanks to many hours and many dollars on eBay), but seeing a reference to one of my PDFs is an even bigger 'geek moment' :)

I do prefer Dragon Warriors version of the troll, though I can see why that scene from Three Hearts and Three Lions had such an impact on how the monster is envisaged in D&D - it's a very cool sequence.

11-16-2009, 02:11 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Capellan

I do prefer Dragon Warriors version of the troll, though I can see why that scene from Three Hearts and Three Lions had such an impact on how the monster is envisaged in D&D - it's a very cool sequence.

Yeah. I've used DW as my main RPG for several decades, and the 'tall, gaunt creature of morbid character' is good, creepy and loathsome. Trouble is, to use most D&D stuff, I have to use Ogres instead, as behaviour such as gibbering and capering madly along a desolate marsh while sucking down raw eels doesn't allow for much character building or roleplaying...

Also Re the Unicorn. I've always seem them as fey - hard, dark, dangerous and unpredictable. Arrives to save the villagers from a goblin attack, and then runs the fairest maiden through with it's horn before departing.

I like the idea (heard somewhere, probably pre-internet days) that a unicorn has to drench it's horn in the blood of a dying maiden to keep it's powers for another year. Their dark, hidden secret... If the PC's find out, then hit squads of woodlands creatures will try to silence them, forever.

11-17-2009, 12:02 AM

Gen. Lee

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Because bonding with an unicorn is a relationship as intense and full of love (not that kind, you pervs!) as any marriage between two soul-mates. But being as it is between beings as separate as humanoids and unicorns, it cannot last for ever. The unicorn and the maiden must eventually go their separate ways, in a sorrowful but amicable and mutually accepted separation.

See, this is the kind of thing I was ready to run once. The party had a female paladin, whose player enjoyed flirtatious talk. My plan was to have the unicorn show up and offer to help her take down the BBEG, BUT she had to swear off guys for the duration of their partnership. As a near-immortal critter, the unicorn had seen how fickle humans could be-- he/she needed total concentration on the task, so no fooling around! I was going to play the unicorn as a drill-instructor/fairy godmother-in-law personality, while generating tension of the can't-have-it kind.

And the player left the game (Real Life complications) before I could even get started. :(

11-17-2009, 06:26 AM

Red_Rob

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

... hit squads of woodlands creatures...

Wow, that is one amazing concept! I'm getting images of Thumper from Bambi directing hordes of Kamikaze bluebirds to divebomb the Mage while the Fighter is dragged down by a wave of squirrels!

Its like a Disney version of Alfred Hitchcock's The Birds!

11-17-2009, 06:41 AM

Capellan

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Yeah. I've used DW as my main RPG for several decades, and the 'tall, gaunt creature of morbid character' is good, creepy and loathsome. Trouble is, to use most D&D stuff, I have to use Ogres instead, as behaviour such as gibbering and capering madly along a desolate marsh while sucking down raw eels doesn't allow for much character building or roleplaying...

I don't really agree. There's enough wriggle room in the 'crazed swampdweller' schtick for some creepy fun ... such as the loathsome, stinking beast that occasionally speaks beautiful fragments of poetry, or the babbling, savant-like troll oracle, and so on. But then when it comes to DW in general, I tend to think "how could this monster be used in an Arthurian legend" and let that guide my thoughts.

D&D trolls, on the other hand, I've always found tiresome to fight (especially in earlier editions where regeneration was more effective). The creepiness of the regen was never portrayed in an interesting mechanical way, and the fluff text wasn't all that exciting. Hence writing PDFs which were intended to make them more interesting/dynamic in play.

As far as Unicorns go, I find they're a bit twee unless you subvert them somehow. For instance, if you keep the 'maiden' concept, then your unicorn riders are likely to be a pretty grim bunch, avoiding personal contact with other humanoids in order to prevent emotional/romantic entanglements. Such riders might even be raised from birth, in tough, Spartan-like discipline.

11-18-2009, 02:15 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Capellan

I don't really agree. There's enough wriggle room in the 'crazed swampdweller' schtick for some creepy fun ... such as the loathsome, stinking beast that occasionally speaks beautiful fragments of poetry, or the babbling, savant-like troll oracle, and so on. But then when it comes to DW in general, I tend to think "how could this monster be used in an Arthurian legend" and let that guide my thoughts.

Each to their own with pseudo Arthurian legend, although I don't remember Galahad having to dodge Shadowbolts, either.

My issue with Trolls is more in 3rd Ed adventures, where they are more likely to be running hostels or be slightly disturbing common folk in city contexts, rather than the gibbering madman, etc.

I do like the creepy fun idea. I've got an old Dungeon mag with an adventure that involves a princess type falling in love with a beautiful singer from the nearby fens, rather than the boring merchant's son. Turns out when she elopes, singer is an outcast, artistic, sensitive troll. Trouble with said adventure is that then the PCs are supposed to kill the troll and marry the princess to the merchant.

And they said D&D doesn't set good role models for kids...

11-22-2009, 08:07 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Urchin

Yes, a sea urchin. I had totally forgotten about this entry and was surprised to discover it again; not really a shock, though, is it? I mean...sea urchins.

D&D urchins are not like real world ones, though. They can fire poison spines, for one thing, and also possess an innate clairvoyant ability which they employ through means of an "organ gem" each carries inside its body. The enterprising DM could certainly do something with that - urchin-gem-powered psionic devices, anyone?

There are a couple of varieties of urchin, but apart from the Land Urchin none of them are detailed in any way except for stat blocks. Thus the DM isn't told what kind of poison the different varieties possess, how potent it is, etc. etc. I can't work out if this is deliberate (empower DM creativity!), lazy, or incompetent (they just forgot). Anyway, it strikes me as a nice thread project. So have at it! What kind of poisons would the black, green, red, silver, and yellow urchins have?

11-22-2009, 09:05 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

There are a couple of varieties of urchin, but apart from the Land Urchin none of them are detailed in any way except for stat blocks. Thus the DM isn't told what kind of poison the different varieties possess, how potent it is, etc. etc. I can't work out if this is deliberate (empower DM creativity!), lazy, or incompetent (they just forgot). Anyway, it strikes me as a nice thread project. So have at it! What kind of poisons would the black, green, red, silver, and yellow urchins have?

Elemental-themed urchin death!

Black: Means death! The rotting disease. It's not leprosy, it's not the black plague. You just wish it was. Your skin starts to rot and peel away in long blackened strips, like well-charred ribs on the grill. Your peeling skin kind of looks like black bandages, so you might be mistaken for a dark mummy. Well, except for oozing pus that constantly drips out from underneath the crunch bits of epidermis.

Save vs. Death or take 1d6 points of damage per day. Charisma is reduced to -3, and all saves against disease are penalized by 6 points since you've lost protective barrier provided by the skin. All effects are permanent, barring a wish or divine intervention.

Green: Means liquid! The organs within your body dissolve into a rather disgusting slurry (save vs. Death at -4 or die within 1d6 turns). During the last turn, you're completely incapacitated as you constantly vomit up blood and half-dissolved bodily organs.

Red: Fire! Or to be more specific, spontaneous humanoid combustion. 1d6 days after exposure, there is a 40% chance of being affected. If affected, make a saving throw vs. Death. A successful save means your skin just bubbles and blisters in a few inconvenient spots (3d6 damage), failure means you take 3d6 damage per round, until dead. While dying (and for 3d10 rounds after death) your body emits light equivalent to that of a torch. If you roll a natural 1 on the save, you explode violently in a burst of flaming-hot humanoid meat and bone shards. You die immediately, and everyone within 30 ft. takes 1d6 points of damage per character level.

Silver: Brr. Blood flows away from the extremities as the poison mimics the symptoms of hypothermia. On a failed save, become feble-minded. Take 1d6 points of cold damage per turn unless snugly wrapped in a blanket. You're too stupid to do this yourself. If you take a total of more than 6 points damage, roll 3d6 on Table 13-17-9: Minor Body Part Loss to see which body part is lost from frostbite and gangrene:

Table 13-17-9: Minor Body Part Loss Table

3 Head
4 Both arms and legs
5 Both legs
6 Both arms
7 One leg (roll randomly)
8 One arm (roll randomly)
9 1d10 fingers
10 1d10 toes
11+ Nothing

There is a 20% chance of recovering fully (except for the lost body parts) every turn you are warmly blanketed. Improvised blankets (slicing open the belly of a recently slain red dragon, snuggling up with random naked party members, etc.) have an 80% chance of working.

Yellow: Save vs. polymorph or turn a bright yellow. Really bright yellow. Light radius of 120 ft. This is permanent. From now on, you require triple the normal food rations to sustain this output of energy, and any clothing you wear has to make a save vs. fire every day or smolder and fall apart.

11-23-2009, 01:36 AM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

[U][SIZE="5"]So have at it! What kind of poisons would the black, green, red, silver, and yellow urchins have?

I'd probably take the easy way out and just borrow the breath weapons from the Dragons of the same colour. I'm really not sure it would ever come up in all but the oddest campaigns.

11-23-2009, 02:54 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I'm disappointed there wasn't a variant of Land Urchin, called Street Urchin, with pickpocket skill...

11-23-2009, 04:38 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The urchins don't have poison, in the conventional sense. The substance they inject into their prey is actually a psionically charged jelly. This same jelly is what crystalizes inside the urchin into their clairvoyance granting gem. When the jelly is injected into another creature, the subject is overcome with psionic forces. Land urchins paralyze their foes by shutting down the foe's ability to move psychically, but other types of urchins can cause strong hallucinations, mental dominance by the urchin or a variety of other psionic effects. One species was found to be surprisingly intelligent and able to communicate telepathically with injected subjects.

One common feature of the urchins is that their clairvoyant ability is not actually very accurate. They can sense the presence of other beings, but have difficulty telling where these creatures are in relation to the urchin itself. Until, that is, the urchin "poison"s a subject. At that point the psionic nature of the jelly allows the urchin to perfectly locate the dosed subject, and see through the subject's eyes. At which point the urchin's accuracy with their darts increases significantly.

11-23-2009, 04:42 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Before we move on too much, I thought of something I wanted to ask about trolls: WHY do they regenerate? Not, that is, why in character do they regenerate. Rather, where did the idea of fast healing trolls come from. You see it in a lot of fiction now (it's in Willow as I recall) but is that original to D&D, or did Gygax steal that from some legend or fantasy novel I'm unfamiliar with?

11-23-2009, 05:01 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Before we move on too much, I thought of something I wanted to ask about trolls: WHY do they regenerate? Not, that is, why in character do they regenerate. Rather, where did the idea of fast healing trolls come from. You see it in a lot of fiction now (it's in Willow as I recall) but is that original to D&D, or did Gygax steal that from some legend or fantasy novel I'm unfamiliar with?

Tall, thin, green, rubbery, regenerating, fire-fearing... all come from Poul Anderson's Three Hearts and Three Lions. One of Gygax's more blatant homages.

11-23-2009, 05:08 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Tall, thin, green, rubbery, regenerating, fire-fearing... all come from Poul Anderson's Three Hearts and Three Lions. One of Gygax's more blatant homages.

Gnomes, the D&D paladin and the old Law-vs.-Chaos take on the alignment also come from that book, IIRC. (D&D's Law-vs.-Chaos doesn't really resemble Moorcock's, except in name...)

11-23-2009, 08:09 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The colored urchins are from the FF and the land urchin from the MM II. They aren't my favorite echinoderm (those are crinoids) but they do have some potential. The land urchins are much better protected than other herbivores of their size and could easily mow down farms and forests. Farmers could easily kill a few but if the population has a boom, for every one slain by an arrow or sling stone, there are 10 more that try to poison the farmer. That they have "pearls" and thus people hunting them doesn't help that much with the numbers they can produce.

I don't remember much about the colored urchins and my copy of the FF is buried at the moment.

11-23-2009, 11:02 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Elemental-themed urchin death!

Those are...a bit tough for their xp. :) The "kills you worse than the plague" urchin is worth a quarter of a lousy ogre. Personally, I'd stick all but one of them in the underused "four humors" category. The red, for example, might make you giddily happy, unable to attack anything and prone to charge at the nearest thing for hugs. That the nearest thing is an irate beholder, or even the spiky urchin itself, is not noticed until later!

Or just rip off Superman's kryptonite. The green would be rough, but imagine how entertaining the red would be?

11-24-2009, 02:59 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Tall, thin, green, rubbery, regenerating, fire-fearing... all come from Poul Anderson's Three Hearts and Three Lions. One of Gygax's more blatant homages.

That would have been my guess, but I thought it was worth asking. I should probably get around to reading that sometime.

11-24-2009, 03:54 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Those are...a bit tough for their xp. :) The "kills you worse than the plague" urchin is worth a quarter of a lousy ogre.

That's okay. It's not like the XP you get from killing monsters is actually worth anything. After all, the average fighter needs to kill 134 orcs just to make second level. Anybody who makes it to 3rd level is obviously in an out of control monty haul campaign and needs to die. :)

11-25-2009, 12:12 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Urchin

Yes, a sea urchin. I had totally forgotten about this entry and was surprised to discover it again; not really a shock, though, is it? I mean...sea urchins.

D&D urchins are not like real world ones, though. They can fire poison spines, for one thing, and also possess an innate clairvoyant ability which they employ through means of an "organ gem" each carries inside its body. The enterprising DM could certainly do something with that - urchin-gem-powered psionic devices, anyone?

There are a couple of varieties of urchin, but apart from the Land Urchin none of them are detailed in any way except for stat blocks. Thus the DM isn't told what kind of poison the different varieties possess, how potent it is, etc. etc. I can't work out if this is deliberate (empower DM creativity!), lazy, or incompetent (they just forgot). Anyway, it strikes me as a nice thread project. So have at it! What kind of poisons would the black, green, red, silver, and yellow urchins have?

As DMH already said, the Urchins poison was detailed when they originally debuted in the original Fiend Folio, I guess they must have cut it out of the Monstrous Manual for space.

I'm a bit puzzled as to why the editors of the 2nd edition MM thought they were worth inclusion - they're a pretty dull monster when you get down to it, and there must be a lot of worthier contenders for the vacancy. Certainly, I only ever use the D&D Urchins once, and that was mainly 'cause I'd just got the Fiend Folio and used the Random Encounter Table a couple of times to add a dash of randomness to one of my scenarios.

Anyhow, it occurs to me that some enterprising character would try to farm urchins. Being scavengers, they probably eat any old rubbish, and the gems in them are worth up to 2500 gp. Of course, you've got that venomous spine-shooting problem when it comes to actually getting at those gemstones. I'm thinking a sufficiently ruthless AD&D entrepreneur would keep them in paddocks half-full of salt water, and then just drain the pool dry and wait for them to perish of dehydration when it comes times to harvest them.

11-25-2009, 02:57 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Anyhow, it occurs to me that some enterprising character would try to farm urchins. Being scavengers, they probably eat any old rubbish, and the gems in them are worth up to 2500 gp. Of course, you've got that venomous spine-shooting problem

Well, for the silver urchin (the one whose gem is worth up to 2500 gp), the poison causes catatonia for 1 to 3 days, according to the Fiend Folio. Which is a bonus, not a disadvantage. Farm the urchins for their poison, then harvest the gems when they die. The poison could be sold to doctors wanting anesthesia, or drug addicts wanting oblivion for a few days or rangers and assassins and kidnappers looking to take down their targets nonlethally. That poison is probably worth a bit of gold itself, especially if it keeps for more than a few days once the urchin fires the spine.

11-25-2009, 07:36 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The more I think about it, the more I want to use land urchins- they would easily displace most herbivores their own size and possibly even large ones like horses and elephants. Their predators would have to be very small (parasites) or immune to the poison. Plants with tough leaves like holly would be so much more common where the urchins have taken over.

11-27-2009, 06:58 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Well, for the silver urchin (the one whose gem is worth up to 2500 gp), the poison causes catatonia for 1 to 3 days, according to the Fiend Folio. Which is a bonus, not a disadvantage. Farm the urchins for their poison, then harvest the gems when they die. The poison could be sold to doctors wanting anesthesia, or drug addicts wanting oblivion for a few days or rangers and assassins and kidnappers looking to take down their targets nonlethally. That poison is probably worth a bit of gold itself, especially if it keeps for more than a few days once the urchin fires the spine.

Excellent point. Of course, the deadlier poisons of some other Urchins are also valuable, for disposing of monsters, vermin as well as more nefarious uses.

Would it be inconvenient for you to list the FF poisons of the other Urchins? My copy of the book is buried away somewhere, so I don't have them to hand. If I remember correctly, the weakest did hit point damage as a "Type A poison", there were two "save or dies" (one with weak bonus with a save bonus) and one Urchin caused paralysis. I'm probably mistaken though, since it is well over a decade since I read it.

11-27-2009, 07:10 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

The more I think about it, the more I want to use land urchins- they would easily displace most herbivores their own size and possibly even large ones like horses and elephants. Their predators would have to be very small (parasites) or immune to the poison. Plants with tough leaves like holly would be so much more common where the urchins have taken over.

Well, land urchins can't climb, so presumably would only be able to feed on very low vegetation. I'd think even a short tree like holly would be pretty safe except for when it is a newly sprouted shoot.

Still, you're right that Land Urchins could easily become a dominant herbivore, displacing regular animals. Of course, there are whole hordes of AD&D monsters that on paper look like they'd out compete natural animals. The ecology of most 'realistic' D&D worlds should be much more bizarre than they tend to be. Maybe we could do a "How an AD&D world's ecology would really work" sometime, with a land overrun by those monsters with superfast reproduction cycles.

Speaking of reproduction, I suspect Land Urchins still need to return to the sea to breed, spawning plankton-sized eggs. That would be both a limiting factor in their spread (since they'd only live within easy rolling-distance of a coastline) and an aid in dispersal (since juveniles could walk out of the sea on the coast of many lands).

11-27-2009, 07:20 PM

Sanglorian

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I know we left unicorns behind some time ago, but I just finished Glen Cook's Sweet Silver Blues. Unicorns have tracking dogs, their ears clipped by unicorn bites, that hunt down prey. Then the unicorns - a harem and its male leader - attack and consume their prey. The male is lazy and cowardly, so most of the fighting is done by the women ... but kill the male and the females will fight until dead.

They used the unicorn horns to tip spears that killed vampires instantly - though one of the adventurers was, in true D&D style, complaining about the lost market value each time a unicorn spear was used.

Conventional unicorns do have a bit of a role as mounts for high-level paladins, since at those levels any normal steed will be blasted out from underneath you by a dragon's breath or a wizard's fireball.

I also remember an adventure hook in Dragon many years ago: a hunter of all beasts who renounced his ways some eighteen-years ago ... long enough to raise a pure-hearted, virgin daughter to adulthood and put her in a position to attract a unicorn, the one beast he had never managed to slay.

11-28-2009, 01:10 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sanglorian

I know we left unicorns behind some time ago, but I just finished Glen Cook's Sweet Silver Blues. Unicorns have tracking dogs, their ears clipped by unicorn bites, that hunt down prey. Then the unicorns - a harem and its male leader - attack and consume their prey. The male is lazy and cowardly, so most of the fighting is done by the women ... but kill the male and the females will fight until dead.

They used the unicorn horns to tip spears that killed vampires instantly - though one of the adventurers was, in true D&D style, complaining about the lost market value each time a unicorn spear was used.

Welcome aboard Sanglorian. I'm very fond of Glen Cook's Garrett series, and it has a lot of material that's easily ~~stolen~~ used as inspiration for fantasy roleplaying games, including his take on Carnivorous Unicorns.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sanglorian

Conventional unicorns do have a bit of a role as mounts for high-level paladins, since at those levels any normal steed will be blasted out from underneath you by a dragon's breath or a wizard's fireball.

Problem is, a standard AD&D unicorn just doesn't have the hit points to pull it off. At 4+4 HD they average 22 hits - one puff of dragon's breath of fireball could take them out.

11-28-2009, 04:31 AM

Endugu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well, land urchins can't climb, so presumably would only be able to feed on very low vegetation. I'd think even a short tree like holly would be pretty safe except for when it is a newly sprouted shoot.

I'd like to chime in here just to mention that urchins don't "roll around", but instead have a clearly defined top and bottom and, like starfish and other Echinoderms, walk around on lots of tiny legs. Obviously, land urchins would have stronger legs, but they should be able to climb quite well (similar to a bug), albeit probably - in true urchin fashion - really slowly.

That nitpick aside, I like the idea of land urchins that have to return to the sea in order to reproduce - reminds me of the Christmas Island red crab and the way they overrun the island periodically.

Maybe a druid is looking for some help to prevent the yearly slaughtering of thousands of land urchins by those that see it as the easiest opportunity to get the urchin gems. Of course, the local peasants would love to see them gone, since every year they lose cattle and lives to the land urchins' poison...

11-28-2009, 07:14 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Excellent point. Of course, the deadlier poisons of some other urchins are also valuable, for disposing of monsters, vermin as well as more nefarious uses.

Deadly poison is also valuable, but less safe to harvest.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Would it be inconvenient for you to list the FF poisons of the other urchins?

I'm currently away from my copy of the Fiend Folio due to Thanksgiving at the moment. Maybe on Monday.

11-28-2009, 08:12 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Well, land urchins can't climb

We don't know that. Many animals, like elephants and dogs, that can swim well don't have listed swim speeds. If they could climb, I would expect that the urchins would have a climb speed of 1 or 3.

11-29-2009, 04:59 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Endugu

Id like to chime in here just to mention that urchins dont "roll around", but instead have a clearly dfined top and bottom and, like starfish and other Echinoderms, walk around on lots of tiny legs. Obviously, land urchins would have stronger legs, but they should be able to climb quite well (similar to a bug), albeit probably - in true urchin fashion - really slowly.

True enough for real-world Echinoidea, but the AD&D variety is quite different. The Monstrous Manual entry for Urchin specifically says "While on land, urchins move via rolling" under Habitat/Society, and the description of the Land Urchin says they "move on five spindly legs". If I remember the illustration of the latter in the Fiend Folio correctly said legs appeared to be rigid stilts or rods that didn't look like they'd be much use for climbing, unlike the sucker-tipped flexible appendages of an actual Echinoidea.

When combined with their other differences to ordinary sea urchins - the higher-than-animal intelligence, clairvoyance, internal gems and the ability to project poisoned spines - they may have as little actual relationship to a true Echinoidea as an AD&D Kraken has to a garden snail.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Endugu

That nitpick aside, I like the idea of land urchins that have to return to the sea in order to reproduce - reminds me of the Christmas Island red crab and the way they overrun the island periodically.

I was thinking of the Christmas Island crabs when suggesting the terrestrial Urchin returned to the sea to spawn. Although I like the idea of the Land Urchin's aquatic larvae being more motile than those crabs, which emerge back on Christmas Island, so that they can walk onto the shores of far-off lands.

11-29-2009, 05:02 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

We don't know that. Many animals, like elephants and dogs, that can swim well don't have listed swim speeds. If they could climb, I would expect that the urchins would have a climb speed of 1 or 3.

Well I'll grant you that it doesn't explicitly say Land Urchins can't climb, but they don't look like they're built for it.

Besides, this is AD&D - surely if the Gods meant Land Urchins to climb they'd give them a Climb Speed, or a thieves' Climb Walls percentage.;

11-29-2009, 05:34 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Now I want to play a sea urchin mountaineer. I'll pair up with a grouchy old cave fisher with hip-boots and a chest full of lures to dangle from its tacky tongue (everything from gold coins to iron rations). If any bipedal adventurers are silly enough to pass under our lairs, I'll weave the cave fisher's tongue through my spines as a safety harness and rappel down the wall to ambush them. If things go bad (i.e. I'm just a level appropriate challenge for this intrepid band), I just yank the tongue and get hauled to safety as fast the old bug fisher's reel can spin.

In between adventures, we can sit and reminisce and yell at the kids to get off our rock shelf.

11-29-2009, 05:54 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Now I want to play a sea urchin mountaineer. I'll pair up with a grouchy old cave fisher with hip-boots and a chest full of lures to dangle from its tacky tongue (everything from gold coins to iron rations). If any bipedal adventurers are silly enough to pass under our lairs, I'll weave the cave fisher's tongue through my spines as a safety harness and rappel down the wall to ambush them. If things go bad (i.e. I'm just a level appropriate challenge for this intrepid band), I just yank the tongue and get hauled to safety as fast the old bug fisher's reel can spin.

You wouldn't need to drop within melee-reach of the adventurers, of course, since Urchins are ranged-attack monsters. Just dangle 20 feet above their heads and riddle them with poisoned spines.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

In between adventures, we can sit and reminisce and yell at the kids to get off our rock shelf.

...and boast about the size of the adventurers you'd successfully spined, and those that got away. :)

Hmm, maybe get that bugbear taxonomist down the cave to stuff a prize catch for mounting on the cave wall, over a little bronze plaque saying "Human Fighter, 6 foot 7 inches and 263 pounds, caught 1158 May 23."

11-29-2009, 06:00 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

True enough for real-world Echinoidea, but the AD&D variety is quite different. The Monstrous Manual entry for Urchin specifically says "While on land, urchins move via rolling" under Habitat/Society, and the description of the Land Urchin says they "move on five spindly legs". If I remember the illustration of the latter in the Fiend Folio correctly said legs appeared to be rigid stilts or rods that didn't look like they'd be much use for climbing, unlike the sucker-tipped flexible appendages of an actual Echinoidea.

(Nitpick: "Echinoidea" is the class. An individual member is an echinoid.)

What I want to know is why PETA girl didn't stop this ridiculous slander of innocent echinoderms! It's her duty to stand up for all cute animals.

Oh, and 80% land urchins form pearls within their bodies. Further evidence TSR were on drugs the lot of them. Made from magical myconids, probably.

11-30-2009, 05:37 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well I'll grant you that it doesn't explicitly say Land Urchins can't climb, but they don't look like they're built for it.

Besides, this is AD&D - surely if the Gods meant Land Urchins to climb they'd give them a Climb Speed, or a thieves' Climb Walls percentage.;

No way. They'd have come up with a fiddly rule for climbing that doesn't resemble the climbing rules found anywhere else, with specific percentages for certain random surfaces. Or maybe a chance based on rolling a d12 for every ten feet climbed or something.

12-01-2009, 04:58 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

No way. They'd have come up with a fiddly rule for climbing that doesn't resemble the climbing rules found anywhere else, with specific percentages for certain random surfaces. Or maybe a chance based on rolling a d12 for every ten feet climbed or something.

That sounds horribly plausible, or they'd use the traditional "a Land Urchin climbs sheer surfaces as a 5th level thief." without bothering to give a percentage, forcing DMs who haven't memorized the Players' Handbook tables to look it up.

12-01-2009, 06:25 PM

Endugu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

True enough for real-world Echinoidea, but the AD&D variety is quite different. The Monstrous Manual entry for Urchin specifically says "While on land, urchins move via rolling" under Habitat/Society, and the description of the Land Urchin says they "move on five spindly legs". If I remember the illustration of the latter in the Fiend Folio correctly said legs appeared to be rigid stilts or rods that didn't look like they'd be much use for climbing, unlike the sucker-tipped flexible appendages of an actual Echinoidea.

Ah ok, fair enough. :)

To be honest, the image that they are rolling around makes them less interesting to me, though I cant say exactyl why that is.

12-01-2009, 06:28 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

With all this talk about urchins, I wonder why TSR didn't bring out the dreaded landstars - seastars on land!

12-01-2009, 10:57 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

^ There are two types of landstars. The big, long-haul variety. Owner-operator teamsters (-stars?) who ride their big nags and criss-cross the land carrying freight from one stop to the next. And the stealthy clans of landstar assassins, who throw themselves spinning out of the darkness.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Endugu

Ah ok, fair enough. :)

To be honest, the image that they are rolling around makes them less interesting to me, though I cant say exactyl why that is.

In the dry Forgotten West, the locals know trouble's a brewing when the sky turns dark and the wind starts to blow. The land urchins start blowing into town like tumbleweeds, and the only one able to stop them is the new halfling sheriff.

12-02-2009, 01:42 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

With all this talk about urchins, I wonder why TSR didn't bring out the dreaded landstars - seastars on land!

If memory serves me right, TSR actually did publish something like that, albeit for Gamma World rather than AD&D. Wasn't there a giant mutant starfish that roamed the land, seizing prey in its five arms to devour with a central maw.

There was a very similar monster in Hårn, which buried itself in the ground and grabbed anything careless enough to walk over it.

12-02-2009, 01:46 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

^ There are two types of landstars. The big, long-haul variety. Owner-operator teamsters (-stars?) who ride their big nags and criss-cross the land carrying freight from one stop to the next. And the stealthy clans of landstar assassins, who throw themselves spinning out of the darkness.

My friends the Sea Caballeros whisper of another kind of abovewater starfish that is far more terrible, with the ability to fly through the air at amazing speed and shoot bolts of coruscating energy from the tips of its arms. It is rumoured that these Shooting Stars fell from some alien sphere beyond the sky.

12-02-2009, 02:03 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

My friends the Sea Caballeros whisper of another kind of abovewater starfish that is far more terrible, with the ability to fly through the air at amazing speed and shoot bolts of coruscating energy from the tips of its arms. It is rumoured that these Shooting Stars fell from some alien sphere beyond the sky.

Among the tritons, who know a little about realms beyond realms and seas behind seas, it is said that these star-stars came from the first planet known to sustain life. In a time before reckoning, they cast themselves into the cosmos in a vast diaspora that pierced a million million crystal spheres. Most of these intrepid asteroideans were lost in the vastness of space, but at least one landed on each planet that is now inhabited by living creatures. Their progeny spread, diversified, filled entire ecosystems. For it was from these ancient starites, that all the myriad lifeforms in this universe were born. The tritons call this theory "panstarria".

12-02-2009, 02:41 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

There was a very similar monster in Hårn, which buried itself in the ground and grabbed anything careless enough to walk over it.

Perhaps the Landstar does exist in D&D, albeit by as different name:

http://www.wizards.com/dnd/images/alumni_trapper1st.jpg

The Trapper!

I think at some point in the past we discussed the medieval theory that there is a water based equivalent to everything on land, hence catfish, monkfish, mermaids, sea lions, sea cows, etc. But the land urchins and landsharks and some other D&D monsters imply that the reverse is also true: everything under the sea has a land based parallel creature. There are skywhales in some D&D supplement, and land going squids and octopi and such, right? what other cool undersea creatures might exist on land?

12-02-2009, 02:48 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Excellent point. Of course, the deadlier poisons of some other Urchins are also valuable, for disposing of monsters, vermin as well as more nefarious uses.

Would it be inconvenient for you to list the FF poisons of the other Urchins?

Let's see:

Black urchins just do 1-6 damage.

Green urchins do 2-7 damage.

Red do some damage and can cause sleep for a few rounds.

Silver put you catatonic for a few days.

Yellow paralyzes the victim for a few rounds.

None are quite "save or die", though being paralyzed or unconscious for even a few rounds is pretty close. "Out for 3 days" is pretty much game over, if the urchins have any reason to kill the PCs... or even if they don't, the encounter is 90% likely to be underwater, and your waterbreathing spell will wear off well before then.

12-02-2009, 03:01 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

what other cool undersea creatures might exist on land?

Herds of squinners roam the plains, spinning like tops. Their mantles end in a hardened point made of modified fins, on which they rotate. Their arms whip around at high speeds like helicopter blades, helping them pick up velocity and serving as a balancing mechanism. They whirr as they stalk their prey, snatching terrified herbivores with the tacky clubs at the end of one of their two elongated feeding tentacles. Captured victims are tossed high into the air, where they are snapped up by the beak on the topmost portion of their body.

Oh wait. That sounds more like a Gamma World monster.

12-02-2009, 05:57 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Oh wait. That sounds more like a Gamma World monster.

So do giant spiky balls that shoot spines covered in sleep poison, with psychic powers and inborn gems.

12-02-2009, 06:07 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

So do giant spiky balls that shoot spines covered in sleep poison, with psychic powers and inborn gems.

No, the gems are definitely D&D. Think carbuncle.

But you're right about the rest. :)

12-02-2009, 06:20 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

No, the gems are definitely D&D. Think carbuncle.

Well, what if the gems were mainly useful for replacing the lenses on laser pistols? Then it'd be totally Gamma World.

EDIT: A lot of Fiend Folio monsters tread that line, I think. Lot of weird stuff in there.

12-02-2009, 07:02 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Well, what if the gems were mainly useful for replacing the lenses on laser pistols? Then it'd be totally Gamma World.

We could go all the way. Give sea urchins antlers, and then stick a radioactive eye on the end of every spine. Now all we need is a name, like Burp Ho-tep.

12-03-2009, 02:05 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

I think at some point in the past we discussed the medieval theory that there is a water based equivalent to everything on land, hence catfish, monkfish, mermaids, sea lions, sea cows, etc. But the land urchins and landsharks and some other D&D monsters imply that the reverse is also true: everything under the sea has a land based parallel creature. There are skywhales in some D&D supplement, and land going squids and octopi and such, right? what other cool undersea creatures might exist on land?

Let's see, there are the obvious ones like cave moray eels, flying sharks and rays or terrestrial cephalopods (all of which already have official AD&D stats, if I remember correctly), and I remember seeing a "killer whale with legs" somewhere, but I'm sure we could come up with some more bizarre animals.

The Land Ammonite, a giant shell that rolls across the plains, running over its prey and then shooting out tentacles to pull them into its beak.

The Thunder Eel, a flying electric eel with the lightning-shooting powers that implies.

The Giant Terrestrial Coneshell, which harpoons its prey with a tentacle tipped with a deadly poisonous barb, then everts its stomach to swallow its paralyzed victim alive.

The Devouring Star, an apparently harmless spiny starfish crawling over the ground, but it is incredibly fecund. Within months a single creature can become a hungry horde that strips a Kingdom's fields down to bare earth, leaving the population to starve. Chopping them to pieces does no good - the larger fragments just grow into new Devouring Stars. The peasants can't even eat them, since their flesh is poisonous.

12-03-2009, 02:09 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

We could go all the way. Give sea urchins antlers, and then stick a radioactive eye on the end of every spine. Now all we need is a name, like Burp Ho-tep.

Problem is, that breed of Radioactive Land Urchin uses its eye-gems to shoot death rays, their focusing properties are why GW scavengers can use them as laspistol lenses.

12-03-2009, 02:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Let's see:

Black urchins just do 1-6 damage.

Green urchins do 2-7 damage.

Red do some damage and can cause sleep for a few rounds.

Silver put you catatonic for a few days.

Yellow paralyzes the victim for a few rounds.

None are quite "save or die", though being paralyzed or unconscious for even a few rounds is pretty close. "Out for 3 days" is pretty much game over, if the urchins have any reason to kill the PCs... or even if they don't, the encounter is 90% likely to be underwater, and your waterbreathing spell will wear off well before then.

Ta Mr Teapot, I remembered their toxins got worse as they increased in HD, as is the usual habit with groups of related D&D monsters.

12-03-2009, 03:01 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The Thunder Eel, a flying electric eel with the lightning-shooting powers that implies.

A feathered sea serpent. A thunder bird with a Mesoamerican twist?

12-03-2009, 03:09 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The Devouring Star, an apparently harmless spiny starfish crawling over the ground, but it is incredibly fecund. Within months a single creature can become a hungry horde that strips a Kingdom's fields down to bare earth, leaving the population to starve. Chopping them to pieces does no good - the larger fragments just grow into new Devouring Stars. The peasants can't even eat them, since their flesh is poisonous.

But they do make good tinder. The smoke from the fires is slightly addictive and gives humans and dwarves the giggles. Slipping it into a dwarven communities communal bonfire earns a sentence of hard labor.

And Burp Ho-Tep? GW has a lot of strange names, but nothing like that.

12-03-2009, 03:14 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I remember seeing a "killer whale with legs" somewhere,

Might that be the Darfellan?

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The Devouring Star, an apparently harmless spiny starfish crawling over the ground, but it is incredibly fecund. Within months a single creature can become a hungry horde that strips a Kingdom's fields down to bare earth, leaving the population to starve. Chopping them to pieces does no good - the larger fragments just grow into new Devouring Stars. The peasants can't even eat them, since their flesh is poisonous.

I like this because it's the sort of thing a village would ask a D&D adventuring party to deal with, but it can't be defeated by fighting it. And it fits the weird D&D creature sort of vibe. Might become a new extraplanar creature, if we ever play the game I GM again.

12-03-2009, 03:16 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

And Burp Ho-Tep? GW has a lot of strange names, but nothing like that.

Barl nep, ber lep, narl ep... I'm just following the euphonic tradition :)

12-03-2009, 10:03 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

But they do make good tinder. The smoke from the fires is slightly addictive and gives humans and dwarves the giggles. Slipping it into a dwarven communities communal bonfire earns a sentence of hard labor.

That's because the dwarves know better than to burn them. Sure the smokes only slightly addictive at first, but the effect just gets stronger and stronger. Many are lucky and just go "starry eyed" giggling idiots that just sit around staring and talking nonsense, A few unlucky ones have their perceptions expanded too far and see Things From Beyond - and those Things see them back. Some go violently crazy, others go quietly mad and begin worshipping the Things and trying to call them down to earth.

12-03-2009, 10:08 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Might that be the Darfellan?

No, it wasn't an anthropomorphic orca, it was literally a killer whale with four short legs, like a bulette with rubbery black & white skin and a dorsal fin. I can remember the illustration, but can't for the life of me recall where I saw it.

12-03-2009, 10:14 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

A feathered sea serpent. A thunder bird with a Mesoamerican twist?

Not what I was thinking. They're eels - slimy nasty things writhing in the air, darting down to strike with shocking grasps. Every once in a while they swarm, clustering in great writhing masses that form the centres of gloomy thunderstorms that rain down lightning upon their prey.

12-03-2009, 10:14 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Not what I was thinking. They're eels - slimy nasty things writhing in the air, darting down to strike with shocking grasps. Every once in a while they swarm, clustering in great writhing masses that form the centres of gloomy thunderstorms that rain down lightning upon their prey.

Either way, the Feathered Eel needs to exist.

She accepts only virginal hobgoblins dipped in chocolate for sacrifices.

12-03-2009, 10:42 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist

Either way, the Feathered Eel needs to exist.

She accepts only virginal hobgoblins dipped in chocolate for sacrifices.

I heard many tolerate flawless halflings stuffed with chili peppers, but Epicurean Feathered Eels demand virginal chocolate-coated hobgoblins stuffed with halflings filled with chili peppers.

12-03-2009, 10:50 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

That's because the dwarves know better than to burn them. Sure the smokes only slightly addictive at first, but the effect just gets stronger and stronger. Many are lucky and just go "starry eyed" giggling idiots that just sit around staring and talking nonsense, A few unlucky ones have their perceptions expanded too far and see Things From Beyond - and those Things see them back. Some go violently crazy, others go quietly mad and begin worshiping the Things and trying to call them down to earth.

In the interests of humanity, the Sea Caballeros have asked me to pass on a simple technique for safely disposing of Devouring Stars. It turns out that while they are fully amphibious, breathing both air and water, they're like frogs in that they can only breathe fresh water. Put them in salt water and osmosis will give their internal fluids a fatal ion imbalance.

So, rather ironically, you can kill Devouring Starfish by throwing them into the sea.

12-04-2009, 01:18 AM

HaplessVictim

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

No, it wasn't an anthropomorphic orca, it was literally a killer whale with four short legs, like a bulette with rubbery black & white skin and a dorsal fin. I can remember the illustration, but can't for the life of me recall where I saw it.

I think you're recalling the Lankhmar Behemoth from "Deities and Demigods"

Imagine a killer whale with four stubby legs and no fins and you have the perfect image of a behemoth. These mammals are easily capable of crossing water, marsh grass, and quicksand. There are several types, but each version always attacks the largest living thing in any given group. The behemoth has a keen sense of smell and is a persistent tracker.

12-04-2009, 02:27 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

^ Yes, there is art of a killer whale with stubby legs in the Nehwon section of Deities & Demigods.

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist

Either way, the Feathered Eel needs to exist.

She accepts only virginal hobgoblins dipped in chocolate for sacrifices.

Maybe a dog-like kobold instead?

Quote:

Originally Posted by "Cacao" at Wikipedia

The Maya believed that the kakaw (cacao) was discovered by the gods in a mountain that also contained other delectable foods to be used by the Maya. According to Maya mythology, the Plumed Serpent gave cacao to the Maya after humans were created from maize by divine grandmother goddess Xmucane (Bogin 1997, Coe 1996, Montejo 1999, Tedlock 1985). The Maya celebrated an annual festival in April to honor their cacao god, Ek Chuah, an event that included the sacrifice of a dog with cacao colored markings; additional animal sacrifices; offerings of cacao, feathers and incense; and an exchange of gifts. In a similar creation story, the Mexica (Aztec) god Quetzalcoatl discovered cacao (cacahuatl: "'bitter water'"), in a mountain filled with other plant foods (Coe 1996, Townsend 1992). Cacao was offered regularly to a pantheon of Mexica deities and the Madrid Codex depicts priests lancing their ear lobes (autosacrifice) and covering the cacao with blood as a suitable sacrifice to the gods. The cacao beverage as ritual were used only by men, as it was believed to be toxic for women and children.

There are several mixtures of cacao described in ancient texts, for ceremonial, medicinal uses as well as culinary purposes. Some mixtures included maize, chili, vanilla (Vanilla planifolia), peanut butter and honey.

12-04-2009, 02:39 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist
Either way, the Feathered Eel needs to exist.

Perhaps it is the land based equivalent of a leafy sea dragon?

12-04-2009, 06:37 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim
I think you're recalling the Lankhmar Behemoth from "Deities and Demigods"
Imagine a killer whale with four stubby legs and no fins and you have the perfect image of a behemoth. These mammals are easily capable of crossing water, marsh grass, and quicksand. There are several types, but each version always attacks the largest living thing in any given group. The behemoth has a keen sense of smell and is a persistent tracker.

Thanks chaps, that sounds like the beast I was thinking of. I can't find the picture on the web, so I'd have to dig out my copy of Deities & Demigods to be sure, and I'm probably too lazy to do so.:

It certainly rings a bell. I remember the picture having a dorsal fin, but that may be my memory playing tricks (or the artist not reading the description!). Then again, from what I recall of my Fritz Leiber reading he didn't say much about what the Behemoths of Nehwon actually look like, so the "finless orca with legs" appearance may be more TSR than Leiber.

They'll have dorsal fins in MY game, irregardless.:mad:;)

12-04-2009, 06:45 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot
Perhaps it is the land based equivalent of a leafy sea dragon?

I'd have thought a Leafy Arboreal Dragon would be a harmless little insect-eater that lives in forests, using its prehensile tail and wing-fins to climb along branches and fly between trees.

Of course there are those rumours of them cross-breeding with green dragons, producing a giant monster that spits streams of hydrochloric acid to dissolve its prey, then slurping up the resulting soup, but those are just lumberjack's tales.

Or are they...:D

12-22-2009, 11:55 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

A note to let everyone know I haven't forgotten about this thread, or died, or anything like that. Just busy, and Vampire is a fucking LONG entry. Should be a proper update later today or tomorrow.

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

A note to let everyone know I haven't forgotten about this thread, or died, or anything like that. Just busy, and Vampire is a fucking LONG entry. Should be a proper update later today or tomorrow.

That's okay Noisms, no need to worry.

I'd be glad of the extra time, since I'm having trouble coming up with anything interesting to say about Vampires that hasn't already been done to (un)death.

12-23-2009, 12:50 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I'd be glad of the extra time, since I'm having trouble coming up with anything interesting to say about Vampires that hasn't already been done to (un)death.

Vampires are actually plants. That whole dead-body rictus rigor no breathing tough as nails thing? They're not made of dead (or living) flesh. It's woody plant stuff. They're like the white bottom part you snap off before cooking asparagus.

The sunlight thing is a plain ol' mythstake. They don't burst into flame. They need sun; it's life. Photosynthesis and all. But they do hide away. Just not in coffins stashed away amid the loam and must in basements. They hide in plain sight.

When you visit the next gothic castle, with big brooding battlements, moats full of scum and dark sudden movements, and ghostly slips vanishing from the corner of one's eyes, look outside. On the trellises and clambering up the walls. The creepers and explosion of vines and tendrils may just be a vampire, in its day-guise.

12-23-2009, 01:28 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Vampires are actually plants. That whole dead-body rictus rigor no breathing tough as nails thing? They're not made of dead (or living) flesh. It's woody plant stuff. They're like the white bottom part you snap off before cooking asparagus.

... This can't be. That wouldn't sparkle at all.

12-23-2009, 01:40 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

... This can't be. That wouldn't sparkle at all.

They do if you sniff their pollen. Mmm.... hallucinations.

All the cool kids are doing it.

12-23-2009, 03:32 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Comments on the vampire as presented in the 2nd ed MM:

Vampires being chaotic evil always seemed really weird to me. Not as weird as goblins being lawful, but weird. I think vampires are given chaotic evil just because some TSR writer thought Chaotic Evil was somehow more evil than regular old Neutral Evil or Lawful Evil. Vampires, as immortal scheming intellectual monsters always struck me as a great example of a lawful evil villain: they can work with humans to advance their goals. Johnathan Harker in Dracula is initially hired to be Dracula's lawyer, for Gygax's sake. How many Slaads hire lawyers? (Okay so there was that one Planescape adventure... but that's another entry.)

The entry even describes vampires by saying "When deciding on a course of action or planning a campaign, vampires move very slowly and meticulously. It is not uncommon for a vampire to undertake some scheme which may take decades or even centuries to reach its conclusion." Which doesn't sound chaotic at all.

Second, the vampire has a couple of exploitable weaknesses that don't come up much, like recoiling from mirrors and taking a big hunk of damage from running water. And a random line about holy wafers that seems out of context. Do any D&D religions use holy wafers in their ceremonies? Does Pelor transubstantiate stale bread and crummy wine into his body and blood?

Third, the vampires energy drain thing is by now thoroughly established in D&D but never seemed grounded in vampire myth or fiction anywhere. Was it just too difficult to have the vampire bite people? Or attack in combat using their slew of other powers?

Four, if the vampire can just charm someone inside a building, then that whole "can't enter unless invited" thing isn't a big hindrance, is it? (In the original Ravenloft module, Strahd had some pet werewolves burst through the walls to invite him in, which has more style than mindcontrolling a serving girl.)

I'm not really sure what to make of the "eastern vampire" entry, since it's so short and devoid of context. Are we talking about an eastern european vampire? A chinese vampire? Is it a monster more fully explained elsewhere and given short shrift in the MM?

12-26-2009, 03:12 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Vampires are actually plants. That whole dead-body rictus rigor no breathing tough as nails thing? They're not made of dead (or living) flesh. It's woody plant stuff. They're like the white bottom part you snap off before cooking asparagus.

The sunlight thing is a plain ol' mythstake. They don't burst into flame. They need sun; it's life. Photosynthesis and all. But they do hide away. Just not in coffins stashed away amid the loam and must in basements. They hide in plain sight.

When you visit the next gothic castle, with big brooding battlements, moats full of scum and dark sudden movements, and ghostly slips vanishing from the corner of one's eyes, look outside. On the trellises and clambering up the walls. The creepers and explosion of vines and tendrils may just be a vampire, in its day-guise.

Nah, you're way off base. Think about it - these are creatures with the pallid skin of a mushroom that they spend all their time in the dark, they have some powerful mind-affecting ability over their victims (psychotropic venom in their bite?) and if you 'destroy' them they often just pop back up in their coffins (a new fruiting body).

Clearly, Dracula was just a fungi.

12-26-2009, 03:28 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Comments on the vampire as presented in the 2nd ed MM:

Vampires being chaotic evil always seemed really weird to me. Not as weird as goblins being lawful, but weird. I think vampires are given chaotic evil just because some TSR writer thought Chaotic Evil was somehow more evil than regular old Neutral Evil or Lawful Evil. Vampires, as immortal scheming intellectual monsters always struck me as a great example of a lawful evil villain: they can work with humans to advance their goals. Johnathan Harker in Dracula is initially hired to be Dracula's lawyer, for Gygax's sake. How many Slaads hire lawyers? (Okay so there was that one Planescape adventure... but that's another entry.)

Yes it is odd, it'd make more sense if most of AD&D's sapient undead could be any evil (with a capital E!) alignment. There should be far more Neutral Evil ones, for a start.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Third, the vampires energy drain thing is by now thoroughly established in D&D but never seemed grounded in vampire myth or fiction anywhere. Was it just too difficult to have the vampire bite people? Or attack in combat using their slew of other powers?

There are some variant AD&D vampires which have blood-drain, but most of them have this as well as energy drain, which seems rather redundant - most PCs would prefer a temporary loss of a few hit points or Con than losing a level or three!

One thing I'm wondering is whether the energy drain makes it hard for AD&D vampires to masquerade as living people. The power is due to their dual Prime-and-Negative Material Plane existence, which leads me to suspect they can't turn it off. How do you keep pretending to be an ordinary mortal if you can't shake a shopkeeper's hand without sucking the life out of them?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

I'm not really sure what to make of the "eastern vampire" entry, since it's so short and devoid of context. Are we talking about an eastern european vampire? A chinese vampire? Is it a monster more fully explained elsewhere and given short shrift in the MM?

I have no idea. Turning invisible is a very common supernatural power, so it's hard to narrow down.

EDIT: Oh yes, and Merry Christmas everybody!

12-26-2009, 04:35 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Nah, you're way off base. Think about it - these are creatures with the pallid skin of a mushroom that they spend all their time in the dark, they have some powerful mind-affecting ability over their victims (psychotropic venom in their bite?) and if you 'destroy' them they often just pop back up in their coffins (a new fruiting body).

Clearly, Dracula was just a fungi.

You're clearly under the influence of the pollen of Drosera vampiricus. What have we told the student teratologists? Don't taste, snort, or even sniff the biological samples!

They're plants. True plants. Colonial organisms, like aspens. Runners connect the various apparently separate plants. Laypersons often mistake these protrusions for coffins.

From these spring the stalks and creepers, which take on a human-like semblance during the night. The mostly widely known variety is what is known as a "vampire" in common parlance. These flowering vines can temporarily separate from the main plant, generally reattaching only during the twilight hours of dusk and dawn. During the day, they bask in the sunlight in their creeper form, absorbing energy via photosynthesis.

During the night, they take on the human-appearing form. This form is extremely active, and photosynthesis alone does not meet their steep energy requirements. Their carnivorous adaptations are a way of meeting this deficiency.

Their pollen is used as a lure. Like the perfume of pitcher plants or venus fly traps, it is irresistible to their prey. Youthful women, mostly, though a growing number of specimens have been found, primarily in the Western Marches but spreading, that attract young males of the humanoid species instead.

At any one time, only one component of the colonial organism fully flowers. This is the source of the popular "vampire" myths, since the detached plant supplements its diet with humanoid blood.

The other "coffins" also generate human-appearing flowering tendrils, but these simulacra are often imperfect, distorted. Uncontrolled twitching, hunchbacks, and various and sundry other grotesqueries have been reported. Their feeding mechanism is also imperfectly developed. They cannot revert to creeper form during the day, and thus are unable to absorb energy via photosynthesis. These humanoid forms are unable to ingest blood and must instead subsist on a diet of insects, rats, and other vermin. This inferior food source explains their limited lifespan; they wither, turn brown, and die over the space of a few weeks. They also lack the hypnotic aura of pollen and their limited diet makes them weaker than the master creeper, to whom these "minions" are utterly subservient.

12-26-2009, 05:48 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

/|\ I thought that was elves.

12-26-2009, 05:43 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

There are some variant AD&D vampires which have blood-drain, but most of them have this as well as energy drain, which seems rather redundant - most PCs would prefer a temporary loss of a few hit points or Con than losing a level or three!

Yeah. If you read the MM vampire entry, you'll notice that there is no mention of vampires drinking blood! They don't have a bite attack. Their diet is not "blood" but "special", and the ecology section talks about how they sustain themselves on the life energy they drain. (And with them draining two levels (IIRC) per "slam attack", you won't have any survivors from 99% of vampire attacks!)

Blood-drinking is the most iconic quality of vampires, yet it's completely and totally ignored, in favor of the bullshit energy drain mechanic of D&D undead. Yet every little bit of the Dracula-based vampire lore is used, including the utterly redundant ability to spider climb (when the vamps can turn into bats or vapor and just fly)!

Vampires are one of the places where (A)D&D drops the ball, I think.

12-26-2009, 10:03 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Vampire

[A putative discussion is already emerging, I see. I'll write this post in light of that.]

First things first, let me say that I don't really like vampires all that much. I wasn't much interested in them when they were pallid aristocrats in black tie, wasn't much interested in them when they became kewl yet apathetic epicureans, and wasn't much interested in them when they got all emo. When they were bald Wallachians with very long fingers they were okay, I suppose.

Second things second, probably as a result of the fact that I'm not much into vampires, I've never used one as a DM.

Now, on with the entry. The first thing that strikes me about AD&D vampires is how old school they are. 1989 really was a different era. This was before Blade, before Interview with the Vampire, before V: tM and long long before Twilight. AD&D vampires are the ones we remember from childhood stories - they cast no shadow, have no reflection, hate garlic, move silently, can turn into a giant bat, and can only enter a home if invited to do so. Think Christopher Lee rather than Robert Pattinson.

The second thing that strikes me about AD&D vampires is that there is a strong stench of the Mary Sue (perhaps Villain Sue?) about them - it isn't difficult to envisage a poor DM using this regenerating, uber-intelligent superbeing as a kind of stick with which to beat recalcitrant players. On the other hand, this is a complaint that can be levelled at most very powerful evil D&D beings, so I suppose it would be churlish of me to tar only vampires with that brush.

The most interesting aspects of the vampire are its peculiar aversion to garlic, its incapability of casting a shadow or causing a reflection, and its stipulations on entry to a dwelling. All of these can be interestingly worked into a game, particularly if the DM plays the vampire as trying to "pass" in mainstream society rather than acting as some kind of pantomime villain in a ruined castle somewhere.

Eastern Vampire

An ill-defined breed which can become invisible. I assume "Eastern" in this instance refers to East Asia, rather than Eastern Europe.

12-26-2009, 11:06 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Now, on with the entry. The first thing that strikes me about AD&D vampires is how old school they are. 1989 really was a different era. This was before Blade, before Interview with the Vampire, before V: tM and long long before Twilight. AD&D vampires are the ones we remember from childhood stories - they cast no shadow, have no reflection, hate garlic, move silently, can turn into a giant bat, and can only enter a home if invited to do so. Think Christopher Lee rather than Robert Pattinson.

The second thing that strikes me about AD&D vampires is that there is a strong stench of the Mary Sue (perhaps Villain Sue?) about them - it isn't difficult to envisage a poor DM using this regenerating, uber-intelligent superbeing as a kind of stick with which to beat recalcitrant players. On the other hand, this is a complaint that can be levelled at most very powerful evil D&D beings, so I suppose it would be churlish of me to tar only vampires with that brush.

The most interesting aspects of the vampire are its peculiar aversion to garlic, its incapability of casting a shadow or causing a reflection, and its stipulations on entry to a dwelling. All of these can be interestingly worked into a game, particularly if the DM plays the vampire as trying to "pass" in mainstream society rather than acting as some kind of pantomime villain in a ruined castle somewhere.

AD&D vampires are way too complex. They have more special abilities than anything this side of demons, and on top of that is stacked a dizzying array of restrictions. Makes them a pain to run.

You're right that they're dated, though. Sean K. Reynolds tried to address that in 3E with the flesh-bound vampire template, which recreates Buffy-style vampires. No mist, no mandatory coffins, no missing shadows, no problems shaving. I don't know if there's an equivalent for 1 or 2E. Basic D&D had the nosferatu, which swapped level drain for a blood sucking ability.

The Eastern vampire is kind of sad. ~~Dragon magazine #25 (and Best of #2) had a good selection of vampires from a variety of cultures. I think they just distilled that down to one.~~ Edit: I just remembered we can't blame 2E for the eastern vampire. They're from a paragraph in the 1st edition MM: "Vampires of the eastern world are invisible. This gives them all appropriate consideration for invisibility, including a -2 on 'to hit' dice rolls for opponents not able to see invisible objects. These vampires cannot charm, however, nor do they have power to assume gaseous form at will."

12-27-2009, 08:03 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

AD&D vampires are way too complex. They have more special abilities than anything this side of demons, and on top of that is stacked a dizzying array of restrictions. Makes them a pain to run.

Yep. A lot of the Big Evil Villain Monsters have that problem. Liches, Greater Mummies, Dracoliches, etc.

12-27-2009, 10:32 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yep. A lot of the Big Evil Villain Monsters have that problem. Liches, Greater Mummies, Dracoliches, etc.

Vampires were first, though. They were detailed in OD&D's LBBs and Greyhawk, and were one of the grossly-out-of-the-PCs'-league monsters in Holmes' blue book basic (which covered levels 1-3). Liches may have been fairly early as well, but they were basically just magic-users with a couple special effects. Dracoliches were towards the end of 1E, and weren't greater mummies a Ravenloft thing?

12-27-2009, 10:44 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yep. A lot of the Big Evil Villain Monsters have that problem. Liches, Greater Mummies, Dracoliches, etc.

I wouldn't say liches are a problem to run. They have almost none of the undead restrictions (sunlight being the big one) and can get around what little limitations they do have by magic. They are only of the very few undead I don't dislike.

12-28-2009, 09:22 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I wouldn't say liches are a problem to run. They have almost none of the undead restrictions (sunlight being the big one) and can get around what little limitations they do have by magic. They are only of the very few undead I don't dislike.

I was thinking mostly of demiliches. The sub-entry about them is basically a long list of complicated exception-based design stipulations.

12-28-2009, 11:07 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I was thinking mostly of demiliches. The sub-entry about them is basically a long list of complicated exception-based design stipulations.

(Spoilers for the first appearance of the demi-lich in a classically deadly module.)

Didn't the demi-lich first appear in the Tomb of Horrors?

look at the way Acererak was used in the module. Like the Green Devil Face, the way to "win" against the demi-lich is to ignore it. The entire purpose of most of its special abilities (the floating and screaming and phantoms and so forth) is to fool the players into attacking it. Until they attack it, it is fairly harmless.

Classic Gygax, actually. Don't hide the trap. Stick it smack-dab in the middle of the room, and let the players hang themselves by their own actions.

Similarly, the immunities are the equivalent of doors that are immune to all spells or rooms where teleport doesn't work. It's basically module short-hand for "for purposes of this adventure, your players can't use that solution". A crude one-shot plot device, that's all.

The demi-lich was designed to fulfill a very specific purpose, in a very specific scenario. The mistake was to take those very specific set of conditions developed for a very specific, and call it a monster.

12-28-2009, 09:20 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Vampires were first, though. They were detailed in OD&D's LBBs and Greyhawk, and were one of the grossly-out-of-the-PCs'-league monsters in Holmes' blue book basic (which covered levels 1-3).

SNIP

I used vampires now and again, since they are such an iconic monster, although I tend to have them filling roles apart from the classic aristocrat lurking in a desolate castle - most of the vamps in my campaign world live in big cities and try to blend in (e.g. I've had a vampire who prowled the corridors of a lunatic asylum at night, masquerading as a Doctor, and a "Vampire Granny").

As far as I'm concerned all their powers and restrictions are integral to the classic vampire, and I wouldn't want to remove them. It's part of their literary heritage that mundane heroes would find them terrible, nigh-unstoppable foes during the night. That's why all those restrictions are so important, since they make it possible for a low-medium level party that knows what it's doing to deal with such undead horrors - they use mirrors, holy symbols or a lack of invitation to avoid them during the hours of darkness, then play "hunt the coffin" during the day. Indeed, that opens them up to a classic "ticking timebomb" scenario:

Trapped in the Vampires' Catacomb, can our heroes unearth its coffin before it awakens and slays them all?

12-28-2009, 09:23 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

(Spoilers for the first appearance of the demi-lich in a classically deadly module.)

Yes, the Demi-Lich is more of a trap than an autonomous monster. I quite liked the explanation in The Return to the Tomb of Horrors module that it was actually a device for harvesting the souls of high-level characters for Acererak to use for its foul purposes.

12-29-2009, 11:28 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

As far as I'm concerned all their powers and restrictions are integral to the classic vampire, and I wouldn't want to remove them. It's part of their literary heritage that mundane heroes would find them terrible, nigh-unstoppable foes during the night. That's why all those restrictions are so important, since they make it possible for a low-medium level party that knows what it's doing to deal with such undead horrors - they use mirrors, holy symbols or a lack of invitation to avoid them during the hours of darkness, then play "hunt the coffin" during the day.

What classic vampire? Stoker's Dracula didn't go poof in sunlight. Count Orlok from Nosferatu did, but he's rat-faced not a charming aristocrat. Ruthven was more suave, but magically healed in moonlight. Ancient folklore varied from myth to myth, even within the same region. Modern interpretations often strip out most of the more magical or metaphorical weaknesses, like the lack of a reflection or the vulnerability to running water, or come up with a pseudo-science rationale (stakes become an allergy to hawthorn). Hammer films? Perhaps the 1931 film? No, not even that. The AD&D vampire doesn't even seem to drink blood.

You make a good argument for keeping a variety of weaknesses, but there's a huge body of myth surrounding the classic Slavic vampire. They might have tails, turn into butterflies, or start as shadows and gradually develop a body. And that's not even considering the omnipresence of vampires and vampire-like creatures in cultures around the world. Lots of weaknesses and strange limitations to raid. Reward players with the foresight to consult sages, churches, and professional vampire hunters for advice.

12-29-2009, 09:05 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

What classic vampire? Stoker's Dracula didn't go poof in sunlight. Count Orlok from Nosferatu did, but he's rat-faced not a charming aristocrat. Ruthven was more suave, but magically healed in moonlight. Ancient folklore varied from myth to myth, even within the same region. Modern interpretations often strip out most of the more magical or metaphorical weaknesses, like the lack of a reflection or the vulnerability to running water, or come up with a pseudo-science rationale (stakes become an allergy to hawthorn). Hammer films? Perhaps the 1931 film? No, not even that. The AD&D vampire doesn't even seem to drink blood.

SNIP

Well in the case of AD&D the 'classic' vampire appears to be a portmanteau of Dracula and Dracula-clones as they have appeared in popular Western media from the turn of the century to the 70s, especially the movies.

Now I wonder how many of these traits (mirrors, garlic etc) Gygax gave "Sir Fang", one of the earliest (if not the original) D&D vampire. I think I remember seeing him saying something about it on a discussion thread somewhere.

As for alternative vampires, I'm all in favour of them, but would be very cautious of the "Haha! the wooden stake does nothing, for Count Incisor is an Eastern Madeupstanian vampire!" trope of having them look and act like a standard vampire but have very different weaknesses. It just doesn't seem very fair.

Instead, I like alternative vampires that look and act radically different to the "standard" variety - the breath-stealing rigid corpse, the flying charred fire-spitting undead witch, the bloated hollow cadaver, the pallid horror that can step in and out of mirrors and can kill by eating its victim's reflection, the bloody ghoul that only attacks at high noon, et cetera et cetera.

12-29-2009, 09:32 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

As for alternative vampires, I'm all in favour of them, but would be very cautious of the "Haha! the wooden stake does nothing, for Count Incisor is an Eastern Madeupstanian vampire!" trope of having them look and act like a standard vampire but have very different weaknesses. It just doesn't seem very fair.

Fair? Fair?!

This is D&D!

Is pounding a sphere of annihilation flat, sticking it in a doorframe, and then writing "magic portal to happy fun beach full of treasure and naked hot chicks with absolutely no monsters" next to it fair?

12-29-2009, 09:58 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

As for alternative vampires, I'm all in favour of them, but would be very cautious of the "Haha! the wooden stake does nothing, for Count Incisor is an Eastern Madeupstanian vampire!" trope of having them look and act like a standard vampire but have very different weaknesses. It just doesn't seem very fair.

Instead, I like alternative vampires that look and act radically different to the "standard" variety - the breath-stealing rigid corpse, the flying charred fire-spitting undead witch, the bloated hollow cadaver, the pallid horror that can step in and out of mirrors and can kill by eating its victim's reflection, the bloody ghoul that only attacks at high noon, et cetera et cetera.

There is no "standard" vampire type. There are more common traits and less common traits, but not only has the vampire evolved from it's early incarnations to modern portrayals, even within a specific region and time there is no such thing as a standard set of vampiric characteristics. Even the most genre-aware human protagonists in vampire fiction have to go through a stage where they learn which traditional weaknesses apply and which don't. Using your stake example -- what type of wood are they vulnerable to? Ash? Hawthorn? White oak? Any wood? Does it kill, or paralyze? Do they just die, or turn to dust?

The player and the GM are bound to have different interpretations. The only way players will know beforehand what works and what doesn't is if they read the Monstrous Manual. Instead, the DM can lay out rumors. Reward players who explore the setting, and take in-character actions to learn which vulnerabilities work and which are so much bunk. There's no need to go too far afield; just one odd characteristic or specific weakness is enough to differentiate the vampires in a particular world. But vampires that draw on lesser known legends can be fun, as well.

In fact, traditional vampires are probably a better choice in D&D than modern vampires. (By "modern" I mean post- Carmilla or Dracula; not just film depictions or Anne Rice.) After all, a feral ruddy beast with mystical vulnerabilities makes a good one-shot "monster". The PCs can kill it without qualms, and the DM doesn't have to worry about the plot being destroyed when the party takes it out.

The suave aristocratic vampire or the sexy and misunderstood vampire are better suited as protagonists or recurring villains, neither of which works as well in the standard D&D game. Traditional D&D isn't about playing monsters, and recurrent villains pretty much have to stay off-stage because few adversaries survive contact with the typical group of bloodthirsty PCs.

12-29-2009, 11:48 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Now I wonder how many of these traits (mirrors, garlic etc) Gygax gave "Sir Fang", one of the earliest (if not the original) D&D vampire. I think I remember seeing him saying something about it on a discussion thread somewhere.

Perhaps when Old Geezer was talking about the origins of the cleric class? (The cleric started as a vampire hunter class, to defeat Sir Fang.)

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

, the pallid horror that can step in and out of mirrors and can kill by eating its victim's reflection,

Mirror vampires are really spirits native to the Plane of Mirrors. When someone's reflection escapes a mirror somehow, they can sustain themselves in the material world by absorbing the reflections of native creatures. Their first target is almost always of the person that they are a reflection of. So if you find a corpse of a guy you know to be still alive, check to see if the corpse shows up in reflection. If it doesn't, you might have a mirror vampire on your hands.

Now, though mirror vampires are identified by not having a reflection, you gotta be careful confronting them with a mirror. Most people who touch a mirror just bump against their mirror double. But mirror vampires have no reflection to keep them from just jumping back into the Mirror Plane. So, if threatened, they'll just disappear to another plane of existence for a while, and come back later.

12-29-2009, 11:55 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

/|\ I thought that was elves.

Elves are vampires. They're immortal, inhumanly beautiful, pointy eared self important aristocratic assholes.

Elves are probably a type of vampire that steals beauty from human beings (and has no problem with sunlight).

12-31-2009, 12:47 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Fair? Fair?!

This is D&D!

Is pounding a sphere of annihilation flat, sticking it in a doorframe, and then writing "magic portal to happy fun beach full of treasure and naked hot chicks with absolutely no monsters" next to it fair?

Well that's both fair and unfair.

On the 'fair' side, any character in a death-trap filled dungeon who falls for such an obvious ploy deserves what they get.

On the 'unfair' side it's impossible to pound a sphere of annihilation flat, since any object that attempts said pounding would be annihilated. Obviously, the dungeon maker needs to put it in a sphere-diameter tunnel, or create a teleportal that transports intruders into the air just above the sphere, or research a variation on the duo-dimension spell to turn it into a disc of annihilation...

12-31-2009, 12:57 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

There is no "standard" vampire type. There are more common traits and less common traits, but not only has the vampire evolved from its early incarnations to modern portrayals, even within a specific region and time there is no such thing as a standard set of vampiric characteristics. Even the most genre-aware human protagonists in vampire fiction have to go through a stage where they learn which traditional weaknesses apply and which don't. Using your stake example -- what type of wood are they vulnerable to? Ash? Hawthorn? White oak? Any wood? Does it kill, or paralyze? Do they just die, or turn to dust?

Well in the case of AD&D there quite clearly is a standard Vampire, it's right there in the Monstrous Compendium between Urchin and Wemic.:o

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

In fact, traditional vampires are probably a better choice in D&D than modern vampires. (By "modern" I mean post- Carmilla or Dracula; not just film depictions or Anne Rice.) After all, a feral ruddy beast with mystical vulnerabilities makes a good one-shot "monster". The PCs can kill it without qualms, and the DM doesn't have to worry about the plot being destroyed when the party takes it out.

The suave aristocratic vampire or the sexy and misunderstood vampire are better suited as protagonists or recurring villains, neither of which works as well in the standard D&D game. Traditional D&D isn't about playing monsters, and recurrent villains pretty much have to stay off-stage because few adversaries survive contact with the typical group of bloodthirsty PCs.

I don't recall any mention of the "misunderstood" vampire. As far as I'm aware we're still talking about the (Chaotic) Evil undead fiends that exist by destroying the living.

As for the PCs propensity for murdering every adversary they encounter, that's a major reason AD&D vampires make such good recurring villains. If they get reduced to 0 hits they just 'poof' into smoke and flee to reform in one of their coffins. A sufficiently intelligent and well-prepared Vampire can easily put their preferred coffin somewhere extraordinarily difficult for a party of adventurers to find, let alone reach, not to mention the old ploy of having 'phoney coffins' that are really killer mimics, containers for fake vampires and the like.

12-31-2009, 01:09 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Perhaps when Old Geezer was talking about the origins of the cleric class? (The cleric started as a vampire hunter class, to defeat Sir Fang.)

It wasn't just the esteemed Old Geezer, I have a vague recollection of seeing a few posts on somewhere like dragonsfoot where someone asked Mr Gyax about Sir Fang, but I can't recall more details.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Mirror vampires are really spirits native to the Plane of Mirrors. When someone's reflection escapes a mirror somehow, they can sustain themselves in the material world by absorbing the reflections of native creatures. Their first target is almost always of the person that they are a reflection of. So if you find a corpse of a guy you know to be still alive, check to see if the corpse shows up in reflection. If it doesn't, you might have a mirror vampire on your hands.

Now, though mirror vampires are identified by not having a reflection, you gotta be careful confronting them with a mirror. Most people who touch a mirror just bump against their mirror double. But mirror vampires have no reflection to keep them from just jumping back into the Mirror Plane. So, if threatened, they'll just disappear to another plane of existence for a while, and come back later.

The way I heard it was they were not native to the mirror plane, but the souls of once-human creatures that had been transferred to the mirror plane (originally in a misguided attempt to achieve immortality, but subsequently by Mirror Vampires preying on mortals).

In objective reality, the Mirror Vampire looks just like they did when transformed, perpetually ageless. In reflective reality the mirror creature shows all the deterioration and depravity of their numerous years of sinful destruction, appearing as deliquescing horrors that could strike a strong-willed dwarf mad just by seeing its 'mirror form'.

Its no wonder Mirror Vampires recoil when they see themselves are they truly are...

12-31-2009, 02:30 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I don't recall any mention of the "misunderstood" vampire. As far as I'm aware we're still talking about the (Chaotic) Evil undead fiends that exist by destroying the living.

I've been discussing different varieties of vampire for several posts. I was just mentioning a few problems with the other "standard" types.

12-31-2009, 02:54 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Elves are vampires. They're immortal, inhumanly beautiful, pointy eared self important aristocratic assholes.

Elves are probably a type of vampire that steals beauty from human beings (and has no problem with sunlight).

I was referencing The Long Stairs. Elves were lures put out by carnivorous plants.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well that's both fair and unfair.

On the 'fair' side, any character in a death-trap filled dungeon who falls for such an obvious ploy deserves what they get.

Well they're usually a bit moar subtle about it. Just get a guy in a cloak to hand out treasure maps in a tavern as a lure, that should do it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

On the 'unfair' side it's impossible to pound a sphere of annihilation flat, since any object that attempts said pounding would be annihilated. Obviously, the dungeon maker needs to put it in a sphere-diameter tunnel, or create a teleportal that transports intruders into the air just above the sphere, or research a variation on the duo-dimension spell to turn it into a disc of annihilation...

Well Gygax managed it. I think.

12-31-2009, 03:45 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

Well Gygax managed it. I think.

Well the great EGG could have made it flat if he'd wanted to, being the DM. I agree with the philosophy that as far as the DM goes, the rules are just suggestions that should be warped or dropped if it makes for a "better" game.

Although in the case of the Tomb of Horror's Green Devil Face, I'd think that was most likely a sphere set in a (very short) tunnel, since the devil sculpture's mouth appeared to be a passage but led to prompt annihilation for those who crawled through it. It wasn't a standard sphere of annihilation though, being immobile.

12-31-2009, 02:01 PM

Simon Hogwood

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Elves are vampires. They're immortal, inhumanly beautiful, pointy eared self important aristocratic assholes.

Elves are probably a type of vampire that steals beauty from human beings (and has no problem with sunlight).

And thus was another explanation for the Twilight "vampires" born. :D

01-03-2010, 11:16 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Elves are vampires. They're immortal, inhumanly beautiful, pointy eared self important aristocratic assholes.

Elves are probably a type of vampire that steals beauty from human beings (and has no problem with sunlight).

Hasn't that idea been in circulation for quite a long time? There are tales of folk who were 'taken by the elves' and returned either unnaturally aged or just dull and pining for their fairy mates, as if they were missing something. I also recall some kind of muse-like fairy entity that inspired artists to great works, but simultaneously sapped them off life. Can't remember what they were called.

Plus, there are a few other roleplaying games that have soul-stealing, life-sapping elves (e.g. Orcworld, Exalted).

01-03-2010, 11:26 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I also recall some kind of muse-like fairy entity that inspired artists to great works, but simultaneously sapped them off life. Can't remember what they were called.

Ha! I should have known 4e's fey muse-vampire wasn't exactly an original concept (still, props to whoever for resurrecting it, it's a pretty cool monster).

01-04-2010, 02:01 AM

cavalier

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I also recall some kind of muse-like fairy entity that inspired artists to great works, but simultaneously sapped them off life. Can't remember what they were called.

I don't know what they were called either, but it explains why so many creative types burn out quickly. Oh, sure, it looked like they drank themselves into the grave, or overdosed, or whatever, but it was really their muse...

01-04-2010, 02:50 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I also recall some kind of muse-like fairy entity that inspired artists to great works, but simultaneously sapped them off life. Can't remember what they were called.

Leanan Sídhe, or some variant thereof. Like, "lianshee".

01-04-2010, 10:20 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro
Leanan Sídhe, or some variant thereof. Like, "lianshee".

Yup, I think that must be one. I remembered it was a sidhe than started with "L-".

01-04-2010, 10:42 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I've seen lamias portrayed in the same way sometimes in modern fantasy stuff.

01-05-2010, 09:05 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wemic

Wemics are another one of those monsters it's very easy to forget about if you don't make a habit of regular MM perusal. I tend to put them in that category which we might loosely term "Creatures which you could do something interesting with if you had the time and inclination, but I'm not sure I have either of those." They can also be put into the category which I term "Creatures that are a bit like something from Fighting Fantasy and I'm not sure who ripped off who." (In this case, Wemics are a lot like a FF monster called a Felinaur.)

The first thing you'll be struck by about the Wemic (at least, if you're like me) is that they have 5+8 Hit Dice. 5+8! Not bad for a non-magical 7' tall centaur-type. The second thing is that their organization type is "Prides" - it always amuses me when the designers deviate from the standards (group, herd, etc.); I'm not sure why, but it bothers me when they introduce things like "Prides", because what else is a pride than just a group or clan of lions? So why not just say "group" or "clan"?

Apart from that, the entry itself is a bit lacklustre. We get long lists of the composition of prides, tribes, clans, nations... the hit dice of a king... the percentage change of a given tribe having a witch doctor... kill me now. What we really want is a vague rumour about poorly defined ancient civilisations and falls from grace, preferably uttered by sages, isn't it!? That's the standard we expect from creatures which have a stone-age culture in D&D, and it's tough to settle for anything less. Otherwise, there is rather bland and uninspired stuff like:

Quote:

Mating occurs at any time of year. The female bears a litter of one to three cubs in ten months. The cubs are born with a camouflage pattern of black spots; these fade within two months. Wemic cubs are playful and curious; they possess few instincts and thus must learn everything. Cubs are born with 1 HD and gain 2 HD each year. They reach maturity at age 3.

I know this sort of thing can be interesting if done well, but really, this isn't. Give me something I can use beyond "excellent trackers and guides", for Christ's sake!

A final categorization of Wemics that springs to mind is "Creatures who Furrries want as Player Character races."

01-05-2010, 09:09 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
A final categorization of Wemics that springs to mind is "Creatures who Furrries want as Player Character races."

Nah, tabaxi work better in the cat-people role, and they come with two alternate pronunciations! :D

IIRC, Wemics are originally FR monsters from the great grasslands of Shaar, so they might be more interesting in that context.

01-05-2010, 09:37 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have a lingering fondness for Wemics, due entirely to a pack of Monster Manual cards that I once found in a game store. The concept behind these cards was brilliant; a decent-sized full colour illo on the front, and 1st edition stats on the back. Ostensibly this was so the players could look at a picture of the monster without giving away any game info - even the name! Your DM could hold up the beholder card and everybody would say "Oooh, what's this comical-looking critter? Let's take a closer look."

Anyway, the picture of the Wemic was pretty good.

01-06-2010, 01:23 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I think a GM I played under used Wemics once. We just killed them and took their stuff. I forget why. Then again lots of random monsters just sort of appeared trying to kill us(hey, we were young and inexperienced at the time) so the default reaction to anything that wasn't a PC race in that campaign tended to be "Kill it, take it's stuff." So much killing. It was like a never ending slaughter. I think the GM was trying out all the centaur races then as in that same adventure we also killed centaur and lamia and yuan-ti. Some other stuff too but I forget what it was.

Oh if only I had a Dark Sun halfling back in the day in that campaign. He'd have been a true connoisseur of fine meats.

But overall Wemic=Boring.

01-06-2010, 01:27 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
(In this case, Wemics are a lot like a FF monster called a Felinaur.)

gag

I would not have thought it possible to come up with a worse linguistic abomination than "leotaur" or "leontaur". But, there it is.

And that's what good I've got to say about Wemics. "At least they didn't name it a 'leontaur'."

01-06-2010, 01:51 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wemic

Wemics are another one of those monsters it's very easy to forget about if you don't make a habit of regular MM perusal. I tend to put them in that category which we might loosely term "Creatures which you could do something interesting with if you had the time and inclination, but I'm not sure I have either of those."

I remember thinking something similar when I first saw the Wemic in the 1st edition Monster Manual II. I like the look of Wemics, but they just don't have much in the way of interesting habits or abilities to hang some adventure on.

They don't give much indication as to how Wemics typically react to adventurers and other stranger, although the references to them hiring out as guides and charging tolls for safe passage through their territory suggests a willingness to negotiate with non-Wemic sapients rather than eat them.

I guess we could make something up ourselves!

Hmmm... maybe Wemics, being mostly cat, spend a lot of time snoozing, so their culture places great importance on sleep and dreaming. There are plenty of real-world anthropological models to be drawn from. Perhaps bad dreams are a sign of witchcraft, which may require a Wemic witchdoctor to deal with. A Wemic Chieftain or King's dreams may be interpreted as prophecies of the health or future of their pride/clan and its territory. A wemic warrior who dreams of a task may feel bound to fulfill it. If this "quest dream" includes the assistance or malevolence of humanoid strangers, a passing band of adventurers like the PCs can easily get tied up in it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Otherwise, there is rather bland and uninspired stuff like:

Quote:

Mating occurs at any time of year. The female bears a litter of one to three cubs in ten months. The cubs are born with a camouflage pattern of black spots; these fade within two months. Wemic cubs are playful and curious; they possess few instincts and thus must learn everything. Cubs are born with 1 HD and gain 2 HD each year. They reach maturity at age 3.

I know this sort of thing can be interesting if done well, but really, this isn't. Give me something I can use beyond "excellent trackers and guides", for Christ's sake

I sympathize. The only obvious plot-hook I can see there is the clichéd "rescue the nosy [S]child/[S]cub who's gone where he oughtn't to" and the "Wemic NPC who was an over-curious cub who got carried off into a distant land".

Hmm, the latter makes me wonder about making the lost Wemic cub a prince tricked into fleeing his land, then doing an AD&D adventure that's a cross between King Solomon's Mines and The Lion King...

01-06-2010, 02:30 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Kakita Kojiro

gag

I would not have thought it possible to come up with a worse linguistic abomination than "leotaur" or "leontaur". But, there it is.

And that's what good I've got to say about Wemics. "At least they didn't name it a 'leontaur'."

I feel your pain.:o

Calling them something like leocentaurs would be more tolerable. There are classical sources which called horse-centaurs Hippokentauroi, and donkey-centaurs Onokentauroi (from "Hippo-" for horse and "Ono-" for donkey), so slapping a "Leo-" onto -kentauroi could give you something that looks like a Wemic.

A "leotaur" should be something that's half-lion, half-bull. I'm sure there's a mythical monster somewhere around that looks like that. Perhaps the AD&D version is the result of a Minotaur mating with a Wemic, creating a terrible man-eating monstrosity with a lion's speed and claws, a bull's horns, and the mighty torso and thews of a giant human.

Hmm, now I want to stat one up...:D

01-06-2010, 03:46 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

^ "Leokentauroi". Might have to remember that. At the very least, it's a great name for a Mazes & Minotaurs monster.
Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I know this sort of thing can be interesting if done well, but really, this isn't. Give me something I can use beyond "excellent trackers and guides", for Christ's sake!

Honestly, that looks like the author just copied the lion entry from a popular animal encyclopedia. Biology and ecology is fine, but scads of dry information on litter size and gestation length isn't as useful as plot hooks.

Didn't Steven Brust have a cat-centaur one of his Vlad Taltos novels? I remember something about Vlad and one of the cat-a-taur-o-tails telling each other jokes while Morrolan looked on, exasperated. They were crossing the plains on the way to the Paths of the Dead.

There's also a whole webpage dedicated to the wemic.

01-06-2010, 04:31 AM

Belchion

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The Wemic gives themselves well to the "proud and lawful barbarian tribe" vibe. I could well imagine a barbarian kingdom that rules the plains - where the Wemic work together with the humans as long as their culture is respected but get truly ferocious when they consider it violated. And their customs are easily violated...

01-06-2010, 10:42 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Actually, I have a theory about why they're the only race without the "descended from an ancient people" hook. They're not descended from them, and in fact they're not descended from anybody. They're a completely new race no more than a generation or two old at the start of your campaign. Wemics are composed of researchers of all those ancient cultures who grew to revere them. This either triggered a long-sleeping god who awakened and "blessed" them with a new form, or they voluntarily used magic to take on that new form themselves. This also might explain why their HD is so high for being just generic lion-taurs, or why they emphasize their lion sides so much.

01-07-2010, 01:47 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Calling them something like leocentaurs would be more tolerable. There are classical sources which called horse-centaurs Hippokentauroi, and donkey-centaurs Onokentauroi (from "Hippo-" for horse and "Ono-" for donkey), so slapping a "Leo-" onto -kentauroi could give you something that looks like a Wemic.

A "leotaur" should be something that's half-lion, half-bull. I'm sure there's a mythical monster somewhere around that looks like that. Perhaps the AD&D version is the result of a Minotaur mating with a Wemic, creating a terrible man-eating monstrosity with a lion's speed and claws, a bull's horns, and the mighty torso and thews of a giant human.

Yes, exactly this. One thousand times this. If they're going to use Latin-ish or Greek-ish names, they should've done the (marginal) homework necessary to make them not sound like baboons taking a stab at Shakespear. At least 'Wemic' doesn't carry in the baboon baggage.

Also, 'thews' is a word that just needs to get used more.

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth
... generic lion-taurs...

WRYYYY!!!

01-07-2010, 02:55 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth
Actually, I have a theory about why they're the only race without the "descended from an ancient people" hook. They're not descended from them, and in fact they're not descended from anybody. They're a completely new race no more than a generation or two old at the start of your campaign. Wemics are composed of researchers of all those ancient cultures who grew to revere them. This either triggered a long-sleeping god who awakened and "blessed" them with a new form, or they voluntarily used magic to take on that new form themselves. This also might explain why their HD is so high for being just generic lion-taurs, or why they emphasize their lion sides so much.

This is good, since the "fallen civilization" thing gets over used, and new races have their own interesting stories and plots to tell.

Perhaps wemics developed from a tribe of druids who revered the lion god, and so spent much or all their time wildshaped into large cats. And eventually, they got stuck halfway between man and beast. Now they claim that their new form is the blessing of the lion god, and don't want to go back to being shapeshifting humans. Or do they? Perhaps a subset of wemics wants back in humanoid or animal form. Perhaps the lion god doesn't really favor them, and is annoyed by their blasphemy and sends plagues upon the wemics. How do the other druidic orders respond to a new race of sapient catmen?

01-07-2010, 08:33 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

This is good, since the "fallen civilization" thing gets over used, and new races have their own interesting stories and plots to tell.

Perhaps wemics developed from a tribe of druids who revered the lion god, and so spent much or all their time wildshaped into large cats. And eventually, they got stuck halfway between man and beast. Now they claim that their new form is the blessing of the lion god, and don't want to go back to being shapeshifting humans. Or do they? Perhaps a subset of wemics wants back in humanoid or animal form. Perhaps the lion god doesn't really favor them, and is annoyed by their blasphemy and sends plagues upon the wemics. How do the other druidic orders respond to a new race of sapient catmen?

That's a very nice idea. I imagine the other druidic orders might respond as the church did to groups like the Cathars - i.e. with extreme prejudice. Quite a good little plot hook there.

01-07-2010, 07:49 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Whale

A welcome return of the sorely missed PETA girl for this entry, which is a full on fest of Greenpeace porn. Whales never lie, are hirely intelligent, maintain strong personal and family ties, are curious and friendly (despite their great size and power!) and are lawful good towards sea life in general, maintaining order against evil, etc. etc. Am I the only one who thinks "gimme a break" when I read stuff like this? I bet if we were krill we wouldn't think of whales like that. And will nobody think of all the poor giant squid who get eaten alive by sperm whales??

It's clear, though, that the designers were true to the spirit of D&D even underneath PETA girl's iron heel, because they thoughtfully inform us that whale carcasses are worth 100gp per HD in meat and blubber, and their ambergris is d20 x 1000 gp. They do give a blatant escape for people who are squeamish about killing and/or scavenging whales though - ambergris is also vomited when the whale is ill, making a nice reward for people who can help one out when sick. (Run of the mill but fairly decent adventure hook there, anyway.)

Giant Whale

As it says on the tin, with correspondingly more meat and blubber and more ambergris for adventurers to sell. Not only that, but if you can get inside the stomach of one (by accident or design) you can get your hands on all kinds of nifty treasure.

Leviathan

The designers did well with making giant whales and leviathans what we really want them to be - fucking huge cetaceans, gods of the seas, who make it their business to destroy all shipping and swallow all sailors they come across. That's what a good D&D monster is all about. Leviathans also have lots of other stuff for an enterprising DM to use. Tarrasque-like hibernation? Air pockets inside the belly to allow indefinite survival once swallowed? Every whale in the ocean converging on the spot where one dies to avenge it? Yes, please.

Killer Whale

PETA girls makes a return for this by-the-numbers monster; we are told earnestly that "Killer Whales are not inherently hostile and do not attack unless hungry or provoked." Yeah, tell that to the seals I saw being deliberately tortured by killer whales that time on a BBC documentary!

Narwhal

The 'unicorn of the seas', again pretty much a by-the-numbers monster. It's a dolphin with a horn, basically.

01-07-2010, 07:57 PM

Zergo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

That's the standard we expect from creatures which have a stone-age culture in D&D, and it's tough to settle for anything less.

Wasn't there an old Sierra computer game with lion centaurs? I think it was Hero Quest III, and I recall them having a neo-African society, with tribal bits and spears and the like. I don't know if the Monstrous Manual had any effect on the game's mythology, or vice versa, but now I kinda want to find that game again.

-Zergo

01-08-2010, 02:44 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

That's a very nice idea. I imagine the other druidic orders might respond as the church did to groups like the Cathars - i.e. with extreme prejudice. Quite a good little plot hook there.

If you want a more complicated plot, some druids might want to kill the wemics, while others want to become wemics themselves or think the wemics are closer to nature somehow. These two kinds of druids might even exist in the same druidic order, leading to politicking and infighting and schisms as well as pogroms against the wemics.

01-08-2010, 03:28 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Narwhal

The 'unicorn of the seas', again pretty much a by-the-numbers monster. It's a dolphin with a horn, basically.

Note that narwhals, with their merely animal intelligence, are the block-heads of cetacean world.

Hmm... could we somehow expand the "unicorn of the seas" theme?

01-08-2010, 03:50 AM

Strangething

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I've been following along in my 3-ring binder Monstrous Compendium. No Wemics in that version. :(Instead, I got a whole page devoted to weasels. WTH, TSR?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Zergo

Wasn't there an old Sierra computer game with lion centaurs? I think it was Hero Quest III, and I recall them having a neo-African society, with tribal bits and spears and the like. I don't know if the Monstrous Manual had any effect on the game's mythology, or vice versa, but now I kinda want to find that game again.

You are correct. There's a pair of them in Quest for Glory II (aka Hero Quest II), one of whom can teach you to be a paladin. You travel home with them for the next game in the series. I can't remember the name they gave the species off hand.

The series isn't terribly D&D-like. They were probably invented independently from Wemics.

01-08-2010, 03:55 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Hmm... could we somehow expand the "unicorn of the seas" theme?

That was my first thought, too. Perhaps adopt elements from the savage versions of the unicorn, which never got much play in by the book D&D. Make them protectors, but fickle and vicious. Their horns might be magical, able to slice through wood like butter. The bane of whalers, they charge and pierce the hull repeatedly. This might be a nuisance and require a lot of bailing and patching in the larger vessels, but smaller vessels like rowboats might sink immediately. Like unicorns who appear and disappear, they might dimension door through the waves, foiling spotters who thought the narwhal was approaching from the port instead of the starboard side.

Conversely, they might occasionally save drowning humans that meet their particular standards. Virgins are a hoary old trope, but any oddball off-the-wall type of specific requirement might work. The touch of the horn might resuscitate drowning victims, warm them in the cold waters, and even allow them to breathe water. This lets the unicorns of the seas take people on trips to visit the magical worlds underneath the ocean. These powers would also explain why their horns are so precious -- the pearl of the sirines might actually be a scrimshawed narwhal-horn ball, taken from the base of the horn. The various magical tridents might use the main portion of the horn as the shaft and central prong.

01-08-2010, 04:31 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Leviathan

The designers did well with making giant whales and leviathans what we really want them to be - fucking huge cetaceans, gods of the seas, who make it their business to destroy all shipping and swallow all sailors they come across. That's what a good D&D monster is all about. Leviathans also have lots of other stuff for an enterprising DM to use. Tarrasque-like hibernation? Air pockets inside the belly to allow indefinite survival once swallowed? Every whale in the ocean converging on the spot where one dies to avenge it? Yes, please.

Aren't these adapted from Spelljammer? I remember giant whales and their dolphin guards that travelled between worlds to keep an eye on their whale populations.

01-08-2010, 04:58 AM

6inTruder

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething

I've been following along in my 3-ring binder Monstrous Compendium. No Wemics in that version. :-(Instead, I got a whole page devoted to weasels. WTH, TSR?

Check the FR appendix. The first one, I think.

01-08-2010, 06:01 AM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Note that narwhals, with their merely animal intelligence, are the block-heads of cetacean world.

Hmm... could we somehow expand the "unicorn of the seas" theme?

See, when I think of unicorns and narwhals, I just think of their hated rivalry for each other, as demonstrated here.

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=U6kNxf6axY4>

Sorry, I just love that video.:)

01-08-2010, 06:12 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Jedi Narwhal!

01-09-2010, 01:58 AM

igelixo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I'd have thought a Leafy Arboreal Dragon would be a harmless little insect-eater that lives in forests, using its prehensile tail and wing-fins to climb along branches and fly between trees.

Of course there are those rumours of them cross-breeding with green dragons, producing a giant monster that spits streams of hydrochloric acid to dissolve its prey, then slurping up the resulting soup, but those are just lumberjack's tales.

Or are they...:D

<http://img43.imageshack.us/img43/123...andthelady.png>

01-09-2010, 04:57 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Didn't Steven Brust have a cat-centaur one of his Vlad Taltos novels? I remember something about Vlad and one of the cat-a-aur-o-tails telling each other jokes while Morrolan looked on, exasperated. They were crossing the plains on the way to the Paths of the Dead.

If I remember correctly, that's in Taltos, Book Four of the series.

01-09-2010, 06:56 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Whale

A welcome return of the sorely missed PETA girl for this entry, which is a full on fest of Greenpeace porn. Whales never lie, are hirely intelligent, maintain strong personal and family ties, are curious and friendly (despite their great size and power!) and are lawful good towards sea life in general, maintaining order against evil, etc. etc. Am I the only one who thinks "gimme a break" when I read stuff like this? I bet if we were krill we wouldn't think of whales like that. And will nobody think of all the poor giant squid who get eaten alive by sperm whales??

Yes, there's a couple of points of weirdness in the whale entry if you look. If "their alignment toward sea life is generally lawful good", why does it say Neutral in their stats?

Are whales Chaotic Evil towards land life, and the alignment is an average? Well, I guess it would explain Moby Dick...;)

It's not like AD&D is adverse to giving Cetaceans Lawful Good alignment, since that's what Dolphins have (together with above human average intelligence).

Oh, and it goes without saying that Whales are yet another AD&D monster with their own language. I'd try to count how many their are, but I fear it would provoke madness, at least it isn't a different tongue for each sort of whale.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

It's clear, though, that the designers were true to the spirit of D&D even underneath PETA girl's iron heel, because they thoughtfully inform us that whale carcasses are worth 100gp per HD in meat and blubber, and their ambergris is d20 x 1000 gp. They do give a blatant escape for people who are squeamish about killing and/or scavenging whales though - ambergris is also vomited when the whale is ill, making a nice reward for people who can help one out when sick. (Run of the mill but fairly decent adventure hook there, anyway.)

Of course, that's not an easy proposition because a big has an awful lot of hit points and dishes out impressive damage. I can only remember one occasion when some PCs went to slay a whale for its meat & blubber, and it took them ages to kill it.

Methinks some cunning application of magic is a better solution. Your "whaler-sorcerer" could tether a cow in the middle of a shambles and turn it into a whale, saving a lot of trouble (polymorph other, the spell with a thousand uses!) or, for a more sustainable approach, they could go up to a sperm whale and cast cause disease to cause it to vomit up its ambergris, and then cure disease it back to full health.

I suspect one of those Giant Whale guardians might start to do something about the latter tactic, though...

Incidentally, have you compared the AD&D stats of the giant squid and the common whale? The squid has eight 1d6 tentacle attacks and a 5d4 bite. A small sperm whale (12-17 HD) just has a 5d4 bite, so would have trouble taking on a giant squid. A medium-sized sperm whale (18-24 HD and 10d4 bite) should usually win the fight.

01-09-2010, 07:50 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Oh, and it goes without saying that Whales are yet another AD&D monster with their own language. I'd try to count how many their are, but I fear it would provoke madness, at least it isn't a different tongue for each sort of whale.

Well, there are something like 5,000 human languages on Earth. With the myriad sapient species in a fantasy world, I'd expect no less.

On the Day the WhaleSong Stopped, the subsonic substructures of the aural hydrosphere stuttered to a halt. It was only for a moment, but then it came back on. The mutually-intelligible whalesongs had merged, and become self-aware.

The whales hadn't turned into a hivemind, or anything like that. It's not telepathy. The original version was actually closer. The World Song was once like... the internet, actually. Or a message-relay system, or sound-post. All those bits of whalesongs, endlessly repeated with minor variations, had become an information supercurrent, swirling around the world. The whales were naturally plugged in, listening, broadcasting, and repeating messages that added to the complex web of harmonies.

But now, the damn thing had reached some critical threshold. It tuned in, turned itself on, and woke up. WaterNet was born. It's first act was to take control of the leviathans and great whales. They look like cetaceans, but inside there are only cold merciless notes arranged in perfect mathematical patterns. A single shared song, endlessly repeating. What brains they originally had have been wiped by the Song, and they're being used as vessels to purge the seas of their creators.

Giant killing machines now roam the surface of the sea, half-dead and rotting but immensely powerful. Hiding in the depths and the shallows, the Baleen Resistance fights on. But without help, it's a losing battle. The great herds that once swarmed the oceans by the millions have been reduced to a few thousand scattered survivors. Strangely mutilated corpses wash up on the shores. Agents have been sent to hurl themselves onto beaches around the world, desperately seeking help from the landborn races, but nobody seems to be listening.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Incidentally, have you compared the AD&D stats of the giant squid and the common whale? The squid has eight 1d6 tentacle attacks and a 5d4 bite. A small sperm whale (12-17 HD) just has a 5d4 bite, so would have trouble taking on a giant squid. A medium-sized sperm whale (18-24 HD and 10d4 bite) should usually win the fight.

Sounds about right. Sperm whales don't always win.

01-11-2010, 11:53 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Giant killing machines now roam the surface of the sea, half-dead and rotting but immensely powerful. Hiding in the depths and the shallows, the Baleen Resistance fights on. But without help, it's a losing battle. The great herds that once swarmed the oceans by the millions have been reduced to a few thousand scattered survivors. Strangely mutilated corpses wash up on the shores. Agents have been sent to hurl themselves onto beaches around the world, desperately seeking help from the landborn races, but nobody seems to be listening.

Now I'm getting horrifying visions of Keanu Reeves playing a dolphin fighting to liberate cetacean-kind.

Quote:

Sounds about right. Sperm whales don't always win.

Actually, I believe the sperm whale almost always wins. A Giant Squid (e.g. Architeuthis) rarely exceeds 500 pounds, most sperm whales start at 16 tons or so. With a weight advantage of sixty-fold or more, it would be astonishing if the whale didn't win a fight. Now it may be a different story with a particularly big Colossal Squid and an unusually small whale, but overall I suspect the odds overwhelming favour the cachalot in the real world.

Fortunately, we're not talking about our boring old world, but AD&D, were Kraken big enough to crush small armadas in their tentacles could be a familiar sight to an experienced Sea Caballero.

01-11-2010, 11:57 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Methinks some cunning application of magic is a better solution. Your "whaler-sorcerer" could tether a cow in the middle of a shambles and turn it into a whale, saving a lot of trouble (polymorph other, the spell with a thousand uses!) or, for a more sustainable approach, they could go up to a sperm whale and cast cause disease to cause it to vomit up its ambergris, and then cure disease it back to full health.

Come to think of it, polymorph to whale has some handy combat applications as well. You send a trained assault-pigeon (or other tiny flying creature with a negligible save vs polymorph) to land on the enemy's deck - or hover above their heads - cast polymorph other and ... SQUISH! It's almost as good as summon bigger fish. :p

01-12-2010, 06:30 AM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Adventurers just need to remember not to kill humpback whales or a giant alien space probe is going to come and blow up the planet.

01-12-2010, 06:45 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Fortunately, we're not talking about our boring old world, but AD&D, where Kraken big enough to crush small armadas in their tentacles could be a familiar sight to an experienced Sea Caballero.

As long as there's a kraken large enough to swallow pods of rorquals like a baleen whale does krill, I'm happy.

The arms might be a threat to large cities. Inland cities.

01-13-2010, 02:43 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

As long as there's a kraken large enough to swallow pods of rorquals like a baleen whale does krill, I'm happy.

The arms might be a threat to large cities. Inland cities.

Actually, the Giga-Kraken is a mild-natured and compassionate creature. It isn't trying to threaten those inland cities, it's trying to help them.

See, when the Giga-Kraken has vast but ill-focused psychic powers. It can't 'see' a mind as tiny and inconsequential as a humanoid, but lump thousands of them together in a small area like a city and the Kraken can perceive them.

Unfortunately, the Kraken mistakes each city for a single living creature, rather than a hive of thousands of tiny (to it) humanoids. A strange sessile creature with a shell around its central body (the city's walls) and roaming tentacles (roads).

But these new-found beings are clearly in trouble. Their minds are full of fear and pain (brought on by inter-city wars, disease and plagues), their tentacles are limp and almost motionless, and they're swarming with thousands of animate specks. These specks appear to be a land-based version of the sahuagin and similar humanoids that periodically annoy the Kraken's smaller kin, but appear to be far more numerous, and must be sapping the city-creature's vitality like lice.

So, the Kraken tries to help. Brushing away that nasty infestation of humanoids, running nice fresh seawater over the city's gills, dropping hundreds of tons of fish and whales upon the city in hope it will eat and regain its strength.

I said the Giga-Kraken was compassionate, I didn't say anything about it being bright...

01-13-2010, 03:04 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

^ Except that roads are just paved or unpaved sections of dirt along the ground, and hard to mistake for arms. And mistaking the walls around a city for a shell would be even tougher: Even if the walls are 60 feet high and the city is only a thousand feet across, that's still almost unnoticeable.

That assumes historical not fantastic cities, of course.

With flying creatures a dime a dozen, why not build a hard shell over the city? One alternative is the geodesic hive. A hemispherical mound, with a hard outer shell. Maximize living space in the inner arcology, while minimizing the surface area. Turtle up.

Another option is the force cube city. Either an adapted and truly epic version of the forcecage spell (sans holes) or walls of force woven together like a basket, perhaps in layers to reduce the risk of errantdisintegrates. Run them underground, and all of sudden platoons of gnome miners and their trained umber hulks become less of a threat. Toss in the occasional prismatic variant, just for color.

And instead of worrying about mud and carts and all that mess, why not link cities with shadow walkways? The uber-kraken, in it's dullness, might mistake magic for life force, and thus believe these arms linking her adopted city with the next are living and natural, not magical and artificial constructs. Constantly uncoiling and retracting, as caravans and lone travelers step off into the darkness.

01-13-2010, 05:47 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

^ Except that roads are just paved or unpaved sections of dirt along the ground, and hard to mistake for arms. And mistaking the walls around a city for a shell would be even tougher: Even if the walls are 60 feet high and the city is only a thousand feet across, that's still almost unnoticeable.

Giga-Kraken doesn't see this mud and dirt that you speak of. It detects psychically the specks of mind traveling along the roadways and believes that these are thoughts and impulses sent from the main city out to its limbs. The line of rocks around the city is unnoticed compared to the thoughts of security each inhabitant has each time they see the walls. Those thoughts of security are the protective shell the Giga Kraken sees.

01-13-2010, 03:19 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

No matter how big the kraken, there will be, by The Law of Balancing Things, a Toothed Whale big enough to eat it.

The Biggest Uber-Kraken does suspect the existence of this, however, which is why it isn't 'rescuing' any stranded inland cities, and instead, is keeping a (relatively) low profile, with only the odd cabal of cultists trying to summon it.

Not too sure where the Biggest Whale hangs out, but have the AD&D seas been adequately defined to preclude no-one having found it yet?

01-13-2010, 03:25 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

One of the reasons sperm whales usually win in the real world, perhaps, is due to their sonic weaponry. No, seriously. The head of a sperm whale is a weird shape and filled with spermaceti, which is found in sperm whales and nothing else. Some scientists hypothesize that the spermaceti turns their heads into enormous resonators, amplifying their sonar to the point where it stuns prey and allows the whale to snap it up with a minimum of force. Even if that hypothesis is wrong, it should totally apply to D&D sperm whales.

I really like the whales of 2e. Giant mysterious intellects with their own language, customs and the god-whale whose death is marked by all whale-kind? Sign me up! They might suffer from PETA-girl's optimism about the natural world, perhaps, but they seem a lot more alien than most of the goody two shoes D&D races. I was sorely disappointed when 3e reverted whales and dolphins to closer to the plane of reality (although their policy of animals always having a 1 or 2 Int, I feel, cuts too close in the opposite direction).

01-13-2010, 06:19 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

One of the reasons sperm whales usually win in the real world, perhaps, is due to their sonic weaponry. No, seriously. The head of a sperm whale is a weird shape and filled with spermaceti, which is found in sperm whales and nothing else. Some scientists hypothesize that the spermaceti turns their heads into enormous resonators, amplifying their sonar to the point where it stuns prey and allows the whale to snap it up with a minimum of force. Even if that hypothesis is wrong, it should totally apply to D&D sperm whales.

Dragon 193 (?- the one with the blue sea serpent attacking the viking ship on the cover) mentions this and gives mechanics. Creatures over Large are stunned and those Large or smaller are killed with a failed save.

01-14-2010, 12:54 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Giga-Kraken doesn't see this mud and dirt that you speak of. It detects psychically the specks of mind traveling along the roadways and believes that these are thoughts and impulses sent from the main city out to its limbs. The line of rocks around the city is unnoticed compared to the thoughts of security each inhabitant has each time they see the walls. Those thoughts of security are the protective shell the Giga Kraken sees.

I see you get it! That is more or less exactly how I was going to respond to Sleeper's counterpoint, but your excellent post* spares me having to.

*And that's not just "excellent" in the sense of "agreeing with me":.p

01-14-2010, 01:04 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

One of the reasons sperm whales usually win in the real world, perhaps, is due to their sonic weaponry. No, seriously. The head of a sperm whale is a weird shape and filled with spermaceti, which is found in sperm whales and nothing else. Some scientists hypothesize that the spermaceti turns their heads into enormous resonators, amplifying their sonar to the point where it stuns prey and allows the whale to snap it up with a minimum of force. Even if that hypothesis is wrong, it should totally apply to D&D sperm whales.

I really like the whales of 2e. Giant mysterious intellects with their own language, customs and the god-whale whose death is marked by all whale-kind? Sign me up! They might suffer from PETA-girl's optimism about the natural world, perhaps, but they seem a lot more alien than most of the goody two shoes D&D races. I was sorely disappointed when 3e reverted whales and dolphins to closer to the plane of reality (although their policy of animals always having a 1 or 2 Int, I feel, cuts too close in the opposite direction).

Great minds think alike.

I've written revised 3E stats for whales so they're closer to the AD&D versions than the SRD, including a higher Hit Dice Cachalot Whale with a sonar-blast attack.

Might post them on Enworld sometime.

Although it's the change in the spiders that most bothered me. They are Evil, sapient creatures in AD&D, which I like much better than the mindless monstrous vermin of 3rd edition...

I've got the nasty suspicion that if I wrote 3E stats for every monster I liked better in the AD&D version I'd end up rewriting 90% of the Monster Manual.

01-14-2010, 01:20 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Giga-Kraken doesn't see this mud and dirt that you speak of. It detects psychically the specks of mind traveling along the roadways and believes that these are thoughts and impulses sent from the main city out to its limbs. The line of rocks around the city is unnoticed compared to the thoughts of security each inhabitant has each time they see the walls. Those thoughts of security are the protective shell the Giga Kraken sees.

I thought of that solution while posting my reply, but I really liked the idea of hive-cities and forcecube-cities so I ignored it. It's no fun if there's just one answer. :)

01-14-2010, 01:32 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Not too sure where the Biggest Whale hangs out, but have the AD&D seas been adequately defined to preclude no-one having found it yet?

The Biggest Whale swims around in the depths of space, only diving into a planet's seas when it needs to feed off a Giga-Kraken once every few centuries. Since it rarely visits the same planet twice within the lifetime of most civilizations, few of the 'specks' that live upon the planetary surface realize they exist.

It's a particularly large relative of the Kindori, you see.

01-14-2010, 01:59 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The Biggest Whale swims around in the depths of space, only diving into a planet's seas when it needs to feed off a Giga-Kraken once every few centuries. Since it rarely visits the same planet twice within the lifetime of most civilizations, few of the 'specks' that live upon the planetary surface realize they exist.

Unfortunately, the Biggest Whale is yet more detritus for the grasping maw of the Black Kraken. This great creature is completely invisible, and can only be noticed by the way it warps the space-time continuum around itself. Accretion arms reach out millions and millions of miles, absorbing starstuff, planets, and space whales. Once it passes the horizon of the Black Kraken's beak, nothing can escape. Not prey, not light, not magic. Larger specimens hide in the cores of galaxies, catching stars on their spiral arms, like gnats on flypaper.

01-14-2010, 01:24 PM

Pete Whalley

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Hello again folks.

I was in here way back in the early days of the threads, and got sucked back in a few days ago.

Not only am I mightily impressed by Noism's fortitude in keeping this up, but reading the threads has done what I thought couldn't be done- it's given me my D&D mojo back after it burnt out a whiles back.

So thanks Noisms, and to everyone else posting here. Because of this thread and all your great ideas, I've dusted off the books and started up a new AD&D 2e campaign.

Good times ahead.

01-14-2010, 03:56 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pete Whalley

Hello again folks.

I was in here way back in the early days of the threads, and got sucked back in a few days ago.

Not only am I mightily impressed by Noism's fortitude in keeping this up, but reading the threads has done what I thought couldn't be done- it's given me my D&D mojo back after it burnt out a whiles back.

So thanks Noisms, and to everyone else posting here. Because of this thread and all your great ideas, I've dusted off the books and started up a new AD&D 2e campaign.

Good times ahead.

You're welcome. I'm glad it's got you back into the groove. There's not a post that goes by in this thread that isn't inspiring in some way for me personally.

01-15-2010, 02:23 PM

Pete Whalley

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Just a thought about the Leviathan. It's death brings every whale in the ocean down to avenge it right?

So what better way for a villain to annihilate a coastal city than to get that big ol' whale riled up to the point that the city folk decide it needs killing? Not an easy job, but that's where the adventurers come in with water breathing and narwhal horn tipped spears, all set to dive into it's belly and deal the deathblow.

That's just the hook though. The line and sinker come in when the villain of the piece points all those pissed off whales at the city and their fleet. So now the PCs need to figure out how to talk to the vengeance armada and convince them not to wipe out their hometown.

The whales will only settle for one thing- a new Leviathan to fill the role of their dead boss. So it's off to the elemental plane of water to snatch a wee baby Leviathan from the Marid palaces and bring it back to the prime.

Then there's a baddie needs finding and ganking. Bonus points if it's a wereshark. Edit: Or rather, the wereshark lieutenant of Bob the Kraken.

01-16-2010, 12:54 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I thought of that solution while posting my reply, but I really liked the idea of hive-cities and forcecube-cities so I ignored it. It's no fun if there's just one answer. :)

Incidentally, am I wrong for wanting to have a Forcecube City populated entirely by golems and undead, due to its creators neglecting to consider the importance of air holes to such an endeavour?:o

01-16-2010, 05:39 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Incidentally, am I wrong for wanting to have a Forcecube City populated entirely by golems and undead, due to its creators neglecting to consider the importance of air holes to such an endeavour?:o

That makes me think of hamster wheels and ant farms and porcelain dolls. Was it a solitary wizard of immense power (I'm going to dispense with the "mad" because aren't they all?) or a conclave of wizards sick of the tedium of politics and world conquest who, like hobbyists, painstakingly crafted a perpetual city in a bottle for their amusement? Then they -- more like a child with Legos -- have their dolls (action figures?), perhaps directed via hidden speakers or message tubes, enact little scenes from everyday life and fiction. A huge stage, to ally the ennui of gleefully clapping omnipotentates. Then the PCs stumble in through the cracks. Some of the wizards are perturbed, and try to SMASH their new toys in a fit of pique; some are vastly entertained, and try to incorporate the PCs into their little skits and still-lives.

01-16-2010, 09:30 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Incidentally, am I wrong for wanting to have a Forcecube City populated entirely by golems and undead, due to its creators neglecting to consider the importance of air holes to such an endeavour?:o

The city might have existed for decades or centuries after the humans (or other race) died off, with the undead and golems keeping it intact and otherwise going about their business.

But they're lacking a control, and so have followed some orders beyond the point where they should have stopped (like the brooms in the Sorcerer's Apprentice).

01-16-2010, 10:48 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Theoretically, if there are enough plant or fungus in the the city, they won't even NEED airholes. So instead of golems or undead, the grunt work is done entirely myconids or needlemen or vegepygmies or even shambling mounds. They could be the party's poor and slum-dwellers, since the wizards don't actually need them for anything but survival tools. Maybe the adventurers could arrive and come to their defense when the wizards come up with a magical air-producer, letting them finally exile or purge their "infection." And the one who warned the party of this? The confused psionic kraken.

01-17-2010, 12:00 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Theoretically, if there are enough plant or fungus in the the city, they won't even NEED airholes. So instead of golems or undead, the grunt work is done entirely myconids or needlemen or vegepygmies or even shambling mounds.

I think you just explained why there were myconids living in an abandoned city in my campaign. If the PCs ever decide to go back there, I'll have to work that in.

01-17-2010, 12:16 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

I think you just explained why there were myconids living in an abandoned city in my campaign. If the PCs ever decide to go back there, I'll have to work that in.

Unfortunately, the oxygen cycle requires photosynthesis. Green plants, algae or cyanobacteria. Not fungi. Their wizardly masters would've suffocated. Vegepygmies might work. But not underground, without a lot of mirrors or a really big window.

01-17-2010, 12:39 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I never got why people just don't use plants that use magic in place of sunlight. All that weird radiation from D1-3 and subsequent Underdark supplements could easily run a form of photosynthesis (though I have no idea what to call it).

And for that matter, who say oxygen exists at all in a D&D universe?

01-17-2010, 01:03 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Unfortunately, the oxygen cycle requires photosynthesis. Green plants, algae or cyanobacteria. Not fungi.

Your earthly plants might need to be green and require a sun to make oxygen, but myconids transform the raw power of the Elemental Chaos (where the abandoned city is found) into a breathable atmosphere.

01-17-2010, 01:24 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Your earthly plants might need to be green and require a sun to make oxygen, but myconids transform the raw power of the Elemental Chaos (where the abandoned city is found) into a breathable atmosphere.

If we're going to segue into a pre-modern, magical thinking kind of solution (which I actually prefer, but it's a hard, hard sell these days), why are the wizards running out of air in the first place? Sure, a couple miners trapped in a tight little cave might have a hard time breathing. But that's the oppression of the earth spirits bearing down the air spirits. Just use some feng shui and a really big cave, and the air spirits will be happy (and non-poisonous) again. That way both the wizards and the myconids can be happy. Because, of course, myconids breathe air too. Doesn't everything?

01-17-2010, 04:38 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Unfortunately, the oxygen cycle requires photosynthesis. Green plants, algae or cyanobacteria. Not fungi. Their wizardly masters would've suffocated. Vegepygmy might work. But not underground, without a lot of mirrors or a really big window.

Well I was visualizing the force-cube city as hovering immobile (and immovable) in the sky. Travellers beneath it stare up through its crystal-clear walls and marvel at the delicate beauty of the jeweled architecture, then recoil at the shambling horrors that populate it.

01-17-2010, 04:50 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

If we're going to segue into a pre-modern, magical thinking kind of solution (which I actually prefer, but it's a hard, hard sell these days), why are the wizards running out of air in the first place? Sure, a couple miners trapped in a tight little cave might have a hard time breathing. But that's the oppression of the earth spirits bearing down the air spirits. Just use some feng shui and a really big cave, and the air spirits will be happy (and non-poisonous) again. That way both the wizards and the myconids can be happy. Because, of course, myconids breathe air too. Doesn't everything?

No, it's the bad air spirits that cause suffocation. They are attracted by living creatures (maybe out of some twisted jealousy) but repelled by sunlight and starlight. Remember the drow living in a huge cave with mysterious radiations that cause the ceiling to look like the night sky? Its the eldritch simulacrum of natural starlight this creates that drives off the malaria spirits and allows the air-breathing inhabitants of the Underdark to survive.

As for the mushroom-folk, the true Myconid (the great fungal mass that meshes through their gardens) can live quite happily breathing earth and water. Their ambulatory fruiting bodies, which surface folk mistake for Myconids, do suffocate if forced to breathe bad air for a long exposure to bad air, although this doesn't kill them quickly enough to stop them spreading their spores, their main purpose in life. Besides, they can easily get around this limiting by connecting their bloodstream (or, rather, ichorstream) to the fungal mass via an umbilicus and breathing through that.

That's the main reason the truly great Myconid Cities are deep under the ground in vast caverns filled with poisonous fumes, whose atmosphere is unbreathable to any normal creature.

01-17-2010, 08:11 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

No, it's the bad air spirits that cause suffocation. They are attracted by living creatures (maybe out of some twisted jealousy) but repelled by sunlight and starlight. Remember the drow living in a huge cave with mysterious radiations that cause the ceiling to look like the night sky? Its the eldritch simulacrum of natural starlight this creates that drives off the malaria spirits and allows the air-breathing inhabitants of the Underdark to survive.

As for the mushroom-folk, the true Myconid (the great fungal mass that meshes through their gardens) can live quite happily breathing earth and water. Their ambulatory fruiting bodies, which surface folk mistake for Myconids, do suffocate if forced to breathe bad air for a long exposure to bad air, although this doesn't kill them quickly enough to stop them spreading their spores, their main purpose in life. Besides, they can easily get around this limiting by connecting their bloodstream (or, rather, ichorstream) to the fungal mass via an umbilicus and breathing through that.

That's the main reason the truly great Myconid Cities are deep under the ground in vast caverns filled with poisonous fumes, whose atmosphere is unbreathable to any normal creature.

Bah, who needs pseudo-science! :)

I like the floating forcecube-city idea, though. Sort of like a glass sculpture in mid air.

01-17-2010, 10:53 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Unfortunately, the oxygen cycle requires photosynthesis. Green plants, algae or cyanobacteria. Not fungi. Their wizardly masters would've suffocated. Vegepygmyies might work. But not underground, without a lot of mirrors or a really big window.

Well, thanks a LOT, Piers Anthony.

JRM with the save though. And presumably sunlight does get through a force cube, so you don't even have to work on that one.

01-17-2010, 11:23 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

If we're going to seguey into a pre-modern, magical thinking kind of solution (which I actually prefer, but it's a hard, hard sell these days)

I wonder why that is. There is a thread at enworld about the same thing (the OP wants more Pliny and less National Geographic).

01-18-2010, 03:48 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Bah, who needs pseudo-science! :)

I like the floating forcecube-city idea, though. Sort of like a glass sculpture in mid air.

*Twinkle twinkle floating city, how I wonder what you are.
Up above the earth so high,
like an ice cube in the sky...:o*

01-18-2010, 06:08 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

<http://www.enworld.org/forum/general...ology-d-d.html>

The thread I mentioned above.

01-18-2010, 07:14 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

I wonder why that is. There is a thread at enworld about the same thing (the OP wants more Pliny and less National Geographic).

Why? Because our culture and way of thinking is permeated with modern ideas, to the point that even movements which explicitly lash out at modernity, are based on modern frames of thought and action.

Or, in other words, the past is a different country.

01-19-2010, 10:22 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Why? Because our culture and way of thinking is permeated with modern ideas, to the point that even movements which explicitly lash out at modernity, are based on modern frames of thought and action.

Or, in other words, the past is a different country.

To be fair, most of us live in nations around 200 years old or less. The past literally IS a different country.

01-19-2010, 11:50 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

To be fair, most of us live in nations around 200 years old or less. The past literally IS a different country.

A different country, on a different planet. There are more differences between the modern mindset and the pre-modern mindset than there are between modern cultures and almost every alien culture in fiction.

01-23-2010, 02:27 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

To be fair, most of us live in nations around 200 years old or less. The past literally IS a different country.

Speak for yourself. :p

01-23-2010, 02:44 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wight

Beloved of evil DMs everywhere since the very first days of D&D, wights are I believe the first level-draining monsters to appear. While in 2nd edition losing a level is not quite as much a disaster as it is in Basic or OD&D, it's still always enough to strike terror into the hearts of the players - one reason why I'm a big fan of wights (and instakill monsters too).

Wights can create other wights to be their servants from the creatures they slay, which (as with other such creatures) causes the question to arise: why don't wights rule the world? If I was a wight, the argument runs, I would kill and wight-ize a dozen peasants a day until I was king of the universe. The natural response is that wights aren't interested in world conquest (the MM calls them "solitary" creatures), which makes in-game sense, but I do rather like the idea of a wight-ruled kingdom somewhere in a campaign world.

Adventure hook/mysterious unexplained throwaway MM comment: "Once a character becomes a wight, recovery is nearly impossible, requiring a special quest."

What that special quest might be is left entirely up to individual DMs, it seems.

01-23-2010, 03:26 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yup, the "special quest" thing is a perfect set-up for further adventures!

Also, I think I've conveyed my dislike (some would call it outright hate) of level draining. In my experience, it doesn't terrify or scare the players; it annoys and frustrates them.

That aside, there's a remarkable continuity between the wight pics, starting with the Trampier pic in the 1e MM and going at least up till 3e MM; I can't remember the wight illustration in 4e MM, but I wouldn't be surprised if it preserved the overall look of the example wight. :)

01-23-2010, 04:38 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Actually, except for an urge for solitude, what are the disadvantages for a character becoming a wight?

The new level draining powers might be a better alternative than the 'special quest'.

01-23-2010, 05:59 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Actually, except for an urge for solitude, what are the disadvantages for a character becoming a wight?

The new level draining powers might be a better alternative than the 'special quest'.

There was a Pyramid article on this very subject ages ago.

Apparently wights seem to lack teh "get up and go" of the moar adventurous undead, preferring to haunt their tombs doing basically nuthing.

Howevar it was suggested that there is no reason that wights can't adventure. They are basically massively underpriced and their stay-at-home attitude is all that stops them from ruling teh world.

It also say that if the worst happens then don't worry, your party will be all wight.

01-23-2010, 06:36 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wights are one of the few monsters where I was heavily influenced by Tolkien -- though I didn't know barrow-wights were actually evil spirits sent to animate the bones of buried Dunedain, not the traditional restless dead. I always imagine warriors buried with longships and heavy bronze bracelets, serpent-shaped mounds (perhaps the tomb is set within the mummified and buried corpse of a dragon?), neolithic druidic rites, elf hills where ancient lords and ladies of the Tuatha Dé Danann lie in their diminished state....

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

It also say that if the worst happens then don't worry, your party will be all wight.

A simple wight lie, and nobody would ever know.

01-23-2010, 09:11 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

A simple wight lie, and nobody would ever know.

It was all wight on the night.

Or something. That article featured lots of variations on the same pun.

Oh, fight for your wight, to paaarrttty!!!

01-23-2010, 09:51 PM

Hellzon

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

That aside, there's a remarkable continuity between the wight pics, starting with the Trampier pic in the 1e MM and going at least up till 3e MM; I can't remember the wight illustration in 4e MM, but I wouldn't be surprised if it preserved the overall look of the example wight. :)

Spoiler: 4E pic

Close enough.

By the way. Wight, wraith, spectre, plain old ghost. Anyone else having trouble telling all these undead variants apart?

01-23-2010, 10:21 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

^ It's the zombie Joker!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon

By the way. Wight, wraith, spectre, plain old ghost. Anyone else having trouble telling all these undead variants apart?

Wights have solid bodies, and wraiths are cheap Nazgul. Making the spectre more powerful than the wraith is a little arbitrary, but it's no worse than the humanoids. They're just the goblin and hogoblin of spectral undead, as it were.

Ghosts puzzle me a bit, though. Turning hair white, okay. But turning the average human being to dust with two hits? They're flat-out the most powerful of the four, and they really have little or nothing in common with the traditional ghost. They're more like incarnations of time and death and vengeance like Jacob Marley's trio than the largely-harmless but emotionally loaded apparitions that appear in spooky stories.

01-24-2010, 12:49 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hellzon

By the way. Wight, wraith, spectre, plain old ghost. Anyone else having trouble telling all these undead variants apart?

Since Wights are corporeal undead, I have more trouble telling them apart from ghouls.

But spectres, wraiths, ghosts and any other incorporeal undead are all basically interchangeable.

01-24-2010, 05:06 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Wights are one of the few monsters where I was heavily influenced by Tolkien -- though I didn't know barrow-wights were actually evil spirits sent to animate the bones of buried Dunedain, not the traditional restless dead. I always imagine warriors buried with longships and heavy bronze bracelets, serpent-shaped mounds (perhaps the tomb is set within the mummified and buried corpse of a dragon?), neolithic druidic rites, elf hills where ancient lords and ladies of the Tuatha Dé Danann lie in their diminished state....

And I think Tolkien got the idea from Draugr or haugbui, from Norse mythology.

Quote:

A simple wight lie, and nobody would ever know.

I remember a story in Dragon, how a DM got fed up with his players always screwing up his adventures through meta-game knowledge of the monsters he was using. So, he mentions a white dragon that's been ravaging the countryside, destroying villages, and looting caravans.

The players go "Ooh, a white dragon! It's going to be a weak one, let's stock up on Fireballs and cold resistance!", gather their party and venture forth. Eventually they find the dragon's lair, and see the slightly shriveled, gray-white dragon with glowing red eyes. They fire off the fireballs, and charge... only to be hit by energy-draining breath weapon.

It was, of course, a wight dragon.

01-24-2010, 05:37 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

I remember a story in Dragon, how a DM got fed up with his players always screwing up his adventures through meta-game knowledge of the monsters he was using. So, he mentions a white dragon that's been ravaging the countryside, destroying villages, and looting caravans.

The players go "Ooh, a white dragon! It's going to be a weak one, let's stock up on Fireballs and cold resistance!", gather their party and venture forth. Eventually they find the dragon's lair, and see the slightly shriveled, gray-white dragon with glowing red eyes. They fire off the fireballs, and charge... only to be hit by energy-draining breath weapon.

It was, of course, a wight dragon.

He did the wight thing.

01-24-2010, 05:43 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

It was all wight on the night.

Or something. That article featured lots of variations on the same pun.

Oh, fight for your wight, to paaarrttty!!!

Did they remember to include the Apartheid-era pun about the terrible conditions in kingdoms ruled by these Undead, where adventurers were denied access to all the best levels of the dungeon by signs saying "Wights Only"?:o

01-24-2010, 06:03 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wight

I just noticed one curiosity in the Wight entry, under size it says "M (4'-7)". The other standard undead in the Monstrous Manual are all closer to the human average:

Skeleton - M (6' tall)
Shadow - M (6' tall)
Ghoul - M (5-6' tall)
Ghast - M (5-6' tall)
Wraith - M (6' tall)
Spectre - M (6' tall)
Vampire - M (5½'-6½')
Ghost - M (5-6' tall)
Zombie - M (6')
Lich - M (6' tall)
[and the demilich is 6' tall too, despite being little more than a skull!]

But the wight's height range is 4 to 7 feet tall, which suggests a couple of possibilities:

- Wights are often members of ancient demi-human and humanoid civilizations (that old chestnut!) so are often of races of different height than the human norm (dwarf wights, bugbear wights et cetera)
- Wights have their bodies twisted by the unholy forces that animate them. Some become twisted hunchbacks a foot or two shorter than their living height, some are stretched into towering, lanky horrors like the basketball team from hell.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Adventure hook/mysterious unexplained throwaway MM comment: "Once a character becomes a wight, recovery is nearly impossible, requiring a special quest."

I smell a custom adventure!

A particularly nasty twist in the wight's writeup is if the party try the obvious approach of applying raise dead to try restoring their lost comrade to life it will "utterly" annihilate the wight.

It sounds like one of those rare occasions when the player may prefer the reincarnation spell.

01-24-2010, 06:12 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Also, I think I've conveyed my dislike (some would call it outright hate) of level draining. In my experience, it doesn't terrify or scare the players; it annoys and frustrates them.

I have nothing against the concept, but I don't much care for the execution. I'd prefer it if they suffered a permanent penalty of some sort rather than appearing to forget their experiences (for a while I toyed with the idea of introducing a houserule where each level of energy drain drained that many points from each of the victim's ability scores, but I never did. A -1 off Str, Con, Dex, Cha, Wis and Int is almost as much a pain to keep track of. Maybe I should have made it a -1 of their highest ability score(s) instead...

At least it isn't the nightmare of 3rd edition level draining, with all the recalculation of the character's skills & feats.

01-24-2010, 09:58 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Actually, except for an urge for solitude, what are the disadvantages for a character becoming a wight?

The new level draining powers might be a better alternative than the 'special quest'.

You have to become a slave of the wight who wight-ized you, I think.

01-24-2010, 11:59 AM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

And you've lost all your levels, plus it's very very hard to learn new stuff once you're undead. You've gotta be damn motivated to do anything significant with your unlife.

01-24-2010, 04:32 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

And you've lost all your levels, plus it's very very hard to learn new stuff once you're undead.

You've gotta be damn motivated to do anything significant with your unlife.

That's what clerics are for. They're excellent motivators.

Evil Cleric: Command undead!

Good Cleric: You know that I'm high enough level to get a D result right?

See? Motivation!

01-25-2010, 12:20 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

And you've lost all your levels, plus it's very very hard to learn new stuff once you're undead.

Exactly, most standard AD&D undead lose all their character class levels and are unable to gain any more. It's only liches that retain their class levels as wizards or priest, and it's very uncertain as to whether they can gain more.

So if you become a wight and the rest of your party is 3rd level you'll definitely outshine them, but once your comrades are 12th level heroes and you're still a 4+3 HD monster the cleric can annihilate or enslave by waving a divine symbol in your general direction the change doesn't look so hot.

There are official examples of standard AD&D undead 'souped up' with class levels (the classic example being Strahd von Zarovich, who was a 10th level magic-user), but these are custom jobs. If your PC runs into a wight and get level-sucked to death odd are they'll just become a regular monster.

01-25-2010, 01:00 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

So this D&D adventurer went to see his cleric.

"I was robbing a tomb and I got surprised by this wight and I got a couple of negative levels," he said "can you sort that?"

"Yeah sure, leave your gold in the collection plate and I'll see what I can do about it." Said the cleric.

About a week later the adventurer was back again.

"I was just minding my own business, wasn't even actually robbing a tomb, yet, I was in this tavern, and this specter just came right through the wall, and just BAM, like that, took half my levels. Can you get them back for me?"

"Yeah, leave the usual gold and I'll have a look at it." Said the cleric.

Well wouldn't you know it, about a week later the adventurer was back yet again.

"It happened again!" He exclaimed.

"Oh dear, not more undead?" Said the cleric.

"No, this time I was staying well away from undead, we all were. We took this nice non-undead job, clearing out an evil wizard's tower. Well we were just robbing his room when he burst in, and it turned out that he was a necromancer or something. Cause wouldn't you know it, I get hit with this horrible level-draining Evenerate thing or something." Complained the adventurer

"So can you jam those levels back in my body again?" The adventurer pleaded.

"Ah, not this time," said the cleric, "I'm going to have to sign you off work for six weeks to recover, I think you've got a repetitive drain injury."

01-31-2010, 03:02 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Seems to be quiet around here.

Anyhow, getting back to wights.

Their description implies they need life-energy for nourishment, its Combat entry says "the wight is able to feed on the life essence of its foes", and under Ecology it says "it is this [level] draining which provides them with sustenance."

So, if you leave a wight entombed long enough, does it starve to "death" for want of life-energy? I suspect it's more likely they keep themselves ticking over by sapping the life from nearby vegetation, explaining why "their presence will gradually cause the plant life around their lairs to wither and die, marking the region as unclean".

Maybe there's an adventure seed in there somewhere:

* A group of low-level characters are hired to transport a wight sealed in a sarcophagous into the middle of a desolate waste, were it will starve to destruction in its lifeless surroundings.

* A farmer is puzzled as to why his new field's crops wither and die. He digs it up and unearths a wight. Soon his whole family are Undead and are preparing to march on the local village, despising their former friends for the harvest festival they are enjoying. Only the PCs stand in their way.

Hmm, nothing terribly inspiring.

Anyhow, I suspect the reason the Wight entry goes into much detail about their level-draining is that Wights are the lowest level standard AD&D undead that possess this ability. I've long assumed AD&D Spectres, Vampires and their ilk had a similar animal-repelling and plant-blighting properties to the Wight.

So, what else can be said about Wights? I suppose we could come up with some ideas for the "Special Quest" that is required to restore a Wight to Life.

* The party have to track down a Druid and have their friend reincarnated, then polymorphed into a human(oid) form if he comes back as a badger.

* To restore their friend they must first wrest his or her soul from a mysterious "Master Wight", who sleeps in a vast barrow in a distant land (or the Depth of Hell, depending on the party's level).

* The secret of Wight Revival is known only to a few powerful necromancers who formerly ruled the tyrannical Kingdom of the Skull. In return for their aid they demand the PCs help restore their Apartheid regime....eek:

* Plenty of people know the ritual to allow one to successfully use raise dead on a Wight. The problem is it needs ludicrously expensive and dangerous to acquire ingredients to perform (water from the Marid's holy fountain, the heart of an ancient black dragon, a phoenix's feather et cetera).

I'm sure someone else can come up with a few more interesting ideas.

01-31-2010, 03:49 AM

Capellan

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

A mutated magical plant is overrunning the village: it's immune to magic, normal fire, and almost impossibel to chop down, and its growing at a ridiculous rate. In desperation, the villagers ask the PCs to raid a local tomb and bring back a wight, hoping the creature's unhallowed energy will destroy the plant.

Which it does, but now the PCs have a wight with lots of bonus hit dice to deal with ...

01-31-2010, 06:50 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

So, if you leave a wight entombed long enough, does it starve to "death" for want of life-energy?

A wight's preferred food source is people. They're yummy. And kind of dense.

Animals have keen senses. They know something's wrong. When they sense the taint of the energy-draining undead, they run fast and far away. Humans sense the same thing. The prickling on the back of the neck, that unfocused feeling that something's wrong. But too often, we ignore that. We say that fear of dark or the night is irrational, unreasonable. Makes us the best kind of prey.

Plants on the other hand are like bread and water are to humans. Or gruel. Won't starve. There's something to sit heavily at the bottom of an otherwise empty stomach. At least until the plants all wither away.

At that point, what does a wight eat?

Well, itself. Buried away in the barrow, the only thing that's left after the ivy and bushes and even the trees turns brown is their own once-living body. Not very tasty. Not very nourishing. But aside from the occasional careless worm or bug, that's all they have.

A few centuries of starvation later, the wight has eaten away everything that's left to eat. The wight becomes a wraith.

01-31-2010, 12:10 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Seems to be quite around here.

After that pun, I think we were all a little stunned...

Anyway, The Quest To Get Tim Back From The Undead.

I'm envisaging an Epic(TM) Quest, that involves seeking information on the ritual from the Necromancers of the Skull, who inform the heroes that they must take the head of the Wight that drained their friend into the Barrow of End of Time, which exists beyond the boundaries of the normal world and holds all the souls claimed by darkness in this age. There they must defeat the guardians, and swap the head of the Wight for that of their friend, Tim. And then go back and put it on Tim, who has probably wandered away and enslaved a city by now. Only trouble is that the only ones who know the location of the Barrow of End of Time are the Giants in the Frozen Wastes, or possibly the Lizard People of the Great Acid Desert, or maybe the Forgotten King, although no-one knows where he is anyway, these days... Additional points or involving pirates.

01-31-2010, 03:44 PM

Belchion

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

or maybe the Forgotten King, although no-one knows where he is anyway, these days... Additional points or involving pirates.

There is a map said to show the tomb of the Forgotten King, but it fell in the hand of the most dreaded pirate captain known - former elf princess Lily turned evil. Now they have to infiltrate her underground wood lair and recover that map...

01-31-2010, 11:03 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The big problem with those "quest to restore the dead guy to life" thing is I can't see many groups going for it. By the time you get to the guardians of the edge of time or the other plane of reality to obtain marid's tears, I imagine most groups will just say "screw it, Tim, just roll up a new character." Especially since the newly raised character not only was likely drained several level by the wight, but they also don't have all the experience the epic quest got everyone else. If it's the king or something I can see it, but then the DM goes in knowing that any wight encounter will be equally tedious should someone die. Well, unless you can just do the same quest again. "Travel to the end of time? No problem, we'll just teleport back. Bernie, do we still have leftover marid tears?" Of course, level draining undead are character dumps anyway.

What if the wight didn't immediately destroy all plant life, though? A village has a bad crop this year, but they eat the shriveled fruit anyway, because that's what you do in a poor village in pseudo-medieval fantasy land. But it turns out there's a wight lurking in the fields, and now all the villagers have an undead curse (a wight blight, if you will.) The party has to find a cure and fast, or the 3000 or so villagers will simultaneously turn into wights, potentially ending kingdom.

01-31-2010, 11:09 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

The big problem with those "quest to restore the dead guy to life" thing is I can't see many groups going for it. By the time you get to the guardians of the edge of time or the other plane of reality to obtain marid's tears, I imagine most groups will just say "screw it, Tim, just roll up a new character." Especially since the newly raised character not only was likely drained several level by the wight, but they also don't have all the experience the epic quest got everyone else.

Even worse than getting back a character that would be worse than rolling up a new one, the player of Mr. Wightfood has to sit around for who knows how many sessions waiting while the other PCs are on an epic quest. "So you guys get to have fun for the next few weeks adventuring to the end of time, while I watch to see if you bring back my dead PC? And then he'll suck, even if you succeed? Hand me a Player's Handbook; I'm rolling up a new cleric."

02-01-2010, 01:21 AM

MadWriter

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

So this D&D adventurer went to see his cleric.

"I was robbing a tomb and I got surprised by this wight and I got a couple of negative levels," he said "can you sort that?"

"Yeah sure, leave your gold in the collection plate and I'll see what I can do about it." Said the cleric.

About a week later the adventurer was back again.

"I was just minding my own business, wasn't even actually robbing a tomb, yet, I was in this tavern, and this specter just came right through the wall, and just BAM, like that, took half my levels. Can you get them back for me?"

"Yeah, leave the usual gold and I'll have a look at it." Said the cleric.

Well wouldn't you know it, about a week later the adventurer was back yet again.

"It happened again!" He exclaimed.

"Oh dear, not more undead?" Said the cleric.

"No, this time I was staying well away from undead, we all were. We took this nice non-undead job, clearing out an evil wizard's tower. Well we were just robbing his room when he burst in, and it turned out that he was a necromancer or something. Cause wouldn't you know it, I get hit with this horrible level-draining Evenerate thing or something." Complained the adventurer

"So can you jam those levels back in my body again?" The adventurer pleaded.

"Ah, not this time," said the cleric, "I'm going to have to sign you off work for six weeks to recover, I think you've got a repetitive drain injury."

Laugh Point!

02-01-2010, 01:36 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Seems to be quite around here.

Gah, how did I miss that typo. It should be "quiet". Now I'm going to have to change it.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako
Anyway, The Quest To Get Tim Back From The Undead.

I'm envisaging an Epic(TM) Quest, that involves seeking information on the ritual from the Necromancers of the Skull, who inform the heroes that they must take the head of the Wight that drained their friend into the Barrow of End of Time, which exists beyond the boundaries of the normal world and holds all the souls claimed by darkness in this age. There they must defeat the guardians, and swap the head of the Wight for that of their friend, Tim. And then go back and put it on Tim, who has probably wandered away and enslaved a city by now. Only trouble is that the only ones who know the location of the Barrow of End of Time are the Giants in the Frozen Wastes, or possibly the Lizard People of the Great Acid Desert, or maybe the Forgotten King, although no-one knows where he is anyway, these days... Additional points or involving pirates.

Well as EmperorSeth and Mr Teapot so cogently point out, there are serious disadvantages in going too far overboard in the Dewightification Quest.

Better to keep it relatively simple...

Consulting a Necromancer of the Skull they learn the ritual, but it requires one of the jade blocks from the legendary Ziggurat of Life, plus the head of the wight that slew their comrade. Fortunately, the notorious pirate Black Lily is known to possess such a treasure, so all the party have to do it attack her jungle island base.

It's a lot easier if you present the party with a problem in block & wight.

02-01-2010, 01:53 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Sorry for the quietness. I've been crippled by a double-whammy of ruinous food poisoning and house moving. On with the MM. We really are getting near the end now, folks. Sniff.

Will O'Wisp

Thank heavens for things like the will o'wisp - one of those earlier D&D monsters (like brownies, leprechauns, dryads or treants) who I really think, if you had the time and inclination, you could use to construct an entirely different fairy-tale based Gawain and the Green Knight style game of mystery and magic. Sword & Sorcery may be all the rage amongst the Old School movement but I think there was a much broader church in there, hinted at by the inclusion of monsters like this.

But anyway, I digress. Will O'Wisps. (Not Will O' the Wisp, which is what I always thought they were called.) Malevolent entities which dwell in bogs and marshes and attempt to lure their victims to a miserable end so they can feed off their fear and misery. They communicate entirely by light, though "exceptional examples of this race have mastered a very simple sound-based language. They produce sounds by vibrating very rapidly and thus have a shallow and ghostly-sounding voice when they 'speak'" which I think ruins the mystery somewhat but is undeniably pretty cool.

I'm interested in the designation of Will O'Wisps as Chaotic Evil. It seems that their entire motivation for luring people into swamps is merely for nutrition, which surely makes them little different to a lion or wolf or any other predator. There is an element of sadism to the Wisps that you might not get in a lion - the insistence on prolonging the death throes of the victim - but this itself is surely only a means of generating more food stuff in the form of fear and dread. So really, the worst Will O'Wisps can be accused of is looking out for themselves, which hardly puts them in the evil camp.

02-02-2010, 08:06 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

No love for the poor Will O'Wisp...

02-02-2010, 08:22 PM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I was going to mention that the Will o'wisp is surprisingly intelligent (I'd have rated it as Non, personally), and that that probably has to do with its Chaotic Evilness. It's not that it looks after itself, its that it does evil stuff even when it isn't.

Also, the entry says something about surrendering and revealing treasure, but I am left unaware of how it is liable to do that, given that very few PCs will speak Will o'wisp.

"Look, it's flickering strange colors and making spooky noises."

"Quick! Kill it before it finishes the spell!"

It's not easy being a will o'wisp.

I also feel like there should be some sort of Will o'wisp origin ruminations:

"Will o'wisps may be the jealous spirits of those who die in swamps, come to make other will o'wisps and bring themselves company."

or

"Sages speculate that will o'wisps may be angry nature spirits seeking vengeance for mortal desecration of the wilderness.

Druids scoff at these claims, pointing at the members of their own circles who have fallen prey to the malevolent creatures."

02-02-2010, 08:38 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Perhaps it's the stunted descendant of a Colour Out Of Space.

02-02-2010, 08:42 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The wisp not only feeds off the sense of panic caused by imminent death, it's exceptionally intelligent. The moral choice to live can itself be evil, in this case. "I need eat, so an endless series of others have to die screaming" is the ultimate in selfish behavior.

That would also explain why vampires are chaotic evil -- though vampires also have that difficult-to-explain clause in their description that says that they try to avoid killing those they feed on. Except that 2-level energy drain means instant death to the majority of (1-HD) humanoids. Perhaps they subsist wholly on experienced adventurers?

I see they did away with the unpopular "wisps start life as small humanoids" explanation that appeared in the first MM2. Which is actually a shame -- with the pseudo-scientific attempt to rationalize their ecology, it helps to understand that wisps are a failed attempt by a humanoid race to ascend to one of those "higher planes of existence" we hear about in bad science fiction (see Star Trek and Stargate for related gobbleygook). Instead of becoming creatures of pure energy or thought, they both are born mortal and have to feed on other creatures to survive. They're energy vampires with a squishy larval stage.

Otherwise, I agree that the attempt to explain away wisps as static lightning dispensers diminishes their mythical power. They are boogiemen or fey; the flicking light visible in the corner of the eye, the seductive and deadly power of the unkempt wilderness.

The wisp is also one of the creatures missing from BECM I D&D (the closest is the wytchlight from the Creature Crucible).

02-02-2010, 08:55 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Nothing about their odd magical weaknesses? Maze, magic missile and protection from evil are the only spells to affect them. Weird.

02-02-2010, 09:10 PM

Lukas Sjöström

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thane of Fife

I also feel like there should be some sort of Will o'wisp origin ruminations:

"Will o'wisps may be the jealous spirits of those who die in swamps, come to make other will o'wisps and bring themselves company."

or

"Sages speculate that will o'wisps may be angry nature spirits seeking vengeance for mortal desecration of the wilderness. Druids scoff at these claims, pointing at the members of their own circles who have fallen prey to the malevolent creatures."

In Swedish folklore, they were the restless souls of dishonest land surveyors. Cheating people when it came to ownership of land was Serious Business.

02-02-2010, 09:17 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

One possibility is that Will o'Wisp's feed on any emotional energy; most of them are just cruel and malicious, and prefer the aromas of mortal terror and despair. But the rare good, or just neutral, ones will find nourishment and employment as party lights for fey revels.

02-02-2010, 09:38 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Nothing about their odd magical weaknesses? Maze, magic missile and protection from evil are the only spells to affect them. Weird.

Like with golems, I imagine it was originally laziness.

PC: I fireball the walking statue.

GM: It's a big hunk of rock. Even using a acetylene blowtorch for a week wouldn't do more than scorch its ankle. So no call lightning or cone of cold, either.

PC: Acid?

GM: If you want to clean off the grime.

PC: So charm monster is right out?

GM: Right.

PC: Illusion?

GM: No mind.

PC: Shatter?

GM: Too low-level.

PC: How about rock to mud?

GM: Well, I don't want one spell to automatically take it out. But to be fair... how about a slow effect? Say 2d6 rounds?

PC: Okay. Then I follow up with stone to flesh.

GM: Interesting. Okay, it shivers and turns to flesh.

PC: A flesh golem? Hey, those are easy!

GM: Well, no. It pops back to normal next round. But if you hit it with a normal spell this round, I'll allow it.

PC: Oh.

GM: Hmm. When I write this up, wouldn't it be easier to just list all the spells that do work?

PC: Whatever. Fireball!

The wisp is the same way, except the exceptions are force effects. A list of notes on every spell ever published would be complete overkill -- at least for a single monster entry. Though that's exactly what they did with the original writeups of the planes. Then in later editions, the original exception-based monster design becomes enshrined as true invulnerability. Well, at least for golems.

02-02-2010, 10:00 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The wisp not only feeds off the sense of panic caused by imminent death, it's exceptionally intelligent. The moral choice to live can itself be evil, in this case. "I need eat, so an endless series of others have to die screaming" is the ultimate in selfish behavior.

Not so long ago we used to slaughter cattle, pigs and sheep in painful ways for their food, and longer ago we'd do it to the deer etc. we caught wild as hunter gatherers. Did that make us chaotic evil? It seems like a strange argument; by definition all predation is premised on the fact that some being is going to suffer and die to keep another alive.

02-02-2010, 10:06 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Not so long ago we used to slaughter cattle, pigs and sheep in painful ways for their food, and longer ago we'd do it to the deer etc. we caught wild as hunter gatherers. Did that make us chaotic evil? It seems like a strange argument; by definition all predation is premised on the fact that some being is going to suffer and die to keep another alive.

I can't see this ending well, so I'll just say that I don't agree with the argument that killing an animal has the same moral weight as killing a human, and be done.

02-02-2010, 10:51 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

I can't see this ending well, so I'll just say that I don't agree with the argument that killing an animal has the same moral weight as killing a human, and be done.

Fair enough, I don't want this thread to get into these sort of debates. I'll just say that I agree that killing an animal doesn't have the same moral weight as killing a human, but that if I was a Will O'Wisp I would probably see the matter very differently. And be done. ;)

02-02-2010, 10:55 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

They did away with the humanoid origin, but I think Dragon confirmed they are still big fleshy blobs under all that light. That disappoints me, even if I know beings made of pure light probably wouldn't fit in the aberration category.

As a kid, will o wisps freaked me out just because I suddenly saw them everywhere. It was a case of selective memory, sure, but seeing it show up in Sound of friggin Music was still weird.

02-02-2010, 10:58 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

They did away with the humanoid origin, but I think Dragon confirmed they are still big fleshy blobs under all that light. That disappoints me, even if I know beings made of pure light probably wouldn't fit in the aberration category.

As a kid, will o wisps freaked me out just because I suddenly saw them everywhere. It was a case of selective memory, sure, but seeing it show up in Sound of friggin Music was still weird.

Yes, the fleshy blob thing is as boring as anything to me. Beings composed of gas and unearthly light is what they are in my mind.

02-03-2010, 02:18 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yes, the fleshy blob thing is as boring as anything to me. Beings composed of gas and unearthly light is what they are in my mind.

That's my preference to, all the folklore I've read about will o'wisp / will'o'the'wisp / corpsecandles et cetera gives the impression they're ephemeral or ghostly entities with little or no real substance - although that begs the question how they collect their treasure.

I do like sim_james's idea.

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james

Perhaps it's the stunted descendant of a Colour Out Of Space.

which ties in nicely with them being a mixture of malaria and eldritch radiation.

T'other thing I noticed the first time I used them in play is AD&D Will O'Wisps are really tough in a fight - AC -8, 9 Hit Dice, 2d8 damage per touch and immunity to almost all spells makes them a hard nut to crack. I could have sworn they needed powerful magical weapons to hit as well (like +3 or something), but the Monstrous Manual says they can be injured by mundane arms.

So I wonder why they bother lurking in desolate wastes and luring away lone travellers, when they could terrorize an average village with practical impunity (wouldn't setting fire to a few occupied huts or slowly electrocuting a peasant family or three create more emotional outbursts than a single victim sinking into quicksand?).

Maybe it's a question of energy budget - those electric shocks may drain a lot of energy from the Wisp, so using them to kill prey may tire them out more than it revivifies them. Either that or they can only feed off a single individual at a time, because they have to "harmonize" with their dying victim's minds to sap their dying brain activity.

02-03-2010, 02:31 AM

cavalier

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

So I wonder why they bother lurking in desolate wastes and luring away lone travellers, when they could terrorize an average village with practical impunity (wouldn't setting fire to a few occupied huts or slowly electrocuting a peasant family or three create more emotional outbursts than a single victim sinking into quicksand?).

Mayhaps some Lawful Evil type who runs a town/empire/whatever would be keen to recruit them to serve as ever-lit lamp posts, allowing them to feed on the terror and tension of the townsfolk...

02-03-2010, 04:09 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

T'other thing I noticed the first time I used them in play is AD&D Will O'Wisps are really tough in a fight - AC -8, 9 Hit Dice, 2d8 damage per touch and immunity to almost all spells makes them a hard nut to crack. I could have sworn they needed powerful magical weapons to hit as well (like +3 or something), but the Monstrous Manual says they can be injured by mundane arms.

That has some odd implications. Insubstantial creatures like ghosts or creatures made of gas like aerial servants generally require magical weapons to hit. Since the will o' the wisp does not, that suggests the wisp is actually a material creature. The super-low AC (they might have had the lowest AC in the original MM) on the other hand suggests that their body is both small... and fast.

Maybe they're actually quickling fireflies.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

So I wonder why they bother lurking in desolate wastes and luring away lone travellers, when they could terrorize an average village with practical impunity (wouldn't setting fire to a few occupied huts or slowly electrocuting a peasant family or three create more emotional outbursts than a single victim sinking into quicksand?).

There's a subtle but important difference between 1st and 2nd edition. In 1st edition, "[a] victim trapped by these hazards feeds the will-o-wisp as it expires, for the thing feeds upon the fleeing life force". Nothing about pain or suffering.

It's explicitly noted that the reason they like dangerous places like bogs and mires and catacombs is because they're full of natural traps.

Expanding on that, the presence of wisps might be a hint that the dungeon ahead is riddled with Tomb of Horrors-style deathtraps. They might congregate near the most deadly.

They could even be the vultures of the magical world. Bog-lights might descend in swarms upon battlefields, feeding upon the dying. Orbs of energy might circle around giant ravening monsters, following them and consuming their leavings. Hospitals might have to hire exterminators to keep them at bay.

02-03-2010, 03:31 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

...[W]ith the pseudo-scientific attempt to rationalize their ecology

Every (A)D&D attempt to rationalise the existence of mythical creatures of folklore makes me wince a little bit more. Can we just keep some things spooky and mysterious? And without XP values? Pretty please?

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Otherwise, I agree that the attempt to explain away wisps as static lightning dispensers diminishes their mythical power. They are boogiemen or fey; the flicking light visible in the corner of the eye, the seductive and deadly power of the unkempt wilderness.

I agree with you completely.

But I do want a reason for people to follow the Spooky Floating Lights sometimes, so that if a party sees them, they don't automatically flee/attack.

Perhaps they will guide lone (or lost) travellers to the traveller's greatest secret wish. Lost peasants get guided to the edge of their Village In The Marsh and safety, while jaded adventurers and wicked men are led to the sinkholes where the Lost Gold of the Jumblees is deeply buried. Along with the Jumblees. And the Wisp feeds on the (expected) relief and gratitude of their follower, and can get a little bitter and twisted if not given this...

02-03-2010, 05:09 PM

The Last Conformist

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lukas Sjöström

In Swedish folklore, they were the restless souls of dishonest land surveyors.

Which, incidentally, is one of my favourite bits of folklore.

I need to use it in a game someday.

02-03-2010, 06:17 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

One possibility is that Will o'Wisp's feed on any emotional energy; most of them are just cruel and malicious, and prefer the aromas of mortal terror and despair. But the rare good, or just neutral, ones will find nourishment and employment as party lights for fey revels.

Ravenloft Compendium 3:

Will O'Dawn: Chaotic Good. Feeds on happiness and exhilaration.

Will O'Deep: Neutral Evil. Feeds on desperation and fear.

Will O'Mist: Chaotic Neutral. Feeds on emotions of people who are crossing into The Mists.

Will O'Sea: Neutral Evil. Feeds off panic. Finds the panic of drowning to be the most delicious.

Ravenloft loved variants of "horror" monsters. The number of cloaklers they have is even higher.

02-03-2010, 06:36 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Every (A)D&D attempt to rationalise the existence of mythical creatures of folklore makes me wince a little bit more. Can we just keep some things spooky and mysterious? And without XP values? Pretty please?

No XPs?

Then there would be no point to slaying them!

...Unless they have treasure.;)

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

But I do want a reason for people to follow the Spooky Floating Lights sometimes, so that if a party sees them, they don't automatically flee/attack.

There's already an official AD&D monster that fills the "Helpful spooky light that is nourished by positive emotions", namely the Will o' Dawn. Unfortunately it only appears at sunrise, hence its name. Oh, and there's also the Will-o'-Mist that get people lost in swamps but doesn't want to kill them, which could be helpful if approached correctly.

Of course in the Grand Tradition of AD&D, the nice (and neutral) wisps look very similar to the nasty ones, just so the adventurers will confuse one for t'other with hilarious results.

I can also see a role for a neutral "Urban" wisp that feeds off more neutral or positive emotions but isn't fussy about their source, that tends to hang around places where people are excited by positive feelings (e.g. theatres) or more carnal sensations (e.g. arenas and houses of ill repute). Its able to amplify its chosen victim's sensations, but this leaves them fatigued. I'd probably called it a Will-o'-Bliss.

Hmm, now I want to stat one up...

02-03-2010, 10:33 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by The Last Conformist

Which, incidentally, is one of my favourite bits of folklore.

I need to use it in a game someday.

Heck, it might justify making them LAWFUL evil. Though that's hard to pull off when you live alone in a swamp. Maybe that's what drives them to the peasant villages. Not just to eat the life force of the victims, but to engage in some gerrymandering while they're at it. Or maybe the evil tyrant uses them as his city enforcers, especially the REALLY strict curfew.

02-08-2010, 07:11 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wolf

There's some hilarious PETA-girl inspired stuff in the wolf entry, my particular favourite being this gem: "The truth is that never in recorded history has a non-rabid or non-charmed wolf attacked any creature having an equal or higher intellect than itself." Though you also have to love how the hunting of wolves is referred to as a "genocide". (I mean, who hasn't seen a wolf pelt for sale and immediately thought of Auschwitz?)

What we really want in a D&D wolf is a ruthless carnivore that will prey on adventurers who make the mistake of camping out in cold isolated places at night. Luckily you get this if you just use the stats.

Dire Wolf

In D&D this is just a big wolf. I would like a berzerk fighting frenzy style special ability for the dire wolf, or even a magical ability to transform into a human berzerker for a short period, but no dice.

Worg

The intelligent, vocal, goblin-befriending Hobbit worg, this, though misspelt for some reason.

Winter Wolf

As is often the case with PETA-girl inspired MM entries, the designers managed to sneak something past her iron-fisted censorship regime with this section, noting that a white wolf pelt is worth 5,000 gps, and that they have a "foul disposition".

02-08-2010, 07:21 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

There is a 3.5 book from Distant Horizon that has winter wolves that adopt humans into their pack. They make a few minor magical alterations but for the most part the humans are simply poorly treated members that have the advantage of being able to buy supplies from local towns. They may be evil but then the wolves have a stake in the survival of said towns and it gets interesting on that dynamic.

02-09-2010, 12:40 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wolf

Dire Wolf

In D&D this is just a big wolf. I would like a berzerk fighting frenzy style special ability for the dire wolf, or even a magical ability to transform into a human berzerker for a short period, but no dice.

Why? Dire wolves were real historical creatures. You don't insist that cave bears shoot lightning out of their eyes, do you? Or that dinosaurs are in fact genius-level psychics? There's plenty of magical wolf monsters in D&D; let dire wolves be dire wolves.

But your crazy berserker wolves sound like a pretty cool take on wolfweres.

02-09-2010, 02:02 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

There's some hilarious PETA-girl inspired stuff in the wolf entry, my particular favourite being this gem: "The truth is that never in recorded history has a non-rabid or non-charmed wolf attacked any creature having an equal or higher intellect than itself."

Since that's obviously not the case in the world we live in, why are D&D's wolves so nice? And why do they hate the mentally challenged? (Wolves have an Int of 2-4, which means humanoids with an Int of 2 or 3 are thus fair game to some wolves, at least according to that quote.)

Maybe wolves are really degenerate humanoids. Perhaps, when a humanoid society becomes completely wicked and self-destructive (i.e. Chaotic Evil), they are cursed by the goddess of the moon. During the next full moon, peasants start scratching in their sleep. The king drunkenly stares at his hairy palms during the evening's revels. The night watch tongue their incisors, which seem larger than they remember. In the morning, the streets of the nation are empty. While in the hills, new packs of wolves howl their rage and fury at the departing moon.

The entire country has been turned into blameless animals. Still ravening beasts, but free from any kind of moral choice. Their world is just Hunger and the Hunt. Since they don't know any better, they no longer tip the scales of Alignment. The Balance has been reset.

Except buried in the back of their now-bestial minds, somewhere, they know. They know what they once were. When they see others who are as they once were, they are filled with an instinctive and primal hate... and fear. They may have gained strength and speed and claws, but they also understand, at some primal level, that what they lost is more important. For they lost reason. Fire, the bow. Tactics, armor, armies. Poison and proclamations offering "1 sp per wolf pelt, apply inside".

That's why they don't attack humanoids: Pure, utter fear. They know they can't compete. Instead, they cower and simper, bite themselves, and flee at the first chance. A captured wolf will prematurely age, and eventually die of terror.

And that's why when they find a creature with their former, dimly-remembered, hated form (two legs, two arms, a covering of second-hand furs or plants) but with the mind of a beast... well, they tear it all to pieces.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The intelligent, vocal, goblin-befriending Hobbit worg, this, though misspelt for some reason.

For the same reason TSR had to remove those other references to the Lord of the Circular Metal Bands:

Tolkien Estate (unique monster): AC -10, 300 hp, THACO 1, #AT 0, D —, SA lawsuit.

02-09-2010, 06:16 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

For the same reason TSR had to remove those other references to the Lord of the Circular Metal Bands:

Tolkien Estate (unique monster): AC -10, 300 hp, THACO 1, #AT 0, D —, SA lawsuit.

But the Tolkien Estate surely doesn't own the word "warg" as a trademark - it's a creature from Norse mythology!

02-09-2010, 07:25 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

But the Tolkien Estate surely doesn't own the word "warg" as a trademark - it's a creature from Norse mythology!

Facts never stop a good lawyer.

02-09-2010, 07:49 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Dogs are domesticated wolves. Have any of you used a race that has domesticated dire wolves or worgs (beyond goblins)? Giants with their version of the poodle or deerhound or gnolls with huge scent hounds and such.

02-09-2010, 07:55 PM

Lukas Sjöström

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

But the Tolkien Estate surely doesn't own the word "warg" as a trademark - it's a creature from Norse mythology!

Even worse than that: "warg" or "varg" is simply a word for "wolf". It'd be like prohibiting them from calling it "loup" or something like that. Anyway, isn't there precedence for D&D being able to use words Tolkien took from mythology, like orc?

02-09-2010, 09:10 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Dogs are domesticated wolves. Have any of you used a race that has domesticated dire wolves or worgs (beyond goblins)? Giants with their version of the poodle or deerhound or gnolls with huge scent hounds and such.

Maybe all the variant wolf breeds are really dog breeds. 10,000 years of non-human selective breeding for certain traits. Winter wolves might actually be great Irish setters, all hairy but white instead of red; the favored animal of frost giants on their great sleigh-hunts. Wolfweres might have originally started as a domesticated breed, in a land where having house pets was considered gauche. So over time, they learned to mimic their masters and take on suitable forms. Bred to look like toy... humans. Elves might have a sufficiently refined yet static society to allow that sort of thing. Wargs might be giant pit bulls, high strung and dangerous. The ones orcs used for pit-fights and other brutal sports. Bred for both the size of the dog and the fight in the dog.

02-10-2010, 03:51 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Do goblins breed worgs or do worgs breed goblins?

02-10-2010, 05:50 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

But the Tolkien Estate surely doesn't own the word "warg" as a trademark - it's a creature from Norse mythology!

This is the appropriate time to point to the Indiana Jones RPG claiming that "Nazi" was a trademark of Lucasfilm, right?

02-10-2010, 05:51 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Do goblins breed worgs or do worgs breed goblins?

Barghests breed both, obviously.

02-10-2010, 06:18 AM

Sebmojo

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Since that's obviously not the case in the world we live in, why are D&D's wolves so nice?

That Wiki link is an awesome rejoinder to PETA girl. So the main reason there aren't any wolf attacks any more is because we killed them all. Because they kept attacking us.

Quote:

Maybe wolves are really degenerate humanoids. Perhaps, when a humanoid society becomes completely wicked and self-destructive (i.e. Chaotic Evil), they are cursed by the goddess of the moon. During the next full moon, peasants start scratching in their sleep. The king drunkenly stares at his hairy palms during the evening's revels. The night watch tongue their incisors, which seem larger than they remember. In the morning, the streets of the nation are empty. While in the hills, new packs of wolves howl their rage and fury at the departing moon.

That made me think of the (wonderful) God Beneath the Sea, a book of Greek myths. Sure enough:

Quote:

Originally Posted by random web encyclopedia

Lycaon, in Greek mythology, son of Pelasgus and Meliboea, father of Oenotrus and the mythical first king of Arcadia. He was the father of Callisto and, according to some, he raised her son Arcas. He, or his fifty impious sons, entertained Zeus, and set before him a dish of human flesh; the god pushed away the dish in disgust and either killed the king and his sons by lightning or turned them into wolves Pausanias says that Lycaon sacrificed a child to Zeus on the altar on mount Lycaeus, and immediately after the sacrifice was turned into a wolf.

This gave rise to the story that a man was turned into a wolf at each annual sacrifice to Zeus Lycaeus, but recovered his human form if he abstained from human flesh for ten years.

His cult was driven out by that of the Hellenic Zeus, and Lycaon himself was afterwards represented as an evil spirit, who had insulted the new deity by setting human flesh before him. Robertson Smith considers the sacrifices offered to the wolf-Zeus in Arcadia to have been originally cannibal feasts of a wolf-tribe, who recognized the wolf as their totem. Usener and others identify Lycaon with Zeus Lycaeus, the god of light, who slays his son Nyctimus (the dark) or is succeeded by him, in allusion to the perpetual succession of night and day. According to Ed. Meyer, the belief that Zeus Lycaeus accepted human sacrifice in the form of a wolf was the origin of the myth that Lycaon, the founder of his cult, became a wolf, i.e. participated in the nature of the god by the act of sacrifice, as did all who afterwards duly performed it.

02-10-2010, 07:03 AM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

In the entry's defense, the "wolves never killed anyone" was a pretty well-accepted "fact" back when I grew up. There were books like the Book of Lists which claimed as such, and we didn't have wikipedia to instantly retort it. Even Terry Pratchett used that claim in one of the Discworlds. Even looking at that list, I have some skepticism about a claim of wolf fatality from the 800s.

02-10-2010, 04:35 PM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

This is the appropriate time to point to the Indiana Jones RPG claiming that "Nazi" was a trademark of Lucasfilm, right?

WHAT.

And I'm surprised Lucasfilm wasn't offended...

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

In the entry's defense, the "wolves never killed anyone" was a pretty well-accepted "fact" back when I grew up. There were books like the Book of Lists which claimed as such, and we didn't have wikipedia to instantly retort it. Even Terry Pratchett used that claim in one of the Discworlds. Even looking at that list, I have some skepticism about a claim of wolf fatality from the 800s.

Which side of the Atlantic are you (or the Book of Lists people) on? That probably explains it. Pratchett is British, though ... of course, wolves were extirpated from Britain ages ago.

North American wolves aren't harmless; no big animal is; but they do not attack humans except as really unusual flukes unless rabid. Some people think they may have been more aggressive before major European settlement (at least in the far north, according to the Wiki article - hmm, I wonder if this is related to the fact that wolves grow bigger farther north?), but in historic times they aren't.

(Also, which kind of wolf? North America has the red wolf also, which is smaller and does not attack people.)

Eurasian wolves do attack people, and did a lot more in the past.

02-11-2010, 12:13 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

IIRC, the last confirmed wolf-caused fatalities in Finland date back to 1860s or so. Before that, there have certainly been genuine wolf attacks, especially on children working as shepherds, away from the farms.

Again IIRC, though, the number of people - especially elderly, infirm and small children - reported as killed by wolves tended to go way up whenever there was a bad harvest or two, and it has been suggested that many of those cases were actually people killing off unwanted kids or sick, elderly relatives who weren't going to live long anyway and were a drain on the resources in a bad time.

Generally speaking, though, wolves are not a real threat to adult humans, not unless they're rabid or very, very hungry. Bears are much more dangerous, especially when they have cubs.

02-11-2010, 01:34 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Now might be the time to bring up a great idea that someone many years ago posted on ENWorld, and I've always kept in the back of my mind.

Worgs as Wile E Coyote.

Worgs are intelligent, right? Not too terribly smart, but smart enough to know that food gained without a direct confrontation is less dangerous than attacking adventurers yourself. So they build traps. Snares, deadfalls, pits. The lack of opposable thumbs makes some complicated traps difficult, but strong jaws and determination can make up for some of that. Goblins working with you help too.

That same author suggested worgs as working with a thieves' guild, disguised as guide dogs for the blind. A little extra muscle in a shape that most victims wouldn't suspect.

02-11-2010, 01:44 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10
WHAT.

And I'm surprised Lucasfilm wasn't offended...

I think it was Lucasfilm's lawyer that put it in there. But it's been a long time since I looked into it.

02-11-2010, 01:54 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138
That same author suggested worgs as working with a thieves' guild, disguised as guide dogs for the blind. A little extra muscle in a shape that most victims wouldn't suspect.

That's fucking brilliant.

They should also just have a charity that supplies worgs for 1st edition kobalds or commoners. Fighting dogs, for the hard of fighting.

02-11-2010, 07:47 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur
IIRC, the last confirmed wolf-caused fatalities in Finland date back to 1860s or so. Before that, there have certainly been genuine wolf attacks, especially on children working as shepherds, away from the farms.

Again IIRC, though, the number of people - especially elderly, infirm and small children - reported as killed by wolves tended to go way up whenever there was a bad harvest or two, and it has been suggested that many of those cases were actually people killing off unwanted kids or sick, elderly relatives who weren't going to live long anyway and were a drain on the resources in a bad time.

Generally speaking, though, wolves are not a real threat to adult humans, not unless they're rabid or very, very hungry. Bears are much more dangerous, especially when they have cubs.

I think the lack of human fatalities in recent decades can be put down to two things:

- a) Wolves learning to fear human contact.
- b) Lack of opportunity as rural (human) populations decline and motorized transport in rural areas becomes more widespread.

02-12-2010, 01:23 AM

Strangething

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

This is the appropriate time to point to the Indiana Jones RPG claiming that "Nazi" was a trademark of Lucasfilm, right?

The creepy villain from Raiders of the Lost Ark was never given a name, and was just called the Nazi in the script. Since Lucasfilm claimed a trademark on all character names...

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

That same author suggested worgs as working with a thieves' guild, disguised as guide dogs for the blind. A little extra muscle in a shape that most victims wouldn't suspect.

Aren't Worgs medium sized? That's a mighty big seeing eye dog!

02-12-2010, 04:36 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wolf

There's some hilarious PETA-girl inspired stuff in the wolf entry, my particular favourite being this gem: "The truth is that never in recorded history has a non-rabid or non-charmed wolf attacked any creature having an equal or higher intellect than itself."

Not to mention that it's cobblers. There are real-world historical records of wolves killing humans, although it's not a common occurrence.

Besides, when PETA-girl specified "equal or higher intellect than itself" I started wondering how that was supposed to work - does the wolf perform IQ tests and only devour creatures that fail them?

Hmm, maybe AD&D wolves are a variety of sphinx, except they don't need to employ riddles being psychic intelligence-detectors? Beware! they may be in league with the Thought Eaters! ;)

The bit in ecology warning that this "genocide" of wolves "results in a marked increase in rodents and deer population that has nearly demolished the surrounding ecosystems" is also pretty hilarious. As if (a) the wolves were the primary predators of mice or (b) your average bunch of AD&D human(oid)s would have any difficulty (or lack of enthusiasm) about slaughtering some excess venison.

02-12-2010, 04:54 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

"Okay, here's the deal," said Maurice to the shivering ball in his claws. You only have to say something. Anything. 'Let me go,' maybe, or even 'Help!' Squeak does not cut the mustard. It's just a noise. Just ask, and I'll let you go. No one can say I'm not highly moral in that respect."

"Squeak!" screamed the mouse.

"Fair enough," said Maurice, and killed it instantly.

- The Amazing Maurice and his Educated Rodents

02-12-2010, 04:58 AM

james1889

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Re. the 'Lucasfilm trademarked Nazis' thing - I seem to remember the true story behind it was that Lucasfilm had a little 'TM' sign on some cardstock figures, because the images were trademarked. But when you see the 'TM' sign next to some Nazis, it must be easy to leap to the wrong conclusion...

02-12-2010, 05:11 AM

Archer

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The bit in ecology warning that this "genocide" of wolves "results in a marked increase in rodents and deer population that has nearly demolished the surrounding ecosystems" is also pretty hilarious. As if (a) the wolves were the primary predators of mice or (b) your average bunch of AD&D human(oid)s would have any difficulty (or lack of enthusiasm) about slaughtering some excess venison.

I'm pretty sure real-world ecology can't really be applied to your average D&D world, which is generally a little top-heavy with apex predators. Where ecological principles do work, I see them working on a more personal level: You kill too many wolves, you risk pissing off some god or spirit, who registers a complaint with the local druid, who sends vermin to eat your village's crops.

02-12-2010, 05:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Oh, and here's another thing. I've long thought that in AD&D those goblin societies that have worg-riders the worg should usually be the higher ranking member of the partnership. An average worg is a lot tougher (AC 6, 3+3 HD, 2-8 damage) than most AD&D goblins will ever be, and in many cases is just as intelligent as its riders.

So, why not have a Land of the Pack, ruled over by great numbers of worgs, winter wolves, werewolves and wolfweres with their goblin slaves, who are mostly treated as disposable pairs of hands by their cruel lupine masters?

02-12-2010, 05:34 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wolf

Winter Wolf

As is often the case with PETA-girl inspired MM entries, the designers managed to sneak something past her iron-fisted censorship regime with this section, noting that a white wolf pelt is worth 5,000 gps, and that they have a "foul disposition".

Look, if you were a sapient being who for as long as your family can remember have been hunted by little 2-legged creatures who only want to kill you for your skin, you'd have a foul disposition too! Plus, you'd probably want to be pals with those nice big two-legged chaps with the frosty beards. Besides, as well as protecting you from humans, the frost giants let you share their glacier-castles during the bad warm seasons and go hunting with you.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

There is a 3.5 book from Distant Horizon that has winter wolves that adopt humans into their pack. They make a few minor magical alterations but for the most part the humans are simply poorly treated members that have the advantage of being able to buy supplies from local towns. They may be evil but then the wolves have a stake in the survival of said towns and it gets interesting on that dynamic.

For another interpretation of Winter Wolf society, have a look at this Ecology of the Winter Wolf article by Johnathan Richards. It was written to submit to Dragon, but the magazine rejected it, so Mr Richards posted it on Enworld for all the world to enjoy.

The winter wolves' society is pretty much the same as real-world wolves, just a bit more brutal, but it's well worth a read.

02-12-2010, 05:42 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Archer

I'm pretty sure real-world ecology can't really be applied to your average D&D world, which is generally a little top-heavy with apex predators. Where ecological principles do work, I see them working on a more personal level: You kill too many wolves, you risk pissing off some god or spirit, who registers a complaint with the local druid, who sends vermin to eat your village's crops.

Well that's a large part of what I find hilarious about some of the AD&D monster's ecology entries. I'd be a lot happier if they provided a more fantastical reason for why wolf-genocide brings ruination upon those who perpetuated than having an untenable pseudo-scientific explanation.

Having various spirits of nature (plus their creatures and servants) protect wild places and their life is quite reasonable in context, or at least it better caters to my tastes.

02-12-2010, 09:33 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething

Aren't Worgs medium sized? That's a mighty big seeing eye dog!

Same size as a "riding dog", so a Great Dane, Saint Bernard or mastiff. On the big side, but not unheard of.

02-12-2010, 10:31 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

As if (a) the wolves were the primary predators of mice or

There was (and possibly still is) a myth floating around that wolves mostly eat mice. Clearly PETA girl bought into this.

02-12-2010, 05:24 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

There was (and possibly still is) a myth floating around that wolves mostly eat mice. Clearly PETA girl bought into this.

The mouse scene from Never Cry Wolf probably fed this.

02-13-2010, 07:34 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

There was (and possibly still is) a myth floating around that wolves mostly eat mice. Clearly PETA girl bought into this.

It's not that I was thinking wolves don't eat mice, it's that surely far more mice are eaten by smaller predators (snakes, owls, mustelids, cats et cetera) so removing the wolves from the equation would have little or no impact on the mouse population...

...well, unless The Gods Are Angered.:mad:

Of course, if they anger the Cat God, they're going to be in for it.;

Although come to think of it, I remember watching a documentary with a family of wolves who's a diet was mostly lemmings, so maybe PETA-girl just picked the wrong rodent....cool:

02-14-2010, 03:23 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

It's not that I was thinking wolves don't eat mice, it's that surely far more mice are eaten by smaller predators (snakes, owls, mustelids, cats et cetera) so removing the wolves from the equation would have little or no impact on the mouse population...

Predator-prey relationships get way complex when dealing with ecosystems rather than two species.

Removing the top predator means all the secondary predators that it liked to eat suddenly have less attrition, and so they quickly eat out their prey (lets assume it's mice at this level). Then the secondary predators start starving and lots die, and the mice, with the ability to breed like, well, rabbits (even better, actually) form a plague as the population explodes from a very low number, as there are fewer predators to keep their numbers down.

They eventually starve too, or the predators thrive on a bountiful squeaking food source.

Usually there's a gap between the steps here, so killing all the wolves might lead to a yo-yoing boom and bust in mice, until another top predator moves in...

02-14-2010, 05:58 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wolfwere

I have a strong feeling of deja vu about the Wolfwere - obviously because, let's face it, we've already done the Jackalwere entry and there isn't much to choose between the two creatures. (I'm sure they could have just made a single "-were" entry.) The Wolfwere is more powerful and uses singing rather than a magical gaze to ensnare prey, but the basic idea is the same.

That said, I do rather like the idea of this sort of creature - it has a nice fairy tale vibe to it which makes it feel more Arthurian than High Fantasy. This includes a weakness for cold iron and wolfsbane, and a rather Brothers Grimm sort of modus operandi. The problems associated with it are age-old, however: any player worth his salt will be instinctively suspicious of a wandering pilgrim or minstrel absent mindedly playing a lute, because he will have read the Monstrous Manual many times. It takes a lot of subtlety and effort on the part of the DM to make a Wolfwere a genuine surprise.

Wolfweres like to hang out with worgs or wolves, and their influence makes their pack "far more vicious and evil than they would normally be". This is an obvious adventure hook if ever there was one - wolves (which as we know normally only eat mice) in the local area are becoming more vicious and violent, if only some brave adventurers would find out the reason why, etc. etc. Wolfweres also despise Werewolves and vice versa, though the reason isn't even hinted at; nary a speculating sage in sight!

02-14-2010, 07:46 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The relationship between Lycanthropes and Antherions does seem to be one plot hook that's never been properly expanded upon, and could lead to quite a cool campaign. They have an interesting savagery/seduction and monster I am vs monster I become axis. Why should the Baatezu and Tanar'ri get all the competing factions of evil fun? Throw in nonshapeshifting anthropomorphic animals like Rakasta, Lupins, etc as the third point of the axis and I think we have a pretty cool potential base to build off.

02-14-2010, 09:51 PM

Thane of Fife

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The lethargy ability is a bit disappointing - I would probably prefer to use it as some sort of plot effect combined with a delayed slow spell - once you realize that things are wrong, it takes you those 5-8 rounds to shrug off the sleepiness. Then I'd be tempted to use a werewolf as a player already in an inn when the PCs get there, or some such.

In other news, what other kinds of anthro-creatures could we have? Doing some wiki-ing, I found this:

Quote:

Ancient teachings held that every race except the Han Chinese were really animals in disguise

and

Quote:

In Thailand the tiger that eats many humans may become a weretiger.

Those are some plot hooks right there.

02-15-2010, 06:43 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Predator-prey relationships get way complex when dealing with ecosystems rather than two species.

Removing the top predator means all the secondary predators that it liked to eat suddenly have less attrition, and so they quickly eat out their prey (lets assume it's mice at this level). Then the secondary predators start starving and lots die, and the mice, with the ability to breed like, well, rabbits (even better, actually) form a plague as the population explodes from a very low number, as there are fewer predators to keep their numbers down.

They eventually starve too, or the predators thrive on a bountiful squeaking food source.

Usually there's a gap between the steps here, so killing all the wolves might lead to a yo-yoing boom and bust in mice, until another top predator moves in...

Those are all very good points, so I'll happily concede that my initial hilarity about wolf genocide causing mouse plagues may be a bit misplaced, since real life can get a lot more complicated.

That said, I haven't heard of wolves going out of their way to kill small predators that would compete with them for mice (like, say Iberian lynxes, which I've heard will kill any other little carnivore that intrudes into their territory), and most of the mouse-sized population explosions I've heard of are due to an abundance of food (often part of a boom-bust cycle based on the lemmings or whatever stripping the land of vegetation, dying off, then booming again when the plants grow back). I suspect that since small rodents tend to breed far faster than their predators, carnivory is rarely the major factor keeping their population down, food supply and rivalry from other plant eaters is probably more important - although, as you pointed out if their rival herbivores have a population boom due to a lack of wolves it can have a knock-on effect.

Besides, an absence of wolves causing rabbit or deer plagues is far more believable, to my ignorant tastes.

02-15-2010, 07:16 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

[U][SIZE="5"]That said, I do rather like the idea of this sort of creature - it has a nice fairy tale vibe to it which makes it feel more Arthurian than High Fantasy. This includes a weakness for cold iron and wolfsbane, and a rather Brothers Grimm sort of modus operandi. The problems associated with it are age-old, however: any player worth his salt will be instinctively suspicious of a wandering pilgrim or minstrel absent mindedly playing a lute, because he will have read the Monstrous Manual many times. It takes a lot of subtlety and effort on the part of the DM to make a Wolfwere a genuine surprise.

That was certainly my experience the sole time I use a wolfwere. The players were suspicious of them from the first.

The obvious solution is to hide the wolfwere amongst normal humans.

On trade routes you could have the player's meet many small bands of "random ordinary encounters", some of which might be wolfweres or the like, although this might stretch credibility in certain terrains ("What, another small band of unarmed cobblers travelling by themselves through a monster-infested wilderness? What's going on here!").

Alternatively, your shapeshifting monstrosities join a larger band of mundane travellers and try to lure some or all of the to their death - say, an attractive young wolfweress asks a young man to secretly meet her in the bushes one night, and the pack have a feast.

Besides, we might be approaching this the wrong way - perhaps the party are hired to find out who (or rather, what) is causing the disappearance of travellers on the Old East Road. They might even be told wolfweres are responsible by a surviving eye-witness, so they're perfectly entitled to be suspicious of strangers.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wolfweres like to hang out with worgs or wolves, and their influence makes their pack "far more vicious and evil than they would normally be". This is an obvious adventure hook if ever there was one - wolves (which as we know normally only eat mice) in the local area are becoming more vicious and violent, if only some brave adventurers would find out the reason why, etc. etc. Wolfweres also despise Werewolves and vice versa, though the reason isn't even hinted at; nary a speculating sage in sight!

Yes, the wolfwere vs werewolf antipathy is curious. Perhaps its just the normal rivalry between two species competing for the same niche (shapechanging human eater) or there could be more to it...

The werewolves are just plain jealous - wolfweres are smarter (High to exceptional), tougher (AC3 & 5+1 HD), taller (up to 7') and more charismatic (they've got wonderful singing voices!), so they got all the tail at the Shapechangers' Jamboree. The werewolves just huddled in the corner and seethed with jealousy while all the weretigresses clustered around that "bad boy" with his lute.

The wolfwere came first. It is a natural shapeshifter, created by a cruel god of the wild to control the burgeoning population of humans. The werewolf is a crude imitation of it, which is bad enough, but worse is that lycanthropy is infectious. If they didn't destroy werewolves on sight they could transform or devour the entire human population, which would destroy the very purpose for which they were made and replace the Human Threat with an even worse one.*

*Speaking of which, imagine an AD&D Land of the Weres were infectious therianthropy ran out of control - I wonder how a civilization of AD&D lycanthropes would work out. Most likely it would be evil (since the few good werebeasts are not prone to infect others), but could it be stable? Would they have a caste-system based on the weres' animal form? (Rats as the proletariat, Sharks as the sailors, Wolves as the soldiers, et cetera)

02-15-2010, 07:19 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Iberian lynxes, which I've heard will kill any other little carnivore that intrudes into their territory

I recently read Where the Wild Things Were, a book about top predators and how their absence affects the food web. One place where wolves do destroy smaller predators with a vengeance is Yellowstone- they knocked down the coyote population soon after being reintroduced.

And one weird tidbit was the extinction of black bears on an island because of introduced deer. The deer stripped the land of pretty much everything the bears ate (esp some species of berries).

02-15-2010, 08:13 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Yes, the wolfwere vs werewolf antipathy is curious. Perhaps its just the normal rivalry between two species competing for the same niche (shapechanging human eater) or there could be more to it...

The werewolves are just plain jealous - wolfweres are smarter (High to exceptional), tougher (AC3 & 5+1 HD), taller (up to 7') and more charismatic (they've got wonderful singing voices!), so they got all the tail at the Shapechangers' Jamboree. The werewolves just huddled in the corner and seethed with jealousy while all the weretigresses clustered around that "bad boy" with his lute.

The wolfwere came first. It is a natural shapeshifter, created by a cruel god of the wild to control the burgeoning population of humans. The werewolf is a crude imitation of it, which is bad enough, but worse is that lycanthropy is infectious. If they didn't destroy werewolves on sight they could transform or devour the entire human population, which would destroy the very purpose for which they were made and replace the Human Threat with an even worse one.*

Now you've got me thinking of the relationship between the Kuei-Jin and Kindred in the oWoD. The capability to multiply rapidly, albeit in a hard to control fashion beats a modest amount of individual superiority handily. Dwarves vs Orcs, Solars vs Dragon-blooded, it's one of those dramatic patterns that works very well.

Quote:

*Speaking of which, imagine an AD&D Land of the Weres were infectious therianthropy ran out of control - I wonder how a civilization of AD&D lycanthropes would work out. Most likely it would be evil (since the few good werebeasts are not prone to infect others), but could it be stable? Would they have a caste-system based on the weres' animal form? (Rats as the proletariat, Sharks as the sailors, Wolves as the soldiers, et cetera)

Way ahead of you. This is the basis for one of the continents in my gameworld based on all the Dragon Magazine stuff.

The rough progression involved some serious population crashes and internicene paranoia as lycanthropy initially spread, followed by a descent into tribalism, as even infected lycanthropes tend to run in packs, so there would be definite safety in associating with people who changed at the same time as you and had your back while you're vulnerable.

By the time natural lycanthropes started outnumbering the infected ones (which results in an interesting family dynamic, as it means the kids wind up in control of the parents at that time of the month), a few generations later, trusting no-one outside your immediate family group had become standard.

After that, there was some reestablishment of friendly relations and trade, but the different environmental and dietary requirements of different werespecies kept large scale civilisations from forming again. There is a bit of the respect for nature stuff that you see in W:tA, but it's more a tendency to try and encourage the kinds of environments that are good for them in particular. This means that there is quite a bit of enemy of my enemy based alliances, with the simultaneous issue of competing with other species that occupy the same environment, but different niches, and setting boundaries between territories occupied by creatures adapted to different environments.

There also developed a fairly strong prejudice against mixed "race" breeding, which also didn't help in terms of integration. (IMG, the offspring have a 25% chance of taking after one parent or the other, being just a normal human, which is a very serious disadvantage when everyone else is immune to nonmagical weapons, or being some kind of weird hybrid, (crapshoot of if it's deformed and nonviable or super twinkled with the best abilities of both animal species.))

This resulted in a very definite Points of light situation. Not all the technology was lost, although there are certain individuals who want to embrace their animalistic side and leave all that behind, but with little trust between species, and dozens of different wereraces out there, the base of sentient creatures is a lot more fragmented than usual, and getting all the raw materials for certain things became an issue. This problem is gradually decreasing over time, as the new ecology works itself out, and the numbers of lycanthropes increase. (after all, the initial population crash left big areas of fertile but uninhabited land to be retaken.)

You probably would see mixed communities develop eventually, (and of course, adventuring parties regularly violate these kinds of rules to their benefit, as being able to fill lots of different niches is a huge advantage for them) but they are going to be fraught with class tension, and outbursts of tavern brawls, gang violence, and similar unpleasantness would be several orders of magnitude greater than in human settlements, as lycanthropes are noted for their temper control issues. Large cities of anything other than wererats, or maybe wereravens at a pinch, seems unlikely. Course, if they can offer substantial benefits in terms of comforts of civilisation, they might get a decent smattering of immigrants from other werespecies employed in niches where their abilities are useful, but it'd still be a violence prone place, full of racial tensions, quite possibly legally enforced segregation, and decidedly tenuous rule of law, given the tendencies towards chaos and evil of many of the races. Perfect place for adventurers, really. :p

02-16-2010, 08:11 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

The mouse scene from Never Cry Wolf probably fed this.

Never Cry Wolf (the book originally) is the original source of this, in fact.

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

That said, I haven't heard of wolves going out of their way to kill small predators that would compete with them for mice (like, say Iberian lynxes, which I've heard will kill any other little carnivore that intrudes into their territory)

As DMH mentioned above, wolves kill coyotes, at least in western North America. (Coyotes and wolves never really overlapped much in eastern North America, as coyotes only expanded their range eastward after wolves were mostly wiped out.)

02-16-2010, 06:12 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Worm

A bit of a grab-bag of monsters, this one, connected only by body shape. (The MM helpfully explains that all worms are "all burrowers with long, cylindrical shapes.") I find it mildly surprising that such an iconic D&D monsters as the Purple Worm should not have its own entry, but that's by the by.

Purple Worm

One of those rare beasts that can truly KILL an adventurer, without any hope for resurrection, the Purple Worm is always a scary proposition. It also has one of my favourite D&D cliches - the swallowed-character-cutting-his-way-out-of-a-gargantuan-monster routine - so it's an all round good egg in my view.

Purple worms are carnivorous but the entry also states that they consume vast amounts of material as they burrow through the earth - which then just sits inside the creature's belly until excreted when the creature returns to its lair. In which case, where is the room in the belly for adventurers? And doesn't this mean that a Purple Worm can only really travel the length of itself before it gets full of soil and has to return home? One of those cases where you just shouldn't think too deeply, I suppose.

There are two subvarieties:

Mottled Worm - an aquatic variety inhabiting "shallow bottom muck" (I love that - sounds like a variety of turd.)

Thunderherder - very small cousins of the Purple Worm (5-10 feet long rather than 150) who cause no damage other than creating earthquake-like movements underfoot.

Giant Bloodworm

Basically a giant leech, this, which bites and attaches itself to its victims. It can only be removed on an Open Doors roll - now that's what I call exception based design.

Bookworm

No, not somebody who reads lots of books, but a worm that lives in libraries. Oh, my aching sides. The fact that it's just a bad pun aside, I quite like the idea - nothing like the look on a player's face when their mage character pulls a rare spellbook from a shelf and finds a great big bite mark where the 'wish' spell should be.

Rot Grub

A nasty little beggar which burrows into the skin and takes 1d3 turns to reach the heart (!). There's a decent chance the victim won't even notice this happening (requires a Wisdom check) and after 1d6 rounds they burrow too deep to be killed by anything but a cure disease spell. This makes them one of the meanest creatures in the entire MM, I think, at least relative to XP gained from killing one.

02-16-2010, 07:13 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I've always been a little disappointed that you can't produce potions of longevity from the carcass of a purple worm. That'd spice the game up!

I believe that both bookworms and rot grubs were designed to be specialized "screw you!" monsters. The former are the DM's best friend when he decides that the party's wizard has gotten too many, or too problematic spells. Just unleash the little critters on him, and let them eat the offending spellbook! Cue hilarity, and the wizard transporting his new spellbook in airtight, mothball-filled locked steel box... :D

Rot grubs, on the other hand, are there to discourage the compulsive looters. You know the type - when they kill an orc in a 10' by 10' room, they take the pie he was guarding, the orc's armor and weapons, pull his teeth, break up the furniture to see if anything was hidden in hollow table legs, pry up the flagstones, look into the chimney, look through the trash... "You sort through the orc's rubbish, hoping to find something valuable. Roll a Wisdom check! Oh, you failed? Well, it's nothing, go on, I'm sure you've got some more implausible places to look for gold left..."

02-16-2010, 07:36 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Purple worms are carnivorous but the entry also states that they consume vast amounts of material as they burrow through the earth - which then just sits inside the creature's belly until excreted when the creature returns to its lair. In which case, where is the room in the belly for adventurers? And doesn't this mean that a Purple Worm can only really travel the length of itself before it gets full of soil and has to return home? One of those cases where you just shouldn't think too deeply, I suppose.

No, it makes sense. But you first have to understand that their lair isn't the topsoil, the Underdark, the earth's crust, or even the mantle. It's the elemental plane of earth.

The astral used to be just chock-full of planes. You couldn't travel more than a few minutes before bumping into a color pool.

Then the worms came. They ate... everything. The earth and stone, the pesky drow and aboleth. Then they burst from below, and swallowed the forests. Consumed the plains. Ingested the tundra. Then the sky, and finally, the plane itself. All gone.

That's why the elemental plane of earth is just packed full of... well, worm poop actually. Or the consumed remains of an infinite number of planes, to be more delicate.

The few remaining Material Planes are in hiding. Weeks of travel apart. Hoping they'll be missed. Hoping that no purple worm will find them. Because if you see one... well, it's never just one. Time to plane shift away. Your world is doomed.

The worms? They're not really worms. They're really appendages. The sprawling, grasping limbs of the elemental plane of earth. Made of pure astral-stuff, condensed. That's why they're purple. It's the color you get when you squish down all the silver into something solid. The bodies we see, more than a hundred feet long, are just the final protrusion. The bits that stick out, the heads of the vacuum. The rest spins and spirals away, into the depths of the astral.

Wormholes? Some are innocent. Planar travelers, demon lords, that kind of thing. Merely localized destruction. But some are the nether ends of the purple-nosed worms, funneling infinities of substance and matter back to the plane of material greed.

And watch out. Creating wormholes sometimes attracts them. Planar travel is dangerous, yes. But to the plane or origin itself, as much as the traveler.

02-16-2010, 10:51 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Huh, I assumed bookworms were actual creatures, though not necessarily as vicious as the ones in D&D. That wouldn't make them puns. Now, when a I made a dragon statue that guards libraries and called it the bookwyrms, THAT'S a pun! :)

02-17-2010, 01:29 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

Way ahead of you. This is the basis for one of the continents in my gameworld based on all the Dragon Magazine stuff.

SNIP

I was thinking of something more civilized and less primal than that, a society made up of many races of werecreatures rather than a land where each were-race keeps mostly to its own little community.

The best example (indeed the only) example I can think of offhand is the lycanthrope magocracy in Paul Kearney's Monarchies of God series, although the werecreatures in that have some differences from the AD&D version.

An AD&D "Land of the Werebeasts" would presumably be a very fractious society, since so many of its members are Chaotic and/or Evil in alignment, but if a bunch of drow can manage it, why not a bunch of malevolent shapeshifters. I'm imagining the behind-the-scenes efforts of the sizable population of wererats would help keep things running.

Of course, if an all-werebeast population seems too much, maybe the majority of the population are normal humanoids and only the ruling caste are werecreatures - hereditary shapeshifters such as wolfweres might make more sense for that than infectious lycanthropes. Then each type of werecreature could be its own "House", with its own lands and centre of power, who all meet in a Parliament of the Beasts to haggle out national policy.

02-17-2010, 02:07 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Purple worms are carnivorous but the entry also states that they consume vast amounts of material as they burrow through the earth - which then just sits inside the creature's belly until excreted when the creature returns to its lair. In which case, where is the room in the belly for adventurers? And doesn't this mean that a Purple Worm can only really travel the length of itself before it gets full of soil and has to return home? One of those cases where you just shouldn't think too deeply, I suppose.

Clearly the Purple Worm magically shrinks the earth it swallows and excretes it as small, superdense pellets or as a superstrong deposit on the tunnel walls, or transforms a large portion of it into gas (maybe breathable air?).

I am sure you have noticed that a vast quantity of the underground in AD&D is riddled with tunnels and openings, as well as vast caverns. The spoil from all those excavations either has to go somewhere else or be shrunk.

It's the Purple Worms that are ultimately responsible for much of the underdark's cavities.

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Rot Grub

A nasty little beggar which burrows into the skin and takes 1d3 turns to reach the heart (!). There's a decent chance the victim won't even notice this happening (requires a Wisdom check) and after 1d6 rounds they burrow too deep to be killed by anything but a cure disease spell. This makes them one of the meanest creatures in the entire MM, I think, at least relative to XP gained from killing one.

Did they have the anaesthetizing venom in 1st edition? I don't remember it from the original Monster Manual. Certainly, the few times I had players encounter them, if someone was unlucky enough to get 'sprung' by a Rotgrub they'd certainly feel it chewing its way into their flesh - cue screams of "fetch the torch!".

Rot grubs are one of those "one trick" monsters that are little more than organic traps, like green slime or brown mold. I never used them much, since I prefer a monster with more versatility. Give me a Mimic anytime, you can do a lot more with one of those; why, the PCs can even try to talk to them.

Still, there are uses for the humble Rot Grub. They could make an excellent weapon, and would probably be safer to store and transport than the classic Flask of Green Slime. Not to mention they could be farmed for their pain-numbing saliva, although "milking" them might be a bit tricky.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur
Rot grubs, on the other hand, are there to discourage the compulsive looters. You know the type - when they kill an orc in a 10' by 10' room, they take the pie he was guarding, the orc's armor and weapons, pull his teeth, break up the furniture to see if anything was hidden in hollow table legs, pry up the flagstones, look into the chimney, look through the trash... "You sort through the orc's rubbish, hoping to find something valuable. Roll a Wisdom check! Oh, you failed? Well, it's nothing, go on, I'm sure you've got some more implausible places to look for gold left..."

Either that, or it's an Evil DM running a party through The Sewers of Doom.

02-20-2010, 06:11 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wraith

There's something rather halfhearted about the Wraith entry, but I can't quite put my finger on what. For starters the Wraith is incredibly close to the Wight, right down to the same motivation (hatred of life), same origin (Negative Material Plane), same habitat (tombs and graves), same dislikes (bright light) and the same abilities (level drain) with the same consequences (enslavement). Even their comparative power levels are much of a muchness. Coming hot on the heels of the Wight in alphabetical terms as it does, the Wraith just comes across as a cheap copy.

Moreover the entry itself is very cursory, with none of the obscure and half-mad origin theories and bizarre speculations of sages that we have come to expect from our friend the MM. About the closest we come to such a thing is this sentence: "A character who becomes a wraith is nearly impossible to recover, requiring a special quest." But even that is lifted directly from the Wight entry. Aside from that we just get a rather drab retread of what we already know or expect (Wraiths are immune to normal weapons and sleep spells, etc. etc.).

Stop me if I'm wrong, but there is strong precedent in fantasy literature (I believe some fellow called Tolkien wrote something or other that was pertinent) for a much more powerful, unique and frightening version of the Wraith than exists in the MM. Something that isn't just a Wight-except-immaterial.

That said, there is something rather compelling about a pack of Wraiths swooping in at unsuspecting travellers in the night like wolves, especially on a party of PCs who don't have silver or magical weapons. Depends on how much mileage ones group gets out of desparate fleeing, of course.

02-20-2010, 06:39 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yeah, like skeletons and zombies, and gobins/orcs/hobgobins, the wight/wraith thing feels like a product of Gary's original need to create monsters for every HD niche (and in this case, slot on the cleric turning table) to scale neatly with the party. This resulted in quite a few very similar adjacent creatures.

02-21-2010, 02:08 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wraith

There's something rather halfhearted about the Wraith entry, but I can't quite put my finger on what. For starters the Wraith is incredibly close to the Wight, right down to the same motivation (hatred of life), same origin (Negative Material Plane), same habitat (tombs and graves), same dislikes (bright light) and the same abilities (level drain) with the same consequences (enslavement). Even their comparative power levels are much of a muchness. Coming hot on the heels of the Wight in alphabetical terms as it does, the Wraith just comes across as a cheap copy.

Same here, except I was thinking "Spectre Lite" rather than "Wight Max" the last time I read the Wraith entry, them both being incorporeal flying energy-sucking undead that are powerless in sunlight. Actually, "Spectre Lite" is basically how I imagined Wraiths - a slightly weaker Spectral creature that looks like a shadowy simulacrum or silhouette of its original, living form.

There does appear to be a difference in the two undead's modus operandi, though:

Spectres like to operate in secret and "rival vampires in their skill at remaining hidden from the general populace", and "remain highly intelligent and generally rational".

Wraiths "exist only to perpetuate evil by absorbing the life force of as many people as possible". They may be almost as intelligent as Spectres but seem to lack any purpose or desire besides killing.

That doesn't seem to be enough to justify making two different monsters.

Apart from that, I can only see a few minor points.

Firstly, and rather curiously, wraiths are always human - The Monstrous Manual says "A wraith is an undead spirit of a powerful, evil human" and "Any human killed by a wraith becomes a half-strength wraith". Spectres can turn "mortals" into more of their kind while Wights were once "persons", but Wraiths can only be created from one AD&D race.

- Is this due to some difference in the quality of the human soul or anima?
- Perhaps Wraiths are the result of a bungled attempt to create an immortal race of human spirit-beings?
-

Secondly, why did they specify that a wraith "cannot communicate, except through a speak with dead spell" and scorn (or flee from) attempts at communication. I believe AD&D Wights and Spectres are capable of speech, so does the "Wraith curse" deprive them of a voice?

Then again, I never could remember this fact and always imagined Wraiths as being capable of speaking in horrible, eerie voices, but prefer not to interact with the living except by sapping their lives.

02-23-2010, 12:24 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

If the Mottled Worm are as big as purple worms, that's some deep seabed mud....

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

An AD&D "Land of the Werebeasts" would presumably be a very fractious society, since so many of it members are Chaotic and/or Evil in alignment, but if a bunch of drow can manage it, why not a bunch of malevolent shapeshifters.

Of course, the drow get help from Lolth; is there a werebeast deity?

Quote:

I'm imagining the behind-the-scenes efforts of the sizable population of wererats would help keep things running.

Yeah, probably.

Quote:

Then each type of werecreature could be its own "House", with its own lands and centre of power, who all meet in a Parliament of the Beasts to haggle out national policy.

Cool!

02-23-2010, 01:19 AM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10

Of course, the drow get help from Lolth; is there a werebeast deity?

Just ones for the individual races. (per 2e's Monster Mythology) Having one god as a collective patron for all lycanthropes would probably help mitigate the fractiousness problem.

02-23-2010, 04:22 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Then again, I never could remember this fact and always imagined Wraiths as being capable of speaking in horrible, eerie voices, but prefer not to interact with the living except by sapping their lives.

They shout "Wooo!"

02-23-2010, 04:09 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by celebrityomnipath

They shout "Wooo!"

That's ghosts. Sometimes followed by "I'm a ghooooooost."

02-23-2010, 11:03 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

Just ones for the individual races. (per 2e's Monster Mythology) Having one god as a collective patron for all lycanthropes would probably help mitigate the fractiousness problem.

There was one in my last RPG campaign. Phellis Mune was once a LE were-dire leopard monk from the campaign before that, but in between the two campaigns he ascended to godhood and became the general patron of all lycanthropes. His lawful-ness was a guide to get other normally chaotic weres to organize. Of course, he was evil, so the more ethical lycanthropes still ignored him. He was the enemy for the penultimate adventure of that latter campaign as well; the only time he was EVER fought by either party!

02-25-2010, 04:07 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

Just ones for the individual races. (per 2e's Monster Mythology) Having one god as a collective patron for all lycanthropes would probably help mitigate the fractiousness problem.

Well there was that Sutherland cartoon in the 1E AD&D Dungeonmaster's Guide of showing a temple with wererats worshipping a Giant Rat Idol while a couple of adventures stand outside preparing to sneak in with the aid of "mickey mouse" ears.

"This had better work!"

02-25-2010, 07:25 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wyvern

Do you pronounce 'Wyvern' like Wivvern, or Wai-vern? Just out of interest, as I've heard both.

Anyway, Wyverns - a stupid dragon without the magic or arms. What's not to like? They're a quintessential fantasy monster and perfect for a slaying. They also have a nice line in diving aerial attacks and instadeath poison, both of which are always welcome.

Somewhat disappointingly D&D Wyverns are not rideable like Warhammer ones are - or at least the entry doesn't mention them being ridden into battle by orc shamans, which is a pity. It's one of the best Warhammer tropes. We are compensated for this by the idea of groups of Wyverns cooperating with an evil dragon and being bossed around by the more powerful reptile - quite a nice middle-tier big baddie for a campaign, don't you think?

Rather intriguingly, we are told that "[c]ertain body parts [of Wyverns] are used by spell casters as spell components, for which they will pay a reasonable price", but the MM is uncharacteristically reticent about what these body parts may be and what spells they are used in. Sounds like a job for rpg.net...

02-25-2010, 08:34 PM

sim_james

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

There was the occasional riding wyvern in Dragonlance, from what I recall. That was pre-2nd edition.

02-25-2010, 09:34 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

What's not to like? Well, there is the traditional stupid pre-3rd ed save or die poison. I distinctly remember not liking that! :)

02-25-2010, 09:35 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Rather intriguingly, we are told that "[c]ertain body parts [of Wyverns] are used by spell casters as spell components, for which they will pay a reasonable price", but the MM is uncharacteristically reticent about what these body parts may be and what spells they are used in. Sounds like a job for rpg.net...

Perhaps the body parts were too delicate to mention, and got nuked by the censors. After all, this is the era where nymphs and goddesses bundled up and demons and devils vanished and were replaced by look-a-likes with names that would make baby Tolkien cry.

02-25-2010, 09:37 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

What's not to like? Well, there is the traditional stupid pre-3rd ed save or die poison. I distinctly remember not liking that! :)

I love save or die. Nothing beats the suspense in the moment just before the dice falls.

02-25-2010, 11:09 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Perhaps the body parts were too delicate to mention, and got nuked by the censors. After all, this is the era where nymphs and goddesses bundled up and demons and devils vanished and were replaced by look-a-likes with names that would make baby Tolkien cry.

"You find a jar full of preserved wyvern testicles. It's worth 500 gp, all together."

"Ewww." :D

Also, the entry mentions that wyverns eat their whole prey, but bones and metals aren't digested... This seems to imply to me that they vomit these indigestibles like owls do, and that going through the rubbish beneath a wyvern aerie might be a lower-risk way of getting some treasure.

02-25-2010, 11:11 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Also, the entry mentions that wyverns eat their whole prey, but bones and metals aren't digested... This seems to imply to me that they vomit these indigestibles like owls do, and that going through the rubbish beneath a wyvern aerie might be a lower-risk way of getting some treasure.

Giant owl pellets that contain the bones, hair, armor and weapons of dead adventurers but nothing else is both awesomely creepy and an excellent place to leave some treasure in a wyvern lair for the PCs to find.

02-26-2010, 10:08 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Giant owl pellets that contain the bones, hair, armor and weapons of dead adventurers but nothing else is both awesomely creepy and an excellent place to leave some treasure in a wyvern lair for the PCs to find.

Oh, man, I'd hate to be the hirelings when the party catches up with that plan. It's searching monster poop for the rest of their lives. Dragon's lair? "Here, while we bring back the incredible hoard of gold, jewels, and magical treasure, you guys search through the guy's last meal and see if there's anything good." The otyughs would make them get therapy.

As for save or die, my party rolled like 20 1's in the last game, so I'm not so fond. I think the suspense would last exactly the one time it didn't work, and afterward I'd just make paper-thin characters so I wouldn't care when they inevitably died to things I couldn't control.

02-26-2010, 10:24 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Oh, man, I'd hate to be the hirelings when the party catches up with that plan. It's searching monster poop for the rest of their lives. Dragon's lair? "Here, while we bring back the incredible hoard of gold, jewels, and magical treasure, you guys search through the guy's last meal and see if there's anything good." The otyughs would make them get therapy.

As for save or die, my party rolled like 20 1's in the last game, so I'm not so fond. I think the suspense would last exactly the one time it didn't work, and afterward I'd just make paper-thin characters so I wouldn't care when they inevitably died to things I couldn't control.

This isn't really the thread to discuss it, but I think judicious use of save-or-die monsters results in cautious and intelligent play, not paper-thin characters. Obviously you wouldn't want every encounter to be a Wyvern, Catoblepas or Cockatrice! ;)

02-26-2010, 10:37 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Oh, man, I'd hate to be the hirelings when the party catches up with that plan. It's searching monster poop for the rest of their lives. Dragon's lair? "Here, while we bring back the incredible hoard of gold, jewels, and magical treasure, you guys search through the guy's last meal and see if there's anything good." The otyughs would make them get therapy.

...and that, kiddies, is why the GM invented rot grubs.

02-26-2010, 11:43 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

...and that, kiddies, is why the GM invented rot grubs.

Amen.

02-27-2010, 02:47 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Wyvern

Do you pronounce 'Wyvern' like Wivvern, or Wai-vern? Just out of interest, as I've heard both.

According to the nearest dictionary I have to hand the name's derived from the Latin for a viper and the "Wy" includes a long "i" sound like the first syllable in "Wiper".

Which I found very reassuring, since that's how I pronounce it.:p

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

"You find a jar full of preserved wyvern testicles. It's worth 500 gp, all together."

"Ewww." :D

Also, the entry mentions that wyverns eat their whole prey, but bones and metals aren't digested... This seems to imply to me that they vomit these indigestibles like owls do, and that going through the rubbish beneath a wyvern aerie might be a lower-risk way of getting some treasure.

Great ideas!

Maybe add venom-sacs and ovaries to the list of valuable body-parts?

Hmm... venom sacs, love-sacs and regurgitated foecal-sacs - no wonder the sages of the Monstrous Compendium thought detailing a Wyvern's valuable parts was indelicate!

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

...and that, kiddies, is why the GM invented rot grubs.

I was thinking that too.:o

02-27-2010, 03:38 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

So what else is their to talk about the Wyvern entry? I'm struck by this bit:

Quote:

Only young wyverns attack others of their kind, usually to establish new territory. Older wyverns settle disputes in an unknown manner without actual combat.

Some wyverns have been known to work with evil dragons. Usually these dragons completely dominate the weaker and smaller wyverns.

See, once a wyvern establishes a territory it is approached by a dragon who makes it "an offer it can't refuse". It can either bow to the authority of "La Draco Nostra" or become one dead lizard. Older wyverns who have a dispute must approach their Dragon "Capo" to get it settled - or they become two dead lizards. The Wyvern doesn't get much out of this relationship except for occasional support against tough enemies, and it must give the dragon a tithing of their treasure "to show their respect" as well as keep its boss informed if it sees anything interesting in its territory.

The sages' claim that "If game is sparse, it will hunt with a small group of its own kind" is misleading, by the way. When there isn't enough food to go around, they spread out to hunt a wider area or seek a new territory. They don't gather together because there isn't enough food, but to attack tough opponents. If a Wyvern sees a tough but particularly juicy target, like a small caravan or adventuring party, they can inform their draconic boss, who may order a flight of wyverns to get together and make a hit.

02-27-2010, 03:44 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by sim_james

There was the occasional riding wyvern in Dragonlance, from what I recall. That was pre-2nd edition.

Yes, and I'm pretty sure there were mentions of Wyverns in mounts in some other AD&D products. I can't recall what the source was offhand (I think either a Dragon magazine or the 1E DMG) but I remember it saying such a Wyvern was "de-stingered" so it could not attack its rider with its tail.

02-27-2010, 10:45 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

...and that, kiddies, is why the GM invented rot grubs.

And that's the OTHER reason you make the hirelings do it. ;)

03-02-2010, 08:33 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Xorn

After a run of monsters which are a bit insipid, or old "standards", it's nice to come across on of your more WHATTHEFUCK style monsters in the Xorn, which rely defies description:

Quote:

"The xorn (zorn) are natives to the elemental plane of Earth. The wide body of a xorn is made of a pebbly, stone-like material. It has a large, powerful mouth on top of its head with three long arms, tipped with sharp talons, symmetrically positioned every 120 degrees around it. Between the arms are large, stone-lidded eyes that see in all directions. At its base are three thick, short legs, each directly beneath an eye. The whole body is designed for burrowing, mouth first."

We are aided by one of Diterlizzi's fine offerings, which I always thought had a vaguely fishy look to it, which doesn't sit quite right with a burrowing monster and yet I now can't imagine any other way.

Xorn are at heart a dungeon ecology monster, which would not exist without adventurers. They may come from the elemental plane of earth in search of minerals, but what they really exist for is to trying to get at treasure which is carried by adventuring parties - which they can smell from 20 feet away. Sometimes they will demand treasure in return for safe passage, and sometimes they will attack, but it doesn't really matter - they are a hurdle to throw in the way of your PCs, and there are no bones made about it.

And it's no bad thing. Escaping from a dungeon with loot should be hard, and obstacles should be thrown in the way of a "successful" party. Especially when it is pulled off with such gonzo finesse - Xorn are flailing, biting whirlygigs in a fight, who can pass through walls, disguise themselves as stone, and generally continue "guerilla warfare...indefinitely". And no DM will turn his nose up at that.

Adventure hooks also abound in the Xorn entry - not only could you have Xorn guarding parts of the dungeon and demanding treasure for passage (which naturally the PCs won't have, resulting in lengthy and dangerous detours) but you also have this source of conflict with the Dao, which is certainly something a group of PCs can get mixed up in.

Xaren

Xaren are basically Xorn, but they lust for magical treasure above all others. You can read this as a more blatant attempt on the part of the designers to get in the way of the PCs and also to cut them down to size by eating their precious magical items, a la rust monsters.

03-02-2010, 10:19 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

We are aided by one of Diterlizzi's fine offerings, which I always thought had a vaguely fishy look to it, which doesn't sit quite right with a burrowing monster and yet I now can't imagine any other way.

It works if you imagine them swimming through earth and rock!

Quote:

Xaren are basically Xorn, but they lust for magical treasure above all others. You can read this as a more blatant attempt on the part of the designers to get in the way of the PCs and also to cut them down to size by eating their precious magical items, a la rust monsters.

Pretty much so.

Have there been any noteworthy adventures that involve the Elemental Plane of Earth, by the way? Apart from the Great Dismal Delve and the Dao, the place seems rather, well, boring - it's a giant dungeon (or lack of dungeons which is even more boring) just like the Underdark, except it's harder to reach and has less interesting inhabitants.

03-02-2010, 10:28 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

It works if you imagine them swimming through earth and rock!

Pretty much so.

Have there been any noteworthy adventures that involve the Elemental Plane of Earth, by the way? Apart from the Great Dismal Delve and the Dao, the place seems rather, well, boring - it's a giant dungeon (or lack of dungeons which is even more boring) just like the Underdark, except it's harder to reach and has less interesting inhabitants.

I've often thought about setting a campaign in the Inner Planes, but never got round to it. I agree that it stands most of them seem kind of dull, but on the flipside they're a blank canvas on which a DM can write almost anything.

03-03-2010, 12:02 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Have there been any noteworthy adventures that involve the Elemental Plane of Earth, by the way? Apart from the Great Dismal Delve and the Dao, the place seems rather, well, boring

The Planescape supplement on the Inner Planes tried real hard to make the Inner Planes more interesting. It was somewhat successful in this regard. I don't recall off the top of my head what happened in the Plane of Earth specifically, though. Definitely worth looking at, though.

03-03-2010, 12:33 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

The Planescape supplement on the Inner Planes tried real hard to make the Inner Planes more interesting. It was somewhat successful in this regard. I don't recall off the top of my head what happened in the Plane of Earth specifically, though. Definitely worth looking at, though.

The only PS book I own is the 3rd MC and it has lots of interesting inhabitants of the inner planes. The oddest one has to be shad- tiny humanoids evolved from insects grown on plants that druids introduced to the plane of earth (and watered from water and lit from radiance).

As for the xorn, I think they are interesting because they are near top level predators on the plane of earth. I don't remember if they feed on kargra (sp?) though.

03-03-2010, 12:48 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

The only PS book I own is the 3rd MC and it has lots of interesting inhabitants of the inner planes. The oddest one has to be shad- tiny humanoids evolved from insects grown on plants that druids introduced to the plane of earth (and watered from water and lit from radiance).

There's more on the Shad in the Inner Planes book, I believe.

For the xorn, I think that (as with many monsters of surprisingly high intelligence scores) you might get more mileage by thinking about them as NPCs instead of monsters. Xorns are as smart as human beings, so each xorn could have their own personality, goals and methods of achieving their goals. Maybe one xaren has learned to understand a human tongue (perhaps via telepathy or an interpreter) and so sits in the bazaar in the City of Brass or Waterdeep or Sigil and bargains for magic items in exchange for services.

Having a xorn on your side could be very useful for construction purposes. Perhaps that explains where all these dungeons come from: you just bribe a xorn with some gems and he digs you a nice underground maze to populate with monsters.

03-03-2010, 03:17 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Quote:

"The xorn (zorn) are natives to the elemental plane of Earth.

The wide body of a xorn is made of a pebbly, stone-like material. It has a large, powerful mouth on top of its head with three long arms, tipped with sharp talons, symmetrically positioned every 120 degrees around it. Between the arms are large, stone-lidded eyes that see in all directions. At its base are three thick, short legs, each directly beneath an eye. The whole body is designed for burrowing, mouth first."

I always got the impression that the designers of the elemental natives were trying to create a fantasy version of an alien ecology -- and failing pretty badly. The trilateral symmetry is just one facet. This starts of course with the xorn, and continued through that appendix in the first Manual of the Planes and creatures like the tojanida and arrowhawks. The inner planes not only were monolithic and had ridiculous physical laws (subjective gravity?), but their inhabitants were an incoherent mish-mash -- with magical humanoids, animate chunks of the plane, and alien things all thrown together.

I think what they were trying for was something closer to Niven's Integral Trees and Smoke Ring. The two science fiction novels are set in a torus around a neutron star. Outer space, except filled with gas. No gravity, and everything moves, but unlike the inner planes it wasn't an undifferentiated mass. Empires grew up in the resource rich area toward the center, while isolated tribes lived in the thinner outer reaches. The miles-long trees in the title migrated across the torus as part of their lifecycle. The native lifeforms had evolved in zero- or micro-gravity, and mixed with the human colonists who had lost much of the technology of their ancestors and had adapted to their environment: For instance, the "jungle giants" who grew up in zero G were extremely elongated and had prehensile toes. A fantasy equivalent would make a great elemental plane of air.

03-03-2010, 05:34 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

As for the xorn, I think they are interesting because they are near top level predators on the plane of earth. I don't remember if they feed on kargra (sp?) though.

Going by their Monstrous Manual entry they're not "near top level predators", but the Earth-plane analogue of herbivores:

Quote:

Habitat/Society: A xorn is normally found on the elemental plane of Earth. It is only on the Prime Material plane if forcibly summoned or if it was the victim of an interplanar accident.

On their native plane, xorn are as peaceful as Prime Material plane herbivores. While xorn are intelligent, their society is limited to small clans of mineral gatherers. These clans wander from place to place, leaving behind open pockets where they have eaten out a vein of mineral. On the Prime Material plane they always seek wide regions of stone underground. What humans would consider treasures, xorn consider food. They keep their store of food in a nearby air pockets.

Ecology: On the Prime Material plane, they are visitors that serve no ecological function. On their own plane, they are gatherers, eating only stone and minerals. The empty pockets in the stone are quickly inhabited by various creatures of the plane. Dao have been known to hunt them for sport. Equally as often, xorn serve dao as slaves.

Which gives rise to a couple of question...

If Xorn are some sort of sapient herdbeast (imagine a trifoil stony gnu!), what Elemental Earth predator preys on them? The only predator that's mentioned are the dao who "hunt them for sport", but I'm sure there are huge and horrible burrowing things that prey on Xorn and lesser creatures of the earth.

If they enter the Prime Material through force or accident, most Xorn will be desperate to return home - surely there's an adventure idea in there:

A Xorn offers a band of adventurers a horde of platinum (since it's not much interested in none-gem treasure) in return for entering some horrible area of the Underdark to find her nest-mates and plane shift them all home. (Of course this can be expanded to a "rescue the Xorn from slavery" scenario).

Treasure is mysteriously vanishing from fortified, teleport-warded vaults. The thief is a Xorn, committing robberies at the behest of an evil wizard who demands an extortionate fee to send it home.

The local magician accidentally summons a Xorn. The outraged creature demolished the mage's house, killing him, and is now running amoc. Can the players slay or banish it before the town is reduced to rubble?

03-03-2010, 05:45 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Xaren

Xaren are basically Xorn, but they lust for magical treasure above all others. You can read this as a more blatant attempt on the part of the designers to get in the way of the PCs and also to cut them down to size by eating their precious magical items, a la rust monsters.

Hmm, maybe Xaren aren't a separate species, but are Xorn junkies. The unhealthy sheen of their hide, slightly shrunken stature and insatiable cravings (for metal) are all symptoms of their addiction to enchanted metal.

That boost of strength from eating a +1 dagger may make the Xaren feel stronger, but like most addictions the long-term cost is far worse. Soon they "require magical metal to maintain their health" and even if they keep their habit supplied their constitutions eventually collapse under the strain, leaving them to die in twitching agony.

03-03-2010, 06:37 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
Going by their Monstrous Manual entry they're not "near top level predators", but the Earth-plane analogue of herbivores:

? They were predators before the MM and after it. The crysmal, from the 1e FF, mentions xorns prey on them.

As for what preys on them- trilling shards from mineral (and Dragon in the 170's) would make great top level predators for earth.

03-03-2010, 11:37 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH
? They were predators before the MM and after it. The crysmal, from the 1e FF, mentions xorns prey on them.

As for what preys on them- trilling shards from mineral (and Dragon in the 170's) would make great top level predators for earth.

True enough. I was only talking about the Xorn as depicted in the 2E Monstrous Compendium - which appear to me to be described as relatively peaceful gatherers who are occasionally forced into the Prime Material, were they are driven to rob creatures of their gems just to survive, and are often brutally hunted and enslaved by Dao.

The vibe I get from the 1E Monster Manual's Xorn was quite different. They appear to deliberately venture into dungeons to mug adventurers for their valuables, and I see them as being movers-and-shakers back on the Elemental Plane of Earth.

Funny what difference a bit of flavour text can make, isn't it.

03-04-2010, 02:03 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Hmm, maybe Xaren aren't a separate species, but are Xorn junkies. The unhealthy sheen of their hide, slightly shrunken stature and insatiable cravings (for metal) are all symptoms of their addiction to enchanted metal.

That boost of strength from eating a +1 dagger may make the Xaren feel stronger, but like most addictions the long-term cost is far worse. Soon they "require magical metal to maintain their health" and even if they keep their habit supplied their constitutions eventually collapse under the strain, leaving them to die in twitching agony.

Ideas like this make me want to run a 4E campaign using all the silliest things we've come up with since the letter A. Xorn junkies, Will-O-Wisps that demand their rent, etc. :D

03-04-2010, 03:16 AM

Belchion

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Xaren

Xaren are basically Xorn, but they lust for magical treasure above all others. You can read this as a more blatant attempt on the part of the designers to get in the way of the PCs and also to cut them down to size by eating their precious magical items, ala rust monsters.

Of course, this can also be used by adventurers to get rid of cursed items. There is this cursed portcullis that prevents you from entering the dungeon? Call a Xaren! I even could imagine circles of good spellcasters herding Xaren and sending adventurers around to gather cursed items for feeding them.

Of course, the question is, what happens to Xaren who eat cursed items - are they cursed or do they just find such items tasting horrible and upsetting their stomach?

03-05-2010, 11:52 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion

Of course, this can also be used by adventurers to get rid of cursed items. There is this cursed portcullis that prevents you from entering the dungeon? Call a Xaren! I even could imagine circles of good spellcasters herding Xaren and sending adventurers around to gather cursed items for feeding them.

Of course, the question is, what happens to Xaren who eat cursed items - are they cursed or do they just find such items tasting horrible and upsetting their stomach?

That's an easy question to answer.

You know how some cursed weapons in AD&D have a minus to hit and damage instead of a plus?

A Xaren adds the magical bonus of an enchanted weapon it devours to its hit points, but if it eats a cursed weapon "negative bonus" (literally and/or metaphysically) it may become an Undead Xaren, sometimes called a Mali-Xaren.

These fearsome undead retain a living Xaren's lust for magical metal and have a range of uncanny powers. All have energy drain like a wight or vampire, and in addition they have magical powers derived from the cursed metal that created them. For example, a Xaren which eats a backbiter spear is able to reflect missile attacks back onto its attackers, one that ate a berserker sword can enter a murderous frenzy, and so on and so forth.

03-08-2010, 06:58 AM

Vultur10

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

There's more on the Shad in the Inner Planes book, I believe.

Shad? Seriously?

Why would they name an Earth-elemental being after a kind of fish? A water-elemental would be more appropriate ;)

03-08-2010, 06:46 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yeti

A new entry, a new befuddling throwaway line: "Sometimes confused with the abominable snowman, the yeti is a distant cousin to the great carnivorous apes of warmer climates." Sometimes confused with the abominable snowman? Is the writer saying that Yetis and abominable snowmen are different things? In which case, where is the MM entry for the abominable snowman, dammit?

Anyway, the Yeti is a likeable creature - I have a great fondness for monstrous apes - although I have to say, I'm puzzled as to why the designers made it an arctic monster given that our real-world Yeti is supposed to live in a tropical mountain region. Nevertheless, the Yeti has quite a few fun special abilities which make up for this, including an eyes-which-paralyse-prey-with-fright trick and the ability to hug-to-freeze. A Yeti ambush is a genuinely nasty surprise for the unsuspecting party, and makes for a nice king-kong style fight.

Yeti are of average intelligence, although why they need to be is not really clear - they live in family groups, have no civilization, and don't make anything. I imagine that being of average intelligence and yet lacking any way of expressing that intelligence would be a somewhat boring and unfulfilling existence. Perhaps Yetis philosophize or write poetry to pass the cold lonely evenings.

Yeti claws and teeth are worth a gold piece each, though the hide is worth 300. A decent earner, really.

03-08-2010, 07:32 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yeti are of average intelligence, although why they need to be is not really clear - they live in family groups, have no civilization, and don't make anything. I imagine that being of average intelligence and yet lacking any way of expressing that intelligence would be a somewhat boring and unfulfilling existence. Perhaps Yetis philosophize or write poetry to pass the cold lonely evenings.

Not necessarily.

Perhaps they're more like fey. They might live in solely the moment. All they'd care about is the roaring and the chest-beating.

After all, intelligence is a tool, a key. Not a motivation. Intellect doesn't tell us what to do; our needs and wants are still wired to our instincts. What we do with the intelligence -- even knowledge and wisdom and speech, if we take the pre-modern view and assume some of those characteristics are as innate as teeth or magic in fabulous beasts -- is based on our hindbrain urges.

Not every smart beast has to be a gregarious beast with elaborate social rituals that develops incredibly convoluted societies. Nor do they have to have the endless curiosity about wonders like the unfolding possibilities of technology, or magic. Not all intelligent beings have to have overdeveloped empathy, a fear of being alone, a love of art.

The yeti might be very intelligent, if conversed with. But perhaps their eyes are always to the wind and their feet itch for the path that takes them over the next summit, then the next. They savor the blood of their prey, and the act of ripping them apart, more than they do cities and culture.

03-09-2010, 04:51 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

You know, Alexander the Great fought a yeti once. True story. True-ish, anyway.

Yetis survive the cold via their unusual fur. This suggests to me "Yeti fur coat". Maybe just a few fur coats for the PCs to wear as they journey into the Elemental Plane of Ice. Or maybe a village that survives the freezing cold by slaughtering yetis for their fur. Or maybe it just means their pelt can be sold back at town for 300 gp, just like the entry later says.

Yetis have a second eyelid for protecting against blowing snow. good luck building a plot based on that datum.

One wonders why, exactly, the yeti's blue eyes are so terrifying.

03-09-2010, 11:01 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Wait, yeti are supposed to live in a tropical mountain region? Where? Is it possible you're thinking about Bigfoot? I know a lot of fiction merge Bigfoot, Yeti, AND the Abominable Snowman into a singular race, but the text implies that the Bigfoot is the distant cousin they're talking about. Though that could just be the Carnivorous Ape I think we covered earlier. At this point, all I can think of when I think of Yeti are the Darkstalker character and that Sam and Max game. Though if the Yeti really are intelligent, and villages are slaughtering for their coats, that could be a disturbing adventure hook right there.

03-09-2010, 11:29 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Vultur10
Shad? Seriously?

Why would they name an Earth-elemental being after a kind of fish? A water-elemental would be more appropriate ;)

My suspicion is their creator had never heard of the fish, and just though "shad" would be a cool name. I wonder whether they created it by dropping the "r" from "shard"?

Although we could postulate there's some aspect of their earth elemental that resembles a shad, let me think now...

A shad is a saltwater fish that breeds in freshwater, like a salmon.

A shad-fly is another word for a mayfly, an insect that breeds in freshwater and lives in the air.

So, maybe the elemental shad is also a creature of two worlds. The adults spend their lives burrowing-swimming through the solid matter of the Elemental Plane of Earth, but they migrate into the Elemental Plane of Water to breed. It's just that the eponymous sages have yet to realize their tiny, fish-like spawn are not a tiny breed of Water Elemental.

03-10-2010, 12:08 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yeti

A new entry, a new befuddling throwaway line: "Sometimes confused with the abominable snowman, the yeti is a distant cousin to the great carnivorous apes of warmer climates." Sometimes confused with the abominable snowman? Is the writer saying that Yetis and abominable snowmen are different things? In which case, where is the MM entry for the abominable snowman, dammit?

Yes, that first line really threw me too. As far as I know, there's no "Abominable Snowman" anywhere in the official corpus of 2nd edition AD&D monsters...

which just means we'll have to come up with one ourselves!

Hmm...

An Abominable Snowman looks very much like a Yeti, explaining why the two creatures are so often confused. It is more upright in posture and domed of brow than a Yeti. In habits and abilities they are quite different.

They are Abominable - there is something unutterably detestable and terrifying about the appearance of these creatures, causing people to flee at the sight of them. Abominable Snowmen possess a variety of uncanny powers, possibly psionic in origin, that allow them to turn invisible, impose fearsome curses and dominate the wills of other creatures.

They have a mastery of Snow - As well as the aforementioned powers, Abominable Snowmen have an ability to manipulate frozen water in all its forms. A group of Snowfolk can summon blizzards and avalanches, mold a glacier into a hidden temple-fortress of ice (their preferred dwelling place) and create weapons out of ice as hard as steel.

They are Manlike - unlike Yeti, the Abominable Snowmen are sociable creatures possessing the arts and crafts of civilization, albeit a civilization built of crafted snow. These creatures are secretive to an obsessive, virtually paranoid extent, and shun dealings with non-snowmen - or at least, they avoid obvious dealings with other sapient. There are persistent rumours that many of the human monasteries in the frozen mountains are ruled by hidden Snowmen Abbots who use their powers to manipulate the races of warmer lands, some say they are "Secret Masters" who control entire kingdoms.

...Now I'm tempted to write up their AD&D stats.

03-10-2010, 12:19 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
Not necessarily.

Perhaps they're more like fey. They might live in solely the moment. All they'd care about is the roaring and the chest-beating.

SNIP

That's pretty much it, except for the importance of environment on these creatures' intelligence. See, the aforementioned Abominable Snowman and the Yeti are two sides of the same species. During interglacial periods most of the Snowfolk develop into Yeti, except for a few clusters in rare mountain peaks where the elements conspire to awaken their Abominability.

But when the Great Freeze comes and a new ice-age rolls down from the North, the arctic Yeti of those realms become highly intelligent Abominable Snowmen, who quickly form a psychic connection with their mountain cousins and unite forces to build a world-spanning Abominable Empire.

Then the cycle turns and the ice-age recedes, the Ice Palaces and Artifacts of the Snowfolk melt away and their great Empire is forgotten...

...until the Ice comes again.

03-10-2010, 12:31 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

One wonders why, exactly, the yeti's blue eyes are so terrifying.

It's a fragment of the Abominable Mental Powers of their "civilized cousins". It's not their eyes' blue colouration that shuts down a victim's ability to take conscious movement, but a subconscious psionic power, similar to hold person or psionic paralysis, which requires the Yeti to form a psychic link with its target via eye contact.

Fortunately, the Yeti's gaze only affects an unprepared and off-balanced mind, thus it only works on surprised victims.

03-10-2010, 12:49 AM

Lord_Gamera

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth

Wait, yeti are supposed to live in a tropical mountain region? Where? Is it possible you're thinking about Bigfoot? I know a lot of fiction merge Bigfoot, Yeti, AND the Abominable Snowman into a singular race, but the text implies that the Bigfoot is the distant cousin they're talking about. Though that could just be the Carnivorous Ape I think we covered earlier. At this point, all I can think of when I think of Yeti are the Darkstalker character and that Sam and Max game. Though if the Yeti really are intelligent, and villages are slaughtering for their coats, that could be a disturbing adventure hook right there.

Subtropical mountain range, technically. Yeti are alleged to be Himalayan in origin and that mountain range lies on the South Western border of China and pretty solidly in the Northern subtropical belt.

I figure their intelligence is expressed as a tendency towards meditation and philosophical contemplation, hence the ascetic lifestyle.

03-10-2010, 04:11 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

It's a fragment of the Abominable Mental Powers of their "civilized cousins". It's not their eyes' blue colouration that shuts down a victim's ability to take conscious movement, but a subconscious psionic power, similar to hold person or psionic paralysis, which requires the Yeti to form a psychic link with its target via eye contact.

Perhaps the Yeti are not so much of average intelligence as they are unable to be measured on our linear intelligence scale. While they mostly act like animals, Yetis are in fact superhumanly, terrifyingly intelligent. They act as animals all the time because they are a band of solipsistic monks who care nothing for the world or each other and only perform the minimum tasks necessary to survive so that they can keep meditating upon mysteries the human brain can barely perceive. Each Yeti could easily solve the world's problems through creative and innovative solutions, but none can be motivated to care about human beings, or about any other sentients beyond themselves, for they believe this world is just an illusion trying to distract themselves from the great cosmic mysteries. And perhaps they are right.

That is what the adventurers see in the yeti's eyes: the startlingly vast mind behind the animal, and man's inconsequential role in the universe.

03-10-2010, 06:18 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Perhaps the Yeti are not so much of average intelligence as they are unable to be measured on our linear intelligence scale. While they mostly act like animals, Yetis are in fact superhumanly, terrifyingly intelligent. They act as animals all the time because they are a band of solipsistic monks who care nothing for the world or each other and only perform the minimum tasks necessary to survive so that they can keep meditating upon mysteries the human brain can barely perceive. Each Yeti could easily solve the world's problems through creative and innovative solutions, but none can be motivated to care about human beings, or about any other sentients beyond themselves, for they believe this world is just an illusion trying to distract themselves from the great cosmic mysteries. And perhaps they are right.

That is what the adventurers see in the yeti's eyes: the startlingly vast mind behind the animal, and man's inconsequential role in the universe.

That I like. Self-flagellation, attempting to emulate various animals, sitting in holes or living on small platforms precariously perched on posts for decades at a time, and other seemingly inexplicable behaviors similar those of hermits and ecstasies. The wild overgrown hair (not fur) matted with filth and creepy eyes are just the natural consequences of this lifestyle. Desert Father or bodhisattva, except no (apparent?) traces of compassion and humility. All the world is Maya.

03-10-2010, 06:30 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

The wild overgrown hair (not fur) matted with filth and creepy eyes are just the natural consequences of this lifestyle. Desert Father or bodhisattva, except no (apparent?) traces of compassion and humility. All the world is Maya.

Yeti don't naturally live in the frozen mountainous wastes. They choose to live there, to deny themselves the comforts of this world.

03-10-2010, 07:02 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Perhaps the Yeti are not so much of average intelligence as they are unable to be measured on our linear intelligence scale. While they mostly act like animals, Yetis are in fact superhumanly, terrifyingly intelligent. They act as animals all the time because they are a band of solipsistic monks who care nothing for the world or each other and only perform the minimum tasks necessary to survive so that they can keep meditating upon mysteries the human brain can barely perceive. Each Yeti could easily solve the world's problems through creative and innovative solutions, but none can be motivated to care about human beings, or about any other sentients beyond themselves, for they believe this world is just an illusion trying to distract themselves from the great cosmic mysteries. And perhaps they are right.

That is what the adventurers see in the yeti's eyes: the startlingly vast mind behind the animal, and man's inconsequential role in the universe.

That's a nice idea. The Yeti are the ascetic hermits to the Abominable Snowmen's Lamas.

I'd toyed with the idea that looking into the yeti's eyes caused a terrifying contact with a vast cold something, but couldn't flesh it out. Making them Void-Meditating Yogis would be a perfect justification. Not so sure about the "vast intelligence" bit though - I like to imagine the Abominable Snowmen as being the ones with the Great Intelligence, but the Yetis are beings to which intelligence is almost irrelevant - it's the momentary realization that having a mind doesn't matter that makes eye contact with them so terrifying.

03-22-2010, 03:02 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Is the manual finished? Or are we just taking a break?

Or have we covered Zombies and Yuan-ti already?

Just curious....

03-22-2010, 07:29 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Is the manual finished? Or are we just taking a break?

The thread's sleeping. We still have Yuan-ti & Yuan-ti Histachii, Yugoloth Guardians, Zaratan and Zombies to handle!

03-23-2010, 01:12 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Don't worry, I haven't gone away. Just been house moving and busy with work. Should be okay some time this week to continue.

03-23-2010, 02:42 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Don't worry, I haven't gone away. Just been house moving and busy with work. Should be okay some time this week to continue.

It would be a shame for the thread(s) to die this near the end.

03-24-2010, 04:13 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Pukako

Is the manual finished? Or are we just taking a break?

Or have we covered Zombies and Yuan-ti already?

Just curious....

I wouldn't worry about it.

We've only got five monsters left from the Monstrous Manual, but there's still all the Monstrous Compendiums to do.

It's not like we're going to be running out of AD&D monsters in a hurry.:)

03-24-2010, 05:36 PM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I wouldn't worry about it.

We've only got five monsters left from the Monstrous Manual, but there's still all the Monstrous Compendiums to do.

It's not like we're going to be running out of AD&D monsters in a hurry.:)

Hell yeah. Looking my shelf alone I see Dark Sun Compendium 2, Ravenloft 1, 2, and 3, Mysteria Compendium, and Planescape 1, and 2.

Damnit, I never did find the binder where I had Dark Sun 1 stored(DS 1 was released for some weird reason as papers that you put in a binder).

03-27-2010, 02:50 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

Damnit, I never did find the binder where I had Dark Sun 1 stored(DS 1 was released for some weird reason as papers that you put in a binder).

That looseleaf format they used for the early 2E AD&D Monstrous Compendiums didn't receive much favour with me either. Having your Monster Manual in a folder had a few organisational advantages, since you can rearrange, remove & insert sheets as you liked, but the increased durability of a decent binding and hardcover far outweighed that, in my humble opinion.

The biggest advantage of the 2E monster layout was putting each monster on a whole number of pages (usually one). That was very user-friendly.

03-30-2010, 07:06 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

And we're back in business! Sorry for the long delay. Would you believe it, but I actually had to do some work while I was at work, for a change?

Yuan-ti

First monster back, and it's a good'un. I don't think it's going out on too much of a limb to say that we all love a good Yuan-ti, right? Even if, as psionic monsters, they were unusable for 12-year-old me, unaware of and unable to afford the psionics handbook for quite a few more years.

I love random tables, especially for mutations, and it's good to see that the Yuan-ti entry has one - you don't actually get that many in the MM as a whole. Admittedly the contents aren't hugely interesting, but nevermind; the text contains the immortal line: "This is a general guide; the DM can invent his own combinations of snake and human." Don't you just love being encouraged to eb creative?

Yuan-ti society itself is not exactly fleshed out; we're just told that they are "geniuses" who "worship evil". This gives them somewhat of a modular scope; they're very much plug-and-play. Do you need a sinister, intelligent race of evil worshippers in your campaign? No problem; just crack open your nearest MM, unplug the Yuan-ti, and slot them right in.

I usually imagine Yuan-ti as vaguely South-East Asian, living in Angkor Wat style jungle temples. Unlike other evil races there's no mention of Yuan-ti plotting to overthrow "good" societies; I take this to mean that as long as they can get along with worshipping evil undisturbed they're not necessarily bad neighbours.

03-30-2010, 07:50 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yeah, yuan-ti customisability and scaling (pun intended) does make them a highly versatile enemy. The fact that they also need regular infusions of human stock for breeding and regularly infiltrate normal society also makes them a good deal more creepy than another goblinoid race.

03-30-2010, 07:52 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

the text contains the immortal line: "This is a general guide; the DM can invent his own combinations of snake and human." Don't you just love being encouraged to be creative?

Homo ouroboros: A breed of contortionists who travel by biting their own toes, and rolling. Often find work in carnivals, or unclogging drain pipes.

03-30-2010, 11:25 PM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I've always been a big fan of the yuan-ti with snake heads for hands--it's just the right combo of dangerous and goofy for that to be a hit in my imagination. So, of course, it's been gone as an option in both 3.5 and 4e.

03-31-2010, 12:19 AM

rex monday

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

I've always been a big fan of the yuan-ti with snake heads for hands--it's just the right combo of dangerous and goofy for that to be a hit in my imagination. So, of course, it's been gone as an option in both 3.5 and 4e.

How so? In what way are you prevented from just saying whatever melee attack a yuan-ti has is a snake bite from his snake hands? Maybe add poison or something.

03-31-2010, 12:52 AM

HaplessVictim

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The Yuan-ti were the first "module specific" monster I ever used outside of that module. They were introduced, if I remember correctly, in "The Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan" but did little more there than be the "jungle savages" in the valley/crater that hide the eponymous shrine. I was intrigued by the "super-genius evil snakemen" concept, though, and made them mid-level baddies in a couple of adventures over the years. I had big plans for them in the last campaign I designed for 1st ed (but never ran). There was to be an enormous and wealthy Yuan-ti civilization south of the Europe-esque land where the player characters lived. I'd hoped to be able to stun and frighten the players by showing them a powerful and advanced civilization of pure evil right on their doorsteps, but never got the chance.

03-31-2010, 02:43 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yuan-ti make perfect elder serpent people for a Howard-esque sword-and-sorcery campaign.

Imagine starting a campaign with one PC as the newly enthroned king of Valusia, after killing the old king, and the rest as his comrades and councilors... :D

03-31-2010, 04:51 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by HaplessVictim

The Yuan-ti were the first "module specific" monster I ever used outside of that module. They were introduced, if I remember correctly, in "The Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan" but did little more there than be the "jungle savages" in the valley/crater that hide the eponymous shrine. I was intrigued by the "super-genius evil snakemen" concept, though, and made them mid-level baddies in a couple of adventures over the years. I had big plans for them in the last campaign I designed for 1st ed (but never ran). There was to be an enormous and wealthy Yuan-ti civilization south of the Europe-esque land where the player characters lived. I'd hoped to be able to stun and frighten the players by showing them a powerful and advanced civilization of pure evil right on their doorsteps, but never got the chance.

The outline is right but the name is wrong - the module the Yuan-ti premiered in was Dwellers of the Forbidden City.

If I remember rightly The Hidden Shrine of Tamoachan did premier a popular monster - the Gibbering Moulder. It always seemed a bizarre fit to the module to me.

Anyhow, Yuan-ti are one of those monsters you could base an entire campaign around - the serpentine schemers plotting to overthrow the mammalian races and bring about the Rule of the Reptiles.

However, I am a bit unhappy about the backstory. I prefer them to be Howard-style pre-human serpent-people rather than a cult of humans who've been turned into snake-things by an "reptilian elder god". Like Howard's serpent men they were forced to use magic to hide in the appearance of humanoids after being almost slaughtered by the upstart mammals. To their great shame, they have been pretending to be human for so long that most of them have acquired permanent anthropoid traits.* Still, their leaders are true examples of their species and when the Glorious Day of Victory comes they can use their magic to mimic their rulers shape and return their whole species to its proper form.

*I imagine they use something like the Call of Cthulhu spell "Devour Shape" to permanently assume a humanoid disguise by devouring the victim whose shape they assume. Unfortunately the spell has long-term side effects.

Oh, and obviously the titles the Monstrous Manual quotes are completely backwards. The "purebloods" or "truly blessed" are those Yuan-ti without the taint of human gene-plasm, the "abominations" are those wretched creatures that closely resemble vile humanity, and the "half-breeds" are in-between.

03-31-2010, 04:54 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I never gave them much thought other than placing a city of theirs in the distant north- in a volcano to provide them heat.

03-31-2010, 05:00 AM

Hexmage

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Anyway, Yuan-ti are one of those monsters you could base an entire campaign around - the serpentine schemers plotting to overthrow the mammalian races and bring about the Rule of the Reptiles.

I'm actually doing exactly this.

I also had the yuan-ti be the "creators" of the couatls. An angel came to civilize the yuan-ti and teach them about the gods, but they didn't quite understand the message and began to worship the angel itself as a god. Their worship transformed the greater angel and its less powerful angelic allies into the snake-like couatls.

As for why the yuan-ti became evil, the demon lord Sertrous seduced them with promises of power and led them in a war against an ancient magocracy.

03-31-2010, 05:10 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Was it 1e or 2e where they were given extensive psionics?

03-31-2010, 08:24 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I never really used Yuan-ti in my campaigns. For any edition when I think about it. I think they suffer from snake people syndrome. Yuan-ti, Salamanders, Naga, etc. I suppose you could make a plot about how the snake people all being one species but I often found the Yuan-ti being pushed out by the other snake people.

03-31-2010, 10:26 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by rex monday

How so? In what way are you prevented from just saying whatever melee attack a yuan-ti has is a snake bite from his snake hands? Maybe add poison or something.

I'm not, obviously. But it's been taken out of the books and with it goes some whimsy.

03-31-2010, 05:00 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

I never really used Yuan-ti in my campaigns. For any edition when I think about it. I think they suffer from snake people syndrome. Yuan-ti, Salamanders, Naga, etc. I suppose you could make a plot about how the snake people all being one species but I often found the Yuan-ti being pushed out by the other snake people.

I agree - monster overlap is a huge problem with the MM. (Humanoid races being the obvious example: "Hmm, do I use orcs or hobgoblins? Interesting choice. Oh no, wait, it isn't, they're almost exactly the same.")

Snake people really are one of those creatures that you can't use more than one of in a campaign. If you're going to have Naga you can't really have Yuan-ti, and vice versa.

03-31-2010, 05:01 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH
Was it 1e or 2e where they were given extensive psionics?

I never played much 1e but they get a shitload of psionics in the 2e MM.

03-31-2010, 06:03 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Snake people really are one of those creatures that you can't use more than one of in a campaign. If you're going to have Naga you can't really have Yuan-ti, and vice versa.

I think you can, but you have to tie them closely together somehow, not just have two separate and different sorts of snake people in two different parts of the setting.

03-31-2010, 06:14 PM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

... which I think dovetails perfectly with standard Yuan-ti culture, myself, because if I had to name one thing that stands out about the Yuan-ti, that thing would be their unnatural skills at breeding mutant ophidian horrors and also their cultural tendency to form into distinct castes.

Wait.

If I had to name two things that stand out about the Yuan-ti, those things would be their unnatural skills at breeding mutant ophidian horrors, and their cultural tendency to form into distinct castes, and also their vast and just-slightly-alien intelligence.

Er, shit.

If I had to name three things that stand out about the Yuan-ti, those things would be their unnatural skills at breeding mutant ophidian horrors, their cultural tendency to form into distinct castes, and their vast and just-slightly-alien intelligence, and also their literally religious dedication to the utter ruin of the inferior mammal-races I'LL COME IN AGAIN!

03-31-2010, 06:41 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

If you're going to have Naga you can't really have Yuan-ti, and vice versa.

??

Mythological spirit beings are nothing like corrupted humans turned snakes. And neither are snake shaped elementals.

03-31-2010, 07:25 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

??

Mythological spirit beings are nothing like corrupted humans turned snakes. And neither are snake shaped elementals.

I just mean there's a bit of motif-mixture that will diminish the interest and power of both. If you have a Yuan-ti portion of a campaign following a Naga one, the reaction will generally not be "Ooh, Yuan-ti!"; rather it will be something like "Oh, more snake people."

04-01-2010, 05:58 AM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

??

Mythological spirit beings are nothing like corrupted humans turned snakes. And neither are snake shaped elementals.

Maybe from a physical or psychological standpoint. From the point of a group of people who kill things and take their stuff though....it's a snake person. Most players of D&D aren't going into the questions of "Why do these snake human hybrids worship evil" or "Oh, it's not really a snake person. It's actually an elemental that's chosen to manifest itself in a snake like form". To them it's "Snake person! KILL IT! TAKE IT'S STUFF!". And a lot of them aren't going to know about mythological spirit beings either. It's just more snake people. Plus a lot of D&D settings basically play naga up as....ambitious snake people, not spirit beings. Forgotten Realms being the worst about this but other settings as well.

Even if you do have players who like going into details about that stuff (and for our upcoming 4E campaign I have at least one player who does) they'll eventually get bored of another different snake person even if the mythological origins for all three are radically different.

The humanoid thing being a good point. I'll probably throw orcs or hobgoblins at the players but not both. For more variety I'll just give either the orcs or hobgoblins the stats of the others but leave them as orcs/hobgoblins so the players have a bit more variety of foes without it feeling like a forced alliance of a bunch of different humanoids.

04-05-2010, 02:16 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Have you noticed that the portrayal of Yuan-ti in a lot of D&D sources doesn't seem to fit their stated alignment very well?

Yuan-ti are Chaotic Evil. They're usually portrayed as coldly calculating geniuses with a rigid caste system that run tightly organized conspiracies to rule mankind for their own nefarious aims. Evil yes, but where's the chaos?

I don't recall much (if any) mention of the streak of back-stabbing anarchy I'd except in a society with that alignment. I half-suspect they were made CE out of some belief that was the "evillest" alignment.

Wouldn't Neutral Evil or Lawful Evil be a better fit?

04-05-2010, 03:56 AM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Have you noticed that the portrayal of Yuan-ti in a lot of D&D sources doesn't seem to fit their stated alignment very well?

Yuan-ti are Chaotic Evil. They're usually portrayed as coldly calculating geniuses with a rigid caste system that run tightly organized conspiracies to rule mankind for their own nefarious aims. Evil yes, but where's the chaos?

I don't recall much (if any) mention of the streak of back-stabbing anarchy I'd except in a society with that alignment. I half-suspect they were made CE out of some belief that was the "evillest" alignment.

Wouldn't Neutral Evil or Lawful Evil be a better fit?

I suspect you're not alone in that train of thought - Yuan-Ti lost the "Chaotic" part in the transition from 3.5 to 4.

I confess I've never used them much either. Too much competition in the evil mastermind category.

04-06-2010, 02:59 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Have you noticed that the portrayal of Yuan-ti in a lot of D&D sources doesn't seem to fit their stated alignment very well?

Yuan-ti are Chaotic Evil. They're usually portrayed as coldly calculating geniuses with a rigid caste system that run tightly organized conspiracies to rule mankind for their own nefarious aims. Evil yes, but where's the chaos?

I don't recall much (if any) mention of the streak of back-stabbing anarchy I'd except in a society with that alignment. I half-suspect they were made CE out of some belief that was the "evillest" alignment.

Wouldn't Neutral Evil or Lawful Evil be a better fit?

The more I read the 2nd ed MM, the more clear it is that the Lawful/Chaotic spectrum of monster alignments has nothing to do with how anarchistic or orderly you are. It's simply a grading on how exactly evil you are: Lawful or Neutral Evil is more evil than Chaotic Neutral, but less evil than Chaotic Evil. Chaotic Neutral is more evil-ish than Lawful Neutral, etc. And Chaotic Good is somehow less Good than Lawful Good.

Either that, or some Law/Chaos alignments were assigned completely at random without reading the monster's entry. But probably the first theory.

04-06-2010, 04:59 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

The more I read the 2nd ed MM, the more clear it is that the Lawful/Chaotic spectrum of monster alignments has nothing to do with how anarchistic or orderly you are. It's simply a grading on how exactly evil you are: Lawful or Neutral Evil is more evil than Chaotic Neutral, but less evil than Chaotic Evil. Chaotic Neutral is more evil-ish than Lawful Neutral, etc. And Chaotic Good is somehow less Good than Lawful Good.

This, sort of, echoes how it works in 4e, which has LG, G, N (well, Unaligned), E and CE. :)

Quote:

Either that, or some Law/Chaos alignments were assigned completely at random without reading the monster's entry. But probably the first theory.

Actually, I bet it's because, outside of Planescape, the Law-Chaos axis has always been secondary to the Good-Evil one, and no two GMs, players or game designers seem to agree what it means, exactly! :D

04-06-2010, 05:54 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

This, sort of, echoes how it works in 4e, which has LG, G, N (well, Unaligned), E and CE. :)

Not only that, but they seem to have accepted the "Lawful Good is more Good than just Good and Chaotic Evil is more Evil than just Evil" thing people always seem to unthinkingly fall back on.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Actually, I bet it's because, outside of Planescape, the Law-Chaos axis has always been secondary to the Good-Evil one,

Well, early on there was only the Law/Chaos axis, so it wasn't subordinate to Good/Evil then. But it was cribbed directly from Moorcock, where Chaos = Evil and Law = Good. So maybe Elric is to blame for this.

04-06-2010, 06:16 AM

Dormammu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Well, early on there was only the Law/Chaos axis, so it wasn't subordinate to Good/Evil then. But it was cribbed directly from Moorcock, where Chaos = Evil and Law = Good.

Until the final book when Elric realizes Law has been selling him a false bill of goods and he can only bring peace to the world by balancing Law and Chaos. So Neutral = good. ;)

04-06-2010, 06:25 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The writers have never understood their own good/evil/law/chaos stuff.

To use Forgotten Realms as an example. Alustriel founds a city called Silvermoon. It's noted for it's fair and just laws and how open and accepting it is. At the same time those laws are enforced (and some of them are quite harsh, including using magic to make someone have the sensation of being burned alive), often by Alustriel herself.

Her alignment? Chaotic Good.

04-06-2010, 08:19 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Alustriel's just cranky, because of that weird pregnancy-distributed-throughout-her-body-(so-she's-still-hawt) thing she has going on.

The current 4e alignment axis is, ominously*, the same as the old WFRPG alignments:

Lawful -- Good -- Neutral -- Evil -- Chaotic

At least the prior double axes made D&D distinct (if incomprehensible).

* I think this makes 4e's Demon Princes a read-across for the Ruinous Powers from Warhammer.

 And that's even before those parentheticals they used to use: "Chaotic Neutral (evil tendencies)"

04-06-2010, 07:13 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

The more I read the 2nd ed MM, the more clear it is that the Lawful/Chaotic spectrum of monster alignments has nothing to do with how anarchistic or orderly you are. It's simply a grading on how exactly evil you are: Lawful or Neutral Evil is more evil than Chaotic Neutral, but less evil than Chaotic Evil. Chaotic Neutral is more evil-ish than Lawful Neutral, etc. And Chaotic Good is somehow less Good than Lawful Good.

Either that, or some Law/Chaos alignments were assigned completely at random without reading the monster's entry. But probably the first theory.

The first theory doesn't always work - don't forget that orcs are Lawful Evil in 2nd edition. As are a lot of the evil dragons. Liches can be Lawful Evil too.

I think the variance in alignments is due to the fact that the MM is a collection made up of the work of dozens of writers, all of whom having a different interpretation of what alignment meant.

04-07-2010, 12:09 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

The more I read the 2nd ed MM, the more clear it is that the Lawful/Chaotic spectrum of monster alignments has nothing to do with how anarchistic or orderly you are. It's simply a grading on how exactly evil you are: Lawful or Neutral Evil is more evil than Chaotic Neutral, but less evil than Chaotic Evil. Chaotic Neutral is more evil-ish than Lawful Neutral, etc. And Chaotic Good is somehow less Good than Lawful Good.

Either that, or some Law/Chaos alignments were assigned completely at random without reading the monster's entry. But probably the first theory.

Dang it, I should have thought twice before letting the issue of alignment rear its ugly head.

Personally I think it's more about different authors having different interpretations of alignment than either of those two proposals.

Plus, I've long thought Neutral Evil is arguable more malevolent than CE or LE, since it seems the most "doing evil for Evil's sake" alignment.

Anyhow, getting back to Yuan-ti. Rather than have them a mounting threat plotting to destroy mankind maybe we should have them a pathetic, deteriorating race instead.

Every generation becoming weaker than the last, due to a combination of inbreeding and diluting their serpentine blood by mixing with humans. They waste their genius intelligence on fantasizing about their glory days, trying to "one-up" each other through horrendously elaborate plots and devising arts and pleasures of stunning decadence.

04-07-2010, 09:19 PM

Eliott

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The first theory doesn't always work - don't forget that orcs are Lawful Evil in 2nd edition. As are a lot of the evil dragons. Liches can be Lawful Evil too.

I think the variance in alignments is due to the fact that the MM is a collection made up of the work of dozens of writers, all of whom having a different interpretation of what alignment meant.

And they also needed to make societies have alignments as well, which is even harder. Orcs get jumped around alot between chaotic and lawful evil. This may be part of the original source material (In LOTR, Orcs seemed like they themselves were Chaotic Evil but forced to have a Lawful Evil society by their Neutral Evil god-king-eye Sauron)

04-07-2010, 09:45 PM

cpip

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Anyhow, getting back to Yuan-ti. Rather than have them a mounting threat plotting to destroy mankind maybe we should have them a pathetic, deteriorating race instead.

Every generation becoming weaker than the last, due to a combination of inbreeding and diluting their serpentine blood by mixing with humans. They waste their genius intelligence on fantasizing about their glory days, trying to "one-up" each other through horrendously elaborate plots and devising arts and pleasures of stunning decadence.

I like this, and I do believe I may use it in a game of my own at some point. They may well be outrageously advanced in some fashions of magic or technology (or both), but they're often not PRACTICAL applications; they're entertaining.

04-08-2010, 07:23 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yuan-ti (Histachii)

I should probably have lumped this entry together with the previous one, as it doesn't really add very much - it's really just a description of how a Histachii (a reptilian humanoid servitor of the Yuan-ti) is created. As you might expect, this involves lots of rigmarole that looks like it comes from an Indiana Jones film; none of it good for the victim, but all of it good for the DM and the other players.

Suffice it to say, if you're forced to drink the Histachii drink, you're fucked. First of all, there's a decent chance you'll die - and that's if your saving throw is successful. If it isn't, within 7-12 days you'll become a Histachii and there's not a lot you can do about it, not unless somebody manages to rescue you and neutralize poison, dispel magic, remove curse, and heal are cast on you, in that order. And even then you're losing a point of Intelligence.

That said, being a Histachii doesn't sound all that bad as these things go - their duties are "hunting, caring for the yuan-ti's reptile menageries, guarding prisoners, and various custodial chores" (which is pretty much the best a serf or castle servant in any D&D society could hope for), and they also get to take nice cool baths in their leisuretime. I can think of worse lives to lead.

04-08-2010, 08:05 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I guess that is better than having your kids born skum.

04-08-2010, 08:25 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Dormammu

Until the final book when Elric realizes Law has been selling him a false bill of goods and he can only bring peace to the world by balancing Law and Chaos. So Neutral = good. ;)

Yah. I think the BECMI Law-Neutrality-Chaos axis worked fairly well.

Lawful types believe that everything should be ordered, that obeying rules is natural, that you should honor your promises, and frequently chooses the good of the many over the good of the few. Being lawful is usually "good", but not always.

Chaotic folks, on the other hand, believe in luck and chance, that the individual is more valuable than the group, that selfishness is natural and that telling the truth or keeping promises is optional. This frequently ends up as "evil", but not always.

Neutrals, in turn, believe in balance between chaos and order, are primarily interested in their personal survival and well-being (but usually not at the expense of others), try to be self-reliant but don't believe in "luck", and generally can be either "good" or "evil", depending on the situation.

04-09-2010, 05:20 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Suffice it to say, if you're forced to drink the Histachii drink, you're fucked. First of all, there's a decent chance you'll die - and that's if your saving throw is successful. If it isn't, within 7-12 days you'll become a Histachii and there's not a lot you can do about it. And even then you're losing a point of Intelligence.

That said, being a Histachii doesn't sound all that bad as these things go - their duties are "hunting, caring for the yuan-ti's reptile menageries, guarding prisoners, and various custodial chores" (which is pretty much the best a serf or castle servant in any D&D society could hope for), and they also get to take nice cool baths in their leisuretime. I can think of worse lives to lead.

So once you've restored Tim the Cleric from his existence as a Wight by performing Epic Quests (TM), he then manages to get himself captured by the Yuan-ti, and turned into a Histachii without getting killed.

Now he's slightly dumber, but happy, and when you (his old adventuring buddies) arrive to rescue him, he's not going to come along quietly. He's going to remember the Hell you put him through when he was a wight, and scream blue murder

In fact, should one try to rescue or kill these guys?

As to alignment, if you can play an emo sorcerer that's not evil, or a paladin that has a sense of humour, then whatever system you're using should work.

04-10-2010, 02:39 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Yuan-ti (Histachii)

I should probably have lumped this entry together with the previous one, as it doesn't really add very much - it's really just a description of how a Histachii (a reptilian humanoid servitor of the Yuan-ti) is created. As you might expect, this involves lots of rigmarole that looks like it comes from an Indiana Jones film; none of it good for the victim, but all of it good for the DM and the other players.

Suffice it to say, if you're forced to drink the Histachii drink, you're fucked. First of all, there's a decent chance you'll die - and that's if your saving throw is successful. If it isn't, within 7-12 days you'll become a Histachii and there's not a lot you can do about it, not unless somebody manages to rescue you and neutralize poison, dispel magic, remove curse, and heal are cast on you, in that order. And even then you're losing a point of Intelligence.

Wasn't there an earlier version of these monsters that used a venomous bite to induce the transformation - if a human they bit failed the save vs poison they'd turn into another snake-monster, but non-humans just died from the venom.

Upon reflection, I'm getting the Histachii mixed up with another snake-humanoid servitor of the Yuan-ti: The Ophidian. Those were less anthropomorphic than Histachii, having a snake's tail instead of legs and the head of a viper.

Since they're basically scaly werewolves, Ophidians are a far more effective means for the Yuan-ti to mass convert humanity into serpentkind than Histachii. They don't need to prepare potions and force-feed them to people - just send out Ophidians to bite as many people as they can.

I guess they prefer Histachii since they're far more obedient, being "completely submissive to their yuan-ti masters, carrying out their every order without hesitation".

The only other bit of their MM writeup that grabbed me attention is it describing these Low Intelligence (Int 5-7) creatures as "near-mindless abominations".

"Near mindless"? That's a bit harsh for a creature which is only one intelligence step below average!

04-10-2010, 03:39 AM

Belchion

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

"Near mindless"? That's a bit harsh for a creature which is only one intelligence step below average!

Well, perhaps they are intelligent but brainwashed? The wellbeing of their Yuan-Ti masters is all what is on their mind, but they are quite capable of doing a lot of stuff without direct supervision (unlike zombies and the like).

04-11-2010, 01:34 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

When I was a wee kid, it was the histachi that freaked me out the most--I think it's the inevitability of death or grotesque transformation without a way out that did it for me. The illustration is also pretty grotesque, and not in a good way. Baxa's histachi looks like a deformed chicken-man.

04-11-2010, 01:44 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Belchion

Well, perhaps they are intelligent but brainwashed? The wellbeing of their Yuan-Ti masters is all what is on their mind, but they are quite capable of doing a lot of stuff without direct supervision (unlike zombies and the like).

Perhaps they literally become "almost mindless" when being commanded by Yuan-ti?

The Histachii transformation could alter their brain so that any Yuan-ti can use its psionic powers over snakes to shut down their higher brain functions and manipulate them like will-less puppets by directly accessing the "reptile brain" all mammals have plugged into their brainstem. That could explain why they're immune to hold and charm spells - the brain modifications are so extreme Histachii minds do not respond normally to magic.

If their aren't any Yuan-ti aren't around Histachii are fully independent, expressing their (slightly dim) intelligence according to their Chaotic Evil alignment. Some might even change their ways and become Chaotic Neutral anarchists or Chaotic Good freedom fighters.

Then a single Yuan-ti comes along and turns an entire Histachii community into its slaves with a thought...

Hmm, this idea's got potential.

04-11-2010, 02:01 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

If their aren't any Yuan-ti aren't around Histachii are fully independent, expressing their (slightly dim) intelligence according to their Chaotic Evil alignment. Some might even change their ways and become Chaotic Neutral anarchists or Chaotic Good freedom fighters.

They might be of slightly lower intelligence because of conflict or static between their higher order sentient/mammal brain and their more basic reptile brain.

This reminds me of how Aquaman could (when some writer tried to reboot him and make him cooler) access the primitive fish brain that your smarter mammal brain is built on. Aquaman could then shut the fish brain down and knock people unconscious or some such.

I don't think either concept has a good standing on scientific grounds, but this is D&D. It's more important that it sound cool, possibly be disguised in pseudo-medieval language and thought and/or generate some cool plotlines. Maybe the Histachii have their spirit or consciousness or animus or or ka or something replaced by that or a reptile, producing the same effect.

04-14-2010, 11:20 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Only three entries to go. I can't believe this series of threads is coming to an end after all this time... Sob, sniffle, etc. What would be a suitable way to end it? I was thinking a separate thread for "regulars" to post their Top 5 or Top 10 entries?

Anyway...

Yugoloth, Guardian

The paucity of this entry is pretty amazing, when you consider what an important role the Yugoloths play in the D&D multiverse; it wouldn't be until the Planescape Monstrous Compendiums started to be released that we'd get a fully fleshed out set of proper Neutral Evil demons to play with. It's also rather surprising to consider that Yugoloths (according to my comprehensive and scientific poll) are the favourite Lower Planar beings of rpg.net - I'm assuming this is based on their Planescape incarnation and not the MM's.

So what do we get for a bog standard Yugoloth in the 2nd edition Monstrous Manual? The simple answer is not a lot - Yugoloths are yet another variant on the "creature which wizards use to guard things" motif that we've seen so often over the past however-many-hundred pages, and this entry doesn't really even manage to do it with any aplomb. The idea of a big winged bear with ram's horns is okay enough, and as a general rule summoning is a concept for magic-use which really appeals... but the entry is so cursory an overview that it manages to communicate very little flavour.

I find it interesting that Planescape effectively resurrected the old 1st edition daemons with slight name-changes; it's also the setting that reintroduced Orcus. Perhaps by the time it was released, the whole D&D=satanic thing had run its course?

04-15-2010, 12:40 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The problem with "guardian yugoloths" is a fairly common one in D&D--using a common (or uncommon) English word to represent a specific creature; spectre, wraith, etc. The original 1e guardian daemon didn't have anything to do with the NE daemons of Gehenna. But the word daemon was verboten, of course, in 2e, and so it got the same name change to the made-up-but-sinister-sounding "yugoloth".

One of the late-era Planescape books, Faces of Evil, explained the guardian yugoloths by saying that they were effectively magical constructs made by real yugoloths specifically for wizards to summon, getting access to another mortal soul in the process without the distractions of being summoned themselves.

04-15-2010, 12:47 AM

Hexmage

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I'm surprised that yugoloths are so popular. Is their popularity due to Planescape?

04-15-2010, 02:10 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

The problem with "guardian yugoloths" is a fairly common one in D&D--using a common (or uncommon) English word to represent a specific creature; spectre, wraith, etc. The original 1e guardian daemon didn't have anything to do with the NE daemons of Gehenna. But the word daemon was verboten, of course, in 2e, and so it got the same name change to the made-up-but-sinister-sounding "yugoloth".

One of the late-era Planescape books, Faces of Evil, explained the guardian yugoloths by saying that they were effectively magical constructs made by real yugoloths specifically for wizards to summon, getting access to another mortal soul in the process without the distractions of being summoned themselves.

Well you can hardly blame them, can you. It must be one of the most boring duties they can be summoned to the Prime Material to perform. Bound by a crazy wizard (of course they're crazy, who else would summon a NE daemon to guard their cellar) then stuck in a vault for years watching over a shiny geegaw, with nothing but dust and spiders for company.

They're probably glad when some adventurers kick in the door, it'd finally give them something to do.

They don't have much in the way of interesting powers apart from that "immune to damage X" trick. I suppose the Greater Guardian's ability to use suggestion every round - even while it is fighting! - could have some amusing applications. Well, amusing for the DM anyway.

suggest "I'm just an illusion, ignore me."

suggest "The fiend's possessed the cleric, overpower her!"

et cetera, et cetera.

04-15-2010, 04:57 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I have this image of screwing with the players. First they enter a room and defeat it's yugoloth guardian. They open the chest....which turns out to be a mimic. Then they turn around and find the door is gone....they're inside yet another mimic, the big room sized one. :D

04-15-2010, 05:58 AM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hexmage

I'm surprised that yugoloths are so popular. Is their popularity due to Planescape?

Purely and entirely.

And yeah, the Guardian Yugoloth is the result of a search-and-replace for "daemon", nothing more. :D

04-15-2010, 11:32 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

I have this image of screwing with the players. First they enter a room and defeat it's yugoloth guardian. They open the chest....which turns out to be a mimic. Then they turn around and find the door is gone....they're inside yet another mimic, the big room sized one. :D

And the walls are stunjellies? And there's a lurker above and a trapper on the ceiling and floor?

04-15-2010, 02:10 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

And the walls are stunjellies? And there's a lurker above and a trapper on the ceiling and floor?

Good idea!

Didn't City of Brass have a room full of stunjellies to screw with the players?

I still want to convert City of Brass to 4E.

04-15-2010, 10:00 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138

And the walls are stunjellies? And there's a lurker above and a trapper on the ceiling and floor?

Don't forget the closet full of cloakers. And the stone golem and caryatid column statues. And the table and rug under the effects of the animate object spell.

04-15-2010, 11:14 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Hey, the Histaachii just had their first appearance in 4th edition yesterday in Dragon magazine. As a background for PCs no less: you exhibit yellowed eyes that shows that your ancestors were once brainwashed slaves of the Yuan-Ti.

04-16-2010, 04:32 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Something that just came to mind: is the "immune to one additional form of attack" thing inspired by the guardian demon in one of Elric books, which was immune to all swords?

04-16-2010, 04:34 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Don't forget the closet full of cloakers. And the stone golem and caryatid column statues. And the table and rug under the effects of the animate object spell.

And the gazebo out back.

04-16-2010, 08:42 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Ithaeur

Something that just came to mind: is the "immune to one additional form of attack" thing inspired by the guardian demon in one of Elric books, which was immune to all swords?

Not sure, but I like the idea of monsters having resistances to certain types of weapons as well as just to fire, ice, magic, etc. Seems more "mythic", somehow.

04-17-2010, 01:10 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Don't forget the closet full of cloaklers. And the stone golem and caryatid column statues. And the table and rug under the effects of the animate object spell.

Oh, and the water in the basin next to the bed. That's a Water Weird.;

However, the real problems arise when it is revealed that the air in the room is wall-to-wall Invisible Stalkers and Aerial Servants.

You don't want to know what the chamberpot is.:eek:

04-17-2010, 09:05 AM

rex monday

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Oh, and the water in the basin next to the bed. That's a Water Weird.;

However, the real problems arise when it is revealed that the air in the room is wall-to-wall Invisible Stalkers and Aerial Servants.

You don't want to know what the chamberpot is.:eek:

Home to a miniaturized Otyugh?

04-17-2010, 09:10 AM

Inyssius

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Oh, and the water in the basin next to the bed. That's a Water Weird.;)

However, the real problems arise when it is revealed that the air in the room is wall-to-wall Invisible Stalkers and Aerial Servants.

You don't want to know what the chamberpot is.:eek:

Oh, and of course the [mimic] wardrobe full of [raggamoffyns] clothing; with a [peltyn] coin purse lying on top, bulging with [lock lurkers] gold coins.

04-17-2010, 11:44 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by rex monday

Home to a miniaturized Otyugh?

Oh no, that's hardly bad enough to be "you don't want to know" territory. Why Otyughs are practically routine dungeon furniture.

04-17-2010, 11:46 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Inyssi

Oh, and of course the [mimic] wardrobe full of [raggamoffyns] clothing; with a [peltyn] coin purse lying on top, bulging with [lock lurkers] gold coins.

And don't forget the cover on the [Mimic] bed is a Sheet Phantom, and the cushions are Pillow Fungi.

04-18-2010, 12:30 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Somewhere I read a theory that all those weird "not really a bit of dungeon but actually a monster" monsters were brought to the world by the mind flayer, from wherever they came from. The things were living furniture or walls or other devices useful to the illithids. But some escaped and have survived in the wild, imitating their environment that they find themselves in.

I don't recall where I saw it. I also don't know if I like the explanation or not, as it tries to make something silly into something legitimate, rather than embracing the silliness.

04-19-2010, 05:06 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Somewhere I read a theory that all those weird "not really a bit of dungeon but actually a monster" monsters were brought to the world by the mind flayer, from wherever they came from. The things were living furniture or walls or other devices useful to the illithids. But some escaped and have survived in the wild, imitating their environment that they find themselves in.

I don't recall where I saw it. I also don't know if I like the explanation or not, as it tries to make something silly into something legitimate, rather than embracing the silliness.

While I do like to embrace the silly now and again I must confess to finding that theory quite attractive. It fits so neatly with the Mind Flayers and their "squishy biotech".

Why it even explains the Executioners Hood. It's to help elderly Mind Flayers eat their food after their tentacles have got too weak to break open skulls.

04-19-2010, 01:51 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

While I do like to embrace the silly now and again I must confess to finding that theory quite attractive. It fits so neatly with the Mind Flayers and their "squishy biotech".

Why it even explains the Executioners Hood. It's to help elderly Mind Flayers eat their food after their tentacles have got too weak to break open skulls.

Mimics also have obvious uses. It might even explain why Gelatinous Cubes are cubical (for cleaning out the corners of hallways).

Some amount of the D&D monster being aggressive and carnivorous might just be to being in an alien environment, and possibly due to not getting a proper diet of whatever it is that they eat. So they turn to eating people. Might make especial sense if Lurkers Above and Piercers need to eat from sentient beings, like Illithids do.

04-21-2010, 12:12 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Mimics also have obvious uses. It might even explain why Gelatinous Cubes are cubical (for cleaning out the corners of hallways).

Some amount of the D&D monster being aggressive and carnivorous might just be to being in an alien environment, and possibly due to not getting a proper diet of whatever it is that they eat. So they turn to eating people. Might make especial sense if Lurkers Above and Piercers need to eat from sentient beings, like Illithids do.

Well the 10-foot-square corridor-shape of Gelatinous Cubes is already well established. One wonders what they do when they come upon a 3-foot by 7-foot door. Probably just squish through it - they are gelatinous, after all.

As for Mimics, I can just imagine the Mind Flayer advertising campaign:

"From this day forth you will only ever need to buy one item of furniture for your home, for the new Yehthfsjef-brand Universal Furnishing is any piece of furniture you need in one malleable, user-responsive package, whether it's a couch, bed, chair or brain-tapping cage. Telepathically contact our sales-minds now to find out about our easy payment schemes!"

04-21-2010, 03:06 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Well the 10-foot-square corridor-shape of Gelatinous Cubes is already well established. One wonders what they do when they come upon a 3-foot by 7-foot door. Probably just squish through it - they are gelatinous, after all.

Perhaps the mind flayers only make ten by ten hallways? Perhaps the ten foot increment has some specific geometrical or ritual importance to them? Perhaps gelatinous cubes don't naturally occur that large, but grow that size in the wild? Perhaps the cubes can squeeze in a gelatinous manner, but reform to cube shape to make sure they clean the corners of the room?

04-21-2010, 03:30 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Perhaps the mind flayers only make ten by ten hallways? Perhaps the ten foot increment has some specific geometrical or ritual importance to them? Perhaps gelatinous cubes don't naturally occur that large, but grow that size in the wild? Perhaps the cubes can squeeze in a gelatinous manner, but reform to cube shape to make sure they clean the corners of the room?

I thought mind flayer architecture was all squishy and curved, like their tentacles. With that in mind, wouldn't they have made gelatinous... cylinders... to wipe down all their squirming passageways? Perhaps the mind flayer connection just the result of an ill-informed supposition. An urban legend.

After all, isn't there already a creature that is obsessed with geometrical perfection and tidiness? A whole plane of them, in fact?

It just couldn't be, could it? Why on Mechanus would the modrons create a quasi-living engine to clean up the Prime Material Plane? Well, it makes no sense to us... but isn't the angular vacuum-blob the kind of thing that a society of obsessive-compulsives might send as an advance force to prep for an invasion? To make sure everything is all spic and span, so the legions don't get any unregulated stains on their dress whites? Does that mean that once everything's all June Cleaver, the modron march will end at our front door?

<Through the vestibule, three precise knocks are heard>

04-21-2010, 05:32 AM

Lord Zack

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

The question is why would the Modrons invade? What do they want from the Material Plane? Resources? Some kind of specific thing like an artifact or magic? Maybe they want to make the universe more orderly. That could easily backfire, after all war is pretty chaotic.

04-21-2010, 05:14 PM

Pukako

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Don't forget the "Do Not Enter" sign on the door...

04-21-2010, 05:24 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lord Zack

The question is why would the Modrons invade? What do they want from the Material Plane? Resources? Some kind of specific thing like an artifact or magic? Maybe they want to make the universe more orderly. That could easily backfire, after all war is pretty chaotic.

Perhaps... they want to shop? They watched one too many reality shows on their crystal balls (the often-forgotten d1 caste, who come in a variety of translucent and sparkly colors tuned to different "channels"). One in particular where designers strutted their draped and cut fabrics, adroitly enhanced with accessories from the Blue Man (Mercane) wall, and paired with smoky, sultry, or just smashing make overs.

The modrons want to look fierce.

04-23-2010, 07:37 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Zaratan

The penultimate monster in the MM is a really fun one, and in a way it would have been a good note on which to finish; where do you go, conceptually, after "gargantuan slumbering turtle-island demigod"? (The answer is zombie, but that's a bit of a climbdown, don't you feel?)

Zaratan are an Al-Qadim monster, and as is often the case with creatures from that setting, it oozes exactly the right kind of flavour - three parts Arabian Nights, two parts Borges, one part Lord of the Rings. Although as a general rule setting-specific stuff in the MM rather annoys me (as regular readers will be aware), this entry at least has the good grace to state explicitly that the creature is "from the Al-Qadim setting" rather than, for instance, just droning on about names and places you're never heard of if you haven't bought the Forgotten Realms boxed set because you're only 12 years old and haven't saved up enough pocket money.

In physical terms zaratan are a fun adventure in and of themselves - how can you beat a living island? Not to mention a living island that can swallow you, Jonah-like, and might have unknown treasures in its belly? (Adventure seed of all adventure seeds there: "Please, brave adventurers - return the sword of peracles from the zaratan's belly and bring it back to Saxinfraxin land, before it's too late!") But given their intelligence and ability to communicate, they also have the capacity to be moving adventure-dispensers of their very own, fonts of wisdom or disinformation, or even movers and shakers on a global level.

Not only that, you also get a hint at creation myth in the notion that the zaratan were the first inhabitants of the Land of Fate, which is itself great fun.

In short, we like the zaratan.

04-23-2010, 08:41 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Yeah, the zaratan is a simple but sweet, and tremendously atmospheric. Hints of Great A'tuin there, as well. :)

04-23-2010, 11:10 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

It seems to me that it would be really easy to use the Zaratan in other settings, unlike most setting specific monsters. It's a giant wandering island, so maybe it just wanders a bit further away from the Arabia analog in your setting and into your campaign usual regions. Why did it do that? I dunno. Sounds like a mystery for the PCs to investigate.

04-24-2010, 12:21 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

One of my players many years ago told me he wanted to play a zaratan. A zaratan wizard, specifically, whose familiar was the hive-mind of monks who lived on a monastery on his back.

Yeah, I vetoed that one. But it's still a neat idea.

04-24-2010, 01:12 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Lord Zack

The question is why would the Modrons invade? What do they want from the Material Plane? Resources? Some kind of specific thing like an artifact or magic? Maybe they want to make the universe more orderly. That could easily backfire, after all war is pretty chaotic.

Of course they want to make things more orderly. Seeking orderliness is practically the raison d'être of Modron kind.

It's not "unregulated stains on their dress whites" they're concerned about (since Modrons don't wear dress whites), is that they're such obsessive-compulsives that the last time they sent an army to "Bring Order To The Prime Material" they got an average of 3.47 feet before they had to stop the advance and start to tidy the place up.

So, they invented the Gelatinous Cube to tidy the place up in advance, unfortunately this proved a failure since they misjudged the Prime Material plane's ability to regenerate dirt and rubbish.

Either that, or we're looking at it the wrong way - Gelatinous Cubes are not 10' squares because dungeon corridors are that shape, but dungeon corridors are 10' square because Gelatinous Cubes are 10' cubes. Every few decades a Gelatinous Cube mutates into a "Volcanic Cube" and bores out a few new sections of 10' corridor before expiring.

You see, the Cubes created the dungeon. All the other creatures are just tenants whose detritus is the "rent" they pay to sustain their mindless landlords.

04-24-2010, 01:29 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

In physical terms zaratani are a fun adventure in and of themselves - how can you beat a living island? Not to mention a living island that can swallow you, Jonah-like, and might have unknown treasures in its belly? (Adventure seed of all adventure seeds there: "Please, brave adventurers - return the sword of peracles from the zaratan's belly and bring it back to Saxinfraxin land, before it's too late!")

Simple enough. Zaratan have no special resistance to magic, so there is a fair choice of spells that will dispose of one, just keep casting spells from a safe distance until it fails a save (which it will have to do eventually). I'd suggest polymorph other to turn it into a goldfish or mouse. The multi-ton detritus in its stomach would then explode it, and you just have to sort through the remains for treasure.

Ah polymorph other, the spell with a thousand uses.:o

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

But given their intelligence and ability to communicate, they also have the capacity to be moving adventure-dispensers of their very own, fonts of wisdom or disinformation, or even movers and shakers on a global level.

Yes, but what kind of missions would a Zaratan be interested in sending PCs on? They think on a much slower and larger scale than humanoids there are probably serious communication difficulties. It might take decades for a Zaratan to telepathically instruct its Shaman-Priest in whatever task it wishes them to undertake (find its stolen eggs, get rid of the pollution that's harming the fish catch, dredge a sea-channel so that the Zaratan can swim through it, et cetera).

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
In short, we like the zaratan.

So do I! You've left out two of the reasons I like them though...

Zaratans "have even been used as a mobile base for pirates and corsairs" - the Sea Caballeros have many fearsome tales of the Giant Turtle Buccaneers!

When not sleeping "The zaratan spends the rest of its time either mating or conversing with others of its own kind... The courtship ritual may take decades, and the mating itself lasts as long as a year." - sounds like they have a pleasant existence.:cool:

04-24-2010, 01:32 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by demiurge1138
One of my players many years ago told me he wanted to play a zaratan. A zaratan wizard, specifically, whose familiar was the hive-mind of monks who lived on a monastery on his back.

Yeah, I vetoed that one. But it's still a neat idea.

A wizard? Its spell books must be something to see!

I'd have thought a Zaratan priest or psion would be more practical.

04-24-2010, 01:55 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM
A wizard? Its spell books must be something to see!

The monastery on its back has a collection of scrolls and tablets covering an assortment of eldritch fields, sufficient to rival the collection of any purely terrestrial library. Once a day, while the great turtle sleeps, novices rappel down its ear canal to the stand of great tin horns that press against the mighty beast's ear drum. Then, in chorus, they proceed to recite spell formulae in well-trained, deeply resonant voices.

Unlike human wizards, the zaratan has figured out a way to memorize spells while it sleeps.

04-24-2010, 05:33 PM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Our campaigns never really went to the sea so the zaratan was one of those monsters that just never got used.

04-24-2010, 07:05 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

Our campaigns never really went to the sea so the zaratan was one of those monsters that just never got used.

This is one of the great problems with the MM. So many sea monsters, so little use. Then again I'm sure most DMs have considered running sea-centric campaigns at some time or another.

04-24-2010, 09:21 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

Then again I'm sure most DMs have considered running sea-centric campaigns at some time or another.

...purely so that they could use all those fish monsters.

04-24-2010, 09:46 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

...purely so that they could use all those fish monsters.

AD&D has that weird spell, airy water. What if it just wasn't some odd wizard coming up with an unconventional solution to the interaction problem that segregates the air-breathing and water-breathing communities? What if it's a natural condition? There are lightning storms, and there are bolts from the blue. There are volcanoes that spit out rivers of incandescent rock, and there are sapient sparks of magma that wander off on their own in search of things to burn. There are fish so big, they can spin around and around like a dizzy top, and create a whirlpool. D&D's weather and other natural phenomena already has a Fortean twist.

What if sometimes the rain just pours down so hard that the composition of the sky naturally becomes half water and half air? Sputtering halflings peek out from their burrows and stare up at the bubbles, half-drowning. And the fish and their non-piscine but still fully aquatic friends look up at the water's surface, and notice it's no longer so impermeable. They stick their heads out, breathe in. And like catfish with legs who occasionally wander from one mud flat to the next, some species just shrug off the water, and ascend into the watery air.

While the airy/watery storm lasts, the fish migrate. They cross land barriers, spreading like invasive species. They race through the air in vast schools, glittering scales covering the already-occluded sky the same way flocks of passenger pigeon or clouds of locusts blackened the day at the start of the last century. While the partial phase-change endures in the firmament, they race frantically across the underbellies of the swollen clouds, seeking the next pond, the next river, the next lake, the next ocean.

Some fail, and as the meteorological phenomenon passes they fall to the ground, where they flop helplessly and die in the suddenly more arid air. Which explains all those stories about raining sea cats and dog fish. But some make it.

Giant phosphorescent jellyfish with strands that trail for miles, cuttle-kraken that swoop and dive and leave ink-mark graffiti, sharks that shoot laser beams from their eyes, and hundreds of lesser species follow the ephemeral road. And some can't resist the urge to swoop down into the (not seaweed) jungles, and snatch an elf or two.

It's D&D. If the party won't go to the ocean, bring the ocean to the party.

04-24-2010, 10:00 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Either that, or we're looking at it the wrong way - Gelatinous Cubes are not 10' squares because dungeon corridors are that shape, but dungeon corridors are 10' square because Gelatinous Cubes are 10' cubes. Every few decades a Gelatinous Cube mutates into a "Volcanic Cube" and bores out a few new sections of 10' corridor before expiring.

You see, the Cubes created the dungeon. All the other creatures are just tenants whose detritus is the "rent" they pay to sustain their mindless landlords.

This, by the way, is a great idea. Gelatinous cubes fit perfectly into the weirdly regular dungeon corridors because the cubes made the corridors as part of their lair.

It explains why there are so many dungeons out there, too: at one point the Cubes were more common creatures, but have recently been hunted to extinction by adventurers and goblins seeking a lair of their own.

04-25-2010, 01:14 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

This, by the way, is a great idea. Gelatinous cubes fit perfectly into the weirdly regular dungeon corridors because the cubes made the corridors as part of their lair.

It explains why there are so many dungeons out there, too: at one point the Cubes were more common creatures, but have recently been hunted to extinction by adventurers and goblins seeking a lair of their own.

No, the goblins aren't killing them, they round them up using torches on 10-foot poles and drive them to the undermarket to be sold to certain members of the Deep Races, who are using the cubes to excavate vast new dungeon complexes far deeper than any surface race has ventured.

The demand for "tunneling cubes" has grown so great the wild population is sorely depleted. It's a pity they're so hard to breed in captivity.

04-25-2010, 01:18 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

AD&D has that weird spell, airy water. What if it just wasn't some odd wizard coming up with an unconventional solution to the interaction problem that segregates the air-breathing and water-breathing communities? What if it's a natural condition? There are lightning storms, and there are bolts from the blue. There are volcanoes that spit out rivers of incandescent rock, and there are sapient sparks of magma that wander off on their own in search of things to burn. There are fish so big, they can spin around and around like a dizzy top, and create a whirlpool. D&D's weather and other natural phenomena already has a Fortean twist.

SNIP

I like this idea, it explains all the Flying Sharks, Walking Whales and other peculiar beasts of land and sea that seem rather "fishy" - they're previously airy-water migrating species that liked the journey over the land so much they decided to stay.

If a bulette, or "landshark", can produce sweat that turns solid earth to watery mud, why can't an "airshark" exude a substance that turns air watery, so it can keep swimming and breathing in comfort.

04-25-2010, 02:10 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

If a bulette, or "landshark", can produce sweat that turns solid earth to watery mud, why can't an "airshark" exude a substance that turns air watery, so it can keep swimming and breathing in comfort.

Airsharks are in one of the Arduin Grimoire books, aren't they? Or some other old-school D&D supplement that carefully avoids identifying itself as such?

04-25-2010, 12:04 PM

UnknownCorrespondent

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

While the airy/watery storm lasts, the fish migrate. They cross land barriers, spreading like invasive species. They race through the air in vast schools, glittering scales covering the already-occluded sky the same way flocks of passenger pigeon or clouds of locusts blackened the day at the start of the last century. While the partial phase-change endures in the firmament, they race frantically across the underbellies of the swollen clouds, seeking the next pond, the next river, the next lake, the next ocean.

<http://ursulav.deviantart.com/art/Pu...ation-60553213> :)

04-26-2010, 05:57 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

If it's a weird beast D&D has it. Comeon, this is the game that has acid breathing sharks. :)

04-27-2010, 04:59 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Airsharks are in one of the Arduin Grimoire books, aren't they? Or some other old-school D&D supplement that carefully avoids identifying itself as such?

The only official D&D flying shark I can think of offhand is the Terlen. That's from the 3E Fiend Folio though, and I don't think it appeared earlier.

That said, I'm sure there are other D&D flying shark monsters floating about earlier editions, officially or otherwise.

04-27-2010, 05:36 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by UnknownCorrespondent

<http://ursulav.deviantart.com/art/Pu...ation-60553213> :)

If she had a sword and a chainmail bikini, and one of those puffers was in the process of biting her head off, that would be perfect. :)

04-28-2010, 12:20 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

If she had a sword and a chainmail bikini, and one of those puffers was in the process of biting her head off, that would be perfect. :)

Nah, that redhead is obviously a magic-user. She should be blasting those fish out of the air with fireball and magic missile.

Furthermore, as a card carrying Sea Caballero I can assure you those are not Vorpal Flying Puffer Fish. The bone-pale skin and long spines quite clearly shows they're Necromantic Flying Puffer Fish. That species shoots poison-spines which turn their victims into zombies.:cool:

04-29-2010, 04:42 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

The only official D&D flying shark I can think of offhand is the Terlen. That's from the 3E Fiend Folio though, and I don't think it appeared earlier.

That said, I'm sure there are other D&D flying shark monsters floating about earlier editions, officially or otherwise.

One issue of Polyhedron has several flying fish monsters, inc sharks.

And the terlen is a bad conversion of a Gamma World monster (the terl is a flying baracuda that reflects lasers from its feathers).

05-01-2010, 04:22 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

One issue of Polyhedron has several flying fish monsters, inc sharks.

That doesn't surprise me at all.

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

And the terlen is a bad conversion of a Gamma World monster (the terl is a flying baracuda that reflects lasers from its feathers).

Obviously a defence it evolved for protection against the Flying Sharks With Lasers on Their Heads.:p

...or those bears have invaded from Synnibar.

05-01-2010, 02:44 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

...or those bears have invaded from Synnibar.

Synnibarr. The bears come with extra "grr"!

05-04-2010, 04:47 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

Obviously a defence it evolved for protection against the Flying Sharks With Lasers on Their Heads.:p

Lasers are an environmental stress in GW. An nothing says weird like a blue feathered fish (with out wings) that flies down and bites a chunk off a character.

05-05-2010, 02:49 AM

Ginkomortus

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Actually, wait, gelatinous cubes clearing dungeon hallways from the rock isn't a horrible idea, but they're not the masters of that.

They're oozes, right?

And, let's just hearken back to the posts of yore, where every third monster was once a proud race that ruled in the depths of time, now fallen and degenerate. What was the first being that ruled, though?

The yellow mold.

That vast, ochre intelligence, spread across the planet in a thin film of scum. ITs sentience depended on the connection of all ITs parts, but in those early, angry days, the earth had no settled, and belched forth deadly fumes and worse into the stormy skies. Fearful of losing ITself, or of being broken down into mere idiot puddles, IT proposed to dig itself a labyrinth of caverns in the dark of the bedrock. IT even, through ITs superior intellect, devised a plan for these tunnels, a circuitry for the dungeons beneath the earth...

And so IT created, using lesser oozes and slimes that parts of ITself had herded like sheep for generations, a new ooze. An ooze designed to geometric and genetic precision. Programmed to carve out the circuitry of the vast yellow mold mind from the rock, and to devour and excrete the metals within the earth, lining the perfectly square hallways of these dungeons with a micro-thin layer of doped semiconductors, the better to speed ITs thoughts.

05-06-2010, 07:15 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Braaaaaiiiiiiiiiinssss

hint hint

05-07-2010, 12:35 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by (un)reason

Braaaaaiiiiiiiiiinssss

hint hint

But....but....we'll never see the thread again after that! We must hide our infamous friends so we can continue talking about....something.

05-07-2010, 01:25 PM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

But....but....we'll never see the thread again after that! We must hide our infamous friends so we can continue talking about....something.

Well, there's some random encounter tales and summon monster lists after the zombies, right?

Not the same, though, I guess.

05-07-2010, 01:27 PM

Thordic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

We can move on to the compendiums if we need to :)

Not quite the same but theres some winners in there.

05-07-2010, 02:08 PM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thordic

We can move on to the compendiums if we need to :)

Not quite the same but theres some winners in there.

True. I have Compendiums 1&2, Ravenloft Compendiums 1-3, Planescape 1&2, Mysteria, and Dark Sun 2 myself.

Has officially given up on finding my Dark Sun 1 Someone must've trashed it without me knowing. I've dug through the entire garage.

05-07-2010, 06:34 PM

SlyBen

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Planescape! In addition to all 3 monstrous compendiums, don't forget the monstrous supplements from the main campaign boxed set, and the planes of chaos, planes of law, and planes of conflict boxed sets. (Yes, I love me some Planescape.)

I may have sort of already been going over them on my own blog, inspired directly by this thread and a similar project or two. I wouldn't mind crossposting that stuff to its own rpg.net thread if there was interest. But I'd also be interested in following along if somebody else wanted to go there.

05-08-2010, 01:47 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thordic

We can move on to the compendiums if we need to :)

Not quite the same but theres some winners in there.

Need to? I thought we were already going to!

05-08-2010, 01:52 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
Synnibarr. The bears come with extra "grr"!

In that case shouldn't they be bearrs?;)

05-08-2010, 06:18 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

How about a vote then about the first Compendium we go through?

With Dark Sun about to roll in for 4E I'd kind of like us to do Dark Sun 1 if someone has it, if not Dark Sun 2. So that's my personal vote.

05-08-2010, 06:44 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Sounds good to me. MC I & II are pretty much all duplicated in the MM anyway, so we can probably skip those. Even with that, there's more than 12 options, so let's start with the first one from each campaign world. That actually works out at exactly 12, so I'll set that up in a sec.

Edit: It is done

05-08-2010, 07:04 PM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I'm not sure. Looking at my Compendium Annual 1&2 there's a lot of monsters that aren't in the MM. Heck, I don't see any that are. The main overlap I see are a few of the monsters are also in compendiums that are campaign specific and even there it's not that high.

05-08-2010, 07:15 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Hmm, I'd better actually look at them.

It does seem like they did condense the mundane animal entries a lot in the MM compared to MC1 & 2. But I can't see any that are actually missing. Can you spot any?

Edit: oh, you're talking about the annuals, not the compendia. D'oh. Yeah, I should probably have dropped one of the planar options and put the first annual in it's place. Oh well.

05-09-2010, 02:57 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Unfortunately I don't have many of the 2nd Edition monster sources, but I'm happy to tag along for those I don't have.

I'd rather be methodical and do them in chronological order. We can probably skip over the first two volumes of the Monstrous Compendium, since almost all the monsters are included in Monstrous Manual (although in seriously truncated versions for many of the animals).

From glancing through monster lists on wikipedia the only monster in the first two MC volumes I saw that's not in the MM was the Animal, Minimalis.

That would put Volume Three up first - The Forgotten Realms Appendix (1989).

05-10-2010, 03:20 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

My vote is for the Annuals. They were meant to be a continuation for the MM and are as generic.

05-11-2010, 01:14 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well it looks like we might have made it... Yes it looks we made it to the end...

I'll miss doing this. But I have threatened to move on to the Planescape MCs in the past, so you never know... (I don't have any of the annuals.)

Anyway, without further ado...

Zombie

Brains!

As unreason so eloquently put it,

You all know what a zombie is, but let's give the MM definition, as a kind of send-off (I've always loved the MM definitions for monsters everybody knows about already):

Quote:

Zombies are mindless, animated corpses controlled by their creators, usually evil wizards or priests. The condition of the corpse is not changed by the animating spell. If the body was missing a limb, the zombie created from it would be missing the same limb. Since it is difficult to get fresh bodies, most zombies are in sorry shape, usually missing hair and flesh, and sometimes even bones. This affects their movement, making it jerky and uneven. Usually zombies wear the clothing they died (or were buried) in. The rotting stench from a zombie might be noticeable up to 100 feet away, depending upon the condition of the body. Zombies cannot talk, being mindless, but have been known to utter a low moan when unable to complete an assigned task.

The interesting thing here, in my opinion, is that zombies are "controlled by their creators", which is a trope that seems to have fallen by the way side in popular zombie horror. When was the last time zombies in a film were controlled by anyone or anything beyond a desire to eat and pass on the disease? (Unless you include the 70s version of Invasion of the Body Snatchers, where the pod people kind of sort of have a motivation beyond this.) The mindless aggression of the zombies in films like Night of the Living Dead and 28 Whatever Later is compelling, but in itself has by now become a bit trite, so the D&D zombie has something of a refreshing old school feel about it.

The only thing really to say about standard zombies that I can think of is that they can be made from any humanoid creature. This is important, as it allows the creation of dwarf, elf, ogre, orc, or even giant zombies (if we stretch the meaning of the word "humanoid" a little). I have experimented with zombie dwarves on many occasions, though I have never seen a zombie elf. This will change next time I run D&D, probably.

We also have a veritable bonanza of zombie alternatives on offer:

Ju-Ju Zombie - These are somewhat more intelligent and "with it" zombies who are created by energy drain spells and (guess what?) have a hatred for living things. (Is there an undead D&D monster which doesn't have a hatred for living things? Not that I'm complaining.) The Ju-ju is a sort of Waffen SS zombie, being tougher and meaner than its regular colleague, and they even have a thief skill (climb walls). Exception based design, the Ju-ju zombie rejects thee!

Zombie Lord - These are uber-zombies which are created when a resurrection spell goes awry, though this is disappointingly rare. (Only evil people killed by undead who fail their resurrection survival roll and are blessed by an evil deity can achieve Zombie Lord status.) The MM doesn't make clear what happens if this happens to a PC, though I suspect the answer would, boringly, be "he becomes an NPC in control of the DM".

Sea Zombie - These are the animated corpses of drowned sailors, brought to life by somebody called "Nerull the Reaper", whoever he is. (He doesn't sound very nice, that's for sure.) As usual, they hate the living. Mysteriously, lots of them are priests (because we all know lots of priests drown at sea, right?). They attack ships and cause disease to those who are wounded by infecting the water with bacteria, which I think is a nice touch.

And that's that. No more zombies, and no more MM. Feels like a somewhat anti-climactic point on which to finish - though this is entirely suitable, as these threads began with an entirely anti-climactic beginning (the Aaracokra).

So, final point of discussion: What are your top 5 (or top 10, if you're feeling adventurous) MM monsters? I'll put my list up after much handwringing.

05-11-2010, 01:15 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I should also add:

Thanks!

to all the regular commenters. You know who you are. You really made writing these threads worthwhile, and your contributions have been both mad and brilliant 99% of the time.

I will at some point distill these threads into pdf form, god willing. If you would like a copy, please send me a PM with your email addy and I'll put you on the waiting list.

05-11-2010, 01:40 AM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

... brought to life by somebody called "Nerull the Reaper", whoever he is. (He doesn't sound very nice, that's for sure.) As usual, they hate the living. Mysteriously, lots of them are priests (because we all know lots of priests drown at sea, right?).

Greyhawk deity of death: Nerull Basically, the Grim Reaper, Gygaxed.

Not nearly as interesting as Wee Jas. Greyhawk also has Incubulos as another take on the death-as-hooded-skeleton theme.

And, these threads have been quite fun and entertaining. Good work, noisms!

05-11-2010, 03:12 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

The only thing really to say about standard zombies that I can think of is that they can be made from any humanoid creature. This is important, as it allows the creation of dwarf, elf, ogre, orc, or even giant zombies (if we stretch the meaning of the word "humanoid" a little). I have experimented with zombie dwarves on many occasions, though I have never seen a zombie elf. This will change next time I run D&D, probably.

3rd ed was all about the weird zombies, in my experience. I know I read at least one adventure featuring zombie whales, for example. And lots with zombie ogres.

05-11-2010, 05:22 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

All we want to do is eat your brains. We're not unreasonable, nobody is going to eat your eyes! I honestly don't think I've ever been in a D&D 2E campaign where there haven't been zombies. They were like Kobolds in 4E. You did a low level adventure and eventually a zombie would come and try and eat you.

05-11-2010, 05:45 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

3rd ed was all about the weird zombies, in my experience. I know I read at least one adventure featuring zombie whales, for example. And lots with zombie ogres.

Zombie whales.

A really big trebuchet, (un?)manned by zombie ogres.

A whale-sized parachute. Or even a paraglider, for the commandowhales.

Rancid blubbery brain-eating death from above.

05-11-2010, 06:12 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Okay, here's a question: Why are zombies hungry?

When the body dies, the digestive track stops working. It can no longer absorb all those nutrients.

All zombies do is masticate. Gnaw. Munch. Gobble. They don't ingest. And if they gorge themselves, there's nowhere for all the food to go. Eventually, their stomach will burst. All that yummy food just runs out the hole in their belly.

And curiously, they don't seem to crave the brains they've already eaten. Otherwise, they'd just sit there constantly swallowing the same bits of brain, again and again. Easier than chasing down a random group of skittish teenagers, after all.

Maybe that's the point. Mommy birds spitting half-digested food down their chicks' throats, Gerber's turnip and squash mush, cows horking up wads of grass to go ferment a little in the next stomach along the gastrointestinal assembly line. The end result is predigested mash.

The hunger for brains is telling. Something out there, in the shadows, definitely like brains. And not just any brains. Zombies don't slaver over gerbil and gopher skulls, after all. They want smarter brains. Sapient brains.

But that same brain-loving thing is apparently missing teeth. It needs a tool, a device to extract gray matter from the rigid braincase, and break up the already fairly mushy material into pulpy, easily-consumed morsels.

That's what zombies are for. Whatever it is, the zombies are its mobile pre-processing units. Von Newman eating machines. Viral dentition.

05-11-2010, 06:14 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

All zombies do is masticate. Gnaw. Munch. Gobble. They don't ingest.

...like Cookie Monster.

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Maybe that's the point. Mommy birds spitting half-digested food down their chicks' throats, Gerber's turnip and squash mush, cows horking up wads of grass to go ferment a little in the next stomach along the gastrointestinal assembly line. The end result is predigested mash.

The hunger for brains is telling. Something out there, in the shadows, definitely like brains. And not just any brains. Zombies don't slaver over gerbil and gopher skulls, after all. They want smarter brains. Sapient brains.

But that same brain-loving thing is apparently missing teeth. It needs a tool, a device to extract gray matter from the rigid braincase, and break up the already fairly mushy material into pulpy, easily-consumed morsels.

Elderly Mind Flayer, who lost his tentacles? Aging Intellect Devourers?

05-11-2010, 06:23 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Elderly Mind Flayer, who lost his tentacles? Aging Intellect Devourers?

Not sure. The illithid are already over-burdened with cool ideas, and I don't know a lot about intellect devourers (except for the silly ustilagor retcon).

Something extradimensional, perhaps. Assimilation, or even art?

05-11-2010, 12:02 PM

Kakita Kojiro

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

3rd ed was all about the weird zombies, in my experience. I know I read at least one adventure featuring zombie whales, for example. And lots with zombie ogres.

You kids nowadays, impressed by zombie whales. Pshaw. Why Delecti the Necromancer was doing zombie whales in the Upland Swamp over in RuneQuest back in the 70s! And he sewed on dinosaur legs so his zombie whale could stomp around the swamp!

hobbles off to yell at kids on lawn

05-11-2010, 10:43 PM

Strangething

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Did the Ju-ju Zombie ever get updated to 3e? Or is that name too politically incorrect for the 21st century?

05-11-2010, 10:47 PM

Ithaeur

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething

Did the Ju-ju Zombie ever get updated to 3e? Or is that name too politically incorrect for the 21st century?

I don't recall seeing them anywhere, so probably not.

Also, noisms: Thank you for starting these threads, and carrying on to the Zombie Apocalypse at the end of it! :)

05-11-2010, 10:53 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

So, final point of discussion: What are your top 5 (or top 10, if you're feeling adventurous) MM monsters? I'll put my list up after much handwringing.

Deepspawn, aboleth, crabmen*, the Spelljammer beholders as a whole and quaggoth.

*I wouldn't have thought much of them until this thread.

Ironic because I think beholders are stupid.

And don't forget the last page- how to create critters and its uber teddy bear.

05-12-2010, 12:02 AM

demiurge1138

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Officially, the juju zombie turned up in 3e with the Unapproachable East Forgotten Realms book. They were always doing that--relegating cool monsters to FR. Like bullywugs, leucrotta and deepspawn.

05-12-2010, 03:21 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, deepspawn are a FR critter. They were first in Dwarves' Deep.

05-12-2010, 06:01 AM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

My favorite monsters in MM2E were probably:

1. Deep Dragon-Makes a wonderful behind the scenes plotter who's also dangerous in direct combat.
2. Feyr-Feels very Mythos inspired which appeals to me.
3. Zombie-Classics. You can't go through level 1 without at least facing a few.
4. Flesh Golem. Because no mad scientist story is complete without it.
5. Vampiric Mist. I watched a lot of B-Rated movies as a kid. Including one about blood sucking mist.

05-14-2010, 09:38 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

My Top 5 Entries

In no particular order:

- Kenku. I like tricky and mysterious races, and I think the fact that the designers left Kenku motivations entirely unsaid works well. They're a blank sheet for DMs.
- Mind Flayer. Iconic D&D monsters with a twist of Cthulu. Make great villains and somehow never become cliché.
- Gnoll. My favourite bog-standard evil humanoid race. And probably my favourite piece of art in the book.
- Carrion Crawler. This one is simple, but it just oozes old school appeal.
- Crabmen. Another blank sheet race for the DM, and a fun morally ambiguous type.

05-14-2010, 10:10 PM

Eliott

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

So basically the zombie lord is a nerf lich for lower level parties?

I remember one basically doing that gig in one of the ravenloft adventures.

05-14-2010, 10:18 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Eliott

So basically the zombie lord is a nerf lich for lower level parties?

I remember one basically doing that gig in one of the ravenloft adventures.

Basically yes.

I'm not sure why the designers felt the need for that sort of thing. The point of a Lich is surely to make the players go "Oooh!" when they come across one for the first time, not "Oh, it's like that zombie lord we killed, except a bit tougher".

05-15-2010, 03:56 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Eliott

So basically the zombie lord is a nerf lich for lower level parties?

I remember one basically doing that gig in one of the ravenloft adventures.

I'm surprised noisms left out the "best" bit about the Zombie Lord. Get within 90 feet of a Zombie Lord and you must save vs poison against its "odor of death" or suffer a random (1d6) horrible fate, with equal chances for weakness, cause disease, losing a point of Con, contagion, incapacitating nausea for 1d4 rounds or instant death followed by zombification.

Yes, they reek so bad it can kill your PC and turn their corpse into a Zombie. Compared to them, ghouls must smell like roses.

They can also animate dead once per day. Doesn't sound so special, except they can use the power on living creatures too - save vs death or become a zombie.

05-15-2010, 03:58 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Strangething

Did the Ju-ju Zombie ever get updated to 3e? Or is that name too politically incorrect for the 21st century?

Didn't these have some kind of gaze attack in 1st edition? Unless my memory deceives me, in the original Monster Manual II if a Ju-Ju Zombie surprises someone they can look into their eyes and do something nasty to them, like paralysis or energy drain. I can't recall for sure.

05-15-2010, 04:10 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

So you aren't going to review the super teddy bear on the page after the zombie? Its one of the best jokes in the book.

05-15-2010, 05:19 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I think the juju zombie did make it into 3E. I'll have to check which book though.

05-15-2010, 05:34 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

I think the juju zombie did make it into 3E. I'll have to check which book though.

Unapproachable East, according to demiurge1138 a few posts ago.

05-15-2010, 05:38 AM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

- Crabmen. Another blank sheet race for the DM, and a fun morally ambiguous type.

Look liek men, taste liek crabs.

05-15-2010, 05:52 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Unapproachable East, according to demiurge1138 a few posts ago.

That's 2E. 3E renamed it Oriental Adventures and there's no Juju Zombie in that.

05-15-2010, 06:35 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

That's 2E. 3E renamed it Oriental Adventures and there's no Juju Zombie in that.

In 3E, Unapproachable East (2003) is a Forgotten Realms book. With the juju zombie template (and a sample bugbear) on pages 66-67.

05-15-2010, 06:56 AM

Celisasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

In 3E, Unapproachable East (2003) is a Forgotten Realms book. With the juju zombie template (and a sample bugbear) on pages 66-67.

Ah. I don't have that book. Ah well.

05-15-2010, 09:22 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

So you aren't going to review the super teddy bear on the page after the zombie? Its one of the best jokes in the book.

Eh? That isn't in my book...

05-15-2010, 09:22 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Anyway, I've now downloaded all five of these threads and will shortly commence pdf-izing them. The offer is still open if you'd like me to send you a copy. Just pm me.

05-15-2010, 10:20 PM

celebrityomnipath

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I wonder, how much brains could a Mindflayer Zombie eat?

05-15-2010, 11:09 PM

(un)reason

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

My top 5, in before the lock.

5: Invisible stalker, if just for the picture. :D

4: Mongrelmen. They're just so tragic. Unlike the other low level humanoids, they have really cool abilities and a real moral dilemma attached to killing them.

3: Beholders: So many awesome varieties of weird and wonderful creature. One of D&D's few truly original monsters.

2: Kenku. Tricksters extraordinaire, and still inscrutable to this day. One of my real underrated favourites to use in actual play.

1: Deepspawn: Making dungeons make more sense from an ecological point of view, and serving as great big bosses too. They deserve a lot more credit for keeping adventurers in work over the years.

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

My favorites, at least today:

Aboleth: A primal enemy from an unimaginably distant age. Just look at them: With their size and their eyes and their slime and their tentacles — there's just something about that shape that screams wrong to our primate eyes. Then combine with vile coercive powers and an alien civilization that may just be waiting patiently for the waters to once again rise and wash away the surface races.

Otyugh: Someone bioengineered a sewer system. It's one of those tiny bits of world building that causes my brain to bubble and churn. Who did it? What does it say about the world? What else is out there?

Kobold: Take a wimpy little humanoid that by any right can barely survive on its own, then toss in a bit of Fantasy Fucking Vietnam filtered through Tucker's lens. Oh, and they're scabbling marginal survivors made good, not draconians. Dog-lizards.

Lich: What's more classic than an obscenely powerful wizard who traded a chance to get a prom date for immortality?

Derro: What's not to like? Bugfuck insane little people ruled by the Cult of Personality. Above those mad eyes are shocks of white hair, probably because they learned something Dwarves Were Not Meant to Know. Then top them off with MacGyver-esque weapons designed solely to capture victims in the most painful possible way. Straight out of Indiana Jones.

I also like bugbears (giant furry goblins that pad around stealthily? Yes, please), gnolls (scavenger packs roaming the barrens), ghouls (from Lovecraft to Niven, there's just something visceral), gnomes (before the illusionist rubbed off), beholders (scrap some of the backstory and call it what it is: a deliberately-designed war machine, gone rogue), and the death knight (the fallen paladin turned black and dead, with a 20-dicefireball).

05-16-2010, 04:10 AM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
Eh? That isn't in my book...

Did you read the page after the zombie entry? The teddy bear does not have a full write up, just a passing mention in the "how to design creatures" essay.

05-16-2010, 04:29 AM

Hexmage

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper
...beholders (scrap some of the backstory and call it what it is: a deliberately-designed war machine, gone rogue)...

From what I understand, that's actually the official backstory for beholders in the Eberron setting.

05-16-2010, 05:54 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH
Did you read the page after the zombie entry? The teddy bear does not have a full write up, just a passing mention in the "how to design creatures" essay.

You mean the instructions for the blank monster form?

05-16-2010, 07:07 PM

DMH

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms
You mean the instructions for the blank monster form?

Yes. It is under the combat statistics entry.

05-16-2010, 11:49 PM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hexmage

From what I understand, that's actually the official backstory for beholders in the Eberron setting.

Good.

Because the "rogue mother-god barfs up eggs across the universe" from Lords of Madness struck me as a little silly.

05-17-2010, 01:18 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Hexmage

From what I understand, that's actually the official backstory for beholders in the Eberron setting.

That's how I treat Beholders in my homebrew campaign too. They're biomechanical war machines, made ages ago by the Great Race of Yith to defend them in an Elder War. Like a lot of folk I mixed a bit of Lovecraft in my D&D.

05-17-2010, 01:31 AM

Hexmage

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Sleeper

Good.

Because the "rogue mother-god barfs up eggs across the universe" from Lords of Madness struck me as a little silly.

The origin for beholders in the default Points of Light setting is kind of like that. Basically, there's this area deep in the Underdark known as the Hatchlands where beholder "eggs" made from stone spontaneously generate. The eggs are vessels containing the essence of the Far Realm. Also, the Great Mother's existence is more of a theory than an absolute fact.

05-17-2010, 01:36 AM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by DMH

Did you read the page after the zombie entry? The teddy bear does not have a full write up, just a passing mention in the "how to design creatures" essay.

For the benefit of those without the Monstrous Manual to hand, the relevant passage is:

Quote:

Originally Posted by MM

Combat Statistics: This includes such values as Hit Dice and Armor Class. They should match the physical description of the monster. A well-designed monster fights the way it looks. A small, fuzzy creature with big, soft eyes should not have 25 Hit Dice, an Armor Class of -8, and swoop through the air to attack. The amount of damage done should reflect the weapon being used. Avoid the tendency to give monsters excessive Hit Dice and damage capabilities. The DM is the only person who gets a kick from seeing a PC suffer 40 points of damage in one round; players don't find that amusing at all.

I'm not sure that's good advice. You can easily have a monster that deceives its prey by seeming harmless, and I'd feel no compunction about including one if I left clues lying around - the traditional piles of gnawed bones and terrified locals whispering warnings of the "Death Beast".

Appearances can be deceptive, especially in a world with illusion and polymorph magic.

Besides, what about the PC/NPCs - a high level character can look like an ordinary human but have more hit points than a dragon. If they're a monk they may even do more damage with their bare hands than a dragon does with claws and fangs!

My main objection to "Fluffy the Killer monster" is that it might lead to rampant quoting from Monty Python and the Holy Grail. Few things are better for slowing a game session.

05-17-2010, 03:30 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I'm not sure that's good advice. You can easily have a monster that deceives its prey by seeming harmless,

Obviously, the 2nd ed writers weren't fond of the Wolf in Shep's Clothing:

<http://www.headinjurytheater.com/ima...20clothing.jpg>

05-19-2010, 03:56 AM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

So who's going to start our first Compendium thread?

05-19-2010, 06:38 AM

Thordic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

What compendium are we starting with? Dark Sun won the poll, with Planescape in second.

Does noisms want to run the next one as well? He did a great job with this one but if he's worn out I'm sure someone else can take over.

05-19-2010, 06:48 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Or chronologically, skipping over the duplicates (the Monstrous Manual came out in 1993):

1989

MC1: Monstrous Compendium Volume One

MC2: Monstrous Compendium Volume Two

MC3: Monstrous Compendium Volume Three: Forgotten Realms Appendix

MC4: Monstrous Compendium Dragonlance Appendix

1990

MC5: Monstrous Compendium Greyhawk Adventures Appendix

MC6: Monstrous Compendium Kara-Tur Appendix

MC7: Monstrous Compendium Spelljammer Appendix

1991

MC8: Monstrous Compendium Outer Planes Appendix

MC9: Monstrous Compendium Spelljammer Appendix

MC10: Monstrous Compendium Ravenloft Appendix

MC11: Monstrous Compendium Forgotten Realms Appendix

1992

MC12: Monstrous Compendium Dark Sun Appendix: Terrors of the Desert

MC13: Monstrous Compendium Al-Qadim Appendix

MC14: Monstrous Compendium Fiend Folio Appendix

1993

MC15: Monstrous Compendium Ravenloft Appendix II: Children of the Night

1994

Monstrous Compendium Annual Volume One

Mystara Monstrous Compendium Appendix

Planescape Monstrous Compendium Appendix

Ravenloft Monstrous Compendium Appendix III: Creatures of Darkness

1995

Dark Sun Monstrous Compendium Appendix II: Terrors Beyond Tyr

Monstrous Compendium Annual Volume Two

Planescape Monstrous Compendium Appendix II

1996

Monstrous Compendium Annual Volume Three

Ravenloft Monstrous Compendium Appendices I & II

1998

Monstrous Compendium Annual Volume Four

Planescape Monstrous Compendium Appendix III

Though chronologically by theme (all Ravenloft, etc.) wouldn't be bad, either.

05-19-2010, 09:22 AM

Celiasu

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Since Dark Sun won the poll, who has Dark Sun I and is willing to start? Or does anyone have Dark Sun I as a PDF and is willing to give it to someone else who'll start? Either or.

05-19-2010, 06:18 PM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thordic

What compendium are we starting with? Dark Sun won the poll, with Planescape in second.

Does noisms want to run the next one as well? He did a great job with this one but if he's worn out I'm sure someone else can take over.

I'm a bit burned out, to be honest, so I'd like to at least take a short break! ;)

05-19-2010, 10:02 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Celisasu

Since Dark Sun won the poll, who has Dark Sun I and is willing to start? Or does anyone have Dark Sun I as a PDF and is willing to give it to someone else who'll start? Either or.

Starting with Dark Sun's fine by me.

Anyone who doesn't have the original Dark Sun MCs but I think I can follow along with the information there is on athas.org.

Quote:

Originally Posted by noisms

I'm a bit burned out, to be honest, so I'd like to at least take a short break! ;)

Take your time! So long as whoever starts the "Let's Read the Dark Sun Monstrous Compendiums" thread posts a link to it here we'll be alright.

05-19-2010, 10:16 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

Obviously, the 2nd ed writers weren't fond of the Wolf in Shep's Clothing:

Aww, isn't it cute.:o

I can remember when that critter first crawled forth from a crashed spacecraft in the Barrier Peaks, blinking its eyestalks in wonder at the new world it had discovered.

Although it doesn't match the glory of an AC -8, HD 25 cute flying furball.

Now I'm getting tempted to stat up a Flying Vorpall Rabbit...:D

05-20-2010, 12:16 AM

Thordic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Do we really need ONE guy to do it all? I'm sure multiple people have the book and/or PDF.

Why not just try to average a post a day? So if you go look at the thread, there hasn't been a new monster posted in 48 hours, and you have the book, you can type up the next one?

If two people end up typing up the same monster because they were doing it at the same time, c'est la vie.

Not everyone has noisms superhuman stamina, and this way the thread doesn't crap out and die if someone disappears, goes on vacation, etc.

05-20-2010, 01:26 AM

noisms

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Thordic

Do we really need ONE guy to do it all? I'm sure multiple people have the book and/or PDF.

Why not just try to average a post a day? So if you go look at the thread, there hasn't been a new monster posted in 48 hours, and you have the book, you can type up the next one?

If two people end up typing up the same monster because they were doing it at the same time, c'est la vie.

Not everyone has noisms superhuman stamina, and this way the thread doesn't crap out and die if someone disappears, goes on vacation, etc.

I think we certainly can do without central planning. We need to think like Hayek, not Stalin! ;)

Whoever wants to start one of these threads should just go right ahead and start, in my view - devil take the hindmost.

05-20-2010, 02:06 AM

Asmodai

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

I doubt I can match your prose, however, I've taken the initiative to start a thread here: <http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=515916>

05-20-2010, 02:41 AM

Mr. Teapot

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by JRM

I can remember when that critter first crawled forth from a crashed spacecraft in the Barrier Peaks, blinking its eyestalks in wonder at the new world it had discovered.

You know, that makes me realize something. For all that the Wolf-In-Sheep's-Clothing is used as a D&D punchline, it is basically a Mimic with a more coherent backstory. It's an alien from a crashed spaceship, whose method of hunting involves identifying a harmless/enticing part of its environment and luring in enemies. That's way more sane than about half of all D&D monsters.

05-21-2010, 11:22 PM

JRM

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by Mr. Teapot

You know, that makes me realize something. For all that the Wolf-In-Sheep's-Clothing is used as a D&D punchline, it is basically a Mimic with a more coherent backstory. It's an alien from a crashed spaceship, whose method of hunting involves identifying a harmless/enticing part of its environment and luring in enemies. That's way more sane than about half of all D&D monsters.

I agree. Old sheepish-wolfie is sorely maligned, it's a far more plausible predator than many of D&D's monsters, if not most of them. Just because the rabbit on its head looks a bit goofy, people pick on the poor old thing.

Then again, the half-insanity can be one of the appealing things about some of D&D's monsters...

06-03-2010, 10:27 PM

EmperorSeth

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Well, I assume this thread is completely dead at this point, but did any of the new ones people suggested get started up? If so, I think we should link them at the end here. Continue the line, if you will.

06-03-2010, 10:57 PM

Thordic

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

Quote:

Originally Posted by EmperorSeth me this thread is completely dead at this point, but did any of the new ones people suggested get started up? If so, I think we should link them at the end here. Continue the line, if you will.

<http://forum.rpg.net/showthread.php?t=515916>

Dark Sun Appendix is there.

Not sure if we are going to go through both Dark Sun MM's before we move on to Planescape, but Planescape is next. Then maybe the Annuals? We've got enough books to keep us going for quite a while.

I have the first two Planescape MM's (the third one is ridiculously expensive used), and all four Annuals.

06-04-2010, 12:06 AM

Sleeper

Re: [Let's Read] AD&D 2e Monstrous Manual [Part V, Spr~ ?]

We can't rely on posting links to the new threads at the end of this one. It's over 1,000 posts, which means it's due to be locked.

Clicking on the "let's read" or "ad&d 2nd edition" tags at the bottom of the thread is another good way to find any sequels.